We rediscover this sphere everywhere. I was speaking to you the other day about Philolaos, he admits the same sphere at the centre of a world in which the earth has an eccentric position, already at the time of Pythagoras it was suspected for a very long time that the earth was eccentric, but it is not the sun which occupies the centre, it is a central spherical fire to which we, the face of the inhabited earth, always have our backs turned. With respect to this fire we are the way the moon is with respect to our earth and this is why we do not feel it. And it seems that it was in order that we should not nevertheless be burned by the central radiation that this person called Philolaos invented this lucubration which already perplexed the people of antiquity, even Aristotle himself: antichton, the anti-earth. What indeed could have been, apart from that, the necessity of this invention of this strictly invisible body (which was supposed to conceal all the powers opposed to those of the earth, which played at the same time, it appears, the role of fireguard), this is something - as they say - which would need to be analysed.

(12) But this is only intended to introduce you to this dimension (to which you know I accord a very great importance) of what one can call the astronomical, or again the Copernican revolution; and to definitively dot the i's on this point, namely - as I have pointed out to you - that it is not the geocentrism supposedly dismantled by Canon Koppernigk (Copernicus) which is the most important thing, and this is even the reason why it is rather false, rather vain, to call it a Copernican revolution. Because, if in his book On the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres, he shows us a form of the solar system which resembles our own (also the ones you find in the text books for the first year of secondary school) in which one sees the sun in the middle and all the stars turning around in the orb, it must be said that it was not at all a new schema, in the sense that everyone knew at the time of Copernicus (we are not the ones who discovered this) that, in antiquity, there was someone called Heraclitus, then Aristarchus of Samos, this has been absolutely confirmed, who had made the same schema.

The only thing which could have made of Copernicus something other than a historical phantasy, because he was nothing other than that, is if his system were, not just closer to the image that we have of the real solar system, but more true. And more true, that means more disencumbered from imaginary elements which have nothing to do with the modern symbolisation of the stars, more disencumbered than the system of Ptolemy. But this is not at all the case. His system is just as full of epicycles.

And what are epicycles? They are something invented and moreover no one could believe in the reality of epicycles; do not imagine that they were stupid enough to think that they would see, in the way you see when you open your watch, a series of little wheels. But there was this idea that the only perfect movement that one could imagine to be conceivable was the circular movement. Everything that was seen in the heavens was damned hard to interpret, because - as you know - these little wandering planets got into all sorts of irregular interloopings between themselves, whose zig-zags it was a question of explaining. People were not satisfied until each of the elements of their circuit could be reduced to a circular movement. The singular thing is that a better result was not arrived at, because, by combining turning movements with turning movements one might in principle think that one could manage to account for everything. In reality it was well and truly impossible for the reason that in the measure that they were better observed it was perceived that there were more things to explain, if only, when the telescope appeared, their variation in size. But it does not matter. The system of Copernicus was just as laden down with this kind of imaginary redundancy which encumbered it, weighed it down, as the system of Ptolemy.

What you must read during this vacation and - you are going to see that it is possible - for your pleasure, is namely how Kepler beginning from elements in Plato from the same Timaeus which I am going to speak to you about, namely from a purely imaginary conception - with the accent that this term has in the vocabulary that I use with you - of the universe entirely regulated according to the properties of the sphere articulated as such, as (13) being the form which carries within itself the virtues of sufficiency which mean that it can essentially combine in itself the eternity of the same place with eternal movement; it is around speculations which are moreover very refined of this kind because to our stupefaction he brings in the five perfect solids (as you know there are only five of them) inscribable within the sphere. And starting from this old Platonic speculation (already displaced thirty times, but which already was coming back into fashion at this turning point of the Renaissance) and from the reintegration into the occidental tradition of Platonic manuscripts, literally in the head of this personage (whose personal life, believe me, in the context of the Peasants' Revolt, then of the Thirty Years' War, is something special and which as you will see I am going to give you the means of referring to) the aforesaid Kepler, searching for these celestial harmonies, and by prodigious tenacity - one really sees the hide-and-seek of unconscious formations - manages to give the first grasp that we have had of something which is that in which there really consists the birth-date of the science of modern physics. In searching for a harmonic relationship, he comes to this relationship of the velocity of the planet on its orb to the area of the surface covered by the line which links the planet to the sun. Namely that he perceived at the same time that planetary orbits are ellipses.

And - believe me because people are talking about it everywhere - Koestler has written a very fine book which is called The Sleepwalkers, published by Johns Hopkins, which has been recently translated. And I asked myself what could Arthur Koestler make of it since he is not always considered to be an author whose inspiration is all that sure. I assure you that it is his best book. It is phenomenal, marvellous! You do not even need to know elementary mathematics, you will understand everything through the biography of Copernicus, of Kepler and of Galileo - with a bit of partiality as regards Galileo, it must be said that Galileo is a communist, he himself admits.

All of this to tell you that, communist or not, it is absolutely true that Galileo never paid the slightest attention to what Kepler discovered (however much of a genius Galileo was in his invention of what one can really call modern dynamics, namely to have discovered the exact law for the fall of bodies, which was an essential step) and of course despite the fact that it was always about this affair of geocentrism that he had all his problems, it nevertheless remains that Galileo was here, just as backward, just as reactionary, just as attached to the idea of perfect circular movement therefore the only possible one for celestial bodies, as the others. To speak plainly, Galileo had not even broken through what we call the Copernican revolution which as you know does not belong to Copernicus. You see then the time that truths take to make their way in the presence of a prejudice so solid as that of the perfection of circular movement.

I could talk to you about this for hours, because it is all the same very amusing to consider effectively why this is so, namely what are really the properties of circular movement and why the Greeks made of it the symbol of the limit, peirar as opposed to apeiron♦ A curious thing, it is precisely because it is one of the things most prepared to tip over into the apeiron, it is for this reason that I must do a little bit here to enlarge, to decrease, to reduce to a point, to infinitise this sphere for you. You know moreover that it served as a usual symbol for (14) this famous infinity. There is a lot to be said. Why should this form have privileged virtues? Naturally, this would plunge us into the heart of the problems concerning the value of the function of intuition in mathematical construction.

I would simply like to tell you that before all of these exercises which made us exorcise the sphere, so that its charm has continued to be exercised on dupes, the fact is that it was something all the same to which, as I might say, the philia of the spirit itself also stuck and nastily like some funny adhesive. And in any case, for Plato, here is where I would like to refer you to the Timaeus, and to the long development on the sphere; this sphere that he depicts for us in all its details corresponds curiously like an alternating strophe with everything that Aristophanes says about these spherical beings in the Symposium. Aristophanes tells us that they have feet, little members which point, which turn round and around.

But there is a relationship such that, from another side what Plato (with a kind of accentuation which is very striking as regards geometrical development) experiences the need to point out to us in passing, it is that this sphere has everything that it needs within: it is round, it is full, it is content, it loves itself, and then above all it does not need either eye nor ear because by definition it is the envelope of everything which might be living - but because of this fact it is Living Reality (le Vivant) par excellence. And what Living Reality is, all of that, is absolutely essential to know in order to give ourselves the mental dimension in which biology was able to develop. The notion of form as being essentially what constituted Living Reality was something which we should take in an extremely strict imaginary spelling out. So it has neither eyes, nor ears, it has no feet, no arms and a single movement was reserved to it, the perfect movement, one on itself; there are six of them; upwards, downwards, to the left, to the right, forward and backwards.

What I mean, is that from a comparison of these texts, the result is that through this kind of double-triggered mechanism, of making play the clown a personage who, for him, is the only one worthy of speaking about something like love, what we arrive at is that Plato seems to be amusing himself in the discourse of Aristophanes by engaging in a clowning, a comic exercise about his own conception of the world and of the soul of the world. The discourse of Aristophanes, is the deriding of the Platonic Sphairos, of the proper Sphairos articulated in the Timaeus. I am constrained by time and, of course, there would be many other things to say about it. So that the astronomical reference may be sure and certain, I am going to give you all the same - because it may seem to you that I am amusing myself - the proof: Aristophanes says that these three types of spheres that he has imagined, the all-male one, the all-female one, the male and female one (they each have all the same a pair of genitals) the heramphrodites as they are called, have origins and that these origins are in the stars. The first, the males, come from the sun; the others, the all-females, come from the earth, and the hermaphrodites from the moon. In this way there is confirmed the lunar origin of those, Aristophanes tells us (because it means nothing else than to have a composite origin) who have a tendency to adultery.

Does something here not highlight, and in a fashion I believe is sufficiently clear, in this relationship, this fascination illustrated by this contrast of this spherical form as being the form which it is a matter of not touching, a matter of not even (15) contesting. For centuries it left the human spirit in this error that there was a refusal to think that in the absence of any outside action, of any outside impulsion, the body is either at rest, or in a rectilinear uniform movement; the body at rest was supposed not to be able to have, outside the state of rest, anything other than a circular movement. All dynamics was barred by that.

Do we not see, in this sort of striking illustration which is given by the pen of this someone whom one can also call a poet, Plato, what is in question in these forms where nothing overlaps, where nothing allows itself to be hooked onto; nothing other than no doubt something which has its foundations in the imaginary structure - and I told you a little while ago that one could comment on it - but the adhesion, to which in so far as it is affective depends on -what... on nothing other than the Verwerfung of castration.

And it is so true that we also have it within the discourse of Aristophanes. Because these beings separated in two like half pears which are going, for a time which is not specified for us moreover because it is a mythical time, to die in a vain embrace as they try to rejoin one another and fated to these vain efforts of procreation in the earth (I will pass over also this whole myth of procreation from the earth, of beings born from the earth, this would take us too far). How will the question resolve itself; Aristophanes speaks to us here exactly like little Hans: they are going to have the genital organ which is in the wrong place unscrewed (because obviously it was at the place where it was when they were round, outside) and it is going to be screwed on to their stomachs, exactly like the tap in the dream which you know from the observation to which I am alluding.

The possibility of loving pacification is referred (which is something unique and stupefying from the pen of Plato) to something which undoubtedly has a relationship, to say the least, with an operation on the subject of the genitals. Whether or not we put that under the rubric of the castration complex, it is clear that what the detour of the text insists on here, is on the passage of the genitals to the anterior face, which does not simply mean that they come there to offer the possibility of coupling with, of rejoining the beloved object, but that literally the passage of the genitals comes with the beloved object into this kind of relationship as superimposition, as superimposition almost. It is the only point at which there is betrayed, at which there is expressed... how can one fail to be struck by it, in a personage like Plato whose apprehensions manifestly (concerning tragedy, he gives us a thousand proofs for it) did not go much further than those of Socrates, how can we fail to be struck by the fact that here, for the first time, the unique time, he brings into play in a discourse, and in a discourse concerning an affair which is a serious affair, that of love, the genital organ as such. And this confirms what I have told you to be the essential mainspring of the comic, which is always at bottom concerned with this reference to the phallus, it is not by chance that it is Aristophanes who says it. Only Aristophanes can talk like that. And Plato does not perceive that in making him talk about that he makes him talk about what is found here to bring us the see-saw, the hinge, the something which is going to immediately make all that follows in the discourse take on a different aspect. This is the point at which we will take things up the next time.

Seminar 7: Wednesday 11 January 1961

A little pause before making you enter into the great enigma of transference-love. A pause - I have my reasons for pausing from time to time. It is in effect a question of understanding one another, of not losing our bearings.

Since the beginning of this year, then, I feel the need to remind you that I think, in everything that I am teaching you, that all I have been pointing out to you is that the doctrine of Freud implicates desire in a dialectic. And there already I must pause for you to note that the branch road has already been taken; and already because of this, I said that desire is not a vital function, in the sense that positivism has given its status to life.

Therefore desire is taken up into a dialectic, because it is suspended - begin a parenthesis, I have said the form in which it was suspended: in the form of metonymy - suspended on a signifying chain, which is as such constitutive of the subject, that through which the subject is distinct from individuality taken simply in the hie et nunc - because do not forget that this hie et nunc is what defines it.

Let us make the effort to penetrate into what individuation might be, the instinct of individuality then, in so far as individuation is supposed for each of the individualities to have to reconquer, as is explained to us in psychology, through experience or through teaching, the whole real structure (which is not after all an easy matter) and moreover, something one is not able to conceive of without the supposition that it is more or less prepared for that by an adaptation, a cumulative adaptation. Already the human individual, qua knowledge, is supposed to be the flower of consciousness at the end of an evolution, as you know, of thought, something I put profoundly in doubt; not after all because I consider that this is a fruitless, or a pointless direction, but only in so far as the idea of evolution mentally habituates us to all sorts of elisions which are very damaging for our reflection - and I would say especially for us analysts, for our ethic. In any case, to return to these elisions, to show the gaps which the whole theory of evolution leaves open in so far as it always tends to cover up, to facilitate the understandableness of our experience, to reopen these gaps is something which to me seems essential. If evolution is true, in any case one thing is certain, which is that it is not, as Voltaire said speaking about something else, so natural as all that.

As regards desire, in any case, it is essential to refer ourselves to its conditions, which are the ones given by our experience upsets the whole problem of data which consist in the fact that the subject preserves an articulated chain outside consciousness, inaccessible to consciousness, a demand and not a pressure, a discontent, an imprint or whatever it may be that you attempt to characterise as being definable in the order of primitive tendencies. But on the contrary there is (2) traced there a trace, as I might say, invested with a trait, isolated as such, raised to a power that one could call ideographic, on condition that this term "ideographic" is well underlined as being in no way an index which can be brought to bear on anything isolated whatsoever, but always linked to the concatenations of the ideogram on a line with other ideograms themselves invested with this function which makes them signifying. This demand constitutes a claim eternalised in the subject, although latent and inaccessible to him: - a statute, a book of charges, (not at all the modulation which would result from some phonetic inscription of the negative inscribed on a film, a tape), - a trace, but one which fixes a date forever, - a recording (enregistrement) yes, but if you put the accent on the term recristre, one filed in the dossier, - a memory, yes, but in the sense that this term has in an electronic machine.

Well, it is the genius of Freud to have designated the support of this chain. I think that I have shown it sufficiently to you and I will show it again especially in an article which is the one I thought I should re-do around the Royaumont Congress and which is going to appear. Freud designates its support when he speaks about the Id (Ca) in the death drive itself, in so far as he designated the deathlike character of the automatism of repetition. Death (this is here articulated by Freud as tendency towards death, as desire in which an unthinkable subject presents itself in the living being in whom the it (ca) speaks) is responsible precisely for what is in question, namely for this eccentric position of desire in man which has always been the paradox of ethics, a paradox it seems to me quite insoluble in the evolutionary perspective. In what one could call their transcendental permanence, namely the transgressive character which is fundamental to them, why and how would desires be neither the effect nor the source of what they constitute, namely after all a permanent disorder in a body supposedly submitted to the statutes of adaptation whatever may be the incidence under which one admits the effects of this adaptation?

There, as in the history of physics, all that has been attempted up to now is "to save the appearances" and I believe that I have made you sense, have given you the occasion to understand more fully the accent of what "to save the appearances" means when it is a question of the epicycles of the Ptolemaic system. You must not imagine that the people who taught this system throughout the centuries, with the proliferation of epicycles that it required (from thirty to seventy-five according to the exigencies of exactitude that were put into it) really believed in epicycles! They did not believe that the heavens were constructed like little armillary spheres. Moreover you see them, they fabricated them with their epicycles. I recently saw in a corridor of the Vatican a lovely collection of these epicycles regulating the movements of Mars, of Venus, of Mercury. You had to put a certain number around the little ball to make it (3) correspond to the movement! Nobody ever seriously believed in epicycles. And "to save the appearances", simply meant giving an account of what one saw in function of a fundamental exigency, of a prejudice regarding the perfection of this circular form.

Well, it is more or less the same when one explains desires by the system of needs, whether they are individual or collective (and I hold that nobody believes it anymore in psychology, I mean a psychology which goes back to a whole moralistic tradition) even at the time when people were occupied with them, nobody ever believed in epicycles. "To save the appearances", in one case as in the other, signifies nothing other than wanting to reduce to forms which are supposedly perfect, supposedly required at the basis of the deduction, and which one cannot in any way from a common sense point of view bring into it.

It is therefore the topology, the fundamental topology of this desire, of its interpretation and in a word, of a rational ethics, that I am trying to establish with you. In this topology, you have seen being separated out in the course of last year this relationship called no man's land (l'entre-deux-morts) which is not as I might say, all the same in itself so difficult to swallow, because it means nothing other than the fact that there is not for man a coincidence between the two frontiers which refer to this death. I mean the first frontier (whether it is linked to a fundamental outcome which is called old age, growing old, going downhill, or to an accident which breaks the thread of life), the first frontier, the one in effect where life ends and is unravelled.... well, the situation of man is inscribed in the fact that this frontier - it is obvious and has always been so, that is why I say that it is not so difficult to swallow - is not confused with the one which one can define in its most general formula by saying that man aspires to annihilate himself in it in order to be inscribed in it in terms of being; if man aspires, this is obviously the hidden contradiction, the little drop you have to swallow, if man aspires to destroy himself in the very fact that he eternalises himself.

This you will rediscover everywhere inscribed in this discourse as well as in the others. In the Symposium you will find traces of it. After all, I took great care to illustrate this space for you last year in showing you the four corners within which is inscribed the space where tragedy is played out. Something of this tragic space (to say the word) had been historically stolen from the poets in the tragedy of the XVIIth century, for example the tragedy of Racine (and take any one at all of his tragedies), you will see that it is necessary, in order that there should be the semblance of tragedy, that from some angle or other this space of l'entre-deux-morts be inscribed. Andromacrué. Iphigénie. Baiazet - do I need to recall the plot to you? - if you show that something subsists here which resembles a tragedy, it is because, however they may be symbolised, these two deaths are always there. Andromache situates herself between the death of Hector and that suspended over the head of Astyanax, this of course is only the sign of another duplicity. In a word, the fact that the death of the hero is always between this imminent menace towards his life and the fact that he affronts it "in order to be remembered", is here only a derisory form of the problem of posterity. This is what is signified by the two terms always rediscovered from this duplicity of the death-bearing drive.

Yes, but it is clear that even though this may be necessary to maintain the framework of tragic space, it is a question of how this space is inhabited. And all I want to do in passing is to carry out this operation of tearing away the spider's web which (4) separates us from a direct vision in order to encourage you - however rich in poetic resonances they remain for you because of all their lyrical resonances - to refer to the high points of Christian tragedy, to the tragedy of Racine, in order to see - take Iphigénie for example - everything that is happening; everything that happens there is irresistibly comic. Test it out: Agamemnon is here in short fundamentally characterised by his terror of the conjugal scene: "There, there are the cries that I feared I would hear"; Achilles appears there in an unbelievably superficial position with regard to everything that is happening. And why? I will try to highlight it for you a little later, precisely in function of his relationship with death, this traditional relationship for which always he is brought back, quoted in the foreground by one of the moralists of the most intimate circle around Socrates. This story of Achilles, who deliberately prefers death which will make him immortal to the refusal to fight which would leave him his life, is everywhere re-evoked there; in the Apology of Socrates itself, Socrates makes much of it to define what is going to be his own behaviour before his judges; and we find the echo of it in the very text of Racine's tragedy - I will quote it for you later on - illuminated in a much more important way. But this belongs to the commonplaces which, throughout the centuries, ceaselessly reverberate, rebound always growing in this resonance which is always more empty and swollen.

What then is missing in tragedy, when it is carried on outside the field of its limits, limits which gave it its place in the respiration of the ancient community? The whole difference reposes on some shadows, obscurities, concealments which refer to the commandments of the second death. In Racine, these commandments no longer cast any shadow for the reason that we are no longer in the text where the Delphic oracle can even make herself understood. It is nothing but cruelty, vain contradiction, absurdity. The characters cavil, dialogue, monologue in order to say that in the final analysis there is surely something amiss.

This is not at all the way it is in ancient tragedy. The commandment of the second death, because it is there under this veiled form, can be formulated there and be received there as arising from this debt which accumulates without a guilty party and is discharged on a victim without this victim having merited the punishment; this "he did not know", in a word, which I inscribed for you at the top of the graph on what is called the line of fundamental enunciating of the topology of the unconscious, here is what is already reached, prefigured - I would say, if it was not an anachronistic word in ancient tragedy - prefigured with regard to Freud who recognises it at once as referring to the raison d'être that he had just discovered in the unconscious. He recognises his discovery and his domain in the tragedy of Oedipus, not because Oedipus had killed his father, nor because he wanted to sleep with his mother. A very entertaining mythologist (I mean who has made a vast collection, a vast gathering together of myths which is quite useful.... it is a work which has no reputation, but is of good practical use) who has reunited in two little volumes published by Penguin Books the whole of ancient mythology, believes he can act the smart alec about the Oedipus myth in Freud. He says: why does Freud not seek out his myth in Egyptian mythology where the hippopotamus is famous for sleeping with his mother and crushing his father? And he says: why did he not call it the hippopotamus complex? And with that, he believes that he has given Freudian mythology a good kick in the backside!

(5) But that is not why he chose it. There are many other heroes besides Oedipus who are the locus of this fundamental conjuncture. The important thing, and the reason why Freud rediscovers his fundamental figure in the tragedy of Oedipus is because "he did not know...." that he had killed his father and had slept with his mother.

Here then we have recalled these fundamental terms of our topology because it is necessary in order for us to continue the analysis of the Symposium, namely in order that you should perceive the importance of the fact that it should now be Agathon, the tragic poet, who comes to give his discourse on love.

I must again prolong this little pause to clarify my account, on the subject of what little by little I am promoting before you throughout this Symposium, about the mystery of Socrates, a mystery about which I was telling you the other day, that for a moment, I had this feeling of being killed by it. I do not think it is unsituatable, not only do I not think it is unsituatable, but it is because I believe that we can perfectly well situate it which justifies our having started from it for our research of this year. I recall this therefore in the same annotated terms which are the ones which I have just rearticulated before you, I recall it, in order that you may go and confront it with the texts of Plato about which (in so far as they are our primary document) for some time I have been remarking that it is no longer in vain that I refer you to these readings. I would not hesitate to tell you that you should reduplicate the reading of the Symposium which almost all of you have done, with a reading of Phaedo which will give you a good example of what the Socratic method is and why it interests us.

We will say then that the mystery of Socrates, and you must have first hand experience of this document to make its originality shine for you again, is the establishment of what he himself calls science, episteme, whose meaning you can check out by referring to the text. It is quite obvious that this does not have the same resonance, the same accent as for usthat there was not the slightest beginnings of what has been articulated for us under the rubric of science. The best formula that you can give of the establishment of this science in what? In consciousness, in a position.... in the dignity of something absolute or more exactly in a position of absolute dignity, it is a question of nothing else than what we can, in our vocabulary, express as the promotion to this position of absolute dignity of the signifier as such. What Socrates calls science, is what is necessarily imposed on all interlocution in function of a certain manipulation, of a certain internal coherence, linked, or which he believes is linked, to the pure and simple reference to the signifier.

You will see it being pushed to its final term by the incredulity of his interlocutors who, however compelling his arguments may be, do not manage - any more than anybody else - to completely yield to the affirmation by Socrates of the immortality of the soul. What Socrates is going to refer himself to in the final analysis (and naturally in a way which for everybody, at least for us, is less and less convincing) is to properties like those of odd and even. It is from the fact that the number three could never in any way receive the qualification of evenness, it is on points like that that there rests the demonstration that the soul cannot accept, because it is at the very principle of life, the qualification of destructibility (Phaedo 103d-106d). You can see to what point what I am calling this privileged reference promoted as a sort of cult, of essential rite, the reference to (6) the signifier, is all that is in question as regards the new, original, striking, fascinating, seductive thing - we have historical testimony for it - contributed by the emergence of Socrates in the midst of the Sophists.

The second term to be extracted from what we have of this testimony, is the following, it is that, through Socrates and through what this time is the total presence of Socrates, through his destiny, through his death and what he affirms before dying, it appears that this promotion is coherent with this effect which I showed you in a man, of abolishing in him, in what appears to be a total fashion, what I would call in a Kierkegaardian term "the fear and trembling" before what? Precisely not before the first but before the second death. There is no hesitation for Socrates on this. He affirms to us that this second death incarnated (in his dialectic) in the fact that he raises to absolute power, to the power of being the only foundation of certitude this coherence of the signifier, it is here that he, Socrates, will find without any doubt whatsoever his eternal life.

I will allow myself almost in the margin to sketch as a sort of parody - provided of course you do not give it more weight than what I am going to say - the picture of Cotard's syndrome: this tireless questioner seems to me to overlook the fact that his mouth is flesh. And that is why this affirmation, one could not say this certitude, is coherent. We are here almost before a sort of apparition which is foreign to us, when Socrates (do not have any doubt about it, in a very exceptional fashion, in a fashion which to employ our language and to make myself understood and to go quickly - I would call in a fashion which is of the order of a psychotic core) implacably unfolds his arguments which are notreally arguments, but also this affirmation, more affirming perhaps than any that one has ever heard, to his disciples the very day of his death concerning the fact that he, Socrates, serenely leaves this life for a truer life, for an immortal life. He does not doubt that he will rejoin those who, let us not forget, still exist for him, the Immortals. Because the notion of Immortals cannot be eliminated, reduced for his thinking; it is in function of the antimony (the Immortals and the mortals) which is absolutely fundamental in ancient thought - and no less, believe me, in our own - that his living, experienced testimony takes its value.

I summarise then: this tireless questioner, who is not a speaker, who rejects rhetoric, the metrical, the poetic, who reduces metaphor and who lives entirely in the game not of the forced card but of the forced question and who sees in it his whole subsistence, engenders before you, develops throughout the whole time of his life what I would call a formidable metonymy whose result as is also attested - we are beginning from historical attestation - is this desire which is incarnated I would say in this set, sad, affirmation of immortality "black and wreathed immortality" Valéry writes somewhere, this desire for infinite (7) discourse. Because in the beyond, if he is sure of rejoining the Immortals, he is also more or less sure he says of being able to continue throughout eternity with interlocutors who are worthy of him (those who have preceded him and all the others who will come to rejoin him), his little exercises, which, you have to admit is a conception which, however satisfying it may be for people who love allegory or an allegorical picture is all the same a conception which has a singular odour of delusion. Arguing about odd and even, of justice and injustice, of mortality and immortality, of the hot and the cold and of the fact that the hot cannot admit the cold into itself without weakening it, without withdrawing to one side in its essence as hot (as is explained to us at length in the Phaedo as principle for the reasons of the immortality of the soul), to argue about this throughout eternity is truly a very singular conception of happiness!

We have to set things off against their background: a man experienced in that way the question of the immortality of the soul, I would say further, of the soul as we are still manipulating it and I would say as we are still encumbered with it. The notion of the soul, the figure of the soul that we have, which is not the one which has developed throughout all the generations of traditional heritage (I mean the soul that we have to deal with in the Christian tradition), the soul has as apparatus, as framework, as metallic rod in its interior, the side-product of Socrates' delusion of immortality. We are still living off it. And what I want simply to put before you, is the highlighting, the energy of this Socratic affirmation concerning the soul as immortal. Why? It is obviously not for the import that we habitually accord it. Because if we refer to this import, it is quite obvious that after some centuries of exercises, and even of spiritual exercises, the rate as I might say, what can be called the level of belief in the immortality of the soul among all of those whom I have before me - I would dare say - believers or unbelievers - is very tempered in the way one says a scale is tempered. This is not what is in question, this is not the interesting thing, to refer you to the energy, to the affirmation, to the highlighting, to the promotion of this affirmation of the immortality of the soul at a date and on certain foundations (by a man, who in his wake, stupefies in short his contemporaries by his discourse), it is so that you may interrogate yourselves, that you may refer yourselves to something which is very important: in order that this phenomenon could have been produced in order that a man should have been able to say.... as we say: "Thus spake..." (This personage has the advantage over Zarathoustra of having existed)what must have been, to Socrates, his desire?

Here is the crucial point that I believe I can highlight for you, and all the more easily, in specifying all the better its meaning because I described at length before you the topology which gives its meaning to this question.

If Socrates introduces this position regarding which I would ask you to open after all any passage, any dialogue whatever of Plato (which refers directly to the person of Socrates) in order to verify the cogency, namely the decisive, paradoxical position of his affirmation of immortality and that on which there is founded this idea he has about science, in so far as I deduce it as this pure and simple promotion to absolute value of the function of the signifier in consciousness to what does this respond.... to what atopie, I would say - the word, as you know, regarding Socrates is not mine - to what atopia of desire?

(8) The term atopia, atopos, to designate it, atopos, an unclassifiable, unsituatable case.... we do not know where to shove this atopia, boys! This is what is in question, this is what the discourse of his contemporaries muttered about Socrates. For me, for us, this atopie of desire which I am questioning, does it not in a certain fashion coincide with what I could call a certain topographical purity, precisely in the fact that it designates the central point where, in our topology, this space of the entre-deux-morts is as such in its pure and empty state the place of desire as such, desire being there nothing more than its place - in so far as it is no longer for Socrates anything but the desire for discourse, for the revealed discourse, forever revealing? From which there results of course the atopia of the Socratic subject himself, if it is the case that never before him had there been occupied by any man, in such a purified way, this place of desire.

I am not answering this question. I am posing it, because it is likely, that it at least gives us a first reference point to situate what our question is, which is a question that we cannot eliminate from the moment that we have once introduced it. And after all I am not the one who introduced it. It is, already, introduced from the moment that we perceived that the complexity of transference could in no way be limited to what is happening in the subject who is called the patient, namely the analysand. And in consequence the question is posed of articulating in a slightly more advanced way than has ever been done up to now what the desire of the analyst should be.

It is not sufficient now to speak about catharsis, the didactic purification, as I might say, of the greater part of the analyst's unconscious, all of this remains very vague. We must give credit to analysts that for some time they have not been satisfied with it. We must also notice, not to criticise them, but to understand the sort of obstacle that we have to deal with, that we have not even made the slightest beginning in what one could articulate so easily in the form of questions concerning what must be acquired by someone for him to be an analyst: he is now supposed to know a little bit more about the dialectic of his unconscious? When all is said and done what exactly does he know about it? And above all how far must what he knows have gone concerning the effects of knowledge? And simply I pose you this question: what must remain of his phantasies? - You know that I am capable of going further, of saying "his" phantasy, if indeed there is a fundamental phantasy. If castration is what must be accepted at the final term of analysis, what ought to be the role of his scar to castration in the eros of the analyst?

These are questions of which I would say it is easier to pose them than to resolve them. That indeed is the reason why they are not posed. And, believe me, I would not pose them either like that in a vacuum, like that as a way simply of tickling your imagination, if I did not think that there must be a method, an indirect, even oblique, even roundabout method, of throwing some light on these questions to which it is obviously impossible for us for the moment to respond all at once. All that I can tell you is that it does not seem to me that what one calls the doctor-patient relationship (with what it involves in terms of presuppositions, of prejudices, of a swarming syrup, which looks like cheese worms), is something which allows us to advance very far in this sense.

It is a question then of trying to articulate, in accordance with reference points which are, which may be designated for us starting with a topology that had already been sketched out as the coordinates of desire, what must be, what is fundamentally the desire of the analyst.

(9) And if it is a question of situating it, I believe that it is neither by referring oneself to the articulations of the situation for the therapist or observer [nor] to any of the notions about situation as a phenomenology elaborates them for us, that we can find our proper reference points. The desire of the analyst is not something that can content itself, be satisfied with a dyadic reference. It is not the relationship with one's patient through a series of eliminations, of exclusions, which can give us the key to it. It is a question of something more intrapersonal. And, of course, I am not telling you either that the analyst must be a Socrates, or a die-hard, or a saint. No doubt these explorers, like Socrates or the die-hards or the saints, can give us some indications about the field that is in question, and not just some indications, but precisely this is the reason that on reflection we refer to it, for our part, all our science, I mean experimental science, in the field in question. But it is precisely starting from the fact that the exploration is carried on by them, that we can perhaps articulate, define in terms of longitude and of latitude the coordinates that the analyst should be capable of attaining simply to occupy the place which is his own - which is defined as the place that he must offer as vacant to the desire of the patient in order that he may realise himself as desire of the Other. This is why the Symposium interests us, it is because by this altogether privileged place that it occupies concerning the testimonies about Socrates (in so far as it is considered to place before us Socrates tackling the problem of love), the Symposium is for us a useful text to explore.

I believe I have said enough about it to justify our tackling the problem of transference, by beginning with the commentary on the Symposium. I believe also that it was necessary for me to recall these coordinates at the moment that we are going to enter into what occupies the central or quasi-central place of these celebrated dialogues, namely the discourse of Agathon.

Is it Aristophanes, or is it Agathon who occupies the central place? It is not important to decide. Between the two of them, in any case, they undoubtedly occupy the central place, because everything that had previously been according to all appearances demonstrated is considered by them as right away rejected, devaluated, because what is going to follow will be nothing other than the discourse of Socrates.

On this discourse of Agathon, namely the tragic poet, there would be a world of things to be said which are not simply erudite, but which would draw us into a detail, indeed into a history of tragedy which you have seen that I highlighted for you a little while ago, this is not the important thing. The important thing is to make you perceive the place of Agathon's discourse in the economy of the Symposium. You have read it. There are five or six pages in the French translation by Robin published by Guillaume Bude. I am going to take it near its high point, you will see why: I am here not so much to give you a more or less elegant commentary on the Symposium as to lead you to the way in which it can or must be of use to us.

After having given a discourse of which the least one can say is that it has always struck every reader by its extraordinary "sophistry", in the most modern, the most common, pejorative sense of the word. The very type for example of what you can call this sophistry, is to say that: "Love wrongs not and is not wronged, wrongs no god and is wronged by none, wrongs no man (10) and is wronged by none." Why? Because - "nothing that happens to him comes by violence for violence touches not love;" - therefore - "nothing he does is violent, for everyone willingly serves Love in everything," Agathon tells us - "and what a willing person grants to a willing is just - so say the city's king, the laws'" (196c) The moral: love is then what is at the principle of the laws of the city, and so on. . . since love is the strongest of all desires, irresistible voluptuousness, it will become confused with temperance, because temperance being what regulates desires and pleasures by right, love ought then to be confused with this position of temperance.

Obviously we are having fun. Who is having fun? Is it just we, the readers? I think that we would be quite wrong to believe that we are the only ones. Agathon is here in a posture which is certainly not secondary if only by the fact that, because, at least in principle, in the terms, in the position of the situation, he is the beloved of Socrates. [I believe] that Plato - we will give him this much credit - is also having fun with what I would call already - and you will see that I am going to justify it still more - the macaronic discourse of the tragedian on love. But I believe, I am sure and you will be sure of it once you have also read it, that we would be quite wrong not to understand that it is not we, nor Plato alone who are amusing ourselves here about this discourse.

It is quite clear... (contrary to what the commentators have said) it is completely out of the question that the one who is speaking, namely Agathon, does not himself know very well what he is doing.

Things are taken so far, things are so extreme, that you are simply going to see that at the high point of this discourse Agathon is going to tell us: "And I am moved to speak something of him in verse myself", and he expresses himself

eirenen men en anthropois peleagei de galenen (197c)

... "eirenen men en anthropois, peace among men," says M. Leon Robin; which means: love brings troubles to an end; a singular notion it must be said because we really had not the slightest suspicion of it until this idyllic modulation; but in order to dot the i's, he adds to it, pelagei de galenen, which means absolutely: "Nothing is working, dead calm on the deep". In other words, you must remember what calm weather on the sea meant for the ancients, that meant: nothing is working any more, the vessels remain blocked at Aulis and, when that happens to you in mid-ocean, it is very embarrassing, just as embarrassing as when that happens to you in bed. So that when one evokes pelagei de galenen in connection with love, it is quite clear that one is having a little giggle. Love is what makes you break down, it is what causes you to make a fiasco of things.

And then that is not all. Afterwards he says, "respite from winds".... love is put aside.... there is no more love nenemian anemon, this sounds moreover like what are always comic verses in a certain tradition. It is like two verses by Paul-Jean Toulet:

(11) "Sous le double ornement d'un nom mol ou sonore, Non, il n'est rien que Nanine et Nonore."

We are in that register. And in addition koiten, which means in bed, "coucouche panier", nothing in the bed, "no more wind in the winds, all the winds have gone asleep" [and then] hupnon t'eni kedei a singular thing, -love brings us "in trouble rest and sleep", one might translate at first glance. But if you look at the sense of the occurrences of this kedos, the Greek term, always rich in underpinnings (which would allow us to revalorise in a particular way what one day - with no doubt a lot of benevolence towards us, but perhaps lacking despite everything by not following Freud in something essential - M. Benveniste, for our first number, articulated about the ambivalences of signifiers), kedos is not simply trouble, it is always kinship. The hupnon t'enikedei gives us an outline of kedos as "a relation by marriage of an elephant's thigh" somewhere in Lévi-Strauss and thus hupnos, "peaceful sleep", t'eni kedei "in relationships with the family-in-law", seems to me to be something worthy of crowning these verses which are undoubtedly constructed to shake us up, if we have not yet understood that Agathon is making fun.

Moreover from that moment on literally he cuts loose and tells us that love, is that which literally frees us, "empties us of estrangement, and fills us with friendliness" (197d).

"Naturally when you are possessed by love, you realise that we all form part of a big family, it is really from that moment on that one feels warm and comfortable." And so on.... It continues for lines.... I will leave you the pleasure of licking your chops over it some evening.

(12) In any case, if you agree that love "provides gentleness and banishes savagery;loves to give goodwill, hates to give illwill"; - there is here an enumeration on which I would like to spend a long time with you - the fact is that it is said to be the father of what? The father of Truphe, Habrotes, Chiide, Charites, Himeros and of Pothos. we would need more time than we have at our disposal here to draw the parallel of those terms which one could initially translate as "Luxury, Daintiness, Delicacy, Grace, Longing, Desire", and to do the double work that would consist in confronting them with the register of blessings, of honesty in courtly love as I recalled it for you last year.

It would be easy for you then to see the distance, and to see that it is quite impossible to satisfy oneself with the rapprochement which M. Leon Robin makes in a note with the Carte du Tendre or with the knightly virtues in La Minne: moreover he does not evoke it, he only speaks about the Carte du tendre.

Because what I would show you text in hand, is that there is not one of these terms (Truphe for example, which people are happy to connote as Wellbeing) which has not been used by the majority of authors, not simply comic authors, with most disagreeable connotations. Truphe for example in Aristophanes, designates that which in a woman, in a wife, is introduced all of a sudden into the life, into the peace of a man, in terms of intolerable pretension. The woman who is said to be trupheros or truphera, is an intolerable little snob: she is the one who never stops for a single instant making the most in front of her husband of the superiorities of her rank and the quality of her family and so on....

There is not a single one of these terms which is not habitually and for the major part, conjoined, juxtaposed by the authors (whether it is a question this time of tragedians, even the poets like Hesiod) juxtaposed (chlide. delicacy for example), with the use of authadia, signifying this time one of the most intolerable forms of hubris and of infatuation.

I only want to point these things out to you in passing. It continues: love is "careful of good things, careless of bad things; in hardship, in fear, in the heat of passion and in talk a pilot...." (197d). These are translations which signify absolutely nothing, because in Greek you have: en pono, en phobo, en logo; en pono, that means in trouble; en phobo in fear; in logo, in speech, kubernetes, epibates, is the one who holds the rudder, the one also who is always ready to direct. In other words, its all a big joke. Pono, phobo, logo are in the greatest of disorder. What is in question, is always to produce the same effect of irony, indeed of disorientation which, in a tragic (13) poet, has really no other meaning than to underline that love is really what is unclassifiable, that which comes to put itself crosswise in all significant situations, that which is never in its place, that which is always out of season.

That this position is really something which is defensible or not, in rigorous terms, this of course is not the high point of the discourse, concerning love in this dialogue; this is not what is in question. The important thing is that it should be in the perspective of the tragic poet that we are given on love precisely the only discourse which is openly, completely derisive. And moreover, to underline what I am telling you, to seal the cogency of this interpretation you only have to read when Agathon concludes: "This, Phaidros, is my speech," he said; "may the god accept my dedication partly play, partly modest seriousness, and the best that I am able to do" (197e). The discourse itself is marked, as one might say, by its connotation as an amusing discourse, the discourse of someone who wishes to amuse.

And it is none other than Agathon as such, namely as the one whose triumph at the competition for tragedy is being celebrated - let us not forget it, we are on the day following his success - who has the right to speak about love.

It is quite certain that there is nothing there which ought to disorient at all events. In every tragedy situated in its full context, in the ancient context, love always figures as an incident in the margins and, as one might say, lagging behind. Love, far from being the one who directs and who runs ahead, only lags behind here, to take up the very terms that you will find in the discourse of Agathon, lagging behind the thing to which curiously enough he compares it in a passage, namely the term which I put forward before you last year under the function of Ate in tragedy (195d).

Ate, misfortune, the thing that has been crucified and which can never be exhausted, the calamity which is behind every tragic adventure and which, as the poet tells us - because it is to Homer that on this occasion reference is made - "Tender are her feet; she comes not near the ground, but walks upon the heads of men.", this is the way Ate passes, rapid, indifferent, and forever striking and dominating and bending heads, driving them mad; that is what Ate is. It is a singular thing, that in this discourse it should be under the reference of telling us that, like Ate, Love must have very tender feet, for it also not to be able to move except upon the heads of men! And on this point, once again, to confirm the phantastical character of this discourse, some jokes are made about the fact that after all not all the skulls are as tender as all that! (195e)

Let us come back one more time to the confirmation of the style of this discourse. All our experience of tragedy and you will see it more especially in the measure that, because of the Christian context, the vacuum (which is produced in the fundamental fatalism of antiquity, in the inscrutability, the incomprehensibility of the fatal oracle, the inexpressibility of the commandment at the level of the second death) can no longer be sustained because we find ourselves before a god who is not capable of giving senseless or cruel orders; you will see that love comes to fill this vacuum.

(14) Iphigenie by Racine is its most beautiful illustration, in a sense a sort of incarnation. It was necessary for us to have arrived at the Christian context for Iphigenia not to suffice as tragic. She has to have Eriphile as understudy, and properly so, not simply in order that Eriphile can be sacrificed in her place, but because Eriphile is the only true lover with a love which is presented to us as terrible, horrible, bad, tragic in order to restore a certain depth to the tragic space and regarding which we also see clearly that it is because love which, moreover sufficiently occupies the play (principally with Achilles), every time it manifests itself as pure and simple love, and not as black love, the love of jealousy, is irresistibly comic.

In short, we have arrived at the crossroads where, as will be recalled at the end of the final conclusions of the Symposium, it is not enough in order to speak about love to be a tragic poet, it is also necessary to be a comic poet. It is at this precise point that Socrates receives the discourse of Agathon and, to appreciate how he welcomes it, it was necessary, I believe - you will see it in what follows - to articulate it with all the accent that I believed I had to give to it today.

Seminar 8: Wednesday 18 January 1961

We have arrived then, in the Symposium, at the moment when Socrates is going to begin to speak in the epainos or the encomion. I told you in passing, these two terms are not altogether equivalent. I did not want to dwell on their difference which would have drawn us into a rather eccentric discussion. In terms of praising love, it is said, affirmed by himself - and the word of Socrates cannot be contested in Plato - that if Socrates knows anything, if there is something that he is not ignorant of, it is the business of love (198d). We should not lose sight of this in everything that is going to happen.

I underlined for you, in a sufficiently convincing fashion I think, the last time, the strangely derisive character of the discourse of Agathon. Agathon, the tragedian speaks about love in a way which gives the feeling that he is clowning of a macaronic discourse. At every instant, it seems that the expression that is suggested to us, is that he a little. I underlined, in the content, in the body of the arguments, in the style, in the very details of elocution, the extremely provocative character of the little verses in which he himself expresses himself at a particular moment. It is rather disconcerting to see the theme of the Symposium culminating in such a discourse. This is not new, it is the function, the role that we give it in the development of the Symposium which may be, because this derisive character of the discourse has always struck those who have read and commented on it. To such a degree that, to take for example what a personage of German science at the beginning of this century - whose name, the day I mentioned it to you, made you laugh, I do not know why - Wilamowitz Moellendorff, following in this the tradition of almost all those who preceded him, states that the discourse of Agathon is characterised by its Nichtigkeit, its emptiness.

It is quite strange that Plato should have put this discourse then into the mouth of the one who is going to immediately precede the discourse of Socrates, in the mouth of the one who is, let us not forget it, currently and on this occasion the beloved of Socrates, at the time of the Symposium.

Moreover the way Socrates is going to introduce his intervention, is by two points. First of all, even before Agathon speaks, there is a sort of interlude where Socrates himself said something like: "After having heard all that we have heard and, if Agathon now adds his discourse to the others, how am I going to be able to speak?" (194a). Agathon for his own part excuses himself. He also announces some hesitation, some fear, some intimidation at speaking before what we could call such an (2) enlightened, such an intelligent, emphrones public. And the beginnings of a sort of discussion, of debate, takes place with Socrates who begins at that moment to question him a little in connection with the remark which had been made that, if Agathon, the tragic poet, had just triumphed on the tragic stage, it is because on the tragic stage he is addressing a crowd, and that here it is a question of something else. And we begin to be engaged on a slope which could be ticklish. We do not know where we might be led when Socrates begins to question him. It is more or less the following: "Would you be ashamed of something in which you might eventually show yourself to be inferior, only in front of us? In front of the others, in front of the crowd, in front of the mob, would you feel yourself more at ease in advancing themes which might be less certain..." (194c). And here, God knows, we do not know very well what we are getting involved in: whether it is a sort of aristocratism, as one might call it, of dialogue or if, on the contrary, Socrates' goal is to show (as seems more likely and as his whole practice bears witness) that even a slave, that even an ignorant person, is capable, if appropriately questioned, to show in himself the germs of truth, the germs of a sound judgement.

But on this slope someone intervenes, Phaidros who, interrupting Agathon, does not allow Socrates to draw him along this path. He knows well that Socrates does not care about anything, as he says expressly, except conversing with someone he loves, and that if we get into this dialogue, we will never get finished....

Then at that Agathon begins to speak, and Socrates finds himself in the position of reproving him. He reproves him. In order to do it, he has as one might say the best of roles and the method immediately shows itself to be of striking superiority, as regards the ease with which it shows up in the middle of the discourse of Agathon what has split apart dialectically, and the procedure is such that here it can be nothing other than a refutation, than an annihilation of the discourse of Agathon, properly speaking, in a way that denounces its ineptitude, its Nichtigkeit, its emptiness. [So that] the commentators and specifically the one whom I evoked above, think that Socrates himself is reluctant to push too far the humiliation of his interlocutor and that here we have a reason for what we are going to see. The fact is that at a given moment Socrates stops and allows to speak in his place (takes as an intermediary someone who is going to be a prestigious figure for the rest of the story) Diotima, the foreigner from Mantinea; that if he allows Diotima to speak and if he allows himself to be taught by Diotima, it is in order not to remain any longer, vis-a-vis the one to whom he has dealt a decisive blow, in the position of magister. And he allows himself to be taught, and he relays himself through this imaginary personage in order to mitigate the disarray into which he has thrown Agathon. I am completely against this position. Because if we look at the text more closely, I believe that we cannot say that this is altogether its meaning. I would say that, just as people want to show, in the discourse of Agathon, a sort of avowal of his (3) going astray: "I fear, Socrates, I knew nothing of what I said!" (201b), the impression that remains with us in hearing him is rather that of someone who might respond: "We are not on the same level, I spoke in a fashion that had a meaning, in a fashion which was well grounded, I spoke let us say at the limit even, in enigmas"; let us not forget that ainos with ainittomai, leads us straight to the etymology of the enigma: "What I said was said in a certain tone".

And so we read, in the discourse-response of Socrates, that there is a certain fashion of conceiving praise that for a moment Socrates devaluates, namely to place, to wrap around the object of praise everything good that can be said. But is this really what Agathon did? On the contrary, it seems, in the very excesses of this discourse, that there was something which it appears was only waiting to be heard. In a word for an instant we can, by listening in a certain fashion - and in fashion which I think is the correct one - to the response of Agathon, we have the impression at the limit that by introducing his critique, his dialectic, his mode of interrogation, Socrates finds himself in the pedantic position.

I mean that it is clear that Agathon says something, which has its share of irony and it is Socrates who, arriving there with his big boots, simply changes the rules of the game. And in truth, when Agathon says again: ego, phanai, o Socrates, soi ouk an dunaimen antilegein, "Socrates, I really could not contradict you; let it be as you say." (201c) there is there someone who disengages himself and who says to the other: "Now let us pass on to the other register, to the other fashion of acting with the word!"

But one could not say, like the commentators and even the one whose text I have before my eyes, Leon Robin, that it is a sign of impatience on the part of Agathon. In a word, if the discourse of Agathon can truly be put between the quotation marks of this really paradoxical game, of this sort of sophistical tour de force, we only have to take seriously - which is the proper way - what Socrates himself says about this discourse which, to use the French term which corresponds best to it, bewilders him (le sidère), méduse's him as it is put expressly, because Socrates makes a play on words on the name of Gorgias and the figure of the Gorgon. Such a discourse closes the door to the operation of dialectic, petrifies Socrates and transforms him, he says, into stone.

But this is not an effect to be disdained. Socrates brought things onto the plane of his method, of his interrogative method, of his way of questioning, of his way also (shown to us by Plato), of articulating, of dividing the object, of operating according to this diairesis, thanks to which the object is presented to examination to be situated, articulated in a certain fashion whose register we can locate with the progress constituted by a development of knowledge suggested at the origin by the Socratic method.

(4) But the import of Agathon's discourse is not for all that annihilated. It belongs to another register, but it remains exemplary. It plays in a word an essential function in the progress of what is demonstrated for us by way of a succession of paeans about love. No doubt it is significant, rich in teaching for us, that it should be the tragic which, as one might say produced the comic romancero about love or on love, and that it should be the comic Aristophanes who spoke about love with an almost modern accent, in its sense of passion. This is eminently rich in suggestions, in questions for us. But the intervention of Socrates intervenes as a rupture, and not as something which devaluates, reduces to nothing what had just been enounced in the discourse of Agathon. And after all can we consider as nothing, and as a simple antiphrase, the fact that Socrates puts all the accent on the fact that it was - he says it properly speaking: kalon logon, "a beautiful discourse", that he spoke very beautifully (198b).

Often the evocation of the ridiculous has been made, of that which may provoke laughter in the preceding text. He does not seem to say to us that it was in any way ridicule that was in question at the moment of this change of register. And at the moment when Socrates brings forward the wedge that his dialectic has driven into the subject in order to bring to us what one expects from Socratic illumination, we have a feeling of discord, not of a balancing which would entirely cancel out what had been formulated in the discourse of Agathon.

Here we cannot fail to remark that, in the discourse of Socrates, what is articulated as being properly method, his interrogative method, which means that, if you will allow me this play on words in Greek, the eromenos, the beloved, is going to become erotomenos (the one interrogated), with this properly Socratic interrogation, Socrates only makes emerge one theme which is the one which from the beginning of my commentary I announced on several occasions namely: the function of lack.

Everything that Agathon says most especially, that beauty for example belongs to it, is one of its attributes, saying all of this succumbs before the interrogation, before this remark of Socrates: "Is Love such as to be a love of something, or of nothing?" "Is it when he has what he desires and loves that he desires and loves it, or when he has not?" (199d - 200a). I will pass over the detail of the articulation of this question properly so-called. He turns it, returns it, with an acuity which as usual makes of his interlocutor someone whom he manipulates, whom he manoeuvres. This indeed is the ambiguity of the questioning of Socrates: the fact is that he is always the master, even where, for us who are reading it, in many cases there may appear to be a way of escape. It does not matter either to know what on this occasion ought or can be developed in strict rigour. It is the testimony that is constituted by the essence of the Socratic interrogation that is important to us here, and also what Socrates introduces, expressly wishes to produce, that of which he conventionally speaks for us.

We are assured that the adversary cannot refuse the conclusion, (5) namely, as he expressly expresses it: "Then he, and every other who desires, desires what is not in his possession, tou me hetoimou, kai tou me parontos, and not there, kai ho me echei.

what he has not, kai ho me estin autos, and what he is not himself" - it is translated- "kai hou endees esti, what he lacks? Toiaut' attā estin on he epithumia te kai ho eros estin, those are the sort of things of which there is desire and love" - the text is certainly translated in a weak fashion - "epithumei he desires tou me hetoimou" - is properly speaking - "what is not ready-made, tou me parontos what is not there, what he does not have, ho me echei kai ho me estin autos, that he is not himself, that which he is lacking, that which he essentially lacks" in the superlative (200e). Here is what is articulated by Socrates in what he introduces to this new discourse, this something which he says is not to be placed on the plane of verbal games - through which we would say that the subject is captured, captivated, is fixated, fascinated (199b).

The thing that distinguishes it from the sophistical method, is that it makes there reside the progress of a discourse which he tells us he pursues without any search at all for elegance in words in this exchange, this dialogue, [in] this consent obtained from the one to whom he addresses himself, and in this consent presented as the emergence, the necessary evocation in the one to whom he addresses himself of knowledge that he already has. Here, as you know, is the essential articulating point on which the whole Platonic theory, of the soul and also of its nature, of its consistency, of its origin, reposes. All this knowledge is already in the soul and it is enough to have the correct questions in order to re-evolve, to reveal it. This knowledge is there from all time and bears witness in a way to the precedence, the antecedent nature of knowledge; from the fact that not only has it always existed, but that because of it we can suppose that the soul shares in an infinite anteriority, it is not only immortal, it has always existed. And this is what gives rise and lends credence to the myth of metempsychosis, of reincarnation, which of course on the plane of myth, on a different plane to that of dialectic, is all the same what accompanies in the margin the development of Platonic thought.

But there is one thing here which is likely to strike us, it is that having introduced what I called a little while ago this wedge of the notion, of the function of lack as essential, constitutive of the relationship of love, Socrates speaking in his own name remains there. And it is no doubt a correct question to ask oneself why he substitutes the authority of Diotima for himself.

But it also seems to me that it is a very facile way of resolving this question to say that it is to spare the self-love of Agathon. Things are the way we are told: namely that Plato has only to produce a quite elementary piece of judo or jiu-jitsu: "I fear I knew nothing of what I said, my discourse is elsewhere" (201b), as he says expressly. - It is not so much Agathon who is in difficulty as Socrates himself. And as we cannot suppose, in (6) any way, that what was conceived here by Plato, is to show Socrates as a heavy-handed pedant, after what was undoubtedly an airy, if only because of its amusing style, discourse given by Agathon, we must believe that if Socrates hands over in his discourse, it is for another reason than the fact that he himself would not have been able to continue, and we can immediately situate this reason: it is because of the nature of the affair of the thing, of the to pragma, that we are dealing with.

We can suspect - and you will see that it is confirmed by what follows - that it is because it is love that is being spoken about that this path must be taken, that he is led to proceed in this fashion. Let us note in effect the point upon which his question was brought to bear. The efficacy that he had put forward, produced, being the function of lack, and in a very obvious fashion, the return to the desiring function of love, the substitution of epithumai, he desires, for era, he loves. And in the text, one sees a moment when, interrogating Agathon on the fact: whether he thinks or not "that love is love of something".... there is substituted the term: love or desire of something (199d - 199e).

It is quite obviously in so far as love is articulated in desire, is articulated in a fashion which here is not properly speaking articulated as substitution, that substitution is not - one can legitimately object - the very function of the method of Socratic knowing, it is precisely because the substitution is here a little rapid that we have a right to point it out, to notice it.

That is not to say that for all that there is any mistake, because it is indeed around the articulation of Eros, Love and of eros, desire, that there is going effectively to turn the whole dialectic as it develops in the dialogue as a whole. Again it is appropriate that something should be pointed out in passing. Here, let us remark again that it is not for nothing that what is properly speaking the Socratic intervention is isolated in this way. Socrates goes very precisely to the point where what I called the last time his method, which is to bring the effect of his questioning to bear on what I called the consistency of the signifier, is properly speaking manifest, visible in the very delivery, in the fashion in which he introduces his question to Agathon:

einai tinos ho Eros eros, e oudenos?

"Yes or no, is Love such as to be a love of something (de quelque chose), or of nothing?" And here he specifies, because the Greek genitive tinis [of something] like the French genitive has its ambiguities: quelque chose can have two meanings, and these meanings are in a way accentuated in an almost massive, caricatural fashion and in the distinction that Socrates makes: tinis can mean: to come from someone, to be the descendant of someone, "I do not mean to ask," he says, "if he is a love of such a mother or such a father" but what is behind it.

This is precisely all the theogony of which there was question at the beginning of the dialogue. It is not a question of knowing from what love descends, from whom it comes - as one says: "My kingdom is not of (de) this world" - in a word from what god love comes? It is a question of knowing, on the plane of the interrogation of the signifier, of what, as signifier, love is the correlative. And this is why we find marked.... we cannot for our part, it seems to me, not notice that what Socrates opposes to this way of posing the question: from whom does this love come? What is in question is the same thing, he says, as this name of the Father - we rediscover it here because what we (7) rediscover is the same father, it is the same thing as to ask: when you say Father, what does that imply, not in terms of the real father, namely what he has as a child, but when one speaks about a father one necessarily speaks about a son. The Father is father of a son by definition, qua father. "You would say, I suppose, if you wanted to answer right" - translates Leon Robin - "that the Father is father of son or daughter" (199d)

We are here properly speaking on the terrain which is the very one on which there develops the Socratic dialectic of interrogating the signifier about its consistency as signifier. Here he is very able.," Here he knows what he is doing. And even that which permits this rather rapid substitution that I spoke about between eros and desire, is that. It is nevertheless a process, a progress which is marked, he says, by his method.

If he hands over to Diotima, why should it not be because, concerning love, things could not go any further with the properly Socratic method. I think that everything is going to demonstrate this and the discourse of Diotima itself. Why should we be surprised about it, I would say already: if there is a step which constitutes compared to the contemporaneity of the sophists the beginning of the Socratic procedure, it is that a knowledge (the only sound one Socrates tells us in the Phaedo), can affirm itself from the simple consistency of this discourse which is dialogue which is carried on in terms of the necessary apprehension, the apprehension as necessary of the law of the signifier.

When one speaks about odd and even, with which, do I need to remind you that in my teaching here, I think I took enough pains, exercised you for long enough to show you that it is a question here of the domain which is entirely closed off in its own register, that the odd and the even owe nothing to any other experience than that of the operation of signifiers themselves, that there is no odd or even, in other words nothing countable, except what is already raised to the function of an element of the signifier, of the texture of the signifying chain. One can count words or syllables, but one can only count things because of the fact that words and syllables are already counted.

We are on this plane, when Socrates begins to speak, outside the confused world of the discussion, of the debate of physicists who like the sophists preceded him who, at different levels, in different ways, organise what we might call in an abbreviated fashion - you know that I would only accept it with the greatest of reservations - the magical power of words. How does Socrates affirm this knowledge which is internal to the operation of the signifier: he posits, at the same time as this knowledge which is entirely transparent of itself, that this is what constitutes its truth.

Now is it not on this point that we have taken the step which makes us disagree with Socrates; in this no doubt essential step which assures the autonomy of the law of the signifier, Socrates, for us, prepares this field of the word precisely, properly speaking, which, for its part, has permitted the whole critique of human knowledge as such.

But the novelty, if what I am teaching you about the Freudian revolution is correct, is precisely the fact that something can be sustained in the law of the signifier, not simply without this involving a knowledge but by expressly excluding it, namely by constituting itself as unconscious, namely as necessitating at its level the eclipsing of the subject in order to subsist as unconscious chain, as constituting what is fundamentally irreducible in the relationship of the subject to the signifier. All this to say that this is why we are the first, if not the only ones, not to be necessarily surprised that the properly Socratic discourse, the discourse of episteme, of knowledge transparent to itself, cannot be pursued beyond a certain limit (8) with regard to a particular object, when this object, if indeed it is the one on which Freudian thought has been able to bring new light, this object is love.

In any case, whether you follow me in this or whether you do not follow me, with respect to a dialogue whose effect, throughout the ages, has maintained itself with the force and the constancy, the interrogative power and the perplexity which develop around it, Plato's Symposium, it is clear that we cannot satisfy ourselves with such miserable reasons as saying that if Socrates allows Diotima to speak, it is simply to avoid too greatly irritating the self-love of Agathon.

If you will allow a comparison which keeps all its ironic value, suppose that I have to develop for you the totality of my doctrine on analysis verbally and that - verbally or in writing does not matter - in doing it, at a certain point, I hand over to Francoise Dolto, you would say: "All the same there is something.... why, why is he doing that?" This, naturally supposing that if I hand over to Francoise Dolto this is not to have her say stupid things! This would not be my method and, moreover, I would have great trouble making her say such things.

This embarrasses Socrates much less, as you are going to see, because the discourse of Diotima is characterised precisely by something which at every instant allows there to appear gaps which undoubtedly allow us to understand why Socrates does not assume them. What is more, Socrates punctuates these gaps with a whole series of replies which are in a way - it is tangible, it is enough to read the text - more and more amused. I mean that there are first of all very respectful replies, then more and more of the style: "Do you really think that?", then afterwards: "Very well, let us go as far as you are leading me", and then, at the end, that becomes clearly: "Have fun, my girl, I'm listening, talk away!". You must read this discourse in order to understand that this is what is in question.

Here I cannot avoid making a remark which it seems has not struck the commentators: Aristophanes, in connection with Love, had introduced a term which is transcribed quite simply in French under the name of dioecisme (193a). It is a question of nothing other than this Spaltung, of this division of the completely round primitive being, of this kind of derisory sphere of Aristophanes' image whose value I told you about. And this dioecisme, he describes in this way by comparing it to a practice which, in the context of community relations, of relations in the city, was the mainspring on which there depended the whole of politics in Greek society, [this practice] consisted [in the fact], when one wished to destroy an enemy city - this is still done in our own day - in dispersing the inhabitants and putting them into what are called reassembly camps. This had been done not long before, at the time that the Symposium appeared and it is even one of the reference points around which turns the date that we can attribute to the Symposium. There is here, it appears, some anachronism or other, the thing to which Plato was alluding, namely an initiative of Sparta, having happened after the text, the supposed meeting of the Symposium and its unfolding around the praise of love. This dioecisme is very evocative for us.

It is not for nothing that I used the term Spaltung above, a term evocative of subjective splitting, and what, at the moment that - this is what I am in the process of exposing before you - in the measure that something which, (when it is a question of the (9) discourse of love) escapes the knowledge of Socrates, ensures that Socrates is effaced, is split (se dioecise) and allows a woman to speak in his place. Why not the woman who is in him?

In any case, no one contests it and certain people, Wilamowitz Moellendorff in particular, have accentuated, underlined that there is in any case a difference of nature, of register, in what Socrates develops on the plane of his dialectical method and what he presents to us in terms of myth throughout everything that the Platonic testimony transmits, restores to us of it. We should always.... (and in the text it is always quite clearly separated out) when one comes (and in many other fields besides that of love) to a certain term of what can be obtained on the plane of episteme, of knowledge, in order to go beyond (we can easily conceive that there is a limit in so far as on the plane of knowledge there is only what is accessible to the pure and simple operation of the law of the signifier). In the absence of well-advanced experimental conquests, it is clear that in many domains - and in domains which we for our part can pass over - there will be a pressure to let myth speak.

What is remarkable, is precisely this rigour which ensures that when one engages with, one locks into the plane of myth, Plato always knows perfectly well what he is doing or what he makes Socrates do and that one knows that one is in the realm of myth. I do not mean myth in its common usage, muthous legein is not what that means, muthous legein, is the common discourse, what is said, that is what it is. And throughout the whole Platonic work we see in the Phaedo, in the Timaeus, in the Republic, myths emerging, when they are required, to supply for the gap in what cannot be assured dialectically.

Starting from there, we are going to see better what one could call the progress of the discourse of Diotima. Somebody here once wrote an article which he called, if I remember rightly: "Un desir d'enfant". This article was entirely built on the ambiguity of the term: desir de l'enfant, in the sense that it is the child who desires; désir d'enfant, in the sense that one desires to have a child. It is not a simple accident of the signifier that things are that way. And the proof, is that you have all the same been able to notice that it is around this ambiguity that there is precisely going to pivot the wedge-like attack on the problem by Socrates.

When all is said and done what did Agathon tell us? It was that Eros was the eros of beauty, the desire of Beauty, I would say in the sense that one might say that the god Beauty desires. And what Socrates retorts to him, is that a desire for beauty implies that one does not possess beauty.. These verbal quibbles have not the vain, pinpricking, confusing character which would tempt one to turn aside from them. The proof, is that it is around these two terms that the whole discourse of Diotima is going to develop.

And first of all, to clearly mark the continuity, Socrates is going to say that it is on the same plane, that it is with the same arguments that he had used with regard to Agathon that Diotima introduced her dialogue with him. The stranger from (10) Mantinea who is presented to us in the personage of a priestess, and magician (let us not forget that at this turning point of the Symposium we are told a good deal about these arts of divination, of how to operate, in order to make oneself heard by the gods in order to move natural forces), is a woman who is wise in the matter of witchcraft, of divination as the comte de Cabanis would say, of all sorts of sorcery (goétie). The term is Greek, goetia, and is in the text (203a). Moreover, we are told something about her which I am astonished to find not much is made of in reading this text, which is that she is supposed to have succeeded by her artifices in putting off the plague for ten years, and what is more at Athens! It must be admitted that this familiarity with the powers of the plague is all the same something to make us reflect, to make us situate the stature and the style of the figure of the person who is going to speak to you about love.

It is on this plane that things are introduced and it is on this plane that she takes up the thread about that which Socrates, who at that moment acts naive or pretends to be foolish, poses her the question: "If Love is not beautiful, then it must be ugly?" (201e) Here in effect is where there ends up the results of the method called through more or less, of yes or no, of presence or absence, proper to the law of the signifier (what is not beautiful is ugly), here at least is what is implied in all rigour by the pursuit of the ordinary mode of interrogation of Socrates. At which the priestess is able to respond to him: "My son" - I would say - "you must not blaspheme! And why should everything that is not beautiful be ugly?"

In order to say it, she introduces to us the myth of the birth of Love which is all the same worth our while dwelling on. I would point out to you the myth exists only in Plato that, among the innumerable myths, I mean the innumerable mythical accounts about the birth of Love in ancient literature - I took the trouble of studying a certain amount of it - there is not a trace of this thing which is going to be enounced here. It is nevertheless the myth which has remained, as I might say, the most popular one. It appears then, it seems, quite clear that a personage who owes nothing to tradition in the matter, to speak plainly a writer of the epoch of the Aufklärung like Plato, is quite capable of forging a myth, and a myth which makes its way throughout the centuries in an altogether living way in order by functioning as a myth, because who does not know since Plato told us, Love is the son of Poros and of Penia.

Poros, the author whose translation I have before me - simply because it is the translation which is opposite the Greek text - translates it in a way which is not properly speaking irrelevant, by Expedient. If expedient means resource, it is undoubtedly a valid translation, cleverness also, if you wish, because Poros is the son of Metis which is again more Ingenuity than wisdom. Over against him we have the feminine person in the matter, the one who is going to be the mother of Love, who is Penia, namely Poverty, even destitution, and in an articulated fashion in the text who is characterised by what she knows well about herself, aporia namely that she is without resources, this is what she knows about herself, that she is without any resources! And the word aporia, which you recognise, is the same word that serves us concerning the philosophical process, it is an impasse, it is something before which we have to give in, we are at the end of our resources.

(11) Here then the female Aporia face to face with the male Poros, Resource, which seems rather illuminating for us. But there is something which is very fine in this myth, which is that in order that Aporia should engender Love with Poros, there is a necessary condition which it expresses, which is that at the moment this happened, it was Aporia who was staying awake, who had her eyes wide open and had, we are told, come to the feast for the birth of Aphrodite and, like any good self-respecting Aporia in this hierarchical epoch, had remained on the steps, near the door, she had not of course entered, because she was aporia, namely having nothing to offer, she did not enter the festive hall.

But the good thing about feasts is precisely that at them there happen things which upset the ordinary order and that Poros falls asleep. He falls asleep because he is drunk, which is what allows Aporia to make herself pregnant by him, namely to have this offspring which is called Love and whose date of conception coincides then with the birth-date of Aphrodite. This indeed is why it is explained to us that Love will always have some obscure relationship with beauty, which is what is in question in the whole development of Diotima, and it is because Aphrodite is a beautiful goddess.

Here then the matter is clearly put. The fact is that on the one hand it is the masculine which is desirable and that, it is the feminine which is active, this at least is how things happen at the moment of the birth of Love and, when one formulates "love is giving what one does not have", believe me, I am not the one who is telling you this in connection with this text in order to produce one of my hobby horses, it is quite evident that this is what is in question here because the poor Penia, by definition, by structure has properly speaking nothing to give, except her constitutive lack, aporia. And what allows me to tell you that I am not forcing things here, is that if you refer to number 202a of the text of the Symposium you will find the expression "to give what one does not have" literally written there in the form of the development which starting from there Diotima is going to give to the function of love, namely: aneu tou echein logon dounai - it fits exactly, in connection with the discourse, the formula "to give what one does not have" - it is a question here of giving a discourse, a valid explanation, without having it. It is a question of the moment when, in her development, Diotima is going to be led to say what love belongs to. Well, love belongs to a zone, to a form of affair, a form of thing, a form of pragma, a form of praxis which is at the same level, of the same quality as doxa, namely the following which exists, namely that there are discourses, ways of behaving, opinions - this is the translation that we give to the term doxa - which are true without the subject being able to know it.

The doxa in so far as it is true, but is not episteme, it is one of the commonplaces of the Platonic doctrine to distinguish its field, love as such is something which forms part of this field. It is between episteme and amathia, just as it is between the beautiful and the true. It is neither one nor the other. To remind Socrates that his objection (a naive pretended objection no doubt, that if love lacks the beautiful then it must be ugly, but it is not ugly)... there is a whole domain which is, for example, exemplified by the doxa to which we ceaselessly refer in the Platonic discourse and which can show that love, according to the Platonic term, is metaxu, "between the two".

That is not all. We cannot be satisfied with such an abstract, indeed negative definition of the intermediate. It is here that (12) our speaker Diotima, brings into play the notion of the demonic: the notion of the demonic as intermediate between immortals and mortals, between gods and men, is essential to evoke here in so far as it confirms what I told you about the way we must think of what the gods are, namely that they belong to the field of the real. We are told this, these gods exist, their existence is not at all contested here and the demoniacal the demon, to diamonion, there are many others besides love, is that through which the gods make their message heard by mortals, "whether they are awake or asleep" (203a) a strange thing which does not seem either to have caught people's attention much is that: "whether they are awake or asleep" if you have heard my phrase, who does this refer to, to the gods or to men? Well, I can assure you that in the Greek text there is some doubt about it. Everybody translates, according to the norms of commonsense, that this refers to men, but it is in the dative which is precisely the case in which the theios are in the phrase, so that it is another little riddle on which we will not dwell very long.

Simply, let us say that the myth situates the order of the demonic at the point where our psychology speaks about the world of animism. It is calculated in a way also to encourage us to rectify what is over-hasty in this notion that the primitive has an animist world. What we are told here, in passing, is that it is the world of what we would call enigmatic messages, which means simply for us messages in which the subject does not recognise his own part. The discovery of the unconscious is essential in that it has allowed us to extend the field of messages which we can authenticate - the only ones that we can authenticate as messages, in the proper sense of this term in so far as it is founded in the domain of the symbolic - namely that many of those which we would believe to be opaque messages of the real are only our own, this is what has been conquered from the world of the gods, this is also what at the point that we have got to, has still not been conquered.

It is around this thing which is going to develop in the myth of Diotima that we will continue with from beginning to end the next time; and having gone right through it we will see why it is condemned to leave opaque that which is the object of the praises which constitute the sequence of the Symposium, condemned to leave it opaque and to leave as a field in which there can be developed the elucidation of its truth only what is going to follow after the entry of Alcibiades.

Far from being an addition, a useless part which is to be rejected, this entrance of Alcibiades is essential, because it is from it, it is in the action which develops with the entry of Alcibiades, between Alcibiades, Agathon and Socrates, that there can only be given in an efficacious fashion the structural relationship. It is even there that we will be able to recognise what the discovery of the unconscious and the experience of psychoanalysis (specifically the transferential experience), allows us for our part, finally, to express in a dialectical fashion.

Seminar 10: Wednesday 1 February 1961

I left you the last time, as a kind of staging-post in our account, on the word to which I also told you I would leave until the next occasion all its enigmatic value, the word agalma.

I did not think that what I said would turn out to be so true. For a great number, the enigma was so total that people were asking: "What was that? What did he say? Do you know?". Well, for those who manifested this unease, one of my own family was able at least to give this response - which proves at least that in my house secondary education has its uses - that means: "ornament, adornment". In any case, this response was only in effect a first level response about something that everyone should know: agalma, from agallo, "to adorn, to ornament", signifies in effect - at first sight - "ornament, adornment". First of all the notion of ornament, of adornment is not that simple; it can be seen immediately that this may take us very far. Why, and with what does one adorn oneself? Or why does one adorn oneself and with what?

It is quite clear that, if we are here at a central point, many avenues should lead us to it. But I finally retained, in order to make of it the pivot of my explanation, this word agalma. You should not see in it any taste for rarity but rather the fact that in a text which we suppose to be extremely rigorous, that of the Symposium, something leads us to this crucial point which is formally indicated at the moment at which I told you the stage revolves completely and, after these games of praising regulated as they had been up to then by this subject of love, there enters this actor, Alcibiades, who is going to change everything. As proof I only need the following: he himself changes the rules of the game by making himself the presiding authority. From that moment on he tells us, it is no longer a question of praising love but the other person and specifically each one is to praise his neighbour on the right. You will see that this is important for what follows, that it is already a lot to say about it, that, if it is a question of love, it is in act in the relationship of one to the other that it is here going to have to manifest itself (213e, 214d).

I pointed out to you the last time, it is noteworthy that from the moment that things get started on this terrain, with the experienced producer whom we suppose to be at the source of this dialogue (which is confirmed for us by the incredible mental genealogy which flows from this Symposium, whose second-last echo I highlighted for you the last time in connection with Kierkegaard's banquet - the last, I already named for you: it is Eros and Agape by Anders Nygren, all this is still dependent on the framework, the structure of the Symposium) well then, this experienced personage can do nothing else.... once it is a question of bringing the other into play, there is not just one of them, there are two others, in other words there are a minimum (2) of three. This, Socrates does not allow to escape in his reply to Alcibiades when, after this extraordinary admission, this public confession, this thing which is somewhere between a declaration of love and almost one might say a malediction, a defamation of Socrates, Socrates replies to him: "It was not for me that you were speaking, it was for Agathon" (222c,d). All of this makes us sense that we are getting into a different register.

The dual relationship of the one who, in the ascent towards love, proceeds by way of identification (if you wish, moreover by the production of what we have indicated in the discourse of Diotima) being helped in it by this marvel of beauty and, coming to see in this beauty itself identified here at the end with the perfection of the work of love, finds in this beauty its very term and identifies it to this perfection.

Something else therefore comes into play here other than this univocal relationship which gives to the term of the work of love this goal, this end of identification to what I put in question here last year, the thematic of the sovereign good, of the supreme good. Here we are shown that something else is suddenly substituted in the triplicity, in the complexity, which shows us, presents itself to reveal to us that in which, as you know, I maintain the essential of the analytic discovery is contained, this topology in which fundamentally there results the relationship of the subject to the symbolic in so far as it is essentially distinct from the imaginary and its capture. This is our term, this is what we will articulate the next time to bring to a close what we will have to say about the Symposium. It is with the help of this that I will make re-emerge old models which I have given you of the intrasubjective topology in so far as this is the way that we should understand the whole of Freud's second topography.

Today therefore, what we are highlighting, is something which is essential in order to rejoin this topology, in the measure that it is on the subject of love that we have to rejoin it. It is about the nature of love that there is question, it is about a position, an essential articulation too often forgotten, elided, and to which we analysts nevertheless have contributed the element, the mainspring which allows its problematic to be defined, it is on this that there should be concentrated what I have to say to you today about agalma.

It is all the more extraordinary, almost scandalous that this should not have been better highlighted up to now, that it is a properly analytic notion that is in question, is what I hope to be able to make you sense, put your finger on in a little while.

Agalma, here is how it is presented in the text: Alcibiades speaks about Socrates, he says that he going to unmask him - we will not today get to the end of what the discourse of Alcibiades signifies - you know that Alcibiades goes into the greatest detail about his adventure with Socrates. He tried what? To make Socrates, we will say, manifest his desire to him because he knows that Socrates has a desire for him; what he wanted was a sign.

Let us leave this in suspense, it is too soon to ask why. We are only at the beginning of Alcibiades' approach and, at first sight, this approach does not seem to be essentially distinguished from what was said up to then. At the beginning there was question, in the discourse of Pausanias, of what one was going to look for in love and it was said that what each one sought in the other (an exchange of proper procedures) was what he contained in terms of eromenon, of the desirable. It indeed is the same thing that appears ... that seems to be in question now. Alcibiades tells us that Socrates is someone whose "amorous dispositions draw him towards beautiful boys...". - this (3) is a preamble - "he is ignorant of everything and knows nothing, agnoei; that is his pose!" (216d) - and then, he goes into the celebrated comparison with the Silenos which has a double import. I mean first of all that this is what he appears like, namely with nothing beautiful about him and, on the other hand, that this Silenos is not simply the image that is designated by this name, but also something which is its usual aspect: it is a wrapping, a container, a way of presenting something - these things must have existed. These tiny instruments of the industry of the time were little Silenos which served as jewel boxes, as wrapping to offer presents and precisely, this is what is in question.

This topological indication is essential. What is important, is what is inside. Agalma can indeed mean "ornament or adornment", but it is here above all "a precious object, a jewel, something which is inside". And here expressly, Alcibiades tears us away from this dialectic of the beautiful which was up to then the path, the guide, the mode of capture on this path of the desirable and he undeceives us in connection with Socrates himself.

"Iste hoti, you should know," he says, "Socrates apparently loves beautiful boys, oute ei tis kalos esti meleis auto ouden, whether one or other is beautiful, melieis auto ouden, does not matter a straw to him, he does not give a hang, on the contrary he despises it, kataphronei", we are told, "as no one would ever believe, tosouton hoson oud'an eis oietheie you could not even imagine...". and that really, the aim that he pursues - I am underlining it because after all it is in the text - it is expressly articulated at this point that it is not alone external goods, riches for example, which everyone up to then (we are delicate souls) has said that it was not what one sought in others, "nor any of the other advantages which might seem in any way to procure makaria, happiness, felicity, hupo plethous to anyone whatsoever;" one is quite wrong to interpret it here as a sign that it is a question of disdaining goods which are goods "for the mob". What is rejected, is precisely what had been spoken about up to then, good things in general (216e).

"On the other hand", Alcibiades tells us, "do not pause at his strange appearance if, eironeuomenos, he pretends ignorance, he questions, he plays the fool in order to get a response, he really behaves like a child, he spends his time making fun. But spoudasantos de autou" - not as it is translated - "when he decides to be serious" - but - it is - "you, be serious, pay careful attention to it, and open this Silenos, anoichthentos, opened out, I don't know if anyone has ever seen the agalmata which are inside, the jewels" about which right away Alcibiades states that he really doubts whether anyone has ever been able to see what he is talking about.

We know that this is not alone the discourse of passion, but the discourse of passion at its most quaking point, namely the one (4) which is in a way entirely contained in the origin. Even before he explains himself, he is there, charged with the most fundamental aspect of everything that he has to tell us, what is going to begin. Therefore it is indeed the language of passion.

Already this unique, personal relationship: no one has ever seen what is in question, as I once happened to see; and I saw it!" "I found them, these agalmata already so divine, chrusa", c'est chou, "it was golden and all beautiful and wonderful, that there remained only one thing to do, en brachei, as soon as possible, by the quickest means, do whatever Socrates commands, poieteon, what is to be done"; what becomes duty, is whatever Socrates is pleased to command (217a).

I do not think it useless for us to articulate a text like this a step at a time. This is not to be read as one reads France-Soir or an article in the International journal of psychoanalysis. It is indeed something whose effects are surprising. On the one hand we are not told for the present what these agalmata (in the plural) are and, on the other hand, this involves all of a sudden this subversion, this falling under the influence of the commandments of the one who possesses them. You cannot fail to find here all the same something of the magic which I already highlighted for you around the Che vuoi? What do you want? It is indeed this key, this essential cutting edge of the topology of the subject which begins with: what do you want? - In other words: is there a desire which is really your will?

"And" - Alcibiades continues - "as I thought he was in earnest when he spoke about hora, eme hora" - this is translated by - "youthful bloom...", and there begins the whole seduction scene.

But as I told you, we will not go any further today, we will try to make you sense that which renders necessary this passage from the first phase to the other one, namely why it is absolutely necessary that at any price Socrates should unmask himself. We are only going to stop at these agalmata. I can honestly tell you that it is not - give me credit for this - to this text that there goes back for me the problematic of agalma, not that this would be in the least inappropriate because this text suffices to justify it, but I am going to tell you the story as it is.

I can tell you, without being really able to date it, that my first encounter with agalma is an encounter like every encounter, unexpected. It is in a verse of Euripides' Hecuba that it struck me some years ago and you will easily understand why. It was all the same a little while before the period when I introduced here the function of the phallus, with the essential articulation that anaJLytic experience and Freud's doctrine shows us that it has, between demand and desire; so that in passing, I did not fail to be struck by the use that was given to this term in the mouth of Hecuba. Hecuba says: "Where am I going to be brought, where am I going to be deported?"

As you know, the tragedy of Hecuba takes place at the moment of the capture of Troy and, among all the places that she envisages in her discourse, there is: "Might it be to this at once sacred and plague-stricken place.... Delos?" - As you know no one had the right either to give birth there or to die there. And then, at the description of Delos, she makes an allusion to an object which was celebrated, which was - as the fashion in which she speaks about it indicates - a palm tree of which she says that (5) this palm tree, is odinos agalma dias, namely odinos, of the pain, agalma dias, the term dias designates [Leto], it is a question of the birth of Apollo, it is "the agalma of the pain of the divine one". We rediscover the thematic of giving birth but all the same rather changed because here this trunk, this tree, this magical thing erected, preserved as an object of reference throughout the ages, is something which cannot fail - at least for us analysts - to awaken the whole register that there exists around the thematic of the [female] phallus in so far as its phantasy is, as we know, at the horizon and situates this infantile object [as a fetish].

The fetish that it remains can hardly fail either to be for us the echo of this signification. But in any case, it is quite clear that agalma cannot be translated here in any way by "ornament, adornment", nor even as one often sees it in the texts, "statue" - because often theon agalmata, when one is translating rapidly one thinks that it fits in, that it is a question in the text of "statues of the gods". You see right away, the point I am keeping you at, the reason why I believe that it is a term to highlight in this signification, this hidden accent which presides over what must be done to hold back on this path of banalisation which always tends to efface for us the true sense of texts, the fact is that each time you encounter agalma - pay careful attention - even if it seems to be a question of "statues of the gods", if you look closely at it, you will perceive that it is always a question of something different.

I am giving you already - we are not playing at riddles here - the key to the question in telling you that it is the fetishaccent of the object in question that is always stressed.

 Moreover of course, I am not giving here a course of ethnology, nor even of linguistics. And I am not going, in this connection, to link up the function of the fetish nor of those round stones, essentially at the centre of a temple (the temple of Apollo for example). You very often see (this thing is very well known) the god himself represented, a fetish of some people, tribe at the loop of the Niger; it is something unnamable, formless, upon which there can be poured out on occasion an enormous lot of liquids of different origins, more or less stinking and filthy and whose accumulated superimposition, going from blood to shit, constituted the sign that here is something around which all sorts of effects are concentrated making of the fetish in itself something quite different to an image, to an icon, in so far as it might be a reproduction.

But this occult power of the object remains at the basis of the usage whose accent, even for us, is still preserved in the term idol or icon. In the term idol, for example in the use Polyeuctus makes of it, it means: it is nothing at all, it is to be thrown away. But all the same if you say about one or other person: "I have made him my idol", that means all the same that
 (6) you do not simply make of him the reproduction of yourself or of him but that you make of him something else, around which something happens.

Moreover it is not a question for me here of pursuing the phenomenology of the fetish but of showing the function that this occupies in its place. And in order to do this I can rapidly indicate to you that I tried, as far as my strength allowed me, to make a survey of the passages which remain of Greek literature where the word agalma is employed. And it is only in order to go quickly that I will not read each one to you.

You should simply know for example that it is from the multiplicity of the deployment of significations that I extract for you what is in a way the central function that must be seen at the limit of the usages of this word; because naturally, it is not our idea - I think here along the line of the teaching I give you - that etymology consists in finding the meaning in the root.

The root of agalma is not all that easy. What I want to tell you, is that the authors, in so far as they link it to agauos from this ambiguous word agamai, "I admire" but just as much "I am envious, I am jealous of", which is going to give agazo, "what one tolerates with difficulty", going towards agaiomai which means "to be indignant", from which the authors looking for roots
 (I mean roots which carry a meaning with them, which is absolutely contrary to the principle of linguistics) separate out gal or gel the gel of gelao the gal which is the same in glene,
 "the pupil", and galene - the other day, I quoted it for you in passing - "it is the sea which shines because it is perfectly unified": in short, that it is an idea of eclat which is hidden here in the root. Moreover aglaos, Aglae, the Brilliant is there to provide us with a familiar echo. As you see, this does not go against what we have to say about it. I only put it here in parentheses, because also this is rather only an occasion to show you the ambiguities of this idea that etymology is something which carries us not towards a signifier but toward a central signification.

Because one could just as well interest oneself not in gal, but in the first part of the phonematic articulation, namely aga which is properly the reason why agalma interests us with respect to agathos. And along this path, you know that if I do not jib at the import of the discourse of Agathon, I prefer to go frankly to the great phantasy of the Cratylus you will see that the etymology of Agathon is agastos, admirable, therefore God knows why one should go looking for agaston, the admirable that there is in thoon, rapid! This moreover is the way in which everything is interpreted in the Cratylus, there are some rather fine things; in the etymology of anthropos there is "articulated language". Plato was really someone very special.

(7) Agalma, in truth, it is not to that aspect that we have to turn to give it its value; agalma, as one can see, had always referred to images on condition that you see clearly that, as in every context, it is always a very special type of image. I have to choose among the references. There are some in Empedocles, in Heraclitus, in Democritus. I am going to take the most popular, the poetic, the ones that everybody knew by heart in antiquity. I am going to look for them in an interlined edition of the Iliad and of the Odyssey. In the Odyssey for example there are two places where one finds agalma.

It is first of all in Book III in the Telemachus section and it is a question of sacrifices which are being made for the arrival of Telemachus. The pretenders, as usual, make their contribution and there is sacrificed to the god a boos which is translated by "a heifer", which is a specimen of the bovine species. And it is said that there was specially invoked someone called Laerkes who is a goldsmith, like [Hephaistos] and who is charged with making "a golden ornament", agalma for the horns of the beast. I will spare you all the practicalities of the ceremony. But what is important, is not what happens afterwards, whether it is a question of a voodoo-type sacrifice, what is important is what it is said they expect from agalma; agalma in effect is involved in this, we are expressly told it. The agalma, is precisely this golden ornament, and it is as an offering to the goddess Athena that this is sacrificed, so that having seen it, she may be kecharoito, "gratified" - let us use this word, because it is a word from our own language. In other words, the agalma appears indeed as a kind of trap for the gods; the gods, these real beings, there are contraptions which catch their eye.

You must not believe that this is the only example that I would have to give you of the use of agalma, for example when, in Book VIII of the same Odyssey, we are told what happened at the fall of Troy, namely the famous history of the big horse which contained in its belly the enemies and all the misfortunes. [The horse] who was pregnant with the ruin of Troy, the Trojans who had dragged it inside the walls question themselves and ask themselves what they are going to do with it. They hesitate and we have to think that this hesitation was what was fatal for them, because there were two things to do - either, to open the belly of the hollow wood to see what is inside - or, having dragged it to the summit of the citadel, to leave it there to be what? Mega agalma. It is the same idea, it is the charm. It is something which is here as embarrassing for them as for the Greeks. To tell the truth it is an unusual object, it is this famous extraordinary object which is so much at the centre of a whole series of preoccupations which are still contemporaneous - I do not need to evoke here the surrealist horizon.

What is certain is that, for the ancients also, the agalma is something in terms of which one can in short capture divine attention. There are a thousand examples of it that I could give you. In the story of Hecuba (again in Euripides), in another place, there is recounted the sacrifice to Achilles' manes, of her daughter Polyxenes. And it is very well done: we (8) have there the exception which is the occasion for evoking in us erotic mirages: it is the moment that the heroine herself offers her admirable breast which is we are told "like an agalma, hos agalmatos". Now it is not sure.... there is nothing to indicate that we should be satisfied here with what that evokes, namely the perfection of the mammary organs in Greek statuary. I indeed rather believe that what is in question, given that at the epoch it was not about objects in a museum, is indeed rather about something the signs of which we see everywhere moreover in the use that is made of the word when it is said that in the sanctuaries, in temples, in ceremonies people "hang up anapto, agalmata". The magical value of objects which are evoked here is indeed linked rather to the evocation of these objects which we well know which are called ex voto. In a word, for people much closer than we are to the differentiation of objects at the origin, it is as beautiful as ex voto breasts; and in effect ex voto breasts are always perfect, they are machine-turned, moulded. Other examples are not lacking, but we can stay with that.

What is in question, is the brilliant sense, the gallant sense, because the word galant comes from galer in old French; it is indeed, it should be said, the function of this that we analysts have discovered under the name of partial object. One of the greatest discoveries of analytic investigation is this function of the partial object. The thing which on this occasion should astonish us most, us analysts, is that having discovered such remarkable things our whole effort should always be to efface their originality.

It is said somewhere, in Pausanias, also in connection with a usage of agalma, that the agalmata which referred in such and such a sanctuary to sorceresses who were there expressly to hold back, to prevent Alcmenes from giving birth were amudroteros amudrota, "a little bit effaced". Well, that's it!

We ourselves have also effaced, as far as we were able, what is meant by the partial object; namely that our first effort was to interpret what had been a marvellous discovery, namely this fundamentally partial aspect of the object in so far as it is pivot, centre, key of human desire, this would have been worth (9) dwelling on for a moment.... But no, not at all! This was directed towards a dialectic of totalisation, namely the only one worthy of us, the flat object, the round object, the total object, the spherical object without feet or paws, the whole of the other, the perfect genital object at which, as everyone knows, our love irresistibly comes to term! We did not say to ourselves in connection with all of this that - even by taking things in this way - perhaps that qua object of desire, this other is the addition-of a whole lot of partial objects (which is not at all the same as a total object), that what we ourselves perhaps, in what we elaborate, have to handle in this foundation which is called our Id, is perhaps a question of a vast trophy of all these partial objects.

At the horizon of our ascesis, of our model of love, we have placed the other.... which is not altogether wrong, but of this other, we have made the other to whom there is addressed this bizare function which we call oblativity: we love the other for himself - at least when one has arrived at the goal and at perfection, at the genital stage which blesses all of this!

We have certainly gained something by opening up a certain topology of relationships to the other which moreover, as you know, is not simply our privilege because a whole contemporary speculation which is personalist in different ways turns around it. But it is funny all the same that there is something that we have left completely to one side in this affair - it has to be left to one side when one approaches things from this particularly simplified perspective - and which supposes, that with the idea of pre-established harmony, the problem is resolved: that in short it is enough to love genitally to love the other for himself.

I did not bring - because I dealt with it elsewhere and you will see it coming out soon - the incredible passage which, on this, is developed on the subject of the characterology of the genital person, in this volume which is called La Psychanalyse d'Aujourd'hui. The sort of sermonising which takes place around this terminal idealness is something whose ridiculousness I have, I believe, for a long time made you sense. There is no need for us to dwell on it today. But in any case, it is quite clear that to come back to the starting point and to sources, there is at least one question to pose on this subject. If this oblativity love is truly only in a way the homologue, the development, the flowering of the genital act in itself (which would be enough, as I would say, to give its secret, its pitch, its measure), it is clear that the ambiguity persists as regards whether our oblativity is what we dedicate to this other in this love which is all-loving, all for the other, whether what we are seeking is his jpuissance (as seems self-evident from the fact that it is a question of genital union) or indeed his perfection.

When one evokes such high-flown moral ideas as that of oblativity, the least that can be said about it, which is something that reawakens old questions, is all the same to evoke the duplicity of these terms. After all these terms, in such a worn down, simplified form can only be sustained by what is underlying, namely the altogether modern supposition of the subject and the object. Moreover once an author who is a little bit careful to write in a style which is permeable to the (10) contemporary audience develops these terms, it will always be around the notion of the subject and the object that he will comment on this analytic theme: we take the other as a subject and not at all purely and simply as our object. The object being situated here in the context of a value of pleasure, of enjoyment, of jpuissance, the object being supposed to reduce this uniqueness of the other (in so far as he should be for us the subject) to this omnivalent function (if we make of him only an object) of being after all any object whatsoever, an object like others, to be an object which may be rejected, changed, in short to be profoundly devalued.

Such is the thematic which underlies this ideal of oblativity, as it is articulated, when it is made for us into a type of ethical correlative necessary for acceding to a true love which is supposed to be sufficiently connoted by being genital.

You should note that today I am less in the process of criticising - this is also why I dispense myself with recalling the texts - this analytic foolishness, than of putting in question that on which it reposes, namely that there is supposed to be some superiority or other in favour of the beloved, of the love partner in the fact that he is thus, in our existential-analytic vocabulary, considered as a subject. Because I do not know whether after having accorded a pejorative connotation to the fact of considering the other as an object, anyone has ever made the remark that to consider him as a subject is no better. Because if one object is as good as another according to its thinking, on condition that we give to the word object its initial meaning (that there are objects in so far as we distinguish them and can communicate them), if it is deplorable therefore that the beloved should ever become an object, is it any better that he should be a subject?

To respond to this it is enough to make the remark that if one object is as good as another, for the subject it is still worse, because it is not simply another subject that he is as good as. A subject strictly speaking is another! The strict subject, is someone to whom we can impute what? Nothing other than being like us this being who enarthron echein epos, "who expresses himself in articulated language", who possesses the combination and who therefore can respond to our combination by his own combinations, whom we can bring into our calculations as someone who combines like us.

I think that those who are formed according to the method that we have introduced, inaugurated here are not going to contradict me on this, it is the only sound definition of the subject, in any case the only sound one for us - the one which permits there to be introduced how a subject obligatorily enters into the Spaltung determined by his submission to this language. Namely that starting from these terms we can see how it is strictly necessary that something happens, which is that in the subject there is a part where it (c_a) speaks all by itself, this thing from which nevertheless the subject remains suspended. Moreover - it is precisely what it is a question of knowing and how is it possible to forget it - what function there can be occupied in this rightly elective, privileged relationship that the love relationship is by the fact that this subject with whom among all others we have this bond of love.... the way precisely this question has a relationship with the fact that he is the object of our desire. Because if one suspends this mooring point, this turning point, this centre of gravity, of hooking-on of the love (11) relationship, if one highlights it and if, in doing so, one does not do it in a distinctive way, it is really impossible to say anything at all that is not a conjuring trick as regards the love relationship. It is precisely by that, by this necessity of accentuating the correlative object of desire in so far as this is the object, not the object of equivalence, of the transitivity of goods, of the transaction about things that are coveted, but this something which is the aim of desire as such, that which accentuates one object among all as being without equivalence to the others. It is with this function of the object, it is to this accentuating of the object that there responds the introduction into analysis of the function of the partial object.

And moreover in fact everything which gives, as you know, its weight, its resonance, its accent to metaphysical discourse, always reposes on some ambiguity. In other words, if all the terms you make use of when you are doing metaphysics, were strictly defined, had each only a univocal signification, if the dictionary of philosophy triumphed in any way (the eternal goal of professors!) you would no longer have to do metaphysics at all, because you would no longer have anything to say. I mean that you perceive that as regards mathematics, it is much better there, one can move about signs that have a univocal sense because they do not have any.

In any case, when you speak in a more or less passionate way about the relationships of the subject and the object, it is because under subject you put something other than this strict subject that I spoke to you about above and, under object, something other than the object which I have just defined as something which, at the limit, is confined to the strict equivalence of an unequivocal communication of a scientific object. In a word, if this object impassions you it is because within, hidden in it there is the object of desire, agalma (the weight, the thing that makes it interesting to know where this famous object is, to know its function and to know where it operates just as much in inter- as in intrasubjectivity) and in so far as this privileged object of desire, is something which, for each person, culminates at this frontier, at this limiting point which I have taught you to consider as the metonymy of the unconscious discourse where it plays a role that I tried to formalise - I will come back to it the next time - in the phantasy.

And it is always this object which, however you have to speak about it in analytic experience - whether you call it breast, phallus, or shit -, is a partial object. This is what there is question of in so far as analysis is a method, a technique which advanced into this abandoned field, into this discredited field, into this field excluded by philosophy (because it is not managable, not accessible to its dialectic and for the same reasons) which is called desire. If we are not able to highlight, highlight in a strict topology, the function of what there is signified by this object at once so limited and so fleeting in its shape, which is called the partial object, if therefore you do not see the interest of what I am introducing today under the name of agalma (it is the major point of analytic experience) and I cannot believe it for an instant given that, however misunderstood this is, the force of things brings it about that the most modern things that are done, said in the analytic dialectic turn around this fundamental, radical function, the Kleinian reference of the object qua good or bad, which indeed is considered in this dialectic as a primordial given. It is indeed on this that I would ask you to allow your minds to dwell for an instant.

We bring into play a lot of things, a lot of functions of identification: identification to the one from whom we demand something in the appeal of love and, if this appeal is rejected, (12) identification to the very one to whom we address ourselves as the object of our love (this very tangible passage from love to identification) and then, in a third sort of identification (you should read a little Freud: the Essais de psychanalyse), the function of third which this certain characteristic object takes on in so far as it may be the object of the desire of the other to whom we identify ourselves. In short, our subjectivity is something we entirely construct in plurality, in the pluralism of these levels of identification which we will call the Ego-Ideal, the Ideal Ego, which we will also call the desiring Ego.

But it is all the same necessary to know where in this articulation there functions, there is situated the partial object. And there you can simply remark, with the present development of analytic discourse, that this object, agalma, little o, object of desire, when we search for it according to the Kleinian method, is there from the beginning before any development of the dialectic, it is already there as object of desire. The weight, the intercentral kernel of the good or the bad object (in every psychology which tends to develop itself and explain itself in Freudian terms) is this good object or this bad object that Melanie Klein situates somewhere in this origin, this beginning of beginnings which is even before the depressive phase. Is there not something there in our experience, which by itself alone is already sufficiently descriptive?

I think that I have done enough today in saying that it is around

this that concretely, in analysis or outside analysis, there can and there should be made the division between a perspective on love which, it, in a way, drowns, diverts, masks, elides, sublimates everything that is concrete in experience (this famous ascent towards a supreme Good whose cheapened vague reflections it is astonishing to see being still kept in analysis by us, under the name of oblativity, this sort of loving in God, as I might say, which is supposed to be at the basis of every loving relationship), or whether, as experience shows, everything turns around this privilege, around this unique point constituted somewhere by what we only find in a being when we really love. But what is that.... precisely agalma, this object which we have learned to circumscribe, to distinguish in analytic experience and around which, the-next time, we will try to reconstruct, in its triple topology (of the subject, of the small other and of the big Other), at what point it comes into play and how it is only through the Other and for the Other that Alcibiades, like each and every person, wants to make his love known to Socrates.

Seminar 9: Wednesday 25 January 1961

We arrived the last time at the point where Socrates, speaking about love, makes Diotima speak in his place. I stressed with a question mark this astonishing substitution at the acme, at the point of maximum interest of the dialogue, namely when Socrates after having brought about the decisive turning point by producing lack at the heart of the question about love (love can only be articulated around this lack because of the fact that there can only be lack of what it desires), and after having brought about this turning point in the always triumphant, magisterial style of this questioning in so far as it is brought to bear on this consistency of the signifier - I showed you that it was what was essential in Socratic dialectic - the point at which he distinguishes from all other sorts of knowledge, episteme, science, at this point, in a singular fashion, he is going to allow to speak in an ambiguous fashion the person who, in his place, is going to express herself by what we have properly speaking called myth - myth about which on this occasion I pointed out to you that it is not as specified a term as it is in our tongue - with the distance that we have taken about what distinguishes myth from science: muthous legein, is at once both a precise story and the discourse, what one says. This is what Socrates is going to rely on by letting Diotima speak.

And I underlined, accentuated with a stroke, the relationship there is between this substitution and the dioecisme whose form, essence Aristophanes had already indicated as being at the heart of the problem of love; by a singular dividing up it is perhaps the woman, the woman who is in him I said, that Socrates from a certain moment allows to speak.

You all understand that this totality, this succession of forms, this series of transformations - employ it as you wish in the sense that this term takes on in combinations - is expressed in a geometrical demonstration; this transformation of figures in the measure that the dialogue advances, is where we are trying to rediscover the structural reference points which, for us and for Plato who is guiding us here, will give us the coordinates of what is called the object of the dialogue: love.

That is why, reentering the discourse of Diotima, we see that something develops which, in a way, is going to make us slip further and further from this original trait that Socrates introduced into his dialectic by posing the term lack which Diotima is going to interrogate us about; what she is going to lead us to takes its beginnings already around an interrogation, about what is envisaged by the point at which she takes up Socrates' discourse: "What is lacking to the one who loves?"

And there, we find ourselves immediately brought to this dialectic of goods for which I would ask you to refer to our discourse of last year on Ethics. "Why does the one who loves love these good things?" And she continues: "It is in order to (2) enjoy them" (205a). And it is here that the arrest, the return takes place: "Is this dimension of love going to arise then from all these goods?" And it is here that Diotima, by making a reference also worth noting to what we have accentuated as being the original function of creation as such, of poiesis, is going to take it as her reference in order to say: "When we speak about poiesis, we are speaking about creation, but do you not see that the use we make of it is all the same more limited, because it is to these sorts of creators who are called poets, this sort of creation which means that it is to poetry and to music that we are referring, just as in all the good things there is something which is specified for us to speak of love..." (205d), this is how she introduces the theme of the love of beauty, of beauty as specifying the direction in which there is exercised this appeal, this attraction for the possession, for the enjoyment of possessing, for the constitution of a ktema which is the point to which she will lead us in order to define love (204c-206a).

This fact is tangible in the rest of the discourse, something is sufficiently underlined in it as a surprise and as a leap: this good thing, in what way does it refer to what is called and what is specially specified as beauty? Undoubtedly, we have to underline at this turning point of the discourse this feature of surprise which means that it is at this very passage that Socrates bears witness in one of his replies to a marvelling, to the same bewilderment which had been evoked for the sophistical discourse, and regarding which he tells us that Diotima demonstrates the same priceless authority as that with which the Sophists exercise their fascination; and Plato warns us that at this level Diotima expresses herself just like a Sophist and with the same authority (206b-208b).

What she introduces is the following, that this beauty has a relationship with something which concerns not having, not anything which can be possessed, but being, and being properly speaking in so far as is it that of the mortal being. What is proper to a mortal being is that he perpetuates himself by generation. Generation and destruction, such is the alternation which rules the domain of what is perishable, such also is the mark which makes of it an inferior order of reality, at least this is the way that this is ordered in the whole perspective which unfolds in the Socratic line of descendants, both in Socrates and in Plato.

This alternation of generation and corruption is here what is striking in the very domain of the human, this is what ensures that it finds its eminent rule elsewhere, at a higher level, where precisely neither generation nor corruption attack the essences, in the eternal forms in the participation in which alone what exists is assured in its foundation as being.

Beauty therefore, says Diotima, is that which in short in this movement of generation (in so far, she says, as it is the mode in which the mortal is reproduced, that it is only by this that he approaches the permanent, the eternal, that this is his fragile mode of participation in the eternal), beauty is properly speaking that which in this passage, in this participation at a distance, what helps him, as one might say, to get through the difficult points. Beauty is the way of a sort of giving birth, not without pain but with the least pain possible, this painful manoeuvring of all that is mortal towards what it aspires to, namely immortality.

The whole discourse of Diotima properly articulates this function of beauty as being first of all - it is properly in this way that she introduces it - an illusion, a fundamental mirage through which the perishable, fragile being is sustained in its (3) relationship, in its quest for everlastingness which is its essential aspiration. Of course, there is in this almost shamelessly an opportunity for a whole series of slippages which are so many conjuring tricks. And in this connection, she introduces as being of the same order this same constancy in which the subject recognises himself as being in his life, his short individual life, always the same, despite - she underlines this remark - the fact that when all is said and done there is not a point or a detail of his carnal reality, of his hair and even his bones, which is not the locus of a perpetual renewal. Nothing is ever the same, everything flows, everything changes (the discourse of Heraclitus underlies this), nothing is ever the same and nevertheless something recognises itself, affirms itself, says that it is always itself. And it is to this that she refers significantly in order to tell us that it is analogously, that when all is said and done it is of the same nature as what happens in the renewal of beings by way of generation: the fact that one after another these beings succeed one another by reproducing the same type. The mystery of morphogenesis is the same as that which sustains in its constancy the individual form.

In this first reference to the problem of death, in this function which is attributed to this mirage of beauty as being that which guides the subject in his relationship with death (in so far as he is at once both distanced from and directed by the immortal), it is impossible for you not to make the rapprochement with what last year, I tried to define, to approach, concerning this function of beauty in this effect of defence in which it intervenes, of a barrier at the extreme point of this zone which I defined as being that of the entre-deux-morts. In short what beauty appears to us to be destined to cover over in the very discourse of Diotima is, if there are two desires in man which capture him in this relationship to eternity with generation on the one hand, corruption and destruction on the other, it is the desire for death qua unapproachable that beauty is designed to veil. The thing is clear at the beginning of Diotima's discourse.

One finds this phenomenon which we brought out in connection with tragedy in so far as tragedy is at once the evocation, the approach of the desire for death as such which is hidden behind the evocation of Ate, of the fundamental calamity around which there turns the destiny of the tragic hero and of the fact that, for us, in so far as we are called to participate in it, it is at this maximal moment that the mirage of tragic beauty appears.

Desire of beauty, desire for beauty, it is this ambiguity around which the last time I told you there was going to operate the sliding of the whole discourse of Diotima. I am leaving you here to follow it yourselves in the development of this discourse. Desire of beauty, desire in so far as it is attached, as it is captured in this mirage, this is what corresponds to what we have articulated as corresponding to the hidden presence of the desire for death. The desire for beauty, is that which, in a way, reversing the function, brings it about that the subject chooses the traces, the appeals of what his objects offer him, certain of his objects.

It is here that we see operating in the discourse of Diotima this slippage which, from this beauty which was there, not medium but transition, a mode of passage, makes it become, this beauty, the very goal which is going to be sought. By dint, one might say, of remaining the guide, it is the guide which becomes object, or (4) rather which substitutes itself for the objects which can be its support, and not without also the transition being extremely marked by it in the discourse itself. The transition is forced. We see Diotima, after having gone as far as possible in the development of functional beauty, of beauty in this relationship to the goal of immortality, as having gone as far as paradox here because she is going (evoking precisely the tragic reality to which we referred ourselves last year) as far as to give this enunciation which does not fail to provoke some derisive smiles: "Do you think that those who show themselves capable of the most beautiful actions, Ascestis" - about whom I spoke last year in connection with the entre-deux-morts of tragedy - "in so far as she accepted to die in place of Admetus did not do it so that people would speak about her, so that discourse would make her immortal forever?" (208d).

It is to this point that Diotima brings her discourse and she stops, saying: "Perhaps even you may become an initiate; but as for the higher revelations (epopteia), I do not know if you could ever become an adept" (210a). Evoking properly speaking the dimension of the mysteries, she takes up her discourse again on this other register (what was only a transition becomes the goal) in which, developing the thematic of what we could call a sort of Platonic Don Juanism, she shows us the ladder which is proposed to this new phase which develops as an initiatory one, which makes objects resolve themselves in a progressive ascent to what is pure beauty, beauty in itself, beauty without admixture. And she suddenly passes to something which seems indeed to have no longer anything to do with the thematic of generating, namely that which goes from love (not just simply of a beautiful young man, but of this beauty that there is in all beautiful young people) to the essence of beauty, from the essence of beauty to eternal beauty and, by taking things at a very high level, grasping its operation in the order of the world of this reality which turns around the fixed plane of the stars which - as we have already indicated - is that by which knowledge, in the Platonic perspective, rejoins properly speaking that of the Immortals.

I think that I have sufficiently made you sense this sort of conjuring through which beauty, in so far as it finds itself as first defined, encountered as a prize on the path of being, becomes the goal of the pilgrimage, how the object which was presented to us at first as the support of beauty becomes the transition towards beauty, how really - if we bring it back to our own terms - one could say that this dialectical definition of love, as it is developed by Diotima, encounters what we have tried to define as the metonymical function in desire.

It is something which is beyond all these objects, which is in the passage from a certain aim, from a certain relationship, that of desire through all the objects towards a limitless perspective; this is what is in question in the discourse of Diotima. One might believe, from numerous indications, that this is in the final analysis the reality of the discourse. And more or less, it is indeed what we are always used to considering as being the perspective of eros in the Platonic doctrine. The erastes, the eron, the lover, in search of a distant eromenos is led by all the eromenoi, everything that is lovable, worthy of being loved (a distant eromenos or eromenon, is moreover a neutral goal) and the problem is what is signified, what can (5) continue to be signified beyond this breakthrough, this leap which is stressed by that which, at the beginning of the dialectic, presented itself as ktema, as the goal of possession.

No doubt the step that we have taken sufficiently marks that we are no longer at the level of having as term of what is envisaged, but at that of being and that moreover in this progress, in this ascesis, it is a transformation, a becoming of the subject that is in question, that it is a final identification with what is supremely lovable that is in question (the erastes becomes the eromenos). In a word, the further the subject directs his aim, the more he is entitled to love himself - in his Ideal Ego as we would say - the more he desires, the more he himself becomes desirable. And it is here again moreover that theological articulation raises a finger to tell us that the Platonic eros is irreducible to what Christian agape has revealed to us, namely that in the Platonic eros the lover, love, only aims at his own perfection.

Now the commentary on the Symposium that we are carrying out seems to me to be precisely of a nature to show that it is nothing of the kind, namely that this is not the point at which Plato remains, on condition that we are prepared to see after this highlighting what is signified by the fact that first of all that instead of Socrates precisely he allowed Diotima to speak and then to see afterwards what happens once Alcibiades arrives on the scene.

Let us not forget that Diotima had introduced love at first as being not at all of the nature of the gods, but of that of demons in so far as it is, an intermediary between the immortals and the mortals (202e). Let us not forget that in order to illustrate it, to give a sense of what is in question, she made use of nothing other than the comparison with this intermediary between episteme, science in the Socratic sense, and amathia, ignorance, this intermediary which in the Platonic discourse, is called doxa, true opinion in so far no doubt as it is true, but in a way that the subject is incapable of accounting for it, that he does not know why it is true. And I underlined these two very striking formulas - that of the aneu tou echein logon dounai which characterises the doxa, "to give the formula, the logos, without having it", of the echo there is in this formula with what we give here in this place as being that of love which is precisely "to give what one does not have", and the other formula, the one which confronts the first, no less worthy of being underlined - in the court as I might say - namely looking from the side of amathia, namely that "this doxa is not ignorance either, oute amathia, because that which by chance reaches the real, to gar tou ontos tugchanon, that which encounters what there is, how could it also be complete ignorance?" (202a).

This indeed is what we must sense, for our own part, in what I could call the Platonic staging of the dialogue. It is that Socrates, even given the only thing in which he says he has some ability, (it is concerning the affairs of love), even if it is posed at the start that he knows about it, precisely he cannot speak about it except by remaining in the zone of the "he did not know".

(6) Although knowing, he speaks, and not being himself who knows able to speak, he must make speak someone in short who speaks without knowing. And this indeed is what allows us to resituate the intangibility of Agathon's response when he escapes from the dialectic of Socrates by quite simply saying to him: "I fear I knew nothing of what I said" (201b). But it is precisely for that reason, this is precisely what gives the accent that I developed on this extraordinarily derisive mode that we have underlined, that which gives its import to the discourse of Agathon and its special import, to have precisely been delivered from the mouth of a tragic poet. The tragic poet, as I showed you, can only speak about it in the style of a clown, just as it was given to Aristophanes the comic poet to accentuate these passionate traits which we confuse with the tragic approach.

"He did not know...". Let us not forget that this is what gives its meaning to the myth that Diotima introduced about the birth of Love, that this Love is born of Aporia and Poros. It is conceived during the sleep of Poros, the omniscient, the son of Metis, the ingenious one par excellence, the omniscient-and-omnipotent, resource par excellence. It is while he is asleep, at a time when he no longer knows anything, that there is going to be produced the encounter from which Love is going to be generated. And the one who at that moment insinuates herself by her desire to produce this birth, Aporia, the feminine Aporia, here the erastes, the original desiring one in the true feminine position which I underlined on several occasions, she is well defined in her essence, in her nature all the same before the birth of Love and very precisely by what is missing, it is that she has nothing of the eromenon about her. Aporia, absolute Poverty, is posed in the myth as being in no way recognised by the banquet which is being held at that moment, that of the gods on the birthday of Aphrodite, she is at the door, she is in no way recognised, she does not have in herself, as absolute Poverty, any good which gives her a right to be at the table of beings. This indeed is the reason why she is before love. It is because the metaphor where I told you that we would recognise always that it is a question of love, even in a shadow, the metaphor which substitutes the eron, the erastes for the eromenon is missing here through lack of the eromenon at the start. The step, the stage, the logical time before the birth of love is described in this way.

On the other side, the "he did not know...." is absolutely essential for the other step. And here let me give an account of what came to my mind while I was trying last night to highlight, to punctuate for you this articulating moment of the structure, it is nothing less than the echo of this poetry, of this admirable poem - which you will not be astonished at because it was intentionally that in it I chose the example in which I tried to demonstrate the fundamental nature of metaphor - this poem which all by itself would be sufficient, despite all the objections that our snobbery may have against him, to make to Victor Hugo a poet worthy of Homer, Booz endormi and the echo which suddenly came to me of it as if always having had it, of these two verses:

Booz ne savait pas qu'une femme était là,
Et Ruth ne savait point ce que Dieu voulait d'elle.

Reread the whole of this poem so that you may perceive that all the givens of the fundamental drama, that everything which gives to the Oedipus complex its eternal meaning and weight, that none of these givens are lacking, even including the entre-deux-morts evoked a few strophes before in connection with the age and the widowhood of Booz:

(7) Voilà longtemps que celle avec qui j'ai dormi,
O Seigneur! a quitté ma couche pour la vôtre;
Et nous sommes encor tout mêlés l'un à l'autre,
Elle à demi vivante et moi mort à demi.

Nothing is lacking to the relationship of this entre-deux-morts with the tragic dimension which is indeed the one evoked here as being constitutive of the whole paternal transmission; nothing is lacking to it, and that is why this poem is the very locus of the presence of the metaphorical function which you will ceaselessly discover in it. Everything, even including as one might say the aberrations of the poet is here pushed to extremes, to the point of saying what he has to say by forcing the terms that he uses:

Comme dormait Jacob, comme dormait Judith,

Judith never slept, it was Holofernes, it does not matter, he is the one who is correct after all because what is outlined at the end of this poem, is what is expressed by the formidable image with which it ends:

(...) et Ruth se demandait,

Immobile, ouvrant l'oeil a moitié sous ses voiles,
 Quel Dieu, quel moissonneur de l'éternel été'
 Avait, en s'en allant, négligemment jeté
 Cette faucille d'or dans le champ des étoiles.

The billhook with which Kronos was castrated could not fail to be evoked at the end of this complete constellation composing the paternity complex.

I ask your pardon for this digression on the "he did not know". But it seems to me to be essential in order to make understandable what is in question in the position of the discourse of Diotima in so far as Socrates can only pose himself here in his knowledge by showing that, there is no discourse about love except from the point where he did not know, which, here, appears to be the function, the mainspring, the starting point of what is meant by this choice of Socrates of his style at this moment of teaching what he is at the same time proving. Neither do we have here something that allows us to grasp what is happening about what the love-relationship is: but it is precisely what is going to follow, namely the entry of Alcibiades.

As you know, it is after (without in fact Socrates appearing to resist it) this marvellous, splendid oceanic development of the discourse of Diotima and, significantly, after Aristophanes had raised his finger to say: "All the same let me put in a word....". Because in this discourse allusion has been made to a certain theory and in effect it was his that the good Diotima has carelessly pushed away with her foot, in what should be noted as a quite significant anachronism (because Socrates says that Diotima had recounted all that to him in the past, but that does not prevent Diotima speaking about the discourse given by Aristophanes). Aristophanes, and with good reason, has his word to say and it is here that Plato gives an indication, shows that there is someone who is not satisfied.... so that the method of sticking to the text is going to make us see whether precisely what is going to develop subsequently does not have some relationship with this indication, even if, this raised finger, says it all, he is interrupted by what? By the entry of Alcibiades.

(8) Here there is a change of perspective and we must carefully set up the world into which all of a sudden, after this great fascinating mirage, all of a sudden he replunges us. I say replunge because this world is not the world beyond, precisely, it is the world as it is where, after all, we know how love is lived out and that, however fascinating all these beautiful stories appear, an uproar, a shout, a hiccup, the entry of a drunken man is enough to bring us back to it as it really is.

This transcendence where we have, seen played out in a ghostly way the substitution of another for another, we are now going to see incarnated. And if, as I teach you, three and not just two are necessary to love, well here we are going to see it.

Alcibiades enters and it is not a bad thing for you to see him emerging in the shape in which he appears, namely with the big bloated face which gives him not alone his state of being officially intoxicated, but the pile of garlands that he is wearing and which, manifestly has an outstanding exhibitionistic signification, in the divine state that he holds as a leader of men. You should never forget what we lose by no longer having wigs! Imagine what learned and also frivolous discussions must have been in the conversations of the XVIIth century when each of these personages shook at each word this sort of lion-like rig-out which was moreover a receptacle for dirt and vermin, imagine then the wig of the Grand Siecle, from the point of view of its mantic effect! If we are lacking this, Alcibiades does not lack it and he goes straight to the only personage whose identity he is capable in his condition of discerning (it is, thank God, the master of the house!) Agathon. He goes to lie next to him, without knowing where that puts him, namely in the metaxu position, "between the two", between Socrates and Agathon, namely precisely at the point that we are at, at the point at which the debate is in the balance between the operation of the one who knows, and knowing, shows that he must speak without knowing and the one who, not knowing, spoke of course like a bird-brain, but who nevertheless spoke very well as Socrates underlined: "You said some very beautiful things". This is where Alcibiades places himself, but not without jumping back when he perceives that this damned Socrates is there again.

It is not for personal reasons that today I am not going to push you to the end of the analysis of what is contributed by the whole of this scene, namely the one which develops after this entry of Alcibiades; nevertheless I must propose to you the first highlights of what this presence of Alcibiades introduces: well, let us call it an atmosphere like the Last Supper. Naturally, I am not going to accentuate the caricatural aspect of things. Incidentally, I spoke in connection with this Symposium, of a gathering of old queens, given that they are not all in the first bloom of youth, but all the same, they are people of some stature, Alcibiades is all the same someone! And when Socrates asks for protection against this personage who does not allow him to look at anyone else, it is not because the commentary on this Symposium throughout the centuries has been carried on in respectable university chairs with all that that involves in terms of nobility and of redundancy, this is all the same not a reason for us not to perceive - as I already underlined - the really scandalous style of what is happening here.

(9) The dimension of love is in the process of showing before us this something in which we must all the same recognise being delineated one of its characteristics, and first of all that it does not tend, wherever it manifests itself in the real, towards harmony. It does not seem after all that this beauty towards which the procession of desiring souls seems to be ascending is something that structures everything into this sort of convergence. Curiously, it is not given in the modes, in the manifestations of love, to call on all to love what you love, to blend themselves with you in the ascent towards the eromenon. Socrates, this most lovable of men, because he is put before us from the first words as a divine personage, after all, the first thing that is in question, is that Alcibiades wants to keep him for himself. You will say that you do not believe it and that all sorts of things go to show it, that is not the question, we are following the text and this is what is at stake. Not only is this what is at stake, but it is properly speaking this dimension which is introduced here.

If the word competition is to be taken in the sense and with the function that I gave it (in the articulation of these transitivisms in which there is constituted the object in so far as it establishes communication between the subjects), something indeed is introduced here of a different order. At the heart of the action of love there is introduced the object, as one might say, of a unique covetousness, which is constituted as such: an object precisely from which one wishes to ward off competition, an object that one does not even wish to show. And remember that this is how I introduced it three years ago now in my discourse, remember that in order to define the object o of phantasy for you I took the example, in La Grande Illusion by Renoir, of Dalio showing his little automaton and the feminine blushing with which he effaces himself after having directed his phenomenon. It is the same dimension in which there unfolds this public confession linked to some embarrassment or other which Alcibiades himself is aware that he is developing as he speaks.

Of course we are in the dimension of the truth that comes from wine and this is articulated in the In vino Veritas which Kierkegaard will take up when he too recreates his banquet. No doubt we are in the dimension of the truth that comes from wine, but all the boundaries of shame must have been broken to really speak about love as Alcibiades speaks about it when he shows what happened to him with Socrates.

What is behind it as the object which introduces into the subject himself this vacillation? It is here, it is at the function of the object in so far as it is properly indicated in the whole of this text that I will leave you today in order to introduce you to it the next time, it is around a word which is in the text. I think I have rediscovered the history and the function of this object in what we can glimpse about its usage in Greek around a word: agalma, which we are here told is what Socrates, this type of hirsute Silenus, conceals. It is around this word agalma, whose closed-off enigma in the discourse itself I will leave you with today, that I will make revolve what I have to say to you the next time.

Seminar 10: Wednesday 1 February 1961

I left you the last time, as a kind of staging-post in our account, on the word to which I also told you I would leave until the next occasion all its enigmatic value, the word agalma.

I did not think that what I said would turn out to be so true. For a great number, the enigma was so total that people were asking: "What was that? What did he say? Do you know?". Well, for those who manifested this unease, one of my own family was able at least to give this response - which proves at least that in my house secondary education has its uses - that means: "ornament, adornment". In any case, this response was only in effect a first level response about something that everyone should know: agalma, from agallo, "to adorn, to ornament", signifies in effect - at first sight - "ornament, adornment". First of all the notion of ornament, of adornment is not that simple; it can be seen immediately that this may take us very far. Why, and with what does one adorn oneself? Or why does one adorn oneself and with what?

It is quite clear that, if we are here at a central point, many avenues should lead us to it. But I finally retained, in order to make of it the pivot of my explanation, this word agalma. You should not see in it any taste for rarity but rather the fact that in a text which we suppose to be extremely rigorous, that of the Symposium, something leads us to this crucial point which is formally indicated at the moment at which I told you the stage revolves completely and, after these games of praising regulated as they had been up to then by this subject of love, there enters this actor, Alcibiades, who is going to change everything. As proof I only need the following: he himself changes the rules of the game by making himself the presiding authority. From that moment on he tells us, it is no longer a question of praising love but the other person and specifically each one is to praise his neighbour on the right. You will see that this is important for what follows, that it is already a lot to say about it, that, if it is a question of love, it is in act in the relationship of one to the other that it is here going to have to manifest itself (213e, 214d).

I pointed out to you the last time, it is noteworthy that from the moment that things get started on this terrain, with the experienced producer whom we suppose to be at the source of this dialogue (which is confirmed for us by the incredible mental genealogy which flows from this Symposium, whose second-last echo I highlighted for you the last time in connection with Kierkegaard's banquet - the last, I already named for you: it is Eros and Agape by Anders Nygren, all this is still dependent on the framework, the structure of the Symposium) well then, this experienced personage can do nothing else.... once it is a question of bringing the other into play, there is not just one of them, there are two others, in other words there are a minimum (2) of three. This, Socrates does not allow to escape in his reply to Alcibiades when, after this extraordinary admission, this public confession, this thing which is somewhere between a declaration of love and almost one might say a malediction, a defamation of Socrates, Socrates replies to him: "It was not for me that you were speaking, it was for Agathon" (222c,d). All of this makes us sense that we are getting into a different register.

The dual relationship of the one who, in the ascent towards love, proceeds by way of identification (if you wish, moreover by the production of what we have indicated in the discourse of Diotima) being helped in it by this marvel of beauty and, coming to see in this beauty itself identified here at the end with the perfection of the work of love, finds in this beauty its very term and identifies it to this perfection.

Something else therefore comes into play here other than this univocal relationship which gives to the term of the work of love this goal, this end of identification to what I put in question here last year, the thematic of the sovereign good, of the supreme good. Here we are shown that something else is suddenly substituted in the triplicity, in the complexity, which shows us, presents itself to reveal to us that in which, as you know, I maintain the essential of the analytic discovery is contained, this topology in which fundamentally there results the relationship of the subject to the symbolic in so far as it is essentially distinct from the imaginary and its capture. This is our term, this is what we will articulate the next time to bring to a close what we will have to say about the Symposium. It is with the help of this that I will make re-emerge old models which I have given you of the intrasubjective topology in so far as this is the way that we should understand the whole of Freud's second topography.

Today therefore, what we are highlighting, is something which is essential in order to rejoin this topology, in the measure that it is on the subject of love that we have to rejoin it. It is about the nature of love that there is question, it is about a position, an essential articulation too often forgotten, elided, and to which we analysts nevertheless have contributed the element, the mainspring which allows its problematic to be defined, it is on this that there should be concentrated what I have to say to you today about agalma.

It is all the more extraordinary, almost scandalous that this should not have been better highlighted up to now, that it is a properly analytic notion that is in question, is what I hope to be able to make you sense, put your finger on in a little while.

Agalma, here is how it is presented in the text: Alcibiades speaks about Socrates, he says that he going to unmask him - we will not today get to the end of what the discourse of Alcibiades signifies - you know that Alcibiades goes into the greatest detail about his adventure with Socrates. He tried what? To make Socrates, we will say, manifest his desire to him because he knows that Socrates has a desire for him; what he wanted was a sign.

Let us leave this in suspense, it is too soon to ask why. We are only at the beginning of Alcibiades' approach and, at first sight, this approach does not seem to be essentially distinguished from what was said up to then. At the beginning there was question, in the discourse of Pausanias, of what one was going to look for in love and it was said that what each one sought in the other (an exchange of proper procedures) was what he contained in terms of eromenon, of the desirable. It indeed is the same thing that appears ... that seems to be in question now. Alcibiades tells us that Socrates is someone whose "amorous dispositions draw him towards beautiful boys...". - this (3) is a preamble - "he is ignorant of everything and knows nothing, agnoei; that is his pose!" (216d) - and then, he goes into the celebrated comparison with the Silenos which has a double import. I mean first of all that this is what he appears like, namely with nothing beautiful about him and, on the other hand, that this Silenos is not simply the image that is designated by this name, but also something which is its usual aspect: it is a wrapping, a container, a way of presenting something - these things must have existed. These tiny instruments of the industry of the time were little Silenos which served as jewel boxes, as wrapping to offer presents and precisely, this is what is in question.

This topological indication is essential. What is important, is what is inside. Agalma can indeed mean "ornament or adornment", but it is here above all "a precious object, a jewel, something which is inside". And here expressly, Alcibiades tears us away from this dialectic of the beautiful which was up to then the path, the guide, the mode of capture on this path of the desirable and he undeceives us in connection with Socrates himself.

"Iste hoti, you should know," he says, "Socrates apparently loves beautiful boys, oute ei tis kalos esti meleis auto ouden, whether one or other is beautiful, melieis auto ouden, does not matter a straw to him, he does not give a hang, on the contrary he despises it, kataphronei", we are told, "as no one would ever believe, tosouton hoson oud'an eis oietheie you could not even imagine. . .". and that really, the aim that he pursues - I am underlining it because after all it is in the text - it is expressly articulated at this point that it is not alone external goods, riches for example, which everyone up to then (we are delicate souls) has said that it was not what one sought in others, "nor any of the other advantages which might seem in any way to procure makaria, happiness, felicity, hupo plethous to anyone whatsoever;" one is quite wrong to interpret it here as a sign that it is a question of disdaining goods which are goods "for the mob". What is rejected, is precisely what had been spoken about up to then, good things in general (216e).

"On the other hand", Alcibiades tells us, "do not pause at his strange appearance if, eironeuomenos, he pretends ignorance, he questions, he plays the fool in order to get a response, he really behaves like a child, he spends his time making fun. But spoudasantos de autou" - not as it is translated - "when he decides to be serious" - but - it is - "you, be serious, pay careful attention to it, and open this Silenos, anoichthentos, opened out, I don't know if anyone has ever seen the agalmata which are inside, the jewels" about which right away Alcibiades states that he really doubts whether anyone has ever been able to see what he is talking about.

We know that this is not alone the discourse of passion, but the discourse of passion at its most quaking point, namely the one (4) which is in a way entirely contained in the origin. Even before he explains himself, he is there, charged with the most fundamental aspect of everything that he has to tell us, what is going to begin. Therefore it is indeed the language of passion.

Already this unique, personal relationship: no one has ever seen what is in question, as I once happened to see; and I saw it!" "I found them, these agalmata already so divine, chrusa", c'est chou, "it was golden and all beautiful and wonderful, that there remained only one thing to do, en brachei, as soon as possible, by the quickest means, do whatever Socrates commands, poieteon, what is to be done"; what becomes duty, is whatever Socrates is pleased to command (217a).

I do not think it useless for us to articulate a text like this a step at a time. This is not to be read as one reads France-Soir or an article in the International journal of psychoanalysis. It is indeed something whose effects are surprising. On the one hand we are not told for the present what these agalmata (in the plural) are and, on the other hand, this involves all of a sudden this subversion, this falling under the influence of the commandments of the one who possesses them. You cannot fail to find here all the same something of the magic which I already highlighted for you around the Che vuoi? What do you want? It is indeed this key, this essential cutting edge of the topology of the subject which begins with: what do you want? - In other words: is there a desire which is really your will?

"And" - Alcibiades continues - "as I thought he was in earnest when he spoke about hora, eme hora" - this is translated by - "youthful bloom...", and there begins the whole seduction scene.

But as I told you, we will not go any further today, we will try to make you sense that which renders necessary this passage from the first phase to the other one, namely why it is absolutely necessary that at any price Socrates should unmask himself. We are only going to stop at these agalmata. I can honestly tell you that it is not - give me credit for this - to this text that there goes back for me the problematic of agalma, not that this would be in the least inappropriate because this text suffices to justify it, but I am going to tell you the story as it is.

I can tell you, without being really able to date it, that my first encounter with agalma is an encounter like every encounter, unexpected. It is in a verse of Euripides' Hecuba that it struck me some years ago and you will easily understand why. It was all the same a little while before the period when I introduced here the function of the phallus, with the essential articulation that analytic experience and Freud's doctrine shows us that it has, between demand and desire; so that in passing, I did not fail to be struck by the use that was given to this term in the mouth of Hecuba. Hecuba says: "Where am I going to be brought, where am I going to be deported?"

As you know, the tragedy of Hecuba takes place at the moment of the capture of Troy and, among all the places that she envisages in her discourse, there is: "Might it be to this at once sacred and plague-stricken place.... Delos?" - As you know no one had the right either to give birth there or to die there. And then, at the description of Delos, she makes an allusion to an object which was celebrated, which was - as the fashion in which she speaks about it indicates - a palm tree of which she says that (5) this palm tree, is odinos agalma dias, namely odinos, of the pain, agalma dias, the term dias designates [Leto], it is a question of the birth of Apollo, it is "the agalma of the pain of the divine one". We rediscover the thematic of giving birth but all the same rather changed because here this trunk, this tree, this magical thing erected, preserved as an object of reference throughout the ages, is something which cannot fail - at least for us analysts - to awaken the whole register that there exists around the thematic of the [female] phallus in so far as its phantasy is, as we know, at the horizon and situates this infantile object [as a fetish].

The fetish that it remains can hardly fail either to be for us the echo of this signification. But in any case, it is quite clear that agalma cannot be translated here in any way by "ornament, adornment", nor even as one often sees it in the texts, "statue" - because often theon agalmata, when one is translating rapidly one thinks that it fits in, that it is a question in the text of "statues of the gods". You see right away, the point I am keeping you at, the reason why I believe that it is a term to highlight in this signification, this hidden accent which presides over what must be done to hold back on this path of banalisation which always tends to efface for us the true sense of texts, the fact is that each time you encounter agalma - pay careful attention - even if it seems to be a question of "statues of the gods", if you look closely at it, you will perceive that it is always a question of something different.

I am giving you already - we are not playing at riddles here -

the key to the question in telling you that it is the fetishaccent of the object in question that is always stressed.
 Moreover of course, I am not giving here a course of ethnology, nor even of linguistics. And I am not going, in this connection, to link up the function of the fetish nor of those round stones, essentially at the centre of a temple (the temple of Apollo for example). You very often see (this thing is very well known) the god himself represented, a fetish of some people, tribe at the loop of the Niger; it is something unnamable, formless, upon which there can be poured out on occasion an enormous lot of liquids of different origins, more or less stinking and filthy and whose accumulated superimposition, going from blood to shit, constituted the sign that here is something around which all sorts of effects are concentrated making of the fetish in itself something quite different to an image, to an icon, in so far as it might be a reproduction.

But this occult power of the object remains at the basis of the usage whose accent, even for us, is still preserved in the term idol or icon. In the term idol, for example in the use Polyeuctus makes of it, it means: it is nothing at all, it is to be thrown away. But all the same if you say about one or other person: "I have made him my idol", that means all the same that
 (6) you do not simply make of him the reproduction of yourself or of him but that you make of him something else, around which something happens.

Moreover it is not a question for me here of pursuing the phenomenology of the fetish but of showing the function that this occupies in its place. And in order to do this I can rapidly indicate to you that I tried, as far as my strength allowed me, to make a survey of the passages which remain of Greek literature where the word agalma is employed. And it is only in order to go quickly that I will not read each one to you.

You should simply know for example that it is from the multiplicity of the deployment of significations that I extract for you what is in a way the central function that must be seen at the limit of the usages of this word; because naturally, it is not our idea - I think here along the line of the teaching I give you - that etymology consists in finding the meaning in the root.

The root of agalma is not all that easy. What I want to tell you, is that the authors, in so far as they link it to agauos
 from this ambiguous word agamai, "I admire" but just as much "I am envious, I am jealous of", which is going to give agazo, "what one tolerates with difficulty", going towards agaiomai which means "to be indignant", from which the authors looking for roots
 (I mean roots which carry a meaning with them, which is absolutely contrary to the principle of linguistics) separate out gal or gel the gel of gelao the gal which is the same in glene,
 "the pupil", and galene - the other day, I quoted it for you in passing - "it is the sea which shines because it is perfectly unified": in short, that it is an idea of eclat which is hidden here in the root. Moreover aglaos, Aglae, the Brilliant is there to provide us with a familiar echo. As you see, this does not go against what we have to say about it. I only put it here in parentheses, because also this is rather only an occasion to show you the ambiguities of this idea that etymology is something which carries us not towards a signifier but toward a central signification.

Because one could just as well interest oneself not in gal, but in the first part of the phonematic articulation, namely aga which is properly the reason why agalma interests us with respect to agathos. And along this path, you know that if I do not jib at the import of the discourse of Agathon, I prefer to go frankly to the great phantasy of the Cratylus you will see that the etymology of Agathon is agastos, admirable, therefore God knows why one should go looking for agaston, the admirable that there is in thoon, rapid! This moreover is the way in which everything is interpreted in the Cratylus, there are some rather fine things; in the etymology of anthropos there is "articulated language". Plato was really someone very special.

(7) Agalma, in truth, it is not to that aspect that we have to turn to give it its value; agalma, as one can see, had always referred to images on condition that you see clearly that, as in every context, it is always a very special type of image. I have to choose among the references. There are some in Empedocles, in Heraclitus, in Democritus. I am going to take the most popular, the poetic, the ones that everybody knew by heart in antiquity. I am going to look for them in an interlined edition of the Iliad and of the Odyssey. In the Odyssey for example there are two places where one finds agalma.

It is first of all in Book III in the Telemachus section and it is a question of sacrifices which are being made for the arrival of Telemachus. The pretenders, as usual, make their contribution and there is sacrificed to the god a boos which is translated by "a heifer", which is a specimen of the bovine species. And it is said that there was specially invoked someone called Laerkes who is a goldsmith, like [Hephaistos] and who is charged with making "a golden ornament", agalma for the horns of the beast. I will spare you all the practicalities of the ceremony. But what is important, is not what happens afterwards, whether it is a question of a voodoo-type sacrifice, what is important is what it is said they expect from agalma; agalma in effect is involved in this, we are expressly told it. The agalma, is precisely this golden ornament, and it is as an offering to the goddess Athena that this is sacrificed, so that having seen it, she may be kecharoito, "gratified" - let us use this word, because it is a word from our own language. In other words, the agalma appears indeed as a kind of trap for the gods; the gods, these real beings, there are contraptions which catch their eye.

You must not believe that this is the only example that I would have to give you of the use of agalma, for example when, in Book VIII of the same Odyssey, we are told what happened at the fall of Troy, namely the famous history of the big horse which contained in its belly the enemies and all the misfortunes. [The horse] who was pregnant with the ruin of Troy, the Trojans who had dragged it inside the walls question themselves and ask themselves what they are going to do with it. They hesitate and we have to think that this hesitation was what was fatal for them, because there were two things to do - either, to open the belly of the hollow wood to see what is inside - or, having dragged it to the summit of the citadel, to leave it there to be what? Mega agalma. It is the same idea, it is the charm. It is something which is here as embarrassing for them as for the Greeks. To tell the truth it is an unusual object, it is this famous extraordinary object which is so much at the centre of a whole series of preoccupations which are still contemporaneous - I do not need to evoke here the surrealist horizon.

What is certain is that, for the ancients also, the agalma is something in terms of which one can in short capture divine attention. There are a thousand examples of it that I could give you. In the story of Hecuba (again in Euripides), in another place, there is recounted the sacrifice to Achilles' manes, of her daughter Polyxenes. And it is very well done: we (8) have there the exception which is the occasion for evoking in us erotic mirages: it is the moment that the heroine herself offers her admirable breast which is we are told "like an agalma, hos agalmatos". Now it is not sure.... there is nothing to indicate that we should be satisfied here with what that evokes, namely the perfection of the mammary organs in Greek statuary. I indeed rather believe that what is in question, given that at the epoch it was not about objects in a museum, is indeed rather about something the signs of which we see everywhere moreover in the use that is made of the word when it is said that in the sanctuaries, in temples, in ceremonies people "hang up anapto, agalmata". The magical value of objects which are evoked here is indeed linked rather to the evocation of these objects which we well know which are called ex voto. In a word, for people much closer than we are to the differentiation of objects at the origin, it is as beautiful as ex voto breasts; and in effect ex voto breasts are always perfect, they are machine-turned, moulded. Other examples are not lacking, but we can stay with that.

What is in question, is the brilliant sense, the gallant sense, because the word galant comes from galer in old French; it is indeed, it should be said, the function of this that we analysts have discovered under the name of partial object. One of the greatest discoveries of analytic investigation is this function of the partial object. The thing which on this occasion should astonish us most, us analysts, is that having discovered such remarkable things our whole effort should always be to efface their originality.

It is said somewhere, in Pausanias, also in connection with a usage of agalma, that the agalmata which referred in such and such a sanctuary to sorceresses who were there expressly to hold back, to prevent Alcmenes from giving birth were amudroteros amudrota, "a little bit effaced". Well, that's it!

We ourselves have also effaced, as far as we were able, what is meant by the partial object; namely that our first effort was to interpret what had been a marvellous discovery, namely this fundamentally partial aspect of the object in so far as it is pivot, centre, key of human desire, this would have been worth (9) dwelling on for a moment.... But no, not at all! This was directed towards a dialectic of totalisation, namely the only one worthy of us, the flat object, the round object, the total object, the spherical object without feet or paws, the whole of the other, the perfect genital object at which, as everyone knows, our love irresistibly comes to term! We did not say to ourselves in connection with all of this that - even by taking things in this way - perhaps that qua object of desire, this other is the addition of a whole lot of partial objects (which is not at all the same as a total object), that what we ourselves perhaps, in what we elaborate, have to handle in this foundation which is called our Id, is perhaps a question of a vast trophy of all these partial objects.

At the horizon of our ascesis, of our model of love, we have placed the other.... which is not altogether wrong, but of this other, we have made the other to whom there is addressed this bizare function which we call oblativity: we love the other for himself - at least when one has arrived at the goal and at perfection, at the genital stage which blesses all of this!

We have certainly gained something by opening up a certain topology of relationships to the other which moreover, as you know, is not simply our privilege because a whole contemporary speculation which is personalist in different ways turns around it. But it is funny all the same that there is something that we have left completely to one side in this affair - it has to be left to one side when one approaches things from this particularly simplified perspective - and which supposes, that with the idea of pre-established harmony, the problem is resolved: that in short it is enough to love genitally to love the other for himself.

I did not bring - because I dealt with it elsewhere and you will see it coming out soon - the incredible passage which, on this, is developed on the subject of the characterology of the genital person, in this volume which is called La Psychanalyse d'Aujourd'hui. The sort of sermonising which takes place around this terminal idealness is something whose ridiculousness I have, I believe, for a long time made you sense. There is no need for us to dwell on it today. But in any case, it is quite clear that to come back to the starting point and to sources, there is at least one question to pose on this subject. If this oblativity love is truly only in a way the homologue, the development, the flowering of the genital act in itself (which would be enough, as I would say, to give its secret, its pitch, its measure), it is clear that the ambiguity persists as regards whether our oblativity is what we dedicate to this other in this love which is all-loving, all for the other, whether what we are seeking is his jouissance (as seems self-evident from the fact that it is a question of genital union) or indeed his perfection.

When one evokes such high-flown moral ideas as that of oblativity, the least that can be said about it, which is something that reawakens old questions, is all the same to evoke the duplicity of these terms. After all these terms, in such a worn down, simplified form can only be sustained by what is underlying, namely the altogether modern supposition of the subject and the object. Moreover once an author who is a little bit careful to write in a style which is permeable to the (10) contemporary audience develops these terms, it will always be around the notion of the subject and the object that he will comment on this analytic theme: we take the other as a subject and not at all purely and simply as our object. The object being situated here in the context of a value of pleasure, of enjoyment, of jouissance, the object being supposed to reduce this uniqueness of the other (in so far as he should be for us the subject) to this omnivalent function (if we make of him only an object) of being after all any object whatsoever, an object like others, to be an object which may be rejected, changed, in short to be profoundly devalued.

Such is the thematic which underlies this ideal of oblativity, as it is articulated, when it is made for us into a type of ethical correlative necessary for acceding to a true love which is supposed to be sufficiently connoted by being genital.

You should note that today I am less in the process of criticising - this is also why I dispense myself with recalling the texts - this analytic foolishness, than of putting in question that on which it reposes, namely that there is supposed to be some superiority or other in favour of the beloved, of the love partner in the fact that he is thus, in our existential-analytic vocabulary, considered as a subject. Because I do not know whether after having accorded a pejorative connotation to the fact of considering the other as an object, anyone has ever made the remark that to consider him as a subject is no better. Because if one object is as good as another according to its thinking, on condition that we give to the word object its initial meaning (that there are objects in so far as we distinguish them and can communicate them), if it is deplorable therefore that the beloved should ever become an object, is it any better that he should be a subject?

To respond to this it is enough to make the remark that if one object is as good as another, for the subject it is still worse, because it is not simply another subject that he is as good as. A subject strictly speaking is another! The strict subject, is someone to whom we can impute what? Nothing other than being like us this being who enarthron echein epos, "who expresses himself in articulated language", who possesses the combination and who therefore can respond to our combination by his own combinations, whom we can bring into our calculations as someone who combines like us.

I think that those who are formed according to the method that we have introduced, inaugurated here are not going to contradict me on this, it is the only sound definition of the subject, in any case the only sound one for us - the one which permits there to be introduced how a subject obligatorily enters into the Spaltung determined by his submission to this language. Namely that starting from these terms we can see how it is strictly necessary that something happens, which is that in the subject there is a part where it (fa) speaks all by itself, this thing from which nevertheless the subject remains suspended. Moreover - it is precisely what it is a question of knowing and how is it possible to forget it - what function there can be occupied in this rightly elective, privileged relationship that the love relationship is by the fact that this subject with whom among all others we have this bond of love.... the way precisely this question has a relationship with the fact that he is the object of our desire. Because if one suspends this mooring point, this turning point, this centre of gravity, of hooking-on of the love (11) relationship, if one highlights it and if, in doing so, one does not do it in a distinctive way, it is really impossible to say anything at all that is not a conjuring trick as regards the love relationship. It is precisely by that, by this necessity of accentuating the correlative object of desire in so far as this is the object, not the object of equivalence, of the transitivity of goods, of the transaction about things that are coveted, but this something which is the aim of desire as such, that which accentuates one object among all as being without equivalence to the others. It is with this function of the object, it is to this accentuating of the object that there responds the introduction into analysis of the function of the partial object.

And moreover in fact everything which gives, as you know, its weight, its resonance, its accent to metaphysical discourse, always reposes on some ambiguity. In other words, if all the terms you make use of when you are doing metaphysics, were strictly defined, had each only a univocal signification, if the dictionary of philosophy triumphed in any way (the eternal goal of professors!) you would no longer have to do metaphysics at all, because you would no longer have anything to say. I mean that you perceive that as regards mathematics, it is much better there, one can move about signs that have a univocal sense because they do not have any.

In any case, when you speak in a more or less passionate way about the relationships of the subject and the object, it is because under subject you put something other than this strict subject that I spoke to you about above and, under object, something other than the object which I have just defined as something which, at the limit, is confined to the strict equivalence of an unequivocal communication of a scientific object. In a word, if this object impassions you it is because within, hidden in it there is the object of desire, agalma (the weight, the thing that makes it interesting to know where this famous object is, to know its function and to know where it operates just as much in inter- as in intrasubjectivity) and in so far as this privileged object of desire, is something which, for each person, culminates at this frontier, at this limiting point which I have taught you to consider as the metonymy of the unconscious discourse where it plays a role that I tried to formalise - I will come back to it the next time - in the phantasy.

And it is always this object which, however you have to speak about it in analytic experience - whether you call it breast, phallus, or shit -, is a partial object. This is what there is question of in so far as analysis is a method, a technique which advanced into this abandoned field, into this discredited field, into this field excluded by philosophy (because it is not managable, not accessible to its dialectic and for the same reasons) which is called desire. If we are not able to highlight, highlight in a strict topology, the function of what there is signified by - this object at once so limited and so fleeting in its shape, which is called the partial object, if therefore you do not see the interest of what I am introducing today under the name of agalma (it is the major point of analytic experience) and I cannot believe it for an instant given that, however misunderstood this is, the force of things brings it about that the most modern things that are done, said in the analytic dialectic turn around this fundamental, radical function, the Kleinian reference of the object qua good or bad, which indeed is considered in this dialectic as a primordial given. It is indeed on this that I would ask you to allow your minds to dwell for an instant.

We bring into play a lot of things, a lot of functions of identification: identification to the one from whom we demand something in the appeal of love and, if this appeal is rejected, (12) identification to the very one to whom we address ourselves as the object of our love (this very tangible passage from love to identification) and then, in a third sort of identification (you should read a little Freud: the Essais de psychanalyse), the function of third which this certain characteristic object takes on in so far as it may be the object of the desire of the other to whom we identify ourselves. In short, our subjectivity is something we entirely construct in plurality, in the pluralism of these levels of identification which we will call the Ego-Ideal, the Ideal Ego, which we will also call the desiring Ego.

But it is all the same necessary to know where in this articulation there functions, there is situated the partial object. And there you can simply remark, with the present development of analytic discourse, that this object, agalma, little o, object of desire, when we search for it according to the Kleinian method, is there from the beginning before any development of the dialectic, it is already there as object of desire. The weight, the intercentral kernel of the good or the bad object (in every psychology which tends to develop itself and explain itself in Freudian terms) is this good object or this bad object that Melanie Klein situates somewhere in this origin, this beginning of beginnings which is even before the depressive phase. Is there not something there in our experience, which by itself alone is already sufficiently descriptive?

I think that I have done enough today in saying that it is around

this that concretely, in analysis or outside analysis, there can and there should be made the division between a perspective on love which, it, in a way, drowns, diverts, masks, elides, sublimates everything that is concrete in experience (this famous ascent towards a supreme Good whose cheapened vague reflections it is astonishing to see being still kept in analysis by us, under the name of oblativity, this sort of loving in God, as I might say, which is supposed to be at the basis of every loving relationship), or whether, as experience shows, everything turns around this privilege, around this unique point constituted somewhere by what we only find in a being when we really love. But what is that.... precisely agalma, this object which we have learned to circumscribe, to distinguish in analytic experience and around which, the~next time, we will try to reconstruct, in its triple topology (of the subject, of the small other and of the big Other), at what point it comes into play and how it is only through the Other and for the Other that Alcibiades, like each and every person, wants to make his love known to Socrates.

Seminar 11: Wednesday 8 February 1961

There are therefore agalmata in Socrates and this is what has provoked Alcibiades' love. We are now going to return to the scene in so far as it puts on stage precisely Alcibiades with the discourse he addressed to Socrates and to which Socrates - as you know - is going to respond by giving to it what is properly speaking an interpretation. We shall see how this appraisal can be touched up, but one can say that structurally, at first sight, the intervention of Socrates is going to have all the characteristics of an interpretation, namely: "All the extraordinary, extravagant, impudent things that you have said there, everything that you have unveiled in speaking about me, was said for Agathon" (222c,d)

In order to understand the meaning of the scene which unfolds between one and the other of these end points (from the eulogy that Alcibiades gives about Socrates to this interpretation by Socrates and to what will follow) we have to take things up from a higher viewpoint and in detail, namely we have to see the meaning of what is happening starting with the entry of Alcibiades, between Alcibiades and Socrates.

I told you, from that moment on there has taken place this change which means that it is no longer a question of praising love but an other designated in order, and the important thing is precisely the following, it is that it is going to be a question of praising the other, epainos. And it is precisely in this, as regards the dialogue, that the passage of the metaphor resides. Praise of the other is substituted not for praise of love but for love itself, and this from the start. Namely that Socrates addressing himself to Agathon, says to him: "...the love of this person" - Alcibiades - "has become quite a serious thing for me!" - Everyone knows that Alcibiades was Socrates' great love - "From the time I fell in love with him" - we will see the meaning that must be given to these terms, he was erastes of him - "I am no longer allowed to look at or talk with a handsome person, not even one, or this jealous and envious creature treats me outrageously, and abuses me and hardly keeps his hands off me. If he uses force, defend me," he says to Agathon "for I'm fairly terrified at his madness and passion, philerastian" (213d).

It is after this that there takes place the dialogue with Eryximachos from which there is going to result the new order of things. Namely that it is agreed that each one in turn will praise the person to his right. This is established during the dialogue between Alcibiades and Eryximachos. The epainos, the eulogy of which there is then going to be question has - as I (2) told you - this metaphorical, symbolic function of expressing something which from one to the other (the one about whom one is speaking) has a certain function as metaphor of love; epainein, "to praise" has here a ritual function which is something that can be translated in these terms: "to speak well of someone". And even though one cannot make the most of this text at the time of the Symposium, because it is much later, Aristotle in his Rhetoric, Book I, Chapter 9, distinguishes epainos from encomion. I told you that up to the present I did not want to get into this difference between the epainos and the encomion, however we will come back to it nevertheless drawn along by the force of things.

The difference to epainos is very precisely in the fashion in which Agathon had introduced his discourse. He speaks about the object starting from its nature, from its essence in order subsequently to develop its qualities, it is a deployment as one might say of the object in its essence, while the encomion - which we have difficulty in translating, it appears, and the term komos which is implied in it is of course responsible for some of that - encomion - if this is to be translated by something equivalent in our tongue - is something like "panegyric" and, if we follow Aristotle, it would be a question then of weaving together a wreath of the acts, of the great deeds of the object, a point of view which extends beyond, which is eccentric with respect to envisaging his essence which is that of epainos.

But the epainos is not something which presents itself without ambiguity from the beginning. First of all it is at the moment when it is decided that it is going to be a question of epainos, that Alcibiades begins to retort that the remark Socrates made about what we can call his ferocious jealousy, does not contain a word of truth.

"Don't you know that the truth is exactly the opposite of what he stated? For if I praise anybody in his presence, god or man other than himself, this man will not keep his two hands off me" - and he takes up the same metaphor that was used above - "to cheire, with great violence (a bras raccourcis)!" (214d). There is then a tone, a style, a sort of discontent, of complication, a kind of embarrassed response, an almost panicky "shut up" from Socrates. Shut up: "won't you hold your tongue?" - as it has been rather well translated" - "By Poseidon!", replies Alcibiades - which is quite something - "you need not make any objection, I forbid you to do so! You know that I would not praise a single other person in your presence!" - "Very well", says Eryximachos, "do this if you like, praise Socrates." And what then happens is that, in praising Socrates, "Am I to have at the man and punish him before your faces..." in praising him must I unmask him? This is how his development will subsequently proceed. And in effect it is not at all without unease, as if it were at once required by the situation and also an implication of the style: that the praise might in its terms go so far as to make people laugh at the person in question.

Moreover Alcibiades proposes a gentleman's agreement: "Must I tell the truth?" Which Socrates does not refuse: "I invite you to tell it". Very well, says Alcibiades, I leave you free, if I go beyond the bounds of the truth in what I say, to say: "You are lying... But if I speak higgledy-piggledy trying to remember, don't be surprised for it is not easy to set out all your (3) absurdities" - we find here again the term atopia, "unclassifiable" - "nicely in order, katarithmein" (215a). And then the eulogy begins.

The last time I indicated to you the structure and theme of the eulogy. Alcibiades in effect says that he is of course going to get into the gelos, geloios more exactly, into the "laughable" and undoubtedly by beginning to present things by the comparison which - I note this for you - will return in short three times in his discourse, every time with a quasi-repetitive insistence, in which Socrates is compared to this crude and derisory envelope which is constituted by the satyr. It must in a way be opened in order to see inside what he calls the first time agalmata theon, "the statues of the gods" (215b). And then subsequently he takes up in the terms that I told you about the last time, by calling them once again agalmata theia, "divine", thaumasta, "admirable" (216e). The third time, we will see him employing further on the term aretas, agalmata aretes, "the finest images of virtue", the marvel of marvels (222a).

On the way, what we see, is this comparison which, at the moment that it is established, is pushed very far forward at that moment, when he is compared to the satyr Marsyas.... and despite his protestations - eh, he is undoubtedly not a piper! - Alcibiades comes back, gives another push and here compares Socrates to a satyr not simply in the form of a box, of a more or less derisory object, but specifically to the satyr Marsyas, in so far as when he gets into action every one knows from the legend that the charm of his song emerges. The charm is such that this Marsyas made Apollo jealous. Apollo flayed him alive for having dared to rival the supreme music, the divine music. The only difference, he says, between Socrates and him, is that in effect Socrates is not a piper; it is not through music that he works and nevertheless the result is exactly of the same order. And here we should refer to what Plato explains in the Phaedo concerning what we may call the superior states of inspiration such as they are produced by going beyond the boundaries of beauty. Among the diverse forms of this going beyond which I am not going to take up here, there are those which are deomenous which "have need" of gods and initiations; for those, the journey, the path consists in means among which that of intoxication produced by a certain music producing in them this state described as possession. It is to neither more nor less than this state that Alcibiades refers when he says that this is what he, Socrates, produces by words, "by words" which are, for their part, "unaccompanied, without instruments"; he produces exactly the same effect by his words. "When we hear an orator", he says, "speaking about such subjects, even quite a good orator, nobody cares a jot. But when one hears you, or your words recited by another, even a very poor speaker, panu phaulos, "a worthless man", let a woman hear, or a man hear, or a boy hear, we are overwhelmed and enraptured - and properly speaking katechometha, we are possessed by them!" (215c).

Here is the determination of the point of experience which makes Alcibiades consider that in Socrates there is this treasure, this altogether undefinable and precious object which is going to fix, (4) as one might say, his resolve after having unleashed his desire. It is at the source of everything that is going to be subsequently developed in his terms, his resolution, then his business with Socrates-. And it is on this point that we should dwell.

Here in effect is what he is going to describe for us. He has had an adventure with Socrates which is far from banal. The fact is that having made up his mind, knowing that he was getting onto a terrain that was in a way rather safe (he knows the attention that for a long time Socrates has paid to what he calls his hora people translate it as they can - really his sex-appeal), it seems to him that it would be enough that Socrates should declare himself in order to obtain from him precisely everything that is in question, namely what he defines himself as: "everything he knows, pant akousai hosaper houtos edei" (217a). And then we have the narrative of the steps he took.

But after all can we not already pause here? Because Alcibiades already knows that he has Socrates' desire, why can he not better and more easily presume his complicity? What is meant by this fact that as regards in a way on what he, Alcibiades already knows, namely that for Socrates he is a beloved, an eromenos, why does he need to have Socrates give a sign of desire on this subject? Because this desire is in a way recognised (Socrates has never made a mystery of it in the past) recognised and because of this fact known and therefore one might think already avowed, what is meant by these seductive manoeuvres developed with a detail, an art and at the same time an impudence, a challenge to the hearers? - moreover so clearly felt as something which goes beyond the limits that what introduces it is nothing less than the phrase which is used at the origin of the mysteries: "You others who are there, clap strong doors on your ears!" (218b). It is a question of those who have no right to hear, and still less to repeat, the servants, the uninitiated, those who cannot hear what is going to be said as it is going to be said; it is better for them not to hear anything.

And in effect, to the mystery of this exigency of Alcibiades, to this mystery there responds, corresponds after all Socrates' behaviour. Because if Socrates has always shown himself to be the erastes of Alcibiades, of course it would seem to us (in a post-Socratic perspective we would say: in another register) that there is great merit in what he shows, in what the translator of the Symposium highlights in the margin under the term of "his temperance". But this temperance is not at all in this context something which is indicated as necessary. That Socrates here is showing his virtue.... perhaps! But what relationship is there with the subject in question, if it is true that what we are shown at this level is something about the mystery of love.

In other words, you see what I am trying to encompass (this situation, this game that develops before us in the actuality of the Symposium) in order to grasp properly speaking the structure. Let us say right away that everything in Socrates' behaviour indicates that the fact that Socrates in short refuses to enter himself into this game of love is closely linked to the fact, which is posed at the origin as the terms of debate, which is that he knows, it is even, he says, the only thing he knows; "Love is the only thing I profess to know about." And we will say that it is because Socrates knows, that he does not love.

(5) And moreover with this key we give their full meaning to the words with which, in Alcibiades' narrative, he welcomes him, after three of four scenes in which the growth of Alcibiades' attacks is put before us in an ascending rhythm. The ambiguity of the situation is always close to what is properly speaking the geloios, "the laughable, the comic". In effect, these dinner invitations are a really farcical scene which end with a gentleman who leaves very early, very politely, having come late, who returns a second time and who escapes again, and with whom it is under the sheets that there occurs the dialogue: "Asleep, Socrates?" - "Not at all!" (218c).

There is here something which, in order to come to its final terms, makes us take paths well designed to put us at a certain level. When Socrates responds to him at the end, after Alcibiades has really explained his position, had gone so far as to say to him: "This is what I desire and I would certainly be ashamed in front of people who did not understand; I am explaining to you what I want", Socrates replies to him: "My dearest Alcibiades, you are really and truly no bad hand at a bargain, if what you say is really true about me, and if there is in me some power which can make you better; you must see some inconceivable beauty in me" - a different quality of beauty, something different - "If then you spy it there and if you are trying to do a deal and exchange beauty for beauty, and at the same time" - here in the Socratic perspective of science against illusion - "instead of an opinion of beauty" - the doxa which does not know its function, the deception of beauty - "you want to exchange the truth", and in fact, God knows, "that would mean nothing other than exchanging bronze for gold. But!", says Socrates - and here we should take things as they are said -, "don't be deceiving yourself, examine things more carefully ameinon skopei so as not to deceive yourself, and you will see that I" - properly speaking - "am nothing. Because obviously", he says, "the eye of the mind begins to see sharp when the sight of the eyes is losing its keenness, and you are far from that still" (219a). But be careful, at the place where you see something, I am nothing.

What Socrates refuses at that moment, if it is definable in the terms that I told you about with regard to the metaphor of love, what Socrates refuses (in order to show himself what he had already shown himself to be, I would say, almost officially in all the outbursts of Alcibiades, in order that everyone would know that Alcibiades in other words had been his first love) what Socrates refuses to show to Alcibiades is something which takes on a different meaning, which would be properly the metaphor of love in so far as Socrates would admit himself as loved and I would say further, would admit himself as loved, unconsciously. (6) It is precisely because Socrates knows, that he sets his face against having been, in any justified or justifiable way whatsoever, eromenos, the desirable, what is worthy of being loved.

The reason why he does not love, why the metaphor of love cannot be produced, is because the substitution of the erastes for the eromenos (the fact that he manifests himself as erastes at the place where there was eromenos) is what he must set his face against, because, for him, there is nothing in him which is lovable, because his essence is this ouden, this vacuum, this hollow (to use a term which was later used in the Neo-Platonic and Augustinian meditation) this kenosis which represents the central position of Socrates. This term kenosis is so true, emptiness opposed to the fullness - of whom? Precisely of Agathon! - is right at the origin of the dialogue when Socrates, after his long meditation in the porch of the house next door, finally arrives at the banquet and sits next to Agathon. He begins to speak, people think that he is joking, that he is poking fun, but in a dialogue as rigorous and also as austere in its unfolding can we believe that there is nothing there in the state of being refilled. He says: "You Agathon are full and as there is conveyed from a full vessel to an empty vessel something, a liquid, with the help of a piece of wool along which the liquid flows, in the same way I am going to....." (175d) Irony no doubt but which is directed at something, which intends to express something, which is precisely also what Socrates - I repeated it for you on several occasions and it is in the mouth of Alcibiades - presents as constitutive of his position which is the following: the principal thing is that he knows nothing, except about the affairs of love, amathia, inscientia, as Cicero translated by forcing the Latin tongue a little. Inscitia is brute ignorance, while inscientia, is this not knowing constituted as such, as emptiness, as appeal of the emptiness at the centre of knowledge.

Therefore you can well grasp, I think, what I mean to say here; it is that the structure constituted by the substitution, the realised metaphor constituting what I called the miracle of the apparition of the erastes at the very place where there was the eromenos, it is this whose lack ensures that Socrates cannot but set his face against giving to it, as I might say, a simulacrum. Namely that he poses himself before Alcibiades as not then being able to show him the signs of his desire in so far as he takes exception to having been himself, in any way, an object worthy of the desire of Alcibiades, or indeed of anybody's desire.

So that you should observe that the Socratic message, even though it involves something which refers to love, is certainly not in itself fundamentally something which begins, as one might say, from a centre of love.

Socrates is represented to us as an erastes, as a desirer, but nothing is further from the image of Socrates than the radiation of love which emanates, for example, from the message of Christ. Neither effusion, nor gift, nor mysticism, nor ecstasy, nor simply commandment flow from it. Nothing is further from the message of Socrates than "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself", a formula which is remarkably absent from the dimension of what Socrates says. And this indeed is what has always struck the exegetes who, when all is said and done, in their objections to the asceticism (ascese) proper to eros, say that what is commanded is: "Thou shalt love above all in thy soul what is most essential to you."

(7) Naturally this is only an appearance, I mean that the Socratic message as it is transmitted to us by Plato is not making an error there because the structure, as you are going to see, is preserved. And it is even because it is preserved that it allows us also to glimpse in a more correct way the mystery hidden beneath the Christian commandment. And moreover, even though it is possible to give a general theory of love under every manifestation which is a manifestation of love even if this may appear surprising to you at first sight, you can assure yourselves that once you have its key - I am speaking about what I call the metaphor of love - you find it absolutely everywhere.

I have spoken to you through Victor Hugo. There is also the original book of the story of Ruth and Booz. If this story maintains itself in front of us in a fashion that inspires us differently (except for the bad minds who make of this story a story of a libidinous old man and a little servant girl) it is because moreover we suppose here this lack of knowledge:

"Booz did not know that there was a woman there" already unconsciously Ruth is for Booz the object he loves. And we also suppose, and this in a formal fashion:

"And Ruth did not know what God wanted of her;"

that this third, that this divine locus of the Other in so far as it is there that there is inscribed the fatality of Ruth's desire is what gives to her nocturnal vigil at the feet of Booz its sacred character. The underlay of this lack of knowledge in which already there is situated, in an anteriority veiled as such, the dignity of the eromenos is here for each one of the partners the reason for the whole mystery of the signification of love in the proper sense which the revelation of their desire takes on.

Here then is how things happen. Alcibiades does not understand. After having heard Socrates he says to him: "Listen, I have said all that I have to say, it's up to you to decide what you should do." He confronts him, as they say, with his responsibilities. At which Socrates says to him: "We will talk about all of that... until tomorrow, we still have a lot of things to say about it!" (219a). In short, he places things within the continuation of a dialogue, he engages him on his own paths. It is in so far as Socrates absents himself at the point marked by the covetous desire of Alcibiades... and this covetousness, can we not say that it is precisely a covetousness for what is best? But it is precisely the fact that it is expressed in these terms of object - namely that Alcibiades does not say: "It is under the rubric of my good or of my harm that I want this thing to which nothing can be compared and which in you is agalma", but "I want it because I want it, - whether it is for my good or whether it is for my harm" - it is precisely in this that Alcibiades reveals the central function in the articulation of the love relationship, and it is precisely in this also that Socrates sets his face against responding to him himself on this plane.

I mean that by his attitude of refusal, by his severity, by his austerity, by his noli me tangere he implicates Alcibiades on the path to his good. The commandment of Socrates is: "Look after your soul, seek your perfection." But is it even sure that we should not allow some ambiguity around this "his good". Because after all, precisely what is put in question ever since this dialogue of Plato has been having an effect, is the identity of this object of desire with "his good". Should we not translate "his good" by the good as Socrates conceives it, traces out its path for those who follow him, he who brings into the world a new discourse?

Let us observe that in the attitude of Alcibiades there is something, I was going to say sublime, in any case absolute and passionate which is close to something of a different nature, of (8) another message, the one where in the gospel we are told that the one who knows that there is a treasure in a field - it is not said what this treasure is - is capable of selling everything he has in order to buy this field and enjoy this treasure. It is here that there is situated the margin of the position of Socrates with respect to that of Alcibiades. Alcibiades is the man of desire. But then you will tell me: why does he want to be loved? In fact, he already is, and he knows it. The miracle of love is realised in him in so far as he becomes the desirer. And when Alcibiades manifests himself as loving, as someone who would say that it is not rubbish! Namely that precisely because he is Alcibiades, the one whose desires know no limits, this preferential field in which he engages himself which is properly speaking for him the field of love is something in which he displays what I would call a very remarkable case of the absence of castration fear - in other words a total lack of this famous Ablehnung der Weiblichkeit. Everyone knows that the most extreme types of virility of the ancient model are always accompanied with a perfect disdain for the eventual risk of being treated, even if only by their soldiers, as a woman, as happened, as you know to Caesar.

Alcibiades here puts on a feminine scene in front of Socrates. He remains nonetheless Alcibiades at his own level. This is why we should attach all its importance in going beyond the complement that he gave to the eulogy of Socrates, namely this astonishing portrait destined to complete the impassive figure of Socrates - and impassive means that he cannot even tolerate being taken in the passive sense, loved, eromenos. The attitude of Socrates (or what is unfolded before us as his courage at war) is caused by a profound indifference to everything that is happening around him, even what is most dramatic.

Thus, once there has been gone through the whole end of this development in which in short there culminates the demonstration of Socrates as a being- without equal, here is how Socrates responds to Alcibiades: I think you have all your wits about you!.... And in effect, it was under the shelter of a "I don't know what I'm saying" that Alcibiades had expressed himself. Socrates, who knows, says to him: "You seem to me to have all your wits about you! Nephein moi dokeis" (222c), namely that even though you are drunk I read something in you, and what? It is Socrates who knows it, it is not Alcibiades.

Socrates highlights what is in question, he is going to speak about Agathon. At the end of the discourse of Alcibiades in effect, Alcibiades had turned towards Agathon in order to say to him, "that is a warning to you, not to be deceived by this man. You see how he is capable of treating me. Don't get into it!" (222b) "And it is as a postscript..." - because in truth the intervention of Socrates would have no meaning if it was not on this postscript that the intervention was brought to bear in so far as I called it an interpretation - What he tells us, is that Agathon was being aimed at throughout all the circumlocutions of the discourse, that it was around him that the whole of his discourse was entwined.... "as if your whole discourse" - it should be translated and not language - "had no (9) other goal" but what? To enunciate that "I am obliged to be your lover and love no one else, and Agathon should be your beloved and loved by no one else!" And this, he says, is quite transparent, katadelon, in your discourse. Socrates says indeed that "he reads through the apparent" discourse. And very precisely, it is this business of "the drama of your invention", as he calls it, this metaphor, here is where it is altogether transparent. "To saturikon sou drama touto kai silenikon, your satyric and silenic drama has been shown up" (222d), this is where things can be seen.

Well let us try in effect to recognise its structure. Socrates says to Alcibiades: "If what you want when all is said and done is for you to be loved by me and for Agathon to be your object.... - because otherwise there is no other meaning to be given to this discourse except the most superficial of psychological meanings, the vague stirring up of jealousy in the other - there is no question of it!" The fact is that effectively this is what is in question. Alcibiades, Socrates admits it, manifesting his desire to Agathon and demanding in short from Agathon that which first of all Alcibiades himself demanded from Socrates. The proof is that, if we consider all the parts of the dialogue as a long epithalamium and if what all this dialectic culminates in has a meaning, what happens at the end, is that Socrates eulogises Agathon.

That Socrates should sing the praises of Agathon is the response not to the past but the present demand of Alcibiades. When Socrates eulogises Agathon, he gives satisfaction to Alcibiades. He gives him satisfaction for his present act of public declaration, of putting on the plane of the universal Other what had happened between them behind the veils of modesty. The response of Socrates is: "You can love the one I am going to praise because, by praising him, I Socrates would be able to get across the image of you loving qua the image of you loving; it is through this that you are going to enter upon the path of superior identifications which the path of beauty traces out."

But it would be well not to overlook the fact that here Socrates, precisely because he knows, substitutes something for something else. It is not beauty, nor ascesis, nor the identification to God that Alcibiades desires, but this unique object, this something which he saw in Socrates and from which Socrates diverts him because Socrates knows that he does not have it. But Alcibiades, for his part, always desires the same thing and, what Alcibiades is seeking in Agathon, you can be sure, is this same supreme point where the subject is abolished in the phantasy, his agalmata♦ Here Socrates, in substituting his lure for what I would call the lure of the gods, does so quite authentically in the measure that precisely he knows what love is and it is precisely because he knows that he is destined to deceive himself about it, namely to overlook the essential function of the object aimed at, constituted by the agalma.

He were told last night about a model, a theoretical model. I would say that it is not possible not to evoke in this connection even if it is only as support for our thought, the intrasubjective dialectic of the Ego-Ideal, the Ideal Ego, and precisely the partial object. the little schema which I formerly gave you of the spherical mirror, in so far as it is in front of it that there is created this phantasy of the real image of the vase as it emerges hidden in the apparatus and that this (10) illusory image can be supported, perceived by the eye as real in so far as the eye accommodates itself with respect to that around which it has been realised, namely the flower that we have placed there.

I taught you to note in these three terms (the Ego-Ideal, the Ideal Ego, and little o, the agalma of the partial object) the something denoting the supports, the reciprocal relationships of the three terms that are in question every time there is constituted what? Precisely what is in question at the end of the Socratic dialectic, something which is destined to give consistency to what Freud - and it is in this connection that I introduced this schema - enounced to us as being the essential of being in love, Verliebtheit, namely the recognition of the foundation of the narcissistic image in so far as it is what gives its substance to the Ideal Ego.

The imaginary incarnation of the subject, this is what is in question in this triple reference. And you will allow me to finally come to what I mean: Socrates' demon is Alcibiades. It is Alcibiades, exactly as we are told in the discourse of Diotima that love is not a god, but a demon, namely the one who sends to mortals the message which the gods have to give him and this is why we could not fail in connection with this dialogue to evoke the nature of gods.

(11) I am going to leave you for two weeks and I am going to give you some reading: De natura deorum by Cicero. Reading this did me a lot of damage a very long time ago with a celebrated pedant who, having seen me plunged in this, thought that it augured very badly as regards the focussing of my professional occupations. Read this De natura deorum in order to bring yourselves up to date. You will see in it first of all all sorts of extremely droll things and you will see that this Mr. Cicero, who is not the nit-picker that people try to depict for you by telling you that the Romans were people who simply followed, is someone who articulates things which go straight to your heart. You will also see in it some amusing things. Namely that, in his time, people went to Athens to look in a way for the shades of the great pin-ups of the time of Socrates. People went there saying: I am going to meet Charmides there on every street corner. You will see that our Brigitte Bardot can align herself with the effects that these Charmides had! They were even goggle-eyed at the little street urchins! And in Cicero you see funny things. And specifically a passage which I cannot give you, which goes something like this: "It must be admitted that beautiful lads, those whom all the same the philosophers taught us that it was very good to love, are not easy to find! Of course here and there you can find one who is beautiful." What does that mean? Does the loss of political independence have as an irremediable effect some racial decadence, or simply the disappearance of this mysterious eclat, this himeros enarges, this brilliance of desire that Plato speaks about in Phaedo? We will never know anything about it.... But you will learn still more things in it. You will learn that it is a serious question to know where the gods are localised. And it is a question which has not lost for us, believe me, its importance. If what I am telling you here may one day when, with a tangible slipping of certitude, you find yourself between two stools.... if it is of use to you in any way, one of the things will have been to recall to you the real existence of gods.

So then why should we also not dwell on this scandalous object which the gods of antique mythology were and, without trying to reduce them to packets of filing cards or to groupings of themes, but by asking ourselves what could be meant by the fact that after all these gods behaved in the way you know, and of whom stealing, cheating, adultery - I won't talk about impiety, that was their affair - was all the same the most characteristic style. In other words, the question of what a love of god is is something which is frankly actualised by the scandalous character of antique mythology. And I ought to tell you that all the same the high point is there at the origin, at the level of Homer. There is no way of behaving oneself in a more arbitrary, more unjustifiable, more incoherent, more derisory fashion than these gods. And read the Iliad; there they are all the time mixed up in, ceaselessly intervening in the affairs of men. And one cannot all the same help thinking that the stories which, when all is said and done might in a certain perspective.... but we do not take it - nobody can take it, not even the thickest of the Homeridae - and say that they are tall stories. No, they are there and well and truly there! What could it mean that the (12) gods in short only manifest themselves to men in that way?

It must all the same be seen what happens when they are seized by the love of a mortal for example. There is no stopping them, even if the mortal, in despair, transforms herself into a laurel tree or a frog. There is no way of stopping them. There is nothing all the same which is further removed from these sorts of tremors of being confronted with love than the desire of a god - or moreover a goddess - I do not see why I should not bring them into it also.

It needed Giraudoux to restore for us the dimensions, the resonance of this prodigious myth of Amphitryon. This great poet could not but allow there to radiate onto Jupiter himself something which may resemble a sort of respect for the sentiments of Alcmene, but it is indeed in order to make the thing possible for us. It is quite clear that for the one who knows how to understand, this myth remains in a way a sort of high point of blasphemy, one might say, and nevertheless it was not at all like that that the ancients understood it. Because there things go further than ever. It is divine debauchery which is disguised as human virtue. In other words, when I say that nothing stops them, they are going to practice deception even in what is the best of things and it is here indeed that there lies the whole key to the affair. The fact is that the best, the real gods, push impassivity to a point of which I spoke to you above as not even tolerating the qualification of passive.

To be loved is necessarily to enter onto this ladder of the desirable from which the theologians of Christianity had great trouble as we know extricating themselves. Because if God is desirable, he can be more or less so; henceforth there is a whole ladder of desire and, what do we desire in God if not the desirable but.... plus God - so that it is at the moment when an effort was being made to give to God his most absolute value that people found themselves trapped in a vertigo from which they emerged only with difficulty to preserve the dignity of the supreme object.

The gods of antiquity did not shilly-shally about it: they knew that they could only reveal themselves to men in the rock of scandal, in the agalma of something which violates all the rules as pure manifestation of an essence which, it, remained completely hidden, the enigma of which was entirely behind, hence the demonic incarnation of their scandalous exploits. And it is in this sense that I say that Alcibiades is the demon of Socrates.

Alcibiades gives the true representation, without knowing it, of what is implicated in—the Socratic ascesis. He shows what is there which is not absent, believe me, from the dialectic of love as it was later developed in Christianity.

It is indeed around this that there comes to grief this crisis, which in the XVIth century, overbalances the whole long synthesis which had been sustained and, I would say, the long equivocation concerning the nature of love which had caused it to unfold, to develop in the whole of the Middle Ages in such a post-Socratic perspective. I mean that for example the God of Scotus Erigena does not differ from the God of Aristotle, in so far as he dies as eromenon, they are consistent: it is by his beauty that God makes the world go around. What a distance there is between this perspective and the one which opposes it! But it is not opposed to it — this is the sense of what I am trying to articulate — this is articulated on the opposite side as agape in so far as agape expressly teaches us that God loves us as (13) sinners: he loves us just as much for our evil as for our good. This is the meaning of the overbalancing which took place in the history of the feelings of love, and curiously, at the precise moment where there reappears for us, in its authentic texts, the Platonic message: the divine agape qua addressing itself to the sinner as such, here is the centre, the heart of the Lutheran position.

But you must not believe that this is something which was reserved to a heresy, to a local insurrection in Catholicism, because it is enough to glance even superficially at what followed the counter-reformation, namely the eruption of what has been called Baroque art, to perceive that this signifies exactly nothing other than the proclaiming, the erection as such of the power of the image properly speaking in its seduction, and, after the long misunderstanding which had sustained in the divinity the trinitarian relationship of the knower to the known and remounting from the known to the knower through knowledge, we see here the approach of this revelation which is ours, which is that things go from the unconscious towards the subject which is constituted in its dependency, and remount towards this core-object which we call here agalma.

Such is the structure which regulates the dance between Alcibiades and Socrates. Alcibiades shows the presence of love but only shows it in so far as Socrates who knows, can be deceived by it and only accompany him by being deceived about it. The lure is reciprocal. It is just as true for Socrates, if it is a lure and if it is true that he is lured, as it is true for Alcibiades that he is caught in the lure. But who is the most authentically lured if not the one who follows, firmly and not allowing himself to drift, what is traced out for him by a love which I would call terrifying.

You must not believe that the one who is placed at the origin of this discourse, Aphrodite, is a goddess who smiles. A pre-Socratic, who is I believe Democritus says, that she was there all alone at the origin. And it is even in this connection that for the first time there appears in the Greek texts the term agalma. Venus, to call her by her name, is born every day. The birth of Aphrodite is every day and, to take up from Plato himself an equivocation which, I believe, is a veritable etymology, I would conclude this discourse by these words: Kalemera, "good day", kalimeros, "good day and beautiful desire"! About the reflection on what I have brought you here concerning the relationship of love to something which has always been called eternal love.... may it not be too difficult for you to think about, if you remember that this term of eternal love is put by Dante expressly at the gates of Hell!

Seminar 12: Wednesday 1 March 1961

As I think most of you will still remember, we have arrived then at the end of the commentary on the Symposium, in other words the Platonic dialogue which, as I have if not explained at least indicated on several occasions, happens to be historically at the start of what one can call more than one explanation in our cultural era, of love, at the start of what one can call a development of, in short, the most profound, the most radical, the most mysterious function of relationships between subjects. At the horizon of what I pursued before you as a commentary, there was all the development of antique philosophy (an antique philosophy, as you know, is not simply a speculative position, entire zones of society were oriented in their practical action by the speculation of Socrates).... it is important to see that it is not at all in an artificial, fictitious fashion that in some way Hegel made of positions like the Stoic, Epicurean positions the antecedents of Christianity.

Effectively these positions were lived by a large group of subjects as something which guided their life in a fashion that one could say was effectively equivalent, antecedent, preparatory with respect to what was brought to them subsequently by the Christian position. To perceive that the very text of the Symposium continued to mark profoundly something which in the Christian position also extends beyond speculation, because one cannot say that the fundamental theological positions taught by Christianity failed to have an effect, to profoundly influence everyone's problematic, and specifically that of those who found themselves in this historical development to be in the lead by the position of example that they assumed under different headings (either by their remarks, or by their directive action) of what is called sanctity, this could naturally only be indicated at the horizon and, in a word, that is enough for us.

That is enough for us, because if it was from this starting point that we had ourselves wished to expedite what we have to say, we would have taken it at a subsequent level. It is precisely in the measure that this initial point which the Symposium is can conceal in itself something altogether radical in this mainspring of love whose title it bears, which it indicates as being its purpose, it is for this reason that we have carried out this commentary on the Symposium.

We concluded it the last time by showing that something - I do not believe that I am exaggerating in saying this - had been neglected up to now by all the commentators of the Symposium, and that in this respect our commentary constitutes (in the sequence of the history of the development of indications, of virtualities that there are in this dialogue) an epoch. If, in so far as we (2) believe we have seen in the very scenario of what happens between Alcibiades and Socrates the last word of what Plato wants to tell us concerning the nature of love, it is certain that this supposes that Plato had deliberately, in the presentation of what one could call his thought, made a place for enigma, in other words that his thought, is not entirely open, betrayed, developed in this dialogue.

Now I believe that there is nothing excessive in asking you to admit this for the simple reason that, in the opinion of all the commentators, ancient and especially modern, of Plato - the case is not a unique one - an attentive examination of the dialogues shows very evidently that in this dialogue there is an exoteric and esoteric element, a closed-off element, and that the most singular modes of this closing-off - up to an including the most characteristic traps which can go so far as to be lures - touch on the difficulty produced as such so that those who are not supposed to understand do not understand and this is really structuring, fundamental in everything that has remained to us from Plato's expositions. Obviously to admit such a thing is also to admit how risky it always is for us to advance, to go further, to try to pierce, to guess in its final principle what Plato indicates to us.

It appears that as regards this thematic of love to which we have limited ourselves, as it is developed in the Symposium, it would be difficult, for us analysts, not to recognise the bridge, the hand that is stretched out to us in this articulation of the last scenario of the scene of the Symposium, namely what happens between Alcibiades and Socrates.

I articulated and made you sense this in two moments by showing you the importance of the declaration of Alcibiades, in showing you what we cannot but recognise in what Alcibiades articulates around the theme of the agalma, the theme of the object hidden within the subject Socrates. It would be very difficult for us not to take seriously that in the form, in the articulation that this is presented to us, these are not metaphorical remarks, pretty images to say that in general he expects a lot from Socrates there is revealed there a structure in which we can rediscover what we ourselves are capable of articulating as altogether fundamental in what I would call the position of desire.

Here of course - and I excuse myself to the newcomers here - I can suppose known by my audience in its general characteristics the elaborations which I already gave of this position of the subject, those which are indicated in this topological summary constituted by what we call here conventionally the graph. Its general form is given by the splitting, by the fundamental reduplication of two signifying chains in which the subject is constituted, in so far as we admit that it has already been demonstrated that this reduplication of itself required by the logical, initial, inaugural relationship of the subject of the signifier as such, from the existence of an unconscious signifying chain, flows from the sole position of the term (3) subject as a being determined as subject by the fact that it is the support of the signifier.

No doubt....let those for whom this is only an affirmation, a proposition that still has not been demonstrated reassure themselves, we will have to come back to it. But we have to announce this morning that this has been previously articulated. Desire as such presents itself in a position (with respect to the unconscious signifying chain as constitutive of the subject who speaks), in the position of what cannot be conceived of except on the basis of metonymy, determined by the existence of the signifying chain by this something, this phenomenon which is produced in the support of the subject of the signifying chain which is called metonymy and which means that, from the fact that the subject undergoes the mark of the signifying chain, something is possible, something is fundamentally established in him which we call metonymy - which is nothing other than the possibility of the indefinite sliding of significations under the continuity of the signifying chain.

Everything that happens to be associated at one time by the signifying chain (the circumstantial element with the element of activity and the element of the beyond of the term at which this activity ends up), all of this is in the position of finding itself in appropriate conditions as being able to be taken as equivalent one for the other - a circumstantial element being able to take on the representative value of the term of the subjective enunciating of the object to which it is directed, or moreover, of the action itself of the subject.

It is in the measure that something presents itself as revalorizing the sort of infinite slipping, the dissolving element that the signifying fragmentation brings of its own accord into the subject, that something takes on the value of privileged object and stops this infinite slipping. It is in the measure that an object o takes on with respect to the subject this essential value which constitutes the fundamental phantasy, $$*o$, in which the subject himself recognises himself as arrested, what we call in analysis - to remind you of more familiar notions - fixated with respect to the object in this privileged function, and which we call o.

Therefore it is in the measure in which the subject identifies himself to the fundamental phantasy that desire as such takes on consistency and can be designated, that the desire we are dealing with is rooted by its very position in the unconscious, namely also, to rejoin our terminology, that it is posed in the subject as desire of the Other, the big O - O being defined for us as the locus of the word, this locus always evoked once there is a word, this third locus which always exists in relationships to the other, small o, once there is signifying articulation. This big O is not an absolute other, an other who would be the other of what we call in our moral verbosity the other respected qua subject, in so far as he is morally our equal. No, this Other, as I teach you here to articulate it, at once necessitated and necessary as locus but at the same time perpetually submitted to the question of what guarantees it, is a perpetually vanishing Other and, by this very fact, one which puts us ourselves in a perpetually vanishing position.

Now, it is to the question posed to the Other of what he can give us, of what he has to respond to us, it is to this question that there is attached love as such; not that love is identical to each one of the demands with which we assail him, but that love is situated in the beyond of this demand in so far as the Other can respond to us or not as final presence. And the whole question is to take note of the relationship which links this Other to whom there is addressed the demand for love with the apparition of this term of desire in so far as it is no longer (4) this Other, our equal, this Other to whom we aspire, this Other of love, but that it is something which, with respect to that, represents properly speaking a falling away from it - I mean something which is of the nature of object.

What we are dealing with in desire is an object, not a subject. It is precisely here that there lies what one can call this terrifying commandment of the god of love which is precisely to make of the object that he designates for us something which, firstly is an object and secondly that before which we falter, we vacillate, we disappear as subject. Because this collapse, this depreciation that is in question, it is we as subject who have to assume it. And what happens to the object is precisely the contrary, namely - I am using terms here in order to make myself understood, they are not the most appropriate, but it does not matter, it is a question of getting it across and making myself understood - this object, for its part, is overvalued and it is in so far as it is overvalued that it has this function of saving our dignity as subject, namely of making of us something other than this subject submitted to the infinite slipping of the signifier, to make of us something other than subjects of the word, this something unique, inestimable, irreplaceable when all is said and done which is the true point at which we can designate what I have called the dignity of the subject.

The equivocation, if you wish, that there is in the term individuality, is not that we are something unique as body which is this one and not another, individuality consists entirely in this privileged relationship at which we culminate as subject in desire.

All I am doing here after all is giving an account once more of this merry-go-round of truth on which we are turning since the origin of this seminar. It is a question this year, with transference, of showing what are its consequences at the most intimate level of our practice. How does it happen that we are coming so late to this transference, you will ask me.... Of course, the fact is that the property of truths is never to show themselves entirely, in a word, that truths are solids of a rather perfidious opacity. They do not even have, it seems, this property that we are capable of producing in solids, of being transparent, and of showing us at the same time their anterior and posterior bone structure; it is necessary to go right around them and even I would say, to do some conjuring tricks with them.

—

For transference then, as we are tackling it this year, you have seen that whatever the charm with which I may have succeeded in leading you on for a certain time by making you pay attention with me to love, you must all the same have perceived that I approached it from an angle, a pitch which not only is not the classical angle, or pitch, but is moreover not the one by which up to the present I have even approached this question of transference before you. I mean that, up to the present, I always reserved what I advanced on this theme by telling you that one had to be terribly mistrustful of what is the appearance, the phenomenon most habitually connoted under the terms for example of positive or negative transference, of the order of the collection of terms in which not only a more or less well informed public, but even ourselves, in this daily discourse, connote transference.

I always reminded you that one must start from the fact that transference, in the final analysis, is the automatism of repetition. Now it is clear that if since the beginning of the year I have done nothing other than make you pursue the details, the movement of Plato's Symposium, On Love, love is the only thing that is dealt with, it is quite obviously to introduce you into transference from another angle. It is a question therefore of joining up these two methods of approach.

(5) So legitimate is this distinction that one reads very singular things in the authors, and that precisely for want of the lines, the guidelines which I provide for you here, people arrive at quite astonishing things. It would not displease me at all if some lively person gave us here a brief report so that we could really discuss it - and I even wish it for reasons that are quite local, precise at this turning point of our seminar of this year, on which I do not want to spend too much time and to which I will return - it is certainly necessary that some people should be able to mediate between this rather heterogeneous assembly that you compose and what I am in the process of trying to articulate before you, should be able to mediate in so far as it is obviously very difficult for me to advance very far into this mediation, in a subject matter which is going to do nothing less than put right at the point of what we are articulating this year the function as such of desire not only in the analysand, but essentially in the analyst. One asks oneself for whom this involves the greater risk: for those who for some reason know something about it or for those who are still not in a position to know anything about it. In any case, there ought to be all the same a method of approaching this subject before a sufficiently prepared audience, even if it does not have the experience of analysis.

This having been said, in 1951, an article by Hermann Nunberg which is called "Transference and reality" is something quite exemplary (as moreover is everything which has been written on transference) of the difficulties, the avoidances which are produced for want of an approach which is sufficiently illuminated, sufficiently oriented, sufficiently methodical of the phenomenon of transference, because it is not difficult to find in this short article of exactly nine pages, that the author goes so far as to distinguish as being essentially different transference and the automatism of repetition. They are, he says, two different things. This is going a bit far all the same. And it is certainly not what I am telling you. I will ask someone then for the next time to give a report in ten minutes of what there seems to him to emerge from the structure of the enunciation of this article and the fashion in which it can be corrected.

For the moment let us carefully mark what is in question. At the origin transference is discovered by Freud as a process which, I underline, is spontaneous, a spontaneous process certainly disturbing enough (since we are in history at the beginning of the appearance of this phenomenon) to divert from the first analytic investigation one of the most eminent pioneers: Breuer. And very quickly it is referred, linked to what is most essential in this presence of the past in so far as it is discovered by analysis. These terms are all carefully weighed. I would ask you to record what I am retaining to fix the principle points of the dialectic that is in question. Very quickly also it is admitted first of all in a tentative way, then confirmed by experience, that this phenomenon, qua linked to what is most essential in the presence of the past discovered by analysis, can be handled by interpretation.

Interpretation already exists at this moment, in so far as it has manifested itself as one of the mainsprings necessary for the realisation, for the completion of remembering in the subject. It is seen that there is something other than this tendency to remember, without really knowing yet what it is, in any case, it is the same thing. And this transference is admitted immediately as manageable by interpretation therefore, if you (6) wish, permeable to the action of the word, which immediately introduces the question which will remain, which still remains open for us, which is the following: this phenomenon of transference is itself placed in the position of a support for this action of the word. At the same time as transference is discovered it is discovered that, if the word has an effect as it had an effect up to then before it was perceived, it is because transference exists.

So that up to the present, in the final analysis - and the subject was treated and re-treated at length by the most qualified authors in analysis - I signal very particularly the article by Jones, in his Papers on psychoanalysis; "The action of suggestion in psychotherapy", but there are innumerable others. The question remaining on the agenda is that of the ambiguity which still remains, which in the present state of things nothing can reduce. This is that transference, however interpreted it may be, preserves in itself as a kind of irreducible limit, the following, the fact is that in the central, normal conditions of analysis, in neuroses, it will be interpreted on the basis and with the instrument of transference itself, which could not be done except with that accent; it is from the position that transference gives him that the analyst analyses, interprets and intervenes on the transference itself.

What must be called an irreducible margin of suggestion remains from outside as an always suspect element not of what happens from outside - one cannot know that - but of what the theory is capable of producing. In fact, as they say, these difficulties do not prevent us from advancing. It nevertheless remains that one must fix the limits of the theoretical aporia and perhaps this introduces us to a certain possibility of subsequently going further.

Let us carefully observe all the same what is involved in it, I mean as regards what is happening, and perhaps we will be able to perceive already the ways in which one can go beyond it.

The presence of the past therefore, such is the reality of transference. Is there not already something which imposes itself, which allows us to formulate it in a more complete fashion? It is a presence, a little more than a presence, it is a presence in act and, as the German and French terms indicate, a reproduction. I mean that what is not sufficiently articulated, not sufficiently highlighted in what is ordinarily said, is the way in which this reproduction is distinguished from a simple passivity of the subject.

If it is a reproduction, if it is something in act, there is in the manifestation of transference something creative. It appears to me to be absolutely essential to articulate this element and, as always, if I highlight it, this is not to say that its indications are not already noticeable in a more or less obscure fashion in what the authors have already articulated.

Because if you refer to an epoch-making report by Daniel Lagache, you will see that this is what constitutes the core, the point of this distinction that he introduced - which to my mind remains a little vacillating and unclear because it does not see the final point.... - of the distinction that he introduced of the opposition around which he wanted to make there turn his distinction of transference between repetition of need and need of repetition. Because however didactic may be this opposition which in reality is not included, is not even for a single (7) instant really in question in what we experience of transference - there is no doubt that it is question of the need for repetition - we are not able to formulate otherwise the phenomena of transference than in this enigmatic form: why is it necessary for the subject to repeat perpetually this signification, in the positive sense of the term, which he signifies to us by his behaviour. To call that need, is already to inflect in a certain direction what is in question and in this respect one understands in effect that the reference to an opaque psychological datum like the one connoted purely and simply by Daniel Lagache in his report, the Zeigarnik effect, after all better respects what is to be preserved in what constitutes the strict originality of what is in question in transference.

For it is clear that everything on the other hand indicates to us that if what we do in so far as transference is the repetition of a need (of a need which may manifest itself at one or other moment to manifest the transference) is something which could manifest itself there as need, we arrive at an impasse - because in other respects we spend our time saying that it is a shadow of a need, a need which has for a long time been superseded, and that it is for that reason that its repetition is possible.

And moreover we arrive here at the point where transference appears as properly speaking a source of fiction. The subject in transference pretends, fabricates, constructs something and it then seems that it is not possible not to integrate immediately into the function of transference this term which is first of all: what is the nature of this fiction, what on the one hand is its source, and on the other hand its object? And if it is a question of fiction, what is being pretended and, because it is a question of feigning, for whom? It is quite clear that if one does not respond immediately: "For the person to whom one is addressing oneself", it is because one cannot add "...knowingly". It is because one is already greatly distanced by this phenomenon from any hypothesis even of what one can call massively by its name: simulation.

Therefore it is not for the person to whom one addresses oneself in so far as one knows it. But it is not because it is the contrary, namely that it is in so far as one does not know it, that it must be believed for all that that the person to whom one is addressing oneself is here all of a sudden volatilized, vanished. Because everything that we know about the unconscious from the very start, from dreams, indicates to us and experience shows us that there are psychic phenomena which are produced, are developed, are constructed to be understood, therefore precisely for this other who is there even when one does not know it, even if one does not know that they are there to be understood; they are there to be understood, and to be understood by another.

In other words, it seems to me impossible to eliminate from the phenomenon of transference the fact that it manifests itself in the relationship to someone to whom one is speaking. This is constitutive of it, constitutes a frontier and indicates to us at the same time that we should not swamp this phenomenon in the general possibility of repetition which the existence of the unconscious constitutes. Outside analysis there are repetitions linked of course to the constancy of the unconscious signifying chain in the subject. These repetitions, even if they can in certain cases have homologous effects, are to be strictly distinguished from what we call transference and, in this sense, justify the distinction into which - as you will see - the very remarkable personage that Herman Nunberg is allows himself to slip into from a quite different angle, but from an erroneous angle.

(8) Here I am going for a moment to slip in again, in order to show you its invigorating character, a piece, a segment of our exploration of the Symposium.

Remember the extraordinary scene - and try to situate it in our terms - constituted by the public confession of Alcibiades. You should indeed sense the quite remarkable weight that is attached to this action. You should properly sense that there is something here which goes well beyond a pure and simple account of what happened between him and Socrates, it is not neutral, and the proof, is that, even before beginning, he himself puts himself under the protection of some invocation of the secret which is not simply aimed at protecting himself. He says: "Let those who are not capable or worthy of hearing, the slaves who are there, block up their ears!" because there are things which it is better not to hear when one is not in a position to understand them.

He makes his confession before whom? The others, all the others, those who, by their agreement, their body, their council, their plurality, seem to constitute, to give the greatest possible weight to what one can call the tribunal of the Other. And what gives the confession of Alcibiades its value before this tribunal is a report in which precisely he tried to make of Socrates something completely subordinated, submitted to a value other than that of the relationship of subject to subject, where he had, vis-a-vis Socrates, manifested an attempt at seduction, in which what he wanted to make of Socrates, and in a fashion openly avowed, is someone instrumental, subordinated to what? To the object of his desire, to that of Alcibiades, which is agalma, the good object. And I would say further, how can we analysts fail to recognise what is in question because it is said clearly: it is the good object that he has in his belly.

Socrates is no longer there anything but the envelope of what is the object of desire. And it is indeed to mark clearly that he is nothing more than this envelope, it is for this reason that he wanted to show that Socrates is with respect to him the slave of desire, that Socrates is subjected to him by desire, and that even though he knew it he wanted to see Socrates' desire manifesting itself as a sign in order to know that the other object, agalma, was at his mercy.

Now for Alcibiades it is precisely the fact of having failed in this enterprise that covers him with shame and makes of his confession something so heavily charged. The fact is that the demon of Aidos, of Shame, of which I gave an account before you at one time in this connection is what intervenes here, this is what is violated. It is that before everybody there is unveiled in its most shocking trait, secret, the final mainspring of desire, this something which forces it to be always more or less dissimulated in love, the fact is that its aim is this collapse of the Other, capital O into the other, little o, and that, in addition on this occasion, it appears that Alcibiades failed in his enterprise, in so far as this enterprise was specifically to knock Socrates off his perch.

What could be closer in appearance to what one could call, to what one could believe, to be the final term of a seeking for the truth, not at all in its function of blueprint, of abstraction, of neutralisation of all the elements, but on the contrary in what it brings in terms of a resolution, of an absolution of everything that is in question and which you clearly see is (9) something quite different from the simple phenomenon of an incomplete task, as people say it is, it is something different.

Public confession with all the religious weight that we attach to it, rightly or wrongly, is indeed what seems to be in question here. As it is constructed up to its final term, does it not also seem that on this striking testimony given about the superiority of Socrates there should be completed the homage rendered to the master, and perhaps that which certain people have designated as being the apologetic value of the Symposium? Given the accusations with which Socrates remained charged even after his death, because the pamphlet by someone called Polycrates again accuses him at the time - and everyone knows that the Symposium was constructed in part in relation to this libel, we have some quotations from other authors - of having as one might say - led astray Alcibiades and many others also, of having indicated to them that the way to the satisfaction of all their desires was clear, while what is it we see? It is that, paradoxically, before this revelation of a truth which seems in a way to be sufficient in itself, but about which each and every person senses that there is still a question.... why all of this, to whom is it addressed, who is it a question of instructing at the moment that the confession is produced (it is certainly not Socrates' accusers), what is the desire that pushes Alcibiades to undress himself in this way in public? Is there not here a paradox which it is worth highlighting and which as you will see is not so simple if you look closely at it.

The fact is that what everyone perceives as an interpretation by Socrates is in fact such. Socrates retorts to him: "Everything that you have just done here, and God knows it is not obvious, is for Agathon. Your desire is more secret than all the unveiling which you have given yourself over to and is now aimed at still another: small o - and this other - I designate him for you, is Agathon."

Paradoxically, in this situation, it is thus not something phantastical, something which comes from the depths of the past and which no longer has any existence that is here by this interpretation of Socrates put in the place of what is manifested, here, it is well and truly the reality - if we listen to Socrates - which would serve as what we would call a transference in the process of the search for the truth.

In other words, so that you may well understand me, it is as if someone were to say during the trial of Oedipus: "Oedipus only pursues in such a breathless fashion this search for the truth which must lead him to his death because he has only a single goal, it is to go away, to escape, to flee with Antigone..." This is the paradoxical situation before which Socrates' interpretation places us. It is quite clear that all the shimmering of details., the angle through which this may serve to dazzle the groundlings by performing such a brilliant act, by showing what one is capable of, nothing of all of this, when all is said and done nothing holds up. There is well and truly a question of something about which one asks oneself then up to what point Socrates knew what he was doing. Because Socrates replying to Alcibiades seems to fall under the accusations of Polycrates because Socrates himself, learned in the matters of love, designates to him where his desire is and does much more than designating it because he is in a way going to play the game of this desire by procuration and he Socrates, immediately afterwards will lend himself to singing the praises of Agathon who all of a sudden as the camera stops is whisked away - we are completely hoodwinked by it - by a new entry of revellers. Thanks to this the question remains enigmatic.

(10) The dialogue can turn back on itself indefinitely and we will not know what Socrates knows about what he is doing or indeed whether it is Plato who at that moment is substituted for him (no doubt, because he is the one who wrote the dialogue, he knows a little more about it) namely allowing the centuries to go astray about what he, Plato, designates for us as the true reason for love which is to lead the subject towards what? The rungs which indicate to him the ascent towards a beauty more and more confused with supreme Beauty.... that's the real Plato.

This having been said it is not at all towards this, in following the text, that we sense ourselves forced. At most, as analysts, we might be able to say that if the desire of Socrates, as seems to be indicated in his remarks, is nothing other than to lead his interlocutors towards gnoti seauton (which is translated in another register by look after your soul) at the limit, we may think that all of this is to be taken seriously. That, on the one hand, and I will explain by what mechanism, Socrates is one of those to whom we owe the fact of having a soul, I mean of having given consistency to a certain point designated by Socratic interrogation with, as you will see, all that this engenders in terms of transference and qualities. But if it is true that what Socrates designates in this way is, without knowing it, the desire of the subject as I define it and as effectively it is manifested before us.... making of itself what must really be called its accomplice, if that is it and he does it without knowing it, then Socrates has a place that we can completely understand and understand at the same time how when all is said and done he inflamed Alcibiades.

Because if desire at its root, in its essence is the desire of the Other, it is here properly speaking that there lies the mainspring of the birth of love, if love is what happens in this object towards whom we stretch out our hands by our own desire and who, at the moment that it breaks into flame, allows there to appear for an instant this response, this other hand, the one which stretches out towards you as his desire. If this desire always manifests itself in so far as we do not know - "And Ruth did not know what God wanted of her...." because she did not know what God wanted of her, it was necessary all the same that there should be a question of God wanting something of her and if she knows nothing about it this is not because it is not known "what God wanted of her" but because by reason of this mystery God is eclipsed but always there.

It is in the measure that Socrates does not know what he desires and that it is the desire of the Other, it is in this measure that Alcibiades is obsessed by what? By a love of which one can say that Socrates' only merit is to designate it as transference love, to refer it back to his true desire.

These are the points that I wanted to refix, replace today in order to pursue the next time what I think I can clearly show, which is the degree to which this apologue, this final articulation, this almost mythical scenario of the final term of the Symposium allows us to structure, to articulate this situation around the position of two desires. We will then be able to really restore the one-to-one situation to its true sense, to two reals, the situation of the analysand in the presence of the analyst and at the same time put exactly in their place the sometimes ultra-precocious phenomena of love, which are so upsetting for those who approach these phenomena, precocious, then progressively more complex in the measure that they constitute later on in the analysis, in short, the whole content of what happens on the plane of what is called the imaginary for (11) which the whole development of modern theories of analysis believed it necessary to construct, and not without good reason, the whole theory of object-relations, the whole theory of projection in so far as this term is effectively far from being sufficient in itself, the whole theory when all is said and done of what the analyst is during the analysis for the analysand - which cannot be conceived of without a correct positioning of the position the analyst himself occupies with respect to the desire constitutive of analysis and that with which the subject starts into analysis: what does he want?

Seminar 13: Wednesday 8 March 1961

I ended the last time, to your satisfaction it seems, on the point of what constituted one of the elements, perhaps the fundamental element of the position of the subject in analysis. It was this question which for us crosschecked with the definition of desire as the desire of the Other, this question which is in short the one which is marginal, but in this way is indicated as fundamental in the position of the analysand with respect to the analyst even if he does not formulate it: what does he want?

Today we are again going to take a step backwards after having advanced to this point and propose to ourselves to centre on the one hand what we had announced at the beginning in our remarks last time, to advance in the examination of the modes in which theoreticians other than ourselves, from what can be clearly seen of their praxis, manifest in short the same topology as I am in the process of deploying, of trying to establish before you, a topology in so far as it makes transference possible.

It is not necessary, in effect, that they should formulate it like us in order to bear witness to it - this seems obvious to me - in their own way. As I wrote somewhere, one does not need to know the plan of an apartment in order to knock one's head against the walls. I would even go further, for this operation one can rather easily do without the plan, normally. On the contrary, the reciprocal is not true in this sense that contrary to a primitive schema of reality testing, it is not enough to knock one's head against the walls in order to reconstruct the plan of an apartment, especially if one carries out this experiment in the dark. You have an example which I like, Theodore cherche des allumettes, which illustrates it for you in Courteline's work. This having been said, it is perhaps a rather forced metaphor, perhaps not either as forced as it may appear to you, and this is what we are going to see by putting it to the test, to the test of what is currently happening, in our own day, when analysts speak about what? We are going I believe straight to the most current aspect of this question as it poses itself for them, and the same place as you can clearly sense I am centring it this year, from the side of the analyst. And in a word, it is properly speaking that which they best articulate when they - the theoreticians and the most advanced, the most lucid theoreticians - tackle what is called the question of counter-transference.

(2) On this I would like to remind you of some primary truths. It is not because they are primary that they are always expressed and if they go without saying, they go even better when they are said.

For the question of counter-transference, there is first of all the common opinion, that of anyone who has approached the problem a little, where he first situates it, namely the first idea that was had of it; I would also say the first, the most common that has been given of it but also the oldest approach to this question.

There was always present in analysis this notion of counter-transference. I mean very early, at the beginning of the elaboration of this notion of transference, everything that in the analyst represents his unconscious qua unanalysed, let us say, is dangerous for his function, for his operation as analyst in so far as starting from there we have the source of unmastered responses - and especially in the opinion that was had of them - of blind responses from which, in the whole measure that something has remained in the shadows (and this is why people insisted on the necessity of a complete didactic analysis, one pushed very far.... we are beginning with vague terms to begin with) as has been written somewhere, there will result from this neglect of one or other corner of the analyst's unconscious veritable blind spots. From which there is supposed to result - and I put it in the conditional, it is a discourse which is effectively maintained that I put in inverted commas, with reservations, to which I do not right away subscribe but which is admitted - eventually one or other more or less grave, more or less unfortunate occurrence in the practice of analysis, in terms of non-recognition, of a missed intervention, of the inopportuneness of some other intervention, even indeed of error.

But on the other hand one cannot fail to relate to this proposition the following, that it is said that it is on the communication of unconscious's that when all is said and done one must best depend for there to be produced in the analyst the most decisive perceptions, the best insights. It is not so much from a long experience, from an extensive knowledge of what he can encounter in the structure that we should expect the greatest relevance - this lion's spring that Freud tells us about somewhere and which in the best of cases only happens once. He are told that it is with the communication of unconscious's that there emerges that which, in concrete, existential analysis goes furthest, to the deepest level, has the greatest effect and that no analysis ought to lack one or other such moment. It is in short directly that the analyst is informed about what is happening in the unconscious of his patient, by means of a transmission path which remains rather problematic in the tradition. How ought we to conceive of this communication of unconscious's?

I am not here in order, even from an eristic, even critical point of view, to sharpen antinomies and to fabricate impasses which would be artificial. I am not saying that there is here something unthinkable, namely that it is supposed to be at once in so far as at the limit there would remain nothing of the unconscious in the analyst and at the same time in so far as he is supposed still to preserve a good deal of it, that he would (3) be, that he ought to be the ideal analyst. This would really be to make oppositions, I repeat, which would not be founded.

Even to push things to the extreme one can glimpse, conceive of an unconscious "reservation" and it must indeed be conceived, there is no exhaustive elucidation in anybody of the unconscious. However far an analysis may be pushed, one can very well conceive, once this reservation of the unconscious is admitted, that the subject whom we know to have been alerted precisely by the experience of didactic analysis should know in a way how to play on it like an instrument, like the drum of a violin of which moreover he knows the chords. It is not after all a raw unconscious, it is a flexible unconscious, an unconscious plus the experience of this unconscious.

Subject to these reservations, it remains all the same legitimate for us to feel the necessity of elucidating the point of passage at which this qualification is acquired. That which is fundamentally affirmed by the doctrine as being inaccessible to consciousness (because it is as such that we ought always to pose the foundation, the nature of the unconscious) it is not a question of it being accessible to men of good will, it is not, it remains within strictly limited conditions it is under strictly limited conditions that we can get at it, by a detour and by this detour of the Other which makes analysis necessary, which limits, reduces in an unbreakable way the possibilities of self-analysis. And the definition of the point of passage where what is thus defined can nevertheless be utilised as a source of information, included in a directive praxis, to pose the question of this is not to construct a useless antimony.

What tells us that this is the way that the problem is posed in a valid fashion, I mean that it is soluble, is that it is natural that things should be presented in this way. In any case for you who have the keys there is something which immediately gives you the recognisable access to it, it is this thing which is implied in the discourse that you hear, that logically - there is a logical priority for this - it is first of all as unconscious of the other than every experience of the unconscious is had. It is first of all in his patients that Freud encountered the unconscious.

And for each one of us, even if this is elided, it is first of all as unconscious of the other that there opens out for us the idea that such a contraption can exist. Every discovery of one's own unconscious presents itself as a stage of this ongoing translation of an unconscious that is first of all the unconscious of the other. So that there is no need to be very astonished that one can admit that, even for the analyst who has pushed very far this stage of the translation, the translation can always be taken up again at the level of the Other. Which obviously removes much of the import from the antinomy which I evoked above as being able to be constructed, by indicating immediately that it can only be constructed in an improper manner.

Only then, if we start from there, something immediately appears. It is that in short in this relationship to the other which is going to remove, as you see, a part, which is going to exorcise in part this fear which we may experience of not knowing enough about ourselves - we will come back to it, I am not claiming to urge you to dispense yourselves entirely from any worry in this regard. This is very far from my thought - once this is admitted, it remains that we are going to encounter here the second obstacle that we encounter with ourselves in our analysis when it is a question of the unconscious, namely what? The positive power of miscognition - an essential, not to say (4) historically original feature of my teaching - there is in the prestige of the ego or, in the largest sense, in the capture of the imaginary.

What it is important to note here is precisely that this domain, which in our experience of personal analysis is completely intermingled with the deciphering of the unconscious when it is a question of our relationship as psychoanalyst to the other has a position which must indeed be described as different. In other words, there appears here what I would call the Stoical ideal which is constructed about the apathy of the analyst.

As you know, people first of all identified feelings, which we can describe in general as negative or positive, that the analyst may have vis-a-vis his patient, with the effects in him of an incomplete reduction of the thematic of his own unconscious. But if this is true for himself, in his relationship of self-love, in his relationship to the small other in himself, inside himself, I mean that by which he sees himself as other than he is (which had been discovered, glimpsed, well before analysis), this consideration does not at all exhaust the question of what legitimately happens when he is dealing with this small other, with the other of the imaginary, outside.

Let us dot the i's. The path of Stoical apathy, the fact that he remains indifferent to the seductions as well as to the eventual brutality of this little other outside in so far this little other outside always has some power, small or great, over him even if it is only the power of burdening him with his presence, does this mean that this can all by itself be imputed to some inadequacy in the preparation of the analyst as such? In principle absolutely not.

Accept this stage of my progress. That does not mean that I am going to end with it, but I simply propose this remark to you. From the recognition of the unconscious, we have no reason to say, to pose that it by itself puts the analyst beyond the reach of his passions. This would be to imply that it is always and essentially from the unconscious that there comes the total, global effect, the whole efficiency of a sexual object or of some other object capable of producing some physical aversion or other. Why should this be required, I ask, except for those who commit the gross confusion of identifying the unconscious as such with the sum of vital powers? This is what radically differentiates the import of the doctrine that I am trying to articulate before you. There is of course a relationship between the two. There is even question of elucidating how this relationship can be made, why it is the tendencies of the life instinct which are presented in this way - but not just any of them, especially among those which Freud always and tenaciously circumscribed as sexual tendencies. There is a reason why these are particularly privileged, captivated, captured by the mainspring of the signifying chain in so far as it is what constitutes the subject of the unconscious.

But this having been said, why - at this stage of our interrogation the question must be asked - why an analyst, under the pretext that he is well analysed, should be insensible to the fact that this or that person provokes in him reactions of hostile thinking, that he sees this presence - it must be tolerated of course in order that something of this order may be produced - as a presence which is evidently not like the presence of a patient but the presence of a being who takes up room... and the more precisely we suppose him to be imposing, full, normal, the more legitimately may there be produced in his (5) presence all possible kinds of reactions. And likewise, on the intrasexual plane for example, why in itself should the movement of love or of hatred be excluded, why should it disqualify the analyst from his function?

At this stage, in this way of posing the question there is no other response than the following: in effect why not! I would even go further, the better he is analysed, the more it will be possible for him to be frankly in love or frankly in a state of aversion, of repulsion with regard to the most elementary modes of relationships of bodies between one another, with respect to his partner.

If we consider all the same that what I am saying there is a bit strong, in this sense that it embarrasses us, that it does not settle things, that there must be all the same something well founded in this exigency for analytic apathy, it is because it must be necessary for it to be rooted elsewhere. But in that case, it must be said, and we are, ourselves, in a position to say it. If I could say it to you immediately and easily, I mean if I could immediately make you understand it after the journey that we have already taken, of course I would say it to you. It is precisely because there is a journey that I still want you to take that I cannot formulate it in a completely strict fashion. But already there is something which can be said about it up to a certain point which may satisfy us; the only thing that I ask of you, is precisely not to be too satisfied with it before giving it its formula and its precise formula. It is that if the analyst realises, as the popular image or also as the deontological image conceives of it, this apathy, it is precisely in the measure that he is possessed by a desire stronger than the one that is in question, namely to get to the heart of the matter with his patient, to take him in his arms, or to throw him out the window.... that happens.... I would even dare to say that it would augur badly for someone who never felt something like that.

But after all it is a fact that except for the possibility of the thing, this should not happen in the typical case. This ought not to happen, not from the negative point of view of a kind of total imaginary discharge of the analyst - which is a hypothesis we do not need to pursue any further even though this hypothesis would be interesting - but because of something which is what I am posing the question about here this year. The analyst says: "I am possessed by a stronger desire". He is established qua analyst, in so far as there has been produced in a word a mutation in the economy of his desire.

It is here that Plato's texts can be evoked. From time to time something encouraging happens to me. This year I carried out for you this long discourse, this commentary on the Symposium with which I must say I am not dissatisfied. I had a surprise.... someone in my circle surprised me - you should understand this surprise in the sense that this term has in analysis, it is something which is more or less related to the unconscious - by pointing out to me somewhere, in a note at the end of a page, the quotation by Freud of a part of the discourse of Alcibiades to Socrates, regarding which it must indeed be said that Freud could have sought out a thousand other examples to illustrate what he is trying to illustrate at that moment, namely the desire for death mingled with love. You only have to bend (6) down, as I might say, to gather them up by the shovelful. And I communicate to you here a testimony, it is the example of someone who, in a cry from the heart, flung at me one day this ejaculation: "Oh! How I wish that you were dead for two years". There is no need to go looking for that in the Symposium. But I consider that it is not indifferent that at the level of the Ratman, namely at an essential moment in the discovery of the ambivalence of love, that it should be to Plato's Symposium that Freud should have referred. It is not all the same a bad sign, it is not a sign that we are wrong in going there ourselves to seek our references....

Well then, in Plato, in the Philebus, Socrates expresses somewhere this thought that among all the desires the strongest desire must be the desire for death, because the souls which are in the Erebe remain in it. It is an argument which is worth what it is worth, but which here takes on value illustrative of the direction in which I already indicated to you that there could be conceived this reorganisation, this restructuring of desire in the analyst. It is at least one of the mooring, fixation, attachment points of the question with which we surely will not be satisfied.

Nevertheless we can further say that, in this detachment from the automatism of repetition which would constitute a good personal analysis in the analyst, there is something which ought to go beyond what I would call the particularity of its detour, go a little bit beyond, engage upon the detour, which I would call > specific, upon what Freud envisages, what he articulates when he poses the fundamental repetition of the development of life as conceivable as being only the detour, the derivative of a compact, abyssal drive, which is the one which is called at this level the death drive where there no longer remains anything but this ananke, this necessity for the return to zero, to the inanimate.

A metaphor no doubt, and a metaphor which is only expressed by this sort of extrapolation, before which certain people retreat, from what is brought by our experience, namely the action of the unconscious signifying chain in so far as it imposes its mark on all the manifestations of life in the subject who speaks. But indeed an extrapolation, a metaphor which is not all the same constructed by Freud for absolutely no reason, in any case which permits us to conceive that something may be possible and that effectively there can be some relationship of the analyst - as one of my pupils wrote in our first number, in a beautifully highflown tone - with Hades, with death.

whether he plays or not with death (la mort) in any case - I wrote somewhere else that, in this game of analysis which is certainly not analysable uniquely in terms of a game for two - the analyst plays with a dummy (un mort) and there, we rediscover this trait of the common exigency that there must be something capable of playing dead (jouer le mort) in this small other which is in him.

(7) In the position of the game of bridge, the S, which he is has opposite him his own small other, that with which he is in this specular relationship with himself in so far as he is, constituted as Ego. If we put here the designated place of this Other who speaks, the one he is going to hear, the patient, we see that this patient in so far as he is represented by the barred subject, by the subject qua unknown to himself, is going

$$\begin{array}{ccc}
 & 0 - i(o_1) & \\
 i(o) & & S - 0 \\
 & \S & \end{array}$$

to be found to have here the image place of his own little o - let us call the whole thing "the image of little o two", and is going to have here the image of the big Other, the place, the position of the big Other in so far as it is the analyst who occupies it. That is to say that the patient, the analysand has, for his part, a partner. And there is no need for you to be astonished at finding conjoined at the same place the analysand's own Ego and this Other; he must find his truth which is the big Other of the analyst.

The paradox of the analytic bridge game, is this abnegation which brings it about that, contrary to what happens in a normal game of bridge, the analyst must help the subject to find out what is in his partner's hand. And to conduct this game of "the loser wins" at bridge the analyst, for his part, does not require, should not in principle complicate his life with a partner. And this is why it is said that the i(o) of the analyst should behave like a dead person. That means that the analyst should always know what has been dealt there.

But behold, this kind of solution to the problem whose relative simplicity you are able to appreciate, at the level of commonplace, exoteric explanation, for those outside because it is simply a way of talking about what everyone believes - someone who might have dropped in here for the first time might find in it all sorts of reasons for satisfaction when all it said and done and go back to sleep, namely in the fact that he had always heard it said that the analyst is a superior being for example.... - unfortunately this does not fit together! This does not fit together and the testimony for that is given to us by the analysts themselves. Not simply in the form of a tearful lamentation: "We are never equal to our function". Thank God, even though this sort of declaration still exists we have been spared it for a certain time, it is a fact, a fact for which I am not responsible here, which I have only to register.

(8) The fact is that for some time what is effectively admitted in analytic practice, I am speaking about the best circles, I am alluding specifically for example to the Kleinian circle, I mean to what Melanie Klein has written on this subject, to what Paula Heimann wrote in an article, "On counter-transference", and which you will easily find.... it is not in one or other article that you have to search for it, today everyone considers as accepted, as admitted what I am going to say (it is more or less frankly articulated and above all people understand more or less well what is being articulated, that is the only thing, but it is admitted), it is that the analyst must take into account, in his investigation and in his manoeuvring, not of the feelings that he inspires but that he experiences in analysis.

Counter-transference is no longer considered in our day as being in its essence an imperfection, which does not mean that it cannot be of course, but if it does not remain an imperfection, it nevertheless remains something which makes it deserve the name counter-transference. You are going to see it again, in so far as it is apparently of the same nature as the other aspect of transference which last time I opposed to transference conceived of as automatism of repetition, namely that on which I intended to centre the question, the transference in so far as it is called positive or negative, in so far as everyone understands it as the feelings experienced by the analysand with respect to the analyst.

Well the counter-transference that is in question, which it is admitted we must take into account - if there remains disagreement about what we should make of it and you are going to see at what level - it is indeed counter-transference that is in question, namely feelings experienced by the analyst in analysis, determined at every instant by his relations to the analysand.

We are told.... I am choosing a reference almost at random but it is a good article all the same (one never chooses something completely at random), among all those that I have read, there is probably a reason why I feel inclined to communicate to you the title of this one; this is called precisely - it is in short the subject that we are treating today - "Normal counter-transference and some of its deviations" by Roger Money-Kyrle, who obviously belongs to the Kleinian circle and is linked to Melanie Klein through the intermediary of Paula Heimann.

You will see in it that the state of dissatisfaction, the state of preoccupation that Paula Heimann writes about is even a presentiment In her article she gives an account of the fact that she found herself confronted with something which it is not necessary to be an old analyst in order to experience, confronted with a situation which is too frequent namely that the analyst may be confronted in the first phases of an analysis with a patient who precipitates himself in a fashion manifestly determined by the analysis itself, even if he himself is not aware of it, into premature decisions, into a long-term liaison, even a marriage. She knows that this is something to analyse, to interpret, to counter in a certain measure. She notes at that moment a quite uncomfortable feeling that she experiences in this particular case. She notes it as something which, all by (9) itself, is the sign that she is right to be particularly worried about it. She shows how it is precisely what allows her to better understand, to go further.

But there are many other feelings which may arise and the article for example of which I am speaking really takes into account feelings of depression, of a general fall-off in interest for things, of disaffection, of disaffection that the analyst may even experience with respect to everything that he touches.

It is a nice article to read because the analyst does not simply describe for us what results from the beyond of a particular session in which it seems to him that he had not been able to respond sufficiently to what himself calls a demanding patient. It is not because you see here an echo of la demande that you can consider that you understand the accent in English. Demanding, is more, it is a pressing exigency. And he notes in this connection the role of the analytic superego in a fashion which undoubtedly, if you read this article, will appear to you to present indeed some gap, I mean would not really find its true import unless you refer to what is given you in the graph and in so far as the graph (in so far as you introduce the dotted lines) is presented in such a way that, on the lower line, it is beyond the locus of the Other that the dotted line represents the Superego for you.

I am putting in the rest of the graph for you so that you may be able to take into account in this connection how it can be of use to you. It is to understand that it is not always because of this when all is said and done opaque element (with this severity of the superego) that one or other demand may produce these depressive effects or even worse in the analyst; it is precisely in the measure that there continuity between the demand of the other and the structure that is called the superego. You should understand that it is when the demand of the subject has been introjected, has passed as an articulated demand into the one who is its recipient, in such a fashion that it represents his own demand in an inverted form (for example, when a demand for love coming from the mother happens to encounter in the who has to respond his own demand for love going to the mother) that we find the strongest effects which are called hypersevere effects of the superego.

I am only indicating it to you here because this is not where our path goes, it is a lateral remark. What is important, is that an analyst who appears to be someone particularly agile and gifted in recognising his own experience goes so far as to note, to present to us as an example something which worked, and in a fashion which appeared to him to merit a communication not as a blunder nor as an accidental effect more or less well corrected, but as a procedure that can be integrated into the doctrine of analytic operations.

He says that he himself had noted the feeling that he had located as being related to the difficulties that the analysis of one of his patients presented to him; he says that he himself had, and during a period connoted by what is picturesquely permitted in (10) English life, had himself during his weekend been able to note after a rather agitated period concerned with the problematic, unsatisfying things that had been left to him from what he had been able to do that week with his patient.... he had undergone without at all having seen the link, himself, a kind of bout of exhaustion - let us call things by their name - which made him during the second half of his weekend find himself in a state which he cannot recognise except by formulating it himself in the same terms as his patient had done as a state of disgust at the limits of depersonalisation, from which there had begun the whole dialectic of the week - and to which precisely (it was moreover accompanied by a dream from which the analyst had drawn clarification in order to respond to him) he had the feeling of not having given the right response, rightly or wrongly, but in any case based on the fact that his response had really made the patient fume, and that from that moment on he had become extremely nasty with him.

And behold, he, the analyst, discovers himself recognising that when all said and done what he is experiencing, is exactly what at the beginning the patient described to him about one of his states. It was not, for the patient himself, very new, nor new for the analyst to perceive that the patient could be subject to these phases at the limit of depression with slight paranoid effects.

Here is what is reported to us and what the analyst in question (here again with a whole circle, his own, the one which I am calling on this occasion a Kleinian circle) right away conceives as representing the effect of the bad object projected into the analyst in so far as the subject, whether in analysis or not, is liable to project it into the other. It does not seem to be a problem in a certain analytic field - with respect to which we must after all admit that there must all the same be a reason why one slips so easily into the degree of quasi-magical belief that this supposes - that this bad projected object is to be understood as having quite naturally its effect, at least in the case of the person who is coupled with the subject in such a close, such a consistent relationship as the one which is created by an analysis which has already gone on for some time. As having all its effect in what measure? The article also tells you, in the measure that this effect proceeds from an incomprehension on the part of the analyst, of the patient. The effect in question is presented to us as the possible utilisation of deviations from the normal counter-transference. Because as the beginning of the article articulates it, this normal counter-transference is already produced by the to-and-fro rhythm of the introjection of the discourse of the analysand and of something which admits as normal the possible projection - you can see how far he goes - onto the analysand of something which is produced as an imaginary effect in response to this introjection of his discourse.

This counter-transference effect is said to be normal in so far as the introjected demand is perfectly understood. The analyst has no trouble locating himself in what is then produced in such a clear fashion in his own introjection; he only sees the consequences of it and he does not even have to make use of it. What is produced is really there at the level of $i(o)$ and completely mastered. And as regards what is produced on the side of the patient, the analyst has no reason to be surprised that it is produced; he is not affected by what the patient projects onto him.

It is in so far as he does not understand that he is affected by it, that it is a deviation from normal counter-transference, that things can reach a stage that he becomes effectively the bearer of this bad object projected into him by his partner. I mean (11) that he experiences in himself the effect of something quite unexpected in which only the reflection carried out elsewhere allowed him, and again perhaps only because the occasion was favourable, to recognise the very state that his patient had described for him.

I repeat, I am not taking responsibility for the explanation in question, I am not rejecting it either. I am putting it provisionally in suspense in order to go a step at a time, in order to lead you to the precise angle that I must lead you to in order to articulate something. I am simply saying that if the analyst does not understand it himself, he nevertheless becomes, according to the remarks of the experienced analyst, effectively the receptacle of the projection that is in question and feels in himself these projections as a foreign object; which evidently puts the analyst in a singular position as refuse dump. Because.... if this happens with a lot of patients like that you see where that may lead to, when one is not in a position to decide with regard to which of them are produced these happenings which present themselves in the description that Money-Kyrle gives of them as disconnected. That may pose some problems.

In any case I am taking the following step. I am taking it with the author who tells us, if we go in this direction which does not date from yesterday or today (already Ferenczi had put in question the point up to which the analyst should share with his patient what he, the analyst, himself was experiencing in reality, in certain cases as a means of giving to the patient access to this reality), nobody in our day dares to go that far and specifically not in the school to which I am alluding. I mean, for example, Paula Heimann will say that the analyst ought to be very severe as regards his log-book, his daily hygiene, to be always to be in a position to analyse what he himself may experience of this order, but it is his own affair with himself, and with the intention of trying to race against time, namely to overcome the delay he may have undergone in the comprehension, the understanding of his patient.

Money-Kyrle, without being Ferenczi nor as reserved as that, goes further on this particular point of the identity of the state experienced by him with the one his patient had brought along to him at the beginning of the week. He is all the same going, on the particular point, to communicate it to him and to note, this is the object of his article - or more exactly of the communication he gave in 1955 at the Geneva Congress which this article reproduces - to note the effect (he does not tell us about the long-term effect but about the immediate effect) on his patient, which is one of obvious jubilation, namely that the patient deduces nothing other than the following: "Well, is that so? I am very glad to hear it because the other day when you gave an interpretation about this state," says the patient - and in effect he had made one which he recognises was a bit wooly, a bit vague - "I thought that what you were saying referred to yourself and not at all to me."

We have here then, if you wish, a full-scale misunderstanding and I would say that we are satisfied with it. At least the author is satisfied with it because he leaves things there, then he tells us, starting from there the analysis restarts and presents him, we can only believe him, with all sorts of possibilities for further interpretations.

(12) The fact that what is presented to us as a deviation of counter-transference is here posed as an instrumental means to be codified which, in such cases, is to strive to retrieve the situation as quickly as possible (at least by the recognition of its effects on the analyst and by means of modified communications proposing to the patient something which, undoubtedly on this occasion, has the character of a certain unveiling of the analytic situation in its totality), to expect from it something like a restart which unknots that which apparently presented itself as an impasse in the analytic situation - I am not in the process of approving the appropriateness of this way of proceeding - simply I am remarking that if something of this order may be produced in this fashion it is certainly not linked to a privileged point .

What I can say, is that in the whole measure that there is a legitimacy in proceeding in this fashion, in any case it is our categories which allow us to understand it. My opinion is that it is not possible to understand it outside the register of what I have highlighted as being the place of o, the partial object, the agalma in the desire relationship in so far as it itself is determined within a larger relationship, that of the exigency for love. It is only here, it is only in this topology that we can understand such a way of proceeding, in a topology which allows us to say that, even if the subject does not know it, by the simple objective supposition of the analytic situation, it is already in the Other that small o, the agalma functions. And what is presented to us on this occasion as normal counter-transference or not, has really no special reason to be qualified as counter-transference, I mean that all that is in question there is an irreducible effect of the transference situation simply by itself.

The fact that there is transference is enough for us to be implicated in this position of being the one who contains the agalma, the fundamental object that is in question in the analysis of the subject as bound, conditioned by this relationship of vacillation of the subject that we characterise as constituting the fundamental phantasy, as establishing the locus in which the subject can fix himself as desire.

It is a legitimate effect of transference. There is no need here for all that to introduce counter-transference as if it were a question of something which was his own personal part, and much more again the faulty part of the analyst. Only I believe that in order to recognise it it is necessary that the analyst should know certain things, it is necessary that he should know in particular that the criterion of his correct position is not that he understands or does not understand. It is not absolutely essential that he should not understand but I would say that up to a certain point this may be preferable to a too great confidence in one's understanding. In other words, he should put in doubt what he understands and tell himself that what he is trying to reach, is precisely that which in principle is what he does not understand. It is in so far certainly as he knows what desire is, but that he does not know what this subject with whom he is embarked on the analytic adventure desires, that he is in a position to have in himself the object of this desire. Because only this explains certain of these effects which are still so particularly frightening, it appears.

I read an article that I will designate more precisely for you the next time, where a gentleman, who nevertheless is very experienced, asks himself what one ought to do when from the first dreams, sometimes before the analysis begins, the (13) analysand is put forward to the analyst himself as an object characterised by love. The reply of the author is a little more reserved than that of another author who for his part says: when things begin like that it is useless to continue further. There are too many relationships to reality.

So, is it even in this way that we should say things when for us, if we allow ourselves to be guided by the categories that we have produced, we can say that the principle of the situation is that the subject is introduced as worthy of interest, worthy of love, as eromenos. It is for him that one is there but that is what one can call the manifest effect. If we admit that the latent effect is linked to his not knowing, to his unknowing, his unknowing is an unknowing of what? Something which is precisely the object of his desire in a latent, I mean objective, structural fashion. This object is already in the Other and it is in so far as things are that way that, whether he knows it or not, virtually, he is constituted as erastes, fulfilling because of this single fact this condition of metaphor, of substitution of the erastes for the eromenos which we have said constitutes by itself the phenomenon of love - and whose inflaming effects it is no surprise for us to see in transference love from the beginnings of analysis. There is no need for all that to see here a contra-indication for analysis.

And it is indeed here that there is posed the question of the desire of the analyst and up to a certain point of his responsibility for, to tell the truth, it is enough to suppose one thing for the situation to be - as the notaries express it in connection with contracts - perfect. It is enough that the analyst, without knowing it, for an instant, places his own partial object, his agalma in the patient with whom he is dealing, it is here indeed that one can speak about a contra-indication. But as you see, nothing less than localizable, nothing less than localizable in the whole measure that the situation of the desire of the analyst is not specified.

And it will be enough for you to read the author I am indicating to you in order to see that of course he is obliged by the necessity of his discourse to pose the question of what interests the analyst. And what does he tell us? That two things are important in the analyst when he is carrying out an analysis, two basic drives. And you are going to see that it is quite strange to see qualified as passive drives the two that I am going to tell you: the reparative, he tells us textually, which goes against the latent destructiveness of each one of us and, on the other hand the parental drive.

Here is how an analyst from a school certainly as advanced, as elaborated as the Kleinian school has formulated the position that an analyst as such must take up. After all I am not going to cover my face nor shout aloud about it. I think that, for those who are familiar with my seminar, you see the scandal of it clearly enough. But after all, it is a scandal in which we participate more or less because we ceaselessly talk as if this were what was in question - even if we know well that we do not know that we should not be the parents of the analysand - we will say in a thinking about the field of psychoses.

And the reparative drive, what does that mean? That means an enormous number of things, that has all sorts of implications of course in all our experience. But perhaps, is it not worth the trouble in this connection to articulate how this reparative ought to be distinguished from the abuses of therapeutic ambition for example? In short, the putting into question not of the absurdity of such a thematic but on the contrary what justifies it. Because of course I credit the author and the whole school (14) that he represents with aiming at something which has effectively its place in the topology. But it must be articulated, said, situated where it is, explained differently.

It is for that reason that the next time I will rapidly summarise what I happen in an apologetic fashion to have done in the interval between these two seminars, before a philosophy group, an exposition of the "Position of desire". It is necessary that once and for all there should be situated the reason why an experienced author can talk about this parental drive, this parental and reparative drive in connection with the analyst and say at the same time something which must on the one hand have a justification, but which, on the other hand urgently requires it.

Seminar 14: Wednesday 15 March 1961

For those who as one might say fall among us today from the moon I give a brief set of reference points. After having tried to pose again before you in more rigorous terms than has been done up to the present what one can call the theory of love, this on the basis of Plato's Symposium, it is within what we succeeded in situating in this commentary that I am beginning to articulate the position of transference in the sense that I announced it this year, namely in what I called above all "its subjective disparity". I mean by that that the position of the two subjects present is not equivalent in any way. And it is for this reason that one can speak, not about situation, but of an analytic pseudo-situation, of "a so-called situation".

Approaching therefore on these last two occasions the question of transference, I did it from the side of the analyst. This is not to say that I am giving to the term counter-transference the sense in which it is currently received of a sort of imperfection of the purification of the analyst in relation to the analysand. Quite the contrary, I intend to say that the counter-transference, namely the necessary implication of the analyst in the transference situation means that in short we should beware of this incorrect term. The existence of counter-transference is a necessary consequence purely and simply of the phenomenon of transference itself if one analyses it correctly.

I introduced this problem by the current fact in analytic practice that it is accepted in a rather widespread fashion that what we may call a certain number of affects, in so far as the analyst is touched by them in analysis, constitute if not a normal at least a normative mode of mapping out the analytic situation. And even I am saying, not alone of the analyst's investigation in the analytic situation, but even a possible element of his intervention by the communication that he may eventually make of it to the analysand.

And, I repeat, I am not lending my authority to the legitimacy of this method. I note that it was able to be introduced and promoted, that it was admitted, accepted among a very large field of the analytic community and that this just by itself is sufficiently indicative of our path, for the moment, which is to analyse how the theoreticians who understand in this way the usage of counter-transference legitimate it. They legitimate it in so far as they link it to moments of incomprehension on the part of the analyst, as if this incomprehension in itself were the criterion, the dividing point, the aspect on which something (2) is defined which obliges the analyst to pass to a different mode of communication, to a different instrument in his way of locating himself in what is in question, namely the analysis of the subject.

It is therefore around this term comprehension that there is going to pivot what I intend to show you today in order to allow there to be circumscribed more closely what one may call, according to our terms, the relationship of the demand of the subject to his desire, it being understood that we have put at the origin the way in which we have shown that the return is necessary, it is to put in the foreground that what is in question in analysis is nothing other than the bringing to light of the manifestation of the desire of the subject.

Where is understanding when we understand? When we think we understand, what does that mean? I affirm that this means in its most certain form, I would say in its primary form, that the understanding of anything at all that the subject articulates before us is something that we can define in this way at the level of consciousness, that in short we know what to answer to what the other demands. It is in the measure that we believe we can answer the demand that we have the feeling of understanding.

Nevertheless we know a little bit more about the demand than this immediate approach, precisely from the fact that we know that the demand is not explicit, that it is even much more than implicit, that it is hidden for the subject, that it needs to be interpreted. And it is here there lies the ambiguity in so far as we who will interpret it answer the unconscious demand on the plane of a discourse which for us is a conscious discourse. It is here indeed there is the bias, the trap so that always we tend to slide towards this supposition, this capture that our answer. . . . The subject in a way should be content because we bring to light by our answer something with which he should be satisfied. We know that it is here that there is always produced nevertheless some resistance.

It is from the situation of this resistance, from the fashion in which we can qualify the agencies to which we have to refer it, that there have flowed all the stages, all the steps of the analytic theory of the subject - namely the different agencies with which we have to deal in him.

Nevertheless is it not possible to go to a more radical point, without of course denying the part that these different agencies have in resistance, to see, to grasp that the difficulty of the relationships of the demand of the subject to the answer which is given him is situated further on, is situated at an altogether original point. To this point, I tried to bring you by showing you what there results in the subject who speaks, from the fact, as I thus expressed myself, that his needs must pass through the defiles of the demand - that from this very fact, at this altogether original point, there results precisely this something in which there is founded the fact that everything which is natural tendency, in the subject who speaks, has to situate itself in a beyond and in a hither of demand. In a beyond it is the demand for love, in a hither it is what we call desire, with what characterises it as condition, as what we call its absolute condition in the specificity of the object which concerns it, little o, this partial object, (this something which I tried to show you as being included from the beginning in this fundamental text about the theory of love, this text of the Symposium as agalma) in so far as I also identified it to the partial object of analytic theory.

(3) It is this that today, by briefly going through again what is most original in analytic theory, the Triebe, "the drives and their vicissitudes", I intend to make you put your finger on, before we are able to deduce from it what flows from it as regards what is important to us, namely the point on which I left you the last time of the drive involved in the position of the analyst. You remember that it is on this problematic point that I left you in so far as an author, the one precisely who expresses himself on the subject of counter-transference, designates in what he was calling the parental drive, this need to be a parent, or the reparative drive, this need to go against the supposedly natural destructiveness in every subject qua analysable analysand.

You have immediately grasped the boldness, the daring, the paradox of advancing things like that because moreover it is enough to dwell on it for a moment to perceive, as regards this parental drive, if it is indeed what should be present in the analytic situation, that how then would we dare even to speak about the transference situation, if it is really a parent that the subject in analysis is faced with? What is more legitimate than that he should fall again in this situation into the same position that he had throughout his whole formation with respect to subjects around whom there were constituted for him the fundamental passive situations which constitute in the signifying chain the automatisms of repetition. In other words, how can we not perceive that we have here a direct contradiction, that we are going straight onto the reef which allows us to affirm it? Who will contradict us by saying that the transference situation, as it is established in analysis, is discordant with the reality of this situation - which some people imprudently express as being such a simple situation, that of the situation in analysis, in the hie et nunc of the relationship to the doctor? How can we not see that if the doctor is armed here with the parental drive, however elaborated we may suppose it to be in terms of an educative position, there will be absolutely nothing which distances the normal response of the subject to this situation from everything that can be enounced in it as the repetition of a past situation.

It must indeed be said that there is no means of even articulating the analytic situation without at least posing somewhere the contrary exigency.

And for example in chapter III of Beyond the pleasure principle, when effectively Freud, taking up again the articulation that we are dealing with in analysis, discriminates between remembering and the reproduction of the automatism of repetition, Wiederholungszwang, in so far as he considers it as a semi-failure of the remembering aims of analysis, as a necessary failure going so far as to attribute to the structure of the ego (in so far as he sees the necessity at this stage of his elaboration of establishing its agency as being in great part unconscious) to attribute and to assign, not the whole (because of course the whole article is written to show that there is a margin) but the most important part of the function of repetition, to the ego's defence against the repressed memory, considered as the true term, the final term, even though perhaps at this moment considered as impossible, of the analytic operation.

It is therefore by following the path of something which is the resistance to this final aim, the resistance situated in the unconscious function of the ego, that Freud tells us that we must pass this way that "the physician cannot as a rule spare his patient this phase of the treatment. He must get him to re-experience some portion of his forgotten life, but must see to (4) it, on the other hand, that there is maintained some degree von Überlegenheit, of aloofness, so that it can be recognised, in spite of everything, that what appears to be reality, die auscheinende Realität, is in fact only a reflection of a forgotten past". God knows the abuses of interpretation to which this highlighting of this Überlegenheit has lent itself. It is around this that the whole theory of alliance with what is called the healthy part of the ego was able to be constructed. There is nevertheless in such a passage nothing of the kind and I cannot sufficiently underline what must have appeared to you in passing, it is in a way the neutral character, ne-uter, neither on one side or the other, of this Überlegenheit. Where is this aloofness? Is it on the side of the doctor who, let us hope, keeps his wits about him? Is this what is to be understood on this occasion or is it something on the side of the patient?

A curious thing, in the French translation - which, with respect to others, is as bad as those which have been made under different other patronages - the thing is translated: et doit seulement veiller a ce que le malade conserve un certain degre de sereine superiority - there is nothing like this in the text - qui lui permette de constater, malgre tout, que la realite de ce qu'il reproduit n'est qu'apparente. So that indeed must we not situate the question of the situation of this Überlegenheit which is no doubt required, which we are dealing with, in a fashion which, I believe, can be infinitely more precise than everything that is elaborated, in these so-called comparisons by the current aberration of what is being repeated in the treatment with a situation which would be presented as perfectly known.

Let us begin then from the examination of the phases and the demand, from the exigencies of the subject as we approach them in our interpretations, and let us simply begin in accordance with this chronology, in accordance with this diachrony called the phases of the libido, with the most simple demand, the one to which we refer so frequently, let us say that it is a question of an oral demand. What is an oral demand? It is the demand to be fed which is addressed to whom, to what? It is addressed to this Other who hears and who, at this primary level of the enunciating of the demand, can really be designated as what we call the locus of the Other, the Other.... on, the Autron I would (5) say in order to make our designations rhyme with the familiar designations of physics. Here then to this abstract, impersonal Autron there is addressed by the subject, more or less without his knowing it, this demand to be fed.

As we have said, every demand, from the fact that it is word, tends to structure itself in the fact that it summons from the Other its inverse response, that it evokes because of its structure its own form transposed according to a certain inversion. To the demand to be fed there responds, because of the signifying structure, at the locus of the Other, in a fashion that one may say to be logically contemporaneous with this demand, at the level of the Autron, the demand to allow oneself to be fed (de se laisser nourrir).

And we know well, in experience this is not the refined elaboration of a fictitious dialogue. We know well that this is what is in question between the child and the mother every time there breaks out in this relationship the slightest conflict in what seems to be constructed to meet, to fit together in a strictly complementary fashion. What in appearance better responds to the demand to be fed than that of allowing oneself to be fed? We know nevertheless that it is in this very mode of confrontation of two the demands that the lies this tiny gap, this beance, this slit in which there can insinuate itself, in which there is normally insinuated the discordance, the preformed failure of this meeting consisting in the very fact that precisely it is not the meeting of tendencies but the meeting of demands. It is into this meeting of the demand to be fed and of the other demand to allow oneself to be fed that there slips the fact, manifested at the first conflict breaking out in the feeding relationship, that a desire overflows this demand and that it cannot be satisfied without this desire being extinguished there. It is in order that this desire which overflows this demand should not be extinguished that even the subject who is hungry (from the fact that to his demand to be fed there responds the demand to allow oneself to be fed) does not allow himself to be fed, refuses in a way to disappear as desire by being satisfied as demand because the extinction or the crushing of the demand in satisfaction cannot happen without killing desire. It is from here that there emerged these discordances of which the most vivid is that of the refusal to allow oneself to feed, of the anorexia more or less correctly described as nervosa (mentale).

We find here this situation which I cannot better express than by playing on the equivocation of the sonorities of French phonematics, the fact is that one cannot avow the following to the most primordial Other: "tu es le desir", you are the desire", without at the same time saying to her: "tuer le desir", kill the desire" without conceding to her that she kills the desire, without abandoning to her desire as such. And the first ambivalence proper to every demand is that in every demand there is also implied that the subject does not want it to be satisfied, aims in itself at the safeguarding of desire, testifies to the blind presence of the unnamed, blind desire.

What is this desire? We know it in the most classical and most original fashion, it is in so far as the oral demand has another meaning than that of the satisfaction of hunger that it is a sexual demand, that it is fundamentally, Freud tells us since the Three essays on the theory of sexuality, cannibalistic and that cannibalism has a sexual sense (he reminds us that here is what (6) is masked in the first Freudian formulation) that to feed himself is for man linked to the goodwill of the other. Linked to this fact by a polar relationship, there exists also this term that it is not only from the bread of her goodwill that the primitive subject has to feed himself, but well and truly from the body of the one who feeds him. Because things must be called by their name, what we call sexual relationship, is that by which the relationship to the other leads on to a union of bodies. And the most radical union is that of the original absorption to which there points, there is aimed the horizon of cannibalism and which characterises the oral phase for what it is in analytic theory.

Let us carefully observe here what is in question. I took things from the most difficult end by beginning at the origin, even though it is always retroactively, by going backwards that we ought to discover how things are constructed in real development.

There is a theory of libido against which as you know I rebel even though it is one put forward by one of our friends, Alexander, the theory of libido as a surplus of energy which manifests itself in the living being when the satisfaction of needs linked to preservation has been obtained. It is very convenient but it is false because sexual libido is not that. Sexual libido is indeed in effect a surplus but it is this surplus which renders vain any satisfaction of need there where it is placed and, if necessary - it must be said - refuses this satisfaction to preserve the function of desire.

And moreover all of this is only something evident which is everywhere confirmed, as you will see by going back and starting again from the demand to be fed; as you will immediately put your finger on it in the fact that from the simple fact that the tendency of this mouth which is hungry, through this same mouth expressing a signifying chain.... well then, it is in this way that there enters into it the possibility of designating the food that it desires. What food? The first thing which results from it, is that this mouth can say: "Not that!" Negation, the pushing aside, the "I like that and not anything else" of desire already enters there where there explodes the specificity of the dimension of desire. Hence the extreme prudence that we should have concerning our interventions, our interpretations, at the level of this oral register. Because as I said, this demand is formed at the same point, at the level of the same organ where the tendency emerges. And it is indeed here that there lies the confusion, the possibility of producing all sorts of equivocations by responding to him. Of course, from the fact that he is responded to there results all the same the preservation of this field of the word and the possibility therefore of always discovering in it the place of desire - but also the possibility of all the suggestions of those who try to impose on the subject that since his need is satisfied he should be content with it, from which there results compensated frustration and the end of analytic intervention.

I want to go further and today I really have, as you are going to see, my reasons for doing so. I want to pass on to what is called the stage of anal libido. Because moreover it is here that I believe I can encounter, get to and refute a certain (7) number of confusions which are introduced in the most common fashion in analytic interpretation.

By tackling this term by way of what is the demand at this anal stage, you all have I think enough experience for me not to illustrate any more what I would call the demand to retain excrement, founding no doubt something which is a desire to expel. But here it is not so simple because also this expulsion is also required by the educating parent at a certain moment. Here it is demanded of the subject to give something which would satisfy the expectation of the educator, the maternal one on this occasion.

The elaboration which results from the complexity of the demand is worth our while dwelling on because it is essential. Observe that here is no longer a question of the simple relationship of a need with the liaison to its demanded form but of the sexual surplus. It is something else, it is a disciplining of need that is in question and sexualisation is only produced in the movement of return to need which, as I might say legitimates this need as gift to the mother who is waiting for the child to satisfy his functions which are going to make emerge, make appear something which is worthy of general approbation. Moreover this gift-character of excrement is well known from experience and was spotted from the beginning of analytic experience. To such an extent is an object experienced here in this register that the child, in the excess of his occasional outbursts uses it, one might say, naturally, as a means of expression. The excremental gift forms part of the most antique thematic of analysis.

I would like in this connection to give in a way its final term to this extermination - for which I have always been striving - to the myth of oblativity by showing you here what it really refers to. Because from the moment that you have once seen it, you will no longer be able to recognise otherwise this field of anal dialectic which is the real field of oblativity.

For a long time in different forms I have tried to introduce you to this mapping out and specifically by having always pointed out to you that the very term oblativity is an obsessional phantasy. "Everything for the other" says the obsessional and this indeed is what he does. Because the obsessional being in the perpetual vertigo of the destruction of the Other, can never do enough to allow the other to maintain himself in existence. But here we see its root, the anal stage is characterised by the fact that the subject satisfies a need uniquely for the satisfaction of an other. He has been taught to retain this need uniquely in order that it should be founded, established as the occasion of the satisfaction of the other who is the educator. The satisfaction of babyhood of which wiping the bottom forms a part is first of all that o_f the other.

And it is properly in so far as something that the subject has is demanded from him as a gift, that one can say that oblativity is linked to the sphere of relationships at the anal stage. And note the consequence of this, which is that here the margin of the place which remains to the subject as such, in other words desire comes to be symbolised in this situation by what is carried away in the operation: desire literally goes down the toilet. The symbolisation of the subject as that which goes into the pot or into the hole on occasion is properly what we encounter in experience as most profoundly linked to the position of anal desire. It is indeed what makes of it both the and also in many cases the avoidance, I mean that we do not always succeed in bringing the insight of the patient to this (8) term. Nevertheless you can assure yourselves each time, in so far as the anal stage is involved, that you would be mistaken not to mistrust the relevance of your analysis if you have not encountered this term.

For that matter moreover, I assure you that from the moment that you have touched on what must be called this precise, neuralgic point, which is just as valuable because of the importance that it has in experience as all the remarks about the good or bad primitive oral objects, as long as you have not located at this point the fundamental, deep-seated relationship of the subject as desire with the most disagreeable object, you will not have taken any great step in the analysis of the conditions of desire. And nevertheless you cannot deny that this reminder is given at every instant in the analytic tradition.

I think that you would not have been able to remain deaf to it for so long except for the fact that things have not been highlighted in their fundamental topology as I am trying to do it for you here.

But then, you will say to me, what about the sexual here and the famous sadistic drive that is conjugated - with the help of a hyphen - to the term anal as if that went simply without saying? It is quite clear that here some effort is necessary of what we cannot call understanding except in so far as it is a question of understanding at the limit. The sexual can only enter in here in a violent fashion. This indeed is what happens here in effect because moreover it is a sadistic violence that is in question. This still preserves in itself more than one enigma and it would be well for us to dwell on it.

It is precisely in the measure that the other here as such, fully takes over dominance in the anal relationship that the sexual is going to manifest itself in the register which is proper to this stage. We can approach it, we can glimpse it by recalling its antecedent qualified as oral-sadistic (a reminder that in short life fundamentally is devouring assimilation as such) and moreover that this theme of devouring was what was situated at the preceding stage in the margin of desire, this presence of the open maw of life is moreover what is going to appear to you here as a sort of reflection, of phantasy, the fact that when the other is posed as the second term, he must appear as an existence offered up to this gap. Will we go so far as to say that suffering is implied in it? It is a very particular suffering. To evoke a sort of fundamental schema which, I believe, is the one which will best give you the structure of the sado-masochistic phantasy as such, I would say that it is a suffering expected by the other, that it is this suspension of the imaginary other as such above the gulf of suffering which forms the point, the axis of sado-masochistic eroticisation as such, that it is in this relationship that what is no longer the sexual pole but what is going to be the sexual partner is established at the level of the anal stage and that therefore, we can say that it is already a sort of reappearance of the sexual.

What in the anal stage is constituted as sadistic or sado-masochistic structure is, starting from a point of maximum eclipse of the sexual, from a point of pure anal oblativity, the re-ascent towards that which is going to be realised at the genital stage. The preparation of the genital, of human eros, of desire emitted in normal fullness (in order that it may be able to situate itself not as tendency, need, not as pure and simple copulation but as desire) takes its beginnings, finds its starting point, finds its point of reemergence in relationship to the other as undergoing the expectation of this suspended threat, of this virtual attack which founds, which characterises, which (9) justifies for us what is called the sadistic theory of sexuality whose primitive character we know in the great majority of individual cases.

What is more, it is in this situational feature that there is founded the fact that in the origin of this sexualisation of the other that we are dealing with, he must as such be delivered to a third in order to be constituted in this first mode of his apperception as sexual and it is here there lies the origin of this ambiguity, which we know, which ensures that the sexual as such remains, in the original experience which the most recent theoreticians of psychoanalysis were the discoverers of, indeterminate between this third and this other. In the first form of libidinal perception of the other, at the level of this point of re-ascent from a certain punctiforme eclipse of the libido as such, the subject does not know what he most desires, from this other or from the third who intervenes, and this is essential for the whole structure of sado-masochistic phantasies.

Because the one who constructs this phantasy, let us not forget it, if we have given here a correct analysis of the anal stage, this subject-witness to this pivotal point of the anal stage is indeed what he is, I have just said it: he is shit! And what is more he is demand, he is shit which only demands to be eliminated. This is the true foundation of a whole radical structure that you will find, especially in the phantasies, in the fundamental phantasy of the obsessional in so far as he devalues himself, in so far as he puts outside himself the whole game of the erotic dialectic, that he pretends, as someone has said, to be its organiser. It is on the foundation of his own elimination that he grounds the whole of this phantasy. And things here are rooted in something which, once they are recognised, allow you to elucidate quite commonplace points.

Because if things are really fixed at this point of the identification of the subject to the excremental little o, what are we going to see? Let us not forget that here it is no longer to the organ itself involved in the dramatic knot of need to demand that there is entrusted, at least in principle, the task of articulating this demand. In other words, except in the paintings of Jerome Bosch, one does not speak with one's behind. And nevertheless, we have curious phenomena of cutting, followed by explosions of something which make us glimpse the symbolic function of the excremental ribbon in the very articulation of the word.

Once upon a time, it is a very long time ago and I think there is nobody here who would remember it, there was a sort of little personage.... - there have always been little significant personages in infantile mythology which in reality is of parental origin, in our own day people talk a lot about Pinocchio - at a time which I am old enough to remember there existed Bout de Zan. The phenomenology of the child as precious excremental object is entirely in this designation where the child is identified with the sweetish substance of what is called liquorice, glukurrhiza "the sweet root", which it appears is its Greek origin.

And no doubt it is not in vain that it should be in connection with this word liquorice that we are able to find one of the really - it must be admitted - sugary examples, of the perfect ambiguity of signifying transcriptions. Allow me this little parenthesis. This pearl which I found for your use along my path, this did not happen yesterday, I have kept this for you for a long time but because I meet it in connection with Bout de Zan I am going to give it to you; liquorice (reglisse) then, we are told, is originally glukurrhiza. Of course, this does not come directly from the Greek, but when the Latins heard that, they made of it liquiritia by making use of liqueur whence, in old French, this became licorice, then ricolice by metathesis. Ricolice met up with regle, regula is thus what gives us (10) réglisse. You must admit this encounter of licorice with la regie is really superb. But this is not all, because the conscious etymology at which all of this culminated, on which the last generations finally came to rest indeed, is that réglisse should be written reygalisse, because réglisse is made from a sweet root which is only found in Galicia, the rai [radix] of Galicia, here is what we get back to after having started - and there is no mistake about it - from the Greek root.

I think that this little demonstration of signifying ambiguities will have convinced you that we are on a solid ground in giving all its importance to it.

When all is said and done, as we have seen, we should more than elsewhere be reserved at the anal level as regards the understanding of the other, precisely because any formulation of his demand implicates Jiim so profoundly that we should look at it twice before going to meet it. And what am I telling you there, if not something which rejoins what you all know, at least those of you who have done a little bit of therapeutic work, namely that with obsessionals you must not give them the least bit of encouragement, of déculpabilisation indeed even of interpretative commentary which goes a little bit too far because then you have to go much further and that, what you would find yourself coming to and conceding to your own great disadvantage, is precisely to this mechanism through which he wants to make you eat, as I might say, his own being as a shit. You are well taught by experience that this is not a process in which you will be of any use to him, quite the contrary.

It is elsewhere that in placing symbolic introjection for oneself in so far as it has to restore the place of desire in him and moreover because - to anticipate what is going to be the next stage - what the neurotic most usually wants to be is the phallus, it is certainly to shortcircuit inappropriately the satisfactions to be given to him to offer him this phallic communion against which as you know that, in my seminar on Desire and its interpretation, I already brought forward the most precise objections. I mean that the phallic object as imaginary object cannot in any case lend itself to revealing in a complete fashion the fundamental phantasy. To the demand of the neurotic, it can only in fact respond by something which we can call in general an obliteration, in other words a way which is offered to him of forgetting a certain number of the most essential principles which played a part in the accidents of his access to the field of desire.

In order to mark a pause in our journey and what we have put forward today we are saying the following, that if the neurotic is unconscious that is to say repressed desire, it is above all in the measure that his desire undergoes the eclipse of a counter-demand. This locus of the counter-demand is properly speaking the same as the one where there is placed, where there is built up subsequently everything that from the outside may be added on as a supplement to the construction of the super-ego. A certain fashion of satisfying this counter-demand every premature mode of interpretation in so far as it understands too quickly, in so far as it does not perceive that what is most important to understand in the demand of the analysand is what is beyond this demand - it is the incomprehensible margin which is that of desire - it is in this measure that an analysis stops prematurely and in a word, fails.

(11) Of course the trap is that in interpreting you give the subject something to feed himself on, the word even the book which is behind it, and that the word remains all the same the locus of desire, even if you give it in such a way that this locus is not recognisable, I mean that if this locus remains, for the desire of the subject, uninhabitable.

To respond to the demand for food, to the frustrated demand in a nourishing signifier is something which leaves elided the following, that beyond any food of the word, what the subject really needs is what it signifies metonymically, it is that which is not at any point of this word and therefore that each time you introduce - no doubt you are obliged to do it - the metaphor, you remain on the same path which gives consistency to the symptom, no doubt a more simplified symptom but still a symptom, in any case with respect to the desire that it is a question of separating out.

If the subject is in this singular relationship to the object of desire, it is because he himself was first of all an object of desire which was incarnated. The word as locus of desire, is this Poros in whom there is every resource. And desire - Socrates originally taught you to articulate it - is above all lack of resource, aporia. This absolute aporia approaches the sleeping word and becomes pregnant with its object. What does that mean, if not that the object was there and that it was what demanded to come to light.

The Platonic metaphor of metempsychosis, of the wandering soul which hesitates before knowing where it is going to dwell, finds its support, its truth and its substance in this object of desire which is there before its birth. And Socrates, without knowing it, when he praises, epainei, eulogises Agathon, does what he wants to do, to bring back Alcibiades to his soul by bringing to light this object which is the object of his desire, this object which is the goal and end for each one, limited no doubt because the "all" is beyond, cannot be conceived of except as beyond this end of each.

We are again going to wander, I feel inclined to say, through the labyrinth of the position of desire. A certain returning to, a certain labouring of the subject, a certain Durcharbeitung, as they say, appears necessary to me - I already indicated this the last time and indicated why - for an exact positioning of the function of transference.

This is why I will come back today to underline the meaning of what I told you the last time by bringing you back to the examination of what are called the phases of the migration of the libido in the erogenous zones. It is very important to see the measure in which the naturalist view implied in this definition is resolved, is articulated in our way of enunciating it in so far as it is centred on the relationship of demand and of desire.

From the beginning of this journey I have stressed that desire preserves, maintains its place in the margin of demand as such; that it is this margin of demand which constitutes its locus; that, to highlight what I mean here, it is in a beyond and a hither in this double hollow which is already delineated once the cry of hunger passes to the stage of being articulated; that at the other extreme we see that the object which is called the nipple in English, the tip of the breast, the mamelon, takes on at the term of human eroticism its value as agalma, as marvel, as precious object becoming the support of this pleasurable sensation, of this pleasure of a nibbling in which there is perpetuated what we can truly call a sublimated voracity in so far as it takes this Lust, this pleasure and moreover these Lüste, these desires (you know the equivocation that the German term preserves in itself which is expressed in this sliding of signification produced by the passage from the singular to the plural) therefore this oral object takes its pleasure and its desires, its covetousness, from elsewhere.

This is why, by an inversion of the usage of the term sublimation, I have the right to say that here we see this deviation as regards the goal in the inverse direction to the object of a need. In effect, it is not from primitive hunger that the erotic value of this privileged object here takes its substance, the eros which dwells in it comes nachtraglich, by retroaction and only in a deferred manner, and it is in the oral demand that the place of this desire has been hollowed out.

 (2) If the demand with the beyond of love that it projects did not exist, there would not be this place hither, of desire, which constitutes itself around a privileged object. The oral phase of sexual libido requires this place hollowed out by demand.

It is important to see whether the fact of presenting things in this way does not involve some specification which one could brand as being too partial. Should we not take literally what Freud presents to us in one or other of his enunciations as the pure and simple migration of an organic, mucous erogeneity as I might call it; and moreover could one not say that I am neglecting natural facts, namely for example instinctual, devouring motions which we find in nature linked to the sexual cycle (cats eating their young); and moreover the great phantastical figure of the praying mantis which haunts the analytical amphitheatre is presented there as a mother-image, as a matrix of the function attributed to what is so boldly, perhaps after all so inappropriately, called the castrating mother.

Yes, of course, I myself in my analytic initiation was happy to take on the support of this image, so richly echoing for us the natural domain, which is presented for us in the unconscious phenomenon. To meet this objection you can suggest to me the necessity of some correction in the theoretical line - I believe I can satisfy you as well as myself.

I dwelt for a moment on what this image represents and asked myself in a certain fashion what in effect a simple glance thrown on the diversity of animal ethology shows us, namely the luxuriant richness of perversions. Someone well-known, my friend Henri Ey, has looked carefully at this subject of animal perversions which go further after all than anything that human imagination has been able to invent: I believe that he even devoted an edition of L'evolution psychiatrique to it. Taking things in this register, do we not see ourselves brought back to the Aristotelian point of view of a sort of field outside the human field as the basis of perverse desires? This is where I would stop you for a moment by asking you to consider what we are doing when we dwell on this phantasy of natural perversion.

I am not overlooking that in asking you to follow me onto this terrain how fastidious, speculative such a reflection may appear to you but I believe that it is necessary in order to decant what is both founded and unfounded in this reference. And moreover through this we are going - you are going to see it right away - to find ourselves rejoining what I designate as fundamental in subjectivication, as the essential moment in the whole establishment of the dialectic of desire.

To subjectivise the praying mantis on this occasion, is to suppose for it, which is not excessive, a sexual jouissance. And after all we do not know anything about it, the praying mantis is perhaps, as Descartes did not hesitate to say, a pure and simple machine - a machine, in his language, which precisely supposes the elimination of all subjectivity. We have no need, for our part, to limit ourselves to these minimal positions, we grant it this jouissance..... this jouissance, this is the next stop, is it a jouissance of something in so far as it destroys it? Because it is only starting from there that it can indicate for us the intentions of nature.

(3) In order to highlight immediately what is essential, in order that it should be for us some sort of model of what is in question, namely oral cannibalism, or primordial eroticism, I designate this right away, it is necessary properly speaking that we should imagine here this jouissance correlative to the decapitation of the partner which it is supposed in some degree to recognise as such. I do not disdain this because in truth it is animal ethology which for us is the major reference for maintaining this dimension of knowing that all the progress of our knowledge nevertheless renders for us, in the human world, so vascillating as to be identified properly speaking to the dimension of miscognition, of Verkennung as Freud says; a simple remark, the observation elsewhere in the field of living things of this imaginary Erkennung, of this privilege of the counterpart which goes so far in certain species as to reveal itself for us in its organogenic effects. I will not return to this old example around which I oriented for you my exploration of the imaginary at the time when I was beginning to articulate something of what is coming, after years, to maturity - to maturity before you, my doctrine of analysis - the female pigeon in so far as she does not reach completion as a pigeon except by seeing her pigeon image for which a little mirror in the cage may suffice, and also the cricket who does not go through his stages unless he has encountered another cricket.

There is no doubt that not only in what fascinates us, but in what fascinates the male of the praying mantis, there is this erection of a fascinating form, this deployment, this attitude from which for us it draws its name, the praying mantis, it is singularly from this position (not of course without opening the way for us to some vacillating reversal or other) which presents itself to our eyes as that of prayer. We notice that it is before this phantasy, this incarnated phantasy, that the male yields, that he is taken, summoned, aspirated, captivated in the embrace which for him is going to be fatal.

It is clear that the image of the imaginary other as such is here present in the phenomenon, that it is not excessive to suppose that something is revealed here about this image of the other. But does it mean for all that that there is already some préfiguration, a sort of inverse blue-print of what would therefore be presented in man as a sort of remainder, of sequel, of defined possibility of variations in the operation of natural tendencies? And if we ought to accord some value to this properly speaking monstrous example, we cannot all the same do other than remark the difference to what is presented in human phantasy (that from which we can begin with certainty from the subject, there alone where we are assured of it, namely in so far as it is the support of the signifying chain), we cannot therefore fail to remark that in what nature presents us with there is, from the act to its excess, to that which overflows and accompanies it, to this devouring surplus which signals it for us as the example of another instinctual structure, the fact is that there is synchrony here: the fact is that it is at the moment of the act that there is exercised this complement exemplifying for us the paradoxical form of instinct. Henceforward, is there not outlined here a limit which allows us to define strictly the way in which what is exemplified is of service to us, but is only of service to us in order to give us the form of what we mean when we talk about a desire.

If we talk about the jouissance of this other who is the praying (4) mantis, if it interests us on this occasion, it is because, either it enjoys (jouit) there where the male organ is, and also it enjoys elsewhere, but wherever it enjoys - something we will never know anything about, but it does not matter - that it should enjoy elsewhere only takes on its meaning from the fact that it enjoys - or it does not enjoy, it does not matter - there. Let her enjoy where she likes, this has no meaning, in the value that this image takes on, except from the relationship to a there of virtual enjoying. But when all is said and done in synchrony (whatever may be in question), it will never after all be, even in a deviant way, anything but a copulatory jouissance. I mean that, in the infinite diversity of instinctual mechanisms in nature, we can easily discover all the possible forms, including the one in which the organ of copulation is lost in loco in the consummation itself. We can moreover consider that the act of devouring is there one of the numerous forms of the bonus which is given to the individual partner of copulation in so far as it is ordered to its specific end in order to keep him in the act which it is a question of allowing.

The exemplary character therefore of the image that is proposed to us only begins at the precise point that we have no right to go to, namely that this devouring of the cephalic extremity of the partner by the praying mantis is something which is marked by the fact that this is accomplished by the mandibles of the female partner which participate as such in the properties which constitute, in living nature, the cephalic extremity, namely a certain collection of the individual tendency as such, namely the possibility in some register that it exercises a discernment, a choice. In other words, the praying mantis likes the head of her partner better than anything else, there is here a preference, malle, mavult, that is what she likes. And it is in so far as she likes that that for us, in the image, she shows herself as enjoying (jouissant) at the expense of the other, and in a word, that we begin to put into natural functions what is in question, namely some moral sense, in other words, that we enter into the Sadian dialectic as such.

This preference for jouissance to any reference to the other is revealed as the dimension of essential polarity in nature. It is only too clear that it is we who contribute this moral sense, but that we contribute it in the measure that we discover the meaning of desire as this relationship to something which, in the other, chooses this partial object. Here again let us pay a little more attention. Is this example fully valid as a way of illustrating for us this preference for the part rather than the whole, precisely illustratable in the erotic value of the extremity of the nipple of which I spoke above? I am not so sure, in so far as it is less, in this image of the praying mantis, the part which would be preferred to the whole in the most horrible fashion allowing us already to short-circuit the function of metonymy, than rather the whole which is preferred to the part.

Let us not in effect omit that, even in an animal structure so distant from us in appearance as that of the insect, the value of concentration, of reflection, of totality represented somewhere in the cephalic extremity undoubtedly functions and, that in any case, in phantasy, in the image which attracts us, there operates with its particular accentuation this acephalisation of the partner as it is presented to us here. And, in a word, the value of the praying mantis as a fable (the one which underlies what it represents effectively in a certain mythology or simply a folklore) in everything that Caillouis put the accent on under the (5) register of the myth and the sacred, which is his first work.... it does not appear that he sufficiently highlighted that we are here in poetry, in something whose accent does not depend simply on a reference to the relationship to the oral object as it is delineated in the koine of the unconscious, the common tongue, but in something more accentuated, in something which designates for us a certain link of acephalousness with the transmission of life as such.

In designating the fact that there is, in this passing of the flame from one individual to another, in a signified eternity of the species, that the telos is not passed on by the head, this is what gives to the image of the mantis its tragic sense which, as you see, has nothing to do with the preference for what is called an oral object which, does not on any occasion, in human phantasy in any case, refer to the head.

It is something quite different that is in question in the liaison with the oral phase of human desire. That which is outlined as a reciprocal identification of the subject to the object of oral desire, is something which is on the way - experience shows it to us immediately - to a constitutive fragmentation, to these fragmentary images which were recently evoked during our journées provinciales as being linked to some primitive terror or other which seemed, I do not know why for the authors, to take on some value as a disturbing designation, even though it is indeed the most fundamental, the most widespread, the most common phantasy at the origin of all the relationships of man to his somatic existence. The fragments from the anatomy building which people the celebrated image of St. George de Carpaccio in the little church of Sainte-Marie-des-Anges in Venice are indeed that which, I believe, with or without analysis, never fail to present themselves at the level of the dream in every individual experience, and moreover in this register, the head which walks around all by itself continues very well, as in Cazotte, to tell its little stories.

This is not what is important. And the discovery of analysis, is that the subject, in the field of the Other, encounters not simply the images of his own fragmentation but, already from the beginning, the objects of the desire of the Other, namely of the mother, not just in their fragmented state but with the privileges that the desire of the mother accords them. In others words, that there is one of these objects that he encounters, and which is the paternal phallus already encountered with the first phantasies of the subject, Melanie Klein tells us, at the origin of the fandum, he must speak, he is going to speak. Already in the inner empire, in this interior of the body of the mother where there are projected the first imaginary formations, something is perceived which distinguishes itself as more specially accentuated, even dangerous: the paternal phallus. On the field of the desire of the Other, the subjective object already encounters identifiable occupants at whose ell, as I might say, at whose rate he has already to value himself and to weigh himself, and pose these differently modelled little weights which are in use in primitive tribes of Africa where you see a little twisted-up animal, or even indeed some phalloform object as such.

(6) At this phantastical level therefore, the privilege of the image of the mantis is uniquely the fact - which is not after all so certain - that the mantis is supposed to eat her males one after another, and that this passage to the plural is the essential dimension through which it takes on for us a phantastical value.

Here then there is defined this oral phase. It is only within the demand that the Other is constituted as the reflection of the hunger of the subject. The Other therefore is not at all simply hunger, but articulated hunger, hunger which demands. And the subject by this is open to becoming object, but, as I might say, of a hunger which chooses. The transition is made from hunger to eroticism along the path of what I called above a preference. She likes something, that especially, in what one might call a gluttonous way.... here we find ourselves reintroduced into the register of original sins. The subject has placed himself on the a la carte menu of cannibalism which everyone knows is never absent from any communion phantasy.

Read this author whom I speak to you about throughout the years returning in a sort of periodical way, Baltasar Gracian. Obviously only those of you who understand Spanish will be able to find in it, unless they have it translated, their complete satisfaction. Translated very early, as people translated at the time, almost instantaneously throughout Europe - all the same some things remain untranslated. It is a treatise about communion, el Comulgatorio, which is a good text in this sense there is revealed there something which is rarely admitted, the pleasures of consuming the Corpus Christi, the body of Christ, are detailed there. And we are asked to dwell on this exquisite cheek, on this delicious arm, I will spare you the rest in which spiritual concupiscence is satisfied, lingers on, revealing to us in this way what always remains implied in even the most elaborated forms of oral identification.

In opposition to this thematic in which you see there being deployed by the virtue of the signifier in a whole field already created to be inhabited secondarily, the most original tendency, it is really in opposition to this that the last time I wanted to show you a meaning of the anal demand ordinarily little or badly articulated, by showing you that it is characterised by a complete reversal of the initiative for the benefit of the other. It is properly here that there lies - namely at a stage not so obviously advanced or certain in our normative ideology - the source of the discipline - I have not said the duty - the discipline, as people say, of cleanliness (proprete*) in which the French tongue so nicely marks the oscillation with proprietorship (propriete), with that which properly belongs, education, good manners as I might say. Here the demand is exterior, and at the level of the other, and is posed, articulated as such.

The strange thing is that we have to see and recognise here, in what has always been said and which it seems no one has really dealt with, that here there properly comes to birth the gift-object as such, and that what the subject can give in this metaphor is exactly linked to what he can retain, namely his own waste, his excrement.

It is impossible not to see something exemplary, something which it is properly speaking indispensable to designate as the radical point at which there is decided the projection of the desire of the subject into the other. There is a point of the phase at which desire is articulated and is constituted, at which the other is properly speaking its rubbish dump. And one is not surprised to see that the idealists of the theme of a "hominisation" of the cosmos - or as they are forced to express it in our day, of the planet.... one of the phases of the (7) "hominisation" of the planet, is that the man-animal makes of it properly speaking a refuse dump, a rubbish dump. The most ancient testimonies that we have of human agglomerations as such, are enormous pyramids of broken shells, which has a name in Scandanavian. It is not for nothing that things are so. What is more it seems that if it is necessary some day to reconstruct the mode by which man has introduced himself to the field of the signifier, it is in these first heaps that it will have to be designated.

Here the subject designates himself in the evacuated object as such. Here is, as I might say, the zero point of desire. It reposes entirely on the effect of the demand of the Other. The Other decides about it, and indeed it is here that we find the root of this dependency of the neurotic. Here is the tangible point, the tangible note through which the desire of the neurotic is characterised as pregenital. It is in so far as he depends to such a degree on the demand of the Other that what the neurotic demands from the Other in his neurotic demand for love, is that he should be allowed to do something from this place of desire, that it is this place of desire which manifestly remains to a certain degree dependent on the demand of the Other. Because the only sense that we could give to the genital stage in so far as at this place of desire there might reappear something which would have the right to call itself a natural desire - even though given its noble antecedents it can never be it - the fact is that desire must indeed one day appear as that which is not demanded, as aiming at what one does not demand. And then do not rush to say that it is what one takes for example, because anything you say will never do anything except make you fall again into the little machinery of demand.

Natural desire has, properly speaking, this dimension of never being able to be said in any way, and this indeed is the reason why you will never have any natural desire, because the Other is already installed at the place, the Other with a big O, as the one where there reposes the sign. And the sign is enough to set up the question: Che vuoi? What do you want? To which at first the subject can respond nothing, always delayed by the question in the response that it solicits. A sign represents something for someone and, for want of knowing what the sign represents, the subject becomes that question, when sexual desire appears, loses the someone to whom the question is addressed namely himself - and gives birth to the anxiety of little Hans.

Here there is delineated this something which, prepared by the furrow of the fracture of the subject by the demand, is set up in the relationship that for an instant we are going to consider as it is often considered, isolated, of the child and the mother. The mother of little Hans - and moreover all mothers, "I am calling on all mothers", as someone once said - distinguishes her position in the fact that she marks, for that which begins to appear as a little wagging, as a little trembling not to be doubted in the first wakening of sexual genitality as such in Hans: "That's really dirty", desire is disgusting, this desire that he cannot describe. But this is strictly correlative to an interest which is no less doubtful in something which is here the object, the one to which we have learned to give all its importance, namely the phallus.

In what is no doubt an allusive but not ambiguous fashion, how many mothers, all mothers, confronted with little Hans' little tap, or something else, however it is called, will have thoughts like: (8) "My little son is very well endowed", or indeed: "You will have lots of children". In short, the appreciation qua brought to bear on the object, it well and truly partial, again here is something which contrasts with the refusal of desire. Here, at the very moment of the encounter with what solicits the subject in the mystery of desire, the division is established between this object which becomes the mark of a privileged interest, this object which becomes the agalma, the pearl at the heart of the individual (who here trembles around the pivotal point of his advent to living plenitude) and at the same time of a debasement of the subject. He is appreciated as object, he is depreciated as desire.

And it is around this that there is going to turn this establishment of the register of having, that the affair is going to be played out. The matter is important enough for us to dwell on it, I will go into further detail.

The thematic of having I have been announcing to you for a long time by formulae such as the following, love is giving what one does not have, of course, because you see clearly that, when the child gives what he has, it is at the preceding stage. What does he not have, and in what sense? It is not towards the phallus (even though one could make the dialectic of being and having revolve around it) that you ought to direct your gaze to understand properly what is the new dimension that the entry into the phallic drama introduces. What he does not have, what he does not dispose of at this point of birth, of revelation of genital desire, is nothing other than his act. He has nothing but a draft on the future. He establishes the act in the field of project.

I would ask you to notice here the force of linguistic determinants through which, just as desire took on in the conjunction of Romance languages this connotation of desiderium, of mourning and of regret, it is not nothing that the primitive forms of the future should have been abandoned in favour of a reference to having. Je chanterai, is exactly what you see written: je chanter-ai, effectively this comes from cantare habeo. The decadent Romance tongue found the surest path the true sense of the future: I shall make love later, I have making love as a draft on the future, je desirer'ai. And moreover this habeo leads on to the debeo of the symbolic debt, to a habeo that is deprived. And it is in the future that this debt is conjugated when it takes the form of commandment: "Thou shalt honour thy father and thy mother", etc.

But - and it is here that I want today only to keep you on the verge of what results from this articulation, which no doubt is slow, but done precisely so that you will not rush too quickly into it - the object in question, separated from desire, the object phallus, it is not the simple specification, the homologue, the homonym of the imaginary little o into which there collapses the fullness of the Other, of the big O. It is not a specification which has finally come to light of what had previously been the oral object, the anal object. It is something - as I indicated to you from the start, at the beginning of this discourse today, when I marked out for you the first encounter of the subject with the phallus - it is a privileged object in the field of the Other. It is an object which comes by way of deduction from the status of the Other, of the big Other as such. In other words, the little o, at the level of genital desire and of the castration phase, whose precise articulation all of this as you clearly perceive is constructed in order to introduce you to, the little o is the 0 minus phi, $o = 0 - \phi$. In others words it is from this angle that the © (phi) comes to symbolise what is lacking to the 0 in order to be the noetic 0 , the 0 in full exercise, the Other in so far as one can trust its response to the demand. The desire of this noetic Other is an enigma, and this enigma is tied into the (9) structural foundation of its castration. It is here that there is going to be inaugurated the whole dialectic of castration.

Pay attention now not to confuse either this phallic object with this same sign which would be the sign at the level of the Other of its lack of response, the lack of which there is question here is the lack of the desire of the Other. The function that this phallus is going to take on in so far as it is encountered in the field of the imaginary, is not to be identical to the Other, as designated by the lack of a signifier, but to be the root of this lack. It is the Other who is constituted in what is certainly a privileged relationship to this object (ϕ), but a complex relationship. It is here that we are going to find the point of what constituted the impasse and the problem of love which is that the subject cannot satisfy the demand of the Other except by lowering it again, by making of him, this other, the object of his desire.

Seminary 16; Wednesday 12 April 1961

It is not because one" may seem to have diverted from what is at the centre of your preoccupations that one does not rediscover it at the extreme periphery. This is what, I believe, happened to me almost without my noticing it in the Borghese Gallery in the most unexpected place. My experience has always taught me to look at what is near the lift, which is often significant and which people never look at. The experience transferred to the museum of the Borghese Gallery (which is quite applicable to a museum) made me turn my head on leaving the lift thanks to which I saw something - at which people really never stop, I have never heard anyone ever speak about it - a picture by someone called Zucchi.

He is not a very well known painter, even though he has not completely escaped from the meshes of the critical net. He is what is called a Mannerist from the first period of Mannerism, in the XVIth century. His dates are approximately 1547-1590, and what is in question is a painting called "Psyche surprises Amore", namely Eros.

It is the classical scene of Psyche raising her little lamp on Eros who for some time has been her never glimpsed nightly lover. You have of course, I think, some idea of this classical drama. Psyche favoured by this extraordinary love, that of Eros himself, enjoys a happiness which could have been perfect if she had not been overtaken with curiosity to see who was involved. It is not that she had not been warned by her lover himself never to try, under any circumstances, to throw light on him, without him being able to say what sanction would result from it, but the insistence is extreme. Nevertheless Psyche cannot do otherwise than end up doing it and, at that moment, the misfortunes of Psyche begin. I cannot tell you them all. I would like first of all to show you what is in question, because moreover this is what is important in my discovery. I obtained two copies of it and I am going to pass them round. I reduplicated these two reproductions with a sketch done by a painter who even those who do not know my family relationships will I hope recognise, and who was kind enough this morning, because of a wish to please me, to make for you this sketch which will allow me to highlight what is in question in the demonstration. You see that the sketch corresponds in its significant lines at least to what I am in the process of circulating.

(2) I thought I should see this place on the Palatine that Commandant Boni, about fifty years ago I think, thought he could identify with what the Latin authors call the Mundus■ I managed to go down into it, but I'm afraid that it is nothing more than a cistern, and I managed to get a sore throat there....

I do not know if you have already seen the subject of Eros and Psyche treated in this fashion. For my part what struck me (this has been treated in innumerable ways, both in sculpture and in painting) I never saw Psyche appearing armed in a work of art, as she is in this picture, with what is represented there very vividly as a little cutting instrument and which is precisely a scimitar in this picture. On the other hand, you will notice that what is here significantly projected in the form of the flower, and of the bouquet of which it forms a part and of the vase also in which it is inserted, you will see in the picture in a very intense, very marked fashion, that this flower is properly speaking the visual mental centre of the picture. It is so in the following fashion, this bouquet and this flower are put in the foreground and are seen, as they say, against the light, namely that this looks here like a black mass; it is this which is treated in a fashion that gives to this picture the character that one can call Mannerist. It is drawn in an extremely refined way. There would certainly be things to say about the flowers which are chosen in this bouquet.

But around the bouquet, coming from behind the bouquet, there radiates an intense light which falls on the elongated thighs and the stomach of the personage who symbolises Eros. And it is really impossible not to see here, designated in the most precise fashion and as it were by the most solidly supported index, the organ which must anatomically be concealed behind this mass of flowers, namely very precisely the phallus of Eros. This is seen in the very manner of the picture, accentuated in such a fashion that it cannot be a question here of an analytic interpretation, that there cannot fail to be presented in the representation the thread which unites this menace of the cutting instrument to what is properly speaking designated for us here. In a word, it is worthwhile designating the thing precisely because of the fact that it is not frequent in art. Judith and Holofernes have been frequently represented for us, but all the same for Holofernes, it is not what is in question here, it is "off with his head". In such a way that the very gesture, stretching out, of the other arm which holds the lamp is something which is also made in order to evoke for us all the resonances precisely of this type of other picture to which I am alluding. The lamp is there suspended above the head of Eros. You know that in the story it is a drop of oil spilt in a rather sudden movement by a very emotional Psyche, which has woken Eros causing him, the story moreover specifies it for us, a wound from which he suffers for a long time.

Let us observe in order to be scrupulously careful that, in the reproduction that you have before your eyes, you can see that there is something in effect like a luminous trait which starts from the lamp and goes towards the shoulder of Eros.

Nevertheless the obliqueness of this trait does not allow it to be thought that it is a question of this drop of oil, but of a shaft of light. Some people will think that there is here (3) something which is in effect quite remarkable and which represents on the part of the artist an innovation, and therefore an intention which we could unambiguously attribute to him, I mean that of representing the threat of castration applied to the circumstances of loving. I think we would have to beat a hasty retreat if we were to advance in this direction.

We would have to beat a hasty retreat from it because of the fact that I highlighted for you.... a point already highlighted, but which I hope has already struck some of you, it is that this story is only known to us, despite its diffusion in the history of art, through a single text, the text of Apulius, in The golden ass. I hope for your own pleasure that you have read The golden ass, it is, I must say, a very exciting text. If, as has always been said, certain truths are included in this book, I can tell you in a mythical and picturesque form veritable esoteric and initiatory secrets, it is a truth wrapped up in the most shimmering, not to say the most arousing, the most titillating appearances. Because as it first appears, it is in fact something which has not yet been superseded, even by the most recent productions with which we have been regaled in France these last years in the most characteristic erotic genre, with the whole nuance of sadomasochism which constitutes the most common aspect of the erotic novel.

It is in effect in the middle of a horrible story about the kidnapping of a young girl, accompanied by the most terrifying threats to which she finds herself exposed in the company of the ass (the one who speaks in the first person in the novel) it is in an interlude, something included within this very spicy story, that an old woman, in order to distract for a moment the girl in question, the kidnap victim, recounts to her at length the story of Eros and Psyche.

Now what I highlighted for you above, is that it is as a result of the perfidious insistence of her sisters who will not rest until they lead her to fall into the trap, to violate the promises that she had made to her divine lover, that Psyche succumbs. And the final method of her sisters is to suggest that what is in question is a terrifying monster, a serpent of most hideous aspect, that undoubtedly she is in some danger with him. After which the mental short-circuit is produced namely that, noticing the recommendations, the extremely insistent prohibitions to which her nocturnal interlocutor has recourse, imposes on her by enjoining that in no case should she violate his very severe prohibition not to try to see him, she can only too clearly see the coincidence between this recommendation and what her sisters are suggesting to her. And it is then that she takes the fatal step.

In order to take it, given what has been suggested to her, what she thinks she is going to find, she arms herself. And in this sense we can say - despite the fact that the history of art does not give us any other testimony as far as I know, I would be grateful if someone stimulated now by my remarks brought me proof to the contrary - [that if Psyche] has been represented at this significant moment as armed, it is indeed from the text of Apuleius that the Mannerist in question, Zucchi, has therefore borrowed what constituted the originality of the scene.

What does that mean? Zucchi represents for us this scene the story of which is very widespread. At the time already it is very widespread for all sorts of reasons. If we have only a single literary testimony, we have many in the order of plastic and (4) figurative representations. It is said for example that the group which is in the museum of the Offices in Florence represents an Eros with a Psyche, both winged this time (you can notice that here if Eros has them, Psyche does not). Psyche herself winged with the wings of a butterfly. I have in my possession for example Alexandrian objects in which Psyche is represented under different aspects and frequently furnished with butterfly's wings; the butterfly's wings on this occasion are the sign of the immortality of the soul. The butterfly having been for a very long time (given the phases of the metamorphosis that it undergoes, namely born at first in the shape of a caterpillar of a larva, it envelops itself in this sort of tomb, of sarcophagus, enveloped in a fashion which is even going to recall the mummy where it remains until it reemerges into the light in a glorified form).... the thematic of the butterfly, as signifying the immortality of the soul had already appeared since antiquity, and not only in different peripheral religions, but moreover was even used and still is in the Christian religion as symbolic of the immortality of the soul.

It is in fact very difficult to deny that it is a question of what one can call the misfortunes or the misadventures of the soul in this story of which we have only, as I am telling you, a mythological text as basis, foundation of its transmission in antiquity, the text of Apuleius. In this text of Apuleius, whatever may be thought of it by authors accentuating in different ways the religious and spiritual significations of the thing and who, gladly, would find that in Apuleius we only find what is properly speaking a debased, romantic form which does not permit us to reach the original import of the myth, despite these allegations, I think on the contrary that the text of Apuleius - if you refer to it you will see it - is on the contrary extremely rich. In the sense that this point that is in question, the one that is represented here in this moment by the painting, is only the beginning of the story, despite the fact that already we have the previous phase of what one can call not only the happiness of Psyche, but a first test namely that Psyche is at the beginning considered as being as beautiful as Venus and that it is already through the effects of a first persecution by the gods that she finds herself exposed to the fact from a rock (another form of the myth of Andromeda), to something which is going to seize her, which must be a monster and which is found in fact to be Eros (to whom Venus had given the charge of delivering her over to the one of whom she must be the victim). But he, in short, seduced by the one to whom he has been delegated by the cruel orders of his mother, takes her away and installs her in this profoundly hidden place where she can enjoy in short the happiness of the gods.

The story would have ended there if poor Psyche did not have a different nature than the divine nature and did not show among other weaknesses the most deplorable family feelings, namely that she will not rest before having obtained from Eros, her unknown spouse, permission to see her sisters again - and you see that here the story takes up again... Therefore, before this moment there is a short period, a short moment previous to the story, but the whole story stretches out afterwards. I am not going to go right through it with you because this goes beyond our subject.

(5) What I want simply to say to you, is that when Jacopo Zucchi produces this little masterpiece for us, it was not unknown, neither more nor less than through the brush of Raphael himself because, for example, you know that it is displayed on the ceiling and on the walls of this charming Farnese palace. They are lovely scenes, almost too lovely. We are no longer, it seems, able to tolerate a sort of prettiness in which for us there seems to be degraded that which ought to have appeared, the first time that the type emerged from the brilliant brush of Raphael, as a surprising beauty. In truth, one must always take into account the fact that, when a certain prototype, a certain form appears, it must make a completely different impression from what it is when it has been not only reproduced thousands of times but imitated thousands of times. In short, these paintings of Raphael at the Farnese give us a development, scrupulously based on the text of Apuleius, of the misadventures of Psyche.

In order that you should not doubt that Psyche is not a woman, but indeed the soul, let it suffice for me to tell you that, for example, she is going to have recourse to Demeter who is presentified here with all the instruments, all the weapons of her mysteries (and in fact here it is a question of the mysteries of Eleusis) and that she is rejected by her. Demeter desires above all not to get into the bad books of her sister-in-law Venus. And all that is in question is the following, it is that in short, the unfortunate soul, because she has fallen and committed at the beginning a faux pas of which she is not even guilty (because at the beginning this jealousy of Venus comes from nothing other than the fact that she is considered by Venus as a rival) finds herself tossed out, repelled from any help, even religious sources of help. And one could even carry out a little phenomenology of the unhappy soul compared to that of the conscience qualified by the same name.

In connection with this very pretty story of Psyche, we must not therefore deceive ourselves in this regard, the thematic of which there is question here is not that of the couple. It is not a question of the relationships of man and woman, it is a question of something which - you really have only to be able to read in order to see that this is only really hidden because it is in the foreground and too obvious, as in "The purloined letter" - is nothing other than the relationships of the soul to desire.

It is in this that the composition - I do not believe I am forcing things in saying that it is extremely gripping - of this picture, could be said to isolate for us in an exemplary fashion this tangible character imaged by the intensity of the image which is produced here, to isolate what could be a structural analysis of the myth of Apuleius which still remains to be done. You know enough about it, I told you enough about what a structural analysis of a myth is for you to know at least that such a thing exists. In Claude Lévi-Strauss the structural analysis of a certain number of North American myths is carried out, I do not see why one would not give oneself over to the same sort of analysis with regard to the fable of Apuleius.

Naturally we are, it is a curious thing, less well served for the things that are closest to us than for others which appear to us to be more distant as regards sources, namely that we have only one version of this myth, when all is said and done that of Apuleius. But it does not seem to be impossible, within the myth, to operate in a sense which would allow there to be thrown (6) into relief in it a certain number of significant opposing couples. By means of such an analysis, I would say, without the help of the painter, we would perhaps run the risk of allowing there to go unnoticed the really primordial and original character of the moment, of nevertheless the best known moment, moreover everyone knows that what has remained in the collective memory about the meaning of the myth is indeed the following, it is that Eros flees and disappears because little Psyche had been in short too curious and what is more disobedient.

what is in question, what is concealed, what is hidden behind this well-known moment of the myth and of the story, would be if we are to believe what the intuition of the painter reveals to us here, nothing other therefore than this decisive moment. Certainly, it is not the first time that we see it appearing in an antique myth, but whose value as an accent, whose crucial character, whose pivotal character had to wait in short for many long centuries before being, by Freud, put in the centre of the psychical thematic. It is for this reason that it is not a waste of time, having made this discovery, to tell you about it, because in short it happens to designate - in the tiny image which will remain, because of the very time that I am consecrating to it this morning, imprinted in your spirits - it happens to illustrate that which today I can scarcely designate otherwise than the meeting point of two registers, that of the instinctual dynamic in so far as I have taught you to consider it as marked by the effects of the signifier, and to permit therefore to accentuate also at this level how the castration complex ought to be articulated, cannot even be fully articulated except by considering this instinctual dynamic as structured by this mark of the signifier. And at the same time, this is the value of the image, to show us that there is therefore a super-imposition or a super-impression, a common centre, a vertical direction at this point of production of the castration complex into which we are now going to enter. Because you see that it is here that I left you the last time having taken up the thematic of desire and demand in the chronological order, but in repeating to you at every instant that this divergence, this splitting, this difference between desire and demand which marks with its stroke all the first stages of libidinal evolution, and is determined by the nachtraglich action, by something retroactive coming from a certain point where the paradox of desire and of demand appears with the minimum of eclat, and which is really that of the genital stage, in so far as it appears that the same desire and demand should at least be able to be distinguished there.

They are marked by this stroke of division, of explosion which, for analysts, consider it carefully, must still be, if you read the authors a problem, I mean a question, an enigma more avoided still than resolved and which is called the castration complex.

Thanks to this image, you have to see that the castration complex, in its structure, in its instinctual dynamic is centred in such a way that it overlaps exactly what we could call the point of the birth of the soul.

For when all is said and done if the myth of Psyche has a meaning, it is the fact that Psyche only begins to live as Psyche not simply as provided with an extraordinary initial gift (that of being equal to Venus), nor indeed with a masked and unknown favour (that in short of an infinite and unplumbable happiness) but in so far as Psyche, qua subject of a pathos which is (7) properly speaking that of the soul - at that very moment when precisely the desire which had fulfilled her is going to flee from her, is going to disappear, it is from that moment that the adventures of Psyche begin.

I once told you, Venus is born every day and, as the myth tells us, this time the Platonic one, it is therefore because of this we have also every day the conception of Eros. But the birth of the soul is, in the universal and in the particular, for each and every person, a historic moment. And it is from that moment that there develops in history the drama which we have to deal with in all its consequences.

When all is said and done, one can say that if analysis, with Freud, went straight to this point I would say that, if the Freudian message ended on this articulation - consult Analysis finite and infinite - it is because there is a final term - the thing is properly articulated in this text, at which one arrives when one manages to reduce in the subject all the avenues of his re-emergence, of his reliving, of unconscious repetitions, when we have managed to make them converge towards this rock - the term is in the text - of the castration complex, the castration complex in man as in woman - the term Penisneid is only among others in this text the pinpointing of the castration complex as such. It is around this castration complex and as I might say starting again from this point, that we should put to the test again everything that has in a certain fashion been discovered starting from this stumbling point.

For, whether it is a question of highlighting the quite decisive and primordial effect of what emerges from the agencies of the oral for example, or again of the bringing into play of what is called the aggressivity of primordial sadism, or again of what has been articulated in the different developments which are possible around the notion of the object (of the decomposition and the deepening of this relationship, up to the point of highlighting the notion of good and bad primordial objects), all of this cannot be resituated in a proper perspective unless we regasp in a divergent fashion that from which this effectively diverged, from this point unsustainable to a certain degree in its paradox, which is that of the castration complex. An image like the one that I am taking care, today, to produce before you is in a way to incarnate what I mean in speaking about the paradox of the castration complex.

In effect, if the whole divergence which has been able to appear to us up to the present in the different phases that we have studied, motivated by the discordance, the distinction between what constitutes the object of demand (whether it is in the oral stage the demand of the subject as in the anal stage the demand of the other) and that which in the Other is at the place of desire (which would be in the case of Psyche masked, veiled up to a certain point although secretly perceived by the archaic, infantile subject), would it not seem that what one can massively call the third phase - which is currently described under the name of the genital phase - is this conjunction of desire in so far as it may be involved in some demand or other of the subject, is it not properly speaking that which ought to find its reference, its identical in the desire of the Other? If there is a point where desire presents itself as desire, it is indeed there where precisely the first accentuation of Freud was constructed to situate it for us, namely at the level of sexual desire revealed in its real consistency and no longer in a contaminated, displaced, condensed, metaphorical fashion. It is no longer a question of the sexualisation of some other function, we are dealing with the sexual function itself.

(8) To make you measure the paradox that it is a question of pinpointing, I sought this morning an example to incarnate the embarrassment of psychoanalysts in what concerns the phenomenology of this genital stage, I came across an article by Monchy on the castration complex in the International Journal. To what is an analyst who in short interests himself again in our day - because there are not many of them - in the castration complex led in order to explain it? Well, to something that you would never guess. I will summarise it for you very briefly. The paradox naturally cannot fail to strike you that without the revelation of the genital drive it is necessarily marked by this splitting which consists in the castration complex as such, the Trieb is for him something instinctual.

We are dealing with someone who begins with a certain baggage (von Uexkull and Lorenz), he speaks to us at the beginning of his article of what are called congenital reaction schemes, which evokes for us the fact that in the case of little birds who have never been subjected to any experience it is enough to have a lure projected, the shadow identical to that of a hawk, of a faucon in order to provoke all the reflexes of terror, in short the imagery of the lure as the author of this article - which is written in English - puts it in French l'attrape. Things are very simple: the primitive attrape must be sought for in the oral phase. The biting reflex, namely that because the child may have these famous sadistic phantasies which culminate at a section of the object, more precious than any other, of the mother's nipple, it is here that there is to be sought the origin of that which in the subsequent genital phase is going to manifest itself by the transference of phantasies of fellatio, as this possibility of depriving, of wounding, of mutilating the partner of sexual desire under the form of his organ. And this is why, not that your daughter is mute, but why the genital phase is marked by the possible sign of castration.

The character of such a reference, of such an explanation is obviously significant of this sort of reversal which has been brought about and which has made there be put progressively, under the register of primary drives, drives which become it must be said more and more hypothetical in the measure that one makes them retreat into the original foundation which, when all is said and done, culminate at an accentuation of the constitutional thematic, of something or other innate in primordial aggressivity. It is undoubtedly rather significant of the present orientation of analytic thinking.

Are we not spelling out things correctly in dwelling on something which experience - I mean the problems which experience gives rise to for us - in a way really proposes habitually for us. I already noted before you what is articulated in Jones' writings, in a certain need to explain the castration complex, in the notion of aphanisis, a common Greek term put on the agenda in the articulation of Freud's analytic discourse, and which means disappearance. It is a question of the disappearance of desire and of the fact that what is in question in the castration complex is supposed to be, in the subject, the fear given rise to by the disappearance of desire.

Those who follow my teaching for a long enough time cannot fail, I hope, to remember - in any case those who do not remember it (9) can refer to the excellent summaries made of it by Lefebvre-Pontalis - that I already took it further by saying that if this is a way of looking at things, there is all the same a singular reversal in the articulation of the problem, a reversal which clinical facts allow us to highlight. It is for this reason that I analysed at length for you, carried out a critique of Ella Sharpe's famous dream which is precisely what my seminar analysed the last time. This dream of Ella Sharpe turns entirely around the thematic of the phallus. I would ask you to refer to this summary because I cannot be repeating myself and because the things which are there are absolutely essential. The meaning of what is in question on this occasion is this thing that I highlighted which is that, far from the fear of aphanisis being projected as one might say into the image of the castration complex, it is on the contrary the necessity, the determination of the signifying mechanism which, in the castration complex in most cases pushes the subject, not at all to fear aphanisis but on the contrary to take refuge in aphanisis, to put his desire in his pocket. Because what analytic experience reveals to us, is that something is more precious than desire itself: to preserve its symbol which is the phallus. This is the problem which is proposed to us.

I hope that you have carefully noted this picture. The flowers which are here in front of the sexual organ of Eros, they are precisely not at all distinguished by such an abundance that one cannot see that precisely there is nothing behind. There is literally no place for the least sexual organ, so that what Psyche is here on the point of cutting literally has already disappeared from the real. And moreover if something strikes us as being opposed to the proper form, to the beautiful human form of this effectively divine woman here in this image, it is the extraordinarily composite character of the image of Eros. This face is one of a child, but the body has something Michaelangellesque about it (its muscles) and already almost which begins to be marked, not to say lose shape.... without mentioning the wings. Everyone knows that people argued for a long time about the sex of angels. If people argued for such a long time, it was probably because they did not know very well where to stop. In any case the apostle tells us that, whatever may be the joys of the resurrection of the body, once the celestial feast has come, there will no longer be anything done in heaven of the sexual order, either active nor passive. So that what is in question, what is concentrated in this image, is indeed this something which is the centre of the paradox of the castration complex.

The fact is that, far from the desire of the Other, in so far as it is approached at the level of the genital phase, being able to be, be in fact ever accepted in what I would call its rhythm which is at the same time its fleetingness (as regards the child, namely that it is still a fragile desire, that it is an uncertain, premature, anticipated desire) this masks from us when all is said and done what is in question, that it is quite simply the reality at whatever level it may be of sexual desire to which, as one might say, the psychical organisation is not adapted in so far as it is psychical; the fact is that the organ (10) is not taken up, brought, approached, except as transformed into a signifier and that, because it is transformed into a signifier, it is in this that it is cut off. And reread everything that I taught you to read at the level of little Hans. You will see that there is question only of that: is it rooted? Can it be taken away? At the end he arranges things, it can be unscrewed, it is unscrewed and one can put others in its place.

This therefore is what is in question. What is striking in it, is that what is shown to us, is the relationship of this elision thanks to which it is no longer here anything but the sign itself that I am saying, the sign of absence. Because what I have taught you is the following: it is that if ϕ (phi), the phallus as signifier has a place, it is very precisely that of supplying at the point, at this precise level where significance disappears in the Other, where the other is constituted by the fact that there is somewhere a signifier lacking. Hence the privileged value of this signifier which one can of course write, but which one can only write in parenthesis, by saying indeed precisely the following: that it is the signifier of the point where the signifier is lacking $S(/6)$. And it is for this reason that it can become identical to the subject himself to the point that we can write him as barred subject, namely at the only point where we analysts can place a subject as such - for us analysts, namely in so far as we are linked to the effects which result from the coherence of the signifier as such when a living being makes himself its agent and its support. We see the following, that from then on the subject has no other possible efficacy (if we admit this determination, this overdetermination, as we call it) than from the signifier which makes him vanish. And that is why the subject is unconscious.

If one can even speak, and even when one is not an analyst, of double symbolisation, it is in this sense that the nature of the symbol is such that two registers necessarily spring from it, the one which is linked to the symbolic chain and the one which is linked to the disturbance, to the disorder that the subject was capable of bringing to it, because it is here that when all is said and done the subject situates himself in the most certain fashion. In other words the subject only affirms the dimension of truth as original at the moment that he makes use of the signifier to lie.

This relationship therefore of the phallus with the effect of the signifier, the fact that the phallus as signifier (and this means therefore transposed to a completely different function than its organic function) is precisely what it is a question of considering as centre of every coherent apprehension of what is in question in the castration complex, it is to this that I wanted this morning to draw your attention. But again to open up, not again in an articulated and rational but in a picturesque fashion, what we will bring forward the next time and which is, as I might say, represented with genius thanks to the very Mannerism of the artist who made this painting. Has it occurred to you that by putting in front of this phallus as lacking and, as such, raised to a major significance this vase of flowers, Zucchi can be seen to have anticipated by three and a half centuries - and I assure you up to the last few days without my knowing it - the very image of which I made use in the form of what I called "the illusion of the inverted vase" in order to articulate the whole dialectic of the relationships of the ideal ego and the ego-ideal. I said this a long time ago, but I entirely redid it in an article which should appear soon. This relationship of the object as object of desire, as partial object (11) with the whole narcissistic accommodation is the thing whose different parts I tried to articulate in this system which I called "the illusion of the inverted vase" in an amusing physics experiment.

The important thing is to project into your spirit this idea that the problem of castration as mark (in so far as it marks, in so far as it is at the centre of the whole economy of desire as an analysis has developed it) is closely linked to this other problem which is that of how the Other in so far as he is the locus of the word, in so far as he is the subject as of right, in so far as he is the one with whom we have at the limit relationships of good or bad faith can and ought to become something exactly analogous to what can be encountered in the most inert object, namely the object of desire, o. It is this tension, it is this levelling down, it is this collapse, collapse at a fundamental level which becomes the essential regulation of everything that in the case of man is the problematic of desire, it is this that is in question in analysis. I hope the next time to be able to articulate it for you in the most exemplary fashion.

I ended what I taught you in connection with the dream of Ella Sharpe with these words: "This phallus" - I said, speaking about a subject caught up in the neurotic situation which is more exemplary for us in so far as it was that of aphanisis determined by the castration complex - "this phallus, is and is not. This interval - to be and not to be - the tongue allows us to perceive in a formula where the verb to be slides: he is not without having it, (il n'est pas sans l'avoir) '. It is around this subjective assumption between being and having that the reality of castration operates. In effect, the phallus" - I then wrote - "has a function of equivalence in the relationship to the object: It is in proportion to a certain renunciation of the phallus that the subject enters into possession of the plurality of objects which characterise the human world. In an analogous formula, one could say that the woman 'is without having it, (est sans l'avoir)¹, which can be experienced very painfully in the form of Penisneid" - but which, I am adding this to the text, is also a great force. "This is what Ella Sharpe's patient does not consent to see: he 'shelters' the signifier phallus...." and I concluded: "No doubt there is something more neurotogenic than the fear of losing the phallus, it is not to wish that the Other should be castrated."

But today, after we have gone through the dialectic of transference in the Symposium, I am going to propose to you another formula, which is the following, this desire of the Other essentially separated from us by this mark of the signifier, do you not now understand what Alcibiades, having perceived that there is in Socrates the secret of desire, demands, in an almost impulsive fashion, with an impulse which is at the origin of all the wrong paths of neurosis or of perversion, this desire of Socrates, which he knows to exist in another connection because it is on this that he bases himself, to see it as sign. It is moreover why Socrates refuses. Because this is of course only a short-circuit.

To see desire produced as a sign is not for all that to be able to enter on the path through which desire is caught up in a certain dependency which is what it is a question of knowing.

So that you see being initiated here what I am trying to show you and to trace as a path towards that which ought to be the desire (12) of the analyst. In order that the analyst should have what the other lacks he must have nescience qua nescience, he must be in the mode of having, that he must also be also without having it, that he must be lacking in nothing for him to be as nescient as his subject. In fact, he also is not without having an unconscious. No doubt it is always beyond anything the subject knows, without being able to say it to him. He can only give him a sign, to be that which represents something for someone is the definition of the sign. Having here in short nothing other which prevents him from being this desire of the subject, except precisely knowledge, the analyst is condemned to a false surprise. But you can be sure that he is only efficacious by offering himself to the true which is untransmissible, of which he can only give a sign. To represent something for someone, is precisely here what is to be stopped, because the sign that is to be given is the sign of the lack of the signifier. It is, as you know, the only sign which is not tolerated because it is the one which provokes the most unspeakable anguish. It is nevertheless the only one which can allow the other to gain access to what is the nature of the unconscious, this "knowledge without consciousness" which you will understand perhaps today before this image in what sense, not negative but positive, Rabelais says that it is "the ruin of the soul".

Seminar 17: Wednesday 19 April 1961

I take up again before you my difficult discourse, more and more difficult because of the aims of this discourse. To say for example that I am leading you today onto unknown terrain would be inappropriate because, if I begin today to lead you onto a terrain, it is necessarily because from the beginning I already began. Moreover to speak about unknown terrain when it is a question of our own, of the one which is called the unconscious, is still more inappropriate because what is in question, and what constitutes the difficulty of this discourse, is that I can say nothing about it which does not take on all its weight precisely from what I do not say about it.

It is not that one should not say everything, the fact is that in order to speak with precision we cannot say everything, even about what we can formulate, because there is already something in the formula which - as you will see, we grasp it at every instant - precipitates what is in question into the imaginary, which is essentially what happens because of the fact that the human subject as such is prey to the symbol. At the point that we have got to in it, this "to the symbol", be careful, should it be put in the singular or the plural? Undoubtedly in the singular in so far as the one which I introduced the last time is properly speaking as such the unnamable symbol - we are going to see why and how - the symbol ϕ (big phi), precisely this point at which I must today take up my discourse again in order to show you how it is indispensable for us in order to understand the incidence of the castration complex on the mainspring of transference. There is a fundamental ambiguity between symbolic phallus and imaginary phallus, concretely involved in the psychical economy. The place where we encounter it, where we first encountered it, particularly where the neurotic lives it out in a fashion which represents his particular mode of manoeuvring, of operating with this radical, fundamental difficulty that I am trying to articulate before you through the usage that I give to this symbol ϕ (big phi) which the last time and many times previously, I briefly designated, I mean in a rapid, abbreviated fashion as the symbol which corresponds to the place where there is produced the lack of signifier.

If I have unveiled anew from the beginning of this session this image which served us the last time as a support to introduce the paradoxes and the antinomies linked to these diverse slippages, so subtle, so difficult to retain in their different moments and nevertheless indispensable to sustain, if we want to understand what is in question in the castration complex (and which are the displacements and the absences, and the levels and the substitutions where there intervenes what analytic experience shows us more and more), this phallus in its multiple, quasi-ubiquitous formulae, you see it in experience, if not re-emerging, at least you cannot deny that it is re-evoked at every instant in theoretical writings under the most diverse forms and even up to the final term of the most primitive investigations on what happens in the first pulsations of the (2) soul - the phallus which you see at the final term identified, for example, with the force of primitive aggressivity in so far as it is the worst object encountered at the end in the mother's womb and that it is moreover the most dangerous object.

Why this ubiquity? I am not the one who introduces it here, who suggests it, it is everywhere manifest in the writings of any attempt pursued to formulate on an old plane as well as on a new, renovated one of analytic technique. Well, let us try to put some order in it and to see why it is necessary for me to insist on this ambiguity, or on this polarity if you wish, polarity with two extreme terms, the symbolic and the imaginary, concerning the function of the signifier phallus. I say signifier in so far as it is used as such but when I speak about it, when I introduced it above, I said the symbol phallus and, as you will see, it is perhaps in effect the only signifier which merits, in our register and in an absolute fashion, the title of symbol.

I have therefore unveiled again this image (which undoubtedly is not the simple reproduction of the original one of the artist) of the painting from which I began as the properly speaking exemplary image, which appeared to me to be charged in its composition with all the sorts of riches that a certain art of painting can produce and whose Mannerist principle I examined. I am going to pass it around again rapidly, if only for those who were not able to see it. I wish simply, and by way I could say of a complement, to clearly mark, for those who perhaps were not able to understand in a precise fashion, what I intend to underline about the importance here of what I would call the Mannerist application. You are going to see that the application must be employed moreover in the proper sense as well as in the figurative sense. It is not I but studies which already exist which have made the rapprochement in this painting between the use that is given by the presence of the bouquet of flowers here in the foreground.... it covers what is to be covered which I told you was less again the threatened phallus than Eros surprised and uncovered here through an initiative of the question of Psyche: "What is there to be said about him? De lui qu'en est-il?" Here this bouquet covers the precise point of an absent presence, of a presentified absence.

The technical history of the painting of the epoch invites us, not by my voice but by the voice of critics who started from premises quite different to those which on this occasion guide me here. They have underlined the kinship there is because of the very fact of the probable collaborator who is the one who especially made the flowers. Certain things indicate to us that it is not, probably, the same artist who at work in the two parts of the painting and that it is a different person, Francesco, a brother or cousin of the artist, instead of Jacopo who, by reason of his technical skill, was asked to be the one to produce this piece of bravura of the flowers in their vase at the appropriate place. This is related by the critics to something which I hope a certain number of you know, namely the technique of Arcimboldo which, a few months ago, was brought to the knowledge of those who inform themselves a little about the different returns to the present of aspects which are sometimes elided, veiled or forgotten in the history of art.

This Arcimboldo is distinguished by this singular technique which produced its latest off-shoot in the work for example of my old friend Salvador Dali, which consists in what Dali has called paranoiac drawing. In the case of Arcimboldo, it is to represent the face for example of the librarian (he worked mainly at the court of the famous Rudolph II of Bohemia who also left many other traces in the tradition of the rare object) of Rudolph II by a clever putting together of the primary implements of the librarian's function, namely a certain fashion of (3) arranging books in such a way that the image of a face, of a visage is here much more than suggested, really imposes itself. In the same way the symbolic theme of a season incarnated in the form of a human face will be materialised by all the fruits of this season whose assemblage will itself be realised so that the suggestion of a face also imposes itself in the form produced. In short this production of that which in its essential shape presents itself as the human image, the image of another, will be realised in the Mannerist method by the coalescence, combination, the accumulation of a pile of objects the total of which will be charged with representing what henceforth manifests itself at once as substance and illusion because, at the same time as the appearance of the human image is sustained, something is suggested which can be imagined in the disaggregation of objects which, by presenting in a way the function of the mask, show at the same time the problematic of this mask. That with which in short we always have to deal every time we see coming into play this so essential function of the person, in so far as we see it all the time in the foreground in the economy of human presence, is the following: if there is a need for a persona it is because behind, perhaps, every form slips away and vanishes.

And undoubtedly, if it is from a complex assemblage that the persona results, it is indeed in effect here that there lies at once the lure and the fragility of its subsistence and that, behind, we know nothing about what can be sustained, because a reduplicated appearance is imposed on us or suggests itself essentially as reduplicated appearance, namely something which when questioned leaves a vacuum, the question of knowing what there is behind in the final analysis.

It is indeed therefore in this register that there is affirmed, in the composition of the painting, the maintaining of the question of knowing (because this is what we should now maintain, sustain essentially before our minds) what is happening in the act of Psyche. The fulfilled Psyche questions herself about what she is dealing with and it is this moment, this precise, privileged instant that Zucchi has held onto, perhaps well beyond what he himself could, would have been able to articulate about it in a discourse - there is a discourse on the antique gods by this personage, I was careful to consult it, without any great illusion, there is nothing much to be drawn from this discourse - but the work speaks sufficiently for itself. And the artist has in this image grasped this something instantaneous which I called the last time this moment of the apparition, of the birth of Psyche, this sort of exchange of powers which ensures that she becomes embodied, and with all this cortege of misfortunes which will be her's in order that she should loop a loop, in order that she should rediscover in this instant this something which, for her, is going to disappear the instant after, precisely what she had wanted to grasp, what she had wanted to unveil: the face of desire.

What justifies the introduction of the symbol ϕ (phi) as such, since I put it forward as that which comes in place of the missing signifier? What does it mean that a signifier should be lacking? How many times have I told you that once given the battery of signifiers beyond a certain minimum which remains to be determined - regarding which I told you that at the limit four should be enough for all significations - there is no tongue, however primitive it may be, where finally everything cannot be expressed, except of course for the fact that, as the Vaudois proverb puts it: "Everything is possible for man, what he cannot do he leaves undone", that what cannot be expressed in the aforesaid tongue, well quite simply it will not be felt. It will not be felt, subjectivated, if to subjectivate is to take up a place in a subject that is valid for another subject, namely to pass to this most radical point where the very idea of (4) communication is not possible. Every signifying battery can always say everything because what it cannot say will signify nothing at the locus of the Other and because everything that signifies for us always happens at the locus of the Other. In order that something should signify, it is necessary that it should be translatable at the locus of the Other.

Imagine a tongue, as I already pointed out to you, which has no future, well then it will not express it, but it will signify it all the same, for example by the procedure of ought or to have. And this is moreover what happens in fact, because I do not need to come back on this, I pointed it out to you, this is how in French and in English one expresses the future: cantare habeo, je chanter-ai, tu chanter-as, it is the verb avoir which is declined, I mean originally, in a well attested fashion; I shall sing, is also, in a roundabout way, to express that which English does not have, namely the future.

There is no signifier lacking. At what moment does there possibly begin to appear the lack of signifier? At that proper dimension which is subjective and which is called the question. I remind you that at one time I took into account sufficiently the fundamental, essential character of the apparition in the child (already well known, picked up of course by the most day-to-day observation) of the question as such, this moment so particularly embarrassing because of the character of these questions which is not an indifferent one, one where the child who knows how to deal with the signifier introduces himself to this dimension which makes him pose to his parents the most importunate questions, the ones that everyone knows provoke the greatest disarray and, in truth, responses that are almost necessarily impotent. What does running mean? What does kicking mean? What is an imbecile?

What makes us so incapable of giving a satisfactory answer to these questions, what forces us to respond to them in such a specially inept fashion... as if we did not know ourselves that to run is to walk very quickly - it is really to spoil the work - that to kick, is to be angry - is really to say something absurd. I am not insisting on the definition that we may give of imbecile.

It is quite clear that what is in question at that moment is a standing back of the subject as regards the usage of the signifier itself and that, the passion of what is meant by the fact that there are words, that one speaks and that one designates a thing so close to what one is dealing with by this enigmatic thing which is called a word, a term, a phoneme, this indeed is what is at stake. The incapacity felt at that moment by the child is, formulated in the question, of attacking the signifier as such at the moment when its action is already marked on everything, indelible. Everything that will come as question, in the historical continuation of his pseudo-philosophical meditation, will only when all is said and done collapse because, when he has got to "What am I?" he will not have got much further in it, unless of course he is an analyst. But if he is not - it is not in his power to be one for all that long - [when] he has got to the stage of posing himself the question "What am I?", he cannot see that precisely by putting himself in question in this form, he veils himself, he does not perceive that it is to break through the stage of doubt about being to ask oneself what one is, for by simply formulating the question in this way, he is going headlong (except for the fact that he does not perceive it) into metaphor. And it is all the same the least of the things that we, we analysts, should remember in order to help him to avoid renewing this ancient error always threatening in its innocence under all its forms and to prevent him from answering himself, even with our authority: (5) "I am a child", for example. Because of course this is the new reply that the indoctrination of psychologising repression in its renewed form will give him and with it in the same packet and without him noticing it, the myth of the adult who, for his part, is no longer supposed to be a child, thus making remultiply again this sort of morality about a pretended reality to which, in fact, he allows himself to be led by the nose by all sorts of social swindles. Moreover, we did not have to wait for analysis, nor for Freudianism, for the formula "I am a child" to introduce itself as a corset designed to make anyone, who in any way finds himself in a slightly irregular position, hold himself straight. If beneath the artist there is a child, it is the rights of the child that he represents among people who of course are considered to be serious, who are not children. As I told you last year in my lessons on The ethics of psychoanalysis, this tradition dates from the beginning of the Romantic period, it begins more or less at the time of Coleridge in England (to situate it in a tradition) and I do not see why we should charge ourselves with taking it on.

What I want to help you to grasp here, is what happens at the lower level of the graph. That to which I alluded during the journées provinciales when I wanted to draw your attention to the fact that the way in which the double intersection of these two beams, of these two arrows is constructed, is meant to draw our attention to the fact that simultaneity, as I said, is not at all synchrony. Namely that, supposing that there develop correlatively, simultaneously the two tensors, the two vectors in question, that of intention and that of the signifying chain [I], you see that what is produced here [II] as an inception of this stepping, of this sequence which will consist in the sequence of different phonematic elements for example of the signifier, this develops very far before encountering the line on which that which is summoned to being (namely the intention of signification or even of the need, if you wish, which is concealed there) takes its place. Which means the following, that when this double intersection takes place in the last analysis simultaneously - because if nachträglich signifies something, it is that it is at the same instant, when the sentence is finished, that the meaning emerges - in passing no doubt the choice was already made. But the meaning can only be grasped in the successive piling up of signifiers [which] have come to take their place each one in its (6) turn [III], and which unfold, here if you wish, in the inverse form, "I am a child" appearing on the signifying line in the order that these elements are articulated [IV].

What is happening? What is happening is that, when the meaning is complete, when that which is always metaphorical in every attribution: I do not know anything except that, I who am speaking, currently, "I am a child", to say it, to affirm it realises this grasp, this qualification of meaning thanks to which I conceive of myself in a certain relationship with objects which are infantile objects. I make myself other than any way in which I could have at first grasped myself. I incarnate myself, I idealise myself, I make an ideal ego of myself, and in the final analysis very directly, in the sequence, in the process of the simple signifying inception as such, in the fact of having produced signs capable of being referred to the reality of my word. The beginning is in the "I" and the term is in the "child".

What remains here as after-effect, something that I may see or not see, is the enigma of the question itself. It is the "what?" which demands to be taken up here subsequently at the

(7) level of the big O. To see that what follows, the after-effect, "What I am" appears in the form that it remains as question, where it is for me the point aimed at, the correlative point where I ground myself as ego-ideal, namely as a point where the question has an importance for me, where the question summons me in its ethical dimension, where it gives this form which is the very one that Freud conjugates with the superego and from which the name which qualifies it in a varyingly legitimate fashion as being that something which branches directly, as far as I know, onto my signifying inception namely: a child.

But what is to be said in all of this? It is that this precipitate, premature response, this something which ensures that in short I elude the whole central operation which has been carried out, this something which makes me precipitate myself as a child, is the avoidance of the true response which ought to begin much earlier than any term of the sentence. The response to the "Who am I?" is nothing else that can be articulated, in the same form as I told you that no demand is supported, to the "Who am I?" there is no other response at the level of the Other than "Let yourself be, laisse-toi etre". And the whole precipitation given to this response, whatever it may be in the order of dignity, child or adult, is only the something in which I flee the meaning of this "Let yourself be."

It is clear therefore that it is at the level of the Other and of what is meant by this adventure at the degraded point that we grasp it, it is at the level of this "what?" which is not "What am I?" but which analytic experience allow us to unveil at the level of the Other, in the form of the Other, in the form of the "What do you want?", in the form of that which alone can stop us at the precise point of what is in question in every formulated question, namely what we desire in posing the question, it is here that it ought to be understood; and it is here that there intervenes the lack of signifier that is in question in the ϕ (big phi) of the phallus.

We know, something analysis has shown us, has found, that what the subject has to deal with, is the object of the phantasy in so far as it presents itself as alone being capable of fixing a privileged point - what must be called with the pleasure principle an economy regulated by the level of jpuissance.

What analysis teaches us is, that to refer the question to the level of "What does it want, what does it want here inside?" what we encounter is a world of hallucinated signs, that the testing of reality is presented to us as this kind of way of tasting the reality of these signs which have emerged in us according to a necessary sequence in which there consists precisely the dominance over the unconscious of the pleasure principle. What is in question therefore, let us carefully observe it, is undoubtedly in the testing of reality to verify a real presence, but a presence of signs.

Freud underlines it with the greatest energy. It is not at all a question in the testing of reality of verifying whether our representations correspond indeed to a real (we know for a long time that we do not succeed any better in that than the philosophers) but of verifying that our representations are well and truly represented, Vorstellungsrepresentanz. It is a question of knowing if the signs are indeed there, but qua the signs (because they are signs) of this relationship to something else. And this is all that is meant by what the Freudian articulation contributes to us that the gravitation of our unconscious is referred to a lost object which is only ever rediscovered, that is to say never re-discovered. It is never anything other than signified and this because indeed of the (8) chain of the pleasure principle. The veritable, authentic object that is in question when we speak about object, is not grasped, transmissible, exchangeable in any way. It is at the horizon of that around which our phantasies gravitate and it is nevertheless with that that we must make objects which, for their part, are exchangeable.

But the affair is very far from being on the way to being settled. I mean that I underlined enough for you last year what was in question in what is called utilitarian morality. It is undoubtedly a question of something quite fundamental in the recognition of objects, that one can describe as constituted by the market of objects: they are objects which can be used by everyone and, in this sense, what is called utilitarian morality is more than founded, there is no other. And it is indeed precisely because there is no other that the so-called difficulties that it is supposed to present are in fact perfectly soluble. It is quite clear that the utilitarians are quite right in saying that, every time we are dealing with something which can be exchanged with our fellows, the rule about it is utility, not ours but the possibility of use: utility for all and for the greatest number. This indeed is what creates the gap between what is in question, in the constitution of this privileged object which emerges in the phantasy, and every kind of object in what is called the socialised world, the world of conformity.

The world of conformity is already consistent with a universal organisation of discourse. There is no utilitarianism without a theory of fictions. To pretend in any way that it is possible to have recourse to a natural object, to pretend even to reduce the distances at which objects are sustained by common accord, is to introduce a confusion, one further myth in the problematic of reality.

The object in question in analytic object-relations is an object which we ought to locate, make emerge, situate at the most radical point at which there is posed the question of the subject as regards his relationship to the signifier. The relationship to the signifier is in effect such that if we are dealing, at the level of the unconscious chain, only with signs, and if it is a question of a chain of signs, the result is that there is no stopping-place in the reference of each of the signs to the one which succeeds it. Because what is proper to communication by signs is to make of this very Other to whom I address myself (in order to urge him to aim in the same way as myself) the object to whom this sign refers. The imposition of the signifier on the subject fixes him in the position proper to the signifier. What is in question, is to find the guarantee of this chain, that which transmits itself from sign to sign and must stop somewhere, which gives us the sign that we have a right to operate with signs. It is here that there emerges the privilege of the phallus in all signifiers. And perhaps it will appear too simple you to underline what is in question on this occasion about this signifier. This signifier always hidden, always veiled, so that one is astonished to throw into relief the enormous undertaking of having its form represented in art, it is more than unusual to see it brought into play in a hieroglyphic chain or in cave art and nevertheless, this phallus, which plays its role in human imagination well before psychoanalysis, is only all the more frequently elided therefore from our signifying constructions. What does that mean? The fact is that of all (9) possible signs, is it not the one that reunites in itself the sign and the mode of action, and the very presence of desire as such, namely that in not allowing it to come to light in this real presence, precisely what is of a nature, not only to bring to a stop all this referring-on in the chain of signs, but even to make them enter into some shadow or other of nothingness. Of desire, there is doubtless no surer sign, on condition that there is nothing more than desire. Between the signifier of desire and the whole signifying chain there is established an "either... or" relationship.

Psyche was quite happy in this certain relationship with what was not at all a signifier, what was the reality of her love with Eros. But there you are! She is Psyche and she wants to know. She poses herself the question because language exists already and because one does not simply spend one's life making love but also gossiping with one's sisters. By gossiping with her sisters, she wants to possess her happiness. This is not such a simple thing. Once one has entered into the order of language, to possess one's happiness is to be able to show it, it is to be able to give an account of it, it is to arrange one's flowers, it is to be equal to one's sisters in showing that she has something better than they and not simply something different. And this is why Psyche emerges in the night, with her light and also her little cutting instrument. She will have absolutely nothing to cut off, as I told you, because it has already been done. She will have nothing to cut off, as I might say, except (and she would be well advised to do it as soon as possible) the current, namely that she sees nothing other than a great dazzling light and that what is going to be produced is, quite against her will, a prompt return to darkness the initiative for which she would do well to take before her object is definitively lost, before Eros remains sick of it for a long time, and is only to be rediscovered after a long series of trials.

The important thing for us in this painting, what makes it what it is for us, is that Psyche is illuminated and - as I have taught you for a long time now concerning the gracile form of femininity at the limits of puberty and pre-puberty - that it is she who, for us, in the scene, appears as the phallic image. And at the same time there is incarnated the fact that it is not the woman or the man who, in the final analysis, are the support of castrating action, it is this image itself in so far as it is reflected, as it is reflected in the narcissistic form of the body.

It is in so far as this unnamed because unnamable relationship, it is because the unsayable of the subject with the pure signifier of desire is going to project itself onto the localisable, precise, situatable organ somewhere in the totality of the corporal edifice, is going to enter into the properly imaginary conflict of seeing itself as deprived or not deprived of this appendix, it is in this second imaginary moment that there is going to reside everything around which there is going to be elaborated the symptomatic effects of the castration complex.

I can here only initiate it and indicate it, I mean recall, summarise what I already touched on for you in a more or less developed fashion when I spoke to you on several occasions naturally about what constitutes our object namely neuroses.

What does the hysteric do? What does Dora do at the final term? I have taught you to follow its paths and its detours in the complex identifications, in the labyrinth where she finds herself confronted with that in which Freud himself stumbles and is lost. Because what he calls the object of her desire, you know that he is mistaken there precisely because he looks for the reference of (10) Dora qua hysteric first of all and above all in the choice of her object, of no doubt an object little o. And it is quite true that in a certain fashion Mr. K. is the object little o and after him Freud himself and, that in truth, this is indeed the phantasy in so far as the phantasy is the support of desire. But Dora would not be a hysteric if she were satisfied with this phantasy. She is aiming at something else, she is aiming at something better, she is aiming at the big O. She is aiming at the absolute Other, Mrs. K., I have explained to you a long time ago that Mrs. K. is for her the incarnation of this question: "What is a woman?" And because of this, at the level of the phantasy, it is not \diamond o, the relationship of fading, of vacillation which characterises the relationship of the subject to this little o which is produced but something else, because she is a hysteric, Jt it is a big O as such, O, that she believes in contrary to a paranoiac.

"What am I?" has for her a meaning which is not that of the moral or philosophical wanderings mentioned above, it has a full and absolute meaning. And she cannot fail to encounter there, without knowing it, the O (ϕ > i < J ϕ) sign perfectly closed, always veiled which responds here. And it is for this reason that she has recourse to all the forms that she can give of the closest substitute, you should carefully note it, of this \wedge (big ϕ) sign. Namely that, if you follow the operations of Dora or of any hysteric, you will see that it is never a question for her of anything but a sort of complicated game through which she can, as I might say, subtilize the situation by slipping in where it is necessary the J> (small ϕ) of the imaginary phallus. Namely that her father is impotent with Mrs. K.? Well what does it matter! She will be the copula, she will pay with her own person, she will sustain this relationship. And because this is still not enough, she will bring into play the image substituted for herself - as I showed and demonstrated for you a long time ago - of Mr. K. whom she will cast into the abyss, whom she will repel into exterior darkness, at the moment that that animal says the only thing that he should not say: "My wife means nothing to me", namely that she does not give me an erection. If she does not give you an erection, then what use are you? Because everything that is in question for Dora, as for every hysteric, is to be the procuress of this sign in the imaginary form. The devotion of the hysteric, her passion for identifying with every sentimental drama, to be there, to support in the wings anything thrilling that may be happening and which nevertheless is not her business, this is the mainspring, this is the principle around which there waxes, proliferates all her behaviour.

If she always exchanges her desire against this sign, do not look elsewhere for the reason for what is called her mythomania. It is that there is something else that she prefers to her desire; she prefers that her desire should be unsatisfied so that the Other should hold the key to her mystery. It is the only thing that is important to her and this is the reason why, in identifying herself with the drama of love, she strives to reanimate this Other, to reassure him, to complete him, to restore him.

When all is said and done this is what we have to be aware of: any reparational ideology in our initiative as therapists, our analytic vocation. It is certainly not the hysteric's path which is the most easily available to us, so that it is not there either that the warning takes on its greatest importance.

There is another, that of the obsessional, who, as everyone knows, is much more intelligent in his way of operating. If the formula of the hysterical phantasy can be written thus: $Q \gg ()$.

o, the substitutive or metaphorical object, over something which is hidden, namely-d) (minus phi), his own imaginary castration in his relationship with the Other, today I will only introduce and (11) begin for you the different formula of the obsessional phantasy.

But before writing it I must give you a certain number of touches, of points, of indications which will put you on the path. We know the difficulty of handling the (phi) symbol in its unveiled form. It is, as I told you above, what is intolerable in it which is nothing other than the following: it is that it is not simply sign and signifier, but presence of desire. It is the real presence of desire. I am asking you to grasp this thread, this indication that I am giving you - and which, given the time, I can only leave here as an indication in order to take it up the next time - it is that at the basis of phantasies, of symptoms, of these points of emergence where we might see the hysterical labyrinth in a way lowering its mask, we will encounter something which I would call the insult to the real presence. The obsessional, for his part also has to deal with the $G \gg$ (big phi) mystery of the signifier phallus and for him also it is a question of making it manageable. Somewhere an author, about whom I must speak the next time, who has approached in a fashion that is certainly instructive and fruitful for us, if we know how to criticise it, the function of the phallus in obsessional neurosis, somewhere for the first time has gone into this relationship in connection with a female obsessional neurosis. He underlines certain sacrilegious phantasies, the figure of Christ, even his phallus itself walked on, from which there arises for her an erotic aura which is perceived and admitted. This author immediately rushes into the thematic of aggressivity, of penis envy, and this despite the protestations of the patient.

Do not a thousand other facts which I could multiply here before you show us that we ought to dwell much more on the phenomenology, which is not an indifferent one, of this phantasizing that we too briefly call sacrilegious. We will remember the phantasy of the Ratman, imagining in the middle of the night his dead father resurrected, coming to knock on his door, and that he shows himself to him while he is masturbating: an insult here also to the real presence.

What we will call aggressivity in the obsession is always present as an aggression precisely against this form of apparition of the Other which I called at another time phallophanie - the Other in so far precisely as he may present himself as phallus. To hit out at the phallus in the Other in order to cure symbolic castration, to hit out at it on the imaginary plane, is the path the obsessional chooses in order to abolish the difficulty that I designate under the name of the parasitism of the signifier in the subject, to restore, for him, its primacy to desire but at the price of a degradation of the Other which makes him essentially a function of something which is the imaginary elision of the phallus. It is in so far as the obsessional is at this precise point of the Other where he is in a state of doubt, of suspension, of loss, of ambivalence, of fundamental ambiguity that his correlation to the object, to an always metonymical object (because for him it is true the other is essentially interchangeable), that his relationship to the other object is essentially governed by something which has a relationship to castration which here takes a directly aggressive form: absence, depreciation, rejection, refusal of the sign of the desire of the Other as such, not abolition or destruction of the desire of the Other, but rejection of its signs. And it is (12) from this that there emerges and is determined this very particular impossibility which hits at the manifestation of his own desire.

Undoubtedly to show him, as the analyst to whom I alluded above insistently did, this relationship with the imaginary phallus in order, as I might say, to familiarise himself with his impasse, is something which we cannot say is not on the path to the solution of the difficulty of the obsessional. But how can we not further retain in passing this remark that after one moment, one stage of the working through of imaginary castration, the subject, this author tells us, was not at all freed from her obsessions but only of the guilt that pertained to them.

Of course, we can tell ourselves that nevertheless the question of this method of therapy is judged by that. What does this introduce us to? To the $\hat{\phi}$ (big phi) function of the signifier phallus as signifier in the transference itself. If the question of "how the analyst himself situates himself with respect to this signifier?" is here essential it is, here and now, because it is illustrated by the forms and the impasses that a certain therapy oriented in this sense demonstrates to us. This is what I will try to tackle for you the next time.

Seminar 18 ; Wednesday 26 April 1961

I found myself on Saturday and Sunday opening for the first time for me the notes taken at different points of my seminar these last years, to see if the reference points that I gave you under the rubric of Object-relations and then of Desire and its interpretation converged without too much uncertainty towards what I am trying this year to articulate before you under the term of transference. I realised that in effect in all that I put before you and which is there, it seems, somewhere in one of the presses of the Society, there are a lot of things that you might find, I think, sometime when we have the time to get it out again, which at that time will make you say to yourselves that in 1961 there was someone who taught you something.

It will not be said that in this teaching there was no allusion to the context of what we are living through at the present time. I think that there would be something excessive in that. And also in order to accompany it I will read for you a little fragment of what I encountered the same Sunday last in Dean Swift whom I had only too little time to speak to you about when already I approached the question of the symbolic function of the phallus, even though in his work the question is in a way so omnipresent that one could say that to take his work as a whole it is articulated there as such. Swift and Lewis Carroll are two authors to whom, without my having the time to give a running commentary on them, I believe that you would do well to refer to in order to find there a good deal of the material which refers very closely, as closely as possible, as closely as it is possible in literary works, to the thematic which I am closest to at the moment.

And in Gulliver's Travels which I was looking at in a charming little edition from the middle of the last century, illustrated by Grandville, I found in "A voyage to Laputa" which is the third part, which has the characteristic of not being limited to "A voyage to Laputa".... It is in Laputa, an incredible anticipation of the space station, that Gulliver takes a journey in a certain number of kingdoms in connection with which he communicates to us a certain number of significant views which preserve for us all their riches, and specifically in one of these kingdoms, when he comes there from another one, he speaks (2) to an académicien and tells him that: "...in the kingdom of Tribnia, by the natives called Langden, where I had long sojourned, the bulk of the people consisted wholly of discoverers, witnesses, informers, accusers, prosecutors, evidences, swearers, together with their several subservient and subaltern instruments, all under the colours, the conduct, and pay of ministers and their deputies" - let us pass over this thematic; but the way in which the informers operate is explained to us - "...effectual care is taken to secure all their letters and other papers, and put the owners in chains. These papers are delivered to a set of artists very dexterous in finding out the mysterious meanings of words, syllables and letters" - it is here that there begins the point at which Swift goes at it with a joyous heart, and as you are going to see it is rather fine as regards the marrow of its substance. - "For instance, they can decipher a close-stool to signify a Privy Council,

A flock of geese a senate,
 A lame dog an invader,
 A cod's-head a -,
 The plague a standing army,
 A buzzard a prime minister,
 The gout a high priest,
 A gibbet a secretary of state,
 A chamber pot a committee of grandees,
 A sieve a court lady,
 A broom a revolution,
 A mousetrap an employment,
 A bottomless pit, the Treasury,
 A sink the Court,
 A cap and bells a favourite,
 A broken reed a court of justice.
 An empty tun a general,
 A running sore the administration.

When this method fails, they have two others more effectual, which the learned among them call acrostics and anagrams. First they can decipher all initial letters into political meanings.

Thus N. shall signify a plot.
 B. a regiment of horse,
 L. a fleet at sea.

Or secondly by transposing the letters of the alphabet in any suspected paper, they can lay open the deepest designs of a discontented party. So, for example, if I should say in a letter to a friend, Our brother Tom has just got the piles, a man of skill in this art would discover how the same letters which compose that sentence may be analysed into the following words; Resist; a plot is brought home, the tour - all is in readiness for sedition.

I think it is not a bad way to resituate at their paradoxical foundation, so manifest in all sorts of features, contemporary things using a text which is not all that old. Because in truth, since I was woken up last night in an untimely way by someone who communicated to me something that you all have more or less seen, a false report, my sleep was for a moment disturbed

(3) by the following question: I asked myself if I were not overlooking in connection with these contemporary events the dimension of tragedy. In truth this constituted a problem for me after what I explained to you last year about tragedy. I did not see appearing anywhere in it what I described for you as the reflection of beauty.

This effectively prevented me from getting back to sleep for some time. I then fell asleep again leaving the question in suspense. This morning on awaking the question had lost a little bit of its pregnancy. It appeared that we were still on the level of farce and, as regards the questions I was posing myself, the problem vanished at the same time.

This having been said, we are going to take things up at the point at which we left them the last time, namely the formula (o, o', o'^1, o''') which I gave you as being that of the phantasy of the obsessional. It is quite clear that presented in this way and in this algebraic form, it must be quite opaque for those who have not followed our preceding elaboration. I am going to try however, in speaking about it, to restore its dimensions to it.

You know that it is opposed to that of the hysteric as I wrote for you the last time. $j\phi$ Q , namely: Jf^\wedge in the relationship which can be read in several ways, desire for, is a way of saying it, big O . It is a question therefore for us of specifying what are the respective functions attributed in our symbolisation to $^\wedge$ (big ϕ) and to ϕ (little ϕ).

I strongly urge you to make the effort not to precipitate yourselves onto analogical slopes to which it is always easy, tempting to yield and to tell yourselves for example that ϕ (big ϕ), is the symbolic phallus, ϕ (little ϕ), is the imaginary phallus. It is perhaps true in a certain sense, but to remain there would be completely to expose yourselves to overlooking the interest of these symbolisations which we take no pleasure, believe me, in multiplying in vain and simply for the pleasure of superficial analogies and mental facilitations, which is not properly speaking what teaching aims at. It is a question of what the two symbols represent. It is a question of knowing what they represent in our intention. And you can already foresee, estimate their importance and utility by all sorts of indices. The year for example began with a very interesting lecture by our friend M. Georges Favez who, speaking to you about what the analyst was and at the same time his function for the analysand, gave you a conclusion like the following: that when all is said and done the analyst, for the analysand, the patient, takes on the function of his fetish. Such is the formula, in a certain respect around which he had grouped all sorts of convergent facts, at which his lecture culminated.

It is certain that this was here a very subjective view and one which, moreover does not leave it completely isolated as a formulation. It was a formulation prepared by all sorts of other things that are found in diverse articles on transference but which one cannot say is not presented in a somewhat astonishing and paradoxical form. I told him moreover that the things that we were going to articulate this year would respond in some way to the question that he had posed here.

When we read on the other hand, in a body of work which has now come to an end, an author who tried to articulate the special function of transference in obsessional neurosis, and who in short bequeaths us a body of work which, beginning from a first (4) consideration of "Therapeutic incidences of the conscious awareness of penis envy in feminine obsessional neurosis, Incidences thérapeutiques de la prise de conscience de l'envie du pénis dans la névrose obsessionnelle féminine", culminates in an action, a quite generalised theory of the function of distance from the object in the handling of transference, this function of distance quite especially elaborated around an experience which is expressed in the progress of analyses (and especially the analyses of obsessionals) as being something whose principal, active efficacious mainspring in the subject's retaking possession of the meaning of the symptom (especially when he is obsessional), of the imaginary introjection of the phallus, is very precisely incarnated in the imaginary phantasy of the analyst's phallus, I mean that there is here a question which presents itself. Already, especially in connection with the works of this author and especially, I would say, in connection with his technique, I began before you the positioning and the critique which today, in a way that is closer to the question of transference, we are going to be able to circumscribe still further.

This, it is incontestable, demands that we should enter into a quite precise articulation of what the function of the phallus is, and specifically in the transference. It is this that we are trying to articulate with the help of terms symbolised here, Φ (big phi) and ϕ (little phi). And because we well understand that it is never a question in the articulation of analytic theory of proceeding in a deductive fashion - from high to low as I might say, because there is nothing which begins more from the particular than analytic experience, something remains valid in an articulation like that of the author, to which I alluded above. It is indeed because his theory of transference, the function of the phallic image in transference begins from a quite localised experience which, one could say, may in certain aspects limit its import, but exactly in the same measure gives it its weight, it is because he began from the experience of obsessionals, and in a quite sharp and accentuated fashion, that we have to consider and discuss what he concluded from it.

It is moreover from the obsessional that we will begin today and it is for this reason that I have produced, at the beginning of what I wanted to say to you, the formula in which I try to articulate his phantasy.

I have already told you a lot of things about the obsessional, it is not a question of repeating them. It is not a question of simply repeating the fundamentally substitutive, the perpetually avoided, this sort of Hey presto! which characterises the whole way in which the obsessional proceeds in his way of situating himself with respect to the Other, more exactly of never being at the place where for the moment he seems to designate himself.

That to which there very precisely alludes the formulating of the second term of the phantasy of the obsessional, $\phi(o, o', o'', o''')$), is the fact that objects, for him, qua objects of desire, are in a way expressed as a function of certain erotic equivalences, that which is precisely in this something that we usually articulate in speaking about the eroticisation of his (5) world, and especially his intellectual world, that to which there tends precisely this fashion of noting this expressing as a function by ϕ (small phi) which designates this something. It is enough to have recourse to an analytic observation, when it is well done by an analyst, in order to perceive that ϕ (small phi) - we will see little by little what that means - is precisely what underlies this equivalence established between objects on the erotic plane. The ϕ (small phi) is in a way the unit of measurement to which the subject accommodates the small o function, the function of the objects of his desire.

To illustrate this, I have really to do nothing other than to look at the prime observation on obsessional neurosis, but you will find it moreover in all the others provided they are valid observations. Remember this feature of the thematic of the Rattenmann, of the Ratman. Why moreover is he called the rats* man, in the plural, by Freud even though in the phantasy where Freud approaches for the first time this kind of internal view of the structure of his desire, in this sort of horror seen on his face of a jpuissance he was unaware of, there are no rats, there is only one rat in the famous Turkish torture to which I will have to return later.

If one speaks about the rats' man, it is indeed because the rat makes his way in a multiplied form into the whole economy of these singular exchanges, the substitutions, this permanent metonymy of which the symptoms of the obsessional are the incarnated example. The formula, which comes from him, "so many rats, so many florins", this in connection with the payment of fees in the analysis, is here only one of the particular illustrations of this sort of permanent equivalence of all objects grasped one after another in this sort of negotiation. This metabolism of objects in the symptoms is inscribed in a more of less latent fashion in a sort of common unit, of gold unit, of standard unit, that the rat symbolises here, holding properly speaking the place of this something that I am calling ϕ (small phi), in so far as it is a certain state, a certain level, a certain form of reducing, of degrading in a certain fashion - we will see why we can call it degradation - the function of a signifier: ϕ (big phi).

It is a question of knowing what ϕ (big phi) represents, namely the function of the phallus in its generality, namely in all the subjects who speak and who because of this fact have an unconscious, in order to grasp it starting from the point of view that we are given in the symptomatology of obsessional neurosis. Here we can say that we see it emerging in these forms that I am calling degraded, emerging, you should carefully note in a fashion which we describe - in conformity with what we know and with what experience shows us in a very manifest fashion in the structure of the obsessional - as being at the conscious level. This expressing as a function of the phallus is not repressed, namely profoundly hidden, as it is in the hysteric. The ϕ (phi), which is there in the position of expressing as a function all the objects instead of the little f of a mathematical formula, is perceptible, avowed in the symptom, conscious, really perfectly visible. Conscious, conscius, that means fundamentally, originally, the possibility of complicity of the subject with himself and therefore also of a complicity with the other who observes him. The observer has almost no trouble being complicitous in it.

(6) The sign of the phallic function emerges everywhere at the level of the articulation of the symptoms. It is indeed in this connection that there can be posed the question of what Freud tries, not without difficulty, to depict for us when he articulates the function of the Verneinung. How can things be at once both said and so overlooked! Because when all is said and done, if the subject were nothing other than what is wanted by a certain psychologism which, as you know, even at the heart of our Societies always maintains its rights, if the subject were seeing the other seeing you, if it were only that, how could we say that the function of the phallus is in the position of being overlooked in the obsessional? Because it is perfectly obvious and nevertheless one can say that even in this obvious form it participates in what we call repression in the sense that, however avowed it may be, it is not, without the help of the analyst, and without the help of the Freudian register, recognised or even recognisable by the subject. It is here indeed that we put our fingers on the fact that to be a subject is something other than to be a gaze before another gaze, according to the formula which I called above psychologicistic, and which goes so far as to include in its characteristics moreover the existing Sartrian theory.

To be a subject is to have one's place in the big 0, at the locus of the word. And here it is to allow there to be seen this possible accident that at the level of the big 0 there is exercised this function which is designated by the bar in the big 0, namely that there is produced this lack of the word of the Other as such at the precise moment specifically where the subject here manifests himself as the function of ϕ (phi) with respect to the object. The subject vanishes at this precise point, does not recognise himself, and this is precisely as such through a failure to recognise that the méconnaissance is automatically produced, at this point of lack where there is found covered, unterdrückt, this function of phallicism. There is produced instead this mirage of narcissism which I would really call frenetic in the obsessional subject, this sort of alienation of phallicism which manifests itself so visibly in the obsessional in phenomena which can be expressed, for example in what one calls difficulties of thinking in the obsessional neurotic, in a fashion that is particularly clear, articulated, avowed by the subject, experienced as such: "What I am thinking", the subject tells you, in an implicit fashion in his discourse very sufficiently articulated for the hyphen to be inserted and the addition be made in his declaration, "it is not so much because it is guilty that it is difficult for me to sustain it, to make progress in it, it is because it is absolutely necessary that what I am thinking should come from me, and never from my neighbour, from another." How often do we hear that! Not alone in the typical situations of the obsessional, in what I would call the obsessionalised relationships that we in a way produce artificially in a relationship as specific as that precisely of analytic teaching as such.

I spoke somewhere, specifically in my Rome report, about what I designated as being backed up against the wall of language. Nothing is more difficult than to bring the obsessional to the point of being backed up against the wall of his desire. Because there is something which I do not know whether it has really been highlighted and which nevertheless is a very illuminating point, I will take it up in order to illuminate the term of which you know I have already made one use, the term introduced by Jones in a fashion whose ambiguities I have marked, aphanisis, disappearance - as you know this is the meaning of the word in Greek - disappearance of desire.

People have never it seems to me highlighted this thing which is so simple, and so tangible in the stories of the obsessional, especially in his efforts when he is on a certain path of autonomous research, of self-analysis if you wish, when he situates himself somewhere on the path of his research which is (7) called the realisation of his phantasy in some form or other, it seems that people have never dwelt on the function which is quite impossible to avoid of the term aphanisis. If it is employed, it is because there is a quite natural and ordinary aphanisis which is limited by the power that the subject has of what can be called holding, holding an erection. Desire has a natural rhythm and, before even evoking the extremes of the incapacity of holding, the most disturbing forms of the brevity of the act, one can remark the following: what the subject has to deal with as an obstacle, as a reef where literally something which is profoundly fundamental about his relationship to his phantasy is shipwrecked, is properly speaking what there is when all is said and done in him about always terminating, the fact is that, as regards the erection then the collapse of desire, there is a moment when the erection vanishes.

Very exactly, precisely this moment signals that, God knows, in general he is not provided with neither more nor less than what we will call a very ordinary genitality - rather even a fairly soft one I thought I could remark - and that in a word, if it were something that was situated at this level that was in question in the avatars and the torments that the hidden mainsprings of his desire inflict on the obsessional, we would have to bring our effort to bear elsewhere. I mean that I am always evoking as a counterpoint that which precisely is absolutely not our business, but which astonishes people - why do people not ask themselves why we do not make it our business - the perfecting of palaestras for sexual intercourse, to bring the body to life in the dimension of nudity and guts. I am not aware that apart from a few exceptions, one of which as you know well was very much reproved, namely that of Reich, I am not aware that this is a field to which analysts have directed their attention. As regards what he is dealing with the obsessional can expect more or less this support, this handling of his desire. It is a question in short of morals in an affair where things, in analysis or not, are kept in the domain of the clandestine, and where- consequently cultural variations do not matter very much. What is in question is situated therefore quite elsewhere, is situated at the level of the discordance between this phantasy (in so far precisely as it is linked to this function of phallicism) and the act in which he aspires to incarnate it, which with respect to this always falls short, . And naturally it is on the side of the effects of the phantasy, this phantasy which is entirely phallicism, that there develop all the symptomatic consequences which are designed to lend to it, and for which precisely he includes everything that lends itself to it in this form of isolation so typical, so characteristic as a mechanism, and which had been highlighted as a mechanism at the birth of the symptom.

If therefore there is in the obsessional this fear of aphanisis that Jones underlines, it is precisely in the measure and uniquely in the measure that it is the testing, which always turns into a defeat, of this Φ (big phi) function of the phallus as we are trying for the moment to approach it. In a word, the result is that the obsessional when all is said and done dreads nothing more than that to which he imagines he aspires, the liberty of his acts and his deeds, and the natural state if I can express myself in this way. The tasks of nature are not his strong point, nor indeed anything that leaves him sole master on (8) board, if I may express myself in this way, with God, namely the extreme functions of responsibility, pure responsibility, what one has vis-a-vis this Other in whom there is inscribed what we are articulating.

And, I am mentioning it in passing, this point which I am designating is nowhere better illustrated than in the function of the analyst, and very properly at the moment when he articulates the interpretation. You see that in the course of my remarks today that I am ceaselessly inscribing, correlatively to the field of experience of the neurotic, the one that analytic action very specially uncovers for us, in so far as necessarily it is the same because this is where "you have to go at it".

At the horizon of the experience of the obsessional, there is what I would call a certain fear of being deflated which is properly speaking related to something that we could call phallic inflation in so far as in a certain fashion the function in him of the phallus Φ (big phi) could not be better illustrated than by that of the fable of The frog who wanted to make himself as big as an ox: "The miserable creature," as you know, "puffed himself up until he burst." It is a moment in experience that is ceaselessly renewed in the real stumbling point to which the obsessional is brought at the limits of his desire. And it seems to me that there is a value in underlining it, not simply in the sense of accentuating a derisory phenomenology, but moreover in order to allow you to articulate what is in question ψ this Φ function of the phallus in so far as it is the one which is hidden behind his cashing-in at the level of the ϕ (ϕ) function.

I already began to articulate the last time this \wedge (Φ) function of the phallus by formulating a term which is that of the real presence. This term, I think your ear is sensitive enough for you to see that I am putting quotation marks around it. Moreover I did not introduce it by itself, and I spoke about "the insult to the real presence" so that already no one could be mistaken, and we are not at all dealing here with a neutral reality.

It would be quite strange that if this real presence fulfilled the function which is the radical one that I am trying here to make you approach, had not already been located somewhere. And naturally I think that you have already perceived its homonymy, its identity with what religious dogma (the one to which we have access, I mean from our birth, in our cultural context) calls by this name. The real presence, this couple of words in so far as it constitutes a signifier, we are habituated, in a near or distant way, to hear it being murmured for a long time into our ears in connection with the Roman Catholic and Apostolic dogma of the Eucharist.

I assure you that there is no need to search very far in order to perceive that this is really on the same level as in the phenomenology of the obsessional. I assure you that it is not my fault.... I spoke above about the work of someone who busied himself with focussing the research of the obsessional structure on the phallus, I am taking his principal article, the one whose title I gave above: "Therapeutic incidences of the conscious awareness of penis envy in feminine obsessional neurosis". I begin to read it, and naturally, from the first pages, there arise for me all the possibilities of critical commentary concerning for example specifically that: "like the masculine obsessional, the woman needs to identify herself in a regressive way to the man in order to liberate herself from the anxieties of early childhood; but while the former will base himself on this (9) identification, in order to transform the infantile love object into a genital love object, she, the woman, basing herself first of all on this same identification, tends to abandon this first object and to orientate herself towards a heterosexual fixation, as if she could proceed to a new feminine identification, this time to the person of the analyst." - And further on that - "a short time after the desire for phallic possession, and correlatively for the castration of the analyst, is revealed, and because of this fact, the aforementioned effects of relaxation were obtained, this personality of the male analyst was assimilated to that of a benevolent mother." - Three lines further on, we again come on this famous "initial destructive drive of which the mother is the object", namely on the major coordinates of the analysis of the imaginary in the analysis at present being conducted.

I have only punctuated in passing in this thematic, simply the difficulties at the leaps that are supposed to have been overcome by this initial interpretation which in a way summarises here as an exordium everything that subsequently is supposedly going to be illustrated. But I do not need to go beyond a half page to enter into the phenomenology of what is in question and into what this author (whose first writing it was and who was a clinician) finds to tell us, to recount to us in the phantasies of his patient who is situated in this way as obsessional. And there is really nothing else before. The first thing which comes before our eyes is the following: "She pictured for herself in imagination masculine genital organs," it is specified, "without it being a question of hallucinatory phenomena". We are quite sure of it. In effect, everything that we see accustoms us in this material to know well that it is a question of something quite different to hallucinatory phenomena.... "she pictured for herself in imagination masculine genital organs, in place of the host." It is in the same observation that, further on, we borrowed the last time the sacrilegious phantasies which consist precisely, not simply in superimposing in such a clear fashion the masculine genital organs - here it is specified for us "without there being a question of hallucinatory phenomena", namely well and truly as such in a signifying form - to superimpose them for that which is also for us, in the most precise symbolic fashion, identifiable to the real presence. what it is a question of is to reduce in a way this real presence, to break it, to pulverise it in the mechanism of desire, this is what the subsequent phantasies, those that I already quoted the last time, will be enough to underline.

I am sure that you do not imagine that this observation is unique. I will quote for you among tens of others, because the experience of an analyst never goes much beyond a hundred in a domain, the following fantasy which occurred in an obsessional at a point of his experience - these attempts at incarnating desire can in their case reach an extreme erotic pitch, in the circumstances when they can encounter in the partner some deliberate or fortuitous complaisance with what is involved precisely in this thematic of the degradation of the big Other into the small other in the field of which there is situated the development of their desire. At the very moment that the subject believed he would be able to limit himself to this sort of relationship which in their case is always accompanied with all the correlatives of an extremely threatening culpability, and which can be in a way balanced by the intensity of desire, the subject fomented the following fantasy with a partner who represented for him, at least momentarily, this very satisfying complementarity: to make the sacred host play a role so that, placed in the vagina of the woman, it found itself capping the (10) penis of the subject, his own, at the moment of penetration. You must not believe that what we have here is one of these refinements that one only finds in a specialised literature, it is really common currency in its register. This is the way it is in fantasy, especially obsessional fantasy.

So how can this not be remembered.... to precipitate all of this into the register of a canalization such as that of a supposed distance from the object in so far as the object in question is supposed to be the objectivity (this indeed is what is described for us, the objectivity of the world as it is recorded by the more or less harmonious combination of spoken enumeration with common imaginary relationships, the objectivity of the form as it is specified by human dimensions) and to speak to us about the frontiers of the apprehension of the external world as threatened by a disturbance which is supposed to be that of the delimitation of the ego from what one can call the objects of common communication.... how can it not be remembered that there is here something of another dimension: it is a question of situating the real presence somewhere and in a different register to that of the imaginary.

Let us say that it is in so far as I teach you to situate the place of desire with respect to the function of man qua subject who speaks, that we glimpse, we can designate, describe this fact that in man desire comes to inhabit the place of this real presence as such and to people it with its ghosts.

But then what does this ^ (big phi) mean? Am I summing it up by designating this place of the real presence in so far as it can only appear in the intervals of what the signifier covers, that from these intervals, if I may thus express myself, it is from there that the real presence threatens the whole signifying system? It is true, there is truth in that, and the obsessional shows it to you at every point in what you call the mechanisms of projection or of defence, or more precisely phenomenologically of incantation - this fashion that he has of filling in everything that may present itself as interspace in the signifier, this fashion that Freud's obsessional, the Rattenmann, has of obliging himself to count up to so many between the flash of lightning and the sound of thunder. Here there is designated in its true structure what is meant by this need to fill in the signifying interval as such, in this way there can be introduced everything that is going to dissolve the whole phantasmagoria.

Apply this key to twenty-five or thirty of the symptoms with which the Rattenmann and all the observations of obsessionals literally swarm, and you put your finger on the truth that is in question, and what is more at the same time, you situate the function of the phobic object which is nothing other than the simplest form of this filling in.

Here, what I reminded you about the other time in connection with little Hans, the universal signifier that the phobic object realises is that, and nothing else. Here it is is at an advance post as I told you, well before one approaches the hole, the gap realised in the interval where the real presence threatens that a unique sign prevents the subject from approaching. This is why the role, the mainspring and the reason for the phobia is not, as people who have nothing but the word fear on their lips believe, a vital danger or even a narcissistic one. It is very precisely, according to certain privileged developments of the position of the subject with respect to the big Other (in the case of little Hans, to his mother) this point where what the subject dreads meeting is a certain sort of desire of a nature to make return into the previous nothingness the whole of creation the whole signifying system.

(11) But then, why the phallus, at that place and in that role? It is here that I want today to advance far enough to make you sense what I would call its suitability, not the deduction because it is the experience, the empirical discovery which assures us that it is there, something that makes us see that it is not irrational as an experience. The phallus therefore, it is experience which shows it to us, but this suitability that I want to highlight, I want to put the accent on this fact that it is properly speaking determined in so far as the phallus, as I said, in so far as experience reveals it to us is not simply the organ of copulation but is taken up into the perverse mechanism as such.

Understand carefully what I mean. What it is a question now of accentuating is that, from the point which as structural Φ presents the accents of the signifier, something, the phallus, (big phi), can function as the signifier. What does that mean? What defines as signifier something of which we have just said that by hypothesis, definition and from the start, it is the signifier excluded from the signifier, therefore which cannot enter into it except by artifice, contraband and degradation and this indeed is why we never see it except in function of the imaginary ϕ (small phi). What is it then that allows us to speak about it as signifier and to isolate Φ (big phi)? It is the perverse mechanism.

If we make of the phallus the following natural schema, what is the phallus? The phallus, under the organic form of the penis, is not a universal organ in the animal kingdom. The insects have other ways of clinging onto one another and, without going that far, the relationships between fish are not phallic relationships. The phallus presents itself at the human level among others as the sign of desire, it is also its instrument, and also its presence. But I hold onto this sign to make you pause at an element of articulation essential to hold onto: is it simply through that that it is a signifier? It would be to go beyond a limit a little bit too rapidly to say that everything can be resumed in that because there are all the same other signs of desire. It must not even be believed that what we note in the phenomenology, namely the easier projection of the phallus because of its more pregnant form onto the object of desire, onto the feminine object for example, which made us articulate several times in perverse phenomenology the famous equivalence of a girl in the simplest form, in the setting up of the phallus, in the erect form of the phallus.... that is not enough, even though we might conceive of this sort of profound choice whose consequences we encounter everywhere as sufficiently motivated.

A signifier, is it simply to represent something for someone, which is the definition of the sign? It is that but not simply that, because I added something else the last time when I recalled for you the function of the signifier, which is that this signifier is not simply, as I might say, to make a sign to someone, but in the same moment of the signifying principle, of the signifying agency, to make a sign of someone. To ensure that the someone for whom the sign designates something assimilates this someone to himself, that this someone himself also becomes this signifier. And it is in this moment that I designate as such, expressly as perverse, that we put our finger on the agency of the phallus. Because, if the phallus which shows itself has as an effect to produce in the subject to whom it is shown the erection of the phallus also, this is not a (12) condition which satisfies in any way a natural exigency.

It is here that there is designated that which we call in a more or less confused fashion the homosexual agency. And it is not for nothing that at this etiological level it is always at the level of the male sex that we highlight it. It is in so far as the result, the fact is that the phallus as sign of desire manifests itself in short as object of desire, as object of attraction for desire, it is in this mainspring that there lies its signifying function because of which it is capable of operating at this level in this zone, in this sector where we ought both to identify it as signifier and understand what it is thus led to designate. It is nothing which is directly signifiable, it is what is beyond any possible signification - and specifically this real presence onto which today I wished to draw your thoughts to make of it the continuation of our articulation.

Seminar 19: Wednesday 3 May 1961

As you know, I am trying this year to put back in its place the fundamental question that is posed to us in our experience by transference by orienting our thinking towards what should be, in order to respond to this phenomenon, the position of the analyst in this affair. I am striving to highlight it at the most essential level, at the point of what I am designating before this appeal of the patient's most profound being at the moment that he comes to ask for our aid and our help, that which in order to be rigorous, correct, impartial, in order also to be as open as is indicated by the nature of the question which is posed to us: what the desire of the analyst should be. It is certainly not adequate in any way to satisfy ourselves with thinking that the analyst through his experience and his science, through the doctrine that he represents, is someone who would be in a way the modern equivalent, the authorised representative through the power of a research, of a doctrine and of a community, of what one could call the law of nature - someone who would redesignate for us anew the path of a natural harmony, accessible through the detours of a renewed experience.

If this year I began again before you from the Socratic experience, it is essentially in order to centre you, from the start, around this point through which we are interrogated qua "knowing", even the bearers of a secret, which is not the secret of everything, which is a unique secret and which nevertheless is worth more than everything one is ignorant of and that one may continue to be ignorant of. This is given from the start, from the condition, from the setting up of the analytic experience. However obscurely, those who come to find us already know, and if they do not know, they will be rapidly oriented by our experience towards this notion that the secret, that we are supposed to possess, is precisely as I say more precious than everything that one is ignorant of and that one will continue to be ignorant of, precisely because of the fact that this secret has to answer for the partiality of what one knows. Is it true, is it not true? It is not at this point that I have to settle it.

It is in this way that analytic experience proposes itself, offers itself, that it is approached. It is in this way that there can, in a certain respect, be defined what it introduces anew into the horizon of a man, the one that we are along with our contemporaries. In the depths of each and every one among us who tries out this experience, from whatever aspect we tackle it, analysand or analyst, there is this supposition that at least at a level that is really central, more, essential for our conduct, there is this supposition - when I say supposition I can even leave it marked with a dubitative accent, it is as an attempt that the experience can be taken on, that it most usually is taken on by those who come to us - the supposition that the impasses due to our ignorance are perhaps only determined in fact because we deceive ourselves about what one can call the power relationships of our knowledge, that in short we are posing ourselves false problems. And this supposition, this hope - I would say, with what it involves in terms of optimism - is favoured by the fact - that it has become part of common consciousness that desire does not present itself with its face uncovered, that it is not even simply at the place that the secular experience of philosophy, to call it by its name, has designated in order to contain it, to exclude it in a certain fashion from the right to domineer over us.

Very far from it, desires are everywhere and at the very heart of our efforts to make ourselves master of them; very far from it, that even in combatting them we are scarcely doing anything more than satisfying there (y satisfaire) - I say there and not them because to satisfy them would still be to consider them too much as graspable, being able to say where they are - to satisfy there is said here as one says, in the opposite sense, to get out of something or not to get out of it (y couper ou de n'y pas couper), in the very measure of a fundamental plan precisely to get out of it. Well there is no getting out of it and so little indeed that it is not enough to avoid them in order not to find ourselves feeling more or less guilty about them. In any case, whatever we may be able to testify as regards our project, that which analytic experience teaches us in the first place, is that man is marked, disturbed and disturbed by anything that we can called a symptom in so far as the symptom is that, it is, with regard to these desires whose limits or whose place we cannot define, to satisfy there always in some respect and, what is more, without pleasure.

It seems that such a bitter doctrine ought to imply that the analyst is the possessor, at some level, of the strangest measure. Because, if the accent is put on such a great extension of fundamental méconnaissance (and not at all as was done up to then in a speculative form from which it might arise in a way in the question of knowing) and in a form - that I believe that I cannot do better than describe at least for the moment as it comes to me - a textual form in the sense that it is really a méconnaissance woven into the personal construction in the broadest sense, it is clear that in making this supposition the analyst ought . . . , and for many is supposed if not to have, at least to have the duty of overcoming the mainspring of this méconnaissance, to have destroyed in himself this stopping point that I designated for you as that of the Che vuoi? What do you want? There where there is supposed to come to a halt the limit of all self-knowledge.

At the very least this path of what I would call the proper good, in so far as it is the accord of self to self on the plane of the authentic, should be open to the analyst for himself and, that at least on this point of particular experience, something could be grasped about this nature, about this natural, about this something which is supposed to be sustained by its own naivete - this something about which as you know elsewhere other than in analytic experience some scepticism or other, not to say some disgust, some nihilism or other, to use the word by which the moralists of our epoch have designated it, has seized the totality of our culture as regards what one can designate as the measure of man. There is nothing further from modern, contemporary thought precisely, than this natural idea so familiar throughout so many centuries to all those who, in any way, tended to direct themselves towards a just measure of (3) conduct, to whom it did not even seem that this notion could be argued.

What is supposed about the analyst at this level should not even be limited to the field of his action, have a local import in so far as he practices, as he is here hie et nunc as they say, but be attributed to him as habitual if you give to this word its full meaning - the one which refers more to the habitus in the scholastic sense, to this integration of oneself to the consistency of act and of form in one's own life, to that which constitutes the foundation of all virtue - more than to habit in so far as it is oriented towards the simple notion of imprinting and of passivity.

Do I need to discuss this ideal before we put a cross on it. Not of course indeed that one could not evoke examples of a kind of purity of heart in the analyst. Do people think then that it is thinkable that this ideal should be required at the beginning in the analyst, could be in any way delineated and, if one bore witness to it, let us say that it is neither the usual thing, nor the reputation of the analyst. Moreover we could easily designate the reasons for our disappointment with these weak-minded formulae which escape us at every moment whenever we try to formulate in our magisterium something which reaches the value of an ethic.

It is not for pleasure, you may well believe me, that I pause at one or other formula of a supposedly analytic characterology in order to show their weaknesses, the character of blind window, of puerile opposition, when I am trying to make shine out before you recent efforts, which are always meritorious, of mapping out the ideals of our doctrine. I see indeed one or other formulation of the genital character as an end, as an identification of our goals with the pure and simple lifting of the impasses identified at the pregenital sufficient to resolve all its antinomies, but I would ask you to see what is supposed, involved in the consequences of such a display of impotence at thinking out the truth of our experience.

It is in a quite other relativity that there is situated the problem of human desire. And if we ought to be, in the patient's search, something more than simple companions of this search, that at the very least we should never lose sight of this measure which makes of the desire of the subject essentially, as I teach it to you, the desire of the other with a big O.

Desire is such that it cannot be situated, be put in its place and at the same time be understood except in this fundamental alienation which is not simply linked to the battle of man with man, but to the relationship with language. This desire of the Other, this genitive is at once subjective and objective, desire at the place where the Other is, in order to be able to be this place, the desire of some otherness and, in order to satisfy this search for the objective (namely what is this desire this other which comes to find us_), it is necessary that we should lend ourselves here to this function of the subjective, that in some way we should be able for a time to represent not at all the object as is believed - well you must admit how derisory it would be and how simplistic also that we should be it - not at all the object that the desire is aiming at but the signifier. It is at once much less but also much more to think that it is necessary for us to hold this empty place where there is summoned this signifier which can only be by cancelling out all the others, this ϕ whose position, whose central condition in our experience I am trying to show you.

Our function, our power, our duty is certain and all the (4) difficulties are resumed in this: it is necessary to know how to occupy one's place in so far as the subject ought to be able to locate in it the missing signifier. And therefore through an antinomy, through a paradox which is that of our function, it is at the very place that we are supposed to know that we are called to be and to be nothing more, nothing other than the real presence and precisely in so far as it is unconscious. At the final term, I am saying at the final term of course, at the horizon of what our function is in analysis, we are there as that, that precisely which remains silent and remains silent in that he wants-to-be. We are at the final term in our presence our own subject at the point where it vanishes, where it is barred. It is for that reason that we can occupy the same place where the subject as subject effaces himself, subordinates himself and subordinates himself to all the signifiers of his own demand, $ O D.

This is not produced simply at the level of regression, at the level of the signifying treasures of the unconscious, at the level of the vocabulary of the Wunsch in so far as we decipher it in the course of the analytic experience, but at the final term at the level of the phantasy. I say at the final term in so far as the phantasy is the only equivalent of the instinctual (pulsionnelle) discovery through which it may be possible for the subject to designate the place of the response.... it is a question of knowing whether, in order that in the transference we should ourselves enter for the passive subject into this phantasy at the level of this supposes that in a certain fashion we should really be this ϕ , that we should be in the final term the ones who see little o, the object of the phantasy, that we should be able in any experience whatsoever, even the experience most foreign to us, to be when all is said and done this seer, the one who can see the object of desire of the other, however distant this other may be from himself.

It is indeed because this is the way things are that you see me, throughout this teaching, interrogating, surveying all the aspects in which not only experience but tradition can be of use to us, as regards this question of what the desire of man is. And in the course of this path which we have taken together, alternate from the scientific definition - I mean in the widest sense of this term science - which has been attempted of it since Socrates, to something quite opposite (in so far as it is graspable in monuments of human memory), to its tragic experience, whether it is a question like two years ago of the journey that I made you take around the original drama of modern man, Hamlet or, like last year, this glimpse that I tried to give you of what is meant in this respect by antique tragedy.

It seemed to me because of an encounter that I had, it must be said, by chance, with one of these formulations which are neither more nor less good than those that we habitually see in our circle about what phantasy is, because of having encountered in the last Bulletin de Psychologie an articulation, which I may say once again startled me by its mediocrity, of this function of the phantasy.... But after all the author, because he is the very person who wished, at one time, to form a great number of mediocre psychoanalysts, will not I think take too much offence at this evaluation. It is indeed that which gave me again - I cannot say the courage, something more is necessary - a type of (5) rage, to go once again through one of these detours whose circuit I hope you will have the patience to follow, and to seek out whether there is not in our contemporary experience something on which there could be hung what I am trying to show you, which must always be there and I would say more than ever at the time of analytic experience which is not after all conceivable as having been simply a miracle which emerged because of some individual accident or other which might be called the Viennese petit bourgeois Freud.

Naturally of course in a whole group, there are in our epoch all the elements of this theatrical art which ought to allow us to put at its own level the drama of those with whom we have to deal, when it is a question of desire and not to be satisfied with true-life stories, the stories you hear from medical students. One can gather here in passing this theme that I cited for you above of phantasy identified with the fact, certainly a lying one moreover, because one sees it clearly in the text, this is not even a case which has been analysed. It is the story of a stall-keeper who, all of a sudden, from the day that he was told that he only had twelve months to live was freed from what is called in this text his phantasy, namely the fear of venereal diseases and who, from that moment on - as the author puts it, although one has to ask oneself where he got this vocabulary because it is difficult to imagine it on the lips of the subject who is being quoted - from that moment on the one whose story is being told is supposed to have had his money's worth. Such is the uncriticised level, to a degree which is enough to make it more than suspect for you, to which there is brought the level of human desire and of its obstacles.

There is another thing which has decided me to make you take a tour, once again around tragedy in so far as it touches us and I am going to tell you immediately which one, because I will also tell you what chance leads me to refer to it. In truth modern tragedy, this time I mean contemporary, exists in more than one example, but it is not all that common. And if my intention is to bring you through a trilogy by Claudel, I will tell you what decided me on it.

It is a long time since I reread this trilogy, the one composed of The hostage, Hard bread, and The humiliated father, (L'otage, Le pain dur, Le pere humilié). I was led to it a few weeks ago by a chance whose accidental side I will tell you about - because after all it is amusing at least for the personal use that I make of my own criteria. And because moreover I told you in a formula, the value of formulae is that one can take them (6) literally, namely as stupidly as possible and that they ought to lead you somewhere, this is true for mine as well as for the others; what is called the operational aspect of formulae, is that and and it is just as true for mine, I do not pretend that only the others are operational. So that in reading the correspondence between Andre Gide and Paul Claudel, which between ourselves is a very powerful one, I recommend it to you, but what I am going to say to you has no relation to the object of this correspondence from which Claudel does not emerge with any greater stature, which does not prevent me here from putting Claudel in the first rank that he deserves, namely as one of the greatest poets who have existed.... It happens that in this correspondence where Andre Gide plays his role as director of the Nouvelle Revue Française - I mean not only of the Revue but of the books that it edits at that epoch, at an epoch which is before 1914 - it is a question precisely of the publication of The hostage. And pay careful attention, not so much as regards the content but as regards the role and the function that I have given to it - because this indeed is the efficient cause of the fact that you are going to hear me talking for one or two sessions about this trilogy which is like no other - it is that one of the problems in question for two or three letters (and this in order to print The hostage) is that it is going to be necessary to cast a character that does not exist, not simply in the printing press of the Nouvelle Revue Française, but in any other: the U with a circumflex accent. Because never at any point of the French tongue was there need for a U with a circumflex accent. It is Paul Claudel who, by calling his heroine Sygne de Coufontaine and at the same time in virtue of his own discretionary power, with an accent on the u of Coufontaine, proposes this little difficulty to typographers for introducing the replies into a correct, readable edition of what is a play. As the names of the characters are printed in capital letters, that which at the limit would not cause a problem at the level of the lower case u, causes one at the level of the capital.

At this sign of the missing signifier I said to myself that there must be something in the wind and that to reread The hostage would at the very least take me a good deal further.

This led me to reread a considerable part of Claudel's theatre. I was, as you might well expect, rewarded for it.

I would like to draw your attention to the following. The hostage, to begin with this play is a work of which Claudel himself, at the time he wrote it and when he was as you know an official in foreign relations, representing France in some capacity or other, let us say something like a counsellor, probably more than an attache* - anyway it does not matter he was an official of the Republic at a time when that still had a meaning - wrote to Andre Gide: it would be better all the same, given the very reactionary style - it is he who expresses himself (7) in this way - of the thing, that it should not be signed Claudel. Let us not smile at this prudence, prudence has always been considered a moral virtue. And believe me we would be wrong to think that because it is no longer in season perhaps, that we should for all that despise the last people who gave proof of it.

It is certain that to read The hostage I would say that the values which are debated there, which we would call faith values.... I remind you that it deals with a sombre story which is supposed to happen at the time of the emperor Napoleon I. A lady who begins to become the tiniest little bit of an old maid, do not forget it, since the time that she has devoted herself to a heroic work which is that.... let us say that it has lasted for ten years because the story is supposed to happen at the acme of Napoleonic power, that what is in question - it is naturally arranged, transformed for the needs of the drama - is the story of the constraint exercised by the Emperor on the person of the Pope. This puts us then a little more than ten years from the time when the trials of Sygne de Coufontaine began. You have already perceived, given the resonance of her name that she forms part of the ci-devants, of those who were, among other things, dispossessed of their privileges and their goods by the Revolution. And therefore since that time, Sygne de Coufontaine who remained in France, while her cousin has emigrated, has given herself over to the patient task of reassembling the elements of the Coufontaine domain. This in the text is not simply the result of a greedy tenacity, this is represented for us as consubstantial, codimensional with this pact with the land which, for the two personages, for the author also who makes them speak, is identical to the constancy, to the value of nobility itself. I would ask you to refer to the text, we will continue to speak about it. You will see the terms, which are moreover admirable, in which there is expressed this bond to the land as such, which is not simply a bond of fact, but a mystic bond, which is also the one around which is defined a whole order of allegiance which is properly speaking the feudal order, which unites in a single cluster this bond which one can call the bond of kinship with a local bond around which there is ordered everything that defines lords and vassals, birthright, the bond of patronage. I can only indicate all these themes to you in a few words. This is not the object of our research. I think moreover that you will have plenty of it if you refer to the text.

It is in the course of this enterprise therefore, founded on the dramatic, poetic, exaltation created before us of certain values which are values ordered according to a certain form of the word, that there comes to interfere the vicissitude constituted by the fact that the emigrant, absent cousin, who moreover in the course of the preceding years had on several occasions made an appearance clandestinely to Sygne de Co&fontaine, once more reappears accompanied by a personage whose identity is not (8) unveiled to us and who is none other than the Supreme Father, the Pope, whose whole presence in the drama will be defined for us as that to be taken literally as the representative on earth of the Celestial Father. It is around this fugitive, escaped person, because it is with the help of Sygne de Coufontaine that he finds himself here beyond the power of the oppressor, it is around this person that there is going to be played out the drama, because here there emerges a third personage, the one described as Baron Turelure, Toussaint Turelure, whose image is going to dominate the whole trilogy.

The whole figure of this Toussaint is delineated in a way to make us regard him with horror, as if it were not already sufficiently villainous and evil to come to torment such a charming woman, but what is more to come to blackmail her: "Mademoiselle I have desired you and have loved you for a long time but today because you have this old eternal daddy in your house, I will trap him and I will wring his neck if you do not yield to my demands...." It is not unintentionally, as you can clearly see that I connote with a touch of Punch and Judy this core of the drama. As if he were not evil enough, villainous enough, old Turelure is presented to us with all the attributes not alone of cynicism but of ugliness. It is not enough that he should be evil, he is shown to us also as lame, a bit twisted, hideous. What is more he is the one who had the head cut off all the people in the family of Sygne de Coufontaine in the good old days of ninety three, and this in the most open fashion, so that he has still to make the lady go through that. What is more he is the son of a sorcerer and of a woman who was the nurse, and then the servant of Sygne de Coufontaine who therefore, when she marries him, will marry the son of the sorcerer and of her servant.

Are you not going to say that what we have here is something which goes a little bit too far in a certain sense to touch the heart of an audience for whom these old stories have all the same taken on a rather different relief, namely that the French Revolution has all the same shown by its consequences that it is not uniquely to be judged by the measure of the martyrdom undergone by the aristocracy. It is quite clear that it is not in effect from this angle that it can in any way be received as I believe The hostage is received by an audience. I still cannot say that this audience extends very far in our nation but one cannot say either that those who attended the production, rather late moreover in the history of this play, were uniquely composed of - I cannot say the partisans of the comte de Paris, because as everyone knows the comte de Paris is very progressive - let us say those who regret the time of the comte de Chambord. It is rather an advanced, cultivated, educated audience which before The hostage of Claudel, experiences the shock, which we can describe as tragic on this occasion, that is involved in the sequence of events. But to understand what this emotion means (namely that not only does the public go along with it, but moreover, I promise you, in reading it you will have no doubt that we are dealing here with a work which has in the tradition of theatre all the rights and all the merits assignable to the greatest thing that could be presented to you), what can be the secret of what makes us experience it through a story which is presented with this aspect of a wager pushed, I insist, to the extremes of a sort of caricature, let us go further. You must not stop here at the idea that it is a question here of what the suggestion of religious values always evokes in us, because moreover it is on this that we must now dwell.

(9) The mainspring, the major scene, the centre accentuated in the drama is that the one who is the vehicle of the request to which Sygne de Coufontaine is going to yield is not the horrible and you are going to see not only horrible personage, so important for all the rest of the trilogy, Toussaint ^Turelure. It is her confessor, namely a sort of saint, the cure Badilon.

It is at the moment when Sygne de Coufontaine is not simply there as the one who has carried out through all sorts of difficulties her work of maintenance but who what is more, at the moment when her cousin has come to find her, has learnt at the same time from him that he has just experienced in his own life, in his person, the most bitter betrayal. He has realised after many years that the woman he loved was simply the occasion for him of being duped for many years, he himself being the only one not to know it; that she had been, in other words, the mistress of the one who in Paul Claudel's text is called the Dauphin - there never was an emigre Dauphin but this is not something that should worry us.

What is in question, is to show in their disappointment, their really tragic isolation, the major personages, Sygne de Coufontaine and her cousin. Some measles or whooping cough had swept away not simply the interesting personage of the cousin's wife, but the young children, his descendants. And he arrives there therefore, deprived by destiny of everything, deprived of everything except his steadfastness to the royal cause. And, in a dialogue which is in short the tragic point of departure of what is going to happen, Sygne and her cousin had become engaged to one another before God. Nothing, either in the present or in the future, will permit them to make this engagement take effect. But they have pledged their word to one another beyond everything that is possible and impossible. They are consecrated to one another.

When the cure Badilon comes to demand of Sygne de Coufontaine not something indifferent but that she should consider the following, that by refusing what the evil Turelure has proposed to her already, she would find herself in short the key to this historical moment when the Father of all the faithful is to be delivered over to his enemies or not, undoubtedly the holy Badilon does not properly speaking impose any duty on her. He goes further, it is not at all to her strength that he appeals - he says and Claudel writes - but to her weakness. He shows her, open before her, the abyss of this acceptance through which she will become the agent of a sublime act of deliverance, but where, you should carefully note, everything is done to show us that in doing this she must renounce in herself something which goes much further of course than any attraction, than any possible pleasure, even any duty, but what is her very being, the pact which has always bound her to her fidelity to her own family. She must marry the exterminator of her family, [renounce] the sacred engagement that she had just made with the one whom she loves, something which carries her properly speaking, not to the limits because we know that she is a woman who would willingly, as she has shown in her past, sacrifice her life, but that which for her as for every being is worth more than her life, not simply her reasons for living but the thing in which she recognises her very being.

(10) And we find ourselves, through what I am provisionally calling this contemporary tragedy, carried properly speaking to the limits which are the ones I taught you last year to approach with Antigone to the limits of the second death, except that here it is demanded of the hero, of the heroine to go beyond them.

Because if I showed you last year what is signified by tragic destiny; if I was able to manage I believe to locate it for you in a topology that we called Sadian, namely in this place which was baptised here, I mean by my listeners, as l'entre-deux-morts; if I showed that this place is superseded by going not as people say in a sort of ritual formula beyond good and evil (which is a nice phrase for obscuring what is in question), but beyond the Beautiful properly speaking; if the second death is this limit which is designated and which is also veiled by what I called the phenomenon of beauty, the one that explodes in the text of Sophocles at the moment when Antigone having passed beyond the limit of her condemnation - not simply accepted but provoked - by Creon, the choir bursts into the song "Eros anikate machan, Eros invincible in combat..." . I remind you of these terms in order to show you that here, after twenty centuries of the Christian era_, it is beyond this limit that the drama of Sygne de Coufontaine carries us. There where the antique heroine is identical to her destiny, Ate, to this law for her divine law which carries her towards the test, it is against her will, against everything that determines her, not simply in her life but in her being, that the other heroine by an act of liberty must go against everything that belongs to her being even down to its most intimate roots.

Life is left far behind here because, you must not forget, there is something different, which is accentuated by the dramatist in all its force: it is that given what she is (her faith-relationship with human things), accepting to marry Turelure could not simply be to yield to a constraint. Marriage, even the most execrable one, is an indissoluble marriage, which again is not nothing.... involves adhering to the duty of marriage in so far as it is the duty of love. When I say, life is left far behind, we will have the proof of this at the point of the denouement to which the play leads us. Things consist in the following, Synge therefore has yielded, she has become the baronne de Turelure. It is on the day of the birth of the little Turelure - whose destiny as you will see will occupy us the next time - that there is going to occur the vicissitude, the acme and the end of the drama. It is in occupied Paris that the baron Turelure who has come here to occupy the centre, to be the historic figure of this whole great Punch and Judy show of the Maréchaux whose faithful and unfaithful oscillations around the great disaster we know about from history, it is that day that Turelure must on certain conditions give the keys of the great city to King Louis XVIII.

The one who is the ambassador for this negotiation will be, as you might expect, as is necessary for the beauty of the drama, none other than Sygne's cousin in person. Naturally, all the most odious things that could be in the circumstances of the encounter do not fail to be added to it. Namely that among the conditions for example that Turelure puts on his good and profitable betrayal - the thing is not presented to us in any other way - there will be in particular that the prerogatives of Coufontaine, I mean the shadow of things but also what is (11) essential to it, namely the name de Coufontaine will pass to the descendants of this improper alliance.

Things of course having been brought to this degree, you will not be at all astonished that they end with a little assassination attempt with a pistol. Namely that once the conditions have been accepted the cousin (who himself moreover is far from being without beauty) prepares himself and decides to finish off, as they say, the aforementioned Turelure; who of course, having all the traits of trickery and malignity, has foreseen this and also has a little revolver in his pocket; in the time it takes the clock to strike three times, the two revolvers go off, and it is naturally not the villain who is left for dead. But the essential is that Sygne de Coufontaine throws herself in front of the bullet which is going to strike her husband and that she is going to die, in the moments that follow, through in short preventing his death.

Suicide, we would say, and not without justification, because moreover everything in her attitude shows us that she has drunk the chalice without finding in it anything other than it is, absolute dereliction, the abandonment experienced by divine powers, the determination to push to the end that which, to this degree, scarcely deserves any more the name of sacrifice. In short, in the last scene, before the gesture in which she is killed, she is presented to us as agitated by a facial tic and, in a way, showing in this way the intention of the poet to show us that this term, that last year I designated for you as respected by Sade himself (that beauty is insensible to outrage), here finds itself in a way superseded, and that this grimace of life which suffers is in a way more of an attack on the status of beauty than the grimace of death and the protruding tongue that we can evoke on the face of the hanged Antigone when Hemon discovers her.

So what happens right at the end? On what does the poet leave us in suspense as the end of this tragedy? There are two endings and this is what I would ask you to retain.

One of these endings consists in- the entrance of the King. A clownish entrance where Toussaint Turelure naturally receives the just recompense for his services and where the restored order takes on the aspects of this sort of caricatural affair, all too easy to make acceptable to the French public after what history has taught us about the effects of the Restoration. In short a sort of really derisory holy picture, which moreover does not leave us in any doubt on the judgement the poet makes with respect to any return of what can be called the Ancien Regime....

The interest lies precisely in the second ending, which is, linked by an intimate equivalence to what the poet is capable of leaving us in this image, the death of Sygne de Coufontaine, not that of course it is evaded in the first ending.

Just before the figure of the King, it is Badilon who reappears to exhort Sygne, and is not able up to the end to obtain from her anything but a "no", an absolute refusal of peace, of abandonment, of the offering of herself to God who is going to receive her soul. All the exhortations of the saint, himself torn apart by the final consequences of what he was the craftsman of, fail before the final negation of one who cannot find, from any angle, anything whatsoever which reconciles her with a fatality which I would ask you to notice goes beyond everything that one can call ananke in antique tragedy, what Mr. Ricoeur, whom I noticed was studying the same things as I in Antigone more or less at the same time, calls the function of the evil god. The evil god of antique tragedy is still something which is linked to man through the intermediary of ananke, of this named, (12) articulated aberration of which it is the orderer, which is linked to something, to this Ate of the other as Antigone says properly speaking, and as Creon says in Sophocles tragedy even though neither one or other of them came to the seminar. This Ate of the other has a meaning in which the destiny of Antigone is inscribed.

Here we are beyond all meaning. The sacrifice of Sygne de Coufontaine only culminates in an absolute mockery of her goals. The old man whom it was a question of snatching from the claws of Turelure, will only be pictured for us up to the end of the trilogy, even though he is the Supreme Father of the faithful, as an impotent father who, faced with the ideals that are coming to the fore, has nothing to offer them except the empty repetition of traditional words without their force. The so-called restored legitimacy is nothing but a lure, a fiction, a caricature and, in reality, a prolongation of the subverted order.

What the poet adds to this in the second ending is this twist in which there intersects again as one might say his challenge of having Sygne de Coufontaine exhorted with the very words of her coat of arms, her motto, which is for her the meaning of her life: Coufontaine Adsum, Cofifontaine here I am, by Turelure himself who, before his wife who is unable to speak or is refusing to speak, tries at least to obtain some sign or other, even if it were only her consent to the arrival of the new being, of recognition of the fact that the gesture she had made was to protect him, Turelure. To all of this the martyr makes no reply, until she dies, except a "no".

What does it mean for the poet to have brought us to this extreme of the default, of the mockery of the signifier itself as such? What does it mean that such a thing should be presented to us? Because it seems to me that I have sufficiently brought you through the degrees of what I would call this enormity. You will tell me that we have thick skins, namely that after all you are sufficiently confronted with all sorts of things not to be surprised by anything, but all the same..... I know that there is something in common between the measure of Claudel's poetry and that of the Surrealists [but] what we cannot doubt in any case is that Claudel, at least, imagined that he knew what he was writing. In any case it is written, such a thing was able to be born of human imagination. For us, the listeners, we know well that if it were only a question here of representing for us in a picturesque way a thematic which moreover our ears have been deafened with about the sentimental conflicts of XIXth century France.... We know well that it is something else that is in question, that this is not what touches us, grips us, leaves us in suspense, attaches us, projects us on from The hostage to the subsequent sequence of the trilogy. There is something else in this image before which words fail us. What is presented to us here according to the formula that I gave you last year di eleou kai phobou to employ Aristotle's terms, namely, not "by terror and by pity" but through all the terror and all the pity that have been superseded puts us here further on again. It is an image of a desire with regard to which again only the Sadian reference seems to have validity.

This substitution of the image of the woman for the Christian sign of the cross, does it not seem to you that it is not simply designated there - you will see it, in the most express fashion in the text because the image of the crucifix is on the horizon from the beginning of the play and we will rediscover it in the following play - but again are you not struck by the coincidence of this theme qua properly erotic with what is here specifically (and without there being something else, another thread) another reference point which allows us to transfix the whole plot and the whole scenario, that of the superseding, of the breach made beyond any value of the faith. This play in appearance by a believer and from which the believers - and the most eminent of them, Bernanos himself - turn away as if from a blasphemy, is it not for us the index of a new meaning to be given to the human tragedy? This is what the next time with the two other terms of the trilogy, I will try to show you.

Seminar 20; Wednesday 10 May 1961

Please excuse me if, in this place which is open to all, I ask those who are united by the same friendship to direct their thoughts for a moment towards a man who was their friend, my friend, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, who was taken away from us last Wednesday, the evening of my last seminar, in an instant, and whose death I heard about a few hours after this instant. It went straight to my heart. Maurice Merleau-Ponty followed his path, pursued his research which was not the same as mine. We began from different points, we had different aims and I would even say that from quite opposite aims that we both found ourselves in a position to teach. He always wished and desired - and I can say indeed that it was despite me - that I should occupy this chair. I can also say that we did not have enough time, because of this mortal fatality, to bring closer together our formulae and our enunciations. His position, with respect to what I am teaching you was one of sympathy. And I believe after the past eight days, when, you may believe me, the effect of this profound mourning that I experienced about it made me question myself about the level at which I can occupy this place, and in such a way that I can put myself in question before myself, at least, it seemed to me that from him, by his response, by his attitude, by his friendly remarks every time he came here, I draw this aid, this comfort that I believe that we had in common this idea about teaching which eliminates as far as possible every principle of infatuation, and in a word, all pedantry.

You will excuse me therefore also if today what I was going to tell you and with which I had counted on finishing this detour the reasons for which I gave you the last time, this detour through a contemporary tragedy by Claudel, you will excuse me therefore if today I do not push things further than I manage to push them. In effect, you will forgive me by reason of the fact that I had of course to forego the preparation that I usually devote to you.

We had left things, the last time, at the end of The hostage and at the emergence of an image: the image of Sygne de Cofifontaine who says "No". Having said this, this "no" at the very place to which a tragedy, that I would provisionally call a "Christian tragedy", pushes its heroine... one needs to dwell on each of these words.

I spoke to you enough about tragedy for you to know that for Hegel when he situated it in the Phenomenology of the spirit, it may be thought that these words of Christian tragedy are in a way (2) linked to reconciliation, the Versöhnung that the redemption implies being in the eyes of Hegel that which at the same time resolves the conflict of tragedy or the fundamental impasse of Greek tragedy and, in consequence, does not allow it to establish it on its proper plane, at the very most it establishes the level of what one can call a "divine comedy", the one in which the threads are in the final analysis all held by the One in whom all Good, even though it is beyond our knowledge, is reconciled. No doubt, experience goes against this noetic grasp where no doubt the Hegelian perspective fails through a certain partiality, because moreover there is reborn afterwards this human voice, that of Kierkegaard, "which comes to contradict it.

And moreover the testimony of Shakespeare's Hamlet, on which as you know we dwelt for a long time two years ago, is there to show us something else, another dimension which subsists which, at the very least, does not allow us to say that the Christian era brings to an end the dimension of tragedy. Is Hamlet a tragedy? Certainly. I think I showed you that. Is it a Christian tragedy? It is here indeed that Hegel's interrogation would catch up with us again because, in truth, as you know, in this Hamlet there does not appear the slightest trace of a reconciliation. Despite the presence on the horizon of the dogma of Christian faith, there is not in Hamlet, at any moment a recourse to the mediation of any redemption whatsoever. The sacrifice of the son in Hamlet remains pure tragedy. Nevertheless, we can absolutely not eliminate something which is no less present in this strange tragedy, what I called above the dimension of the dogma of Christian faith, namely that the father, the ghost, the one who beyond death reveals to the son both the fact that he had been killed and how and by whom, is a damned father. Strange, I have said of this tragedy all of whose resources I undoubtedly did not exhaust in my commentary before you, strange therefore this further contradiction on which we did not dwell, which is that it is not put in doubt that it is the flames of hell, of eternal damnation, that the father bears witness to. Nevertheless, it is as a sceptic, as a pupil of Montaigne, it has been said that this Hamlet questions himself: "To be or not to be, to sleep, perchance to dream", does the beyond of life deliver us from this cursed life, from this ocean of humiliation and of servitude which is life?

And moreover, we cannot avoid outlining the progression which is established of this range which, from antique tragedy to Claudelian drama, could be formulated in this way: at the level of the Oedipus complex, the father already killed without the hero even knowing it, "he did not know" not alone that it was through him that the father had died but even that he was dead and nevertheless the basis, the texture of the tragedy implies that he already is, at the level of Hamlet, this damned father, what can that mean for us beyond the phantasy of eternal damnation? Is this damnation not linked for us, to the emergence of the fact that here the father begins to know?

Undoubtedly he does not know the whole scope, but he knows more about it than is believed, he knows in any case who killed him and how he died. I left open for you in my commentary this mystery left gaping by Shakespeare, by the dramatist, of what is signified by this orchard in which death surprised him, the text (3) tells us "in the blossom of my sin" and this other enigma that it was through the ear that the poison was poured into him. What enters through the ear if not a word and what is, behind this word, this mystery of sensual pleasure?

Does not, responding to the strange iniquity of maternal jpuissance, some hubris respond here, which betrays the form that to the eyes of Hamlet the ideal of the father has, this father in connection with whom, in Hamlet, nothing is said except that he was what we could call the ideal of the knight of Courtly Love - this man who carpeted with flowers the path the queen would walk on, this man who would not allow, the text tells us, "the winds to visit her face too roughly." Such is the strange dimension in which there rests, and uniquely for Hamlet, the eminent dignity, the ever-boiling source of indignation in the heart of Hamlet. On the one hand, nowhere is he evoked as king, nowhere is he discussed, one could say, as authority. The father is there a sort of ideal of man and this deserves no less to remain a question for us, because at each of these stages we can only hope for the truth from a further revelation. And moreover - in the light of what appears, to us analysts, natural to project through the story as the question repeated from age to age about the father - you should pause for a moment to observe the degree to which, before us, this function of the father was never questioned in a way at its core.

The very figure of the father of antiquity, in so far as we have invoked him in our imagery, is the figure of a king. The figure of the divine father poses, throughout all the biblical texts, the question of a whole research: at what point does the god of the Jews become a father, at what point in history, at what point in the prophetic elaboration? All these things stir up such profound thematic, historical, exegetical questions that to evoke them here is not even to pose them. It is simply to remark that it was necessary that at some moment the theme of the problem of the father, of the "What is a father?" of Freud, must have been singularly narrowed for it to have taken on for us the obscure form of the not simply mortal but murderous knot, in which it is fixed for us under the form of the Oedipus complex. God, Creator, Providence, this is not what is involved for us in the question of the father, even though all these harmonics form the basis for it. If they form the basis of it, what we have questioned is whether this basis, through what we have articulated, is going to be illuminated retrospectively..

Henceforth is it not opportune, necessary, whatever may be our tastes, our preferences and what the work of Claudel may represent for each of us, is it not imposed on us to ask ourselves what the thematic of the father may be in a tragedy, when it is a tragedy which has appeared at the epoch when, because of Freud, the question of the father has profoundly changed?

And moreover we cannot believe that it is by chance that in Claudel's tragedy there is question only of the father. The last part of this trilogy is called The humiliated father (Le pere humilie), completing our series, a little while ago the father already killed, the father in the damnation of his death (4) the humiliated father, what does that mean, what does Claudel mean by the term humiliated father? And first of all the question could be posed in Claudel's thematic: where is this humiliated father? "Find the humiliated father", as they say on postcard riddles "find the robber" or indeed the policeman. Who is the humiliated father? Is it the Pope in so far as, even though he remains Pius, there are two of them in the play, in the space of the trilogy. The first, a fugitive, even less than a fugitive, kidnapped, to the point that here also with the ambiguity bearing always on the terms of the titles one can ask oneself if he is not The hostage, and then the Pius at the end, of the third drama, the Pius who goes to confession, an extremely touching scene and well made to exploit the whole thematic of a properly Christian and Catholic feeling, that of the Servant of the servants, the one who makes himself smaller than the smallest, in short this scene which you can read in the The humiliated father, where he goes to confession to a little monk who himself is only a goose-herd or a pig-herd it does not matter and, of course, carries within himself the ministry of the most profound and the most simple wisdom.

Let us not dwell too much on these beautiful images where it seems Claudel conforms rather to what is infinitely more exploited in an English dandyism in which catholicity and Catholicism are for the English authors, from a certain date which goes back almost two hundred years now, the acme of distinction. The problem is quite elsewhere. The humiliated father, I do not believe that it is this Pope, there are many other fathers, there is nothing but that in question throughout these three dramas. And moreover, the father one sees most of, the father in a stature which verges on a sort of obscenity, the father of a properly speaking impudent stature, the father in connection with whom we cannot avoid noting precisely some echoes of the gorilla-like form where the myth of Freud makes him appear to us right at the horizon, the father is indeed here, Toussaint Turelure, whose drama and whose murder will constitute not simply the pivot but the object, properly speaking, of the central play Hard bread (Le pain dur).

Is the humiliation of the father which is shown to us in this figure which is not simply impulsive or simply depreciated - I will come back to it and show it to you - which will go to the most extreme form of derision, a derision which even verges on the abject? Is this what we can expect from an author professing to be Catholic and to be reviving, reincarnating before us traditional values? Is it not even strange that more scandal was not aroused by a play which, when it comes out all by itself three or four years after The Hostage, pretends to hold, to captivate our attention by this episode in which I found a sort of sordidness with Balzacian echoes only emerges from an extreme, from a paroxysm, from a breaking through here also of every limit?

I do not know whether I should ask those who have not read Hard bread since the last time to raise their hands. I think that it is not enough for me to put you on a trail for you to rush onto it right away. I believe myself to be obliged, briefly, to summarise, to remind you of what is in question.

Hard bread opens with the dialogue of two women. More than twenty years have certainly passed since the death of Sygne, on the day of the baptism of the son that she gave to Toussaint Turelure. The man, who was already not very fresh at that time, has become a rather sinister old man. We do not see him, he is hidden in the wings but what we see are two women, one of whom, (5) Sichel, had been his mistress and the other Lumir, his son's mistress. The latter has come back from a land which has since taken on a certain current interest, Algeria, where she has left Louis de Coufontaine - because of course he is called Louis, in honour of the restored sovereign.

Let me not lose the opportunity of slipping in here for you a little amusing story, a little remark which it may be that someone here has already made. The origin of the word Louis, is Ludovicus, Ludovic, Lodovic, Clodovic of the Merovingians and it is nothing other - when it is written one sees it better - than Clovis with the C removed, which makes of Clovis the first Louis. One could ask oneself if everything would not have been changed if Louis XIV had known that he was Louis XV! Perhaps his reign would have changed style, and indefinitely.... anyway, with this little amusing story which is meant to cheer you up, let us pass on.

Louis de Coufontaine is still, at least people believe, on Algerian soil, and the woman who comes back to the house of Toussaint, his father, comes to reclaim from him some money that had been lent by her. It is this story which gave such great entertainment to two authors of books of celebrated parodies; parodying Claudel, it is this scene of claiming back from the old Toussaint which served as the theme for the celebrated A la manière de.... It is in this connection that a commentary is given for the generations that follow of the famous reply well worthy, truer than Claudel himself, imputed to the parodied personage when he is asked to hand back this sum which he is supposed to have robbed from an unfortunate woman: Il n'y a pas des petites économies. Look after the pennies and the pounds will look after themselves". The savings (économies) in question, are not at all the savings of the girl who has come to demand them back from Toussaint Turelure, they are nothing less than the fruit of the sacrifices of Polish emigrants.

The sum of ten thousand francs (it is even more than ten thousand francs) which was loaned by the young woman - regarding whom you are going to see in what follows the role and the function it is appropriate to give her - is what is the object of her request.

Lumir comes to claim back from the old Toussaint, not that it was to the old Toussaint that she had made the renunciation of it or the loan but to his son - the son is now insolvent not alone for these ten thousand francs but for another ten thousand. It is a question of obtaining from the father the sum of twenty thousand of these francs in the middle of the last century, namely at a time when a franc was a franc, believe me, and it was not earned in a second.

The young woman who is there encounters another one, Sichel. Sichel is the titular mistress of old Toussaint and the titular mistress of old Toussaint is someone rather thorny. It is a position which presents some coarseness, but the person who occupies it is up to it. In short, what is in question very quickly between these two women, is how to have the old man's skin. If it were not a question, before having his skin, of having something else, it seems that the question would be resolved still more quickly. Which means in short that the style is absolutely not that of tenderness, nor of the highest idealism. These two women, each one in her own way as you will see, I will come back to it, might easily be qualified as "ideals"; for us, spectators, they do not fail to depict one of the singular forms of seduction.

(6) It is necessary that I indicate to you everything that is woven in terms of calculations and of extreme calculations into the position of these two women, in the face of avarice, "this avarice which is only equalled by his licentiousness, the which is only exceeded by his dishonesty", as the aforementioned Sichel expresses herself textually speaking about Turelure. The Polish woman Lumir - pronounce it Loumyir as Claudel explicitly tells us her name is to be pronounced - is ready to go, to reconquer what she considers as a good, as a sacred law for which she is responsible, which she has alienated but which she must absolutely restore to those to whom she feels a faithful and unique allegiance (all the emigrants, all the martyrs, even the dead of this extremely passionate, emotional, thrilling cause which is the cause of Poland divided, of Poland parcelled out).... the young woman is determined to go as far as one can go, to the extent of offering herself, to the extent of yielding to what she knows to be the desire of old Turelure. Old Turelure, [she] knows in advance what can be expected of him, it is enough that a woman should be his son's wife for it to be already sure that she is not, far from it, for him, a forbidden object.

We rediscover again another trait which only very recently has been introduced into what I could call the common thematic of certain functions of the father. The other, the partner in the dialogue, Sichel - I named her above - a smart lady, knows well the components of the situation. Moreover here we have a novelty, I mean something which, in the operation of this singular game which we call the Oedipus complex, is added in Claudel. Sichel is not the mother, you should notice. The mother is dead, outside the game, and no doubt this arrangement of Claudel's drama is here something perhaps in the nature of a favour, to bring out the elements liable to interest us in this frame, in this topology, in this fundamental theatrical art, in so far as something common at the same epoch links it from one creator to another: a reflective thinking to a creative thinking. She is not the mother, she is not even the wife of the father, she is the object of a tyrannical, ambiguous desire. It is sufficiently underlined by Sichel that if there is something which attached the father to her, it is something which is a desire quite close to the desire to destroy her, because moreover he has made of her his slave and he is capable of speaking of the attachment that he bears her as having taken its origin in some charm that emerged from her talent as a pianist and from a little finger which played so well the notes of the keyboard. This piano, moreover, she has been no longer able to open since she started keeping old Toussaint's accounts.

This Sichel has therefore her own idea. This idea, we will see it flowering in the form of the sudden arrival of the aforementioned Louis de Coufontaine at the point when the drama comes to a head. Because this arrival is not without provoking a real upset, a real weakening of abject fear in the old father: "Is he really coming?" he suddenly cries, forgetting the beautiful language which a minute before, he had been using to describe the poetic sentiments that united him to Sichel, to the young woman of whom I have just spoken, "Is he really coming?" He does indeed come, and he comes because of a behind-the-scenes operation, summoned by a little warning letter from the aforementioned Sichel.

He comes to the centre and the play will culminate in a sort of singular four-sided game, as one might say, if there were not added to it the character of Sichel's father, the old Ali Habenichts (nicht, habenicht having nothing, is a play on words), (7) the old usurer who is a sort of double of Toussaint Turelure, who is the one through whom he negotiates this complicated operation which consists in taking back piece by piece and bit by bit from his own son, the goods of Coufontaine which Louis had made the mistake of claiming from him on stamped paper as an inheritance, when he reached his majority. You see how everything ends up. It is not for nothing that I evoked the Balzacien thematic. The circulation, the metabolism, the conflict on the plane of money well reduplicates affective rivalry. Old Turelure sees in his son this something precisely to which the Freudian experience has drawn our attention, this other himself, this repetition of himself, this reborn figure of himself, in whom he can only see a rival. And when his son tenderly tries at a moment to say to him: "Am I not a true Turelure?" he roughly replies to him: "Yes no doubt, but there is already one, and that's enough. As regards Turelure I am well able to fill his role".

Another thematic where we can recognise this something introduced by the Freudian discovery. Moreover this is not all, and I will say what comes to a head after a dialogue where it was necessary for Lumir, the mistress of Louis de Coufontaine, to straighten him out by all sorts of whiplash insults directly addressed to his self-love, to his narcissistic virility as we would say, to unveil before the son the propositions that she was object of on the part of the father, of this father who by his plots, wants to push him to this term of bankruptcy that he finds himself reduced to when the drama begins and who is not only going to steal away from him his land that he is going to buy cheaply thanks to his usurious intermediaries but moreover is going to ravish his wife from him, in short, to arm Louis de Coufontaine's hand against his father. And we witness on the stage this murder so well prepared by the urgings of the woman herself, who finds herself here not alone the temptress but the one who plots, who constructs the whole artifice of the crime around which there is going to occur the advent of Louis de Cofifontaine himself to the function of father.

And this murder that we see unfolding on the stage, the other stage of the murder of the father, we are going to see it taking place in the following fashion in which the two women are found in short to have collaborated. Because as Lumir says somewhere, "It is Sichel who gave me this idea". And in effect, it is during their first conversation that Sichel gives rise in the imagination of Lumir to this dimension, namely that the old man who is here animated by a desire which, for the personage that Claudel puts before us of this father who is jeered at - as I might say of this father - who is made game of; this father who is made game of in a sense which is the fundamental theme of classical comedy, but here you must understand making game of which goes further again than the lure and derision, he is made game of, as one might say, with dice, he is made game of because he is when all is said and done a passive element in the game. As is expressly evoked in this text in connection with the replies which end the dialogue of the two women, having fundamentally and mutually opened their thinking to one another, one says to the other: "Each one of us is now playing her game against death". It is precisely at this moment that Toussaint Turelure re-enters: "What were you talking about? - We were (8) talking about the game of whist last evening, the game where we were discussing strong and weak hands." And at this old Toussaint, who moreover is unaware of what is in question replies, with this very French elegance which is all the same alluded to ("He is a real French man" Sichel had said to Lumir, "oh! he is incapable of refusing a woman anything, he is an authentic French man, except for money, as regards money forget it!") by making some jests about what he was left with in this game, namely naturally the honours.

This image of the four-handed game, in another sense, which is that of whist, the one to which I alluded on several occasions myself to designate the structure of the analytic position, is it not striking to see it reemerging? The father, before the scene of the drama happens, is already dead, or almost. You only need to puff on him. And it is indeed in effect what we are going to see after a dialogue in which the codimensionality of the tragic and the clownish would make it worth our while for us to read it together. For, in truth, it is a scene which deserves to be retained in universal literature as after all rather unique in this genre, and the vicissitudes also would merit our dwelling on them, if all we had to do here was literary analysis, unfortunately I have to go a bit more quickly than I would wish if I were to make you savour all these detours.

In any case, it is really beautiful to see one of these detours. The son adjures the father to give him this famous twenty thousand francs which he knows (and with good reason because he worked out the whole affair a long time ago through the intermediary of Sichel) he has in his pocket, that they give him a hump, to leave them to him, to give them over to him in order to permit him in short, not only to honour his engagements, not simply to reconstitute a sacred debt: [he envisages] not only losing what he the son possesses, but seeing himself reduced to being no more than a slave on the very land to which he had committed all his passion. Because this land near Algiers that is in question, it is there that Louis de Coufontaine had gone to seek the shoot - in the sense of something which has sprung up again and which sprouts again - of the offspring of his being, the shoot of his solitude, of this dereliction in which he has always experienced himself, he who knows that his mother never wanted him, that his father had never, he says, seen him grow up except with uneasiness; it is to the passion for a land, it is by returning towards this something from which he finds himself hunted from any recourse to nature, this is what is in question.

And in truth, there is here a theme which would be well worth looking at again in the very historical genesis of what is called colonialism. It takes its root in an emigration which not only opened up colonised countries but also virgin lands; the source provided by all these lost children of Christian culture is indeed something which would be worth isolating as an ethical principle which one would be wrong to neglect at the moment when one is measuring its consequences.

It is at the moment therefore that this Louis sees himself at the point when this trial of strength between his father and himself (9) that he draws his pistols, the pistols with which he has been armed, and he had been armed with them by Lumir. There are two pistols. I would also ask you to dwell for a moment on this refinement. It is the artifice of dramatic art properly speaking, it is the cleverness of this refinement thanks to which that with which he has been armed are two pistols. Two pistols, I will tell you right away, which will not go off even though they are loaded.

It is the contrary of what happens in a celebrated passage by the sapper Camember. A letter from the general is given to Private Pidou. "Look," he says, "this letter is not loaded...." It is not that the general does not have the means, but it is not loaded, well "that will not prevent it from going off all the same!" Here it is the contrary. Despite the fact that they are both loaded with care by Lumir, these pistols do not go off. That does not prevent the father from dying, he dies of fright, the poor man, and it is indeed what was always expected, because moreover it is expressly for this reason that Lumir had entrusted to the hero, Louis de CoGfontaine, one of the pistols, the little one, saying to him: "This one is loaded but with a blank, it will only make a noise and it is possible that this will be enough to kill this fellow; if it is not enough then, you can use the big one which has a bullet in it".

Louis had learnt his lessons on the soil of a land which one reclaims but also which one does not acquire - this is very well indicated in the text - without some manoeuvres involving rather crude dispossession and undoubtedly, for the second shot, there is no need to fear that the hand of the one pulling the trigger wi^ll tremble any more than the first one. As Louis de Coufontaine will say later he does not like postponements. It is not with a light heart that he will go that far, "but because one is in the middle of it", he says, the two pistols will be drawn at the same time. Now, as I told you, whether one or both are loaded or not neither of them goes off. There is only a noise but this noise is enough as the indication of the scenario in the text describes very nicely: the old man stops with eyes popping out of his head, his jaw sunken. It is very pretty. We spoke about some kind of grimace of life the last time, here the grimace of death is not elegant and, my goodness, the business is finished.

I told you, and you see it, that all the refinements, as regards the imaginary dimension of the father, are here very well articulated in this sense that even in the order of efficaciousness the imaginary is enough. It is demonstrated to us by the image. But in order that things should be still more beautiful, the aforementioned Lumir reenters at that very moment.

Naturally the lad is not completely calm. There is absolutely no doubt that he is indeed a parricide, because first of all he had really wanted to kill his father and because, in fact, he has done it. The terms and the style of the concluding remarks which are exchanged at this level are worth dwelling on - I would ask you to refer to them - they do not lack a certain crudeness, a great pungency. I was able to observe that to certain ears and not the least, and who are not without merit, Hard bread, like The hostage may appear to be a little boring as plays. I (10) admit that for my part I do not find all these detours at all boring. It is rather sombre, which upsets us, the fact is that this sombreness operates exactly at the same time as a sort of comicality whose quality it must be said may appear a little bit too acid for us. But nevertheless these are no small merits. The only question is all the same where he intends to lead us. What thrills us in all of that? I am quite sure after all that this kind of Punch and Judy demolition of a father slaughtered in a clownish style is not something which is of a nature to give rise in us to feelings which are clearly localised, localisable.

What is rather nice all the same, is to see what this little scene ends on, namely that Louis de Coufontaine says stop, halt. Once the act has been done, while the girl steals the wallet from the father's pocket: "One minute, a detail, allow me to verify something". He reverses the little pistol, he fiddles inside it with things that were used at that time to load these weapons and he sees that the little pistol was also loaded, which he points out to the delightful person who had armed him. She looks at him and she has no other response than a gentle little laugh.

Is this also not of a nature to give rise to some problems for us? What does the poet mean? We will learn it undoubtedly in the third act when we see being admitted the true nature of this Lumir whom we have only seen here after all in traits that were neither sombre nor fanatical. We will see what is the nature of the desire of this Lumir. That this desire can go for her (who considers herself as destined and in a fashion that is certain) as far as the supreme-sacrifice (to be hanged which is the way she will certainly end up and which the remainder of the story indicates us as the way which she in effect ends up) does not exclude that her passion for her lover, the one who is really for her her lover, Louis de Coufontaine, goes as far as to wish for him a tragic ending, for example on the scaffold.

This thematic of love linked to death and, properly speaking, of the sacrificed lover, is something which, at the horizon of the story of de La Mole, of the decapitated de La Mole whose wife is supposed to have collected his head and that of Julien Sorel whose remains a Mademoiselle de La Mole this one imaginary is also going to rejoin, is there to illuminate for us in a literary way this thematic.

The extreme nature of the desire of Lumir is indeed what should be remembered here. It is on the path of this desire, of this love which aims at nothing other than to consume itself in an extreme instant, it is towards this horizon that Lumir summons Louis de Coufontaine.

And Louis de Coufontaine, a parricide in so far as he has entered into his inheritance by murdering his father, in a different dimension to the one he had known up to then, is going to become henceforth another Turelure, another sinister personage whose (11) caricature Claudel will not spare us either in what follows - and notice carefully that he becomes an ambassador. You would be wrong to believe that all these reflections are lavishly dispensed by Claudel without one being able to say that he is involved at his own foundations in some ambivalence. Louis refuses therefore to follow Lumir and it is because he does not follow Lumir that he will marry his father's mistress, Sichel.

I will not tell you the end of the play. It is namely how there takes place this sort of resumption, of transmutation which makes him not alone put on the dead man's shoes, but also go into the same bed as him. It is a matter of sombre stories of acknowledging debts, of a whole trafficking, of a whole insurance that the father, always astute, had made or taken before his death to ensure that those who would bind themselves to him, and specifically if it were Lumir, would not have too much of an interest in his death. He arranged things in order that his wealth might appear to be owed, to be written in the book of debts of his obscure associate, Ali Habenichts. It is in the measure that Sichel will restore this debt to him that she will acquire for him this really abnegatory title. He abnegates (as Paul Valéry said) his title by marrying her. And it is on this that the play ends: the engagement of Louis de Coufontaine and of Sichel Habenichts, the daughter of his father's companion in usury.

One can question oneself still more after this ending, about what the poet means - and specifically at the point that he himself and his own thinking are involved - when he forges for us what can well be called, properly speaking, now that I have recounted it to you in the way I have, this strange comedy. At the heart of Claudel's trilogy just as at the beginning there was a tragedy which split the canvas, which went beyond anything thought possible, in terms of the exigency imposed on the heroine (and on the place that her image occupies at the end of the first play) at the end of the second, there can be nothing but the total obscurity of a radical derision - going as far as something of which certain echoes may after all appear rather antipathetic to us in so far as for example the Jewish position finds itself, one really cannot say why, involved.

Because the accent is put there on Sichel's feelings. Sichel articulates what her position in life is. We must advance without any more reluctance into this element of Claudel's thematic, because moreover I am not aware that anyone whatsoever has ever imputed to Claudel feelings about this that we might qualify in any way as suspect. I mean that the exalted grandeur of the Old Law, more than respected by him, never ceased to dwell in the least personages who may be attached to it in his dramatic work. And every Jew, essentially, for him is attached to it, even if he is a Jew who precisely finds himself rejecting this Old Law and saying that it is the end of all these old laws that he wishes for and aspires to, that what he is going towards, is the sharing by all of this something which alone is real and which is jouissance. This indeed in effect is the language of Sichel and this is how she presents herself to us before the murder, much more again after, when she offers to Louis de Coufontaine the love which it is revealed had always animated her in his regard.

Is there not here again a further problem which is proposed to us in this strange arrangement? I see that in letting myself be drawn into, and it was necessary that I should do so, telling you the central story of Hard bread (today I will scarcely do more (12) than in short propose this to you) a play that perhaps will be produced again, which has been put on a number of times, and of which one cannot say either that it is badly constructed, nor that it does not hold our attention.... Does it not seem to you that to see it closing after this strange vicissitude that you find yourself here before the figure - as one speaks of a figure in ballet, in a scenario - of a cipher which essentially proposes itself to you in a really unprecedented way through its opacity, by the fact that it only appeals to your interest on the plane of the most total enigma.

Time does not permit me, in any way, even to approach what would allow us to resolve it, but understand that if I propose it to you, or if simply I remark that it is not possible not to take notice of such a construction in - I would not say the century - in the decade of the bringing to birth of our thinking about the Oedipus complex You should understand why I am bringing it forward here and that which, with the solution that I think that I am going to contribute to it, justifies my sustaining it for such a long time, in such a detailed fashion, before your attention: the father.

If the father came at the beginning of analytic thinking in this form all of whose scandalous traits precisely comedy is well made to bring out for us; _if Freud had to articulate as being at the origin of the law a drama and a figure the problem of which it would be enough for you to see brought onto the contemporary stage in order to measure, not simply the criminal character, but the possibility of caricatural, even abject deconstruction as I said above, this is why this was required by the only thing which justifies us, ourselves, in our research, and which is moreover our object. What makes it necessary that this image should have emerged at the horizon of humanity if not its consubstantiality with the highlighting, the bringing into operation of the dimension of desire, in other words, the following which we tend to reject always more from our horizon, indeed to deny in our experience, paradoxically more and more, we analysts, the place of the father. Why? Simply because it is effaced in the whole measure that we lose the sense and the direction of desire, where our action with regard to those who entrust themselves to us would tend to put on this desire some gentle halter or other, some soporific or other, some fashion or other of suggesting which brings it back to need.

And this indeed is why we always see more, and more and more, at the foundation of this Other that we evoke in our patients, only the mother, there is unfortunately something that resists, it is that we call this mother castrating. And why, thanks to what is she that? We know it well in experience and this is the cord which keeps us in contact with this dimension that must not be lost. It is this, from the point that we are at and from the point of the reduced perspective which we have by the same token, it is that the mother is all the more castrating in that she is no longer occupied with castrating the father. It is in the measure - and I would ask you to refer to your clinical experience - [that] the mother entirely occupied with castrating the father, that exists but we see it or not or indeed there is nothing to be castrated, but from that moment on there would be no reason to bring into play the mother as castrating if there were not this neglected or absent possibility, the maintenance of the dimension of the father, of the drama of the father, of this function of the father around which as you clearly see there is debated for us, for the moment, what interests us in the position of transference.

(13) We know well that we cannot operate either in our position as analysts the way Freud, who took on in analysis the position of the father, operated - and this is what stupefies us in his way of intervening. And it is for this reason that we no longer know where to hide ourselves because we have not learned to rearticulate, henceforth, what our own position should be. The result, is that we spend our time telling our patients: "You are taking me for a bad mother" which is not all the same the position that we should adopt either.

What I am searching for before you and the path which (with the help of Claudel's drama as you will see) I am trying to put you back on, is to resituate at the heart of the problem of castration, because castration and its problem are identical with what I would call the constitution of the subject of desire as such - not the subject of need, not the frustrated subject, the subject of desire. Because, as I have stressed it enough before you, castration is identical to this phenomenon which means that the object of its lack, for desire, because desire is lack, is in our experience identical to the very instrument of desire, the phallus. I am indeed saying that the object of its lack, for desire, whatever it may be, even on a different plane to the genital one, because it is characterised as object of desire and not of one or other frustrated need, must necessarily come to the same symbolic place that has been occupied by the very instrument of desire, the phallus, namely this instrument in so far as it is raised to the function of signifier.

This is what I will show you the next time to have been articulated by the poet, by Claudel, even though he had, even though of course he had absolutely no suspicion of the formulation into which his creation might one day be put. It is only more convincing. Just as it is altogether convincing to see Freud, in The interpretation of dreams, enunciate in advance the laws of metaphor and metonymy.

And why is this instrument raised to the function of signifier? Precisely to occupy this place which I have just spoken about, a symbolic one. What is this place? Well! Precisely it is the place of the dead point occupied by the father qua already dead. I mean that from the simple fact that he is the one who articulated the law his voice behind cannot but lose its strength. Because moreover either he is lacking as a presence, or as a presence he is only too much there. It is this point where everything that is enunciated repasses through zero between the yes and the no. I am not the one who invented this radical ambivalence of being neither fish nor fowl, and in order not to be speaking Chinese, between love and hatred, between complicity and alienation.

The law, in a word, in order to establish itself as law requires as an antecedent the death of the one who supports it; that there should be produced at this level the phenomenon of desire, is what it is not simply enough to say. This is the reason why I force myself before you to foment these topological schemas which allow us to locate this radical gap. It develops itself and completed desire is not simply this point, it is what one can call a totality in the subject, this totality of which I am trying to mark for you not simply the topology in a paraspatial sense (the thing which is illustrated) but also the three moments of this explosion at the end of which there is realised the configuration of desire, an appeal to the first, and you can see it marked in the generations. And it is for this reason that (14) there is no need, in order to situate the composition of desire in a subject to go back in a perpetual recurrence to our father Adam. Three generations suffice.

In the first, the mark of the signifier, this is what is illustrated in an extreme and tragic way in Claudel's composition by the image of Sygne de Coufontaine, carried to the destruction of her being by having been totally torn away from all her attachments of word and faith.

In the second moment, what results from it, because even on the poetic plane things do not stop at poetry, even the personages created by Claudel's imagination, this culminates with the apparition of a child. Those who speak and who are marked by the word engender, there slips into the interval something which is first of all infans. And this, is Louis de Coufontaine, in the second generation the totally rejected object, the undesired object, the object qua not desired.

How is there composed, is there delineated before our eyes, in this poetic creation, what is going to result from it in the third generation, I mean at the only real one, I mean that it is there also at the level of all the others, the others are artificial deconstructions of it naturally, they are the antecedents of the only one that is in question. How desire composes itself between the mark of the signifier and the passion for the partial object, this is what I hope to articulate for you the next time.

Seminar 21: Wednesday 17 May 1961

"Cofontaine, I am yours! Take and make of me what you will.

Whether I am wife, or already beyond life, where the body no longer serves,

Our souls are welded together without alloy!"

I wanted to indicate to you, throughout the text of the Trilogy, the recurrence of a term which is the one which articulates love in it. It is to these words of Sygne, in The hostage, that Cofontaine is going to respond immediately:

"Sygne, last to be found, do not deceive me like the rest. Is there therefore to be at the end for me Something solid for me outside my own will?"

And everything is there in effect. This man that everything has betrayed, that everything has abandoned, who leads, he says: "this life of a hunted animal, without a safe hiding place," remembers what the Indian monks say, "that this whole evil life

Is vain appearance, and only remains with us because we move along with it,
And that it would be enough simply for us to sit and be still

For it to pass from us.

But these are vile temptations; I at least in this collapse of all Remain the same, with the same honour and duty.

But you, Sygne, think of what you say. Do not grow weak like the rest, at this hour when I am reaching my end.

Never deceive me...."

Such is the beginning which gives its weight to the tragedy. Sygne finds herself betraying the very person to whom she has committed herself with all her soul. We rediscover this theme of the exchange of souls - and of the exchange of souls

(2) concentrated into an instant, later on, in Hard bread - in the dialogue between Louis and Lumir - Loum-yir as Claudel expressly indicates to us the name of the Polish woman should be pronounced - when, the parricide accomplished, the dialogue is engaged between her and him, in which she tells him that she will not follow him, that she will not return with him to Algeria, but that she invites him to come and consummate with her the mortal adventure which awaits her. Louis who, at that moment had just undergone precisely the metamorphosis which is consummated in him by the parricide, refuses her. There is nevertheless still a moment of oscillation in the course of which he addresses Lumir passionately, telling her that he loves her as she is, that there is only one woman for him, to which Lumir herself, captivated by this appeal of death which gives the meaning of her desire, responds to him:

"Is it true that there is only one woman for you? Ah, I know it is true! Ah, say what you will! There is still in you something which understands me and which is my brother!

A rupture, a weariness, an emptiness which cannot be filled.

You are no longer the same as any other. You are alone. You will never be able to cease to have done what you have done, (softly) parricide!

We two are alone in this horrible desert.

Two human souls in the nothingness who are capable of giving themselves to one another,

And in a single second, like the explosion of all time annihilating itself, to replace everything with one another!

Is it not good to be without any prospects? Ah, if life were long.

It would be worthwhile being happy. But it is short and there are ways of making it still shorter.

So short that eternity is held within it!"

Louis: "I have only to create eternity."

Lumir: "So short that eternity is held within it! So short that this world which we want nothing of and this happiness that people make so much of is contained in it!

So small, so straitened, so strict, so shortened, that nothing other than we two is contained in it!"

And she goes on later:

"And I, I shall be the Homeland between your arms, the Sweetness once abandoned, the land of Ur, the antique Consolation!

There is only you and I in the world, there is only this single moment indeed when we will have seen one another face to face!

Accessible to the end to this mystery we enclose.

There is a way of drawing one's soul from one's body like a sword, loyal and full of honour, there is a way of breaking the wall.

There is way of making an oath and of giving oneself entirely to this other who alone exists.

Despite the horrible night and the rain, despite that which surrounds us like nothingness.

 Like honest men!
 To give oneself and to believe entirely in the other!
 To give oneself and to believe in a single lightning flash!
 - Each of us for the other and for that alone!"

Such is the desire expressed by the one who, after the parricide, is put aside by Louis in order to marry, as it is said: "the mistress of his father". This is the turning point of the transformation of Louis, and it is this which is going, today, to allow us to question ourselves about the meaning of what is going to be born of him, this Pensée de Coufontaine, a feminine figure who, at the dawn of the third phase of the Trilogy, corresponds to the figure of Sygne and by means of whom we are going to question ourselves about what Claudel meant to say here.

Because indeed, if it is easy and customary to rid oneself of any word that is articulated outside the paths of routine by saying: "That's by so-and-so" - and you know that people do not fail to say it about the person who is now speaking to you - it seems that no one even dreams of being astonished at the poet whom here (4) people are content to accept in his singularity. And before the strange things in a theatre like that of Claudel, no one dreams of questioning any more the improbabilities, the scandalous features into which he draws us, that which, after all, emerges from the contrast between what may well be his Christian vision and his design.

In the third play, The humiliated father, what is the meaning of Pensée de Coufontaine? We are going to question ourselves about the meaning of Pensée de Coufontaine as we would a living personage. It is a question of Pensee's desire - thought's desire - and in Pensee's desire, we are going to find, of course, the very thought of desire. Naturally, you must not believe that this is, at the level that Claudel's tragedy is maintained, an allegorical interpretation. These personages are symbols only in so far as they operate at the same level, at the heart of the incidence of the symbolic on a person. And this ambiguity of the names, which are conferred, given them by the poet, is there to indicate to us the legitimacy of interpreting them as moments of this incidence of the symbolic on flesh itself.

It would be quite easy to amuse ourselves by reading into the very orthography given by Claudel to this singular name of Sygne, which begins with an S which is really there as an invitation to recognise it as sign, with in addition precisely, in this imperceptible change in the word, this substitution of the y for the i, what that means, this superimposition of the mark, and to recognise in it, through some convergence or other a cabalistic mater lectionis, something which comes to meet our S by means of which I showed you that this imposition of the signifier on man is at once both what marks him and what disfigures him.

At the other end, Pensée. Here the word is left intact. And in order to see what is meant by this thought of desire, we must Indeed begin again from what is signified, in The hostage, by the passion Sygne undergoes. That on which the first play of the Trilogy left us gasping, this figure of the sacrificed woman who makes the sign "no", is indeed the mark of the signifier raised to its supreme degree, the refusal raised to a radical position that we must investigate.

In investigating this position, we rediscover a term which is one which belongs to us, through our experience, to the highest degree if we know how to question it, because if you remember (5) what I taught you at one time, here and elsewhere, in the Seminar and at the Society and, on several occasions if I asked you to revise the usage which is made today in our experience of the term frustration, it is to encourage you to come back to what is meant, in Freud's text where this term frustration is never employed, by the original term of Versagung, in so far as its accent can be placed well beyond, at a far deeper level than any conceivable frustration.

The term Versagung in so far as it implies the failure to keep a promise, and the failure to keep a promise for which already everything had been renounced, this is the exemplary value of the personage and of the drama of Sygne. What she is asked to renounce, is that to which she has already committed all her energy, to which she has already bound her whole life, to what was already marked with the sign of sacrifice. This second-degree, most profound dimension of refusal, which, through the operation of the word, can at once be required, can be opened out to an abyssal realisation, this is what is proposed to us at the origin of Claudel's tragedy, and it is moreover something to which we cannot remain indifferent. It is something which we cannot simply consider as extreme, excessive, paradoxical in a sort of religious folly, because quite the contrary, as I am going to show you, it is there precisely that we have placed ourselves, we, men of our time, in the very measure that this religious folly is absent for us.

Let us carefully observe what is in question for Sygne de Coufontaine. What is imposed on her is not simply order and constraint. What is imposed on her is to engage herself, and freely, in the path of marriage with the one whom she calls the son of her servant and of the sorcerer Quiriace. As regards what is imposed on her, there is nothing which is not linked for her to something accursed. Thus the Versagung, the refusal from which she cannot loose herself, becomes indeed what the structure of the word implies: Ver-sagung, the refusal concerning what is said. And if I wanted to equivocate in order to find the best translation: perdition. Here everything which is condition becomes perdition, and this is why the "not to say" becomes the "not-saying" (le dit-non).

We have encountered this extreme point, and what I want to show, is that here it is superseded. We have encountered it at the end of the Oedipal tragedy, in the me phunei of Oedipus at (6) Colonos, this "may I not be" which all the same means not to be born, where, I remind you in passing, we find the true place of the subject in so far as he is the subject of the unconscious. This place, is the me or this very particular ne of which we only grasp the vestiges in language at the moment of its paradoxical apparition in terms like "je crains qu'il ne vienne" or "avant qu'il n'apparaisse", where it appears to grammarians as an expletive, even though it is precisely there that there is shown the point where there is designated, not the subject of the enunciated which is the I, the one who is actually speaking, but the subject in which there originates the enunciating, this "ne sois-je", or this "ne fus-je", "ne fiam", or to be closer this "n'etre" which so curiously equivocates in French with the verb of being born (naitre), here is where we have got to with Oedipus. And what is designated there, if not that, because of the imposition on man of a destiny, of a burden of parental structures, something has covered him which already makes of his entry into the world the entry into the implacable operation of a debt. When all is said and done, it is simply this burden, that he receives, from the debt, from the Ate, which precedes him, that he is guilty of.

Something else has happened since, the Word has become incarnate for us, he has come into the world and, against the word of the Gospel, it is not true that we have not recognised him. We have recognised him and we are living out the consequences of this recognition. We are at one of the terms of one of the phases of the consequences of this recognition. Here is what I would like to articulate for you. It is that for us the word is not at all simply the path we insert ourselves into in order each one of us to carry our burden of this debt which is our destiny, but that it opens up for us the possibility of a temptation from which it is possible for us to curse ourselves, not at all simply as a particular destiny, as a life, but as the very way on which the Word engages us, and as encounter with the truth, as moment (heure, heurt) of truth.

We are no longer simply within the range of guilt because of the symbolic debt, it is for having the debt to our charge that we can be - in the closest (proche) sense that the word indicates - reproached. In short, it is because the debt itself where we have our place can be taken away from us, that we can experience ourselves as totally alienated from ourselves. The antique Ate, no doubt, rendered us guilty of this debt, of yielding to it, but (7) by renouncing it, as we are now able to do, we are burdened with an unhappiness which is still greater because this destiny is no longer anything. In short, what we know, what we touch in our everyday experience, is the guilt that remains with us, what we put our finger on in the neurotic. It is what must be paid precisely because the God of destiny is dead. That this God is dead is at the heart of what is presented to us in Claudel. This dead God is here represented by this outlawed priest who is no longer made present for us except under the form of what is called The hostage - the hostage, which gives its title to the first play of the Trilogy, a shadowy figure of what the antique faith was is only a hostage in the hands of politics for those who want to use him for the goals of the Restoration.

But the other side of this reduction of the dead God is the fact that it is the faithful soul who becomes the hostage, the hostage of this situation where there is properly reborn, beyond the end of Christian truth, the tragic, namely that everything vanishes from it if the signifier can be captive. The only one who can be hostage, naturally, is the one who believes, Sygne, and, because she believes, must bear witness to what she believes in and precisely by that is caught, captivated in the situation which it is enough to imagine, to forge in order for it to exist. The fact is that by being called to rivet herself to the negation of what she believes, she is held as hostage in the negation, even undergone, of what is best in her. Something is proposed to us which goes much further than the misfortune of Job and his resignation. To Job there is reserved the whole weight of the misfortune that he has not deserved, but the heroine of the modern tragedy is asked to assume as a jpuissance the very injustice which fills her with hcrpr.

This is what ppens up as a ppssibility before the being who speaks, the fact of being the support of the Word at the moment when she is asked to guarantee this Word. Man has become the hostage of the Word because he has told himself or moreover in order that he should tell himself that God is dead. At that moment, there opens out this gap where nothing more, nothing else can be articulated than what is only the very beginning of the ne fus-je, "may I not have been", which can no longer be anything other than a refusal, a no, a ne, this tic, this grimace, in short, this weakening of the body, this psychosomatic occurrence which is the term at which we have to encounter the mark of the signifier.

(8) The drama, as it is pursued throughout the three moments of the tragedy, is to know how from this radical position a desire can be reborn and which one.

It is here that we are brought to the other end of the Trilogy, to Pensee de Co&fontaine, to this incontestably seductive figure, manifestly proposed to us spectators - and what spectators, we are going to attempt to say - as properly speaking the object of desire. And one only has to read The humiliated father, one only has to listen to those who find this story deadly dull - for what could be more deadly dull! What harder bread could be offered to us than that of this undertaking, this father who is put forward in the figure of an obscene old man and whose murder depicted before us is the only thing which leads to the possibility of a pursuit of something which is transmitted and which is only the most degraded, degenerate face - that of Louis de Covtfontaine - of the figure of the father.

One only has to listen to what has struck everyone, the ingratitude that is represented by the apparition, at a night festival in Rome, at the beginning of The humiliated father, of the figure of Pensee de Coufontaine, in order to understand that it is presented to us here as an object of seduction. And why and how? What is she balancing? What is she compensating for? Is something going to come back to her because of Sygne's sacrifice? Is it in the name of her grandmother's sacrifice that she, in a word, is going to merit some respect? Certainly not. If, at a moment, an allusion is made to it, it is in a dialogue of two men - who are going to represent for her the approach of love - with the Pope, and an allusion is made to this old family tradition as to an ancient story that is told. It is in the mouth of the Pope himself, addressing himself to Orian, who is the one in question, who is at stake in this love, that there is going to appear in this connection the word superstition: "Are you going to yield, my son, to this superstition!". Is Pensee even going to represent something like an exemplary figure of a renaissance of the Faith eclipsed for an instant? Far from it.

Pensee is a "free thinker", if one can express oneself in this way, with a word which is not here the Claudelian term, but this indeed is what is in question. Pensee is only animated by a single passion that, she says, of a justice which for her goes beyond all the exigencies of beauty itself. What she wants, is Justice, and not just anyone whatsoever, not ancient justice, that of some natural right to a distribution or a retribution. (9) This justice that is in question, absolute justice, justice which animates the movement, the noise, the progress of the Revolution, and which forms the background noise of the third drama, of The humiliated father, this justice is indeed precisely the reverse of all that which, in the real, of all that which, in life, is felt by the Word as offending justice, felt as a horror for justice. It is of a justice which is absolute in all its power to shake the world that there is question in the discourse of Pensee de Coufontaine.

As you see, it is indeed the thing which may appear to us as the furthest thing from the preaching we might expect from Claudel, the man of faith. It is indeed what is going to allow us to give its meaning to the figure towards which converges the whole drama of The humiliated father. In order to understand it, we must dwell for a moment on what Claudel made of Pensee de Coufontaine, represented as the fruit of the marriage of Louis de Coufontaine with the one in short that his father had given him as wife, through the simple fact that this woman, Sichel, had already been his wife, an extreme, one might say, paradoxical, caricatural point of the Oedipus complex.

This obscene old man who is presented to us forces this son.... - this is the limiting point, the frontier of the Freudian myth which is proposed to us - he forces his sons to marry his wives and, in the very measure that he wants to steal their own, another more advanced and here more express way of accentuating what comes to light in the Freudian myth. This does not produce a better quality father, this produces another blackguard and it is indeed in this way that Louis de Coufontaine, is represented to us throughout the drama. He marries whom he wants, for his part, as object of his jouissance. He marries this singular figure of the woman, Sichel, who rejects all the burdens of the law, and specifically of her own, of the Old Law, of the holy spouse, the figure of the woman in so far as it is that of patience, the one indeed who brings to light her will to encompass the world.

What is going to come to birth from this? What is going to come to birth from this in a singular way, is the renaissance of the very thing which the drama of Hard bread shows us to have been set aside, namely this same desire in its absoluteness which was represented by the figure of Lumir. This Lumir - as singular name, one should dwell on the fact that Claudel, in a little note, indicates to us that it should be pronounced Loum-yir; this must be referred to what Claudel tells us about the fantasies of (10) the old Turelure of always bringing to each name this little derisory modification which means, that he calls Rachel "Sichel", which means, the text tells us, in German: the sickle, this name being the one that the crescent of the moon figures in the heavens, a singular echo of the figure which terminates the Ruth and Booz of Hugo; Claudel carries out unceasingly this same game of altering names, as if he himself here assumed the function of old Turelure - Lumir, this is what we will rediscover later in the dialogue between the Pope and the two personages of Orso and Orian, like the light (lumiere) - "the cruel light!". This cruel light illuminates us about what the figure of Orian represents, because however faithful he may be to the Pope, this cruel light he mentions, makes him, the Pope, start. "Light," the Pope tells him, "is not cruel." But there is no doubt that it is Orian who is right when he says it. The poet is on his side. Now, the one who is going to incarnate the light obscurely sought without knowing it by her mother herself, this light sought with a patience ready to serve everything and accept everything, is Pensee, Pensee her daughter, Pensee who is going to become the incarnated object of the desire of this light. And this flesh and blood Pensee, this living Pensee, the poet can do nothing other than to imagine that she is blind and to represent her to us as such.

I think I should pause for a moment. What does the poet mean by this incarnation of the object, of the partial object, of the object in so far as it is here the reemergence, the effect of the parental constellation, as a blind person? This blind person is going to be paraded before our eyes throughout this third play and, in the most moving fashion, she appears at a masked ball, where there is represented the end of a period of this Rome which is on the eve of its being taken by the Garibaldians. It is a sort of end also which is celebrated in this night festival, that of a noble Pole who, pushed to the limits of his solvency, is going to see the bailiffs entering his property on the following day. This noble Pole is here moreover in order, for a moment, to recall to us, under the form of a figure on a cameo, a person whom we have heard being talked about on many occasions and who died very sadly. Let us mark this with a cross, let us not speak about it any more. All the spectators understand clearly that it is a question of the aforementioned Lumir, and also this noble, completely burdened with the nobility and the romanticism (11) of martyred Poland, is all the same the type of nobleman who always finds himself inexplicably always having a villa to sell off.

It is in this context that we see the blind Pensée walking as if she could see clearly. Because her surprising sensitivity allows her, in a brief preliminary visit, by means of her subtle perception, to be aware of echoes, approaches, movements, once she has taken a few steps.... to map out the whole structure of a place. If we, spectators, know that she is blind, throughout a whole act, those who are with her, the guests at this feast, could be in ignorance of it, and especially the one that her desire is directed towards. This personage, Orian, is worth presenting in a word for those who have not read the play.

Orian, reduplicated by his brother Orso, bears this very Claudelian name, which seems, by its sound and by the same construction, slightly: deformed, accentuated as regards the signifier by a peculiarity which is the same as the one we rediscover in so many of the personages of Claudelian tragedy - remember Sir Thomas Pollock Nageoire - of Homodarmes. That has as nice a sound as the one in the text about the suits of armour, by André Breton, in "Le peu de réalité". These two personages Orian and Orso are at stake. Orso is the honest lad who loves Pensée. Orian, who is not quite a twin, who is the big brother, is the one towards whom Pensée has directed her desire. Why towards him, if not because he is inaccessible. Because, to tell the truth, for this blind person, the Claudelian text and myth indicate to us that she can scarcely distinguish them by voice, to the point that at the end of the drama, Orso, for a moment, will be able to sustain the illusion of being the dead Orian. It is indeed because she sees something different for it to be the voice of Orian, even when it is Orso who is speaking, which can make her fail.

But let us dwell for a moment on this blind girl. What does she mean? Does it not seem to us, in order to see at first what she projects before us, that she is thus protected by a sort of sublime figure of modesty which is based on the fact that, not being able to see herself being seen, she seems to be protected from the only gaze which unveils her?

And I do not think that it is an eccentric remark to bring in this dialectic that I formerly put before you around the theme of the perversions which are called exhibitionistic and voyeuristic, (12) when I pointed out to you that they could not simply be grasped with respect to the one who sees and who shows himself to a partner who is simply other, object or subject, that what is involved in the phantasy of the exhibitionist as in that of the voyeur, is a third element which implies that in the partner there may blossom a complicitous consciousness which receives what he is given to see; that what flowers in her apparently innocent solitude offers itself to a hidden gaze; that thus it is the desire itself which sustains its function in the phantasy which veils from the subject his role in the act; that the exhibitionist and the voyeur in a way themselves enjoy as seeing and as showing, but without knowing what they are seeing and what they are showing.

For Pensée, here she is then, she who cannot be surprised, as I might say, because she can be shown nothing which submits her to the small other, nor can she be seen without the one who spies being, like Acteon, struck with blindness, beginning to be torn to pieces by the bites of the pack of his own desires.

The mysterious power of the dialogue which takes place between Pensee and Orian - Orian which is only except for a letter precisely the name of one of one of the hunters that Diana metamorphised into a constellation - this mysterious admission with which this dialogue ends: "I am blind" has, just by itself, the force of an "I love you" because it avoids any awareness in the other of the "I love you" being said, in order to go straight and place itself in him as a word- Who could say: "I am blind", except from where the_jword creates the night? Who, in hearing it, would not feel coming to birth in himself this depth of night?

Because it is there that I want to lead you: it is to the distinction, to the difference there is between the relationship of "seeing oneself" and the relationship of "hearing oneself". Naturally, it is remarked and it has been long remarked that it is proper to phonation to resonate immediately in the subject's own ear according as it is emitted, but this does not mean that the other to whom this word is addressed, has the same place or the same structure as that of visual unveiling, precisely because the word, for its part, does not give rise to sight because it is, itself, blindness. One sees oneself being seen, that is why one escapes from it, but one does not hear oneself being heard. Namely that one does not hear oneself where one is heard, namely in one's head, or more exactly those who are in this situation - there are in effect those who hear (13) themselves being heard and these are the mad, the hallucinators, it is the structure of verbal hallucination - could not hear themselves being heard except at the place of the Other: there where one hears the Other sending back your own message in its inverted form. What Claudel means by the blind Pensee, is that it is enough that the soul, because it is the soul that is in question, should close its eyes to the world - and this is indicated through all the dialogue of the third play - in order to be able to be that which the world lacks, the most desirable object in the world. Psyche who can no longer light the lamp, pumps, as I might say, sucks into her the being of Eros which is lack.

The myth of Poros and of Penia is reborn here under the form of spiritual blindness, because we are told that Pensee here incarnates the figure of the synagogue itself, as it is represented in the porch of the cathedral at Reims: blindfold.

On the other hand, Orian who confronts her is indeed the one whose gift cannot be accepted precisely because it is superabundance. Orian is another form of refusal. If he does not give Pensee his love, it is, he says, because his gifts are owed elsewhere, to everyone, to the divine work. What he overlooks, is precisely what is demanded of him in love: it is not his Poros, his resources, his spiritual riches, his superabundance, nor even, as he expresses it, his joy, it is precisely what he does not have. He may be a saint of course, but it is rather striking that Claudel shows us here the limits of sanctity. For, desire is stronger here than sanctity itself, because it is a fact that Orian, the saint, in the dialogue with Pensee weakens and yields and loses the game and, in a word, to call things by their name, that he well and truly screws little Pensee. And this is what she wants and right through the drama and the play, she has not lost a half a second, a quarter of a line in order to operate in this direction along paths which we would not call the shortest, but undoubtedly the straightest, the surest ones.

Pensee de Coufontaine is truly being reborn here from all the fatalities which begin with debauchery, continue with the bill drawn on honour, through misalliance, abjuration, Louis (14) Philippism - which someone or other called le second t'en-pire - in order to be reborn as it were before sin, like innocence, but not for all that nature.

This is why there has to be seen the scene on which this whole drama culminates, this scene, the final one, the one where Pensee has confined herself with her mother who stretches over her her protective wing and does so because she has become pregnant through the work of the aforementioned Orian. Pensee receives the visit of the brother Orso, who comes here to bring her, from the one who has died, the final message, but which the logic of the play and the whole previous situation have created, because the whole effort of Orian had been to make both Pensee and Orso accept an enormous thing: that they should marry. Orian, the saint, does not see any obstacle to his good and honest little brother, for his part, finding happiness, it is at his level.

He is brave and courageous. And moreover the declarations of the lad leaves us in no doubt, he is capable of undertaking marriage with a woman he does not love, something can always be worked out. He is courageous, that is his business. He fought first on the left, he was told that he was mistaken, he fights on the right: he was with the Garibaldians, he has rejoined the Pope's zouaves. He is always there, sure-footed and clear-eyed, he is a man you can depend on. Do not laugh too much at this idiot, he is a trap, and we are going to see later for whom and how. Because, in truth, in his dialogue with Pensee, we no longer dream of laughing.

Who is Pensee in this final scene? The sublime object surely, the sublime object in so far as already we have indicated its position, last year, as substitute for the Thing (la Chose). As you heard in passing, the nature of the Thing is not too far from that of the woman, if it were not true that for all the ways that we have to approach this Thing, the woman proves to be quite another thing again - I say the least woman - and, in truth, Claudel does not show us anymore than anybody else that he has the slightest idea of it, far from it. This heroine of Claudel's this woman that he foments for us, is the woman of a certain desire. All the same let us do him this much justice that elsewhere, in Partage de midi, Claudel has made for us a woman, Yse, who is not so bad, she resembles very much what a woman is.

Here we are in the presence of the object of a desire. And what I want to show you, which is inscribed in its image, is that it is a desire which no longer has at this level of destitution anything other than castration to separate it radically from any (15) natural desire. In truth, if you look at what is happening on the stage, it is rather beautiful, but in order to situate it exactly, I would ask you to remember the anamorphic cylinder which I presented to you well and truly in reality - the tube on this table - namely this cylinder on which there was projected a figure by Rubens, that of "The Crucifixion", by the expedient of a sort of shapeless drawing which was cleverly inscribed on the base of this cylinder. From that, I constructed for you from this mechanism the image of the reflection of this fascinating figure, of this beauty erected in such a way that it projects itself to the limit in order to prevent us from going further to the heart of the Thing.

If it is the case that here the figure of Pensee, and the whole line of this drama, is constructed to bring us to this still further limit - what do we see, if not the figure of a divinised woman because she is again here, this woman, crucified, the gesture is indicated in the text as it recurs with insistence at so many other points of Claudel's work, from the Princess of T&te d'or to Sygne herself, to Yse, to the figure of Dona Prouheze - this figure bears in herself what? A child no doubt, but let us not forget what we are told: it is that for the first time this child has begun to show life in her, to move. This moment is the moment at which she has taken into herself the soul, she says, of the one who has died.

How is this capture of the soul represented, depicted for us? It is a real act of vampirism, she closes herself off, as I might say, with the wings of her coat over the basket of flowers that the brother, Orso, had sent her, these flowers growing in a mould which the dialogue has just revealed to us - a macabre detail - contains the eviscerated heart of her lover, Orian. It is the symbolic essence of this that, when she stands up again, she is supposed to have caused to pass into her, it is this soul that she poses, with her own, she says, on the lips of this brother who has just become engaged to her in order to give a father to the child, while saying that he will never be her spouse. And this transmission, this singular realisation of this fusion of souls is the one which in the two first quotations that I gave you at the beginning of this discourse, from The hostage on the one hand, from Hard bread on the other, is indicated to us as being the supreme aspiration of love, it is from this fusion of souls that in short Orso, whom we know is going to rejoin his (16) brother in death, is here the designated carrier, vehicle, messenger.

What does that mean? I told you above, this poor Orso who makes us smile even in this function that he ends up with, of make-believe husband, should not deceive us, we should not allow ourselves to be taken in by his ridiculousness. Because the place he occupies is the very one after all in which we are led to be captivated here. It is to our desire, and as a revelation of its structure, that there is proposed this phantasy which reveals to us what this magnificent power is which draws us in the woman, and not necessarily, as it is said, towards higher things, that this power is tertiary and it is the one which cannot be ours except by representing our destruction.

There is always in desire some delight in death, but of a death that we cannot inflict on ourselves. We rediscover here the four terms which are represented,, as I might say, in us as in the two brothers, o - o', and to us the barred subject, ^, in so far as we understand nothing about it, and this figure of the Other incarnated in this woman. Between these four elements, all sorts of varieties of this inflicting of death are possible among which it is possible to enumerate all the most perverse forms of desire.

Here, it is only the most ethical case in so far as it is the true man, the completed man who affirms himself and maintains himself in his virility, Orian, who pays the price for it by his death. This reminds us that, it is true, he always pays this price in every case, even if from the moral point of view, it is the most costly way for his humanity, if he debases this price, to the level of pleasure.

So ends the plan of the poet. What he shows us, is indeed, after the drama of the subject qua pure victim of the logos, of language, what happens here to desire and for that, he makes this desire visible to us. The figure of the woman, of this terrible subject who is Pensee de Coufontaine, is the object of desire. She deserves her name, Pensee: she is thought about desire. The love of the other, this love that she expresses, is the very thing by which by fixating herself on it she becomes the object of desire.

(17) Such is the topology at which the long journey of the tragedy is completed. Like every process, like every progress of human articulation, it is only retrospectively that there is perceived that which converges in the lines traced in the traditional past, that which one day comes to birth when, throughout the tragedy of Euripides, we find as a sort of shoe that pinches, as awhich exasperates him, the relationship to desire, and more especially to the desire of the woman. What is called the misogyny of Euripides, this sort of aberration, of madness which seems to affect all his poetry, we can only grasp and understand from what it has become, from the fact that it has been elaborated through all the sublimations of the Christian tradition.

These perspectives, these extremes, these quartering points of terms whose crossing for us necessitates effects with which we have to deal, those of neurosis in so far as in Freudian thought they affirm themselves as more original than those of the golden mean, than those of the normal, it is necessary that we should touch them, that we should explore them, that we should know their extremes, if we want our action to be situated in an oriented fashion, not the captive of some mirage or other, always within our reach, of the good, of mutual aid, but because of what may have to be required in the other, even in the most obscure forms, by the fact that we have the audacity to accompany him in transference.

Extremes touch, someone or other has said. There must be at least an instant that we touch them in order to see what is here my end, to locate exactly what should be our place at the moment when the subject is on the only path that we ought to conduct him to, the one where he must articulate his desire.

Seminar 22: Wednesday 24 May 1961

What business have we with Claudel in a year when we have no longer enough time to formulate what we have to say about transference? Our remarks, from certain points of view, might give you this feeling, or at least someone who was less well informed. All the same, everything that we have said has a common axis which I think I have articulated sufficiently for you to have seen that it is what is essential in my aims this year.

And to designate this point, I will try to specify it for you as follows. There has been a lot of talk about transference since analysis exists, people are still talking about it. It is clear that it is not simply a theoretical hope, that we should all the same come to know what it is we are ceaselessly moving about in, what it is that enables us to sustain this movement.

I would say to you that the axis of what I am designating for you this year is something which could be expressed as follows: how should we consider ourselves to be concerned by transference? This kind of displacement of the question does not signify for all that that we consider as resolved the question of what transference itself is. But is it precisely because of very profound differences of points of view which manifest themselves in the analytic community, not only today, but in the stages of what has been thought about transference - there appear in this very tangible divergences - that I believe that this displacement is necessary for us to be able to become aware of the cause of these divergences, which allows us by understanding the "for lack of which" they are produced, is what may also allow it to be understood that we always consider it as certain that each of these points of view on transference has its truth, is usable.

(2) The question that I am posing is not that of countertransference. What has been put under the rubric of countertransference is a kind of vast lumber-room of experiences which involves or seems to involve pretty well everything that we are capable of experiencing in our trade. To take things in this way is really to make the notion quite unusable from then on, because it is clear that this brings all sorts of impurities into the situation. It is clear that we are human and, as such, affected in a thousand ways by the presence of the sick person and even the problem of what is to be done in a case defined by its very particular coordinates. To put all of this under the register of countertransference, to add it to what ought really be considered essentially as our participation in transference, is really to make it impossible to continue.

This participation of ours in transference, how can we conceive it and is this not what is going to allow us to situate very precisely what is at the heart of the phenomenon of transference in the subject, the analysand? There is something which is perhaps suggested as a "perhaps", at least "why not?", if you wish, which is that it may be that the simple necessity of responding to transference is something which involves our being, that it is not simply the definition of a behaviour to be adhered to, of a handling of something outside ourselves, of a how to do?, comment faire?, it may be, and, if you have been listening to me for years, it is certain that all that is implied by what I am leading you towards, is that what we are, what is in question in our implication in the transference, is something which is of the order of what I have just named in saying that it involves our being.

And, after all even, it is so evident that even what may be most opposed to me in analysis - I mean what is least articulated in what reveals itself about the ways to approach the analytic situation, just as much at its starting point as at its end point, in the way that I may have the greatest aversion to - it is all the same from that side that there was one day heard a sort of massive remark - it was not transference that was in question but the action of the analyst - "that the analyst acts less by what he says and by what he does than by what he is". Make no mistake about it, this way of expressing oneself is one I take great offense to, in the measure precisely that it says (3) something correct and that it says it in a way which immediately closes the door, it is well designed precisely to infuriate me.

In fact, from the beginning this is the whole question. What is given when one defines the situation "objectively", is the fact that for the patient the analyst plays his transferential role precisely in the measure that for the patient he is what he is not.... precisely, on the plane of what one could call reality. This allows us to judge the degree, the angle of deviation of the transference, precisely in the measure that the phenomenon of transference is going to help us to make the patient realise, from this angle of deviation, how far he is from the real because of what he produces, in short with the help of the transference, in terms of fictions.

And nevertheless there is some truth in it. It is certain that there is some truth in it in that the analyst intervenes through something which is of the order of his being, it is first of all a fact of experience. Since it is all the same something which is highly probable, why would there be any need for this rectification, for this correction of the subjective position, for this research into the formation of the analyst, of this experience where we try to make him descend or ascend, if it were not in order that something in his position is called on to function in an efficacious fashion, in a relationship which is in no way described by us as being able to be entirely exhausted in a manipulation, even a reciprocal one?

Moreover everything which has developed since Freud, after Freud, concerning the import of transference brings into play the analyst as an existent. And one could even divide these articulations of the transference in a rather clear fashion which does not exhaust the question, which overlaps rather well the tendencies, if you wish the two tendencies, as people say, of modern psychoanalysis - whose eponyms I have given, but in a fashion which is not exhaustive, it is only to pinpoint them - with Melanie Klein on one side and Anna Freud on the other.

I mean that the Melanie Klein tendency has tended to put the accent on the object-function of the analyst in the transference relationship. Naturally, this is not where the position begins, but it is in the measure that this tendency remained the most faithful one - you can even say if you wish (4) that it is Melanie Klein who is the most faithful to Freudian thought, to the Freudian tradition - that she was led to articulate the transference relationship in terms of object-function for the analyst. I will explain. In the measure that, from the beginning of analysis, from the first steps, from the first words, the analytic relationship is thought of by Melanie Klein as dominated by unconscious phantasies which are here immediately what we should aim at, what we have to deal with, what from the beginning I am not saying that we ought, but we could interpret, it is in this measure that Melanie Klein was led to make the analyst, the analytic presence in the analyst, the intention of the analyst function for the subject as good or bad object.

I am not saying that this is a necessary condition, I believe even that it is a consequence which is only necessary in function of the shortcomings of Kleinian thought. It is precisely in the measure that the function of phantasy, even though perceived in a very pregnant fashion, was insufficiently articulated by her - it is the great shortcoming of the Kleinian articulation - the fact is that even among her better acolytes or disciples who certainly have tried to do it a number of times, the theory of phantasy has never really been completed.

And nevertheless there are many extremely usable elements. The primordial function, for example, of symbolisation has been articulated, accentuated here in a fashion which, from certain points of view, goes so far as to be very satisfactory. In fact, the whole key to the correction required by the theory of phantasy in Melanie Klein is entirely in the symbol that I give you of the phantasy $S \diamond o$, which can be read as: S barred desire of o. It is a question of knowing what the o is, it is not simply the noetic correlative of the object, it is in the phantasy. Naturally, it is not easy, unless you take the journey that I have made you retake through a thousand ways of approaching, through a thousand ways of exercising this experience of phantasy. It is in what the approach to this experience necessitates that you will better understand, if already you believe that you have glimpsed something or simply if up to now this appears obscure to you, that you will understand what I am trying to promote with this formalisation.

But let us continue. The other aspect of the theory of transference is the one which puts the accent on the following, which is no less irreducible and is also more evidently true, (5) that the analyst is involved in the transference as subject. It is evidently to this aspect that there refers the accent put, in the other mode of thinking about the transference, on the therapeutic alliance.

There is a real consistency between this and what accompanies it, this correlate of the analyst, in the second mode of conceiving transference, the one for which I pinpointed Anna Freud - which in fact designates it rather well, she is not the only one - who puts the accent on the powers of the ego. It is not simply a question of recognising them objectively, it is a question of the place that is given to them in therapy. And here, what are you going to be told? It is that there is a whole first part of the treatment where there is not even a question of speaking, of thinking of bringing into play what is properly speaking on the plane of the unconscious.

First of all you have only defences, this is the least of what you will be told, this for a good amount of time. This is more nuanced in practice than in the doctrine, it is to be guessed at through the theory that is constructed of it.

It is not altogether the same thing to put in the foreground, as is more than legitimate, the importances of defences and to arrive at theorising things in a way that makes of the ego itself a kind of inertial mass which could be even conceived of - and this is what is proper to the school of Kris, Hartmann and the others - as afterwards involving, let us say, elements which are for us irreducible, uninterpretable when all is said and done.

This is where they end up and things are clear, I am not putting words in their mouths, they say it themselves. And the further step, is that after all it is fine like that and that one should even make it more irreducible, this ego - after all, it is a conceivable mode of conducting an analysis - add defences to it. I am not at all, at this moment, in the process of even giving it the connotation of a rejecting judgement, that is how it is. What one can say in any case, is that, that, compared to what the other trenchant aspect formulates, it does not seem that this side is the more Freudian one, this the least that can be said.

But we have something else to do, do we not, in our remarks today, this year, than to return to this connotation of eccentricity to which we gave, in the first years of our teaching, so much importance. People have seen in it a (6) polemical intention, even though I assure you that this is very far from my mind. But what is in question, is to change the level of accommodation of thinking - things are not altogether the same now, but these deviations were really taking on in the analytic community a really fascinating value which was getting to the point of removing the feeling that there were questions - to restore a certain perspective. A certain inspiration having been brought to light again thanks to something which is nothing other also than the reestablishing of the analytic tongue, I mean of its structure, of what served to make it emerge at the beginning in Freud, the situation is different. And the simple fact even, for those who may feel themselves a little bit at a loss because of the fact that we were going at full blast at a place in my seminar into Claudel, that they have the feeling all the same that this has the closest relationship with the-question of transference, well proves simply by itself that there is something sufficiently changed, that there is no longer a need to insist on the negative aspect of one or other tendency. It is not the negative aspects that interest us, but the positive aspects, the ones through which they may be of service to us moreover and at the point that we have got to as building blocks.

So then, what service can be rendered us, for example, by what I would call in a short word, this "Claudelian mythology"? It is amusing.... I should tell you that I was surprised myself in rereading these last days a piece that I had never reread because it was published uncorrected. It was Jean Wahl who did it at the time that I was giving little discourses open to all at the College Philosophique. It was something on obsessional neurosis which was entitled I do not remember what - The neurotic's myth, I think, you see that we are already at the heart of the question - The neurotic's myth where in connection with the Ratman I showed the function of mythical structures in the determinism of symptoms. As I had to correct it, I considered the thing to be impossible. With time, bizarrely, I read it without too much dissatisfaction and I was surprised to see in it - if I were to have my head cut off, I would not have said it! - that I spoke in it about The humiliated father. There must be reasons for these things. It is not after all because I had encountered the u with the circumflex accent that I am telling you about it. So let us take it up again.

(7) What does the analysand come looking for? He comes looking for what is to be found or, more exactly, if he is looking, it is because there is something to be found. And the only thing that there is to be found properly speaking, is the trope par excellence, the trope of tropes, what is called his destiny. But if we forget that there is a certain relationship between analysis and this kind of thing which is of the order of the figure, in the sense that the word figure can be employed to say "figure of destiny", as one says moreover "figure of rhetoric" and that it is for this reason that analysis was not even able to take a step without myth emerging, that means that one simply is forgetting one's origins.

There is a piece of luck, which is that parallel.... In the evolution of analysis itself, there is a sort of slippage which is the result of a practice always more insistent, always more pregnant, exigent about producing of results, so then the evolution of analysis risks making us forget the importance, the weight of this formulation of myths, of the myth at the origin. Luckily, elsewhere people continued to be very interested in it, so that it is a detour, something which comes back to us, perhaps more legitimately than we believe - we perhaps have some responsibility for this interest in the function of the myth.

I made an allusion to it, more than an allusion, I articulated it a long time ago, ever since the first work before the seminar began - the seminar had all the same begun, there were people who came to work with me, in my house - on the Ratman. It is already the functioning, the bringing into play of the structural articulation of the myth as it has been applied since - and in a persistent, systematic, developed fashion by Lévi-Strauss for example in his own seminar - I already tried to show you the value, the functioning of it to explain what was happening in the story of the Ratman.

For those who have left things or who do not know it, the structuralist articulation of the myth, is something that takes a myth in its totality, I mean the epos, the story, the way that this is recounted from one end to the other in order to construct a sort of model which is uniquely constituted by a series of oppositional connotations within the myth, the functions involved in the myth, for example, the father-son relationship, incest, for example, in the Oedipus myth. I am schematising, naturally, I want to reduce things in order to tell you what is in question. (8) One realises that the myth does not stop there, namely that at the following generation - if it is a myth, this term generation cannot be conceived as simply the next phase of the entrance of the actors, there must always be some there: when the old have died, there are little ones who come back in order that things can begin again - there is a signifying consistency in what is produced in the new mythological constellation, and it is this consistency which interests us. Something happens that you can connote as you wish, brother-enemies, then on the other hand the function of a transcendent love which goes against the law, like incest, but manifestly situated opposite it in its function, in any case having relationships that we could define through a certain number of oppositional terms with the figure of incest, in short, what happens at the level of Antigone. It is a game in which there is question precisely of detecting in it the rules which give it its rigour - and remark that there is no other rigour conceivable than precisely the one established in games. In short, what allows us in the function of the myth, in this game in which the transformations operate according to certain rules and which are found because of this fact to have a revelatory value, creating higher configurations, illuminated by cases for example, in short to demonstrate this same sort of fecundity that mathematics has, this is what is in question in the elucidation of myths.

And this involves us in the most direct fashion, because we cannot approach the subject that we have to deal with in analysis without encountering this function of myth. It is a fact proved by experience. In any case, from the first steps of analysis, Freud was sustained by this reference to myth, from the time of the Traumdeutung and the letters to Fliess: the Oedipus myth. It is not possible either.... the fact that we elide it, that we put it in parenthesis, that we try to express everything, the function for example of the conflict between the primordial tendencies down to the most radical ones and the defences against it, the whole articulation connoted in a topographical way by the accent of the ego, in the thesis on narcissism the function of the ego ideal, of a certain Id as permitting there to be articulated the whole of our experience in an economic mode as it is put, it is not possible that to go in this direction and to lose the other pole of reference should not represent properly speaking what in our experience should be noted as properly speaking, in the positive sense that this has for us, a (9) "forgetting". This does not prevent the experience that continues on from being an analytic experience, it is an analytic experience which forgets its own terms.

You see that I come back, as I often do and I almost always do after all, to articulate alphabetical things. This is not uniquely for the pleasure of spelling them out, even though that exists, but this allows there to be posed in their quite raw character the true questions. The true question which is posed, there where it begins, is not simply the following: is that what analysis is, when all is said and done, an introduction of the subject to his destiny? Of course not. This would be to place us in a demiurgic position which has never been the one occupied by the analyst.

But then, to remain at this level which is simply a general starting point, there is a sort of formula which indeed takes on its value because it is separated out quite naturally from those ways of posing the question which are as good as many others. It is..... Before, that we should have believed ourselves clever enough and strong enough to talk about something or other which is supposed to be "normal" - in fact, we have never believed ourselves to be so strong or so clever not to feel our pen trembling ever so little any time we attacked this subject of what a normal person is. Jones has written an article about it, it must be said that he had a nerve, it must also be said that he managed it rather well, but one sees the difficulty.

In any case, we have to put the accent on this, that it is really only by a piece of trickery that we can even bring into play any notion whatsoever, in analysis, of normalisation. It is a theoretical partiality: it is when we consider things from a certain angle, when we start, for example, talking about instinctual maturation, as if this were all that were in question. We give ourselves over then to these extraordinary ratiocinations bordering on moralising sermons which are so likely to inspire mistrust and withdrawal! To bring in, without anything else, a normal notion of anything at all that has any relationship whatsoever with our praxis, while precisely what we discover in it, is the degree to which the so-called normal subject is precisely what inspires in us, as regards what permits this appearance, the most radical and the most well founded suspicion. As regards these results.... We must all the same (10) know whether we are able to employ the notion of normal for anything whatsoever within the horizon of our practice.

So let us limit ourselves for the moment to the question: does the effort of deciphering something which maps out the figure of destiny, what destiny is.... can we say that the mastery that we have gained of it allows us to obtain what? Let us say the least possible drama, the inversion of the sign? If the human configuration that we attack is drama, tragic or not, can we be satisfied with aiming at the least drama possible? A well informed subject - a good man well informed is worth two - will manage to get by unscathed. After all, why not? A modest pretension. This has never corresponded either, as you well know, to our experience. This is not it.

But I claim that the door through which we can enter in order to say things which have simply some sense, I mean that we have the feeling of being on the track of what we have to say, is the following which as always is a point closer to us than this point where quite stupidly the supposedly obvious is captured, what is called common sense where quite simply there is initiated the crossroads, namely in the present case of destiny, of the normal. There is all the same something, if we have discovered, if we have learned to see in the figure of symptoms something which has a relationship to this figure of destiny, there is all the same something, which is that we did not know it before and now we know it, this does not therefore come from outside. And, in a way from the fact that we can, through this knowledge, neither allow ourselves, nor allow the subject to put himself to one side and that this continues for those who continue to walk in the same direction, this is an altogether absurd and gross schema for the reason that the fact of knowing or of not knowing is essential to these figures of destiny, that this implication in the language of the developed figures that myths are does not refer to a language, but to the implication. Language being caught up in the operation of the word and, to complicate the affair, in its relationships with some Umwelt or other, there develop figures where there are necessary points, irreducible points, major points, points of intersection which are those that I tried to picture in the graph for example.

(11) An attempt which it is not a question of knowing whether it might not be jimcrack, whether it might not be incomplete, whether it might not be, be perhaps much more harmoniously, adequately constructed or reconstructed by someone else, whose aims I wish simply to evoke here because this aim of a minimal structure of these four, of these eight points of intersection appears to be necessitated by the simple confrontation of the subject and the signifier. And it is already a lot to be able to sustain here the necessity, because of this simple fact, of a Spaltung of the subject.

This figure, this graph, these points mapped out, through the eyes also, the attention, is what allows us to reconcile with our experience of development the true function of what trauma is. A trauma is not simply that which at a moment has erupted, has cracked somewhere a sort of structure which appears to be imagined as total - because this is what the notion of narcissism was used for by some people - it is that certain events come to be situated at a certain place in this structure, they occupy it, they take on in it the signifying value holding that place in a subject who is determined, this is what gives its traumatic value to an event.

Hence the importance of returning to the experience of myth. You can be sure that, as regards the Greek myths, we are not so well placed because we have many variants, we even have a great number of them, but, as I might say, they are not always good variants. I mean that we cannot guarantee the origin of these variants. In a word, they are not contemporary, nor even co-local variants. They are more or less allegorical, fictional rearrangements and, of course, they are not usable in the same way as one or other variant collected at the same time as what is provided when collecting a myth in a population from North or South America, as for example the material contributed by a Franz Boas or others allows us to do.

And moreover to go looking for the model of what becomes of the oedipal conflict when there enters into it precisely at one or other point knowledge as such within the myth, moreover to go completely elsewhere, in the Shakespearean fabrication of Hamlet, as I did it for you two years ago and as moreover I had every (12) licence to do because, from the beginning, Freud had taken things from that angle. You have seen what we believe we were able to connote in it: it is that something is modified in it at another point of the structure, and in a very exciting fashion, because it is from a quite particular, aporetic (aporique) point of the subject with respect to desire, that Hamlet proposed to reflection, to meditation, to interpretation, to research, the structural puzzle that it represents. We succeeded well enough in bringing to awareness the specificity of this case through this difference that, contrary to the father of oedipal murder, he, the father killed in Hamlet, it is not that "he did not know" that should be said, but he knew. Not alone did he know, but this intervenes in the subjective incidence that interests us, that of the central personage, of the personage of Hamlet alone. It is a drama entirely included in the subject Hamlet. It has been brought clearly to his knowledge that the father was killed, it has been brought to his knowledge sufficiently for him to know a good deal about what what is involved namely by whom. In saying that, I am only repeating what Freud said from the beginning.

Here is the indication of a method through which it is demanded of us to measure what our knowledge about the function of the structure introduces into this structure itself. To say things in a very general way and in a fashion which allows me to locate the root of what is in question, if, at the origin of every neurosis - as Freud said from his first writings - there is, not what has been since interpreted as a frustration, something like that, an arrears left open in something unformed, but a Versagung, namely something which is much closer to a refusal than to frustration, which is as much internal as external, which is really put by Freud in a position - let us connote it by the term which at the very least has a popular resonance through our contemporary language - in an existential position. This position does not put the normal, always with an original Versagung beyond which there would be a bifurcation, either towards neurosis or towards the normal, one being worth neither more nor less than the other with respect to this beginning of the possibility of the Versagung. And that which the term sagen implied in this untranslatable Versagung is obvious, it is only possible in the register of the sagen, I mean in so far as the sagen is not simply the operation of communication, but the (13) stating (le dire), the emergence as such of the signifier in so far as it allows the subject to refuse himself.

What I can tell you, is that it is not possible to get out of this original, primordial refusal, this power which is prejudicial with respect to all our experience, in other words, we analysts, we only operate - and who does not know this - in the register of Versagung, and this all the time, and it is in so far as we conceal ourselves - who does not know this - that our whole experience, our technique is structured around something which has been expressed in a quite stammering fashion in this idea of non-gratification which is to be found nowhere in Freud. It is a question of deepening the sense of what this Versagung specifies. This Versagung implies a progressive direction which is the one that we bring into play in the analytic experience.

I will recommence by taking up again the terms that I believe to be usable in the Claudelian myth itself in order to allow you to see how in any case it is a spectacular fashion of picturing how we are the messengers, the vehicles of this specific Versagung.

I believe that you no longer doubt any more that what is happening in Hard bread is the Oedipus myth. That you might find in it almost my play on words, that it is precisely at the moment that Louis de Coufontaine and Turelure - it is at the very moment that there is formulated this kind of demand for tenderness, it is the first time that this happens, it is true that it is ten minutes before he kills him - are face to face, where Louis says to him: "All the same you are the father (tu es le pere)", really reduplicating this "kill the father (tuez le pere)" that the desire of the woman, of Lumir, has suggested to him, it is superimposed and literally superimposing in a fashion which, I assure you, is not simply the good fortune of French. So what is meant by what is represented to us here on the stage? What that means in an explicit fashion, is that at that moment, and through that, little Louis becomes a man. Louis de Coufontaine, as he is told, will not have a long enough life to carry this parricide, but also from that moment on he is no longer the couldn't-care-less individual who fails in everything and who allows his land to be taken away from him by a crowd of evil little operators. He will become a very fine ambassador.

capable of all sorts of dirty tricks, there is some correlation here.

(14) He becomes the father. Not only does he become him, but when he speaks about him later, in The humiliated father, in Rome, he will say: "I knew him very well" - he had never wanted to hear a word about him - "he was not the man people think", allowing there to be understood no doubt, the treasures of sensitivity and experience that had accumulated under the skull of this old scoundrel. But he became the father: what is more, it was his only chance to become it and for reasons which are linked to the previous level of the dramatic work, things had not got off to a good start.

But what is made tangible by the construction, the plot, well, is that at the same time and because of this he is castrated. Namely that the desire of the little boy, this desire sustained in such an ambiguous fashion, which binds him to the aforementioned Lumir, well, it will go nowhere - even though this is nevertheless easy, quite simple. He has her within his grasp, he only has to bring her back with him to Mitidga and everything will turn out fine, they would even have lots of children, but something happens. First of all we do not know too well whether he desires it or whether he does not desire it, but there is one thing certain, it is that the lady in question, does not want it. She has said to him: "You shoot Daddy", she goes off towards her own destiny which is the destiny of a desire, of a true desire as befits a Claudelian personage.

Because, let us say it, the importance there is in introducing you into this theatre, even if it has for one or other person, according to his leanings, a smell of the sacristy about it which may please or displease - the question is not there - it is because it is all the same a tragedy. And it is quite droll that this has led this gentleman to positions which are not positions designed to please us, but we must accommodate ourselves to it and if necessary try to understand him. It is all the same from beginning to end, from Tete d'or to Soulier de satin, the tragedy of desire. So the personage who is at this generation its support, the aforementioned Lumir, drops her previous companion, the aforementioned Louis de Coufontaine, and goes off towards her desire which we are quite clearly told is a desire for death. But through this, it is she - it is here that I would ask you to dwell on the variant of the myth - who gives him precisely what? It is not the mother obviously - the mother is Sygne de Coufontaine and she has a place which is obviously not that of the mother when she is called Jocasta. No, there is another one who is the "father's woman", because the father, as I showed you, is always at the horizon of this story in a clearly marked fashion. And this incidence of desire is (15) what has rehabilitated our excluded son, our undesired child, our wandering partial object, what rehabilitates him, reinstates him, recreates with him the ruined father, well, the result, is to give him the father's woman.

You see clearly what I am showing you. There is here an exemplary deconstruction of the function of that which, in the Freudian, oedipal myth is conjugated under the form of this kind of hollow, of centre of aspiration, of vertiginous point of the libido that the mother represents. There is a structural deconstruction.

It is late, but I would not like all the same to leave you without indicating to you - it is time which forces us to cut off at the point that we are at - that towards which I will leave you. After all, it is not a story designed to astonish us so much, we who are already a little hardened by experience, that castration, in short, should be something fabricated like that: withdraw his desire from someone and, in exchange, it is he who is given to someone else, on this occasion to the social order. It is Sichel who has the fortune: it is quite natural, in short, that she should be the one he marries. What is more, the aforementioned Lumir saw very clearly what was happening, because if you read the text she had very clearly explained to him: "There is only one thing for you to do, it is to marry your father's mistress". But the important thing is this structure. And I am telling you that it looks simple because we know it in a way habitually, but it is rarely expressed like that. You have clearly understood, I think, what I have said: one removes a subject's desire from him and in exchange one sends him into the marketplace where he becomes part of the public auction.

But is it not the case that it is precisely this - and illustrated then in a quite different way, which is designed, this time, to awaken our sleeping sensitivity - is it not this which at the beginning, at the stage above, the one perhaps which can enlighten us more radically about the beginning, is this not what happens at the level of Sygne, and that in a fashion well made to move us a little more? Everything is taken away from her, it would be too much to say that it was for nothing - we will leave that - but it is also quite clear that it is in order to give her, in exchange for what is taken away from her, to what she most abhors.

(16) You will see, I am led to end in a fashion that is almost too spectacular by making of it a game and an enigma, it is much richer than what I am in the process of putting before you as a question mark - you will see it, the next time, articulated in a much deeper fashion, I want to leave you something to dream about - you will see at the third generation, that people want to do the same thing to Pensee, only behold, we do not have the same starting point, we do not have the same origin and this is what will be instructive for us and even what will allow us to pose questions about the analyst. People want to do the same thing to her, naturally there the characters are nicer, they are all excellent people, even the one who wants to do the same thing to her, namely the aforementioned Orian - it is certainly not for her harm, it is not for her good, either - and he wants to give her also to someone else - whom she does not desire, this time the girl does not let herself be had, she catches her Orian in passing, illicitly no doubt, just at the time that he is no longer anything but a soldier of the pope, but.... cold. And then the other, my word, is a very gallant man.... and so he resists.

What does that mean? I already told you that it was a beautiful phantasy, it had not said its last word. But indeed it is all the same enough for me to leave in suspense a question about what we are going precisely to be able to make of it concerning certain effects which are those which come from the fact that we ourselves, we count for something in the destiny of the subject.

There is all the same something that I must pinpoint before leaving you, that it is not complete to summarise, in a way, in this fashion the effects on man of the fact that he becomes subject of the law. "It is not simply because everything that is at the heart of himself is taken away from him and that he is given in exchange to the daily grind, this web which binds the generations together, the fact is that in order precisely that it should be a web which ties the generations together, once there is closed this operation whose curious conjugation you see of a minus which is not reduplicated by a plus, well, something is still owing, once this operation is closed.

It is there that we will take up the question again the next time.

Seminar 23: Wednesday 31 May 1961

In order to situate what the place of the analyst should be in the transference, in the double sense that I told you the last time this place must be situated: where is the analysand situated, where should the analyst be in order to respond appropriately to him? It is clear that this relationship - what is frequently called this situation as if the starting situation was constitutive - this relationship or this situation can only be engaged on the basis of a misunderstanding. It is clear that there is no coincidence between what the analyst is for the analysand at the beginning of analysis and what precisely the analysis of the transference is going to allow us to unveil as regards what is implied, not immediately, but what is truly implied, by the fact that a subject engages in this adventure, which he does not know about, which is analysis.

You may have understood, in what I articulated the last time, that it is this "truly" dimension implied by the openness, the possibilities, the richness, the whole future development of the analysis, which poses a question from the side of the analyst. Is it not at least probable, is it not tangible that he ought, for his part, already put himself at the level of this "truly", to be truly at the place that he ought to arrive at at this term of analysis which is precisely the analysis of transference, can the analyst consider himself as in a way indifferent to his veritable position? Let us throw some more light on the matter, this may after all seem to you almost not to be in question, does his science not supply for it, however he may formulate it for himself.

Something, in the facts, that he may know the ways and the paths of analysis is not enough, whether he likes it or not, to put him in this place. But the fact is that divergences in this (2) technical function, once it is theorised, make it nevertheless appear that there is here something which is not sufficient. The analyst is precisely not the only analyst, he forms part of a group, of a crowd (masse), in the proper sense that this term has in Freud's article Ich-Analyse und Massen-psychologie. It is not by pure chance that if this theme is tackled by Freud, it is at the moment that there is already a Society of analysts, it is in function of what is happening at the level of the relationship of the analyst with his own function that a part of the problems that he has to deal with - everything that is called the second Freudian topography - is articulated. This is an aspect which even though it is not obvious deserves no less to be very specially looked at by us analysts.

I referred to it on several occasions in my writings. We cannot, in any case, go through the historical moment of the emergence of Freud's second topography, whatever degree of internal necessity we may attribute to it, without going into the problems which are posed to Freud. This is attested, you only have to open Jones at the right page in order to see that at the very moment that he brought to light this thematic, and specifically what is contained in this article Ich-Analyse und Massen-psychologie, he was thinking of nothing at that stage except the organisation of the analytic Society.

I made an allusion above to my writings, I highlighted there, in an infinitely sharper fashion perhaps that I am in the process of doing for the moment, all the drama that this problematic gave rise to for him. It is necessary all the same to indicate what emerges, in a clear enough fashion, in certain passages quoted by Jones, about the notion of a sort of Komintern, a secret committee even, which is conceived romantically as such within analysis. The idea of this is something to which he clearly committed himself in one or other of his letters. In fact, it is indeed in this way that he envisages the functioning of the group of seven in which he really placed his trust.

Once there is a crowd or an organised mass, those who are in this analyst-function pose themselves all the problems that Freud effectively raises in this article and which are, as I also, at the proper time, clarified, the problems of the organisation of the mass in its relationship to the existence of a certain discourse. And it would be necessary to take up this article by applying it to the evolution of the analytic function, of the (3) theory that analysts have constructed, have put forward about it, to see the necessity that makes converge - it is almost immediately, intuitively, tangible and comprehensible - the gravity that pulls the function of the analyst towards the image that he may construct of it, in so far as this image is going to situate itself very precisely at the point that Freud has taught us to separate out, whose function Freud brings to its term at this moment of the second topography, and which is that of the Ichideal, translated: ego-ideal.

From then on there is an ambiguity with regard to these terms. Ichideal, for example, in an article to which I will refer later, on "Transference and love", which is very important for us, which was read at the Vienna Psychoanalytic Society in 1933 by its authors and which was published in Imago in 1934 - I happen to have it, it is not easy to get copies of Imago, it is easier to get The Psychoanalytic Quarterly of 1939 where it was translated into English under the title of "Transference and love" - l'Ideal du Moi is translated in English by ego-ideal.

This operation of the place in different tongues of the determiner with respect to the determined, in a word, of the order of determination is something which plays a role which is not at all a random one. Someone who does not know German might think that Ichideal means Moi Ideal (ideal ego). I pointed out that in the inaugural article where there is mention of the Ichideal, of the ego-ideal, Einführung zur Narzissmus, there is from time to time Idealich. And God knows that for all of us it is an object of debate, I for my part saying that one cannot even for an instant neglect such a variation from the pen of Freud, who was so precise about the signifier, and others saying that it is impossible from an examination of the context to reach any conclusion about it.

However there is one thing certain, which is that first of all even those who are in the second position will be the first, as you will see in the next number of L'Analyse which is going to appear, to distinguish effectively on the psychological plane the ego-ideal from the ideal ego, I am talking about my friend Lagache, who as you will see, in his article on the "Structure of the personality", makes a distinction which I would say, without at all diminishing it for all that, is descriptive, extremely subtle, elegant and clear. In the phenomenon, this has absolutely not the same function. Simply, you will see in a reply that I have produced quite intentionally for this number, developed around what he gives us as thematic about the structure (4) of the personality, I remarked on a certain number of points, the first of which is that one could object that there is here an abandonment of the method that he himself announced as being the one he proposed to follow in the matter of metapsychology, as regards the elaboration of the structure, namely as a formulation, as he expresses it which is at a distance from experience, namely which is properly speaking metapsychological - the clinical and descriptive difference between the two terms ego-ideal and ideal ego being insufficiently described in the register of the method that he proposed for himself. You will soon see that all of this has its place.

Perhaps I am going to be able to anticipate today already the quite concrete metapsychological fashion in which one can situate, within this big economy, the economic thematic introduced by Freud around the notion of narcissism, to specify quite effectively the function of the one and the other.

But I am not yet at that point. Simply, what I designate for you is the term of Ichideal, or Ideal du moi, in so far indeed as it has been translated in English by ego-ideal - in English this place of the determiner, of the determinant, is much more ambiguous in a group of two terms like ego-ideal - that we already find in it, as one might say the semantic trace of what has happened in terms of a sliding, in terms of an evolution of the function given to this term when people wanted to employ it to mark what the analyst became for the analysand.

Very early on it was said: "The analyst takes for the analysand the place of his ego-ideal". This is true or it is false, it is true in the sense that it happens, it happens easily, I could even say further, I will give you an example later, how convenient it is, the degree to which in a word a subject can establish there positions which are both strong and comfortable and quite of the nature of what we call resistances, it is perhaps truer still than is marked by the occasional and obvious position that certain analyses run foul of. That does not at all mean that this exhausts the question, nor of course, in a word, that the analyst can in any way be satisfied with it - I mean be satisfied with it within the analysis of the subject - that he can in other words push the analysis to its term without dislodging the subject from this position that the subject takes (5) up in so far as he gives him the position of ego-ideal. Therefore that even poses the question of what this truth shows what should be the case in the future. Namely whether, at the end and after the analysis of the transference, the analyst should be elsewhere, but where? This is what has never been said.

Because, when all is said and done, what is revealed by the article that I spoke to you about above is something which, at the moment that it comes out, is not even that much of a research position - 1933 compared to the 20's which gave rise to the "turning point" of analytic technique, as everyone puts it, they had time all the same to reflect on it and to be clear about it.

There is in this article that I cannot go through in all its details with you, but to which I would ask you to refer - it is moreover something that we will speak about again, we are not going to stop at that - all the more since what I wanted to tell you is the following which refers to the English text and that is why it is that one I have with me here, even though the German text is more lively, but we are not considering the articulations of the German text.... We are at the level of the semantic sliding which expresses what has happened, in effect, at the level of an internal critique addressed to the analyst in so far as he the analyst, sole master on board, is put face to face with his action, namely for him the deepening, the exorcism, the extracting from oneself that is necessary for him to have a correct perception of his own proper relationship to this function of the ego-ideal, of the Ideal du Moi, in so far as for him, as analyst, and consequently in a particularly necessary fashion, it is sustained within what I called the analytic crowd.

Because if he does not do it, what is produced - and what has effectively been produced - namely through a sliding, a sliding of meaning which is not at this level a sliding which can in any way be perceived of as semi-exterior to the subject, in a word as an error, a sliding which implicates him profoundly, subjectively and which is testified to by what happens in the theory. Namely that if, in 1933, an article on "Transference and love" is made to pivot entirely around a thematic which is properly that of the ego-ideal and without any kind of ambiguity, twenty or twenty-five years afterwards, what is in question, in a fashion, I am saying, theorised in articles which say it openly concerning the (6) relationships of the analysand and the analyst, are the relationships of the analysand in so far as the analyst has an ego which can be called ideal, but in a sense quite different that of the ego-ideal as well as to that of the concrete meaning to which I alluded above and which you can give - I will come back to it and illustrate all of this - to the function of the ideal ego. The ego of the analyst is an ideal ego, as I might say, which is realised, and an ideal ego in the same sense as one says that a car is an ideal car: it is not an ideal of the car, nor the dream of the car when it is all alone in the garage, it is a really good and solid car. This is the meaning that is finally taken by... - if it were only that, of course, a literary thing, a certain fashion of articulating that the analyst has to intervene as someone who knows a little bit more about it than the analysand, it would all be simply of the order of platitude, would perhaps not have such import. But the fact is that it expresses something quite different, it expresses a veritable subjective implication of the analyst in this very sliding of the meaning of this couple of signifiers: ego and ideal. We have no reason at all to be surprised at an effect of this order, it is only a patching together. It is only the final term of something whose source is much more constitutive of this adventure than simply this local, almost caricatural point, which as you know is the one that we confront all the time, that is all we are here for.

Where has all this come from? From the "turning point" of 1920. Around what does the turning point of 1920 turn? Around the fact that - the people of the time said it, the heroes of the first analytic generation - interpretation no longer functioned as it had functioned, the atmosphere no longer allows it to function, to succeed. And why? This did not surprise Freud, he had said it a long time before. One could highlight the one of his texts where he says, very early on, in the Technical papers: "Let us take advantage of the openness of the unconscious because it will soon have found some other trick".

What can that mean for us who want nevertheless to discover from this experience - which has involved a sliding on our part also - some reference points? I mean that the effect of a discourse - I am talking about that of the first analytic generation - which, while dealing with the effect of a discourse, the unconscious, does not know that this is what is in question, because, even though it was there - since the Traumdeutung - as I teach you to (7) recognise, to spell out, to see that what is constantly in question under the term mechanisms of the unconscious is nothing but the effect of discourse.... it is indeed this, the effect of a discourse which, dealing with the effect of a discourse which, the unconscious, does not know it, necessarily culminates at a new crystallisation of the these effects of the unconscious which makes this discourse opaque. A new crystallisation, what does that mean? That means the effects that we note, namely that it no longer has the same effect on patients when they are given certain glimpses, certain keys, when certain signifiers are manipulated before them.

But, pay careful attention to this, the subjective structures which correspond to this new crystallisation, do not need, for their part, to be new. Namely these registers, these degrees of alienation, as I might say, that we can specify, qualify in the subject under the terms for example of ideal ego, ego-ideal, it is like stationary waves - whatever is happening - these effects which repulse, immunise, mithridatize the subject with respect to a certain discourse, which prevents it from being the one which can continue to function when it is a question of leading him where we ought to lead him, namely to his desire. It changes nothing about the nodal points where he, as subject, is going to recognise himself, establish himself. And this is what Freud notes at this turning point.

If Freud tries to define what these stationary points, these fixed waves are in the subjective constitution, it is because this is what appears very remarkably to him, to be a constant, but it is not in order to consecrate them that he occupies himself with them and articulates them, it is to remove them as obstacles. It is not in order to establish, as a type of irreducible inertia, the supposedly synthesising Ich function of the ego, even when he speaks about it, puts it in the foreground, and it is nevertheless in this way that this was subsequently interpreted. It is to the extent that precisely we have to reconsider that as the artefacts of the self-establishment of the subject in his relationship to the signifier on the one hand, to reality on the other. It is in order to open up a new chapter of analytic action.

It is as a crowd organised by the analytic ego-ideal as it has effectively developed under the form of a certain number of mirages, in the forefront of which is the one for example which is put into the term of strong ego, so often wrongly implied at points where one believes one recognises it... . I am attempting here to do something of which one could say, with all the (8) reservations that this implies, say that it is an effort of analysis in the proper sense of the term, that to reverse the coupling of terms which form the title of Freud's article, to which I referred above, one of the aspects of my seminar could be called Ich-Psychologie und Massenanalyse. It is in so far as there has come, there has been promoted to the forefront of analytic theory the Ich-Psychologie which has acted as a jam, which has acted as a dam, which has created an inertia, for more than a decade, to any restarting of analytic efficacy, it is in so far as things are at that point that it is appropriate to interpellate the analytic community as such by allowing each one to look at what has come to alter the analytic purity of his position vis-a-vis the one for whom he is the guarantor, his analysand, in so far as he himself is inscribed, is determined by the effects which result from the analytic mass, I mean the mass of analysts, in the present state of their constitution and their discourse.

Let no one be in any way deceived about what I am in the process of saying, it is a question here of something which is not of the order of a historical accident, the accent being put on the accident. We are in the presence of a difficulty, of an impasse which results from what you have heard me earlier putting at the high point of what I was expressing: analytic action.

If there is a place where the term action - for some time, in our modern epoch, put in question by philosophers - can be reinterrogated in a fashion which may perhaps be decisive, it is, however paradoxical this affirmation may appear, at the level of the one who may be thought to be the one who most abstains from it, namely the analyst.

On several occasions, these last years in my seminar, remember, in connection with the obsessional and his style of performance, indeed of exploit - and you will rediscover it in the written form that I gave to my Royaumont report. In its definitive form, I put the accent on what our very particular experience of action as acting out, in the treatment, ought to allow us to introduce as a new, original aspect to all thematic reflection about action. If there is something that the analyst can stand up and say, it is that action as such, human action, if you wish, is always implicated in the attempt, in the temptation to respond to the unconscious. And I propose to whoever is occupied in any way whatsoever with what merits the name of action, to the (9) historian specifically in so far as he does not renounce this thing which many fashions of formulating make it difficult to make up our mind about, namely the meaning of history, I propose to him to take up again in function of such a formulation the question of what we cannot all the same eliminate from the text of history, namely that its meaning does not drag us along purely and simply like the famous dead dog, but that in history there occur actions.

But the action that we have to deal with is analytic action. And as regards it, it cannot all the same be contested that it is an attempt to respond to the unconscious. And it cannot be contested either that in our subject what happens, what our experience habituates us to, this thing that makes an analyst, what ensures that we know what we are saying, even when we do not know very well how to say it, when we say: "That is an acting out...", in a subject in analysis. It is the most general formula that one can give of it and it is important to give the most general formula. Because here, if one gives particular formulae, the meaning of things is obscured, if one says: "It is a relapse of the subject" for example or if one says: "It is an effect of our stupidities" one draws a veil over what is in question, naturally it can be that, to the highest degree, these are particular cases of these definitions that I am proposing concerning acting out. The fact is that, because the analytic action is an attempt, is a temptation also in its way of responding to the unconscious, acting out is this type of action through which at one or other moment of the treatment, no doubt in so far as he is very specially solicited - it is perhaps through our stupidity, it may be through his, but this is secondary, it does not matter - the subject requires a more exact response.

Every action, acting out or not, analytic action or not, has a certain relationship to the opacity of the repressed and the most original action to the most original repressed, to the Urverdrangt. And then we ought also.... this is the importance of the notion of Urverdrangt - which is in Freud and which can appear there as opaque, that is why I am trying to give it a meaning for you - it depends on something which is the same thing as what, in a certain fashion, I tried the last time to articulate for you when I told you that we cannot help engaging ourselves in the most original Versagung, it is the same thing (10) which is expressed on the theoretical plane in the following formula that, despite all appearances, there is no metalanguage.

There can be a metalanguage on the blackboard, when I am writing little signs, a, b, x^{Kappa} , it works, it is all right and it functions, it is mathematics. But as regards what is called the word, namely that a subject engages himself - in language one can no doubt speak about the word, and you see that I am in the process of doing so, but in doing so all the effects of the word are engaged, and this is why you are told that at the level of the word there is no metalanguage or, if you wish, that there is no metadiscourse. There is no action, to conclude, which definitively transcends the effects of the repressed. Perhaps, if there is one in the final analysis, at the very most it is the one in which the subject as such dissolves, is eclipsed, and disappears. It is an action about which nothing can be said. It is, if you wish, the horizon of this action which gives its structure to my notation of the phantasy. And my little notation, this is why it is algebraic, why it can only be written with chalk on the blackboard, that the notation of the phantasy is $24o$, which one can read, O . desire of little o , the object of desire. You will see that all of this will lead us perhaps all the same to perceive in a more precise fashion the essential necessity there is for us not to forget this place unsayable precisely in as much as the subject disintegrates there, that the algebraic notation alone can preserve in the formula that I give you of phantasy.

In this article, "Transference and love", by the already mentioned Jekels and Bergler, they said then in 1933, while they were still in the Vienna Society.... There is a brilliant clinical intuition which gives, as is usually the case, its weight, its value to this article, this throwing into relief, this tone which ensures that this makes of it an article belonging to what one can call the first generation. So that now still, what pleases us in an article, is when it contributes something like that. This intuition, is that there is a relationship, a close relationship between the term of the present-day romantic ideal love, and guilt (culpa-bilite).

Jekels and Bergler tell us, contrary to the pastoral scenes in which love is bathed in beatitude: "Just observe what you see, it is not simply that love is often guilty, but that one loves in order to escape guilt". That, obviously, is not the sort of (11) thing that is said every day. All the same, it is a little bit embarrassing for people who do not like Claudel, for me it is of the same order when we are told things like that. If one loves, in short, it is because there is still somewhere the shadow of the one that a very funny woman with whom we were travelling in Italy called il vecchio con la barba, the one you can see everywhere among the primitives. Well then, there is very well sustained this thesis that, at bottom, love is the need to be loved by whoever might make you guilty. And precisely, if one is loved by her or by him, it feels much better.

It is one of these analytic glimpses that I would qualify as being precisely of the order of these truths of good alloy, which are also naturally of bad, because it is an alloy, in other words an alloying that it is not really distinguished, that it is a clinical truth, but it is as such, as I might say, a collaborator-type truth, there is here a kind of collapsing of a certain articulation. It is not a taste for the romantic that makes me want to separate out again these two metals, love and guilt on this occasion, it is that the importance of our discoveries reposes entirely on these piling-up effects of the symbolic in the real, in the reality as they say, with which ceaselessly we have to deal. And it is with this that we progress, that we show the efficacious mainsprings, those with which we have to deal.

And it is quite clear, certain that if guilt is not always and immediately involved in the unleashing, in the origins of a love, in the lightning flash, as I might put it, of falling in love, of love at first sight, it remains no less certain that even in unions inaugurated under such poetic auspices, with time it happens that there comes to be applied, to be centred on the beloved object all the effects of an active censorship. It is not simply that around him there come to be regrouped the whole system of prohibitions, but moreover that it is to him that one comes in this behaviour-function, so constitutive of human behaviour, which is called asking permission.

The role, I am not saying of the ego-ideal, but well and truly of the super-ego, as such and in the most opaque and most upsetting form, the incidence of the superego in very authentic forms, in the best quality forms of what is called the loving relationship, is something which it not at all to be neglected.

(12) And then, there is, on the one hand, this intuition in the article of our friends Jekels and Bergler, and then on the other there is a partial utilisation and truly one that is as brutal as a rhinoceros of what Freud contributed in terms of economic glimpses under the register of narcissism.

The idea that the whole finality of the libidinal equation aims in the last resort at the restoration of a primitive integrity, at the reintegration of all that is, if I remember rightly, Abtrennung, everything that the subject had been led at a certain moment by experience to consider as separated from him, this theoretical notion, itself, is extremely precarious because it is applied in every register and at every level. The question of the function that it plays at the time of "An introduction to narcissism", in the thought of Freud, is a question.... It is a question of knowing whether we can trust it, of knowing whether, as the authors say in clear terms - because they knew the whole compass of the aporias of a position in that generation when people were not formed on the assembly line - one can formulate this under the name of "The miracle of object cathexis". And, in effect, in such a perspective, it is a miracle. If the subject is truly, at the libidinal level, constituted in such a fashion that his goal and his aim are to be satisfied from an entirely narcissistic position, well then, how does he not manage in general and on the whole to remain in it? In a word, that if anything can make this monad throb to the slightest degree in the sense of a reaction, one can very well conceive theoretically that his whole goal is all the same to return to this starting position. It is very difficult to see what could condition this enormous detour which, at the very least, constitutes all the same a complex and rich structuration which is the one that we have to deal with in the facts.

And this indeed is what is in question and what the authors try to respond to throughout this article. To do that they engage, rather servilely I must say, on the paths opened by Freud, which are the following, that the mainspring of this complexification of this structure of the subject - which you see to be that which today gives its equilibrium, its unique theme to what I am developing for you - this complexification of the subject, namely the coming into play of the ego-ideal, Freud, in the "Introduction to narcissism", indicates to us to be the artifice through which the subject is going to be able to maintain his ideal, let us say to be brief because it is late, of omnipotence.

(13) In this inaugural text of Freud's, especially if one reads it, this comes, this happens and then it already sufficiently illuminates things at that particular moment for us not to demand any more of him. It is quite clear that, since Freud's thought has gone a certain distance since then, our authors find themselves confronted with a rather serious complexification of this first differentiation, that they have to face up to the distance, the difference between it and an ego-ideal which would be when all is said and done entirely constructed precisely to restore to the subject - you see in what sense - the benefits of love. The ego-ideal, is this something which, because it itself originated in the first lesions of narcissism, becomes retained when it is introjected. This moreover is what Freud explains to us. For the super-ego, it will be seen that it is all the same necessary to admit that there must be another mechanism, because even though it is introjected, the super-ego does not become for all that much more bénéficient. And I will stop there, I will take it up again.

What the authors are necessarily led to, is to have recourse to a whole dialectic of Eros and Thanatos which is no small thing at that time. They really make a lot of it and it is even rather nicely done, consult this article, you will get your money's worth.

But before leaving you, I would like all the same to suggest to you something lively and amusing, intended to give you an idea of what a more exact introduction to the function of narcissism allows, I believe, to better articulate in a way that all analytic practice has confirmed ever since these notions were introduced.

Ideal ego and ego-ideal have of course the closest relationship with certain exigencies of the preservation of narcissism. But what I proposed to you subsequently, following on the track of my first approach to a necessary modification of analytic theory as it was engaging itself along the path on which I showed you above the ego was being used, is indeed this approach which is called, in what I teach you or taught you, the mirror stage. What are the its consequences as regards this economy of the ideal ego, of the ego-ideal and of their relationship to the preservation of narcissism.

Well then, because it is late, I will illustrate it for you in a way that I hope you will find amusing. I spoke above about a car, let us try to see what the ideal ego is. The ideal (14) ego, is the son and heir at the wheel of his little sports' car. And with that he is going to show you a bit of the countryside. He is going to play the smart Alec. He is going to indulge his taste for taking risks, which is not a bad thing, his love of sport, as they say. And everything is going to consist in knowing what meaning he gives to this word sport, whether sport cannot also be defying the rules, I am not simply saying the rules of the road, but also those of safety. In any case, this indeed is the register in which he will have to show himself or not show himself and namely how he is going to show himself as being better than the others, even if this consists in saying that they are going a bit far. That is what the ideal ego is.

I am only opening a side door - because what I have to say, is the relationship to the ego-ideal - a side door to the fact that he does not leave the ideal ego alone and without object, because after all if on one or other occasion - not on all - he indulges in these risky exercises, it is for what? To catch a girl. Is it as much in order to catch a girl as for the way of catching a girl? The desire is less important here perhaps than the way of satisfying it. And this indeed is the reason why, as we know, the girl may be quite incidental, or even be absent. In a word, from this angle which is the one at which this ideal ego comes to take its place in the phantasy, we see better, more easily than elsewhere what regulates the pitch of the elements of the phantasy, and that there must be something here, between the two terms, which slides for one of the two to be so easily elided. This term which slides is one we know. No need here to note it with any more commentary, it is the small Q>, the imaginary phallus, and what is in question, is indeed something which is being put to the test.

What is the ego-ideal? The ego-ideal which has the closest relationship with this operation and this function of the ideal ego is well and truly constituted by the fact that at the beginning as I told you, if he has his little sports' car, it is because he is the son and heir and he is a Daddy's boy and that in order, to change register, if Marie-Chantal, as you know, joins the Communist party, it is to "get up Daddy's nose". As regards whether she does not overlook in this function her own identification to what it is a question of obtaining in "getting up Daddy's nose", is still another side door that we will avoid pushing. But let us say clearly that one and the other, Marie-Chantal and Daddy's boy at the wheel of his little car, (15) would be quite simply enveloped in this organised world like that by the father if there were not precisely the signifier father, which makes it permissible, as I might say, to extricate oneself from it in order to imagine oneself, and even to succeed in getting up his nose. Which is what is expressed by saying that he or she introjects on this occasion the paternal image.

Is this not also to say that it is the instrument thanks to which the two personages, masculine and feminine can extroject themselves for their part from the objective situation? Introjection, in short, is that, to organise oneself subjectively in such a way that the father, in effect, under the form of the not too cross ego-ideal, should be a signifier from which the little person, male or female, comes to contemplate his or herself without too much disadvantage at the wheel of their little car or waving their Communist Party card. In short, if from this introjected signifier the subject falls under a judgement which disapproves of him, he takes on from that the dimension of outcast which, as everyone knows, is not so disadvantageous from a narcissistic point of view.

But then, there results from this that we cannot talk so simply about the function of the ego-ideal as realising in a sort of massive fashion the coalescence of benevolent authority and of what is narcissistic benefit as if it were purely and simply inherent to a single effect at the same point.

And in a word, what I am trying to articulate for you with my little schema from another time - which I will not do again because I do not have the time, but which is still present, I imagine, in a certain number of memories - which is that of the illusion of the inverted vase in so far as it is from one point only that one can see emerging around the flowers of desire this real image, let us notice, of the vase produced through the intermediary of the reflection of a spherical mirror, in other words that the particular structure of the human being in terms of the hypertrophy of his ego seems to be linked to his prematurity.

The necessary distinction between the locus where there is produced the narcissistic benefit and the locus where the ego-ideal functions forces us to interrogate in a different way the relationship of both one and the other to the function of love - this relationship to the function of love which should not be introduced, and less than ever at the level we are at in the analysis of transference, in a confused fashion.

(16) Allow me again, to end, to tell you about the case of a patient. Let us say that she takes more than her freedom with the rights, if not the duties of the conjugal bond and that, by God, when she has a liaison, she knows how to push its consequences up to the most extreme point of what a certain social limit, that of her husband's self-respect, commands her to respect. Let us say that she is someone, in a word, who knows admirably well how to hold and deploy the positions of her desire. And I would prefer to say that with time she has been able, within her family, I mean as regards her husband and her lovable offspring, to maintain quite intact the field of force of exigencies strictly centred on her own libidinal needs. When Friede speak to us somewhere, if I remember rightly about the neue morale, which means the morality of noodles in what concerns women, namely the satisfactions required, you must not believe that this always fails. There are women who succeed extremely well, except for the fact that she, for her part has all the same need of an analysis.

What was it that for a whole period of time I was realising for her? The authors of this article will give us the response. I was indeed her ego-ideal in so far as I was indeed the ideal point where order is maintained, and in a fashion all the more required in that it is starting from there that all the disorder is possible. In short, it was not a question at that epoch of her analyst being an immoral person. If I had been stupid enough to approve one or other of her excesses, one would have had to see what would have resulted from it. Much more, what she was able to glimpse about one or other atypical feature of my own familial structure or about the principles in which I brought up those who were under my control did not pass without opening up for her all the depths of an abyss quickly closed up again.

You must not believe that it is so necessary for the analyst effectively to supply, thank God, all the ideal images that are formed about his person. Simply, she signalled to me on each occasion all the things that, in my regard, she wanted to know nothing about. The only really important thing, is the guarantee that she had, you can certainly believe me, that as regards her own person I would be unbending.

What does all this exigency for moral conformity mean? The mainstream moralists have, as you may well imagine, the reply quite naturally that this person in order to be leading such a full life must not exactly be from a working class environment. (17) And therefore, the political moralist will tell you that what it is a question of preserving, is above all a lid on the questions that one might pose concerning the legitimacy of social privilege. And this all the more because, as you may well imagine, she was the tiniest bit progressive.

Well then, as you see, in considering the true dynamic of forces, it is here that the analyst has his little word to say. The open abysses, one might deal with them as pertaining to what concerns the perfect conformity of ideals and the reality of the analyst. But I think that the true thing, the one which ought to be maintained in any case beyond any argument, is that she had the prettiest breasts in town, which as you may well imagine, is something that the girls selling brassieres never deny!

Seminar 24: Wednesday 7 June 1961

We are going to continue our account in order to formulate our goal, perhaps a daring one, of this year, to formulate what the analyst should truly be in order to respond to the transference, which also henceforth implies the question of knowing what he ought to be, what he can be, and this is why I have qualified this question as "daring".

You saw it being delineated the last time, in connection with the reference that I gave you in connection with the article by Jekels and Bergler, in Imago, in 1934, namely a year after they made this communication at the Viennese Society, that we were led to pose the question in terms of the function of narcissism involved in every possible libidinal cathexis. You know on this subject of narcissism what authorises us to consider this domain as already opened up, amply dusted down in a fashion that recalls the specificity of the position which is ours: I mean the one that I have taught you here in so far as it is directly involved and we are going to see the way in which it enlarges, it generalises the one which is habitually given or accepted in analytic writings. I mean moreover that when generalised, it allows there to be perceived certain traps included in the particularity of the position ordinarily put forward, articulated by the analysts.

I indicated to you the last time, in connection with Übertragung und Liebe, that one could find in it what were therefore, if not all, at least certain of the impasses that the theory of narcissism risks bringing for those who articulate them. One could say that the whole work of a Balint turns entirely around the question of the so called primordial autoeroticism and the fashion in which it is compatible both with observed facts and (2) with the necessary development applied to the field of analytic experience.

That is why, as a support, I have just drawn for you on the blackboard this little schema that is not new, that you will in any case find much more carefully done, perfected, in the next number of La Psychanalyse.

I did not want to draw all its details for you here - I mean the details which recall its pertinence in the optical domain - as much because I am not particularly inclined to tire myself as because I believe that on the whole it would have made this schema more confused, simply I remind you of this old business described as the illusion, in classical experiments of fundamental physics, of the inverted bouquet by means of which there is made to appear, thanks to the operation of the spherical mirror placed behind a certain apparatus, the real, I underline it, image - I mean that it is not a virtual image seen through space, deployed through a mirror - which arises, provided certain lighting conditions are respected, all around, with sufficient precision, above a support, a bouquet which in reality is found hidden in the underpinnings of this support. These are artifices which are moreover employed in all sorts of tricks that conjurers present from time to time. One could present in the same way something quite other than a bouquet.

Here, it is the vase itself, for reasons of presentation and of metaphorical utilisation, that we make use of, a vase which is (3) here, under this flesh and blood support, with its authentic pottery. This vase would appear in the form of a real image, on condition that the observer's eye is sufficiently far away and on the other hand in the field, naturally, of a cone which represents a field determined by the opposition of lines which join the edges of the spherical mirror to the focus of this mirror, the point at which there can be produced this illusion. If the eye is sufficiently far away, it will follow that tiny displacements will not make the image itself noticeably vacillate and will also allow these tiny displacements, to be appreciated as something whose contours, in short, are maintained alone with the possibility of visual projection in space. It will not be a flat image, but one which will give the impression of a certain volume.

This then is used for what? To construct an apparatus which, for its part, has a metaphorical value and which is founded on the fact that, if we suppose that the eye of the observer is linked, through topological, spatial conditions by being in some way included in the spatial field which is around the point that the production of this illusion is possible, if it fulfils these conditions, it will nevertheless perceive this illusion while being at a point which makes it impossible for him to see it. There is an artificial way to arrange that, which is to place somewhere a plane mirror which we call big O - because of the metaphorical utilisation that we will subsequently give it - in which he can see the same illusion being produced in a reflected fashion under the form of a virtual image of this real image. In other words, he sees being produced there something which is, in short, in the reflected form of a virtual image, the same illusion which would be produced for him if he placed himself in real space, namely at a point symmetrical with respect to the mirror to the one he occupies, and looked at what was happening at the focus of the spherical mirror, namely the point where there is produced the illusion formed by the real image of the vase.

And, in the same way as in the classical experiment, in so far as it is the illusion of the bouquet that is in question - the vase has its usefulness in this sense that it is this which allows the eye to fix itself, to accommodate itself in such a fashion that the real image appears to it in space - inversely we might suppose the existence of a real bouquet that the real image of the vase would come to surround at its base.

(4) We call this mirror 0, we call the real image of the vase $i(o)$, we call the flowers o . And you are going to see the way this is going to be of use to us for the explanations that we have to give concerning the implications of the function of narcissism, in so far as the ego-ideal plays in it the role of a mainspring that Freud's original text on "An introduction to narcissism" introduced and which is the one which was so much taken into account when we were told that the mainspring of the ego-ideal is moreover the pivotal point, the major point of this sort of identification which is supposed to intervene as fundamental in the production of the phenomenon of transference.

This ego-ideal, for example in the article in question, which is really not chosen at random - as I told you, the other day - which is chosen on the contrary as altogether exemplary, significant, well articulated and representing, at the date that it was written, the notion of the ego-ideal as it had been created and generalised in the analytic milieu therefore, what idea do the authors form of it when they begin to elaborate this function of the ego-ideal which is a great novelty because of its topographical function in the conception of analysis? Consult in a cursory fashion the clinical works, the therapeutic accounts or the case discussions, that is enough to grasp the idea the authors had of it at that time. One encounters difficulties both in applying it And here in part at least is what they elaborate. If one reads them with sufficient attention, it emerges that, in order to see what the efficacy of the ego-ideal is, in so far as it intervenes in the function of transference, they are going to consider this ego-ideal, as a field organised in a certain fashion inside the subject. The notion of inside being an altogether capital topological function in analytic thinking - even indeed introjection which refers to it - it is therefore an organised field which is considered rather naively in a way, in the measure that distinctions are not at all made at that time between the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

This state of imprecision, of indistinction that is presented in the topological notions, we are indeed forced to say that in general we must represent it in a spatial or quasi-spatial way, let us say - the thing is not highlighted, but it is implied in the way we are told about it - like a surface or like a volume, in one or other case, as a form of something which, (5) because it is organised in the image of something else, is presented as giving the support, the foundation to the idea of identification. In short, within a certain topographical field, it is a differentiation produced by the particular operation called identification.

It is about functions, identified forms that the authors are going to pose themselves questions. What is to be made of them in order that they should be able in short to fulfil their economic function? We are not required, because it is not our project nor our object today - it would take us too far afield - to give an account of what necessitates for the authors the solution that they are going to adopt which, at the moment that it emerges here, is rather new. It has not yet been - as you will see - completely popularised, it is put forward here perhaps for the first time. In any case, it is naturally only a matter of promoting it in an accentuated fashion, because in effect, in certain remarks of Freud's text to which they refer, lateral remarks in the context from which they are borrowed, there are the beginnings of a solution.

To say what is in question, it is the supposition that the property of this field is to be invested with a neutral energy, which means the introduction into the analytic dynamic of a neutral energy, namely, at the point of the evolution of the theory that we are at, of an energy which distinguishes itself - it cannot mean anything else: as being neither one thing nor the other, which is what neutral means - from properly libidinal energy in so far as Freud's second topography obliged him to introduce the notion of an energy distinct from libido in the Todestrieb, the death instinct and into the function, from then on pinpointed by the analysts under the name of Thanatos - which certainly does not contribute to the clarification of the notion - and, in a contrary manipulation, to couple the terms Eros and Thanatos. It is, in any case, under these terms that the new dialectic of libidinal cathexis is handled by the authors in question. Eros and Thanatos are discussed here as two altogether primordial fates behind the whole mechanics and dialectics of analysis. And the destiny, the purpose, what is at stake in this neutralised field, here is what is going to be developed for us in this article, the vicissitude - das Schicksal, to recall the term used by Freud about the drive and to explain to us how we can imagine it, conceive of it.

(6) In order to conceive of this field, with the economic function that we will be led to reserve for it to render it usable both in its proper function as ego-ideal and in the fact that it is in the place of this ego-ideal that the analyst will be called on to function, this is what the authors are led to imagine. Here we are at the highest, the most developed stage of metapsychology. They are led to conceive the following: that the concrete origins of the ego-ideal and this in so far above all as they are unable to separate them, as it is legitimate to do, from those of the super-ego, which are distinct and nevertheless, in all the theory, linked together - they can only

- and after all we have nothing to envy them, as I might say, with what the developments of Kleinian theory have since brought us - they can only conceive of its origins in the form of a creation of Thanatos.

In effect, it is quite certain that, if one begins from the notion of an original perfect narcissism in what concerns libidinal cathexis, if one conceives that everything which is of the order of the primordial object is primordially included by the subject in this narcissistic sphere, in this primitive monad of jouissance to which the baby is identified in a rather rash way, it is difficult to see what might be involved in a subjective escape from this primitive monadism. The authors, in any case, have no hesitation themselves in considering this deduction to be impossible. Now, if in this monad there is also included the devastating power of Thanatos, it is perhaps here that we can consider there to be the source of something which obliges the subject - if one can express it briefly in this way - to emerge from his self-envelopment.

In short, the authors have no hesitation - I am not taking responsibility for this, I am commenting on them and I would ask you to refer to the text in order to see that it is indeed the way I am presenting it - in attributing to Thanatos as such the creation of the object. They are moreover struck enough by it themselves to introduce, at the end of their explanations, in the last pages of the article, a sort of humorous little question: "However apt it might be, we are not malicious enough to state that object relationship in the service of the discharge of aggression is the most respectable of which the human being is capable."

(7) In truth, even though they question themselves in this way in order to allow a certain tempering, to give a certain touch of humour to what they themselves have developed, there is nothing after all to correct, in effect, this quite necessary framework, this feature, if one has to follow the path of these authors. I am pointing this out to you in passing. For the moment moreover, it is not so much this that creates problems for us, but the following which is conceivable at least in a localised, dynamic way, as marking a significant moment in early infantile experiences: it is in effect, that it is indeed perhaps in a burst, in a moment of aggression that there is situated the differentiation, if not of every object, in any case of a highly significant object. Then this object, once the conflict has broken out, it is the fact that it may afterwards be introjected to a degree that will give it its price and its value. Moreover we rediscover here Freud's classic and original schema. It is from this introjection of an imperative, prohibitive, essentially conflictual object - Freud always tells us - it is in the measure in effect that this object - the father for example, on a particular occasion, in a first summary and rough schématisation of the Oedipus complex - it is in so far as this object has been interiorised that it will constitute this super-ego which constitutes on the whole a progress, a beneficent action from the libidinal point of view because, since it is reintrojected, it reenters - this is a first Freudian thematic - into the sphere which, in short, if only because it is interior, from this fact alone, is sufficiently narcissised to be for the subject the object of libidinal cathexis.

It is easier to make oneself loved by the ego-ideal than by what was for a moment its original, the object. It remains nonetheless that, however introjected it may be, it continues to constitute an inconvenient agency. And it is indeed this character of ambiguity which leads the authors to introduce this thematic of a neutral field of cathexis, a field of struggle which will in turn be occupied, then evacuated in order to be reoccupied by one of the two terms whose Manicheism we must admit embarrasses us a little, those of Eros and Thanatos.

And it would be in particular in a second moment - or more exactly it is in experiencing the need to punctuate it as a second moment - that the authors are going to realise what Freud had from the first introduced, namely the possible function of the ego-ideal in Verliebtheit, as well as in hypnosis. As you (8) know "Being in love and hypnosis", is the title of one of the articles that Freud wrote in which he analysed Massenpsychologie. It is in so far as this ego-ideal, this Ideal du moi already constituted, introjected, can be reprojected onto an object - reprojected, let us underline here once again how the fact of not distinguishing, in the classical theory, the different registers of the symbolic, the imaginary and real ensures that these comings and goings of introjection and projection, which are after all, not obscure, but arbitrary, suspended, gratuitous, given over to a necessity which can only be explained in terms of the most absolute contingency...it is in so far as this ego-ideal can be reprojected onto an object that, if this object happens to be favourable to you, to regard you propitiously, it will be for you this object of loving cathexis to the highest degree in so far as here the description of the phenomenology of Verliebtheit is introduced by Freud at a level such as to make possible its almost total ambiguity with the effect of hypnosis.

The authors clearly understand that following on this second projection, there is nothing to stop us - in any case nothing stops them - from implying a second reintroduction which means that in certain more or less extreme states, among which they have no hesitation in putting at the limit manic states, the ego-ideal itself, even if it is carried away by the enthusiasm of the outpouring of love implied in the second phase, in the second projection, the ego-ideal can become for the subject completely identical, playing the same function as that established in the relationship of total dependency of Verliebtheit. With respect to an object, the ego-ideal can itself become something equivalent to what is called for in love, to what can give its full satisfaction to the "wanting to be loved", to the geliebt werden wollen.

I think that it is not at all evidence of an exaggerated requirement in conceptual matters to feel that, if these descriptions, especially when they are illustrated, carry with them certain glimmers of perspectives, flashes of which we rediscover in clinical work, we cannot, in many respects, be completely satisfied with them.

In order to punctuate immediately what I can believe I can say is articulated in a more elaborated fashion by a schema like that of (9) the little montage which has not, like any other description of this kind, like those of the topographical order that Freud himself constructed, of course, any kind, not alone of pretention, but even of possibility of representing anything whatsoever of the organic order, let it be well understood that we are not one of those who, as one nevertheless sees being written, imagine, that with a suitable surgical operation, a lobotomy, one removes part of the super-ego with a little spoon. There are people who believe that, who have written, that one of the effects of lobotomy was, that one removed the super-ego, that one put it to one side on a plate, that is not what is in question. Let us observe what is articulated by the functioning implied in this little apparatus. It is not for nothing that it reintroduces a metaphor of an optical kind, there is certainly a reason for that which is not simply one of convenience: it is structural.

It is indeed in so far as that which is of the order of the mirror goes much further than the model as regards the properly imaginary mainspring, that here the mirror intervenes. But beware, it is obviously a schema a little bit more elaborated than that of the concrete experience which occurs in front of the mirror.

In effect something happens for the child in front of a real surface which effectively plays the role of mirror. This mirror, usually a plane mirror, a polished surface, is not to be confused with what is represented here as a plane mirror. The plane mirror which is here has a different function. This schema has the value of introducing the function of the big Other - whose figure, under the form of 0, is put here at the level of the apparatus of the plane mirror - of introducing the function of the big Other in so far as it must be implicated in these elaborations of narcissism respectively connoted, which must be connoted in a different fashion as ego-ideal and as ideal ego.

In order not to give you a description of this which might in a way be dry, which, at the same time would run the risk of appearing what it is not, namely arbitrary, I will therefore have to give it first of all under the form of a commentary which involves the authors to which we are referring, in so far as they were guided, obligated by the need to face up to a problem of thinking, of mapping out. It is certainly not in this (10) connotation in order to accentuate the negative effects but much more rather - it is always more interesting - what is positive in it.

Let us observe therefore that according to them, the object is supposed to be created by what? Properly speaking by the destructive instinct, Destruktionstrieb, Thanatos, as they call it, let us say, why not, hatred. Let us follow them. If it is true that things are that way, how can we conceive of it? If it is the need for destruction which creates the object, is it further necessary that there should remain something of the object after the destructive effect, it is not at all unthinkable. Not alone is it not unthinkable, but we indeed rediscover here what we ourselves elaborate in a different manner at the level of what we call the field of the imaginary and the effects of the imaginary. Because, as one might say, what remains, what survives of the object after this libidinal effect, this destructive Trieb, after the properly thanatogenic effect which is thus implied, is precisely what eternalises the object under the aspect of a form, it is what fixes it forever as a type in the imaginary.

In the image, there is precisely something which transcends the movement, the changeable in life, in this sense that it survives it. It is in effect one of the first steps of art, for the antique nous, in so far as in statuary the mortal is eternalised.

It is moreover, as we know in a certain way, in our elaboration of the mirror, the function which is fulfilled by the image of the subject in so far as something is suddenly proposed to him in which he does not simply receive the field of something in which he recognises himself, but of something which already presents itself as an Urbild-Ideal, as something which will always be, something which subsists of itself, as something before which he essentially experiences his own fissures as a premature being, as a being who experiences himself as not yet even - at the moment that the image comes to his perception - sufficiently coordinated to respond to this image in its totality.

It is very striking to see the little child - sometimes still enclosed in one of these little contraptions with which he begins to try to make the first attempts to walk, and where again even the gesture of taking the arm or the hand, things which are marked by a certain assymetrical, inappropriate style - to see this being who is still insufficiently stabilised, even at the level of the cerebellum, nevertheless wave, incline towards, bend, twist himself around with all sorts of expressive babbling (11) in front of his own image provided one has put within his range a low enough mirror and showing, in a way, in a living fashion the contrast between this thing which can be sketched of something which is projected in front of him, which attracts him, with which he persists in playing, and this incomplete thing which is manifested in his own gestures.

And here, my old thematic of the mirror stage, in so far as I suppose in it, as I see in it an exemplary point, a highly significant point which allows us to presentify, to depict for ourselves the key points, the nodal points where there can come to light, be conceived the renewal of this sort of possibility always open to the subject, of a self-breaking, of a self-tearing, of a self-biting before this thing which is both himself and another.

I see in this a certain dimension of conflict in which there is no other solution than that of an: either ... or ... He either has to put up with it as an intolerable image which steals him from himself, or he has to break it immediately, that is to say to reverse the position, to consider as cancelled, as cancellable, breakable the one he has before him, and to preserve of himself that which is at that moment the centre of his being, the drive of this being through the image, this image of the other whether it is specular or incarnated, which can be evoked in him. The relationship, the bond between the image and aggressivity is here quite articulatable.

Is it conceivable that a development, such a thematic could culminate at a sufficient consistency of the object, at an object which allows us to conceive of the diversity of the objectal phase as it develops in the course of the individual's life, is such a development possible?

In a certain fashion, one could say that it has been tried. In a certain fashion, one could say that the Hegelian dialectic of the conflict of consciences is after all nothing other than this attempt at elaborating the whole world of human knowledge starting from a pure conflict which is radically imaginary and radically destructive in its origin. You know that I have already highlighted its critical points, the points where gaps appear on different occasions and that this is not what I am going to do again today.

(12) For us, I think that there is no possibility, beginning from this radically imaginary starting point, of deducing everything that the Hegelian dialectic believes it can deduce from it. There are implications, unknown to itself, which allow it to function, which can in no way be satisfied with this support.

I would even say that if the hand which stretches out - and it is a hand which can be the hand of a very young subject, believe me, in the most direct, the most common observation - that if the hand which is stretched out towards the figure of its fellow armed with a stone - the child does not need to be very old in order to have, if not the vocation, at least the gestures of Cain - if this hand is stopped, even by another hand, namely of the one who is threatened, and that if, henceforth, they put down this stone together, it will constitute in a certain fashion an object, perhaps an object of accord, of dispute, that it will be in this respect the first stone, if you wish, of an objectal world, but that nothing will go beyond, nothing will be built upon it. This is indeed the case evoked as an echo in a harmonic which is called: the one who must throw the first stone and even in order that something should be constituted and come to a halt there, it is necessary, in effect, first of all that nothing should have been thrown and, not having thrown it the first time, it will not be thrown for any other reason.

It is clear that it is necessary that beyond the register of the Other, of the big O, should intervene for something to establish itself which opens out on a dialectic. This is what is expressed by the schema, in the measure that it means that it is in so far as the third, the big Other, intervenes in this relationship of the ego to the small other, that something can function which involves the fecundity of the narcissistic relationship itself.

I say, in order to exemplify it again in a gesture of the child before the mirror, this gesture which is well known, quite possible to come across, to find, of the child who, in the arms of the adult, is deliberately confronted with his image - whether the adult understands or not, it is clear that this amuses him. All its importance must be given to this movement of the head of the child who, even after having been captivated, interested by these first outlines of the game that he is playing before his own image, turns back towards the adult who is carrying him, without one being able to say of course what he is expecting from him, whether it is of the order of an accord, of a testifying. But what we mean here, is that this reference to the Other comes (13) to play an essential function in it, and that it is not forcing this function to conceive it, to articulate it, and that we can put in its place what is going to be attached to the ideal ego and to the ego-ideal respectively in the subsequent development of the subject.

From this Other, in so far as the child in front of the mirror turns back towards him, what can come? We advance and we say: there can only come the sign, the image of o, i(o). This specular image, desirable and destructive at the same time, is, or not, effectively desired by the one towards whom he turns back, at the very place where the subject at that moment identifies himself, sustains this identification to this image. From this first original moment on, we find in a tangible way what I would call the antagonistic character of the ideal ego, namely that already, in this specular situation, there are reduplicated, and this time at the level of the Other - for the Other and through the Other, the big Other - the desired ego - I mean desired by him - and the authentic ego, das echte Ich - if you will allow me to introduce this term which has nothing especially new about it in the context in question - except for the fact that you should notice that, in this original situation, it is the ideal which is there - I am talking about the ideal ego, not the ego-ideal - and that it is the authentic ego which, for its part, is to come.

And it will be through the evolution, with all the ambiguities of this word, that the authentic will come to birth, that it will be this time loved in spite of everything, ouk echon, even though it is not perfection itself. This is moreover how there functions in the whole process the function of the ideal ego: with this character of progress, it is against the wind, in risk and defiance that there will be made all its subsequent development.

What is the function here of the ego-ideal? You will tell me that it is the Other, the big O, but you surely sense here that it is originally, structurally, essentially implicated, involved uniquely as the locus from where there can be constituted in its pathetic oscillation this perpetual reference to the ego - of the ego to this image which offers itself, to which it identifies itself, presents itself and sustains itself as problematical, but uniquely starting from the gaze of the big Other. For this gaze of the big Other to be interiorised in its turn, does not mean that it is going to be confused with the place and the support which here already are constituted as ideal ego, it means something else, which goes very far. Because, this is to suppose an Einfühlung relationship which, by being admitted as (14) having to be necessarily as global as what is involved in the reference to a fully organised being - the real being who supports the child before his mirror - goes very far.

You see clearly that the whole question is here and that already I am highlighting the way in which, let us say, my solution differs from the classical solution, it is simply in something that I am going to say immediately even though it is our goal and the end on this occasion: it is from the first step that Freud takes in the articulation of what is Identifizierung, identification, in the first two forms in which he introduces it.

1 - A primitive identification which is extraordinarily important to remember in the first steps of his article - to which I will come back later, because they constitute all the same something that one cannot avoid - namely that Freud implies, as anterior to the very outline of the Oedipus situation, a first possible identification to the father as such. His head was full of the father. So that one allows him to make a first stage of identification to the father around which he develops a refined set of terms. He calls this identification "typically masculine", exquisit männlich. This takes place in development, I have no doubt about it. It is not a logical stage, it is a stage of development before the Oedipus complex has become engaged, to the point that in short he goes so far as to write that it is starting from this primordial identification that there would arise the desire towards the mother and, from then on, by a reversal, the father would be considered as a rival.

I am not in the process of saying that this stage is clinically grounded. I am saying that the fact that it should have appeared necessary for Freud's thinking should not, for us, at the time that Freud wrote this chapter, be considered as a sort of extravagance, as nonsense. There must have been a reason which necessitated for him this previous stage, and this is what my subsequent discourse will try to show you, I pass on.

2 - He then speaks about regressive identification, the one which results from the love relationship: in the measure that the object refuses love, the subject, by a regressive process - and you see there, it is not the only reason highlighted for which effectively it was necessary for Freud that there should have been this primordial stage of identification - the subject, by a (15) regressive process, is capable of identifying himself to the object which, in his call for love, disappoints him.

3 - Immediately after having given us these two modes of identification in the chapter, Die Identifizierung, it is the good old method that has been known for ages, since the Dora observation, namely the identification which comes from the fact that the subject recognises in the other the total, global situation in which it lives: hysterical identification par excellence. It is because the young girl has just received that evening, in the room where there are assembled rather neurotic and disturbed subjects, a letter from her lover that our hysteric has an attack. It is clear that it is identification, in our vocabulary, at the level of desire, let us leave it to one side.

Freud deliberately pauses in his text to tell us that, in these two modes of identification, the two first fundamental ones - one being the earliest of all modes of Einfühlungs Bindung - identification always occurs through ein einziger Zug.

Here is something which, both alleviates many difficulties for us in more than one respect, in respect first of all of the conceivability - which, is not something that should be despised - of a single trait. Second point, this thing which for us converges towards a notion that we know well, that of the signifier - that does not mean that this einziger Zug, this single trait, is, by that alone, given as such, as signifier. Not at all. It is rather probable, if we begin from the dialectic that I am trying to outline before you, that it is possibly a sign. In order to say that it is a signifier, more is needed: we require its subsequent utilisation in a signifying battery or as something which is related to a signifying battery. But the pinpoint character of this point of reference to the Other, at the origin, in the narcissistic relationship, this is what is defined by this ein einziger Zug. I mean that it is what gives the response to the question: how is there interiorised, this gaze of the Other which, between the two twin brother enemies, of the ego or of the specular image - of the small other - which can of every instant tip the balance of preference?

This gaze of the Other, should be considered by us as being interiorised through a sign, that is enough, ein einziger Zug. There is no need for a whole field of organisation, for a massive (16) introjection. This point of the single trait is a sign of the Other's assent, of the love-choice upon which the subject precisely can adjust his setting in the subsequent operation of the mirror, it is there somewhere, it is sufficient that the subject should coincide there in his relationship with the Other in order that this little sign, this einziger Zug, should be at his disposition.

The radical distinction between the ego-ideal - in so far as there is no particular reason to suppose another possible introjection - and the ideal ego, is that one is a symbolic introjection like every introjection: the ego-ideal, while the ideal ego is the source of an imaginary projection. That what happens at the level of the one, that narcissistic satisfaction should develop in the relationship to the ideal ego, depends on the possibility of being referred to this primordial symbolic term which can be monoformal, monosemantic, ein einziger Zug. This is capital for the whole development of what we have to say and, if you will still grant me a little time, I will begin then to recall simply what I can call, what I should consider as taken here from our theory of love.

Love, we have said, can only be conceived of in the perspective of demand. There is no love except for a being who can talk. The dimension, the perspective, the register of love develops, is outlined, is inscribed in what can be called the unconditional of the demand. It is what comes from the very fact of demanding, whatever one demands, simply in so far, not as one demands something, this or that, but in the register and the order of demand qua pure, that it is only a demand to be heard. I would go further, to be heard for what? Well, to be heard for something which could well be called "for nothing". This is not to say that this does not take us very far for all that. Because, implied in this "for nothing", there is already the place of desire.

It is precisely because the demand is unconditional that what is in question is not the desire of this or of that, but is simply desire. And that is the reason why, from the beginning, there is implied the metaphor of the désirer as such. And that is why when we began this year, I made you approach it from every angle. (17) The metaphor of the désirer in love implies what it is substituted for as metaphor, namely desire.

What is desired, is the désirer in the Other, which cannot happen unless the subject is conversed with as desirable, this is what he demands in the demand for love. But what we should see at this level, this point that I cannot omit today because it will be essential in that we will find it in our subsequent remarks, is something which we should not forget, it is that love as such - I always told you this and we will find it again required from every angle - is to give what one does not have. And that one cannot love except by becoming a non-haver, even if one has. That love as response implies the domain of not-having, is something that was invented not by me but by Plato, who discovered that Poverty alone, Penia, can conceive Love, could have the idea of becoming pregnant on the evening of a festival. And in effect, to give what one has is a festival, it is not love.

From which it follows - I am leading you on a little quickly, but you will see that we will fall on our feet - from which it follows, for the rich man - that exists and is even thought about - to love, that always requires a refusal. This is even the annoying thing. It is not only those who are refused who are annoyed, those who refuse, the rich, are not any more comfortable. This Versagung of the rich man is everywhere, it is not simply the mark of avarice, it is much more constitutive of the position of the rich man, whatever one may think of it.

And the thematic of folklore, of Griselda with all her seduction, even though she is all the same rather revolting - I think you know the story - is there to remind us of it. I would even go further while I am at it, the rich do not have a good press. In other words, we progressives, we do not like them very much. Let us beware, perhaps this hatred for the rich participates, by a secret path, quite simply in a revolt against love, in other words at a negation, at a Verneinung of the virtues of poverty which could well be at the origin of a certain méconnaissance of what love is. The sociological result is moreover rather curious. It is that obviously in that way one facilitates the rich a good deal in their function, their role is made much easier, with that there is tempered in them or more (18) exactly they are given a thousand excuses to avoid their function of festival-givers. That does not mean that they are any the happier for that.

In short, it is quite certain, for an analyst, that it is very difficult for a rich man to love. This is something about which a certain preacher from Galilee has already made a little remark in passing. It would be more appropriate perhaps to pity him on this point, than to hate him, unless after all this hating, which again is quite possible, is a way of loving. What is certain, is that riches tends to render impotent. Long experience as an analyst allows me to tell you that in general I take this fact as given. And this is what explains things all the same, the necessity for example of detours. The rich man is forced to buy because he is rich, and in order to recover himself, in order to rediscover potency, he tries by buying at a discount to devalorize - it is from him that that comes, it is for his convenience - to achieve this, the simplest method for example, is not to pay. In this way sometimes he hopes to provoke what he can never acquire directly, namely the desire of the Other.

But that is enough about the rich. Leon Bloy once wrote La femme pauvre. I am very embarrassed, because for some time I am speaking all the time about Catholic authors, but it is not my fault if I spotted in it a long time ago some very interesting things. I would like if someone, one day, became aware of the awful, the extraordinary things in terms of psychoanalytic benefits, that are hidden in La femme pauvre which is a book that can scarcely be tolerated that only an analyst can understand - I have never yet seen any analyst interest himself in it - but he would have done well also to write: La femme riche. It is certain that only a woman can incarnate in a dignified way the ferocity of riches, but after all that is not enough and that poses, for her and very specially for the one who solicits her love, very particular problems. This would require a return to feminine sexuality. I apologise, I will be forced simply to indicate this to you as a sort of first indication.

I would like all the same because in short we cannot go any further today, to highlight from now, because what is in question when we talk about love is very specifically to describe the (19) field in which we will have to say what our place ought to be in the transference, to highlight before leaving you something which is not at all unconnected with these remarks about riches.

A little word about the saint. It is not completely out of place, because we have not finished with our Claudel. As you know, right at the end, in the solution given to the problem of desire, we have a saint, Orian by name, of whom it is expressly said that if he wants to give nothing to little Pensee, who happily is sufficiently armed to take it from him by force - it is because he has much too much: Joy, nothing less than that, Joy in its entirety, and that there is no question of debasing such riches for a little adventure - this is said in the text - this sort of thing which happens like that, a matter of three nights in an hotel. It's a funny business. It is all the same a little superficial to apply psychology to creativity and to think simply that he is someone very repressed. But what poetic creativity signifies, namely the function that Orian has in this tragedy, namely that what interests us, is something quite different and this is what I want to highlight by pointing out to you that the saint is a rich man.

He does everything he can to look poor, it is true, at least in more than one country, but it is precisely that which makes him rich, and particularly stingy among the others because his is not a riches that one can-easily get rid of. The saint lives entirely in the domain of having. The saint renounces perhaps some small things but it is to possess everything. And if you look very carefully at the lives of saints, you will see that he can only love God as a name of his jouissance. And his jouissance, in the final analysis, is always rather monstrous.

We have spoken in the course of our analytic remarks here about some human terms among which is the hero. This difficult question of the saint, I am introducing here only in an anecdotal fashion, and rather as a support, one of those that I believe altogether necessary to map out our position. Because, naturally, as you can well imagine, I am not placing us among the saints! That still has to be said. Because, by not saying it, it would still remain for many that this would be the ideal, as they say. There are many things that one is tempted, in our (20) connection to say would be the ideal. And this question of the ideal is at the heart of the problems of the position of the analyst, this is what you will see being developed in what follows, and precisely everything that it would be appropriate for us to abandon in this category of the ideal.

Seminar 25: Wednesday 14 June 1961

I woke up this morning with an appalling headache. That never happens to me, I don't know where it could have come from.

I read, while I was having my breakfast, an excellent work by Conrad Stein on primary identification. It is not every day that I get things like that from my students...! What I am going to say today will show him that his work was well orientated. But I no longer know where we were the last time and, as they say, I have not prepared my seminar well. We are going to try to advance. I had intended to read Sappho in order to find there things which might illuminate you. This is going to take us to the heart of the function of identification. Since it is still a question of locating the position of the analyst, I thought that it would be no harm to take things up again.

Freud wrote Hemmung, Symptom und Ankrst. in 1926. It is the third phase of putting his thought together, the first two were constituted by the stage of the Traumdeutung and the second topography. We are going, right away, to go to the heart of the problem evoked by him, which is that of the meaning of anxiety. We are even going to go further because, right away, we are going to start from the economic point of view. The problem is to know from where there is taken, he tells us, the energy for the signal of anxiety. In the Gesammelte Werke, XIV, page 120, I read the following sentence: Das Ich zieht die (vorbewusste) Besetzung von der zu verdrängenden Triebreprä'sentanz ab und verwendet sie für die Unlust - (Angst) - entbindung. Translated "The ego withdraws its (preconscious) cathexis from the instinctual representative" - that which is representative in the drive - "that is to be repressed and uses that cathexis for the purpose of releasing unpleasure (anxiety), Unlust-(Angst-)."

(2) It is obvious that it is not a question of falling on a sentence of Freud's and then of beginning to intellectualise. If I put it before you right away, it is after mature reflection.

It is a carefully deliberated choice which is meant to encourage you to reread this article as soon as possible.

As regards our own purposes, let us apply it, let us transport it right away to the heart of our problems. I have told you enough about it for you to suspect that the structuring formula of the phantasy ^Oo must be involved at this moment of orientation that we are at. This phantasy, is something I have not simply formulated, but evoked, approached even, closely dogged even in every possible way. In order to show the necessity of this formula, it is necessary to know that, in this support of desire, there are two elements whose respective functions and functional relationship cannot in any way be verbalised by any attribute which would be exhaustive, and this is why I must give them as a support these two algebraic elements and accumulate around these two elements the characteristics that are in question.

You know enough about it to know that $j!$ is related to something which is called the fading of the subject and that the small other, which is the small o , has something to do with what is called the object of desire. This symbolisation has already the importance and the effect of showing that desire does not present itself in a simple subjective relationship to the object - even a reflexive one - the subject "thinking himself" in a relationship of knowledge to the object. The theory of desire is constructed to put in question again this theory of knowledge and the Cartesian "I think, therefore I am", which is something others have already done.

Let us take up this sentence and let us try to apply it to that. I will not give you the last word right away, in this way I am bringing you halfway in order to give you the illusion of searching.

What is meant by Freud's little sentence concerning the decathexis of the Triebreprasentanz in order that anxiety should be produced? That means that the cathexis of o is directed back onto the subject.

This subject is only graspable as that. He cannot be conceived of except as a place, because it is not even this point of reflexivity of the subject which could be grasped as desiring. Because the subject does not grasp himself in any way as desiring. But, in the phantasy in which he might do it, this place is always reserved. It is even reserved to such an (3) extent that it is ordinarily occupied by what is produced homologically at the lower stage of the graph, $i(o)$ the image of the specular other, namely that it is not necessarily, but ordinarily occupied by that.

This is what is expressed, in the little schema which you saw above and which we have rubbed out, by the function of the real image of the vase in the illusion of the inverted vase, this vase which has been produced in order to appear to be surrounding the base of these floral stems which elegantly symbolise the little p , this is what is in question, it is the image, the narcissistic ghost which comes to fill, in the phantasy, the function of coadapting oneself to desire, the illusion of grasping one's object, as one might say. Henceforth, if $$$ is this place which can from time to time be found to be empty, namely that nothing comes to be produced there which is satisfying as regards the emergence of the narcissistic image, we can conceive that it is indeed that to which there responds at its summons the production of the signal of anxiety.

I am going to try to show this extremely important point which one can say the final article of Freud on this subject really gives us all the elements to resolve - without giving it properly speaking the final twist. For the moment, the screw is still not tightened.

Let us say, with Freud, that the signal of anxiety is indeed something which is produced at the level of the ego. Nevertheless, we perceive here, thanks to our formalisations, that we are going perhaps to be able to say a little bit more about this "at the level of the ego". Our notations are going to allow us to deconstruct this question, to articulate it in a more precise fashion and this is what will (4) allow us to go beyond some of the points where, for Freud, the question ended up in an impasse.

Here, I am going right away to make a leap, Freud says, at the moment that he speaks about the economy, about the transformation necessary for the production of a signal of anxiety, that it ought not to require a very great quantity of energy to produce a signal. Freud indicates to us already that there is here a relationship between the production of this signal and something which is of the order of Verzicht - of renunciation, close to Versagung - because of the fact that the subject is barred. In the Verdrängung of the Triebreprasentanz, there is this correlation of the concealment of the subject which well confirms the correctness of our notation of the S barred, . The leap consists in designating here for you what I have announced to you for a long time as the place which the analyst really holds to - that does not mean that he occupies it all the time - but the place where he waits - and this word "to wait" takes on here all its import, what we will rediscover about the function of waiting, of the Erwartung - for the subject to constitute, to structure this signal. This place is precisely the place of ^ in the phantasy.

I said that I was taking a leap, namely that I am not proving it right away, I am indicating where I am leading you. Now, let us take the steps which are going to allow there to be understood what is in question. One thing therefore is given to us, it is that the signal of anxiety is produced somewhere, this somewhere that may be occupied by i(o), the ego qua image of the other, the ego qua fundamentally a function of miscognition. It occupies this place, not at all in so far as this image occupies it, but qua place, namely in so far as on occasions this image may be dissolved there. Observe carefully that I am not saying that it is the lack of the image which makes anxiety emerge. Observe carefully that what I have always said is that the specular relationship, the original relationship of the subject to the specular image is set up in what is called a reaction of aggressivity. In my article on the mirror stage, I already indicated this same specular relationship, I defined it, established it, as not being unrelated to anxiety, I even indicated that the way to grasp aggressivity in a slice, transversally, was to see that one had to orientate oneself in the direction of the temporal relationship. In effect, there is no spatial relationship which refers itself to the specular image to the other as such, namely that, when it begins to come to (5) life, when it becomes the incarnated other, there is a temporal relationship: "I can't wait (i 'ai hate) to see myself like him, otherwise where will I be?".

But, if you refer to my texts, you will also see that I am more prudent there and that, if I do not push the formula to its extremes, there is a reason for it. The function of haste in logic, those who are very aware of what I have written know that I dealt with it somewhere in a kind of little sophism which is the one of the problem of the three discs. This function of haste, namely this way in which man precipitates himself into his resemblance to man, is not anxiety. In order that anxiety should be constituted, there has to be a relationship at the level of desire. This indeed is why it is at the level of phantasy that I am leading you today by the hand in order to approach this problem of anxiety. I am going to show you well in advance where we are going and we will come back again in order to make a few detours around the kernel of the problem.

Here therefore is where the analyst is supposed to be in the relationship of the subject to desire, to an object of desire which we suppose on this occasion to be this object which carries with it a menace, of which there is question and which determines the zu verdrängen, the to be repressed. All of this is not definitive.

Let us pose ourselves the following question. If this is the way that we are tackling the problem, what would the subject expect of an ordinary companion who dared, in ordinary conditions, to occupy this same place? If this object is dangerous, because this is what is in question, the subject would expect him to give him the signal: "Danger", the one which, in the case of real danger, makes the subject scamper away. I mean that what I am introducing at this level, is something which one regrets Freud did not introduce into his dialectic, because it was something that should have been done. He tells us that the internal danger is altogether comparable to an external danger and that the subject strives to avoid it in the same way as one avoids an external danger. But then, look at what this offers us in terms of an effective articulation, think of what really happens in animal psychology.

Among social animals, among herd animals, everyone knows the role played by the signal before the enemy of the herd: the cleverest and the best of the herd animals is there to smell him, to scent him, to pick him out. The gazelle, the antelope lift their (6) noses, give a little bell and there is no delaying: everyone heads off in the same direction. The notion of signal in a social complex, the reaction to a danger, here is where we grasp at the biological level what exists in an observable society. Here it can be perceived that this signal of anxiety, it is indeed from the alter ego, from the other who constitutes his ego, that the subject can receive it.

There is something that I would like to highlight here. For a long time you have heard me warning you about the dangers of altruism. Beware, I said to you implicitly and explicitly of the snares of Mitleid, pity, of what prevents us from harming the other, the poor kid, so that one ends up marrying her and both spend a long time being sick of one another. I am schematizing: these are the dangers of altruism. Only, if these are dangers about which it is only humane to warn you, that does not mean that this is the final resort. This moreover is the reason why I am not, with regard to X to whom I speak from time to time, the devil's advocate who brings him back to the principles of a healthy egoism and who would turn him away from this quite attractive course which would consist in not being wicked.

The fact is that this precious Mitleid, this altruism, for the subject who does not know himself, is only the cover for something else, and you will always observe it, on condition all the same of being on the analytic plane. Work a little on the Mitleid of an obsessional: and here the first phase is to notice, with what I am highlighting for you, with what moreover the whole moralist tradition permits on occasion to be affirmed, namely that what he respects, what he does not want to touch in the image of the other, is his own image. But why is this in the final analysis? It is because if it were not carefully preserved, this unstainability, untouchability of his own image, what would arise from all that would be well and truly anxiety, and anxiety before what? Not before the other around whom he turns, the one whom I called above "the poor kid" - who is that only in his imagination, because she is always much tougher than you can imagine - and it is before "the poor kid" that he is anxious, before o, not the image of himself, but before the other, _o, as object of his desire.

I am saying this to clearly illustrate something very important, which is that if anxiety is produced topographically at the place (7) defined by i(o), namely - as Freud's last formulation articulates it for us - at the place of the ego, there is no signal of anxiety, except in so far as it refers to an object of desire, this object of desire in so far as it disturbs the ideal ego, i(o), the one which takes its origin in the specular image.

What is meant by this link which is absolutely necessary to understand the signal of anxiety? That means that the function of this signal is not exhausted in its Warnung, its warning that you should scamper away. The fact is that, while accomplishing its function, this signal maintains the relationship with the object of desire. This is what is the key and the mainspring of what Freud, in this article and elsewhere, in a repeated fashion and with this accent, this choice of terms, this incisiveness which is so illuminating in him, accentuates for us, characterises for us by distinguishing the situation of anxiety from that of danger, Gefahr, and from that of Hilflosigkeit. In Hilflosigkeit, helplessness, being without recourse, the subject is simply turned inside out, overwhelmed by an erupting situation which he cannot face up to in any way. Between that and taking flight, what is the solution which, although it is not heroic, is the one which Napoleon himself found to be the truly courageous solution when it was a question of love: between that and flight, there is something else. And this is what Freud highlights for us in underlining, in anxiety, this character of Erwartung, of waiting, this is the central feature. That we can make of it secondarily the reason for decamping, is one thing, but it is not its essential character. Its essential character, is the Erwartung and this is what I am designating in telling you that anxiety is the radical mode under which there is maintained the relationship to desire. When, for reasons of resistance, of defence, etc.... everything that you can put in the order of mechanisms of cancelling out the object, when nothing but that remains and when the object disappears, vanishes, but not what can remain of it, namely the Erwartung, the direction towards its empty place - the place that it is henceforth missing from, where there is no longer question of anything but an unbestimmt Objekt, or again, as Freud says, we are in the relationship of Objektlosigkeit - when we are at that point, anxiety is the final mode, the radical mode under which it continues to sustain, even if it is in an unbearable way, the relationship to desire.

(8) There are other ways of sustaining the relationship to desire which concern the unsustainability of the object, this indeed is why I explain to you that hysteria, obsessionality can be characterised by these statuses of desire that I called, for you, unsatisfied desire and sustained as impossible desire, established in its impossibility.

But it is enough for you to turn your gaze towards the most radical form of neurosis, phobia, which is that around which there turns Freud's whole discourse in this article, phobia which cannot be defined otherwise than as follows: it is constructed to sustain the relationship of the subject to desire under the form of anxiety. The only thing that is to be added to fully define it, is that, just as the complete definition of the hysteric as regards phantasy is oO/ the metaphor of the other at the point that the subject sees himself as castrated, confronted with the big Other - Dora, in so far as it is by the mediation of Mr K that she desires, but that he is not the one she loves, it is through the mediation of the one she desires that she orientates herself towards the one that she loves, namely Madame K - which means that it is necessary for us to complete the formula for phobia also: therefore phobia, is indeed the following, the sustaining, the maintaining of the relationship to desire in anxiety with something supplementary, more precise. It is not the relationship of anxiety alone, it is that the place of this object, in so far as it is aimed at by anxiety, is required because of what I explained to you at length, in connection with Little Hans, to be the function of the phobic object, namely big phi,⁵ the symbolic phallus in so far as it is the joker in the pack, namely that there is indeed question, in the phobic object, of the phallus, but it is the phallus that will take on the value of all the signifiers, that of the father on this occasion. What is remarkable in this observation, is at once his lack and his presence: lack in the form of the real father - Hans' father - presence under the form of the encroaching symbolic father - Freud. If all of this can play the same place on the same plane, it is of course, because already, in the object of the phobia, there is this infinite possibility of considering a certain function lacking, deficient, which is precisely that before which the subject was going to succumb if there did not arise at that place anxiety.

Having made this little circuit, I think that you can grasp that, if the function of the signal of anxiety warns us of something, (9) and of something very important in clinical, analytic practice, it is because the anxiety to which your subjects are open is not at all uniquely, as is believed, as you always look for it, an anxiety whose sole source would be, as I might say, internal to himself. It is proper to the neurotic to be, in this respect, as Monsieur Andre' Breton called it, a vase communicant. The anxiety with which your neurotic has to deal, anxiety as energy, is an anxiety that he is much in the habit of searching for with a magnifying glass right and left in one or other of the big O's with whom he has to deal. It is just as valid for him, just as usable for him as what he generates himself.

If you do not take this into account in the economy of an analysis, you will make serious mistakes. You will be at the stage, in many cases, of scratching your head to know from where there comes on one or other occasion this little re-emergence of anxiety at the moment when you least expected it. It is not necessarily from his own, from the one that you are already aware of through the practice of the previous months of analysis, that of the neighbours also counts, and then your own. You think that there, of course, you have found your bearings again. You know well that you have already been warned about this. I am afraid that this does not warn you about very much, because precisely a question introduced starting from this consideration, is that of knowing what this warning implies, namely that your own anxiety, should not come into play, that the analysis ought to be aseptic as regards your own anxiety. What can that mean, on the plane that I am trying to sustain you for a whole year, on the synchronic plane, that which does not allow the invasion of diachrony, namely that you have already largely overcome your own anxiety in your previous analysis, which resolves nothing ? Because what it is a question of knowing, is the status in which you ought currently to be, you yourself as regards your desire, in order that there should not emerge in you, in analysis, not simply the signal, but also the energy of anxiety, in so far as it is there, if it emerges, ready-made to tip over into the economy of your subject, and this in the measure that he is more advanced in the analysis, namely that it is at the level of the big Other that you are for him that he is going to search out the path of his desire. Such is the status of the analyst in the synchrony involving anxiety.

(10) In any case, in order to loop this first loop, which makes intervene the function of the Other, big O as being concerned in the possibility of the emergence of anxiety as signal, you see both that the reference to the herd, in so far as this signal is exercised within a function of imaginary communication, is necessary - because it is through this that I want to make you sense that, if anxiety is a signal, this means that it can come from another - it nevertheless remains, in so far as it is a question of a relationship to desire, that the signal is not exhausted in the metaphor of the danger of the enemy of the herd, and precisely in this which distinguishes the human herd from the animal herd, that for each subject, as everyone knows, except entrepreneurs in collective psychology, the enemy of the herd is himself.

In this reference to the reality of the herd, we find an interesting transposition of what Freud articulates for us under the form of "internal danger". We find here confirmation of what I am always telling you about with regard to the universal in man. The individual and the collective are one and the same level. What is true at the level of the individual, this internal danger, is also true at the level of the collective. It is the same internal danger to the subject which is the internal danger to the herd. This comes from the originality of the position of desire as such, in so far as desire has just emerged to fill up the lack of certitude, the lack of guarantee to which the subject finds himself confronted with respect to what is important to him in so far as he is not simply a herd animal - he is that perhaps, only this elementary relationship, which surely exists, is gravely disturbed by the fact that it finds itself included, just as much at the collective level as at the individual level, in the relationship to the signifier.

The social animal, for his part, at the moment that he decamps with the signal that the watching animal or the loving animal gives him, is the herd. The speaking being, for his part, is essentially the want-to-be which has arisen from a certain relationship to the discourse, from a poetry, if you wish. This want-to-be, is something he cannot fill - I already articulated and indicated it for you - except through this action which - you sense it better in this context and in this parallel - takes on so easily, perhaps always takes on radically this character of headlong flight. But precisely, fundamentally, this very action does not suit the herd at all. It does not operate at all on the plane of coherence or of collective defence. In a word, in (11) principle, the herd scarcely accommodates itself to his own action, or even does not want anything to do with it, and not only the herd, reality does not want anything to do with his action either, because reality - I am not saying the real - is precisely the sum total of certitudes accumulated by means of the addition of a series of previous actions, whereas the new one is always unwarranted.

This is what allows us to situate correctly, namely in a way which overlaps experience, namely - which is all the same surprising and nevertheless always more or less obvious - this little surge of anxiety which is produced every time the desire of the subject is really in question. We are there at the common place, at the root, at the kernel of everything that our experience gives us.

If analysis was not of some use in making men understand that their desire, firstly, is not the same thing as their need and, secondly, that desire in itself has a dangerous character, which is this danger whose character is quite obviously from the menace that it involves for the herd, I ask myself then what use analysis ever was.

It is a matter of climbing something and, because we are engaged on the path adopted today and perhaps more directly than the royal road which I did not prepare today, we are going to continue in the same way. We are going to pose an insidious question. I already prepared the question of what the Versagung of analysis should be, but there frankly I did not tell you much more about it. I pose the same question to you, is not the fruitful Versagung of analysis to refuse to the subject the analyst's own anxiety, to leave bare the place where he is in short summoned naturally, as Other, to give the signal of anxiety?

Let us see there being outlined this something of which I already gave you, at least the last time, the indication in telling you that the pure place of the analyst, in so far as we can define it in and through the phantasy, would be the place of the pure desirer, erastes or eron, which would mean this somewhere where there is always produced the function of desire, namely to come in place of the eromenos or of the eromenon - because this is the reason why I made you, at the beginning of the year, undertake this long investigation of the Symposium and of the theory of (12) love. One must succeed in conceiving that some subject is capable of holding the place of pure desirer, of abstracting himself, of removing himself, in the relationship to the other, from any supposition of being desirable.

What you have read of the remarks, of the responses of Socrates in the Symposium, should give you an idea of what I am in the process of telling you, because, if something is incarnated and signified by the episode with Alcibiades, it is indeed that. On the one hand, Socrates affirms that he does not know anything, except about what appertains to love. Everything we are told about him is that he is an put and put, inexhaustible desirer. But when it is a question of showing himself in the position of the desired one, namely in face of the public, scandalous, uncontrolled, drunken aggression of Alcibiades, what we are shown is that there is literally no longer anything there. This, I am not saying that it resolves the affair, but it at least illustrates what I am talking to you about. This has a meaning which has, at least, been incarnated somewhere, because it is not only to me that Socrates appears to be a human enigma - a case like no other that has been seen and which one does not know what to do about, no matter what kind of tweezers one tries to seize him with - it is to everybody, every time that someone has really, in connection with Socrates, posed the question: what was this guy made of? Why did he wreck havoc everywhere simply by appearing and by telling little stories which seem to be about everyday affairs?

I would like us to pause a little at the place of the desirer. This has an echo, this rhymes with something that I would call the place of the prayer, in prayer. Because, in prayer, the prayer sees himself in the process of praying, there is no prayer unless the prayer sees himself in the process of praying.

I thought this morning- of Priam. He is the type of the prayer who entreats from Achilles the body of the last of his sons who are too many for him to count - he had fifty of them, it appears that this is more or less the last one: in any case, this Hector is very important to him. What does he tell Achilles? He cannot talk too much about Hector and that for several reasons. First of all because it is not easy to speak about him in the state that he is at that moment. Then, as it appears, every time there is question of the living Hector, Achilles, who is not an easy person to deal with, nor the master of his impulses, becomes furious again, even though he had received divine instructions, (13) namely that his mother Thetis had come to tell him: "The big boss wants you to give Hector back to his father, Priam. He came to visit me expressly for that". He is within a hair's breadth of not giving him back.

The important thing, is that Priam does not play the psychologist all that much. By the very fact that he is in the position of prayer, he is going to presentify in his very demand the personage of the prayer. I mean that Priam's prayer, the one which has resonated from the beginning of our age - because, even if you have not read the Iliad, this episode is circulating there among all of you as a model through the mediation of all the other models that it engendered - he raises, he reduplicates this praying personage that he is with another who is described, who is inserted into his prayer in the form of someone who is not there, namely Peleus, the father of Achilles whom he represents. It is he who prays, but in his prayer, it is necessary that this prayer should pass through something which is not even the invocation of Achilles' father - he traces out for him the figure of a father, who, for his part, is perhaps at this very moment, he says, very troubled because his neighbours are teasing him unmercifully. He knows that he has still a son who is someone of value, Achilles here present. You will rediscover in every prayer what I am calling the place of the prayer at the very interior of the demand of the one who is praying. The desirer - this is why I am making this detour, this is not the same, I mean that the desirer, as such - can say nothing of himself, except to abolish himself as desirer. Because, this is what defines the pure place of the subject qua desiring, it is that at every attempt at articulating oneself there emerges nothing other than a fainting of language and an impotency to speak because, once he speaks he is nothing but a beggar, he passes to the register of demand, and this is something else.

This is no less important if we have to formulate in some way that which, in this response to the other which constitutes analysis, constitutes the specific form of the place of the analyst.

In order to finish today on something which will add perhaps a little more a formula from which there is no escape to all of those which already I seem to be serving you with, it is this one which has indeed some interest in so far as it completes the elements whose compass I have just sketched out, it is that, if (14) anxiety is what I told you it was, this relationship of sustaining desire where the object is missing, we rediscover this other thing of which we have experience, the fact is that, to reverse the formula - this is constantly seen in practice - desire is a remedy for anxiety. The most insignificant neurotic person knows as much about this, or even more than you. The support found in desire, however inconvenient it may be with its whole train of guilt, is something all the same much easier to hold to than the position of anxiety, so that in short, for someone who is - a little astute and experienced - I say that for the analyst - it would be a question of always having within one's reach a little well-polished desire in order not to be exposed to bringing into play into analysis a quantum of anxiety which would be neither opportune or welcome.

Is it then towards this that I intend to lead you? Surely not. In any case it is not easy to locate by hand the walls of the corridor. The question that is involved is not about the expedient of desire, it is of a certain relationship with desire which is not sustained in this way a week at a time.

At our next meeting, we are going to come back to the distinction, inaugurated the last time, of the relationship of the subject to the ideal ego and to the ego-ideal. This will allow us to orientate for ourselves in the true topography of desire, the function of the einziaer Zug, from what fundamentally differentiates the ego-ideal in such a way that it is only from there that one can distinguish, define the function of the object in its relationships with the narcissistic function.

This is what I hope to complete at our next meeting, by placing it under the title of the formula of Pindar "Man, the dream of a shadow, skias onar anthropos ", he wrote in the last verse of the eighth Ode. This relationship between the dream and the shadow, between the symbolic and the imaginary, is that around which I will make our decisive remarks turn.

Seminar 26: Wednesday 21 June 1961

We are going to try today to make some remarks on the subject of identification in the measure that you have grasped, I hope, that we are led to it as the final term of the precise question around which we have made revolve this year our whole attempt at the elucidation of transference. I already announced to you the last time that I would begin again under the sign of the celebrated ejaculation of Pindar, in the eighth Pythian Ode composed for Aristomenes, the wrestler from Agina, the winner at the Games, "man, the dream of a shadow".

We will take up here again our reference to this relationship, the one to which, for your sakes, I tried to give the support of a model, between two concrete levels of identification - it is not by chance that I am putting the accent on the necessary distinction between them, an obvious distinction, phenomenologically within everyone's range. The ideal ego is not to be confused with the ego-ideal, this is something that the psychologist can discover of his own accord, and which moreover he does not fail to do. That the thing is just as important in the articulation of the Freudian dialectic, is indeed what will be confirmed for us, for example by the work to which I alluded the last time, that of M. Conrad Stein on primary identification.

This work ends with the recognition that what still remains obscure, is the difference between the two series that Freud distinguishes, underlines and accentuates as being the identifications of the ego and the identifications of the ego-ideal .

Let us take up therefore this little schema with which you are beginning to become familiar and which you will rediscover when you begin to work after a little rest on the number of the journal La Psychanalyse which is about to appear (see the schema) .

(2) The illusion here represented, which is called that of the inverted vase can only be produced for an eye which is situated somewhere within the cone thus produced by the point of junction of the edge of the spherical mirror with the focal point where there is produced the so-called illusion of the inverted vase. You know that this illusion, a real image, is what we use to metaphorise something which I call $i(o)$, regarding which you know that what is in question is that it is the support for the function of the image. In it is the image as such and its tone, its accent, its power of fascination, the proper to it in of this libidinal well distinguished by the term of narcissistic cathexis. The function

$i(o)$ is the central function of narcissistic cathexis.

specular other words, specular charged with special of cathexis the register cathexis

Freud under

These words are not enough to define all the relations, all the incidences under which we see appearing the function of $i(o)$. What we are going to say today will allow you to specify what is in question, it is moreover what I call also the ideal ego function cm as opposed and distinct from that of the ego-ideal.

Over against the bringing into play of the Other, the big O , the Other in so far as he is the Other of the speaking subject, the Other in so far as through him, the locus of the word, there comes to operate for every subject, for every subject with whom we, for our part have to deal as analysts, the incidence of the signifier, we can here fix the place of what is going to function as ego-ideal. In the little schema, as you will see it published in the journal which is going to appear, you will see that this purely virtual S is only there as a figuration of a function of the subject which is, as I might say, a necessity of (3) thought, this same necessity which is at the source of the theory of knowledge. We could not conceive of anything as object supported by the subject which does not precisely have this function of the subject whose real existence, as analysts, we put in question because what we, as analysts, bring to light, by the fact that the subject with whom we have to deal is essentially a subject who speaks, this subject cannot be confused with the subject of knowledge - because it is really a banal truth to have to remind analysts that the subject, for us, is not the subject of knowledge, but the subject of the unconscious. We could not speculate about it as the pure transparency of thought to itself because - this is precisely what we rise up against - it is pure illusion that thought is transparent.

I know the insurrection I may provoke at a turning point like this in the mind of a philosopher. Believe me, I have already had serious enough discussions with supporters of the Cartesian position to say that there is all the same a way for us to understand one another. I am therefore leaving to one side the discussion itself which is not what interests us today. This subject therefore, this S which is here in our schema, is in a position to use an artifice, of being only able to use an artifice, of only acceding by means of an artifice to the grasping of this image, the real image which is produced at $i(o)$, and this because he is not there. It is only through the mediation of the mirror of the Other that he comes to place himself there. Since he is nothing, he cannot see himself there, moreover it is not himself qua subject that he is looking for in this mirror. A very long time ago, in the "Discourse on psychic causality" the Bonneval discourse shortly after the war, I spoke about this "mirror without... surface in which nothing is reflected".

This enigmatic remark might then have led to a confusion with some more or less mystical ascetic practice. You should recognise today what I meant or, more exactly, begin to sense the point on which there can be centred the question of the function of the analyst as mirror - it is not the mirror of specular assumption that is in question - I mean as regards the place that he the analyst has to hold, even if it is in this mirror that there must be produced the virtual specular image. This virtual image which is here at $i'(\circ)$, here it is and it is indeed in effect what the subject sees in the other, but he only (4) sees it there in so far as he is in a place which is not confused with the place of what is reflected.

No condition binds him to be at the place of $i(\circ)$ in order to see himself at $i'(\circ)$. Certain conditions bind him to be all the same in a certain field which is the one sketched by the lines limiting a certain conical volume.

Why then, in this original schema, did I put S at the point that I put it, where you will find it in the figure that I published, nothing implies that it should be there rather than elsewhere? In principle, it is there because, with respect to the orientation of the figure, you see it appearing, in a way, behind $i(\circ)$ and that this position behind is not without its phenomenological correspondent which is expressed well enough by an expression which is not there by chance: "an idea in the back of one's head". Why therefore should ideas, which are generally the ideas which sustain us, be qualified as ideas at the back of one's head? It should also be clearly understood that it is not for nothing that the analyst stays behind the patient. Moreover, this thematic of what is in front and what is behind, is one that we are going to rediscover later on.

In any case, it would be well for you to note the degree to which the fact that the position of S in so far as it is not located, as it is only locatable somewhere in the field of the Other, in the virtual field that the Other develops by his presence as 'field of reflection of the subject, only in so far as this position of S is found there at a point big I and in so far as it is distinct from the place where $i^*(\circ)$ is projected, it is only in so far as this distinction is not alone possible, but that it is commonplace that the subject can apprehend what is fundamentally illusory in his identification in so far as it is narcissistic.

There is skias, the shadow, der Schatten, Freud says somewhere and precisely in connection with what? Das verlorene Objekt, the lost object in the work of mourning. Der Schatten, the shadow, that which the narcissistic structure of the world contributes in terms of essential opacity in the relationship to the object, if it is surmountable, it is in so far as the subject through the Other can identify himself elsewhere. In effect, if this is where I am in my relationship to the Other, in so far as we have imaged it here, under the form of a mirror under the form that existentialist philosophy grasps it and grasps it to the exclusion of everything else, and this is what constitutes its (5) limitation, to say that the other, is the one who sends us back our image - in effect, if the other is nothing other than the one who sends me back my image, I am only indeed, in effect, nothing other, than what I see myself to be. Literally, I am the big Other as other in so far as he himself, if he exists, sees the same thing as I, he also sees himself at my place. How can I know if what I see myself to be there is not the whole affair because, in short, if the Other is this mirror, it is enough for us - which is the simplest of hypotheses, because he is the Other - to suppose him, for his part, to be a living mirror, in order to conceive that he, for his part, sees just as much as I do and, in a word, when I look at him, it is he in me who looks at himself and who sees himself at my place, at the place that I occupy in him. It -is he who grounds the truth of this look if he is nothing other than his own look.

To dissipate this mirage, something I represented for you the other day, is enough, is necessary, happens every day, like this movement of the head of the little child who turns back towards the one who is carrying him. It hardly requires that much, a nothing, a flash - that is saying too much, because a flash of lightning was always considered to be something, the very sign of the father of the gods, no less, and it is moreover the reason why I am advancing it - but a fly flying past is enough, if it passes in this field and goes bzz, to make me locate myself elsewhere, to draw me out of the conical field of visibility of i(o) .

Do not believe that I am amusing myself if I introduce here the fly or the wasp who goes bzz, or anything whatsoever that makes a noise, that surprises us. You know well that this is the elective object which is sufficient in its minimal character to constitute that I call the signifier of a phobia. It is precisely in that that this sort of object can have an operational, instrumental function which is quite sufficient to put in question the reality, the consistency of the illusion of the ego as such. It is enough that anything whatsoever should shift in the field of the Other, become the point of support of the subject for there to be, on the occasion of one of these gaps, dissipated, made uncertain, put in question the consistency of the Other, of what is there qua field of narcissistic cathexis. Because, if we follow the teaching of Freud rigorously, this field is central, essential, this field is that around which the whole destiny of human desire is played out. But there is not only this field, the proof is that already in Freud, at the beginning of the introduction of this field, in Zur Einführung des Narzissmus, it is distinguished from another, from (6) the relationship to the archaic object, from the relationship to the nourishing field of the maternal object. It takes on its value in the Freudian dialectic by being distinguished first of all as being of a different order.

What I am introducing to you once again by telling you that this other field, which if I understand correctly what M. Conrad Stein identified in his work under the term of primary identification, is structured for us in an original, radical fashion by the presence of the signifier as such It is not simply for the pleasure of contributing a new articulation in what is indeed always the same field, it is that by highlighting this function-of the signifier as decisive, as that through which what comes from that field is simply what opens out for us the possibility of emerging from the pure and simple capture in the narcissistic field, it is only by highlighting it in this way, by highlighting as essential the function of the signifying element that we can introduce clarifications, possibilities of distinctions which are those necessitated - as you will see, I will show it to you, I hope - imperiously necessitated by clinical questions which are the most concrete possible. Outside of which, this introduction of which I am speaking, the articulation of the signifier as such in the structuring of this field of the Other, of the big Other, there is no salvation. It is uniquely through it that there can be resolved clinical questions which up to now have remained unresolved and which, because they have remained unresolved, lead equally to irreducible confusions.

In other words, this 'skias onar anthropos, man, the dream of a shadow" is my dream, it is by moving about in the field of the dream in so far as it is the field of the wanderings of the signifier that I can glimpse that I can dissipate the effects of the shadow, that I will be able to know that it is only a shadow.

Of course, there is something which I can still not know for a long time, it is that I am dreaming, but it is already at the level and in the field of the dream. If I know how to question it properly, if I know how to articulate it properly, not alone do I triumph over the shadow, but I gain my first access to the idea that there is something more real than the shadow, that there is, first of all and at least, the real of desire from which this shadow separates me. You will say that precisely the world of the real is not the world of my desires, but it is also the Freudian dialectic which teaches us that I only make my way (7) in the world of objects by means of the path of obstacles placed to my desire. The object is not, it is through objections the object is found.

The first step towards reality is made at the level of and in the dream and, of course, for me to reach this reality presupposes that I wake up. It is not sufficient to define awaking topologically by saying that, in my dream, there is a little too much reality, and that this is what wakes me. Awakening is produced, in fact, when there comes, in the dream, something which is the satisfaction of the demand - this is not usual, but it does happen.

On a plane which is that of the analytic journeying of the truth about man contributed by analysis, we knew what awaking is, we glimpse where the demand is going. The analyst articulates what man is demanding. With analysis man wakes up. He perceives that, for the million years that the species is around, he has always eaten dead bodies. This is the last word of that which, under the name of primary identification, the first species of identification, Freud articulates: man has never ceased to eat his dead, even when he dreamt, for a short period of time, that he had radically repudiated cannibalism, this is what will be shown to us by what follows.

It was important, at that moment, to highlight that it is precisely along this path - where we are shown that desire is a dream-desire, that desire has the same structure as the dream - that the first correct step is taken in terms of what is a journeying towards reality, that it is because of the dream and in the field of the dream that we first prove ourselves to be stronger than the shadow.

Now that I have in this way highlighted, articulated in a way that I apologise for, even though you are not able to see right away its clinical correlates, the relationships of i(o) with the big I, we are going to show - and it is already implied in my preceding discourse - everything that is enough to guide us in the relationships to i(o), because what is important for us, are the relationships of this operation coupled with small o, the object of desire.

I will return in what follows to that which, outside this massive experience of the dream, justifies the accent that I placed on the function of the signifier in the field of the Other. The identifications to the ego-ideal as such, every time they are invoked, and specifically for example in the introjection which (8) is that of mourning around which Freud made revolve an essential step of his conception of identification.... You will always see that by looking carefully at the case, the clinical articulation that is in question, that it is never a question of what I might call a massive identification, of an identification which could be compared to narcissistic identification, that it comes to counter-attack, as enveloping from being to being and, in order to illustrate what I have just said, because the image comes to me just now, in the relationship that, in Christian icons, the mother is with respect to the child that she holds before her on her knees - a figuration which is in no way a matter of chance, you can well believe me - : she envelops him, she is bigger than him. The two relationships of narcissistic identification and of anaclitic identification.... if it were this opposition that was in question between the identifications, it would be like a vast container with respect to a more limited interior world which reduces the first by its fulness.

I tell you right away that the most demonstrative things to be read in this regard is Versuch einer Entwicklungsgeschichte der Libido which you should read. It is the history of the development of the libido - by Karl Abraham, 1921, where there is question of nothing but that: the consequences to be drawn from what Freud had just contributed as regards the mechanism of mourning and the identification that it fundamentally represents.

There is not a single example, among the very numerous clinical illustrations given by Abraham of the reality of this mechanism, where you will not grasp unambiguously that it is always a question of the introjection, not of the reality of an other in so far as it is enveloping, full, even confusing on occasion, massive, but always of an einzigiger Zug, a single trait. The illustrations that he gives of it go a long way because in reality, under the title of Versuch.... "A short study of the development of the libido", there is question of nothing but that: of the function of the partial in identification. And concurrently - one could say: under the cover of this research, unless this research is only an excuse or a subdivision of it - it is in this work that Karl Abraham introduces the notion which has since circulated through the whole of analysis and was the foundation stone of a considerable edifice concerning neuroses and perversions and which is wrongly called the conception of the partial object.

(9) You are going to see what this is about. Before even being able to come back to the striking illustrations that are given of it, it is enough for me to indicate the place and for you to seek things where they are in order to perceive that there is no retortion to be given to what I am formulating here, namely that this article only takes on its meaning and its importance in so far as it is the illustration, on every page, of this trait of identification that is in question as ego-ideal identification, that it is an identification through isolated traits, by traits which are each one unique, by traits having the structure of the signifier.

This is also what obliges us to look a bit more closely at a relationship and what must be distinguished in it, if one wishes to see clearly, namely that in the same context, and not without reason, Abraham finds "himself introducing what I mentioned above and designated as the function of the partial object. And it is precisely this that is going to be in question concerning the relationships of $i(o)$ with small o .

If you read Abraham, you will read the following: first of all he never wrote in any way that it was a question of a partial object - he describes die Obieketes partial Liebe, which means "the objects of partial love, l'amour partiel de l'objet". You will see that what he accentuates, when he speaks about what is its most exemplary object, the only veritable object - even though others can be inscribed in the same structure - is the phallus. How does he conceive of - and I intend to bring it to you in his text - this rupture, this disjunction which gives its value as a privileged object to the phallus? On every page, he has produced for us what is in question in the following fashion: "the objects of partial love", what does that mean for him? That means, not the love of this something which has fallen from the operation under the name of phallus, it means the love ready to accede to this normal object of the genital relationship, the other, that of the other sex in so far as there is precisely a stage which is this phallic stage, in which there is effectively love of the other, as complete as possible, minus the genitals. That is what is meant by "the objects of partial love".

But the important thing is in a note, I give you the reference right away: p.9 of the original edition and, in the Selected Papers, p.495. All the clinical examples that have been given lead to it, namely the example of two hysterical women in so far as they certainly had relationships with the father entirely (10) founded on variations of the relationship which manifest themselves at first, for example, in so far as the father is only apprehended... is only taken, following on a traumatic relationship, for his phallic value. After which, in dreams, the father appears with his complete image, but censored at the level of genitals under the form of the disappearance of pubic hair. All the examples go in the same direction, partial love of the object being the love of the object minus the genitals. And that to find there the foundation of the imaginary separation of the phallus as henceforth intervening as central exemplary function, pivotal function, I would say, may permit us to situate what is different, namely o , in little o , qua little o , the general function as such of the object of desire. At the heart of the function of little o , allowing there to be grouped, to be situated the different possible modes of the object, in so far as they intervene in the phantasy, there is the phallus. You should carefully understand that I have said that it is the object which allows the series to be situated, it is, if you wish, for us, an original point behind and ahead of a certain idea.

I read what Abraham wrote in the little note underneath: "Such a stage of object-love with genital exclusion seems to coincide in time with Freud's phallic stage in the psychosexual development of the individual, and moreover to have close internal relations with it," He adds "We may look upon hysterical symptoms as the obverse of those libidinal impulses which belong to object-love with genital exclusion and to the phallic organisation."

I must say that it is a long time since I read that text, having left it to two of you to look after it. It is perhaps not a bad thing for you to know-that the algebraic formula that I give of the hysterical phantasy is manifest here: $\wedge > < > 0 \ll$ But the next step that I want you to take, is something different which is also found in the text but at which I believe no one has yet paused. I quote: Wir müssen ausserdem in Betracht Ziehen, dass bei jedem Menschen das eigene Genitale starker als irgendein anderer Körperteil mit narzisstischer Liebe besetzt ist. The fact is that "we must," he says, "not forget, too," - and at what moment: at the moment that he has asked himself, in the preceding lines, why things are that way, why this reluctance, why this rage, in a word, which already arises at the imaginary level, to castrate (11) the other to the quick, it is to this that there responds Grauen: horror, the preceding lines ought to justify the term rage that I introduced - "We must not forget, too, that the genitals are more intensely cathected by narcissistic love than any other part of the subject's own body", in order that there should be no ambiguity about his thought, it is precisely "Thus everything else in the object," anything at all, "can be loved sooner than the genitals."

I do not know whether you really appreciate what such a notification - which is not isolated like that as if it were a slip of the pen, but which everything here demonstrates to be the very underpinning of this thought - implies. I do not feel myself able to take that in my stride as if it were a commonplace truth, namely, despite the obviousness and the necessity of such an articulation, I do not know whether it has been highlighted by anyone up to the present.

Let us try to represent things a little more for ourselves. It is of course understood that the only reason for having introduced narcissism, is to show us that it is on the avatars of narcissism that there depends the process, the progress of objectal cathexis. Let us try to understand. Here is the field of one's own body, the narcissistic field, let us try to represent, for example, something which corresponds to what we are told, that nowhere is the cathexis stronger than at the level of the genitals. This presupposes that, whether we take the body from one side or from another, we end up with a diagram of the following kind:

(12) What Abraham's sentence implies, if we are to give it its value as a reason, as a consequence, is that, if this represents for us the profile of narcissistic cathexis, contrary to what one might think at first, it is not from on high that the energies are going to be withdrawn in order to be transferred to the object, it is not the most cathected regions which are going to be discharged in order to begin to give a small cathexis to the object, I am saying - if we are speaking about the thinking of Abraham in so far as it is required by his whole book, in other words this book no longer has any meaning - it is on the contrary at the levels of the lowest cathexes that the energy we are faced with is going to be taken, in the world of the object, a certain cathexis, objectile cathexis, the object existing as object. Namely that it is in so far as in the subject - this is explained to us in the clearest fashion - the genitals remain cathected that in the object they are not. There is absolutely no way of understanding it otherwise.

Reflect a little whether all of this does not lead us to something much vaster and more important than you may believe. Because there is a thing which does not seem to be perceived about the function which is in the mirror stage, that of the specular image, which is that if it is in this mirror relationship that there occurs this something essential which regulates communication - the reversal or the warping or the transposing of what happens between the narcissistic object and the other object - should we not show a "little imagination and give some importance to the following which results from it: if effectively the relationship to the other as sexual or as not sexual is governed, organised in the case of man - the organising centre of this relationship in the imaginary takes place at the specular stage and moment - does this not make it worth the trouble to pause a little at the following, which is that there is a much more intimate relationship - it is never remarked - with what we call the face, the face-to-face relationship. We often use this term with a certain accent, but it does not seem that people have found the point about what is original in it.

One calls the genital relationship a tergo, a relationship more ferarum, it must not be that way for cats, if I may express myself in this way. It must indeed be the case. It will be enough for you to think about these lady cats to tell yourselves (13) that perhaps there is something decisive in the imaginary structuring which brings it about that the relationship with the object of desire is essentially structured, for the great majority of species, as having to come from behind, as a relationship to the world which consists in covering or in being covered, or indeed, in the rare species for whom this thing must come from the front, a species for whom a tangible moment of the apprehension of the object is a decisive moment - if you believe both in the experience of the mirror stage and what I always tried to find there, to define there as a capital fact - as this object which is defined by the fact that in the case of the erect animal something essential is linked to the apparition of his ventral face, it does not seem to me that enough value has yet been given to all the consequences of this remark in what I would call the different fundamental positions, aspects of erotism. It is not only here and there that we see its traits and that the authors for a long time have remarked that almost all the primal scenes evoke, reproduce, are linked up around the perception of a coitus a tercero, why?

There are a certain number of remarks which could be organised in this direction, but what I want to point out to you, is that, in this reference, it is rather remarkable that the objects which are found to have, in the imaginary composition of the human psyche, an isolated value, and very specially as partial object, should be, as I might say, not only put out in front, but emerging in a way, if we take a vertical surface as measure, regulating in a way the depth of what is in question in the specular image, namely a surface parallel to the surface of the mirror, raising up with respect to this depth that which comes forward as emerging from libidinal immersion - I am not simply speaking of the phallus, but moreover of this essentially phantastical object which are called breasts.

The memory has come to me, in this connection, in a book by this splendid Mme Gyp, which is called Le petit Bob, an extraordinary epistle about the mapping out by little Bob, at the seaside, on a lady who smooths the way for him, of two little "sugar lumps" as he expresses it, whose appearance he discovers with a sense of wonder - and one cannot fail to notice a certain complacency in the author. I believe that one never fails to draw profit from reading authors who spend their time collecting childrens' (14) remarks. This one is certainly taken from life and, after all, the fact that this woman, whom we know to have been the mother of a now dead neurosurgeon who was no doubt himself the prototype of little Bob, was - it has to be said - was a bit of a numskull. This does not prevent what results from it being of any lesser profit for us, on the contrary.'

Moreover, we will see better perhaps in the objectal relationship, the true function to be given to what we call nipple, the tip of the breast, we see it also in this Gestalt-like isolation against a background and, by this fact, of exclusion from this profound relationship with the mother which is that of feeding. If this were not the way things were, one would perhaps not often have such difficulty in getting the suckling to take hold of the bit in question, and perhaps also the phenomena of anorexia nervosa would have a different twist.

What must be said, what I want to say on this occasion, is therefore a little schema that it would be well for you to keep in mind concerning the mainspring of what happens in terms of reciprocity between narcissistic cathexis and object cathexis by reason of the liaison which justifies the denomination and the isolation of the mechanism. Not every object is to be defined as such as being purely and simply an object determined at the beginning, fundamentally, as a partial object, far from it. But the central characteristic of this relationship of one's own body to the phallus must be taken as essential in order to see what it conditions retrospectively, nachtraglich, in the relationship to all objects, even the most primitive, whose character of being separable, possible to lose, would be different if there were not at the centre the destiny of this essential possibility of the phallic object emerging as a blank on the image of the body, as an island, like the islands of marine charts where the inside is not represented, but the periphery - namely that in the first place, in what concerns all the objects of this desire, this character of isolation as Gestalt at the beginning is essential. Because one will never sketch what is in the interior of the island. One will never enter under full sail into the genital object. The fact of characterising the object as genital does not define the "post-ambivalent" nature of the entry into this genital stage or then no one has ever entered it!

(15) Putting once again into your mental imagery, what I said today about the ventral image, brought to me the idea of the hedgehog. I read Le herisson. I would mention that at the moment when I was dwelling on the relationship between man and the animals, the idea of reading that came to me. How do they make love? It is clear that a tergo must present some problems. I will telephone Jean Rostand!

I am not going to dwell on this episode. .The reference to the hedgehog is a literary reference.

Archilochus expresses himself somewhere in this fashion: "The fox knows a lot, he knows all sorts of tricks. The hedgehog has only one, but it's a very good one". Now, what is in question concerns precisely the fox. Recalling or not recalling Archilochus, Giraudoux in Bella refers to the lightning style of a gentleman who has a marvellous contraption that he attributes to the fox - and perhaps it is the association of ideas which influenced it. Perhaps the hedgehog also knows that trick. It would, in any case, be important for him to know it, because it is a question of getting rid of his vermin, an operation which is extremely problematic for the hedgehog. As regards Giraudoux' fox here is how he proceeds: he enters very gently into the water beginning with the tail. He slips gently into it, he lets himself be submerged until there is nothing above the water but the tip of his nose on which the last fleas dance their final ballet, then he plunges into the water in order to be radically cleansed of everything that embrarrasses him.

Let this image illustrate for you that the relationship of anything narcissistic is conceived of as a root of castration.

Seminar 27: Wednesday 28 June 1961

As the time comes for-me to make my final remarks before you this year, there comes to my mind Plato's invocation, at the beginning of the Critias. It is indeed here in effect that there is to be found, in so far as he speaks about tone as an essential element in the arrangement of what is to be said - may I, in effect, be able to maintain this tone. In order to do this, Plato invokes that which is the very object of what he is going to speak about in this incomplete text: nothing less than that of the birth of the Gods. A cross-checking which could not fail to please me, because, moreover, in a side-long way no doubt, we were very close to this theme to the point of hearing someone - whom you could consider from certain aspects as professing atheism - speaking to us about the gods as something which is found in the real.

It happens that what I tell you here is each time received by many as something addressed to themselves, to themselves as private persons (particulier) - I say private persons, not individuals - not certainly by whoever I wish because many, if not all, receive it, nor collectively either by the same token, because I notice that, from what is received, there is room between each one for contestation, if not for discordance. There is therefore a large place left between different people. This is perhaps what is called, in the proper sense, "speaking in the desert". It is certainly not that I have to complain this year about any desertion - as everyone knows in the desert there can be almost a crowd, the desert is not constituted by emptiness. The important thing, is precisely the following, which I dare to hope for: it is that it is a little in the desert that you have come to find me. Let us not be too optimistic, nor too proud of ourselves all the same, let us say that you have all had, however numerous you may be, a little worry about the boundaries of the desert. This indeed is the reason why I ensure that what I tell (2) you, is never in fact an obstacle to the role in which I find myself and which I have to hold with respect to a certain number of you, which is that of analyst.

In a word, it is in so far as my discourse, in the measure that on the path I took this year it is aimed at the position of the analyst - and that I distinguish this position in so far as it is at the heart of the response, of the satisfaction to be given by the analyst to the power of transference - in so far as at that very place which is his own, the analyst should distance himself from any ideal of the analyst. In so far as my discourse respects this condition, I believe that it is able to allow this necessary conciliation, for some, of my two positions: that of analyst and that of one who speaks to you about analysis.

Under different titles, under different rubrics, one can formulate something, of course, which may be of the order of the ideal, there are the qualifications of the analyst, this is already enough to constitute an average in this order. The analyst, for example, should not be completely ignorant of a certain number of things, but it is not at all here that there exists what comes into play in his essential position as an analyst. Here, certainly, there opens up the ambiguity that exists about the word-knowledge (savoir). Plato, in this evocation at the beginning of the Critias, refers to knowledge, to the guarantee that, as regards what he is approaching, the tone will remain measured. The fact is that in his time the ambiguity was much less great. The meaning of the word knowledge there is much closer to what I am aiming at when I try to articulate for you the position of the analyst and it is indeed here that there is motivated, that there is justified, this beginning starting from the exemplary image of Socrates which is the one that I chose this year.

Here then I had arrived, the last time, at this point which I believe to be essential, a turning point in what we will have to enounce subsequently, about the function of the object o in my schemas in so far as it is what I have least elucidated up to now. I did so in connection with this function of the object in so far as it is a part which presents itself as a separated part - a partial object as they say - and, leading you back to the text which I would urgently ask you during these holidays to consult in detail and with attention, I pointed out to you that the one who introduced this notion of partial object, Abraham, understands by it in the most formal fashion a love of the object from which precisely this part is excluded, it is the object minus this part. This is the foundation of the experience around which there revolves this coming into play of the partial object, (3) of the interest that has been accorded it ever since. In the final analysis, the speculations of Winnicott, as an observer of infant behaviour, on the transitional object, refer back to the meditations of the Kleinian circle.

For a long time now, it seems to me that those who listen to me, if they are listening to me, may have had more than a suspicion regarding the most formal precisions of the fact that this partiality of the object has the closest possible relationship with what I have called the function of metonymy which lends itself in grammar to the same equivocations. I mean that there also you will be told that it is the part taken for the whole, which leaves everything open, at once as truth and as error:

- as truth, we are going to clearly understand that this part taken for the whole in the operation is transformed: it becomes its signifier,

- as error, if we attach ourselves simply to this aspect of part; in other words, if we refer ourselves to a reference to reality to understand it.

I sufficiently underlined this elsewhere, I am not coming back to it. The important thing is that you should remember that which, the last time, around the schema on the blackboard and of another one which I am going to take up again in a simpler form ...

that you should know the relationship there is between the object of desire - in so far as, from the beginning, I underlined, articulated, insisted before you on this essential trait, its structuring as partial object in analytic experience - the relationship there is here and which I highlighted the last time, with the libidinal correspondent, because of that, is precisely (4) what remains most irreducibly cathected at the level of one's own body: the fundamental fact of narcissism and its central core.

The sentence that I extracted from Abraham, namely that it is in so far as the real phallus remains, unknown to the subject, that around which the maximum cathexis is conserved, preserved, kept, it is in this very relationship that this partial object finds itself elided, left blank in the image of the other qua cathected - the very term of cathexis taking on all the ambiguous meaning that it involves in the German besetzt - not simply with a charge, but with something which surrounds this central blank. And moreover, if we must attack something else that is obvious, is it not tangible that the image that we can erect at the high point of the fascination of desire is that precisely which, from the Platonic theme to the paintbrush of Botticelli, is renewed with the same form, that of the birth of Venus, Venus Aphrodite, the daughter of the foam, Venus emerging from the waves, this body erected above the waters of bitter love, Venus and Lolita as well.

What does this image teach us analysts, if we have been able to identify it precisely in the symbolic equation, to employ Fenichel's term, of girl = phallus? Because the phallus, what does it teach us if not that there is articulated here, not in a different way, but properly speaking in the same, nothing but the phallus, where we see it symbolically is precisely where it is not, where we suppose it to be manifesting itself under the veil in the erection of desire, is on this side of the mirror: where it is, is where it is not. If it is there before us in this dazzling body of Venus, it is precisely in so far as it is not there and that this form is cathected, in the sense that we said earlier, with all the attractions, with all the Triebregungen which circumscribe it from outside, the phallus for its part with its charge remaining on this side of the mirror, within the narcissistic enclave.

(5) If the mirror is there, we have the following relationship, what emerges as a fascinating form is what finds itself cathected with the libidinal waves which come from the place from which it has been drawn, from the base, from the foundation, as I might say, from the narcissistic foundation, from which there is extracted everything which comes to form as such the objectal structure, on condition that we respect its relationships and its elements, that which constitutes the Triebregung as a function of desire. Desire in its privileged function - in the proper relationship which is called desire, which is distinguished from demand and from need - has its seat in this remainder to which corresponds in the image this mirage through which it is precisely identified to the part it lacks and whose invisible presence gives to what is called beauty precisely its brilliance, which means the antique himeros, which I approached on several occasions even to the extent of playing on its equivocation with hemera, the day.

Here is the central point around which there is played out what we have to think about the function of o and, of course, it is appropriate to come back to it again and to remind you of the myth from which we started. I say myth, this myth which I fabricated for you, this year, during the Symposium of the hand which stretches out towards the log. What strange heat must this hand carry with it in order that the myth should be true, in order that at its approach there should shoot forth this flame through which the object takes fire, a pure miracle against which all right-thinking people rise up, because however rare this phenomenon may be, it must again be considered as unthinkable that one cannot, in any case, prevent it. It is, in effect, the complete miracle that in the middle of this fire which has been induced a hand appears: such is the quite ideal image of a phenomenon imagined as being that of love. Everyone knows that the fire of love burns with only very little noise. Everyone knows that the damp log can contain it for a long time without anything being revealed outside. Everyone knows, in a word, what is entrusted, in the Symposium, to the nicest of the blockheads to articulate in a quasi-derisory fashion that the nature of love is the nature of dampness, which means precisely at bottom exactly the same thing as what is here on the blackboard: that the reservoir of objectal love, in so far as it is the love of something living, is precisely this Schatten, this narcissistic shadow.

The last time, I put forward to you the presence of this shadow and today I would be quite willing to go so far as to call this stain of mildew (moi-sissure), of moi-si, perhaps better named than is believed, if the word "moi" is included in it. We would (6) be rejoining here the whole speculation of the tender Fenelon, he also, as they say, fluctuating when he also makes of the ego (moi) the sign of some "M.R.P. Alliance" with the Divinity! I would be just as capable as anyone else of pushing this metaphor very far and even so far as to make of my discourse a messenger of your sense of smell. This smell of dead rat which comes from a towel, provided one leaves it hanging on the edge of a bath, ought to allow you to see in it an essential human sign. My style of analyst, it is not uniquely by preference that I prefer for him ways that are qualified, that are stigmatised as abstraction, this may be simply to regulate in you a sense of smell that I could tickle you with as well as anyone else.

In any case, you see there being delineated behind this mythical point - which is surely indeed that born of libidinal evolution - that analysis, without ever knowing very well how to situate it on the scale, has circumscribed around the urinary complex with its obscure relationship to the action of fire, antinomical terms, one struggling against the other, involving the primitive ancestor. As you know - what a different ancestor! - analysis discovered that his first playful reflex with respect to the apparition of flame must have been to piss on it - renewed in Gulliver; the profound relationship of the uro, I burn, to urino, I piss on. All of this is inscribed at the foundation of infantile experience, the operation of drying sheets, the dreams of enigmatically starched linen - rather than the erotic nature of the laundress - in Mr Visconti. Those who are able to go to see the splendid production of of all the possible whites illustrating on the stage, materialising for us the fact that and the reason why Pierrot is in white. In short, it is a very human little milieu which see-saws around the ambiguous moment between enuresis and the first pollutions.

It is around this that there is played out the dialectic of love and desire at its most tangible roots. The central object, the object of desire - without wanting to push any further this myth placidly incarnated in the first images in which there appear for the child what is called the first little geographical map, the little Corsica on the sheets that every analyst knows so well - the object of desire presents itself there at the centre of this phenomenon as an object rescued from the waters of your love. The object finds itself at a place which is precisely - and this (7) is the function of my myth - to be situated in the midst of this same burning bush where one day there was announced what there is in its opaque response: "I am who I am", at the same point where, for want of knowing who is speaking there, we are always at the stage of hearing the interrogation of the Che vuoi? whinnied by the devil of Cazotte, a strange metamorphosed camel's head from which moreover there may emerge the faithful little bitch of desire.

This is what we have to deal with in the small o of desire, this is the high point around which there pivots the reason why we have to deal with it right throughout its structure. But as regards the never superseded libidinal attraction, I mean that what comes before it in development, namely the first forms of the object, qua separated - the breasts, the faeces - only take on their function in so far as nachträglich, they are taken up as having played the same game, at the same place. Something enters the dialectic of love, from primitive demands, from the feeding Trieb which was established from the beginning: because the mother speaks, there is an appeal to the beyond of what can satisfy him, of this object which is called the breast, immediately taken up as an instrumental value, in order to distinguish this ground-, this background that the breast is not simply what is repulsed, what is refused because already one wants something else. It is also around the demand that the faeces - where the analyst recognised the value of the first gift - are held onto or given as response to the demand. Here therefore are these levels of anteriority where we have structured in the "oral" and "anal" relationship the function - where having is confused with being or serves as a summons for being - of the mother, beyond everything that she may contribute as an anaclitic support.

As I told you, it is starting from the phallus, from its advent into this dialectic, that there opens up precisely, because it has been reunited in it, the distinction between being and having. Beyond the phallic object the question - and make no mistake about it - opens up with respect to the object in a different way. What it presents here, in this emergence of the island (cf schema), this phantasy, this reflection in which precisely it incarnates itself as object of desire, manifests itself precisely in the image, I would almost say the most sublime one in which it can incarnate itself, the one that I put forward above, as object of desire: it incarnates itself precisely in what is lacking to it. It is starting from there that there originates everything that is going to be the (8) subsequent relationship of the subject to the object of desire. If it captivates by what is lacking to it here, how can that by which it captivates be found? The consequence and the horizon of the relationship to the object, if it is not above all a relationship of preservation, is, as I might say, to interrogate it about what it has in its stomach or what continues along the line where we are trying to isolate the function of little o, namely the properly Sadian line through which the object is interrogated to the depths of its being, through which it is solicited to turn itself back into what is most hidden in order to come to fill this empty form in so far as it is a fascinating form.

What is demanded of the object, is how far it can support this question. And after all, it can indeed only support it up to the point at which the final want-to-be is revealed, up to the point at which the question is confounded with the destruction of the object. It is because this is the term of this barrier that I put in place for you last year, the barrier of beauty or of form, that through which the exigency of preserving the object is reflected back onto the subject himself.

Somewhere in Rabelais, Gargantua goes off to war: "Protect this thing which is the most beloved", says his wife designating with her finger that which, at the time, was much easier to designate unambiguously than in our time, because you know that this piece of clothing which was called the cod-piece had at that time its glorious character. That means: it cannot be kept at home. The second thing is properly speaking full of wisdom - this is never missing in any of Rabelais' remarks - it is the following: "Commit everything, in the battle everything can go, but this, protect it radically at-the centre", this indeed is what there is no question of putting at risk.

This allows a see-saw to occur in our dialectic. Because all of this would be very nice if it were so simple to think about desire starting from the subject, if we were to rediscover, at the level of desire, this myth which developed at the level of knowledge of making of the world this sort of vast web entirely drawn from the belly of the spider-subject. What does that mean, is it so simple for the subject to say: "I desire"? Not so simple, a lot less simple, as you know in your experience, than to say: "I love oceanically", as Freud so prettily expresses it in connection with his critique of religious effusions. I love, (9) I bathe, I dampen, I flood and what is more I dribble! And moreover, all this by mackling, more often scarcely enough to dampen a handkerchief especially since this happens more and more rarely! The great dampers are disappearing since the middle of the XIXth Century. If someone were to show me in our own time somebody like Louise Colet, I would go out of my way to go and see something else.

To be desiring, is something different. It rather seems that this leaves the I well in suspense, it leaves it so well stuck in any case in phantasy that I would defy you, to find this I of desire elsewhere than where M. Genet highlights it in Le balcon. I already spoke to you about M. Jean Genet the desire, this dear about which I one day did a whole big seminar for you. You will easily find the passage in Le balcon of this play of phantasy where Genet admirably highlights something which girls know well, which is that whatever may be the lucubrations of these gentlemen who are parched with wanting to incarnate their phantasy, there is a trait common to all, which is that it is necessary that through some trait in the execution, this does not appear to be true because otherwise perhaps, if this became altogether true, one would no longer know where one was in it. There would perhaps not be, for the subject, a chance of surviving it. This is the place of the signifier S barred, S, in order that it may be known that here there is nothing but a signifier.

This indication of the inauthentic, is the place of the subject qua first person in the phantasy. The best way I find to indicate it - I already suggested it several times somewhere - is to restore to its true form the cedilla of the c_a in French. It is not a cedilla, it is an apostrophe. It is, xn the apostrophe of c'est, the first person of the unconscious and you can even strike out the t at the end: c'es, here is a way of writing the subject at the level of the unconscious, the subject of phantasy. It must be said that this does not facilitate the passage from the object to objectality. As you see - one speaks in the same way about the displacement of certain lines in the spectrum - there is a whole shifting of the object of desire with respect to the real object, in the measure that we may mythically aspire to it, that is fundamentally determined by the negative character of the apparition of the phallus. It was nothing other than this that I was aiming at earlier in making this circuit of the object for you - from its archaic forms up to its horizon of destruction - from the orifice-object, from the anificiel object, if I can express myself in this way, of the infantile past to the object (10) of the fundamentally ambivalent aim which remains that of desire up to the end. Because it is a pure lie - since moreover this is in no way required from a critical point of view - to speak in the relation of desire to the object of a so-called post-ambivalent phase.

Moreover, this fashion of ordering the ascending and concurring ladder of objects with respect to a phallic peak, is indeed what allows us to understand the similarity of level there is, for example, between a sadistic attack in so far as it is not at all a pure and simple satisfaction of a supposedly elementary aggression, but a way as such of questioning the object in its being, a way of deriving from it the "either" introduced at the phallic peak between being and having. That we find ourselves after the phallic stage just as full of ambivalence as before is not the worst misfortune. It is that by developing things in this perspective, what we can remark is that we never get very far, namely that there is always a moment when we are going to lose this object qua object of desire, precisely because we do not know how to pursue the question.

To force a being - since this is the essence of the o beyond the phallus - is not within everybody's competence. It is not simply this allusion that there are natural limits to constraint, to suffering itself, but that even to force a being towards pleasure is not a problem that we so easily resolve and for a good reason, which is that it is we who lead the dance, it is because we are the ones in question. Sade's Justine, everyone marvels at the fact that she resists, in truth, indefinitely to all the bad treatment, to such an extent that it is really necessary for Jupiter himself to intervene and fire off a thunderbolt in order to make an end of it. But it is because precisely Justine is only a shadow. Juliette is the only one who exists, because she is the one who is dreaming, as such and dreaming, it is she who must necessarily - read the story - expose herself to all the risks of desire and to ones which are no less than those which Justine herself runs. Obviously, we scarcely feel ourselves to be worthy of such company, because it goes a long way. Not too much should be made of it in polite conversation. The people who are interested only in their own little selves find only a very minimal interest in it.

(11) We are brought back therefore to the subject. How then is it from the subject that this whole dialectic of desire can be carried on, if he is nothing, for his part, but an apostrophe inscribed in what? In a relationship which is above all the relationship to the desire of the Other? It is here that there intervenes the function of I, the signifier of the ego-ideal and very precisely in so far as I told you that it is from it that there is preserved i(o), the ideal ego, this precious thing that one attempts to take from this humidity, this ceramic, this little pot which has always been the symbol of the created thing in which everyone tries to give some consistency to himself. Everything converges on it, of course, all the notions of form and of model. We have here, in the reference to the other, this construction of this support around which there is going to be able to be played out the grasp of the flower or not. Why? The fact is, of course, that there is no other means for the subject to subsist. What does analysis teach us, if not that the character, the analogically radical function of the image of the phobia, is what Freud was able to unearth in the ethnographic formation of that time under the rubric of the totem which is now rather shaken.

But what remains of it? Nothing other than the fact that one is quite prepared to risk everything for desire, for the fight, for the prestige, even one's life, but not without a certain limiting image, not the dissolution of the bank (rivage) which rivets the subject to this image. That a fish, a tree do not have phobias. That a Bororo is not an Ara is not a phobia of the Ara. Even if this apparently involves analogous taboos, the single common factor between the two is the image in its function of circumscribing and discerning the object, it is the ideal ego. This metaphor of the desirer in almost anything whatsoever can, in effect, always become urgent again in an individual case. Remember little Hans? It is at the moment when what is desired finds itself without defence with respect to the desire of the Other, when it threatens the bank, the limit, i(o), it is then that the eternal artifice is reproduced and that the subject constitutes it, makes it appear as enclosed in "the bear's skin before having killed it", but it is in reality an inside-out bear-skin, and it is within that the phobic protects what? The other aspect of the specular image. The specular image has a cathexis aspect, of course, but also a defence aspect, "a dam against the Pacific" of maternal love. Let us simply say that the cathexis of the other is, in short, defended by the ideal ego and that the final cathexis of his own phallus is defended by the (12) phobic. In a certain fashion, I would go so far as to say that phobia is the light that appears to warn you that you are driving on the reserves of your libido. One can still drive a certain time with that. This is what the phobia means and this indeed is why its support is the phallus as signifier.

I will not need, in this connection, to recall to you, in our previous experience, everything that illustrates, everything that confirms this way of envisaging things. Simply remember the subject of "The analysis of a single dream" by Ella Sharpe, this little cough when he warns the analyst before coming into her office, everything that is hidden behind this, everything that emerges with his stories, his familiar reveries: "What would I do if I were in a place where I did not want to be found? I would give a little bark. People would say: it's only a dog". Everyone knows the other associations: the dog who, one day, masturbated along his leg, I mean the patient's leg. What do we find, in this exemplary history? That the subject, more than ever in a defensive position at the moment of entering the analytic office, pretends to be a dog. He pretends to be it, it is all the others who are dogs before he enters. He warns them to take on again their -human appearance before he enters. You must not imagine that this corresponds in any way to a special interest in dogs. In this example, as in all the others, to be a dog has only one meaning, that means that one goes "bow-wow", and nothing else. I would bark, people would say - those who are not there - "it's a dog", the value of the einziger Zug.

And moreover, when you take up the schema through which Freud gives us the origin of the identification which is properly that of the ego-ideal, from what angle does he take it? From the angle of Group Psychology. What happens, he tells us, anticipating the great Hitlerian explosion, to make everyone enter into this sort of fascination which allows the massing, the solidification of what is called a crowd to take place? (see the schema).

element. In order that collectively all the subjects, at least for an instant, should have this same ideal which permits anything and everything for a rather short time, what is necessary, he says to us? It is that all these exterior objects, äusseres Objekt should be taken as having a common trait, the einziger Zug

Why does this interest us? It is because what is true at the collective level is also true at the individual level. The function of the ideal, in so far as it is around it that there is accommodated the relationship of a subject to his objects, it is very precisely in so far as, in the world of a subject who speaks, it is a pure and simple matter of a metaphorical attempt to confer on all of them a common trait. The world of the subject who speaks, which is called the human world, corresponds to the following: it is that for all objects, to take them in this animal world that analytic tradition has made the exemplary operation of defensive identifications, it is a pure matter of decree to fix this trait common to the diversity of objects, whether they are dogs, cats, badgers or deer. To decree that in order to subsist in a world where the i(o) of the subject is respected they all, whatever they are, go "bow-wow", this is the function of the einziger Zug.

It is essential to keep it structured in this way. Because, outside this register, it is impossible to conceive of what Freud means in the psychology of mourning and melancholia. What is it that differentiates mourning from melancholia? With my guidelines you will clarify it.

For mourning, it is quite certain that it is around the metaphorical function of traits conferred on the love object in so far as they then have narcissistic privileges, that there is going to unfold all the length and difficulty of mourning. In other words and in a fashion all the more significant that he says it as if he were surprised at it, Freud insists clearly on what is in question: the real loss, the mourning (14) consists in authenticating piece by piece, bit by bit, sign by sign, big I element by big I element to the point of exhaustion, when that has been done, finished. But what does that mean, if this object was an o, an object of desire, if not that the object is always masked behind its attributes, almost made banal.

But the business begins, as one might expect, only if we start from pathology, namely from melancholia where we see two things: the fact is that the object is - a serious thing - much less graspable because it was certainly more present and because it unleashed infinitely more catastrophic effects, because they go so far as the drying up of this Trieb which Freud describes as the most fundamental one, that which attaches you to life. You have to read, to follow this text, understand what Freud indicates about some disappointment or other that he does not know how to define. And there, what are we going to see for such a masked, such an obscure object? It is none of the traits of an object which are not seen that the subject can attack, but in so far as we follow him, we analysts, we can identify some of them through those that he aims at, namely the characteristics that he himself has: "I am nothing, I am only a " Note that it is never a question of the specular image. The melancholic does not tell you that he looks bad or that he has a bad taste in his mouth or that he is twisted in some way. He is the lowest of the low, he draws catastrophies down on all his kin: he is entirely, in his self-accusations, in the domain of the symbolic. And to it you can add having: he is ruined.

Is this not designed to put you on the path of something? I am only indicating it to you today by marking out for you a specific point which, with respect to these two terms of mourning and melancholia, marks to my eyes at least for the moment, a converging point: it is the one I would call, not of the mourning, nor of the depression of the subject about the loss of an object, but of a certain type of remorse, in so far as it is unleashed by a certain type of event which we will signal as being of the order of the suicide of the object. Remorse, therefore, in connection with an object who has entered, under some heading, into the field of desire and who, because of that fact or of some risk that he ran in the adventure, has died.

Analyse these cases, the way has already been traced for you by Freud. Already, in normal mourning, he indicates to you that this drive that the subject turns against himself could well be (15) with respect to the object, an aggressive drive. Investigate this dramatic remorse in the cases where it occurs. You will see perhaps how great is the force from which there returns, against the subject himself, a power of insult which can be related to that of melancholia. You will find its source in the fact that with this object, which has thus vanished, it was therefore not worth the-trouble to have taken, as I might say, so many precautions. It was therefore not worth the trouble to have turned aside from one's true desire, if the desire of the object was, as it seems, that one should go so far as to destroy it. This extreme example - which it is not so rare to see, with the waning of such a loss, after what happens between desiring subjects in the course of these long embraces that are called the oscillations of love - is something which carries us to the heart of the relationship between the big I and the small o.

Undoubtedly this limit on something around which there is always put in question the security of the limit, here is what is in question at this point of the phantasy which is the one about which we should know what to do. This supposes undoubtedly, in the analyst, a complete mental reduction of the function of the signifier, in so far as he ought to grasp by what principle, by what angle, by what detour it is always what is in question when it is a question of the position of the ego-ideal.

But there is something else which I can only, arriving here at the end of my discourse, indicate and which concerns the function of small o: what Socrates knows and what the analyst should at least glimpse, is that with the small o the question is completely different fundamentally to that of the access to any ideal. What is at stake here, what happens on this island, this field of being that love can only circumscribe, is something which the analyst can only think can be filled by any object whatsoever, that we are led to vacillate about the limits at which this question is posed: "Who are you" with any object whatsoever which has once come into the field of our desire, that there is no object which has a greater or lesser price than another. And here is the mourning around which there is centred the desire of the analyst.

Agathon, towards whom, at the end of the Symposium, Socrates' praise is going to be directed, is a royal idiot. He is the biggest idiot of them all, he is even the only complete idiot! And it was on him that there was conferred the honour of saying, in a ridiculous form, the truest thing about love. He does not (16) know what he is saying, he plays the fool, but that has no importance and he is no less the beloved object: Socrates says to Alcibiades: "Everything that you are saying there to me is for him".

The function of the analyst, with what it involves in terms of a certain mourning, but, and after all, what does that mean, if not that we rejoin there this truth that Freud himself left outside the field of what he could understand. A singular thing and probably due to these reasons of comfort - let us say those that I have exposed to you to-day under the formula of the necessity of protecting the china - it does not yet seem to have been understood that this is what "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" means - people do not want to translate it, because this would probably not be Christian, in the sense of a certain ideal but it is a philosophical ideal, believe me: Christianity has not yet said its last word! - that means: with respect to anybody whatsoever, to pose the question of the perfect destructiveness of desire.

With respect to anybody whatsoever, you can have the experience of knowing how far you dare to go in questioning a being, with the risk for yourself of disappearing.

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

BOOK X

ANXIETY

1962 - 1963

Translated by Cormac Gallagher from unedited French typescripts

FOR PRIVATE USE ONLY

Seminar 1: Wednesday 14 November 1962

I am going to speak to you this year about anxiety. Someone who is not at all distant from me in our circle, nevertheless let me see the other day his surprise at the fact that I chose this subject which did not seem to him to be something that had all that much to offer. I must say that I will have no trouble in proving the contrary to him. In the mass of questions that are proposed to us on this subject, I will have to make very severe choices. That is why I will try from today to throw you into the work. But already this question seemed to me to preserve the trace of some naivety or other which has never been checked because it seemed to indicate a belief that it is by choice that each year I pick on a subject, like that, which appears interesting to me to continue on some sort of idle chatter. No. As you will see, I think, anxiety is very precisely the meeting point where you will find waiting everything that was involved in my previous discourse and where, together, there await a certain number of terms which may appear not to have been sufficiently connected up for you up to the present. You will see on this terrain of anxiety how, by being more closely knotted together, each one will take its place still better. I am saying still better, because recently it became clear to me, in connection with what was said about phantasy at one of these so-called provincial meetings of our Society, that something concerning this very essential structure called phantasy, had effectively (2) taken its place in your minds. You will see that that of anxiety is not far from it, because it is well and truly the same. I have put on the blackboard for you - even though, after all, a blackboard is not very big - a few little signifiers to guide you or to help your memory: perhaps not all the ones that I would have wanted, but after all it is just as well not to overdo the schemas.

You will see this becoming clearer in a little while. They form two groups, this one and that one - this one which I will complete. On the right, this graph which I apologise for pestering you with for so long, but which it is all the same necessary - because its value as a reference point will I think appear ever more efficacious for you - for me to recall the structure that it ought to evoke to your eyes.

Moreover its choke-pear shape which perhaps has never struck you is not perhaps evoked here by chance; on the other hand, even though last year in connection with the little topological which I made so much of, some people could see being suggested to their minds some forms of the folding back of embryological leaves, even the layers of the cortex, nobody, in connection with the at once bilateral and interlinked arrangement of orientated intercommunication of this graph, nobody has ever evoked in this connection the solar plexus. Of course I am not claiming by that to deliver its secrets to _____-you, but this curious little homology is perhaps not as external as one might think and deserved to be recalled at the beginning of a discourse on anxiety.

Anxiety, I would say, up to a certain point the remark by which I introduced my discourse a little earlier, the one made by one of the people close to me, I mean in our Society, anxiety does not seem to be what stifles you, I mean as psychoanalysts. And nevertheless, it is not too much to say that it ought to in, what I might call, the logic of things, namely of the relationship that you have with your patient. After all to sense what the subject can tolerate, in terms of anxiety, is something that puts you to the test at every instant. It must therefore be supposed that, at least for those among you who are formed in the technique, the thing has ended up by slipping into your way of regulating matters in the most imperceptible way, it must be said. It is not excluded, and thank God for it, that the analyst, provided he is already disposed to it, I mean by very good dispositions to be an analyst, that the analyst at the beginning of his practice should experience some anxiety from his first relations with the patient on the couch.

Again it would be well to touch in this connection on the question of the communication of anxiety. Is this anxiety that you are able, it appears, to regulate so well in yourselves, to damp down the fact that it guides you, is it the same as that of the patient?

Why not? It is a question that I am leaving open for the moment, (4) perhaps not for very long, but which it is worthwhile opening up from the beginning, even if it is necessary to have recourse to our essential articulations in order to give it a valid response, therefore to wait for a moment at least, in the distances, in the detours that I am going to propose to you and which are not absolutely beyond the capacity of those who are my listeners to forecast. Because if you remember, already precisely in connection with another series of so-called Journées provinciales which were far from having given me as much satisfaction, in connection with which in a sort of inclusion, parenthesis, - anticipation, in my discourse of last year I thought I should warn you and project ahead a formula indicating the relation between essential anxiety and the desire of the Other. For those who were not there, I recall the fable, the apologue, the amusing image of it which I thought I ought to present before you for a moment: putting on the animal mask which the wizard of the grotto of the three brothers covers himself with, I imagined myself before you confronted with another animal, this one real and supposed to be gigantic on this occasion, that of the praying mantis. And moreover since I did not know what kind of mask I was wearing you can easily imagine that I had some reason not to be reassured, in the case where by chance this mask would not have been unsuitable for drawing my partner into some error about (5) my identity, the thing being well underlined by the fact that I had added that in the enigmatic mirror of the ocular globe of the insect I did not see my own image. This metaphor preserves all its value today and it is what justifies the fact that at the centre of the signifiers that I put on this blackboard, you see the question which I introduced a long time ago as being the hinge between the two levels of the graph in so far as they structure this relationship of the subject to the signifier which as regards subjectivity appears to me to be the key of what introduces into Freudian doctrine the Che vuoi?, "What do you want?". Push a little bit more the functioning, the insertion of the key, and you have "What does he want of me?. Que me veut-il?, with the ambiguity about the me that French permits between the indirect and direct complement: not just only "What does he want from me?, Que veut-il à moi?", but something in suspense which directly concerns the moi which is not like "How does he want me?, Comment me veut-il?", but which is "What does he want with respect to this place of the ego? Que veut-il concernant cette place du moi?", which is something in suspense between the two levels, $$ o) - d$ and $e - i(o)$, the two points of return which in each one designates the characteristic effect and the distance which is so essential to construct at the source of everything into which we are now going to advance, a distance which renders at once homologous and so distinct the relation between desire and narcissistic identification. It is in the operation of the dialectic which links these two levels so closely that we are going to see there being introduced the function of anxiety, not that it is in itself the mainspring of it, but that it is by the (6) phases of its appearance what allows us to orientate ourselves in it. So therefore when I posed the question of your relations as an analyst to anxiety, a question which precisely leaves in suspense this one: who are you sparing? The other, no doubt, but also just as much yourself and even though these two sparings overlap they should not be allowed to become confused. This is even one of the aims which at the end of this discourse will be proposed to you. For the moment I am introducing this indication of method that what we are going to have to draw in terms of a teaching from this research on anxiety, is to see the privileged point at which it emerges. It is to be modelled on an orography of anxiety which leads us directly to a relief which is that of the term-to-term relationships which is constituted by this more than condensed structural attempt which I thought I should make the guide of our discourse for you.

If you know then how to come to terms with anxiety, it will already make us advance to try to see how, and moreover, I myself would not be able to introduce it without coming to terms with it in some way or other - and that is the danger perhaps: I must not come to terms with it too quickly: this does not mean either that in any way whatsoever, by some psychodramatic game or other, my goal ought to be to throw you (vous jeter) into anxiety with the play on words that I already made about this je of the jeter. Everyone knows that this projection of the I into an introduction to anxiety is for some time the ambition of a philosophy described as existentialist to give it its name. There are no (7) lack of references since the time of Kierkegaard, Gabriel Marcel, Chestov, Berdiaef and some others; not all of them have the same place nor are they all as usable. But at the beginning of this discourse, I would like to say that it seems to me that this philosophy in so far as, from its patron, the first named, to those whose names I advanced later, it is undoubtedly marked by a certain degradation. It seems to me that I see this philosophy marked, I would say, by some sort of haste unrecognised by itself, marked, I would say, by a certain disarray with respect to a reference which is the one to which at the same epoch the movement of thought was very close to, the reference to history. It is from a disarray (désarroi), in the etymological sense of this term, with respect to this reference that there is born and is precipitated existentialist reflection.

The horse of thought, I would say, to borrow from little Hans the object of his phobia, the horse of thought which imagines itself for a time to be the one pulling the coach of history, bucks all of a sudden, goes mad, collapses and gives itself over to this great Krawall machen to refer ourselves again to little Hans who gives one of these images to his favourite fear. This, is indeed what I am calling here the movement of haste in the bad sense of the term, that of disarray. And it is for that reason that it is far from being what interests us most in the line of descendance, the line of descendance of thought that we have pin-pointed just now, like everyone else moreover, by the term existentialism.

(8) Moreover one could remark that the latest comer, and not one of the least great, Monsieur Sartre, exerts himself quite explicitly not simply to get this horse back on his feet, but -co put him again between the shafts of history. It is precisely in function of this that Monsieur Sartre has busied himself a good deal, has questioned himself a good deal, about the function of seriousness (du sérieux). There is also someone whom I did not put in the series and therefore, because I am simply approaching, and touching at the start on what is in the background of the picture, the philosophers who take note of the point that we have got to: "Will the analysts be able to measure up to what we say about anxiety?", there is Heidegger. It is quite certain that with the use that I made above of the pun on the word jeter, it was indeed to him, to his original dereliction that I was closest.

The being for death, to call it by its name, which is the access path by which Heidegger, in his broken-off discourse, leads us to his present, enigmatic interrogation on the being of the existent, I believe, does not really pass by way of anxiety. He has named the living reference of the Heideggerian question: it is fundamental, it is about everything, it is about the one, it is about the omnitude of the human everyday: it is concern (le souci). Of course, from this point of view it could not be foreign to us, any more than concern itself. And since I have called here two witnesses Sartre and Heidegger, I will not deprive myself from calling on a third, in so far as I do not believe him unworthy to represent those who are here in the (9) process also of observing what he is going to say, and it is myself. . I mean that after all from the testimonies that I had again in recent hours, of what I would call the expectation - it is not just your's that I am speaking about in this case - therefore undoubtedly, I had these testimonies, but that there came to me last evening a work whose text I had asked one of you for, indeed to orientate myself in connection with a question that he himself had posed me, a work which I had told him I was waiting for before beginning my discourse here.

The fact that it was thus brought to me in a way on time, even if I have not been able to get to know it in the interval, since after all I also come here on time to respond to your expectation, is this a movement that is likely in itself to give rise to anxiety? Without having questioned the person concerned, I do not believe it with regard to myself. Indeed, I can respond, in the face of this expectation which is nevertheless designed to weigh me down with some sort of weight, that this is not, I believe I can say it from experience, the dimension which in itself gives rise to anxiety. I would even say on the contrary that I wanted to make this last reference, which is so close that it may appear problematic to you, in order to indicate to you how I intend to put you to what is my question from the beginning, at what distance to speak to you about it without putting it immediately into a cupboard, without leaving it in a crazy state either, at what distance is this anxiety to be put?

(10) Well then, faith, at the right distance, I mean the one which does not in any case place us too close to anyone, at precisely this familiar distance which I evoked for you by taking these last references, the one to my interlocutor who brought me my paper at the last minute and the one to myself who must here take a risk in my discourse on anxiety.

We are going to try to tuck this anxiety under our arms. It will not be any more indiscreet for all that. This will really leave us at the opaque distance, believe- me, which separates us from those who are closest to us. So then, between this concern and this seriousness and this expectation, are you going to believe that this is the way that I wanted to circumscribe it, to corner it? Well then, disabuse yourselves. If I traced out in the middle of three terms a little circle with its separated arrows, it is to tell you that if it is there that you look for it, you will quickly see that the bird has flown if indeed it was ever there. It is not to be sought in the middle. Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety, such is the title, the slogan beneath which for the analyst there appears in his memory, there remains marked the final term of what Freud articulated on this subject.

Today I am not going to go into the text of Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety because as you have seen from the beginning I have decided today to work without a net, and there is no subject where the net of the Freudian discourse is closer, in short, to giving us a false sense of security; because precisely, when we (11) go into this text, you will see what is to be seen in connection with anxiety, that there is no net, because precisely as regards anxiety, each mesh, as I might appropriately put it, has no meaning except precisely by leaving the void in which anxiety is.

In the discourse, thank God, of Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety, everything is spoken about except anxiety. Does that mean that one cannot speak about it? Working without a net evokes a tight rope walker. I am taking as a rope only the title Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety. It leaps, as I might say, to understanding that these three terms are not at the same level. They look irregular and that is why I have written them in this way on three lines and staggered.

In order for it to work, for one to be able to understand them as a series, it is really necessary to see them as I have put them there, on a diagonal, which implies that the empty squares have to be filled in. I am not going to delay in proving to you something which is immediately obvious, the difference between the structure of these three terms which each, if we wish to situate them, have absolutely not the same terms as context, as entourage. Inhibition, is something which is, in the broadest sense of this term, in the dimension of movement and, what is more, Freud speaks about locomotion when he introduces it.

I am not going to go into the text. All the same you remember enough about it, to see that he cannot do otherwise than speak about locomotion when he introduces this term. In a broader (12) sense, this movement to which I refer, movement exists in every function, even if it is not locomotory. It exists at least metaphorically, and in inhibition, it is the stopping of movement that is involved.

Stopping: does that mean that this is all inhibition is designed to suggest to us. You will easily object, braking too, and why not, I grant it to you. I do not see why we should not put into a matrix which ought to allow us to distinguish the dimensions involved in a notion so familiar to us, why we should not put on one line the notion of difficulty, and, on another coordinate axis, the one that I have called that of movement. This is even what is going to allow us to see more clearly, because it is also what is going to allow us to come down to earth, to the earth of what is not veiled by the learned word, by the notion, indeed the concept with which one can always come to terms with.

Why should one not use the word "to impede, empêcher", that is after all what is involved. Our subjects are inhibited when they speak to us about their inhibition and when we speak about it at scientific congresses; and every day, they are impeded. To be impeded, is a symptom; and inhibited, is a symptom that has been put in the museum; if one looks at what that means, to be impeded - be very clear about it - does not imply any superstition from the etymological point of view - I make use of it when it is of use to me - impedicare all the same means to be caught in a trap. And that is an extremely precious notion, (13) because it implies the relationship of a dimension to something different which comes to interfere with it and which entangles (empêtre) what interests us, which brings us closer -co what we are trying to know: not at all the function, the term of reference of difficult movement, but the subject, namely what happens under the form, under the name of anxiety.

If I put impediment (empêchement) here, as you see: I am in the symptom column; and right away I point out to you what we will of course be led to articulate about it much further on, namely that the trap is narcissistic capture. I think that you are no longer altogether at a rudimentary level about narcissistic capture, I mean that you remember what I articulated about it at the final term, namely the very precise limit that it introduces as regards what can be invested in the object, and that the residue, the broken fragment, what does not manage to invest itself, is going to be properly what gives its support, its material, to the signifying articulation that is going to be called on the other plane - the symbolic one - castration. The impediment which has come about is linked to this circle which means that in the same movement by which the subject advances towards jouissance, namely towards what is farthest from him, he encounters this intimate break very close at hand, and why? Because of allowing himself to be captured en route by his own image, by the specular image. That is the trap.

But let us try to go further, because we are still here at the (14) level of the symptom. As regards the subject, what term should be brought forward here in the third column? If we push further the questioning about the meaning of the word inhibition (inhibition, impediment), the third term which I propose to you, still in the sense of bringing you back to the ground of lived experience, to the derisory seriousness of the question, I propose to you the beautiful term of embarrassment (embarras).

It will be all the more precious for us because today the etymology satisfies me to the full; obviously I have the wind to my back, if you see that embarras is very exactly the subject S invested with the bar, that the etymology imbarrare (imbaricare?) makes properly speaking the most direct allusion to the bar (bara) as such and that moreover this is the image of what is called the most direct lived experience of embarrassment. When you no longer know what to do with yourself, when you do not find anything behind which to barricade yourself, what is indeed involved is the experience of the bar; and moreover this bar can take on more than one form. The curious references that one finds, if what I have been told is correct, in numerous dialects where the embarrassed person, the embarazada - there are no Spaniards here, it does not matter because I have been told that the embarazada, without having recourse to dialect, means a pregnant woman in Spanish. Which is another quite significant form of the bar in its place.

So there we are for the dimension of difficulty. It culminates at this sort of slight form of anxiety which is called embarrassment. In the other dimension, that of movement, what are the terms that we are going to see sketched out? Descending (15) towards the symptom it is emotion. Emotion - you will forgive me for continuing to trust in an etymology which has been so favourable to me up to now - emotion from an etymological point of view refers to movement, except that we will give it a little push by putting into it the Goldsteinian meaning of throwing out, ex, of the line of movement, the movement which disintegrates, the reaction which is described as catastrophic. It is useful for me to indicate to you the place where it should be put, because after all, there have been people who have told us that the catastrophic reaction was anxiety. I believe of course that it is not unrelated. What is not related to anxiety? It is a matter precisely of knowing when it really is anxiety. The fact for example that the same reference has been made - and that without any scruple - to the catastrophic reaction to designate the hysterical crisis as such, or again anger in other cases, sufficiently proves all the same that it could not be enough to distinguish, to pinpoint, to highlight where anxiety is. Let us take the next step: we always remain at the same respectful distance from two great traits of anxiety, but is there in the dimension of movement something which responds more precisely to the stage of anxiety? I am going to call it by its name which I- have held in reserve for a long time, in your interest, as a delicacy. Perhaps I have made a fleeting allusion to it, but only particularly sharp ears were able to pick it up: it is the word émoi (dismay). Here etymology favours me in a literally, [^]fabulous way. It delights me. That is why I will not hesitate, when I have told you first everything that it brings me, to further abuse it. In any case, let's go.

Linguistic sensibility, as it is put by Messrs Bloch and Von Wartburg to whose article I am expressly asking you to refer - I apologise if it duplicates what I am going to tell you now, duplicates it all the more because what I am going to tell you is a literal quotation from it, I take things where I find them, and I hope nobody minds - Messrs Bloch and Von Wartburg say then that linguistic sensibility has linked this term to the correct word, to the word émouvoir (to move, to affect). But disabuse yourselves, this is not the case. Emoi has nothing to do with emotion for someone who knows how to use it. In any case, realise - I will go quickly - that the term esmayer, that before it esmais and even properly speaking esmoi - esmais, if you are interested is already attested to in the thirteenth century - only knew, to put it in the authors' words, only triumphed in the sixteenth. That esmayer means troubler (to disturb, to frighten) and also se troubler (to show disturbance). That esmayer is effectively still used in dialects and leads us to the popular Latin exmagare which means to make lose one's power, one's energy, and that this, this popular Latin, is linked to a grafting of a western German root which reconstituted gives us magan and which one moreover has no need to reconstitute because in high German and in Gothic, it exists in this same form, [^]and that, provided you are German speakers, you can refer to mogen to the English may - mogen in German. In Italian smagare exists I hope? Not really. It comes from Bloch and Von Wartburg - and means, according to them, to become discouraged. A doubt exists therefore. Since there are no Portuguese here, I would have no objection to accepting, not what I am putting forward, but Bloch and Von Wartburg, to bringing into play esmaçar which means to crush, which until I learn otherwise I will hold onto as having for what follows a considerable interest. I will pass over Provençal.

In any case, it is certain that the translation which has been accepted, of Triebregung by émoi pulsionnel (instinctual impulse) is quite incorrect and precisely because of the whole distance that there is between emotion and émoi. Emoi is perturbation, collapse of power, Regung is stimulation, the call to disorder, even to a riot. I will fortify myself also with this etymological quest to tell you that up to a certain time, more or less the same as the one that is called in Bloch and Von Wartburg the triumph of émoi, émeute (riot) - precisely had the meaning of emotion and only took on the sense of popular movement more or less from the seventeenth century on.

All of this to make you properly sense that here the nuances, indeed the linguistic versions evoked, are designed to guide us through something, namely, that if we wish to define by dismay a third place in the sense of what is meant by inhibition if we try to connect it with anxiety, dismay, perturbation, being disturbed as such, indicates to us the other reference which though it (18) corresponds, let us say, to a level equal to that of embarrassment, does not concern the same aspect. Dismay is the most profound form of being disturbed in the dimension of movement. Embarrassment is the high point reached by difficulty. Does this mean that for all that we have rejoined anxiety? The boxes of this little table are there to show you that precisely we are not claiming that. We have filled in here emotion, dismay, these two boxes here, impediment, embarrassment, these ones here. It remains that this one here and that one are empty. How can they be filled? It is a subject which greatly interests us and I am going to leave it for you for a while as a riddle. What is to be put in these two boxes? This is of the greatest interest as regards what is involved in the handling of anxiety. Having posed this little preamble from the reference to the Freudian triad of inhibition, symptom and anxiety, the ground has been cleared to speak about it, I would say, doctrinally. Having been brought back by these evocations to the level of experience itself, let us try to situate it in a conceptual framework. What is anxiety? We have ruled out its being an emotion. And to introduce it, I would say: it is an affect.

Those who follow the movements of affinity or of aversion of my discourse by frequently letting themselves be taken in by appearances, think no doubt that I am less interested in affects than in anything else. This is quite absurd. On occasion, I have tried to say what affect is not: it is not Being given in (19) its immediacy, nor is it the subject in some sort of raw form. It is not, to say the word, protopathic in any case. My occasional remarks on affect mean nothing other than this. And that is precisely why it has a close structural relationship with what is, even traditionally, a subject; and I hope to articulate it for you in an indelible fashion the next time. What on the contrary I did say about affect, is that it is not repressed; and that is something that Freud says just like me. It is unmoored, it goes with the drift. One finds it displaced, mad, inverted, metabolised, but it is not repressed. What is repressed are the signifiers which moor it. This relationship between affect and signifier would require a whole year on the theory of affects. I already allowed there to appear on one occasion the way in which I understood it. I said it to you in connection with anger. Anger, I told you, is what happens in subjects when the little pegs no longer go into the little holes. What does that mean? As regards the level of the Other, of the signifier, it always concerns faith and trust, someone is not playing the game. This is what gives rise to anger. And moreover to leave you today on something which preoccupies you, I am going to make a simple remark. Where best does Aristotle deal with the passions? I think that all the same there are a certain number of you who know already: it is in Book Two of his Rhetoric. The best thing (20) about the passions is caught up in the reference, in the net, in the network of the Rhetoric. It is not by chance. This is the net. This indeed is why I spoke to you about the net in connection with the first linguistic references that I tried to give you. I- did not take the dogmatic path of giving a general theory of affects before what I had to say to you about anxiety. Why? Because here we are not psychologists, we are psychoanalysts. I am not developing for you a direct logical psychosis, a discourse about this unreal reality which is called the psyche but a praxis which merits a name: erotology. Desire is what is involved, and the affect by which we are urged perhaps to make emerge everything that it involves as a universal, not general, consequence on the theory of affects, is anxiety. It is on the cutting edge of anxiety that we have to maintain ourselves and it is on this cutting edge that I hope to lead you further the next time.

Seminar 2: Wednesday 21 November 1962

Blackboard

0	0	S	$d(0) : d(0) < 0$	1
0	$\$$	ϕ	$d(0) < i(0) : d(\phi)$	2
0	0		$d(x) : d(0) < x$	3
			$d(0) < d(0)$	} 4
			$d(0) : 0 > d(0)$

↖ The dividing bar

$$ \phi 0$

$0 = \text{zero}$

As I continue today to get into my discourse on anxiety a little more, I can legitimately pose before you the question of what a teaching is here.

The notion that we may have of it ought all the same to undergo some effect - if here we are in principle, let us say, analysts for the most part, if the analytic experience is supposed to be my essential reference when I address the audience composed of yourselves - from the fact that we cannot forget that the analyst is, as I might say, an interpreter (un interprétant). He plays on this so essential moment which I already accentuated for you on many occasions starting from several subjects of "he did not know", "I did not know" and to which we will leave therefore an indeterminate subject by collecting them into a "one did not know, on ne savait pas".

As regards this "one did not know", the analyst is supposed to know something. Why not even admit that he knows a good deal? The question is not to know - it would be at least premature - whether he can teach it - we can say that up to a certain point, the simple existence of a place like this and of the role that I play in it for some time now, is a way of settling the question well or badly, but of settling it - but to know "what is it to teach it?, qu'est-ce que Renseigner?" .

What does teaching it mean when it involves precisely what it is a matter of teaching, to teach it not simply to the one who does not know, but - it must be admitted that up to a certain point we (2) are all in the same boat here - to. the one who, given what is involved, to one who cannot know.

Observe carefully where, as I might say, the false door leads. An analytic teaching, if there were not this false door, this seminar itself could conceive itself as being in the line, in the prolongation of what happens for example in a supervision where it is what you know, what you are supposed to know, that is brought along, and where I would only intervene to give what is analogous to interpretation, namely this addition by means of which something appears which gives meaning to what you think you know, which makes appear in a flash what it is possible to grasp beyond the limits of knowledge.

It is all the same in the measure that a knowledge exists in this work of development of analysis that we describe as communal rather than collective among those who have experience of it, the analysts, that this knowledge is constituted, that a work of putting it together is conceivable, which justifies the place taken by a teaching like the one which is carried out here. It is because, if you wish, there has already been secreted by analytic experience a whole literature which is called analytic theory that I am forced - often quite against my will - to give it here so much space, and it is what necessitates me doing something which has to go beyond this piecing together, and precisely in the sense of our getting closer, through this piecing together of analytic theory, to what constitutes its source, namely experience.

Here an ambiguity appears which depends not simply on the fact that here some non-analysts are mixed in with us. There is no great inconvenience in this because moreover even the analysts come here with positions, postures, expectations which are not necessarily analytic, and already very sufficiently conditioned by the fact that in the theory that is constructed in analysis there are introduced references of every kind, and much more so than may appear at first sight, that one can qualify as extra-analytic, as psychologising for example. By the simple fact then (3) that I have to deal with this material, the material of my audience, the material of my teaching object, I will be led to refer to this common experience which is the one thanks to which there is established all communication in teaching, namely not to be able to remain in the pure position that I called earlier interpreting, but to pass to a broader communicating position, namely to engage myself on the terrain of "making things Vinderstood, faire comprendre", to appeal in you to an experience which goes well beyond that of strict analytic experience.

This is important to recall because "making things understood" is at the same time that which, in psychology in the broadest sense, is really the stumbling block. Not so much because the accent ought to be put on what at one time for example appeared to be the great originality of a work like that of Blondel on La conscience morbid, namely that there are limits to understanding: let us not imagine for example, that we understand, as they say, the real authentic lived experience of the sick. But it is not the question of this limit which is important for us; and at a time when I am speaking to you about anxiety, it is important to point out to you that it is one of the questions that we suspend, because the question is much rather to explain why, by what right we can speak about anxiety, when we subsume under this rubric the anxiety into which we can introduce ourselves following one or other meditation guided by Kierkegaard, the anxiety which can lay hold of us at one or other para-normal or even frankly pathological moment, as being ourselves subjects of an experience that is more or less situatable from a psychopathological point of view, the anxiety which is the one we deal with in our neurotics, the ordinary material of our experience, and for that matter the anxiety that we can describe and localise at the source of an experience that is more peripheral for us, that of the pervert for example, even that of the psychotic.

If this homology is justified by a kinship of structure, it can (4) only be so at the expense of the original understanding which nevertheless is going necessarily to increase with the danger of making us forget that this understanding is not that of a lived experience but of a mainspring, and of presuming too much about what we can assume about the experiences to which it refers, specifically those of the pervert or of the psychotic. In this perspective it is preferable to warn someone that he should not believe too much in what he can understand. It is here indeed that the signifying elements take on their importance, denuded as I try to make them by their notation of understandable content and whose structural relationship is the means by which I try to maintain the level necessary for understanding not to be deceptive, while at the same time allowing there to be located the diverse significant terms into which we make our way, and this especially when what is involved is an affect. Because I have not refused this element of classification: anxiety is an affect. We see that the style of approach of such a theme: "anxiety is an affect" is proposed to us from the point of view of the teacher, in accordance with the different paths that one can, I believe, rather summarily, - namely by effectively summing them up - define under three headings, those of the catalogue, namely as regards affect to work out not simply what it means, but what was meant in constituting such a category, a term which undoubtedly puts us in a position of teaching something about the subject of teaching in its broadest sense, and necessarily here to harmonise what is taught within analysis with what is contributed from outside in the widest sense as category, and why not? Very considerable contributions have come to us from there and, you will see, to take a median reference which will come into the field of our attention, there is as regards what occupies us this year - if it is true that, as I said, I am far from refusing to insert this central object of anxiety into the catalogue of affects, into the different theories which have been produced about affect - well then, to take things, I told you, at <5) a kind of median point of the cut, at the level of Saint Thomas Aquinas to call him by his name, there are some very good things concerning a division which he did not invent concerning affect between" the concupiscent and the irascible, and the long discussion with which he weighs up, in accordance with the formula of scholastic debate, proposition, objection, response, namely which of the two categories is primary with respect to the other, and how he settles it and why. Despite certain appearances, certain references, the irascible is inserted somewhere in the chain of the concupiscent which is already there, which concupiscent therefore is primary with respect to it, this is something which will not fail to be of use to us; because in truth might it not be in the final analysis entirely suspended on a supposition about a Sovereign Good, against which, as you know, we already have substantial objections to make - for us it would be very acceptable; we will see what we can preserve of it, what it clarifies for us. The simple fact is that we can - I would ask you to refer to it - I will give you the references at the appropriate time - we can undoubtedly find here a considerable amount of material to nourish our own reflection. More, paradoxically, than what we can find in recent, modern developments - let us call things by their name: the nineteenth century - of a psychology which claimed to be, without no doubt being fully entitled to do so, more experimental. This again, this path, has the inconvenience of pushing us in the direction, into the category of the classification of affects, and experience proves that too great an abandon in this direction only culminates for us - and even however centrally we may bring it, with respect to our experience, to that part to which a little earlier I gave the trait, the accent of theory - in obvious impasses a lovely testimony of which for example is given by this article which appears in Tome 34, the third part of 1953 of the International Journal, where Mr David Rapaport attempts a psychoanalytic theory of affect.

(6) This article is really exemplary for the properly dismaying evaluation, at which as a matter of fact it culminates, without the author dreaming of hiding it, namely the astonishing result that an author who announces by this title an article which after all could not fail to allow us to hope for something new, original, to come out of it as regards what the analyst can think about affect, should finally culminate only in him also, staying strictly within analytic theory, giving a catalogue of the acceptations in which this term has been used, and seeing that within the very theory itself these acceptations are irreducible to one another, the first being that of affect conceived of as constituting substantially the discharge of the drive, the second within the same theory, and, to go even further, supposedly from the Freudian text itself: affect being nothing but the connotation of a tension at its different phases, usually conflictual, affect constituting the connotation of this tension in so far as it varies, a connotation of the variation of tension, and a third term equally marked as irreducible in Freudian theory itself: affect constituting in a properly topographical reference the signal at the level of the ego concerning 'something happening elsewhere, the danger coming from elsewhere.' The important thing is that he notes that there still subsists, in the debates of the most recently emerging authors in analytic discussion, divergent claims about the primacy of each one of these three meanings, so that nothing can be resolved about it. And that the author in question can say no more to us about it, is all the same indeed the sign that here the method described as "cataloguing" cannot here be marked indeed by any profound gain, since it culminates in impasses, even indeed in a very special type of infecundity.

There is, differentiating itself from this method - I apologise for going on so long today about a question which is nevertheless of great interest as a preamble, as regard the timeliness of what we are doing here, and it is not for nothing that I am

(7) introducing it, as you will see as regards anxiety - the method that I would call, using a need for consonance with the preceding term, the method of analogy, which will lead us to discern what one can call levels. I saw in a work which I will not otherwise quote today, an attempted gathering together of this kind, where one sees, in separate chapters, anxiety conceived as it is put - it is an English work - biologically, then socially, sociologically, then as far as I know culturally, culturellement, as if it were enough in this way to reveal, at supposedly independent levels, analogical positions, to succeed in doing anything more than separating out, no longer what I called earlier a classification, but here a sort of type.

We know what this method culminates in: in what is called an anthropology. Anthropology, to our eyes, is something which, of all the paths to which we might commit ourselves, involves the greatest number of the most hazardous presuppositions. What such a method culminates in, no matter how eclectic it is, is always and necessarily what we, in our familiar vocabulary, and without making of this name or of this title the index of someone who has even occupied such an eminent position, is what we call Jungianism.

On the subject of anxiety, this will necessarily lead us to the theme of this central core which is the absolutely necessary thematic at which such a path culminates. This means that it is very far from what is involved in experience. Experience leads us to what I would call here the third way which I would place under the index, under the heading of the function of what I would call that of the key.

The key is what opens, and what functions because it opens. The (8) key is the form according to which there should operate or not operate the signifying function as such, and what makes it legitimate for me to announce it and to distinguish it and dare to introduce it as something to which we can trust ourselves, is net something which is marked here by presumption, for the reason that I think that it will be for you, and for those here who belong to the teaching profession, a 'sufficiently convincing ireJIfrence, it is that this dimension is absolutely connatural to any teaching, analytic or not, for the reason that there is no ■leaching, I would say - and I would say, for my part, whatever astonishment may result from it among some people as regards what I teach, and nevertheless I will say it - there is no teaching which does not refer itself to what I would call an ideal of simplicity.

If, earlier, something was enough to give rise for us to an objection in the fact that a cat literally cannot find her kittens as regards what we think, we analysts, by going to the texts on affect, there is something here profoundly unsatisfying, and that it is necessary that, as regards any title whatsoever, we should satisfy ourselves as regards a certain ideal of simple reduction. What does that mean and why? Why, why ever since people have done science - because these reflections are concerned with something quite different and with much vaster fields than that of our experience - has one required the greatest possible simplicity? Why should the real be simple? What could permit us for a single instant to suppose it to be so?

Nothing indeed, nothing other than this subjective initium on which I put the accent here throughout the whole of the first part of my teaching last year, namely that there is no conceivable appearance of a subject as such except from the primary introduction of a signifier, and from the simplest signifier which is called the unary trait.

The unary trait comes before the subject. "In the beginning was the word", means: in the beginning is the unary trait. Everything that is teachable ought to preserve the stigmata of this ultra-simple initium which is the only thing which can justify to our eyes the ideal of simplicity.

(9) Simplicity, singularity of the trait, this is what we bring into the real, whether the real wants it or does not want it. But one thing is certain, it is that it enters, that it has already entered before us because already it is along this path that all the subjects who, for some centuries all the same, have been engaged in a dialogue and have to come to terms as best they can with this condition precisely that there is between them and the real this field of the signifier; it is already by this apparatus of the unary trait that they have constituted themselves as subjects. How could we for our part be astonished at finding its mark in our own field, if our field is that of the subject?

In analysis, there is something which is prior to everything that we can elaborate or understand, and this I will call the presence of the Other. There is no self-analysis; even when one imagines it, the Other is there. I recall it because it is already on this path and on the same path of simplicity that I placed what I had to tell you, what I indicated to you, what I began to indicate to you about something which goes further, namely that anxiety is this certain relationship which I have only imaged up to now. I recalled for you the last time the image, with the sketch I re-evoked of my presence, my very modest and embarrassed presence in the presence of the giant praying mantis, I already told you more therefore in saying to you: this is related to the desire of the Other.

This Other, before knowing what my relationship with its desire means when I am in a state of anxiety, I first of all put the Other there. -To get closer to his desire, I will take, God knows, paths that I have already opened up. I told you: the desire of man is the desire of the Other. I apologise for not being able to go back, for example, to a grammatical analysis that I made during the last Journées Provinciales - that is why I am so keen that this text should come to me intact, so that it can be distributed at a suitable time - the grammatical analysis of what is meant by the desire of the Other and the meaning of this (objective) genitive; but after all those who up to now have (10) been at my seminar may all the same, I think, have enough elements to situate themselves sufficiently.

From the pen of someone, who is precisely the author of this little work to which I alluded at the beginning of this year's teaching the last time, which had been brought to me that very morning on a subject which was none other than the one that Lévi-Strauss approaches, that of the suspending of what one could call dialectical reason, at the structuralist level at which Lévi-Strauss places himself, someone making use of it to clarify this debate, to enter into its detours, to disentangle its skein from the analytic point of view, and referring of course to what I said about phantasy as support of desire, does not in my opinion take enough notice of what I am saying when I speak about the desire of man as desire of the Other.

What proves it, is that he believes he can content himself with recalling that this is a Hegelian formula. Now if there is, I think, someone who makes no mistake about what The phenomenology of the spirit has brought us, it is myself. If there is nevertheless a point at which it is important to mark that it is tieirfe that I mark the difference and, if you wish, to employ the term, the progress - I would like still better the leap - which is ours with respect to Hegel, it is precisely concerning this function of desire. I am not in a position, given the field that I have to cover this year, to take up again with you step by step the Hegelian text. I am alluding here to an author who, I hope, will see this article published and who shows a quite sensitive knowledge of what Hegel says on this point.

I am not all the same going to follow him onto the plane of the quite original passage which he very well recalled on this occasion. But for the totality of those who are listening to me and with what has already passed, I think, to the common level of this audience concerning the Hegelian reference, I will say immediately, in order to make you sense what is involved, that in Hegel, as regards this dependence of my desire with respect to the desirer who is the Other, I am dealing, in the most certain [11) and most articulated fashion, with the Other as consciousness. The Other is the one who sees me - how that involves my desire, you know, you already glimpse sufficiently, but I will come back to it later, for the moment I am making massive oppositions - the Other is the one who sees me and it is on this plane, on this plane that you see that there is launched all by itself, according to the basis with which Hegel inaugurates The phenomenology of the spirit, the struggle on the plane of what he calls "pure prestige", and my desire is involved in this.

For Lacan, because Lacan is an analyst, the Other is there as unconsciousness constituted as such, and he involves my desire in the measure of what he is lacking and that he does not know. It is at the level of what he is lacking and that he does not know that I am involved in the most pregnant fashion, because for me there is no other detour, to find what I am lacking as object of my desire.

That is why there is for me not alone no access, but no possible sustentation of my desire which is pure reference to an object, whatever it may be, unless by coupling it, by linking it with the following which is expressed by the which is this necessary dependence on the Other as such. This Other is of course the one that throughout these years, I think I have accustomed you to distinguish at every instant from the other, my fellow. It is the Other as locus of the signifier. It is my fellow among others of course, but not simply that, because of the fact that it is also the locus as such at which there is established the order of the singular difference of which I spoke to you at the beginning.

Am I now going to introduce the formulae which I marked for you on the right which I do not pretend - far from it, given what I said to you right at the beginning - are going to surrender their malice to you immediately. I would ask you today, like the last time - that is why this year I am writing these things on the blackboard - to take them down. You will see how they function afterwards. The desire of desire, in the Hegelian sense, is therefore desire of a desire which responds to the appeal of the subject.

(12) It is desire of a desirer. Why does he need this desirer, who is the Other? It is because from whatever angle you place yourself, but in the most articulated fashion in Hegel, he needs him in order that the Other should recognise him, in order to receive recognition from him. What does that mean? That the Other as such is going to establish something, "o", which is precisely what is involved at the level of what desires - this is the, whole impasse - in requiring to be recognised by him. There where I am recognised as object, because this object in its essence is a consciousness, a Selbstbewusstsein, there is no mediation other than that of violence. I obtain what I desire, I am object and I cannot tolerate myself as object, I cannot tolerate myself unless I am recognised in my world, the only mode of recognition that I can obtain, must necessarily therefore at any, price be settled between our two consciousnesses. This is the desire in Hegel. The desire of desire in the Lacanian or analytic sense, is the desire of the Other in a fashion that is much more fundamentally (principiellement) open to a sort of mediation. At least that is the way it looks at first, I approach. Because desire here - you will see it in the very formula/ the signifier, that I put here on the blackboard,

2, that I am going rather far in the sense of going against, I mean of contradicting what you may now be expecting - is desire qua supporting-image of this desire, a relationship therefore of $d \cdot (\text{£} > -)$ to what I write, to what I do not hesitate to write: $i(o)$, even and precisely because that creates an ambiguity with the notation that I usually designate of the specular image (here we do not know yet, when, how and why the specular image can be, but it is undoubtedly an image; this is not a specular image, it is of the order of image, it is the phantasy, which I do not hesitate on occasion to overlap with this notation of the specular image). I am saying therefore that this desire is desire in so far as its supporting image is the equivalent - that is why the two points $(:)$ which were here are there - is the equivalent of the desire of the Other. But here the Other is (13) connoted because it is the Other at the point where it is characterised as lack. The two other formulae 3 and 4 (because there are only two, this one and then the second one; you see included in a bracket for the second, two formulae which are only two ways of writing the same thing, in one direction, then in the palindromic direction by returning after being like that, by returning in this way; that is all that is written in the third line).

I do not know then whether I will have the time today to get to the translation of these two final formulae. You should know already however that they are one and the other constructed, the first to highlight that anxiety is what shows the truth of the Hegelian formula, namely that if the Hegelian formula is partial and false and makes a false door of the whole beginning of the Phenomenology of the Spirit as I indicated to you on several occasions already by showing you the perversion which results, a perversion which goes very far and even into the political domain, from this too narrow starting point centred on the imaginary because it is all very well to say that the servitude of the slave is full of consequences and leads to Absolute Knowledge. But it also means that the slave will remain a slave until the end of time.

It is Kierkegaard who gives the truth. It is not Hegel's truth, but the truth of the anxiety which leads us to our remarks about desire in the analytic sense.

Remarks: in the two formulae, that of Hegel and mine, in the first term of the formulae (above), however paradoxical it may appear, it is an object o which desires. Although there are differences, there is something in common between the Hegelian concept of desire and the one that I am promoting. It is at a moment, the point of an unacceptable impasse in the process.

{14} Selbstbewusstsein in Hegel, is an object, namely this something where the subject, being this object, is irremediably marked by finiteness, it is this object which is affected by desire. This is the way in which what I am producing before you has something in common with the Hegelian theory, except that at pur analytic level, which does not require the transparency of Selbstbewusstsein - it is a difficulty of course, but not of a kind to make us retrace our steps, nor for that matter to engage ourselves in a fight to the death with the Other - because of the existence of the unconscious, we can be this object affected by desire.

It is even qua thus marked by finiteness that for us, as subjects of the unconscious, our lack can be desire, finite desire, indefinite in appearance, since the lack, always involving some void, can be filled in several ways at first, even though we know* very well because we are analysts, that we do not fill it in ninety-nine different ways. And we will see why and which ones.

What I would call the classical, moralistic, not so much the theological, dimension of the infinity of desire is in this perspective to be completely reduced. Because this pseudo-infinity depends on only one thing which luckily a certain part of the theory of the signifier, which is none other than that of whole numbers, allows us to image. This false infinity is linked to this sort of metonymy which, as regards the definition of integers, is called recurrence. It is quite simply the law that we have, I believe, powerfully accentuated last year in connection with the repetitive One. But what our experience (15) shows us - I will articulate it for you - is that in the different fields that are proposed to it, specifically and distinctly, the neurotic, the perverse, indeed the psychotic, is that this One to which there is reduced in the final analysis the succession of signifying elements, the fact that they are distinct and that they succeed one another does not exhaust the function of the Other. And this is what I am expressing here starting from this originating Other as locus of the signifier, of this still inexistent S which by situating itself as determined by the signifier, under the form of these two columns which are those under which as you know one can write down the operation of division.

O S $ o Other's side		S ø my side
-----------------------------------	--	---------------------------

With respect to this Other, depending on this Other, the subject is inscribed as a quotient, he is marked by the unary trait of the signifier in the field of the Other. Well, it is not for all that, as I might say, that he cuts the Other into slices. There is a remainder in the sense of division, a residue. This remainder, this final other, this irrational, this proof and sole guarantee when all is said and done of the otherness of the Other, is the o. And this is why the two terms, f and Q, the subject as marked by the bar of the signifier, the little object o as residue of the putting into condition, if I can express myself in this way, of the Other, are on the same side, both on the objective side of the bar, both on the side of the Other. The phantasy, the support of my desire, is in its totality on the side of the Other, $ and Q. What is on my side now, is precisely what constitutes me as unconscious, namely j>, the Other in so far as I do not reach it.

Am I going to lead you any further here? No, because I have run out of time. And in order not to leave you on a point which is so closed off as regards the continuation of the dialectic which is going to be inserted into it and which, as you will see, requires that the next step that I have to explain to you is what I am committing to the affair, namely that in the subsistence of the phantasy I will image the sense of what I have to produce with a reminder of an experience which I think will be for you - God knows in what is most interesting for you, I am not the one who said it, it is Freud -: of some use in the experience of love.

(16) I want to point out to you, at the point that we are at, that in this theory of desire in its relationship to the Other you have the following key: the fact is that, contrary to the hope that the Hegelian perspective may give you, the mode of the conquest of the other, is the one, alas, too often adopted by one of the partners: "I love you, even if you don't want it". You must not believe that Hegel did not glimpse this prolongation of his doctrine. There is a very precious little note where he indicates that he could have made his whole dialectic pass along this path. It is the same note where he says that, if he did not take this path, it is because it seemed to him to lack seriousness. How right he was! Try it out. Let me know how successful it is! There is nevertheless another formula which if it does not demonstrate any better its effectiveness, it is perhaps only because it is not articulatable, but that does not mean that it is not articulated. It is "I desire you, even if I do not know it". Wherever it succeeds, however inarticulatable it may be, in making itself heard, this one, I assure you is irresistible. And why? I will not leave this as a riddle for you. If this were sayable, what would I be saying by it? I would be saying to the other that, desiring him without knowing it of course, still without knowing it, I take him as the object unknown to myself of my desire, namely in our conception of desire that I identify him, that I identify you, you to whom I am speaking, you yourself, to the object which is lacking to yourself, namely that by this circuit that I have to take to reach the object of my desire, I accomplish precisely for him what he is looking for. It is indeed in this way that innocently or not, if I take this detour, the other as such, object here - you should note - of my love, will fall necessarily into my toils. I will leave you on this, on this recipe, and I will see you the next time.

Seminar 3 : Wednesday 28 November 1962

You will have noticed that I am always happy to latch onto some current event in our dialogue.

When all is said and done, there is nothing except what is current, that is why it is so difficult to live in what we could call the ;orld of reflection. It is because in truth not much happens there. I sometimes inconvenience myself to see if somewhere some little question mark is not appearing somewhere. I am rarely rewarded. That is why people pose me serious questions; well then, you will not blame me for taking advantage of it.

So I continue my dialogue with the person to whom I already alluded twice in my preceding seminars, in connection with the fashion, which I punctuated the last time, regarding the difference there is between the conception of the Hegelian articulation of desire and mine. I am being urged to say more about what is textually designated as a beyond to be accomplished in my own discourse, a more precise articulation between the mirror stage and, as the Rome report puts it, between the specular image and the signifier. Let us add that some hiatus (2) seems to remain there, not without my interlocutor glimpsing that perhaps here the use of the word hiatus, cut or split, is nothing other than the expected response. Nevertheless under this form, it might appear to be what it would be in effect: an eluding, or an elision. And that is why I will try quite willingly today to respond to him, and this all the more because we find ourselves there strictly on .the path of what I have to describe for you this year concerning anxiety: anxiety is what is going to allow us to go over again, I am saying go over again the articulation thus required of me. I say go over again because those who have followed me these last years and even without necessarily having been assiduous here at every point, those who have read what I wrote, have already more or less the elements to fill our, to make this cut, this hiatus function, as you are going to see from the few reminders with which I am going to begin.

In truth, I do not believe that there ever were two phases in what I taught: one phase which is supposed to be centred on the mirror stage, on something highlighted in the imaginary, and then after, with this moment of our history that is located by the Rome report, the discovery which I suddenly made of the signifier. In a text which I believe is no longer easy to get hold of but which can after all be found in any good psychiatric library, a text which appeared in L'évolution psychiatrique called Propos sur la causalité psychique, a discourse which takes us back, if I remember correctly, to just after the war in 1946, I would ask those who are interested in the question which is thus posed to me to consult it; they will see there things which will prove to them that it is not just now that the interplay between these two registers was closely woven by me.

In truth if this discourse was followed by a rather long silence, let us say that this should not astonish you too much. There was a road to travel afterwards to open a certain number of ears to this discourse, and you must not believe that at the time when - if that interests you, re-read these "Propos sur la causalité psychique" - that at the time when I made these remarks that it was easy to find ears to understand them.

(3) In truth, since it was at Bonneval that these Remarks were made and that a more recent meeting at Bonneval manifested to a certain number the distance that had been travelled since, you should be aware that the reactions to these first Remarks were rather astonishing. The modest term of ambivalence which we make use of in the analytic milieu, is the best way to characterise the reactions which I recorded to these Remarks, and even, because I am going to be queried about this subject, I do not find it absolutely useless to note that at a time, which a certain number of you were already sufficiently formed to remember, that at a time which was the time after the war and of some movement of renewal or other that one might have hoped from it and, I cannot help remembering all of a sudden, when I am brought back to that epoch, the fact indeed that those who were certainly not individually the least disposed to hear a discourse which was very new then, who were the people situated somewhere indeed that is called politically on the left, and even the extreme left, the Communists in fact to call them by their name, very specially demonstrated on this occasion the sort of thing, this reaction, this mode, this style, which I must pinpoint with a term that is in current use, which one should pause for a moment before putting forward - it is a very unjust term with respect to those who invoked it originally, but it is a term which ended up by taking on a meaning which is unambiguous, we will perhaps have to come back to it in what follows, I am employing it here in the courtly sense - it is the term of Pharisaism.

I would say that on that occasion, in this little glass of water which is our psychiatric milieu, Communist Pharisaism really operated flat out in the sense of what we saw being used for at least our present generation here in France, namely to ensure the permanence of this body of good or bad habits in which a certain established order finds comfort and security. In short, I cannot but bear witness to the fact that it was from the very special reservations that they showed, that I understood at that time that my discourse would take a long time to make itself heard. Hence the silence in question and the work that I have put in by devoting myself to making it penetrate simply the milieu whose experience rendered it most apt to hear it, namely the analytic (4) milieu. I will spare you the adventures that followed.

But this may make you re-read the Propos sur la causalité psychique. You will see, especially after what I told you today, that already the framework existed in which each one of the two perspectives that my interlocutor quite rightly distinguishes, was inscribed. These two perspectives are punctuated here by these two coloured lines, the vertical one in blue, the horizontal one in red - which the sign (I) of the imaginary and (S) of the symbolic respectively designate here.

There are many ways of reminding you that the articulation of the subject to the small other and the articulation of the subject to the big Other do not exist separately in what I am demonstrating to you. There is more than one way of showing it to you. I am going to remind you a certain number of moments which have already been illuminated, punctuated as essential in my discourse. I point out to you that what you see here on my blackboard, in the other lines that have been drawn, - you are going to see the elements involved being placed - is nothing other than a schema already published in the remarks that I thought I should make on the report of Daniel Lagache at Royaumont. And this drawing in which there is articulated something which has the closest relationship with our subject, namely the function of dependency of what - taking it from this report of Daniel Lagache but also from a previous discourse that I had given here in the second year of my seminar - of what I called respectively the ideal ego and the ego-ideal, yes, let us recall then how the specular relationship is inserted, finds itself therefore taking its place, finds itself depending on the fact that the subject is constituted in the locus of the Other. He constitutes himself from his mark in relationship to the signifier. Already, simply in the little exemplary image from which the demonstration of the mirror stage begins, in this so-called jubilatory moment when the infant assumes himself as a functioning totality as such in his specular image, have I not always recalled the essential relationship to this moment, of this movement which ensures that the little child who has just grasped himself in this inaugural experience of recognition in the mirror, turns back towards the one who is carrying him, who is supporting him, who sustains him, who is there behind him, towards the adult - turns back in a movement that is really so (5) frequent, I would say, so constant that each and every one of you, I think, may have the memory of this movement - turns back towards the one who is carrying him, towards the adult, towards the one who here represents the big Other, as if to call in a way on his assent to what at this moment the child, the content of whose experience we are trying to assume, the sense of which moment we reconstruct in the mirror stage by referring it to this movement of the rotation (mutation) of the head which turns back and which returns towards the image, seems to demand of him to ratify the value of this image. Of course this is only an indication that I am recalling to you, given the inaugural link between this relationship to the big Other and the advent of the function of the specular image thus noted as always by i(o). But do we have to remain at that? And, since it is within a work which I had asked of my interlocutor concerning the doubts which had come to him in connection specifically with what Claude Lévi-Strauss had put forward in his book La pensée sauvage, whose relation as you will see is really - I referred above to current events - close to what we have to say this year, for, I believe, what we have to tackle here, in order to mark this sort of progress which the usage of psychoanalytic reasoning constitutes, is something which happens to respond precisely to this gap where more than one of you for the moment have come to a halt, the one which throughout his development Claude Lévi-Strauss shows in this sort of opposition between what he calls analytic reasoning and dialectic reasoning.

And it is indeed in fact around this opposition that I would finally like to establish, at the present time, the following introductory remark which I have to make to you on my path today: what have I picked out, extracted, from the inaugural step constituted in the thinking of Freud by The interpretation of dreams if not the following - which I remind you of, which I stressed - that Freud first introduces the unconscious in connection with the dream precisely as a locus that he called eine anderer Schauplatz, a different scene of action (scène)? From the beginning, from the coming into play of the function of the unconscious, this term and this function are introduced into it as essential.

(6) Well then, I believe in effect that this is a constituting mode of what is, let us say, our reason, of this path that we are looking for to discern its structures, to make you understand what I am going to say to you. Let us say without further ado - it will be necessary to come back to it, because we do not yet know what it means - what the first phase is. The first phase, is: there is the world. And let us say that analytic reason, to which the discourse of Claude Lévi-Strauss tends to give the primacy, concerns this world as it is and grants it with this primacy a singular homogeneity, which is indeed what offends and disturbs the most lucid among you, who cannot help pointing out, discerning what this involves in terms of a return to what one could call a sort of primary materialism in the whole measure that at the limit, in this discourse; the very operation of the structure, of the combinatory, so powerfully articulated by the discourse of Claude Lévi-Strauss only rejoins for example the very structure of the brain, indeed the structure of matter, only represents, in accordance with the form described as the materialism of the eighteenth century, the doublet, not even the understudy (doublure). I know well that this is only a perspective at the limit that we can grasp, but that it is worthwhile grasping it since it is in a way expressly articulated.

Now the dimension of the stage (scène), its separation from the locus, whether worldly or not, cosmic or not, where the spectator is, is there indeed to image to our eyes the radical distinction between this locus where things, be they the things of the world, where all the things of the world come to be spoken, to be staged in accordance with the laws of the signifier which we cannot in any way hold from the beginning to be homogeneous with the laws of the world. The existence of discourse and what ensures that we are implicated in it as subjects, is there only too obviously a long time before the advent of science, and the effort marvellous in its hopelessness that Claude Lévi-Strauss makes to homogenise the discourse that he calls that of magic with the discourse of science, is something which is admirably instructive, but which he cannot for a single moment push as far as the illusion that there is not here a moment, a cut, a difference; and I am going to emphasise in a little while what I mean by this and what we have to say about it.

(7) Therefore, first phase, the world. Second phase, the stage upon which we construct this world. And this is the dimension of history. History has always this character of a staging. It is indeed in this respect that the discourse of Claude Lévi-Strauss, specifically in the chapter where he responds to Jean-Paul Sartre, the final development that Jean-Paul Sartre establishes to realise this operation which I called the last time putting history back between its shafts.

The limitation of the range of the historical game, the reminder that the time of history is to be distinguished from cosmic time, that dates themselves take on all of a sudden a different value whether they are called 21 December or 18 Brumaire, and that ix. is not even the same calendar that we are dealing with as the one that you tear the pages off every day. The proof is that these dates have for you a different meaning, that they are re-evoked, when it is necessary, like any other day of the calendar as giving them their mark, their characteristic, their style of difference or of repetition. So then, once the stage has taken priority, what happens, is that the whole world is placed on it, that with Descartes, one can say: "I advance onto the stage of the world", as he does, "masked", and that starting from there the question can be posed of what the world owes, what we have called at the beginning quite innocently the world, what the world owes to what has come down to it again from this stage. And that which everything that we have called the world in the course of history and whose residues are superimposed on one another, piled up without moreover the slightest worry about contradictions, and that which culture brings us as being the world, which is a piling up, which is a warehouse of unclaimed objects, of worlds which have succeeded one another and because they are incompatible live only too comfortably together within each one of us, a structure whose pregnancy and depth the particular field of our experience allows us to measure especially in that of the obsessional neurotic regarding whom Freud himself long ago remarked the degree to which these, these cosmic worlds, could co-exist in a fashion which apparently gives rise to no objections in him, while at the same time manifesting the greatest heterogeneity at a first approach, a first examination.

(8) In short, the putting into question of what the cosmic world is in the real is entirely legitimate, once we have referred to the stage. Is what we believe we have to deal with as world, not quite simply the accumulated remainders of what came down from the stage when - as I might put it - the stage was on tour? Well then, this reminder, this reminder is going to introduce to us a third remark, a third phase which I ought to recall to you as a prior discourse, and all the more, perhaps this time in an insistent way that it is not a phase, that I did not have enough time then to accentuate it. Because we are talking about a stage, we know what function precisely the theatre holds in the functioning of the myths which allow us analysts to think. I bring you back to Hamlet and to this crucial point which has already given rise to questions for a number of authors and more particularly for Rank who wrote on this point an article that was in every way, given the early period he produced it, an admirable article in every way, it is the attention that he drew to the function of the stage on the stage.

What does Hamlet, the Hamlet of Shakespeare, the Hamlet who is a stage character, what does Hamlet bring onto the stage with the players? No doubt the Mousetrap, the souriciere, with which, he tells us, he is going to lay hold of, to trap, the conscience of the king. But besides the fact that very strange things happen on it and in particular something which at the time, at the time when I was speaking to you at such length about Hamlet, I did not want to introduce to you because it would have oriented us towards a literature at bottom even more Hamletic - you know that this exists, that it exists to the point that there is enough of it to cover these walls - more Hamletic than psychoanalytic and that very strange things happen in it, including the following, namely that when this scene is mimed as a prologue before the players begin their speeches, well then, this does not seem to disturb the king much, even though nevertheless the presumed gestures of his crime are there pantomimed before him. On the contrary there is something very strange, it is the real overwhelming, the crisis of agitation which seizes Hamlet from a certain moment when there comes on the stage after a few speeches, when there comes the crucial moment, the one at which (9) the character named Lucianus or Luciano carries out, carries out his crime, on the one of the two characters who represents the king, the sham king (le roi de comedie), even though he had in his speech affirmed himself, assured himself as being the king in a certain dimension, as well as the one who represents his wife, his spouse; after the situation had been well established, all the authors who have paused at this scene, have remarked that the rig-out of the character is exactly, not that of the king whom it is a question of trapping, but of Hamlet himself, and that moreover it is indicated that this character is not the brother of the sham king, is not in a relationship with him which would be homologous to the one of the usurper who is in the tragedy in possession of Queen Gertrude, after having carried out the murder, but in a position homologous to the one Hamlet has to this character, that it is the nephew of the sham king.

What, when all is said and done, does Hamlet cause to be represented there on the stage? It is himself, carrying out the crime in question, this character whose desire, for reasons that I tried to articulate for you, cannot be roused to accomplish the will of the ghost, of the fantome of his father, this character attempts to embody something; and what it is a matter of embodying passes by way of his image which is really specular here, his image not in the situation, the mode of carrying out his vengeance, but of assuming first of all the crime that must be avenged.

Now what do we see? That it is insufficient, that it is all very well for him to be seized, after this sort of magic lantern effect, by what one can really in his remarks, in his style, in the quite ordinary fashion moreover that the actors bring this moment to life, by a genuine little attack of maniacal agitation, when he finds himself a moment later with his enemy within his reach, he can only articulate something which for every listener has always been indeed something that could not be experienced as other than an evasion behind a pretext, it is that undoubtedly, he catches his enemy at a moment that is too holy - the king is praying - for him to decide by striking him at that moment, to make him go directly to heaven.

I am not going to delay by translating all that this means, because here I must go further. I want to advance enough today (10) and point out to you that alongside this failure - I strongly articulated this second phase at that time, I showed you its whole import - it is in the measure that an identification of a quite different nature which I called identification with Ophelia, it is in the measure that the furious soul that we can legitimately infer to be that of the victim, of the person who committed suicide, obviously offered as a sacrifice to the manes of her father - because it is after the murder of her father that she weakens, that she succumbs, but this shows us the age-old beliefs about the consequences of certain kinds of death from the very fact that the funeral ceremonies in her case, cannot be fully carried out - that there is no calming in the vengeance that she for her part is crying out for, that it is at the moment of the revelation of what this neglected, unrecognised object had been for him, that we see there being played out in Shakespeare in a completely open way this identification to the object that Freud designates for us as being the major mainspring of the function of mourning, this implacable definition, I would say, that Freud gave to mourning, this sort of reverse side that he designated to the tears which are consecrated to it, this ground of reproach that there is in the fact that all one wants of the reality of the one whom one has lost, is to want to remember the sorrow that he has left behind. What astonishing cruelty and one well made to remind us of the legitimacy of more primitive celebrations that collective practices still are able to bring to life. Why not rejoice at the fact that he existed? The peasants whom we think are drowning an injurious insensibility in their banquets, are doing something quite different: it is the advent of the one who has been to the sort of simple glory that he merits, because of having been among us simply a living being. Let us not forget that this identification to the object of mourning that Freud has thus dedicated under its negative modes, has, if it exists, also its positive phase, that the entry into Hamlet of what I called here the fury of the feminine soul, is what gives him the energy to become, from then on, this sleepwalker who accepts everything, up to and including - I sufficiently marked it - being the one who holds the stakes in the fight, who takes the side of his enemy, the king himself, against his specular image who is Laertes. From then on, things will be settled all by themselves and without him doing in short (11) anything except exactly what should not be done, by leading him to what he has to do, namely that he should be himself mortally wounded, before killing the king. We have here, the distance, the difference that exists between two sorts of imaginary identification: 1) that of o:i(o), the specular image as it is given to us at the moment of the stage on the stage: 2) the more mysterious one whose enigma begins to be developed there, namely to something else, the object, the object of desire as such, designated without any ambiguity in Shakespeare's articulation as such because it is precisely as object of desire that it had been neglected up to a certain moment, that it is reintegrated on the stage by way of identification, precisely in the measure that as object it has just disappeared, that as one might say the retroactive dimension, this dimension of the imperfect in the ambiguous form that it is used in French, which is the one which gives its energy to the fashion in which I repeat before you the "il ne savait pas", which means: at the last minute did he not know, a little more and he would have known. This object of desire of which it is not for nothing that desire in French is said to be desiderium, namely this retroactive recognition, this object which was there, it is along this path that there is placed the return of Hamlet, that which is the high point of his destiny, of his function as Hamlet, if I can express myself thus, of his Hamletic completion, it is here that this third moment of reference to my previous discourse shows us where the questioning should be carried to, as you already know for a long time, because it is the same one that I am always renewing from multiple angles: the status of the object qua object of desire. Everything that Claude Lévi-Strauss says about the function of magic, about the function of myth, has its value on condition that we know that it is a matter of the relationship to this object which has the status of object of desire, a status which - I agree - is not yet established, which it is our object this year to make advance by taking the path of approaching it through anxiety and that it would be well all the same not to confuse this object of desire with the object defined by epistemology as the advent of a certain object scientifically defined as the advent of the object which is the object of our science, very specifically defined, by a certain discovery of the (12) efficacy of the signifying operation as such, which is proper to our science - I am speaking about the science which exists among us for two centuries - leaves open the question of what I called above the cosmism of the object.

It is not sure that there is a cosmos and our science advances in the measure that it renounces preserving any cosmic or cosmising presupposition. We rediscover here this essential reference point, one which is so essential that one cannot fail to be astonished that in restoring under a modern form a type of permanence, of perpetuity, of the eternity of the cosmism of the reality of the object, Claude Lévi-Strauss, in La pensée sauvage does not bring to everybody the kind of security, of serenity, of Epicurean pacification which ought to result from it. The question is posed of whether it is only analysts who are not satisfied or whether it is everybody. Now I claim, even though I do not yet have proof of it, that it should be everybody. It is a matter of explaining why, why people are not content to see totemism suddenly, as one might say, emptied of what I might call in a gross way in order to make myself understood its emotional content, why are people not satisfied that the world should, since the Neolithic era - because one cannot go back any further than that - already be ordered in such a way that everything is only an insignificant little wave on the surface of that order, in other words, why do we want so much to preserve the dimension of anxiety. There must be some reason for that; because the bias, the passage which is here designated for us between this return to an assured cosmism and on the other hand the maintenance of an historical pathos which we do not hold with either all that much - even though it has precisely its function - it is indeed through the study of the function of anxiety that this path we are seeking must pass. And that is why I am led to remind you of the terms in which it can be seen how the specular relationship is precisely linked to the relationship with the big Other. In this article which I asked you to refer to, because I am not going to redo it here in its entirety, what the apparatus, the little image which I fomented to make understood what was involved, what this apparatus is designed for, is the following: it is to remind us of something I stressed at the end of my seminar on desire, it is that the function of specular cathexis is to be conceived of as situated within the dialectic of (13) narcissism as Freud introduced it.

This cathexis of the specular image is a fundamental moment of the imaginary relationship, fundamental in the fact that there is a limit and the fact is that the whole of libidinal cathexis does not pass through the specular image. There is a remainder. I already tried and, I hope, succeeded sufficiently in making you conceive how and why we can characterise this remainder under a central, pivotal mode, in this whole dialectic - and it is here that I will begin again the next time and show you how this function is more privileged than I have been able to make it up to now - under the mode, I am saying, of the phallus.

And that means that henceforth, in any imaginary mapping out, the phallus appears in the form of a lack, of a (-$>)• In the whole measure that there is realised at i(o) something that I called the real image, the constitution in the material of the subject of the image of the body functioning as properly imaginary, that is to say libidinised, the phallus appears as a minus, appears as a blank. The phallus no doubt is an operational reserve, but one which is not only not represented at the level of the imaginary but which is circumscribed and, in a word, cut out of the specular image.

Everything that I tried, last year, to articulate for you about the cross-cap is, to add a hinge to this dialectic, something which, in the ambiguous domain of topology, in so far as it slims down in an extreme way the data of the imaginary, in so far as it operates on a sort of trans-space which, when all is said and done, everything makes us think is made up of the worst signifying articulation, while at the same time still leaving within our reach some intuitive elements, precisely those supported by this misshapen and nevertheless very expressive image of the cross-cap which I manipulated before you for more than a month in order to make you conceive how on a surface defined in this way such as this one - I am not going to recall it here - the cut can establish two pieces, two different pieces, one which may have a specular image and the other which literally does not have one. The relation between this reservation, this reservation which is imaginarily ungraspable, even though it is linked, thank God, to a still perfectly graspable organ, namely (14) that of the instrument which ought all the same from time to time be brought into action for the satisfaction of desire, the phallus, the relationship between this (-<p) and the constitution of o which is this remainder, this residue, this object whose status escapes from the status of the object derived from the specular image, escapes from the laws of the transcendental aesthetic, this object whose status is so difficult for us to articulate that it is through it that there have entered all the confusions of analytic theory, this object o whose constituting characteristics we have only begun to outline and which we bring here onto the agenda, this object o, is the one which is at stake everywhere Freud speaks about object when anxiety is involved. The ambiguity comes from the way in which we cannot but imagine this object in the specular register. It is a matter precisely of establishing here - and we will do it, we are able to do it - to establish another mode of imaginisation, if I can express myself in this way, in which this object is defined. This is what we are going to be able to do, if you want to follow me, namely step by step. From what, in this article that I am speaking to you about, do I make the dialectic begin? From an S, the subject as possible, the subject because one must at least speak about him if one speaks, the subject whose model is given to us by the classical conception of the subject on this single condition that we limit him to the fact that he speaks, and, once he speaks, something is produced.

Once he begins to speak, the unary trait comes into play. The primary identification at this starting point constituted by the fact of being able to say one and one, and one again, and one again and that it is always from a one that one must begin, it is starting from there - the schema of the article in question outlines it - starting from there that there is established the possibility of the recognition as such of the unit called $i(o)$. This $i(o)$ is given in specular experience; but as I told you, this specular experience is authenticated by the Other and as such, at the level of the sign $i(o)$. Remember my schema, I cannot here give you again the terms of the amusing little physics experiment which I made use of to be able to image it for you: $i'(o)$ which is the virtual image of a real image, at the level of this virtual image, nothing appears here.

(15) I wrote ($-$>$) because we will have to bring it here the next time. ($-$>$) is no more visible, is no more tangible, is no more presentifiable here than it is there, ($-\<p$) has not entered into the imaginary. The initial, inaugural fate, the phase - I insist - of which we are speaking depends here on the following - which will have to wait for the next time for me to articulate it for you - that desire depends on the relationship that I gave you as being that of the phantasy, the diamond, with its meaning that we will learn how to read in a still different way soon, o: o

This means that it would be in the measure that the subject could really be - and not through the mediation of the other - at the place of I that he would have a relationship with what it is a matter of taking in the body of the original specular image $i(o)$, namely the object of his desire, here, these two pillars, are the support of the function of desire, and if desire exists and sustains man in his existence as man, it is in the measure that this relationship is accessible by some detour, that the artifices give us access to the imaginary relationship that the phantasy constitutes. But this is in no way possible in an effective fashion. What man is confronted with, is never anything but the image of what in my schema I represented - as you know or as you do not know - by $i'(o)$ that the illusion of this spherical mirror produces; here in the real state, in the form of the real image, he has its virtual image with nothing in its body [neck?]. The o, support of desire in the phantasy, is not visible in what constitutes, for man, the image of his desire.

This presence elsewhere therefore, on this hither side, and, as you see here, too close to him to be seen, as one might say, of the o, this is the initium of desire; and it is from that that the image $i'(o)$ takes on its prestige. But the more man approaches, circumscribes, caresses what he believes to be the object of his desire, the more in fact he is deviated, turned aside from it, precisely because of the fact that everything that he does on this path in order to get closer to it, always gives more body to what in the object of this desire represents the specular image. The further he goes, the more he wants, in the object of his desire, to preserve, to maintain - listen carefully to what I am telling you - to protect - this is the intact aspect of this primordial vase which the specular image is - the more he (16) engages himself on this path which is often incorrectly called the path of the perfection of object relations, the more he is deceived.

What constitutes anxiety, is when something, a mechanism, makes there appear here at what I would call to make myself understood simply its natural place, at the place which corresponds to the one occupied by the o the object of desire, something - and when I say something, you should understand anything whatsoever - I would ask you, between now and the next time, to take the trouble, with this introduction that I am giving you to it to reread the article on the Unheimlich. It is an article which I have never heard anyone giving a commentary on, never, never heard a commentary on, and which no-one seems even to glimpse as being the absolutely indispensable hinge for approaching the question of anxiety.

Just as I approached the unconscious by the witticism, I will approach anxiety this year by the Unheimlich, it is what appears at this place. This is why I have written it for you from today: it is the (-9), the something which reminds us that what everything starts from is imaginary castration, that there is no - and for good reason - image of lack. When something appears there, it is because, if I can express myself in this way, that the lack is lacking. Now this may appear to be simply a joke, a concetti (?) which is well placed in my style which everyone knows is Gongoric. Well, I don't give a damn. I would just like to point out to you that many things can appear which are anomalous, this is not what makes us anxious. But if all of a sudden all norms are lacking, namely what constitutes the lack - because the norm is correlative to the idea of lack - if all of a sudden it is not lacking - and believe me try to apply that to a lot of things - it is at that moment that anxiety begins.

So that already I authorise you to take up again the reading of what Freud says in his last great article on anxiety, that of Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety, from which we have already begun for a first outline. Then with this key, you will see the true sense to be given, in his writing, to the term of loss of object. It is here that I will take things up again the next time, and where I hope to give its true sense to our research for this year.

So then, I am again putting on the blackboard for you this figure, this schema by means of which I engaged myself with you the last time in the articulation of what is our object, namely through anxiety - I am saying its phenomenon, but also by the place that I am going to teach you to designate as being its own - to go thoroughly into the function of the object in analytic experience.

Briefly I want to point out to you that there will soon appear something that I took the trouble to write up from an intervention, from a communication I made - it is more than two years ago now, it was the 21st of September 1960 - at a Hegelian meeting at Royaumont, at which I had chosen to treat of the following subject: "Subversion of the subject and dialectic of desire in the Freudian unconscious". I point out to those who have already familiarised themselves with my teaching that in sum I think they will find there complete satisfaction as regards the phases of construction and the utilisation, the functioning, of (2) what together we have called the graph. This is published at a centre at 173 Boulevard, Saint Germain and which is responsible for publishing all the work of Royaumont. I think that this work will soon appear in a volume which will also include the other interventions - which are not all especially analytic - which were made in the course of this meeting centred, I repeat, on Hegelianism.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 5 December 1962

It is appropriate to mention this today in the measure that subversion of the subject, like dialectic of desire, is what frames for us this function of the object into which we are now going to have to advance more deeply.

In this respect, especially for those who come here as novices, I do not think that I could encounter in any way what I have to call the very antipathetic reaction that I still remember greeted the work of this title, as I told you, at the Royaumont Congress on the part, to my astonishment, of philosophers whom I believe more hardened to welcoming the unusual and who undoubtedly in something which was precisely constructed to put before them very profoundly the function of the object - and specifically the object of desire - ended up on their part with an impression that I cannot qualify otherwise than in the way they described it themselves: that of a sort of nightmare, indeed even of a lucubration emerging from a certain diabolism.

Does it not appear all the same that everything in an experience that I would call modern, an experience at the level of what there is brought in terms of profound modifications in the apprehension of the object, by the era, that I am not the first to describe as the era of technique, should that not bring to you the idea that a discourse on the object must necessarily pass by way of complex relationships which do not permit us to accede to it except by way of profound chicanery? Can one not say that for example this module of object, so characteristic of what is given to us - I am speaking about the most external experience, I am not talking about analytic experience - this module of object which is called the spare part, is it not something which deserves to be dwelt on and something which brings a profoundly (3) new dimension to every noetic interrogation concerning our relationship to the object? For after all what is a spare part? What is its subsistence outside its eventual use with respect to a certain model which is functioning, but which can also moreover become obsolete, no longer be repeated as they say? After that what becomes of, what meaning has a spare part?

Why should this profile of a certain enigmatic relationship to the object not be of use to us today as an introduction, as a reminder of something which is not a vain complication, that there is no need for us to be astonished or to steel ourselves against a schema, against a schema like this one which I recalled for you and already introduced the last time, and that the result is that it is at that place, at the place where in the Other, at the locus of the Other, authenticated by the Other, there is profiled an image of ourselves that is simply reflected, already problematic, even fallacious; that it is at a place that is situated with respect to an image which is characterised by a lack, by the fact that what is called for there cannot appear there, that there is profoundly orientated and polarised the function of this image itself, that desire is there, not simply veiled, but essentially placed in relation to an absence, to a possibility of appearing determined by a presence which is elsewhere and determines it more closely, but, where it is, ungraspable by the subject, namely here, I indicated it, the o of the object, of the object which constitutes our question, of the object in the function that it fulfills in the phantasy at the place that something can appear. The last time I put this sign (-), in parentheses, pointing out to you that here there ought to be profiled a relationship with the libidinal reserve, with the something which is not projected, with the something which is not cathected at the level of the specular image, for the reason that it remains profoundly cathected, irreducible at the level of one's own body, at the level of primary narcissism, at the level of what is called erotism, at the level of an autistic jouissance, an aliment in short remaining there for what will intervene eventually as instrument in the relationship to the other, to the other constituted starting from this image of my fellow, this other who will profile with its form and its norms the image of the body in its seductive function on the one who is the sexual partner.

(4) Therefore you see there being established a relationship: what, as I told you the last time, can come to be distinguished at this place designated here by the (-jp), is anxiety, castration anxiety in its relationship to the Other. The question of this relationship to the Other is the one into which we are going to advance today. Let us say right away - you see, I am going straight to the nodal point - that everything that we know about this structure of the subject, about this dialectic of desire which is the one that we analysts have to articulate, something absolutely new, original about, we learned through what, along what path? Along the path of the experience of the neurotic. And what has Freud told us? It is that the final term that he arrived at in elaborating this experience, the term which he points out to us as being for him his destination, his end point, the unsurpassable term for him, is castration anxiety.

What does that mean? Is this term unsurpassable? What is meant by this stopping of the analytic dialectic on castration anxiety? Do you not already see, in the simple usage of the schema that I am using, there being outlined the way that I intend to lead you? It begins from a better articulation of this fact of experience, designated by Freud in the neurotic's coming to a halt before castration anxiety. The opening that I am proposing to you consists in the fact that the dialectic that I am showing you here allows to articulate: the fact is that it is not at all castration anxiety in itself which constitutes the final impasse of the neurotic; because the form, the form of castration, of castration in its imaginary structure, is already constructed here in the approach to the libidinised image of my fellow, it is constructed at the level of the breaking that is produced at some time because of a certain imaginary drama; and this - as you know - is what gives importance to the accidents of the scene which for that reason is described as traumatic. There are all sorts of variations, of possible anomalies, in this imaginary break which already indicate something in the material, that can be used for what? For another function which, for its part, gives its full sense to the term castration.

What the neurotic retreats from, is not castration, it is from making of his own castration what is-lacking to the Other, 0, it is from making of his castration something positive which is the (5) guarantee of this function of the Other. This Other which slips away in the indefinite putting off of significations, this Other which the subject no longer sees as anything but destiny, but a destiny which has no end, a destiny which loses itself in the sea of histories - and what are histories, if not an immense fiction - what can ensure a relationship of the subject to this universe of significations, if not that somewhere there is jouissance? He can only ensure this by means of a signifier, and this signifier is necessarily lacking. It is the topping up that the subject is called on to make at this missing place by a sign which we call on from his own castration.

Dedicating his castration to this guarantee of the Other is what the neurotic comes to a halt before; he comes to a halt before it for a reason that is in a way internal to analysis: the fact is that analysis brings him to this rendezvous. When all is said and done castration is nothing other than the moment of the interpretation of castration.

I have perhaps been quicker than I intended to be in my discourse this morning. In any case you see it indicated there that perhaps there is a possible way through, but of course we can only explore this possibility by going back to this very place at which imaginary castration functions, as I have just pointed out to you, in order to constitute properly speaking with all its rights what is called the castration complex.

It is therefore at the level of the putting in question of this castration complex that our whole concrete exploration of anxiety, this year, is going to allow us to study this possible way though, one all the more possible in that it has already been taken on several occasions. It is the study of the phenomenology of anxiety which is going to allow us to say how and why.

Anxiety, which we take in its minimal definition as a signal, a definition which even though it comes at the end of the progress of Freud's thinking is not what people believe, namely the result of an abandoning of the first positions of Freud which made of it the fruit of an energetic metabolism, neither an abandoning, nor even a new conquest; because at the time when Freud made of anxiety the transformation of the libido, there is already the indication that it could function as a signal. This would be (6) easy to show you in passing by consulting the text. I have too much to do, to bring up this year with you concerning anxiety, to become bogged down too long at the level of this explanation of text.

Anxiety, as I told you, is linked to everything that can appear at that place; and what assures us of this, is a phenomenon which because it has been accorded too little attention has meant that we have not arrived at a satisfying, unitary formulation of all the functions of anxiety in the field of our experience. This phenomenon, is Unheimlichkeit. I asked you to refer to Freud's text the last time, and for the same reasons; it is because I do not have the time to spell out this text with you again. Many of you, as I know, went at it right away, for which I thank them. The first thing which stands out in it even on a superficial reading, is the importance that Freud gives to linguistic analysis. If it were not everywhere obvious, this text would be enough just by itself to justify the importance that I give to the functions of the signifier in my commentary of Freud. The thing which will stand out secondly, when you read the way in which Freud introduces the notion of the unheimlich, the exploration of dictionaries concerning this word, is that the definition of unheimlich is to be un-heimlich. It is what is at the high-point of Heim, that is Unheim. And then since he has only to explain to us why it is like that, because it is very-obvious by simply reading the dictionaries, he does not delay any longer on it; he is like me today; he has to advance. Well then, for our conventions, for the clarity of our language, for what follows, this place designated here the last time, we are going to call by its name: this is what is called Heim. If you wish, let us say that if this word has a meaning in human experience, this is where the home of man is. Give to this word home (maison) all the resonances you wish, including the astrological ones. Man finds his home in a point situated in the Other beyond the image of which we are made and this place represents the absence where we are. Supposing - which happens - that it reveals itself for what it is: the presence elsewhere which constitutes this place as absence, then it is the queen of the game. It makes off with the image which supports it and the specular image becomes the image of the double with what it (7) brings in terms of a radical strangeness and, to employ terms which take on their signification by being opposed to the Hegelian terms, by making us appear as object by revealing to us the non-autonomy of the subject. Everything that Freud picked out as example in the Hoffmann texts which are at the heart of such an experience: the Sand-Man and his atrocious story in which one sees the subject rebounding from captivation to captivation before this form of image which properly speaking materializes the extremely reduced schema that I give you of it here, but the doll in question, which the hero of the story spies behind the window of the sorcerer who carries out some magical operation or other on her, is properly this image % '» in the operation of completing it by what is in the very form of the story absolutely distinguished, namely the eye. And the eye involved can only be that of the hero of the story. The theme of this eye which is to be stolen from him, is what gives the explanatory thread of the whole story.

It is significant of some embarrassment or other linked to the fact that it was the first time that the ploughshare entered onto this line of the revelation of subjective structure, that Freud gives us in a way this reference in an unpackaged way. He says: "read The Devil's Elixir". I cannot even tell you how complete it is, the degree to which it contains all the possible forms of the same mechanism in which there are made explicit all the incidences in which this function can be produced, in which there can be produced this unheimlich reaction. Obviously he does not go into it, he is in a way overcome by the luxuriance that is effectively presented by this short little novel which it is still not so easy to get a copy of, even though by the goodness of someone, I still do not know who, among those present I find I have one - and I thank you for it or at least I thank the person in question - on this lectern. It is very useful to have more than one copy at one's disposal.

On this point, Heim does not manifest itself simply, as you have always known, namely that desire is revealed as the desire of the Other, here desire in the Other, but I would say that my desire enters the den where it has been awaited from all eternity in the shape of the object that I am, in so far as it exiles me from my subjectivity by resolving of itself all the signifiers to which (8) this subjectivity is attached. Naturally that does not happen every day, and perhaps even it only happens in the tales of Hoffmann. In The Devil's Elixir it is quite clear. At every detour of this long and so tortuous truth, we understand from the note that Freud gives, which allows it to be understood that one loses oneself a little in it and even this "losing oneself in it" is part of the function of the labyrinth that must be brought to life. But it is clear that, even though everyone makes this detour, the subject only arrives at, only accedes to, his desire by substituting himself always for one of his own doubles.

It is not for nothing that Freud insists on the essential dimension which the field of fiction gives to our experience of the unheimlich. It is too fleeting in reality and fiction demonstrates it much better, produces it even in a more stable fashion because it is better articulated. It is a sort of ideal point, but one very precious for us, since, from that point on, we are going to be able to see the function of phantasy. This possibility, articulated repeatedly in a work like the Devil's Elixir, but locatable in so many other authors, of the major effect of fiction, this effect in the effective current of existence is what remains we can say at the state of phantasy. And what is phantasy taken from this angle if not - which we have some doubts about - ein Wunsch, a wish and even, like all wishes, rather naive. To express it rather humorously, I would say that S desire of o, the formula of the phantasy, can be translated, in this perspective, that the Other faints, swoons, I would say, before this object that I am, a deduction made from the fact that I see myself.

Here then, because I cannot avoid posing things like that in an apodictic way, and then afterwards you will see how it functions, I will tell you right away to declare my hand that the two phases in which I wrote the relationships of S to o by situating them differently with respect to the reflective function of O. With respect to this mirror O, these two fashions correspond exactly, to the fashion, to the redistribution of the terms of the

(9) might say to express myself very roughly to make myself understood - in their proper place: the o is there where it is, phantasy in the pervert and in the neurotic. Things are - as I

where the subject cannot see it, as you know, and the $ is at its place. That is why one can say that the perverse subject, while remaining unconscious of the way in which this functions, offers himself loyally to the jouissance of the Other. Only, we would never have known anything about it, if there were not neurotics for whom phantasy has absolutely not the same function. So that it is at the same time he who reveals it to you in its structure because of what he makes of it, but with what he makes of it, through what he makes of it, he screws you like he screws everybody else. Because, as I am going to explain to you, he makes use of this phantasy for very particular ends. This is what I already expressed before you on other occasions, by saying that what was believed to have been perceived as being a perversion under the neurosis, is simply what I am in the process of explaining to you, namely a phantasy entirely situated at the locus of the Other, the support taken upon something which, if one encounters it, is going to present itself as perversion.

Neurotics have perverse phantasies, and that is why analysts have racked their brains for a long time asking themselves what that means. It can be clearly seen all the same that it is not the same thing, that it does not function in the same way. Hence the question which is engendered and the confusions which multiply about the question of whether, for example a perversion is really a perversion, namely whether it does not function as a question which reduplicates the following: namely of what use the perverse phantasy is to the neurotic? Because there is all the same one thing that, starting from the position of the function that I have just set up before you of the phantasy, one must begin by saying, it is that this phantasy that the neurotic makes use of, that he organises at the moment that he makes use of it - there is indeed in effect something of the order of o which appears at the place of Heim, above the image that I designate for you, the locus of the appearance of anxiety - well then, there is something altogether striking which is that, precisely, this is what serves him best to defend himself against anxiety, to cover up the anxiety.

There is therefore - this can only be conceived naturally starting from presuppositions which I had to pose at first in their extreme form, but like every new discourse, you have to (10) judge it at the moment that it takes shape and see whether it covers (as I think you have no doubt) the functioning of experience - this object o which the neurotic puts into his phantasy, suits him, I would say, the way gaiters suit a rabbit. This indeed is why the neurotic never makes very much of his phantasy. It succeeds in protecting him against anxiety precisely in the measure that it is a false o. It is the function that I illustrated for you a long time ago of the dream of "the butcher's beautiful wife". The butcher's beautiful wife loves caviar; only she does not want it because this might give too much pleasure to her big brute of a husband who is capable of swallowing that with the rest, even that would not stop him. Now what interests the butcher's beautiful wife, is not at all of course to feed her husband with caviar, because, as I told you, he would add a whole menu to it, because he has a huge appetite, the butcher. The only thing that interests the butcher's beautiful wife is that her husband should want the little nothing that she holds in reserve.

This formula is quite clear when we are dealing with a hysteric; believe me today: it applies to all neurotics. This object of functioning in their phantasy, and which serves as a defense for them against their anxiety, is also, despite all appearances, the bait with which they hold onto the other. And thank God for it: it is to this that we owe psychoanalysis.

There was a lady named Anna O who knew something about the operation of the hysterical game and who presented her whole story, all her phantasies, to Messrs Breuer and Freud who precipitated themselves onto it like little fish into water. Freud on I no longer remember what page, 271, of Studien iiber Hysterie marvelled at the fact that in Anna O all the same there was not the slightest defense. She gave everything she had, just like that. There was no need to work very hard to have the whole package. Obviously he found himself before a generous form of hysterical functioning. And it was for that reason that Breuer, as you know, really felt it going down; because he, along with the formidable bait also swallowed the little nothing, and he spent some time trying to regurgitate it. He stayed well away from it in future.

(11) Luckily Freud was neurotic. And since he was both intelligent and courageous, he knew how to make use of his own anxiety about his desire - which was at the source of his ridiculous attachment to this impossible woman who as a matter of fact buried him called Madame Freud - and he knew how to make use of it to project onto the X-ray screen of his fidelity to this phantastical object, to recognise in it without blinking even for an instant what it was a question of doing, namely to understand what use all of this was and well and truly to admit that Anna O had perfectly in her sights, Freud himself, but that he was obviously a little bit harder to have than the other, Breuer. It is indeed to this that we owe our entry through phantasy into the mechanism of analysis and into a rational use of the transference.

It is perhaps also what is going to allow us to take the next step and to perceive that what constitutes the border between the neurotic and the others - a new leap whose passage I would ask you to note, since like the others we are going to have to justify it subsequently - what effectively functions in the neurotic, is that at this level already displaced for him, of the object is something which is already sufficiently explained by the fact that he was already able to transport the function of o into the other. The reality that exists behind this fallacious use of the object in the phantasy of the neurotic has a very simple name: it is the demand.

The true object the neurotic seeks is a demand: he wants a demand to be made of him, he wants to be begged. The only thing that he does not want is to pay the price. This is a gross experience which analysts have no doubt not sufficiently taken apart, illuminated by Freud's explanations, for them not to have believed it necessary to return here to the slippery slope of moralism and to deduce from it a phantasy which can be found everywhere in the oldest moralistic-religious preachings, that of oblativity.

They have obviously glimpsed that, since he wants to give nothing, this has a certain relationship also with the fact that his difficulty is in the order of receiving. He wants to be begged, I told you, and does not want to pay the price. While if he really wished to give something, perhaps it would work. Only, do the analysts in question, those who speak so beautifully about (12) genital maturity - as if this were the locus of the gift - not perceive that what the neurotic must be taught to give, is this thing that he does not imagine, it is nothing, it is precisely his anxiety. This is what leads us to our point of departure today designating the coming to a stop on castration anxiety. The neurotic will not give his anxiety. We will learn more about it: we will learn why. It is so true that this is what is involved, that all the same the whole process, the whole chain of analysis consists in the fact that at least he gives its equivalent, that he begins by giving his symptom a little. And this is why an analysis, as Freud says, begins by a putting into shape of symptoms. We are indeed at the required place and we try to catch him, God knows, in his own trap. You can never do anything other with someone. He makes you what is really a fallacious offer, well then one accepts it. By this one enters into the game through which he appeals to the demand. He wants you to demand something of him. Since you demand nothing of him - this is how the first entry into analysis takes place - he begins to modulate his own, his demands, which come there at the place Heim. And I tell you in passing: I find it hard to see, outside what is articulated almost by itself on this schema, how one has been able to justify up to now, except by a sort of false, gross comprehensibility, the dialectic of frustration-aggression-regression. It is in the measure that you leave the demand without an answer that there begins to be articulated here, that there begins to be produced what? The aggression involved. Where have you ever seen, except outside analysis in practices described as group psychotherapy that we have heard tell of, no aggression being produced? But on the contrary the dimension of aggressivity comes into play to put in question again what it aims at by its nature, namely the relationship to the specular image.

It is in the measure that the subject exhausts his rages against this image that there is produced this sequence of demands which goes always towards a more original demand historically speaking, and regression as such is modulated.

The point at which we arrive now and which also has never been explained up to now in a satisfactory fashion, is how it happens that it is along this regressive path that the subject is lead to a moment that we are indeed forced to situate historically as progressive. There are those who, placed before this paradox of how it is that by going back to the oral phase one separates out the phallic relationship, have tried to make us believe that after the regression one should retrace one's steps in the opposite direction, which is absolutely contrary to experience. There has never been an analysis, no matter how successful it is supposed to have been in the process of regression, which repassed through the opposite stages, which would be necessary if it were something like a genetic reconstruction that was involved. On the contrary it is in the measure that there are exhausted to the end, to the bottom of the barrel, all the forms of demand, including the zero demand, that we see appearing at the bottom the relation to castration.

Castration is found inscribed as a relation at the limit of this regressive cycle of demand. It appears there immediately afterwards and in the measure that the register of demand is exhausted. It is this that must be understood topologically.

I do not want to push things any further today. But all the same I will end with a remark which since it converges with the one on which I ended my last discourse will take your reflection in a direction which will facilitate for you the next step as I have just now highlighted it. And here again I am not going to delay on useless detours, I am going to take things right at the centre. In Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety, Freud tells us, or appears to tell us, that anxiety is the reaction, the signal-reaction to the loss of an object; he enumerates that of the all enveloping uterine milieu, which happens at birth, eventually that of the mother considered as object, that of the penis, that of object-love and that of the love of the super-ego.

Now what did I tell you the last time to put you already on a certain path that is essential to grasp, if not that anxiety is not the signal of a lack but of something that you must manage to conceive of at this redoubled level as being the absence of this (14) support of the lack. Well then, take up again Freud's very list that I take here arrested at its term in full flight, as I might say: do you not know that it is not nostalgia for what is called the maternal womb which engenders anxiety, it is its imminence, it is everything that announces to us something which will allow us to glimpse that we are going to re-enter it. What provokes anxiety? It is not, contrary to what is said, either the rhythm nor the alternation of the presence-absence of the mother. And what proves it, is that the infant takes pleasure in repeating this game of presence and absence: this possibility of absence, is what gives presence its security. What is most anxiety-provoking for the child, is that precisely this relation of lack on which he establishes himself, which makes him desire, this relation is all the more disturbed when there is no possibility of lack, when the mother is always on his back, and especially by wiping his bottom, the model of the demand, of the demand which cannot fail. And at a higher level at the following phase, that of the so-called loss of the penis, what is involved? What do we see at the beginning of little Hans' phobia?

The following, that what the accent is put on, what is not well centred, namely that anxiety is supposed to be linked to the interdiction by the mother of masturbatory practices, is experienced, perceived by the child as the presence of the desire of the mother being exercised towards him. What is anxiety in general in relation to the object of desire, what does experience teach us here, if not that it is temptation, not the loss of the object, but precisely the presence of the fact that objects are not lacking? And to pass to the following stage, that of the love of the super-ego with everything that it is supposed to pose along what is called the path of failure, what does that mean, if not that what is feared, is success, it is always the "it is not missing, ca ne manque pas"?

I will leave you today on this point designed to make you get around a confusion which precisely reposes entirely on the difficulty of identifying the object of desire. And it is not because it is difficult to identify that it is not there: it is there and its function is decisive for what concerns anxiety.

(15) You should consider that what I told you today is still only a preliminary way in, that the precise mode of situating it that we will go into from the next time is therefore to be situated between three themes that you have seen being outlined in my discourse today: one is the jouissance of the Other, the second the demand of the Other, the third could only be heard by the sharpest ears. It is the following, this sort of desire which manifests itself in interpretation, of which the very incidence of analysis in the treatment is the most exemplary and the most enigmatic form, the one which has made me pose the question for a long time for you: "In this essential economy of desire, what does this sort of privileged desire which I call the desire of the analyst represent?"

Seminar 5: Wednesday 12 December 1962

We have seen, we have read, we will see and read again that a certain way of teaching psychoanalysis, specifically the one that is pursued here, has a supposedly more philosophical character than another type which is supposed to try to connect up with a more concrete, more scientific, more experimental experience. It does not matter what word one uses.

It is not my fault, as they say, if psychoanalysis, on the theoretical plane, puts in question the desire to know, and therefore places itself, already places itself in its discourse on the hither side, in what precedes the moment of knowledge which just by itself would already justify this sort of putting in question which gives to our discourse, what we might call a certain philosophical hue.

For that matter moreover, I was preceded in this by the inventor of psychoanalysis himself who was indeed, as far as I know, someone who was at the level of a direct experience, that of patients, of mental patients, of those especially that are called with a greater rigour since Freud, neurotics.

But after all, this would not be a reason for remaining any longer than necessary on an epistemological questioning, if the place of desire, the way in which it hollows itself out (se creuse), was not at every instant - at every instant in our therapeutic position - presentified for us through a problem, which is the most concrete one of all, that of not allowing ourselves to engage on a false path, of not responding to it in the wrong way, of not responding inexactly to it, at least of considering recognised a certain goal that we pursue and which is not so clear. I remember having provoked indignation in the sort of colleague who knows on occasion how to barricade himself

(2) behind some bombast or other of fine sentiments designed to reassure someone or other, to have provoked indignation by saying that in analysis a cure only came in a way as a bonus.

This was seen as some sort of disdain for the one that we are responsible for, the person who is suffering. I was speaking from a methodological point of view. It is quite certain that our justification as well as our duty is to ameliorate the position of the subject. And I claim that nothing is more uncertain in the field that we are in than the concept of a cure.

Is an analysis which ends with the entry of the male or female patient into the third order a cure, even if the subject finds himself improved as regards his symptoms, and in a certain way, a certain order that he has reconquered enunciates the most express reservations about the ways, now seen by him as perverse, through which we have made him pass in order to make him enter the kingdom of heaven.

This happens. That is why I do not think I am deviating for a single instant from our experience. My discourse, very far from deviating from it, consists precisely in recalling that within our experience every question can be asked, and that it is necessary, precisely, for us to preserve in it the possibility of a certain thread which, at least for us, guarantees us that we are not cheating on what is our very instrument, namely the plane of truth.

This necessitates of course an exploration which must not only be serious, but I would say up to a certain point to be, not simply a....., but - what it can be - but to a certain degree, yes, encyclopedic.

It is not easy in a subject like anxiety to gather together in a discourse like mine this year what, let us say, for psychoanalysts ought to be functional, what they, ought not to forget for a single instant about what is important to us. We have designated on this little schema the place currently occupied by as the place of anxiety, as this place which I already designated as constituting a certain void, anxiety appearing there about everything which manifests itself at this place, to confuse us, as I might say, as regards the structuring function of this void.

The signs, as I might put it, the indices to be more exact, the import of this tautology will only have value if we can find them confirmed by some approach or other which has been given by (3) every serious study of the phenomenon of anxiety, whatever its presuppositions might be. Even if these presuppositions appear too narrow for us, should be situated within this radical experience which is ours, it remains that something has been well grasped at a certain level and even if the phenomenon of anxiety appears to us to be limited, distorted, insufficient in the light of our experience, we should at least try to learn why it is that way. Now it is not always that way. We have to harvest ctt any level whatsoever where there has been formulated up to the present the questioning about the subject of anxiety.

It is my intention today to indicate, because I am not able, of course, to add together something that would require a whole year of seminars, to add together what has been contributed in a certain number of types of questioning which are called - rightly or wrongly - for example the objective approach to the problem of anxiety, the experimental approach to the problem of anxiety.

And of course, we would only lose ourselves in these responses, if I had not given you at the beginning the lines of sight, the orientation points that we cannot abandon for a single moment in order to guarantee, to restrict our object, so that we can see what conditions it in the most radical, the most fundamental fashion. And it is for this reason that the last time, my discourse ended by circumscribing them, as one might say, with three reference points which I had of course only started on, to introduce three points where undoubtedly, the dimension of the Other remained dominant. Namely the demand of the Other, the jouissance of the Other and, in a quite modal form which remained moreover at the state of a question mark, the desire of the Other in so far as it is this desire which corresponds to our interrogation, I mean that of the analyst, of the analyst in so far as he intervenes as term.

We are not going to do what we reproach all the others with doing, namely elide ourselves from the text of the experience which interrogates us. The anxiety to which we have here to bring a formula, is an anxiety which responds to us, it is an anxiety that we provoke, it is an anxiety to which we have on occasion a determining relationship.

This dimension of the Other where we find our place, our efficacious place in so far precisely as we know how not to restrict it - which is the motive of the question that I am (4) posing, namely the measure in which our desire ought not to narrow it - this dimension of the Other, I would like to make you sense that it is not absent from any of the modes under which up to now an attempt has been made to circumscribe, to get closer to, this phenomenon of anxiety. And I would say that at the point of mental exercise that I have formed, habituated you to, perhaps indeed you may see the vanity in this sort of bombast, of vain success, of false triumph that some people find themselves taking in the fact that, for example, supposedly in opposition to analytic thinking - and again would it even be that, when all is said and done - neuroses are produced in animals in the laboratory, on the experimental bench. These neuroses, those which the Pavlovian laboratory, I mean Pavlov himself and those who followed him,, emphasised on occasion, what do they show us? We are told that in the text and the sequence of these experiments by which one conditions what is called one or other reflex of the animal, namely one or other "natural reaction" of one of these systems which are associated to a stimulus, to an excitation which forms part of a register presumed to be completely different from the one which is involved in the reaction, by a certain mode of making these conditioned reactions converge, we are going to take into account the effect of contrariety. Once we have already obtained, conditioned, produced one of these responses of the organism, we are going to put it in a position of responding at the same time in two opposed ways, generating as one might say a sort of organic perplexity.

To go further, we would even say that in certain cases we can, we have the idea that what we are obtaining is a sort of exhaustion of the possibilities of response, a sort of more fundamental disorder generated by their confusion, something which involves in a more radical fashion what one can call the ordinary field of the reaction involved, which is the objective expression of what can be interpreted in a more general perspective as defined by certain modes of reaction which are called instinctual. In short, to get to the point where the demand made on the function - it is something which has been theorised more recently and in different cultural areas, by the term stress - may end up, culminate in the sort of deficit which overwhelms the function itself, which involves the system in a way which modifies it, beyond the register of the functional response, which is more or less close, in the lasting traces that it engenders, to a lesional deficit.

(5) It would no doubt be important to highlight in this range of experimental interrogation, where, properly speaking, there is manifested something which reminds us among neurotic reactions of the form described as "anxiety ridden". There is nevertheless something which appears to be eluded in such a way of posing the problem of the experiment. Eluded in a way for which it is no doubt impossible to reproach the reporter of these experiments for eluding, because this elision is constitutive of the experiment itself. But for someone who has to connect this experiment to our experience, namely the one which happens with a speaking subject - this is the importance of this dimension in so far as I remind you of it - it is impossible not to notice the following, that however primitive may be the animal organism thus interrogated compared to that of the speaking subject - and these organisms are far from being primitive, from being distant from our own in the Pavlovian experiments, because they are dogs - the dimension of the Other is present in the experiment.

It is not today or yesterday that intervening for example during one of our scientific meetings on some phenomena which were brought to us - I cannot go over them again today - concerning the creation of experimental neurosis, I pointed out to the one who was communicating his researches, that his own presence in the experiment as a human person, manipulating a certain number of things around the animal, should at one or other moment of the experiment, be put in question, taken into account. When one knows how a dog behaves vis-a-vis the one who is called or who is not called his master, one knows that the dimension of the Other counts, in any case, for a dog. But even if it were not a dog, if it were a grasshopper or a leech, because of the fact that there is this collection of systems, the dimension of the Other is present. You will tell me: in a grasshopper or a leech, the organism undergoing the experiment, knows nothing about this dimension of the Other. I agree absolutely, and that is why my whole effort for a certain time was to demonstrate the extent of the level that in our case, as subjects, as we learn to manipulate, to determine this subject that we are, there is also a whole field where we know nothing about what constitutes us as field. And that the Selbstbewusstsein that I taught you to name, the subject who is presumed to know (le sujet suppose savoir), is a deceptive illusion. The Selbstbewusstsein considered as constitutive of a knowing subject is an illusion, (6) is a source of error. For the dimension of the subject supposedly transparent in his own act of knowing, only begins with the coming into play of a specified object which is the one that I am try to circumscribe in the mirror stage, namely, of the image of one's own body in so far as the subject in a jubilatory fashion has in effect the feeling of being before an object which makes him, the subject, transparent to himself.

The extension of this illusion, which in itself radically constitutes the illusion of consciousness, to every kind of knowledge is motivated by the fact that the object of knowledge will henceforth be constructed, modelled, on the image of this relationship to the specular image, and it is precisely why this object of knowledge is insufficient.

And if psychoanalysis did not exist, one would know it from the following: the fact is that there exist moments of the appearance of the object which throw us into a completely different dimension, a dimension which merits - since it is given by experience - to be detached as such as primal in experience, which is precisely the dimension of the strange, of something which can in no way allow itself to be grasped, as leaving before it the subject transparent to his knowledge.

Before this new thing, the subject literally vacillates and everything is put in question about the so-called primordial relation of the subject to every effect of knowledge.

This emergence of something in the field of the object, which poses its problem as being that of an irreducible structuring, as the emergence of an unknown as experienced, is not a question which is posed to analysts because since it is a given of experience it is all the same necessary to try to explain why children are afraid of the dark, and one sees at the same time that they are not always afraid of the dark, and then one does some psychology, the so-called experimenters engage precisely in theories about the effect of an inherited, ancestral, primordial reaction from a thinking - since it seems that it is always necessary to preserve the term thinking - from a thinking differently structured to logical, rational thinking. And people make constructions and invent things: this is how people start doing philosophy. Here we await those with whom we have on occasion to carry out the dialogue on the very terrain where this dialogue has to be judged, namely whether we for our part can account for it in a less hypothetical fashion.

(7) This form that I am giving you, which is conceivable, consists in grasping that if in the constitution of an object which is the object correlative of a first mode of approach, the one which begins from the recognition of our own form, and if this knowledge, limited in itself, allows there to escape something of this primitive cathexis to our being which is given by the fact of existing as body, is it not saying something which is not only reasonable but testable to say that it is this remainder, it is this non-imagined residue of the body which comes by some detour - and here we are able to designate this detour - to manifest itself here at this place provided for the lack, to manifest itself in this fashion and in a fashion since it is not specular becomes henceforth unlocatable: this lack of certain reference points is effectively a dimension of anxiety.

We would not be in disagreement then with the way in which Kurt Goldstein would approach this phenomenon for example. When he speaks to us about anxiety, he speaks about it very pertinently. How is the whole phenomenology of lesional phenomena, where Goldstein minutely pursues this experience which interests us, to be articulated if not from the prior remark that the organism in all its relational effects functions as a totality. There is not a single one of our muscles which is not involved when we nod our head, that every reaction to a situation implies the totality of the organic response; and if we follow it, we see emerging two terms closely woven with one another, the term of catastrophic reaction, and in its phenomenon, within the field of this catastrophic reaction, the mapping out as such of phenomena of anxiety.

I would ask you to consult the very accessible texts - since they have been translated into French - of Goldstein's analyses in order to locate there at once the degree to which these formulations are close to our own and the degree of clarity they would draw by being more expressly based on them. Because at every instant, if you follow the text with this key that I am bringing you, you will see the difference there is between the disorder reaction by which the subject responds to his inoperancy, to the fact of being confronted with a situation which is unsurmountable as such, no doubt because of his deficit on this occasion. It is after all a way which is not foreign to what can happen to even a non-deficient subject before a situation, a situation of unsurmountable danger. In order for the Hilflosigkeit reaction of anxiety to be produced as such, two conditions are always necessary, - you can see it in the concrete cases mentioned -: 1) that the deficient effect should be sufficiently limited for the subject to circumscribe it in the test that he is undergoing, and .that by reason of this limit the lacuna appears as such in the objective field. It is this emergence of lack in a positive form which is the source of anxiety, provided that: condition 2), which must not be omitted here, that it is under the effect of a demand, of a test organised by the fact that the subject has before him Goldstein or someone from his laboratory who subjects him to an organised test, that there is produced this field of lack and the question posed in this field, in these terms, that there is so little reason for omitting that when you know where and when to seek them, you will unfailingly find them, if there is need of it.

To jump to a completely different order, I would evoke here the most massive, unreconstituted, ancestral experience, rejected onto the obscurity of ancient times from which we are supposed to have escaped, a necessity which unites us with these ages which is still current and which very curiously we speak about only very rarely: it is that of the nightmare. One asks oneself why for some time, analysts interest themselves so little in the nightmare.

I introduce it here because it is going to be necessary all the same for us to remain on it this year for a certain time and I will tell you why. I will tell you why and where to find the material, because if there is already on this question an already established and very remarkable literature, to which you should refer, it is - however forgotten it may be on this point - it is namely Jones' book on the nightmare, a book of incomparable riches. I recall to you the fundamental phenomenology. I am not dreaming for a moment of eluding the principal dimension: the anxiety of the nightmare is experienced properly speaking as that of the jouissance of the Other. The correlative of the nightmare, is the incubus or the succubus, it is this being who weighs with his whole opaque weight of alien jouissance on your chest, who crushes you under his jouissance.

Well then, to introduce ourselves from this important angle into what the thematic of the nightmare will bring us, the first thing in any case which appears, which appears in the myth, but also in the phenomenology of the nightmare, of the nightmare as experienced, is that this being who weighs down by his jouissance is also a questioning being and even properly (9) speaking, one who manifests, deploys himself in this complete, developed dimension of the question as such which is called the riddle.

The sphinx, whose coming into play - do not forget - precedes the whole Oedipus drama, is a nightmare figure and a questioning figure at the same time. We will have to come back to it.

This question, giving the most primordial form of what I called the dimension of demand, the one - as you are going to see - that we usually call demand in the sense of a supposedly instinctual exigency is only then a reduced form of it. Here we are therefore brought back ourselves to a question which is articulated in the sense of interrogating once again, of coming back to the relationship of an experience which, in the usual sense of the term subject, can be called pre-subjective with the term of the question, of the question in its most well-shaped form, in the form of a signifier which proposes itself as opaque, which is the position of the riddle as such.

This brings us back to terms which I believe to be perfectly-articulated, I mean which enable you at every instant to put me back against my own wall, to account for definitions already proposed and to put them to the test of their usage. This signifier, as I told you at one turning point, is a trace, but an effaced trace. The signifier, as I told you at another turning point, is distinguished from the sign by the fact that the sign is what represents something for someone. But the signifier, as I told you, is what represents a subject for another signifier.

We are going to put this to the test again in the sense that concerning this object that is involved, namely our relationship, our anxiety-ridden relationship to some lost object - but which is surely not nevertheless lost for everyone - namely, as you see, as I will show you, where is it to be found again? Because of course, it is not enough to forget something for it not to continue to be there, only it is there where we no longer know how to recognise it. To find it again, it would be necessary to come back to the subject of the trace. For to give you terms designed to animate the interest of this research for you, I am going right away to give you two flashes on the subject of our most common experience.

(1) Does it not seem to you that there is an obvious correlation between what I am trying to outline for you and the phenomenology (10) of the hysterical symptom, the hysterical symptom, in the broadest sense? Let us not forget that there are not only little hysterias, there are also big ones: there are the anaesthetized, there are the paralyzed, there are the scotomized, there are narrowings of the field of vision. Anxiety only appears in hysteria exactly in the measure that these lacks are not seen.

(2) There is something which is not often glimpsed and even - I think I can say this - that you scarcely ever bring into play, it is something which explains a whole section of the behaviour of the obsessional.

I give you this key perhaps insufficiently explained since it is going to be necessary for me to bring you by a long detour - but I give you this term at the end of our path, among others, if only to interest you in this path - the obsessional, in his very particular way of dealing with the signifier, namely of putting it in doubt, of knowing how to polish it, to efface it, to triturate it, to break it into pieces, namely to behave with it like Lady Macbeth with this cursed spot of blood, the obsessional, taking a cul-de-sac no doubt, but one whose aim is not doubtful, operates, precisely in the sense of rediscovering under the signifier, the sign.

Ungeschehen machen: making the inscription of the story nul and void. It happened like that, but it is not sure. It is not sure because it is only signifier (du signifiant), that story is therefore a trick, and in this the obsessional is right; he has grasped something, he wants to go to the origin, to the previous step, to that of the sign that I am now going to try to make you travel in the opposite sense. It is not for nothing that I started today from our laboratory animals. After all, animals do not exist only in laboratories, one could open the door and see what they for their part do with traces.

It is not only men who have the property of effacing their traces, of operating with traces. One sees animals effacing their traces. One sees even complex behaviours which consist in covering a certain number of traces, with dejection, for example. It is well known among cats.

One part of animal behaviour consists in structuring a certain field of its Umwelt, of its environment, by traces which punctuate it, which define its limits. It is what is called the constitution of the territory. The hippopotami do that with their dejections and also with the produce of certain glands which are, if I remember rightly, peri-anal in their case. The (11) deer rubs his horns against the bark of certain trees, this also has the import of a mapping out of traces. I am not going to develop here the infinite variety of what a developed zoology can teach you about this.

What is important to me, is what I have to tell you concerning what I mean about the effacing of traces. The animal, as I told you, effaces his traces and makes false traces. Does he for all that make signifiers? There is one thing that the animal does not do: he does not make false traces in order to make us believe that they are false. He does not make falsely false traces, which is a behaviour, that I would not say is essentially human, but precisely essentially signifying. This is where the limit is. You understand that I mean traces made so that one believes them to be false and which are nevertheless the traces of my true passing, and this is what I mean by saying that here a subject is presentified. When a trace has been made in order that one should take it to be a false trace, then we know that there is a speaking subject as such, and we know then that there is a subject as cause and the very notion of cause has no other support than that.

We try afterwards to extend it to the universe, but the original cause is the cause as such of a trace which presents itself as empty, which wants to be taken for a false trace. And what does that mean? That means indissolubly that the subject where he is born addresses himself to what? He addresses himself to what I would briefly call the most radical form of the rationality of the Other. For this behaviour has no other possible import than to rank itself at the locus of the Other in the chain of signifiers, of signifiers which have or have not the same origin, but which constitute the only possible term of reference for the trace which has become signifying.

So that you grasp here that at the origin, what nourishes the emergence of the signifier, is an aiming at what the Other, the real Other does not know. The "he did not know" is rooted in an "he must not know". The signifier no doubt reveals the subject, but by effacing his trace.

First then there is an o, the object of the hunt, and an O in the interval of which the subject S appears, with the birth of the signifier, but as barred, as not-known (non-su) as such. (12) The whole subsequent mapping out of the subject reposes on the necessity of a reconquest of this original not-known.

Understand therefore here this something which already made appear to you the really radical relationship concerning the being to be reconquered of this subject and this grouping of o, of the object of the hunt, with this first appearance of the subject as not-known, which means unconscious, unbewusste justified by the philosophical tradition which confused the Bewusst of consciousness, with absolute knowledge and which cannot suffice for us, in so far as we know that this knowing and consciousness are not confused, but that Freud leaves open the question of where indeed the existence of this field defined as a field of consciousness comes from. And here after all I can claim that the mirror stage articulated as it is, contributes to this the beginnings of a solution. Because I well know how unsatisfied it can leave some spirits formed on Cartesian meditation. I think that this year we can take a further step which will make you grasp where the real origin, the original object of this system described as consciousness, is.

For we will not be satisfied to see the perspectives of consciousness being refuted until we know that it attaches itself to an isolatable object, to an object specified in the structure.

I indicated to you a little earlier the position of the neurotic in this dialectic. I do not intend to leave you in much suspense. To come back to it immediately, if you have been able to grasp the core of what is involved concerning the emergence of the signifier as such, this will enable us to understand immediately the slippery slope presented to us, concerning what happens in neurosis.

I mean that the demand of the neurotic, all the traps that analytic dialectic has gone into, come from the fact that there has been unrecognised in it the fundamental share of falseness that there is in this demand.

The existence of anxiety is linked to the fact that every demand, even the most archaic and the most primitive, always has something deceptive with respect to what preserves the place of desire, and this is what explains also the anxiety-ridden context of what gives a complete response to this false demand. This is what ensures that the mother who as I saw emerging, not so long ago, in the discourse of one of my patients, allowed absolutely no space between herself and her child up to a particular age, only gave to this demand a false response, a (13) really inexact response, since, if the demand is this something which is structured, in the way that I have told you, since the signifier is what it is, this demand is not to be taken literally: what the infant demands from his mother by this demand, is something which for him is designed to structure this presence-absence relationship which the original fort-da game structures and is a first exercise of mastery over.

But the total filling of a certain void which should be preserved which has nothing to do with either the positive or negative content of the demand, this is where there arises the disturbance in which anxiety is manifested.

But in order to grasp it, to see clearly its consequences, it seems to me that our algebra brings us here a ready-made instrument. If the demand comes here improperly at the place of what is eluded, o the object, this explains to you, on condition that you make use of my algebra - what is an algebra if not something very simple designed to make us achieve a mechanical state in its handling, without you having to understand something very complicated, and it is much better like that: I have always been told: in mathematics, it is enough for the algebra to be correctly constructed - if I taught you to write the drive, $ cut - we will come back to this cut and you have already begun to form a certain idea of it earlier; what it is a matter of cutting, is the elan of the hunter - $ cut of D, of the demand, if this is how I taught you to write the drive, this explains to you first of all why it is among neurotics that drives were described. It is in the whole measure that the phantasy $ 4 o presents itself in a privileged fashion, as in the neurotic, as |«D, in other words that it is a lure of the phantastical structure in the neurotic which allowed this first step called the drive to be made which Freud always and without any kind of wavering designated as Trieb, namely as something which has a history in German philosophical thought, which it is absolutely impossible to confuse with the term instinct.

As a result of this, even in the Standard Edition recently again and, if I remember rightly in the text of Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety, I find translated by "instinctual need", something which in the German text is called Bedürfnis. Why not translate (14) simply, if you wish, "Bedürfnis" by "need", which is a good translation from the German to the English? Why add this "instinctual" which is absolutely not in the text and which is enough to falsify the whole meaning of the sentence?

All of which immediately allows it to be grasped that a drive has nothing to do with an instinct - I have no objection to make to the definition of something that can be called instinct and even as it is called in the usual fashion, why not for example, describe in this way the needs that living beings have to feed themselves, for example.

Well then, yes, since it is the oral drive that is involved, does it not seem to you that the term of erotogeneity applied to what is called the oral drive is something which brings us right away to the problem: why is it only the mouth that is involved? And why not also the gastric secretions, because a little earlier, we were talking about Pavlov's dogs? And even why more especially if we look closely at it, up to a certain age, only the lips and, when that time has passed, what Homer called the enclosure of the teeth?

Do we not find there immediately, from the first properly speaking analytic approach to instinct, this line of breaking which I speak to you about as essential to this dialectic established by this reference to the other in the mirror the reference to which I thought I had brought you earlier - I did not find it in my papers - that I will give you the next time, in Hegel, in the Phenomenology of the spirit, where it is formally said that language is work, it is in this way that the subject makes his inside pass to the outside. And the sentence even is such that it is quite clear that this inside-out, as they say in English is really the metaphor of the glove turned inside out.

But if I gave to this reference the idea of a loss, it is in as much as something in it does not undergo this inversion, that at every stage a residue remains which is not invertible, nor signifiable in this articulated register. And we will not be astonished that these forms of the object appear to us under the form that is called partial; that has struck us enough for us to annotate it as such under the sectioned form, in which we are led to make intervene an object for example correlative to this oral drive.

This maternal nipple, the first phenomenology of which cannot fail to be admitted as that of a cut, riddled, breast, I mean something which is presented as having an artificial character. This indeed is what allows it to be replaced by any other kind (15) of soother which functions exactly in the same way in the economy of the oral drive.

If one wishes to make biological references - the references to need, of course are essential, it is not a matter of refusing them - but it is to see that the completely primitive structural difference introduces there the fact of ruptures, of cuts, introduces there immediately the signifying dialectic. Is there something here which is impenetrable to a conception that I would call everything that is most natural? The dimension of the signifier, what is it, if not, if you wish, an animal who in the hunt for his object is caught up in something such that the pursuit of this object must lead him onto another field of the trace where this pursuit itself as such no longer takes on anything but an introductory value.

The phantasy, the λ with respect to o , here takes on the signifying value of the entry of the subject into this something which is going to lead him to this indefinite chain of signifiers which are called destiny..

One can escape it indefinitely, namely that what it is going to be a matter of rediscovering, is precisely the start: how it got into this business of the signifier.

Now it is all the same clear that it is well worth the trouble to recognise how the first objects, those which were located in the structure of the drive, namely the one which I already named above, this cut breast, and then later, the demand to the mother being inverted into a demand of the mother, for this object, which one cannot otherwise see why it should be privileged, this object which is called the turd, namely something which also has a relationship with a zone which is called erogenous and regarding which it is all the same necessary to see that here also it is in so far as separated by a limit from the whole functional system that it is close to, and which is infinitely more vast among the excretory functions - why the anus, if it is not in its determining function as a sphincter, of something which contributes to the cutting of an object, and the object that is involved is the turd with everything that it can come to represent, not simply, as is said, the gift, but the identity with this object whose nature we are seeking - and this is what gives it its value, its accent.

And what am I saying against this, if not precisely to justify the eventual function which is given to it under the rubric of ((16) object relations in the evolution - I do not mean yesterday, but the day before yesterday - of analytic theory, except that it is altogether to falsify it to see in it a sort of model of the analysand's world in which a process of maturation would allow the progressive restoration of a reaction presumed to be total, authentic, while all that is involved is a scrap designating the only thing that is important, namely the place, the place of a void where there would come - as I will show you - to be situated, other much more interesting objects which you know moreover already, but that you do not know how to place.

For today only to preserve the place of this void, because moreover something in our project will not fail to evoke the existential and even the existentialist theory of anxiety, you can be sure that it is not by chance that one of those whom one can consider as one of the fathers, at least in the modern era, of the existential perspective, this Pascal whom we do not know too well why he fascinates us because if we believe the theoreticians of science he got everything wrong - infinitesimal calculus that he was, it appears, within an ace of discovering, I think rather that he did not give a damn about it, because there is something which interested him and this is why Pascal still touches us, even those among us who are absolute unbelievers - it is that Pascal, like the good Jansenist that he was, was interested in desire. And that is why, I tell you this in confidence, he carried out the experiments of Puy de Dome on the vacuum. Whether nature does or does not abhor a vacuum, was capital for him, because that signified the abhorrence of all the scholars of his time for desire. This vacuum is of absolutely no theoretical interest any longer. It has almost no meaning for us any longer. We know that in a vacuum, we know there can still be produced knots, fullnesses (des pleins), packets of waves, and anything you could wish. And for Pascal precisely, because, if not nature, the whole of thought up to then had a horror of the fact that there could be a vacuum anywhere, this is what is proposed to our attention, and to know whether, we also for our part do not yield from time to time to this horror.

What I am evoking for you here then is not metaphysics. I allowed myself to employ a term to which contemporary events have given a certain prominence for some years, I will speak rather of brain-washing.

What I intend to do is to teach you, by means of a method, to recognise, to recognise in the right place what presents itself in your experience; and of course the efficacy of what I am claiming to do can only be tested by experience.

Seminar 6: Wednesday 19 December 1962

And if sometimes people have objected to the presence at my teaching of certain people whom I have in analysis, after all the legitimacy of the co-existence of two relationships to me, the one in which I am heard and the one in which one makes oneself heard by me, can only be judged from within and in the measure that what I am teaching you here can effectively facilitate for each one - I mean in any case for someone who is working with me - an access to the recognition of his own path.

In this connection of course there is something, a limit, where external control stops, but undoubtedly it is not a bad sign, if it can be seen, that those who participate from these two positions will at least learn from them to read better.

Brain-washing, I have said, is indeed for me to submit myself to this control of recognising in the remarks of those that I analyse something different to what there is in the books. Inversely, for them, it is that to know how to recognise in passing in the books what is effectively in the books. And in this connection, I can only congratulate myself for example on a little sign, like this recent one, which came to me from the mouth of someone precisely whom I have in analysis, that in passing there did not escape him the import of a trait like this one that can be caught in passing in a book whose French translation has appeared recently - and how late it is - in a work by Ferenczi, namely this book whose original title is: Versuch einer Genitaltheorie, "Research" - very precisely - "into a theory of genitality", and not simply "About the origins of

(2) sexual life", as they have drowned it here, a book which undoubtedly cannot but be disturbing because of a certain aspect which I already highlighted long ago for those who know how to listen as having at times its share at times, but which, bringing with it all the same this enormous experience, allows there to be posited in its detours several traits which are precious for us, including the following to which I am sure the author himself does not give all the importance it merits precisely in his plan, in his research, by arriving at a too harmonious, a too all-englobing notion of what constitutes its object, namely, the genital perspective, realisation.

In passing, here is how he expresses himself: "The development of genital sexuality, cursorily described above in the male", he says - it is in effect what is involved in the male man, the male - "undergoes in the female", what is translated as, "a rather sudden interruption", an altogether incorrect translation because what is involved in German is "eine zimmlich unvermittelte Unterbrechung", an interruption, that means that it is most often unmediated, that it is not a part of what Ferenczi describes as amphimixis, which is only when all is said and done, one of the natural forms of what we call "thesis, antithesis, synthesis", of what we call dialectical progress, as I might put it. This, no doubt, is not the term which is valorised in Ferenczi's mind, but what animates effectively his whole construction, is indeed what he notes, it is that unvermittelte, namely in a lateral position with respect to this process - and let us not forget what it is a matter of finding - of genital synthesis and harmony, is therefore to be properly translated here by "rather as an impasse", outside the progress of mediation.

This interruption, he says, "is characterized above all else", and here he only accentuates what Freud tells us - "by the displacement of erogeneity from the clitoris (the female penis) to the cavity of the vagina. Psychoanalytic experience compels the assumption, however, that not only the vagina but, in the manner of hysteria, other parts of the body as well are genitalized, in particular the nipple and the surrounding area."

As you know, there are many other zones again in hysteria. Besides moreover the translation here, because it does not effectively follow the precious aspect of what we are brought here as material, a translation that is in a way, there (3) is simply, not at all "en témoigne également", but "nach Art der Hysterie" in German.

What does that mean? What does that mean, for someone who has learned - whether here or elsewhere - to understand, if not that the coming into operation of the vagina as such in the genital relationship, is a mechanism that is strictly equivalent to any other hysterical mechanism? And here why should we be astonished? Why should we be astonished at this from the moment that through our schema of the place of the empty locus in the function of desire you have quite ready to be recognised something about which the least that can be said is that, for you, it could at least situate this paradox, this paradox which is defined as follows: the fact is that the locus, the home of jouissance is found normally, since it is naturally placed precisely in an organ which you know in the most certain fashion, through experience as well as by an anatomical-physiological investigations, to be insensitive in the sense that it could not even become aware of sensation because it is not innervated, that the locus, that the final locus of jouissance, of genital jouissance is a place - after all, it is not a mystery - onto which one can pour floods of boiling water, and at a temperature that could not be tolerated by any other mucus membrane, without provoking real, immediate sensory reactions.

What does that mean, if not that we have every reason, before entering into the diachronic myth of a supposed maturation, to map out the correlations which would make of the no doubt necessary point of arrival, of completion, of accomplishment of the sexual function in the genital function, something other than a process of maturation, than a locus of convergence, of synthesis, of everything that presented itself up to then in terms of partial tendencies and to recognise, not alone the necessity of this empty place in a functional point of desire, but to see that even if it is there that nature itself, that physiology is going to find its most favourable functional point, we thus find ourselves in a clearer position, at once liberated from this weight of paradox which is going to make us imagine so many mythical constructions around the supposed vaginal jouissance, and not at all of course that something cannot be indicated beyond - and it is, if you remember, those who attended our Amsterdam Congress, what they may remember I indicated at the beginning of the Congress, something which for want of an (4) apparatus, for want of this structural register whose articulations I am trying to give you here, could not even, in the course of a Congress at which many worthy things were said, be effectively articulated and mapped out as such, and nevertheless how precious it is for us to know, since moreover all the paradoxes concerning the place to be given to hysteria in what could be called the scale of neuroses, this ambiguity in particular which brings it about that because of these obvious analogies whose essential element, major element I am highlighting here with the hysterical mechanism, we are called to put it on a diachronic scale as the most advanced neurosis because it is the closest to genital completion, that it is necessary for us in the light of this diachronic conception to put at the end of infantile maturation, and that by the reversal that clinical experience shows us on the contrary, we must, in the neurotic scale, consider on the contrary as the most primary, the one upon which specifically, for example, the constructions of obsessional neurosis are constructed, that the relations in a word between hysteria and psychosis itself, with schizophrenia are obvious.

The only thing that can allow us also not to be eternally, as the need arises - and observers bring us the points of view that we have to tackle on hysteria - putting it either at the end, or at the beginning, of supposedly evolutionary phases, is first and foremost to refer it to what predominates, namely the structure, the synchronic structure of desire (See schema, page 1). It is to isolate, in the constitutive structure of desire as such, which means that I designate this place, the place of the blank, the place of the void, as still playing an essential function; and the fact that this function should be highlighted in a major way, in the completed, terminal structure of the genital relationship, is at once the confirmation of the well-foundedness of our method and also the beginning of a clearer vision, cleared of , of what we have to map out concerning properly genital phenomena.

There is no doubt an obstacle, an objection to us seeing it directly because in order to reach it we must go by a rather complicated path. This roundabout path is anxiety and that is why we are dealing with it this year.

The point that we are at at this moment at which there comes to completion with the year a first phase of our discourse, consists (5) therefore in you assuring yourselves that there is a structure of anxiety; and the important point, the core of the fashion in which in these first talks I announced, put forward, tackled for you, is sufficiently in this image, I mean, in what it contributes in terms of a framework which is to be taken entirely in its specified character. I would even say up to a certain point that it still does not show adequately, in this tachygraphic form, in which - I have been repeating it for you on the blackboard since the beginning of my discourse - it is necessary to insist on the fact that this stroke is something that you see in cross-section and is a mirror. A mirror does not stretch out to infinity, a mirror has limits, and what reminds you of this is that, if you refer to the article from which this schema is taken, I take into account the limits of the mirror; one can s^hee something in this mirror from a point situated, as one might say, somewhere in the space of the mirror, from which it is not perceptible by the subject.

In other words, I myself do not necessarily see my eye in the mirror, even if the mirror helps me to see something that I would not see otherwise. What I mean by that, is that the first thing to be advanced concerning the structure of anxiety, is something that you always forget in the observations where it reveals itself: fascinated by the content of the mirror, you forget its limits and the fact that anxiety is framed.

Those who heard my intervention at the Journées Provinciales on phantasy, the text of which intervention I am still waiting for after two months and a week, may recall that I used as a metaphor a painting which is placed in a window frame, an absurd technique no doubt, if it is a matter of better seeing what is on the painting, but as I also explained to you, it is not exactly this that is involved, it is, whatever may be the charm of what is painted on the canvas, not to see what can be seen through the window.

What the inaugural dream in the history of analysis shows us in the dream of the Wolfman, whose privilege, as happens incidentally and in an unambiguous fashion, is that it is the apparition in the dream of a pure schematic form of the phantasy, it is because the repetitive dream of the Wolfman is the pure phantasy unveiled in its structure, that it takes on its importance, and that Freud chooses it to make, in this observation which only has this unexhausted, inexhaustible (6) character for us because it involves essentially, from beginning to end, the relationship of the phantasy to the real. What do we see in this dream? The sudden opening - and the two terms are indicated - of a window. The phantasy is seen beyond a pane and through a window which opens, the phantasy is framed; and you will recognise in what you see beyond - if you know of course how to perceive it - you will recognise in its most diverse forms the same structure that you see here in the mirror of my schema. There are always the two bars of a more or less developed support and of something which is supported, there are the wolves on the branches of the tree; there is on some drawing or other of a schizophrenic - I have only to open any collection to gather them up as I might say by the shovel-full - also on occasion some tree with at the end for example - to take my first example in the paper given by Bobo(?) at the last Antwerp Congress on the phenomenon of expression - with what at the end of its branches? That which for a schizophrenic fills the role that the wolves play in the case of the borderline that the Wolfman is. Here, a signifier, it is beyond the branches of the tree that the schizophrenic in question writes the formula of his secret: "Io sono sempre vista", namely something that she had never been able to say up to then "I am always seen". Here again I must pause in order to make you see that in Italian as in French, vista has an ambiguous meaning, it is not only a past participle, it is also sight with its two meanings subjective and objective, the function of sight and the fact of being seen, as one says the sight of a landscape, the one which is taken there as an object on a postcard. I will of course come back on all of that.

What I simply want to stress here today, is that the horrible, the suspicious, the uncanny, everything by which we translate, as best we can in French, this masterful unheimlich, presents itself through skylights, that it is as framed that there is situated for us the field of anxiety. Thus you rediscover that by which I introduced the discussion for you, namely the relationship between the stage and the world.

"Suddenly", "all of a sudden", you will always find this term, at the moment that the phenomenon of the unheimlich makes its entry! The stage which proposes itself in its own dimension, beyond no doubt we know that what ought to be referred to it is what cannot be said in the world. It is what we always expect when the curtain rises, it is this quickly extinguished brief moment of anxiety, but which is never lacking to the dimension which ensures that we are doing more than coming to settle our backsides into a more or less expensive seat, which is the moment of the three knocks, which is the moment the curtain opens. And without this, this quickly elided introductory moment of anxiety, nothing could even take on the value of what is going to be determined as tragic or as comic, that which cannot be, here again, not every tongue provides you with the same resources, it is not a können that is involved. Of course many things can be said, from a material point of view. It is a matter of a being able, dürfen, which badly translates what is permitted or not permitted, since dürfen refers to a more original dimension. It is even because Man darf nicht, that it cannot be done, that Man kann, that after all one is going to be able, and that here there comes into play the forcing, the dimension of relaxation, that properly speaking constitutes the dramatic action.

We could not spend too much time on the nuances of this framing of anxiety. Are you going to say that I am appealing to it in the sense of bringing it back to expectation, to preparation, to a state of alert, to a response which is already one of defence to what is going to happen. That yes! It is the Erwartung, it is the constitution of the hostile as such, it is the first recourse beyond Hilflosigkeit♦

But anxiety is different. If, in effect, expectation can serve among other means to frame it, in a word, there is no need for this expectation: the frame is always there! Anxiety is different. Anxiety is when there appears in this frame something which is already there much closer to home: Heim, the guest (l'hôte), you will say, and in a certain sense, of course, this unknown guest who appears in an unexpected fashion has a good deal to do with what is met with in the Unheimlich, but it is not enough to designate him in this way. For, as the term indicates to you very well as it happens in French, this guest, in the ordinary sense of the word, is already someone who has been well worked over in terms of expectation.

This guest is already what had become hostile, had passed into the hostility by which I began this discourse about expectation. This guest, in the ordinary sense, is not the heimlich, it is not the person who lives in the house, it is someone hostile who has been softened, pacified, accepted. That which belongs to Heim, that which belongs to Geheimnis, has never passed through these detours when all is said and done, has never passed through these (8) networks, through these sieves, through these sieves of recognition: it has remained unheimlich, less uninhabitable than inhabitant (moins inhabitable qu'inhabitant), less habitual than uninhabited (moins inhabituel qu'inhabite).

It is this emergence of the heimlich in the frame that constitutes the phenomenon of anxiety. And this is why it is wrong to say that anxiety is without an object. Anxiety has a completely different sort of object to any apprehension that has been prepared, structured, structured by what? By the grill of the cut, of the furrow, of the unary trait, of the "that's it" which always in operating as one might say closes the lips - I am saying the lip or the lips - of this' cut which becomes the sealed letter on the subject in order, as I explained to you the last time, to send him off under a sealed cover to different traces.

The signifiers make of the world a network of traces, in which the passage from one cycle to another is henceforth possible. What does that mean? What I told you the last time: the signifier generates a world, the world of the speaking subject whose essential characteristic is that it is possible to make a mistake about it.

Anxiety is this very cut, without which the presence of the signifier, its functioning, its entry, its furrow in the real is unthinkable. It is this cut which is opened up and which allows there to appear something that you will understand better when I say the unexpected, the visit, the piece of news, what is expressed so well by the term presentiment which is not simply to be understood as the presentiment of something, but also the "pre" of Reeling, that which is before the birth of a feeling.

All the switching points are possible starting from something which is anxiety, which is, when all is said and done what we expected and which is the true substance of anxiety, the "what does not deceive", what is beyond doubting, for do not allow yourself to be taken in by appearances: it is not because, of course, the link between anxiety and doubt and hesitation, and what is called the ambivalent game of the obsessional, may appear clinically obvious to you, that it is the same thing.

Anxiety is not doubt; anxiety is the cause of doubt. I am saying the cause of doubt, it is not the first time, and it will not be the last, that I will have to come back here on the fact that if there is maintained, after so many centuries of critical understanding, the function of causality, it is indeed because it (9) is elsewhere than where it is refuted, and that if there is a dimension in which we should seek the true function, the true weight, the meaning of the maintenance of the function of causality, it is in this direction of the beginning of anxiety. Doubt therefore as I told you, is only there to combat anxiety and precisely all the effort that doubt expends, is against lures. It is in the measure that what it is a matter of avoiding is the dimension of appalling certainty that is in anxiety.

I think that you will stop me here to tell me, or to remind me, of what I put forward more than once in aphoristic forms, that all human activity expands into certainty or again that it generates certainty or in a general fashion that the reference to certainty is essentially action. Well yes, of course, and it is precisely this that allows me to introduce now the essential relation between anxiety and action as such, it is precisely perhaps from anxiety that action borrows its certainty.

To act is to tear its certainty from anxiety. To act, is to operate a transfer of anxiety. And if I allow myself to advance here a little quickly this discourse at the end of the trimester, it is to fill in or to almost fill in the blanks that I left you with in the table of my first seminar. I think that you remember it the one which is organised as follows:

Inhibition, symptom, anxiety, impede, which I completed with embarrass, with emotion and here dismay. I said to you: what is here? Two things: the passage à l'acte and acting-out. I said almost to be complete, because I have not the time to tell you why, the passage à l'acte in this place and acting out at a different one, but I will all the same make you advance along the path by pointing out to you, in the closest relationship with our remarks this morning, the opposition that was already implied and even expressed in my first introduction of these terms, and whose position I am now going to underline, namely between the dimension of too much which is in embarrassment and the dimension of the too little in what I told you, by means of an etymological commentary which you remember I think - at least those who were (10) there - I underlined about the sense of dismay.

Dismay, as I told you, is essentially the evocation of a power which is lacking, esmay, the experience of what you are lacking in need. It is in the reference to these two terms whose link is essential in our subject; for this link underlines the ambiguity: if there is too much, what we have to deal with then is not lacking to us; if it is lacking to us, why say that elsewhere it embarrasses us, let us be on our guard here not to yield to the most flattering of illusions.

In attacking anxiety here ourselves, what are we trying to do, what do all those who have spoken of it 'scientifically' want? Good Lord, it was that it was pure need, what was required of me to posit at the beginning as necessary for the constitution of a world, it is here that this reveals itself not to be useless, and that you have control of it. This is better seen precisely because it is anxiety that is involved. And what is seen is what? And to want to speak about it in a properly scientific way is to show that it is what? An immense deception. It is not realised that the whole domain which our discourse has conquered always ends up showing that it is an immense deception.

To master the phenomenon by thought, is always to show how one can remake it in a falsified way, it is to be able to reproduce it, namely to be able to make a signifier of it. A signifier of what? In reproducing it the subject can falsify the book of accounts, which should not astonish us if it is true, as I teach you, that the signifier is the trace of the subject in the world's course. Only, if we believe we are able to continue this game with anxiety, well then, we are sure of missing out, because precisely I stated right at the beginning that anxiety is concerned with what escapes this game. Therefore this is what we must be on guard against at the moment of grasping what is meant by this relationship of embarrassment to too much signifier, of lack to too little signifier. I am going to illustrate this relationship if you have not done so already: if there were no analysis, of course, I could not speak about it; but analysis encountered it at the first corner. The phallus for example, little Hans, just as much of a logician as Aristotle, poses the equation: all animate beings have a phallus. I am presupposing of course that I am addressing myself to people who have followed my commentary on the analysis of little Hans, who will remember here in this connection, I think, what I was careful to (11) accentuate last year concerning what is called the universal affirmative proposition. I told you the meaning of what I wanted to produce for you by this, namely that the affirmation which is described as universal, positive universal, only has meaning from the definition of the real, starting from the impossible. It is impossible for an animate being not to have a phallus, something that, as you see, poses logic in this essentially precarious function of condemning the real, of eternally stumbling into the impossible. And we have no other means of apprehending it, we advance from stumble to stumble. Example: there are living beings, Mummy for example, who do not have a phallus, so there must be no living beings, hence anxiety.

And the following step is to be taken. It is certain that the easiest thing is to say that even those who do not have one, have one. This indeed is why it is the one that we hold onto in general. It is that the living beings which do not have a phallus have one despite and against everything. It is because they have a phallus that we psychologists will call unreal - this will simply be the signifying phallus - that they are living beings.

Thus, from one stumble to another, there progresses I do not dare to say knowledge, but undoubtedly understanding. I cannot resist the pleasure in passing of sharing with you the discovery that chance, a lucky chance, what is called chance but which is scarcely that at all, a lucky discovery that I made for you no later than last week-end, in a dictionary of slang. God knows, I have taken enough time to come to it, but the English tongue is really a lovely tongue. Is there anyone here then who knows that since the fifteenth century, English slang has found this marvel of replacing on occasions "I understand you perfectly", for example, by "I understumble", namely - I am writing it out, since the phonetising has allowed you perhaps to miss the nuance - what I have just explained to you, not what is meant by understand: I understand you, but something untranslatable into French since the whole value of this slang word is the famous stumble which means precisely what I am in the process of explaining to you: the trebuchement. I understand you, that reminds me that one way or another, is always to go further along the path of misunderstanding.

Moreover, if the stuff of experience was composed, as classical psychology teaches us, of the real and the unreal - and why not - how can one not recall in this connection what this indicates to (12) us in terms of having to take advantage of what is properly the Freudian conquest, and which is specifically the following: it is that if man is tormented by the unreal in the real, it would be altogether vain to hope to rid oneself of it for the reason, which is what in the Freudian conquest is quite precisely disturbing, that in the unreal, it is the real which torments him. His concern, Sorge, the philosopher Martin Heidegger tells us. Of course! This is a great advance for us.

Is this the final term, that before busying oneself, before speaking, before getting down to work, concern is presupposed? What does that mean? And do we not see that here we are already at the level of an art of concern: man is obviously a great producer of something which in so far as it regards him is called concern. But in that case, I prefer to learn it in a holy book, which is at the same time the most profanatory book which exists, called Ecclesiastes. I think I will refer to it in the future. This Ecclesiastes which is as you know the Greek translation in the septuagint of the term goheleth, a unique term, employed on this occasion, which comes from gahal, congregation, goheleth, being at once the abstract and feminine form of it, being properly speaking the congregating virtue, the rallier, the ecclesia, if you wish, rather than Ecclesiastes.

And what does it teach us, this book which I described as a sacred and most profane book. Here the philosopher does not fail to stumble, in reading it, on some Epicurean echo or other, as I have read! To talk of Epicurean in connection with Ecclesiastes! I know that Epicurus has long ceased to calm us, as was, as you know his intention. But to say that Ecclesiastes had for a single moment a chance of producing the same effect on us, can only mean that one has never even opened it!

"God commands me to enjoy (de jouir)" - this is textually in the Bible - it is all the same the word of God. And even if it is not the word of God for you, I think that you have already noticed the total difference there is between the God of the Jews and the God of Plato. Even if Christian history thought itself obliged, in connection with the God of the Jews, to find with the God of Plato its little psychotic evasion, it is, all the same, time to remember the difference there is between the universal mover God of Aristotle, the sovereign good God, a delusional conception of Plato, and the God of the Jews, namely a God with whom one speaks, a God who demands something of you and who in (13) Ecclesiastes gives you the order "enjoy (jouis)". That is really something! Because to enjoy when ordered to do so, is all the same something in which everyone senses that if there is a source, an origin of anxiety, it ought all the same to be found somewhere there. To this order "Jouis!", I can only answer one thing, which is: "J'ouïs (I hear)". Of course, but naturally I do not enjoy so easily for all that.

Such is the relief, the originality, the dimension, the order of presence, in which there is activated for us the God who speaks, the one who tells us expressly that he is what he is. In order to advance while it is there within my reach, into the field of his demands, and because you are going to see that it is very close to our subject, I would introduce - this is the moment - something which you may well imagine I did not notice today or yesterday, namely that, among these demands of God to his elected, privileged people, there are some quite precise ones regarding which it seems that this God did not need the prescience of my seminar to carefully specify the terms. There is one of them called circumcision.

He orders us to enjoy, and what is more he goes into how it should be done. He specifies the demand, he separates out the object. This is why, I think, for you as for me, there could not fail to appear for a long time, the extraordinary entanglements, the confusion of the analogical evocation that there is in the supposed reference of circumcision to castration. Of course this has a relationship with the object of anxiety.

But to say that circumcision is the cause of it, or in any fashion whatsoever, the representative, the analogue of what we call castration and its complex, is a flagrant error. It does not get you out of the symptom precisely, namely of that which in the case of some subject or other who has been circumcised, may establish itself, in terms of confusion concerning its brand with what is involved eventually in neurosis regarding the complex of castration.

Because after all, there is nothing less castrating than circumcision. When it is clear-cut, when it is well done, undoubtedly we cannot deny that the result is rather elegant. I assure you that alongside all these sexual organs, I mean the male ones, of greater Greece than the antique dealers, on the pretext that I am an analyst, bring me by the cartload and which my secretary puts into the already overcrowded courtyard, alongside all these sexual organs, in which I must say that by an accentuation which I do not dare to qualify as aesthetic the phimosis is always accentuated in a particularly disgusting (14) fashion; there is all the same in the practice of circumcision something healthy from the aesthetic point of view. And moreover those who continue to repeat on this point the confusions which are all over psychoanalytic writings, all the same most of them have long ago grasped that there was something from the functional point of view which is just as essential as reducing, at least in part in a signifying fashion, the ambiguity that is described as the bisexual type. "Je suis la plaie et le couteau", Baudelaire says somewhere. Well then, why consider it to be the normal function to be at once the dart and the sheath? There is obviously in this ritual attention of circumcision a reduction of bisexuality which cannot but obviously generate something healthy as regard the division of roles.

These remarks, as you can well sense, are not by the way, they open up precisely the question which situates beyond, something which already from this explanation can no longer appear as a sort of capricious ritual, but something which conforms to what in the demand I teach you to consider as the circumscribing of the object, as the function of the cut - it must be said - of this delimited zone here: God demands an offering, and very precisely to separate out the object after having circumscribed it; that whether after that the sources as well as the experience of those who are grouped together, recognise one another by this traditional sign, that if their experience does not for all that lead to a lowering - perhaps far from it - of the relation to anxiety, it is starting from there that the question begins.

One of those who are evoked here - and it is really not designating anybody in my audience - called me one day in a private note the last of the cabalistic Christians. You can be reassured, if some investigation or other involving properly speaking the calculus of signifiers may be something on which I delay from time to time, it will never make me mistake as I may say my illusions for the lantern of knowledge; or indeed rather, if this lantern turns out to be a blind lantern, to recognise my illusion in it, but more directly than Freud because, coming after him, I question his God: "Che vuoi?", "What do you want of me?", in other words: "What is the relationship of desire to the law?" A question always elided by the philosophical tradition, but to which Freud answered - and you live on it, even if like (15) everybody else you have not realised it. The reply: it is the same thing as what I am teaching you, what I am teaching you leads you to, and which is already there in the text, masked under the myth of Oedipus, it is that desire and the law, which appear to be opposed in a relationship of antithesis, are only one and the same barrier to bar our access to the thing. Nolens, volens: desiring, I commit myself to the path of the law. That is why Freud relates the origin of the law to the opaque ungraspable desire of the father. But what this discovery and all analytic enquiry leads you to, is not to lose sight of the truth there is behind this lure.

Whether my objects are normatived or not, as long as I desire, I know nothing of what I desire. And then from time to time an object appears among all the others, which I really do not know why it is there. On the one hand, there is the one which I have learned covers my anxiety, the object of the phobia - and I do not deny that I had to have it explained to me; up to then I did not know what I was thinking about, except to say that you have one, you have or you have not one - on the other hand, there is the one, as regards which I cannot really justify why it should be the one I desire, and I, who do not detest girls, why should I love a little slipper still more. On the one hand there is the wolf, on the other the shepherdess. This is where I will leave you at the end of these first talks about anxiety, there is something else to be understood about the anxiety-provoking order of God, there is Diana's hunt which, at a time that I chose, that of Freud's centenary, was, I told you, the path of Freud's quest, there is something to which I invite 'you for the coming trimester regarding anxiety, there is the death of the wolf.

Seminar 7: Wednesday 9 January 1963

In the thirty-second introductory lecture to psychoanalysis, namely in the series of New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis which has been translated into French, Freud specifies that it is a matter of introducing something which has not, he says, in any way a purely speculative character, but it has been translated for us in the unintelligible French which you can form your own opinion of: "Mais il ne peut vraiment être question que de conceptions. En effet, il s'agit de trouver les idées abstraites, justes qui appliquées à la matière brute de l'observation y apporteront ordre et clarté". There is no full stop in German where I have shown it, and there is no enigma in the sentence: "It is a matter", Freud tells us, "Sondern es handelt sich wirklich", not truly but really, "of conceptions" (comma), namely I mean by that Vorstellungen, correct abstract representations, it is a matter of einzufahren them, of bringing them, of bringing to light, these conceptions whose application to the rohe Stoff, the raw material of observation, Beobachtung, will permit us to make emerge from them, to give birth from them to order and transparency.

It is obviously always distressing to entrust something as precious as the translation of Freud to ladies-in-waiting.

This effort, this programme, the one that we have been trying our best at here for some years, and it is because of this that today we find that we have, in short, specified on our path about anxiety, the status of something which I would designate right away by the letter o which you see here enthroned above the outline, the outline of the vase which symbolizes for us the narcissistic container of the libido, in so far as through the mediation of this mirror of the Other it can be related to its own image $i'(o)$ and that between the two there can operate this communicating oscillation that Freud designates as the reversibility between the libido of one's own body and that of the object.

From this economic oscillation, this reversible libido from $i(o)$ to $i'(o)$, there is something which we would not say escapes, but which intervenes in the form of an incidence whose style of disturbance is precisely the one that we are studying this year. The most striking manifestation, the signal of the intervention of this object o , is anxiety.

This does not mean that this object o is only the reverse of anxiety, that it only intervenes, that it only functions in correlation with anxiety. Anxiety, Freud taught us, plays the function of a signal with respect to something. I am saying: it is a signal related to what is happening about the relationship of a subject, of a subject who moreover cannot enter into this relationship except in the vacillation of a certain fading, the one which the notation of the subject by an $$$ designates, the relationship of this subject, at this vacillating moment, with (3) this object in all its generality.

Anxiety is the signal of certain moments of this relationship. This is what we are going to strive to show you more about today. It is clear that this supposes a further step in the situation of specifying what we mean by this object o . I mean, we designate this object precisely by o . I point out that this algebraic notation has its function, it is like a thread designed to allow us to recognise its identity under the different incidences in which it appears to us. Its notation is algebraic, o , precisely to respond to this goal of pure mapping out of identity, it having already been posited by us that the mapping out by a word, by a signifier, is always and can only be a metaphor, namely leaving in a way, outside the signification induced by its introduction, the function of the signifier itself. The term good though it generates the signification of good, is not good by itself and far from it, for it generates evil at the same time.

In the same way to designate the little o by the term object is, as you see, a metaphorical usage, since it is borrowed precisely from this subject-object relationship from which the term object is constituted, which no doubt is suitable for designating the general function of objectivity; and this object, of which we have to speak under the term o , is precisely an object which is outside any possible definition of objectivity. I will not speak of what is happening to objectivity in the field of science, I am speaking about our science in general, you know that since Kant a number of misfortunes have befallen it, a number of misfortunes which all arise, in the heart of this object, from having wanted to give too great a share to certain, "obvious things", and especially those which belong to the field of transcendental aesthetics, like for example holding as obvious the independence, the separation between the dimensions of space and those of time was put to the test in the elaboration of the scientific object or came into collision with this something that is expressed quite incorrectly as a crisis of scientific reason: in short this whole effort which had to be undertaken in order to see that (4) precisely these two registers of the spatial and temporal dimensions could not, at a certain level of physics, continue to be held as independent variables, a surprising fact, which seems to have posed to some minds indissoluble problems which do not seem nevertheless to be all that worthy of bringing us to a halt, and if we see that it is precisely to the status of the object that we should have recourse to give to the symbolic its exact place in the constitution, in the expression of experience, not to make risky extrapolations from the imaginary into the symbolic.

In truth, the time that is involved, at the level at which there may be posed the problems that come from derealising it in a fourth dimension, has nothing to do with the time which, in intuition, seems indeed to posit itself as a sort of unsurpassable shock of the real, namely something which appears to all of us, and that taking it as an obvious fact, as something which, in the symbolic, could be expressed by an independent variable is simply a categorical error at the beginning.

There is the same difficulty, as you know, at a certain limit of physics, with the body, and here I would say that we are on our own ground, because it is effectively on what has not been done, on what has not been done at the beginning as regards a correct status of the experience that we have here our word to say. We have our word to say since, our experience posits and establishes that no intuition, that no transparency, that no Durchsichtigkeit - since it is Freud's term - which is founded purely and simply on the intuition of consciousness, can be held to be original and therefore valid and therefore cannot constitute the starting point of any transcendental aesthetics, for the simple reason that the subject cannot be in any way situated in an exhaustive fashion in consciousness, since it is firstly and primarily unconscious.

To this must be added, that if it is firstly and primarily unconscious, it is because in the constitution of the subject, we must firstly and primarily hold to be prior to this constitution, a certain incidence which is that of the signifier. The problem is that of the entry of the signifier into the real and to see (5) how from this the subject is born. Does it mean that, if we find ourselves as it were before a sort of descent of the spirit, the apparition of winged signifiers would begin to make their holes in this real all by themselves, in the midst of which there would appear one of these holes which would be the subject. I think that, in the introduction of the real-imaginary-symbolic division, no one imputes such a plan to me. It is a matter today of knowing what is there at first, what it is precisely that allows this signifier to be incarnated. What allows it is of course what we have there to presentify ourselves to one another, our body. Only this body is not to be taken either, for its part, in the pure and simple categories of the transcendental aesthetics. This body is not in a word, constitutable in the way that Descartes establishes in the field of extension. It is a matter of our seeing that the body in question is not given to us in a pure and simple fashion in our mirror, that even in this experience of the mirror, there can occur a moment where this image, this specular image that we think we have in our grasp, is modified: what we have face to face with us, our stature, our face, our pair of eyes, allows there to emerge the dimension of our own look and the value of the image then begins to change especially if there is a moment at which this look which appears in the mirror begins to look no longer at ourselves, initium, aura, the dawning of a feeling of strangeness which opens the door to anxiety.

The passage from the specular image to this double who escapes me, here is the point at which something happens whose generality, function, presence in the whole phenomenal field we can show, I believe, by the articulation that we are giving to this function of o, and we can show that the function goes well beyond what appears at this strange moment that I wished here simply to pinpoint because its character is well known and also most discreet in its intensity.

How does there occur this transformation of the object, which, from a situatable object, a locatable object, an exchangeable object constructs this sort of private, incommunicable and (6) nevertheless dominant object which is our correlative in the phantasy? Where exactly the moment of this moulting, of this transformation, of this revelation occurs, is, I believe something that, along certain paths, from certain angles which I already prepared for you in the course of the preceding years, can be more than designated, can be explained, and that, in the little schema that I have brought you today on the board something of these conceptions, Auffassungen, in other words of these richtig, correct representations can be given which makes the always more or less opaque, obscure, appeal to intuition, to experience, something durchsichtig, transparent. In other words, to reconstitute for ourselves the transcendental aesthetic which suits us, which suits our experience.

You can hold then as certain, through my discourse, that what is commonly transmitted, I think, about anxiety - not extracted from Freud's discourse but from a part of his discourse, that anxiety has no object - is properly what I am correcting: "it is not without an object, elle n'est pas sans objet", such is exactly the formula on which there ought to be suspended this relationship of anxiety to an object.

It is not properly speaking the object of anxiety, in this "not without (pas sans)", you recognise the formula that I already used in the past about the relationship of the subject to the phallus, "he is not without having it, il n'est pas sans l'avoir".

This relationship of "not being without having" does not mean that one knows what object is involved. When I say "he is not without resources, he is not without guile" that means precisely that these resources are obscure - at least for me - and that his guile is not of the usual sort.

Moreover even the linguistic introduction of the term sans, sine, which is profoundly correlative to this apposition of haud, non haud sine, not without, is a certain type of conditional liaison, if you wish, which links being to having in a sort of alternation; he is not without having it; but besides, where it is, it is not seen.

Do we not have here precisely, the sociological function of the phallus, provided, of course, that we take it here at the level of the capital letter, at the level of the ^>, in which it incarnates the most alienating function of the subject in (7) exchange itself, in social exchange. The subject as he is involved in it, is reduced to being the bearer of the phallus. This is what makes castration necessary for a socialised society in which there are, as Claud Lévi-Strauss has pointed out to us, prohibitions of course, but also and above all preferences.

This is the true secret, it is the truth of what Claud Lévi-Strauss makes turn around the exchange of women in the structure. Beneath the exchange of women, the phalluses are going to fulfill them. It must not be seen that it is the phallus itself which is at stake. If one sees it, there is anxiety.

I could here branch off onto more than one track. It is clear that with this reference, we have arrived, all of a sudden, at the castration complex. Well then, by God, why not engage ourselves ourselves in it.

Castration, as I have frequently reminded you, the castration of the complex, is not a castration. That is something everyone knows, no-one has the slightest doubt about it, and, a curious thing, people do not dwell on it. It is all the same of interest, this image, this phantasy. Where is it to be situated? Between the imaginary and the symbolic, what is happening? Is it the gelding which is well known from the ferocious practices of war? It is undoubtedly closer to it than to the fabrication of eunuchs.

The mutilation of the penis, of course, is what is evoked by the phantastical threats emanating from the father or from the mother, depending on the epoch of psychoanalysis. "If you do that, it will be cut off you". Moreover it is necessary that this accent of cutting should be given all its importance for there to be sustained the practice of circumcision to which the last time, you heard me make what I might call prophylactic references, namely the remark that the psychic incidence of circumcision is far from being unequivocal, and that I am not the only one to have noted it.

One of the last works, a remarkable one no doubt, on the subject, that of Nunberg, on circumcision conceived in terms of its relations with bisexuality, is there to remind us of something which already a good number of other authors had introduced before him, that circumcision has just as much the goal, the aim, (8) of reinforcing, by isolating it, the term of masculinity in the man as to provoke the effects, at least in their anxiety-provoking incidence, as to provoke the effects described as those of the castration complex.

Nevertheless, it is precisely this incidence, this relationship, this common denominator of the cut which allows us to bring into the field of castration, the operation of circumcision, of Beschneidung, of arel to say it in Hebrew.

Is there not also here a little something which might allow us to take a further step about the function of castration anxiety. Well then, it is the following, the term which we lack: "I am going to cut it off you", says the Mammy who is described as castrating. Fine, and afterwards, where will the Wiwimacher, as it is called in the observation of little Hans, be? Well then, if we admit that this threat, always presentified by our experience, is carried out, it will be there, in the operational field of the common object, of the exchangeable object, it will be there, in the hands of the mother who has cut it off. And it is indeed this that would be strange in the situation.

It often happens that our subjects have dreams where they have the object in their hands, either because it has been broken off by a gangrene, or because some partner, in the dream, has taken the trouble to carry out the cutting operation, or by some correlative accident or other that is diversely nuanced with uncanniness and anxiety, a particularly disturbing characteristic of the dream, well then, here, to situate for us the importance of this passage of the object, suddenly, to what one could call Zuhandenheit, as Heidegger would say, its handiness, in the field of common objects and the perplexity which results from it, and moreover, this whole passage to the side of the handy, of the utensil, is precisely that which here in the observation of little Hans, is designated for us also by a dream. He introduces the tap fitter, the one who is going to unscrew it, to rescrew it, change the whole discussion of Eingewurzelt, about what is or is not well rooted in the body, into the field, into the register of the interchangeable. And this moment, this phenomenological turning point, here connects up, and allows us to designate the opposition between these two types of object according to their (9) status. When I began to announce the function, the fundamental function in the general establishment of the field of the object, of the mirror stage, what path did I take? Along the plane of the primary identification, the original miscognition of the subject as a whole in his specular image, then the transitivist reference which is established in his relationship with the imaginary other, his fellow, which makes him always badly separated out from this identity with the other and introduces here mediation, a common object which is an object of rivalry, an object, then, whose status is going to begin from the notion of belonging or not: it belongs to you or it belongs to me. In this field, there are two sorts of objects, the ones that can be shared, and those which cannot be. Those which cannot be, when I see them involved all the same in this domain of sharing, with the other objects, whose status rests entirely on rivalry, this ambiguous rivalry which is at the same time emulation but also agreement, they are priceable objects, they are objects of exchange. But there are some of them, and if I put the phallus in the forefront, it is of course because it is the most illustrious because of the fact of castration; but there are others, as you know, others which you know, the best-known equivalents of this phallus, those which precede it, the turd, the nipple, there are those perhaps which you know less well, even though they are perfectly visible in analytic literature, and we will try to designate these objects when they enter with recognisable freedom into this field where they have only to do, the field of sharing. When they appear, anxiety signals for us the particularity of their status. These objects prior to the constitution of the status of the common object, of the communicable object, of the socialised object, this is what is involved in the o.

We will name these objects, we will draw up a catalogue of them, which is not of course exhaustive, but perhaps also, let us hope so: already just now, I have named three, I would say that as a first approach to this catalogue, there are only two missing and that the totality corresponds to the five forms of loss, of perte, Verlust, that Freud designates in Inhibitions, symptoms (10) and anxiety, as being the major moments of the apparition of the signal.

I want, before going any further, to take up another branch of the switch-line which you saw me a little earlier in the process of choosing, to make a remark, whose asides, I believe, will have for you some illuminating aspects. Is it not strange, significant of something, that in analytic research, there is manifested a quite different lack to the one I already designated in saying that we have not taken a single step in the physiological question of feminine sexuality.

We could accuse ourselves of the same failure as regards male impotence. Because after all, in the process, clearly locatable in its normative phases, of the masculine side of copulation, we are still at the stage of referring ourselves to what can be found in any book of physiology about the process of erection first, then of orgasm.

The reference to the stimulus-response circuit is, when all is said and done, what we satisfy ourselves with, as if the homology between orgasmic discharge and the motor part of this circuit in any kind of action were acceptable. Of course, we are not at that stage, far from it. Even in Freud - and the problem was in fact raised by him - why in sexual pleasure is the circuit not as elsewhere the shortest circuit to return to the level of minimal excitation, why is there a Vorlust, a fore-pleasure, as it is translated, which consists precisely in raising as high as possible this minimal level?

And the intervention of orgasm, namely from what moment is this raising of the level linked as a norm to the preliminary operation interrupted? Have we in any way given a schema of what intervenes, of the mechanism, if you wish, given a physiological representation of the spoken thing, of what Freud would call the Abfuhrinnervationen, the circuit of innervation which is the support of the bringing into play of the discharge? Have we distinguished it, isolated it, designated it, because it must be (11) considered as distinct from what functioned before, because what was functioning before, was precisely that this process should not go towards its discharge before reaching a certain level of the raising of the stimulus? It is then an exercise of the pleasure function tending to get close to its own limit, namely to the arousal of pain.

So where does this feedback come from? No one dreams of telling us. But I would point out to you, that not I, but the very people who, psychoanalytic doctrine tells us, should tell us normally that the Other must intervene here, because what constitutes a normal genital function is presented to us as linked to oblativity. Let us be told then how the function of giving as such intervenes hic et nunc when one is fucking!

This, in any case, has indeed its interest; for either it is valid, or it is not; and it is certain that in some way there must intervene the function of the Other.

In any case, since an important part of our speculations concern what is called the choice of the love object, and since it is in the disturbances of this love life that there lies an important part of analytic experience, since in this field the reference to the primordial object, to the mother, is held to be capital, a distinction is imposed as to where one should locate this frequent incidence of the fact that for some people the result is that they cannot function as regards orgasm except with prostitutes, and that for others it is only with other subjects chosen in a different register.

As we know from our analyses - the relationship to the prostitute is almost directly meshed into the reference to the mother. In other cases, the deteriorations, degradations of Liebesleben, of the love life, are linked to the opposition between the maternal body which evokes a certain type of relationship to the subject, and the woman of a certain different type in so far as she becomes the support, is equivalent to the phallic object.

How does all of this come about? This picture, this schema (pi), the one that I have once more reproduced here on the upper part of the board allows us to designate what I mean. Is the mechanism, the articulation produced at the level of the (12) attraction of the object, which becomes or not invested for us with this glamour, with this desirable brilliance, with this colour - this is how sexuality is designated in Chinese - which means that the object becomes stimulating precisely at the level of excitation?

This is why this preferential colour will be situated, I would say, at the same level of signal which can also be that of anxiety, I am saying then at this level here i'(o). So then it will be a matter of knowing why, and I am indicating it immediately so that you can see where I want to get to: by the branching off of the original erogenous cathexis from what is here qua o present and hidden at the same time.

Or that which functions as a sorting element in the choice of love object is produced here at the level of the framing by an Einschränkung, by this narrowing directly referred by Freud to the mechanism of the ego, by this limitation of the field of interest which excludes a certain type of object precisely in function of its relationship with the mother.

The two mechanisms are, as you see, at the two ends of this chain, which begins at inhibition and which finishes with anxiety whose diagonal line I marked out in the table that I gave you at the beginning of this year. We have a right to distinguish two different mechanisms in inhibition and anxiety and precisely to conceive of how both one and the other can intervene from top to bottom of every sexual manifestation.

I add the following that, when I say from top to bottom, I am including in it what in our experience is called transference. Recently I heard an allusion being made to the fact that we in our Society are people who know a good deal about transference. To tell the truth, since a certain work on transference which was done before our Society was founded, I know only one other work which has been evoked, namely that of the year that I devoted to it with you here.

I said a lot of things, certainly in a form which was the most appropriate one, namely in a form that was partly veiled. It is certain that previously in the earlier work on transference to (13) which I have just alluded and which contributed a division as brilliant as that of the opposition between the need for repetition and the repetition of need (the work of Lagache), you see that having recourse to a play on words to designate things - which moreover are not without their interest - is not simply my privilege. But I think that the reference to transference, to limit it uniquely to the effects of repetition, to the effects of reproduction, is something that would altogether deserve to be extended, and that the synchronic dimension risks, through insisting on the historical element, on the element of the repetition of lived experience, risks in any case, risks leaving to one side a whole no less important dimension which is precisely what can appear, what is included, latent in the position of the analyst, through which there lies in the space that he determines, the function of this partial object.

This is what, in speaking to you about transference, if you remember, I designated by the metaphor, which is clear enough it seems to me, of the hand which stretches out towards the log and at the moment of reaching this log, this log bursts into flames, and in the flames another hand appears which stretches out towards the first one.

This is what I also designated, in studying Plato's Symposium, by the function named agalma in the discourse of Alcibiades.

I think that the inadequacy of the synchronic reference to the function of the partial object in the analytic relationship, in the transference relationship, establishes the basis for opening a dossier concerning a domain which I am and am not astonished, not surprised in any case, to see left in the shade, namely that a certain number of failures in the sexual function can be considered as distributed in a certain field of what we can call post-analytic results.

I believe that this analysis of the function of the analyst as the space of the field of the partial object, is precisely that before which, from the analytic point of view, Freud brought us to a halt in his article on "Analysis terminable and interminable", and if one starts from the idea that Freud's limit, was - one finds it right through all his observations - (14) the non-perception of what is properly to be analysed in the synchronic relationship between the analysand and the analyst concerning this function of the partial object, one will see there - and if you wish, I will come back to it - the very source of his failure - of the failure of his intervention with Dora, with the woman in the case of feminine homosexuality, one will see in it especially why Freud designates for us in castration anxiety what he calls the limit of analysis, precisely in the measure that he remained for his analysand the seat, the locus of this partial object.

If Freud tells us that analysis leaves man and woman unsatisfied, the one in the field of what is properly called in the case of the male the castration complex and the other about Penisneid, this is not an absolute limit, it is the limit where finite analysis ends with Freud, it is the limit which continues to follow this indefinitely approached parallelism which characterises the asymptote. The analysis which Freud calls indefinite, unlimited (and not infinite) analysis, occurs in the measure that something about which I can at least pose the question as to how it is analysable, had been not, I would say, unanalysed, but revealed only in a partial fashion where this limit is established.

You must not believe that I am saying here, that I am contributing here something again which ought to be considered as completely outside the limits of the blueprint already sketched out by our experience, because after all, to refer to recent and familiar works in the French domain of our work, it is around penis envy, that one analyst made his analysis of obsessionals in particular turn, through the years that made up the time of his writing. How often in the course of previous years have I commented on these observations for you in order to criticise them, to show in them, with what we had at that time to hand, what I considered as their stumbling point. I would formulate here, in a more precise fashion, at the point of explanation that we are getting to, what is involved, what I meant. What was involved - you see it from a detailed reading of these

(15) observations - what was involved if not the filling of this field which I designate as the interpretation to be made of the phallic function at the level of the big Other whose place is held by the analyst and the covering, I would say, of this place with the phantasy of fellatio, and especially concerning the analyst's penis.

A very clear indication. The problem had been seen and let me tell you that it is not by chance, I mean by chance with respect to what I am in the process of developing before you. Only my remark is that here there is only an angle, and an inadequate angle: for, in reality, this phantasy used for an analysis which could not here exhaust what was involved, only rejoins a phantasy symptomatic of the obsessional.

And to designate what I mean, I would go back here to a reference which, in the literature, is really exemplary, namely the well known nocturnal behavior of the Ratman when, having obtained by himself, his own erection in front of a mirror, he goes and opens the door to the landing, to his landing, to the imagined ghost of his dead father, to present, before the eyes of this spectre, the present state of his member.

To analyse what is involved then uniquely then at the level of this phantasy of the fellatio of the analyst so linked by the author in question to what he called the technique of rapprocher (getting closer) to the relationship of distance considered as essential, fundamental to the obsessional structure, specifically in its relationships with psychosis, is, I believe, simply to have allowed the subject, indeed even to have encouraged her to take on this phantastical reaction, which is that of the Ratman, to take on the role of this Other in the mode of presence which is precisely here constituted by death, of this other who looks, by pushing her even, I would say, a little further phantastically simply by the fellatio.

It is obvious that this final point, this final term is only addressed here to those whose practice allows them to put the import of these remarks in their proper place.

(16) I will end on the path on which we will advance further the next time, and to give their meaning to these two images which I have designated for you here in the right corner at the bottom of the board: the first represents a - this is not seen, in fact, at first sight - represents a vase, and its neck. I put the hole of this neck facing you to designate, to clearly stress for you that what is important for me is the edge.

The second is the transformation which can be carried out as regards this neck and this edge. Starting from there, there is going to appear to you the opportuneness of the long insistence that I placed last year on topological considerations concerning the function of identification - I specified it for you - at the level of desire, namely the third type designated by Freud, in his article on identification, the one whose major example he finds in hysteria.

Here is the incidence and the import of these topological considerations. I told you that I kept you so long on the cross-cap to give you the possibility of intuitively conceiving what must be called the distinction between the object we are speaking about, o , and the object created, constructed starting from the specular relationship, the common object precisely concerning the specular image.

To go quickly, I am going, I think, to remind you of it, in terms which are simple but adequate given the amount of work accomplished previously.

What ensures that a specular image is distinct from that which it represents? It is that the right becomes the left and inversely.

In other words, if we trust this idea - we usually have our reward when we trust even the most aphoristic things in Freud - that the ego is a surface, it is in topological terms of pure surface that the problem ought to be posed: the specular image, with respect to what it duplicates, is exactly the passage from the right-hand glove to the left-hand glove, what one can obtain on a simple surface by turning the glove inside out.

Remember that it was not today or yesterday that I spoke to you about the glove or the hood. The whole dream quoted by Ella (17) Sharpe turns for the most part around this model.

Try the experiment now with what I taught you to know - I hope there are not many who do not know it yet - about the Moebius strip, namely - I recall it for those who have not yet heard tell of it - you obtain very easily in any way whatsoever, by taking this belt, and after having opened it, fasten it again having given it meanwhile a half turn, you obtain a Moebius strip, namely something on which an ant walking along passes from one of these apparent faces to the other face, without needing to pass across the edge, namely a surface with a single face.

A surface with a single face cannot be turned inside out. For effectively you take a Moebius strip; you make it; you see that there are two ways to make it, depending on whether one turns, one makes the half turn that I spoke about above to the right or to the left and that they do not overlap. But if you turn one of them inside out it will always be identical to itself. This is what I call not having a specular image.

You know on the other hand that I told you that in the cross-cap, when, by means of a section, a cut, which has no other condition than that of rejoining itself, after having included in it the hole-point of the cross-cap, when, I am saying, you isolate a part of the cross-cap, it remains a Moebius strip.

Here is the residual part. I constructed it for you, I am passing it around. It has its interest because, let me tell you: this is o . I give it to you like a host, for you will make use of it subsequently. That is how o is made.

It is made like that when any cut whatsoever has occurred, whether it is that of the cord, that of circumcision, and some (18) others still which we will have to designate.

There remains, after this cut whatever it may be, something comparable to the Moebius strip, something which does not have a specular image. Now then consider carefully what I want to tell you.

The first phase, the vase which is here has its specular image, the ideal ego, constitutive of the world of the common object.

Add to it o in the form of a cross-cap, and separate out in this cross-cap the little object o that I have placed in your hands. There remains, united to $i'(o)$, the remainder, namely a Moebius strip, in other words - I am representing it for you here - it is the same thing as if you make there begin, from the opposite point of the edge of the vase, a surface which connects up with itself, as in the Moebius strip.

Because from that moment, the whole vase becomes a Moebius strip, because an ant walking along the outside enters the inside without any difficulty. The specular image becomes the strange and invasive image of the double, becomes that which happens little by little at the end of the life of Maupassant when he begins by no longer seeing himself in the mirror, or when he perceives in a room something which turns its back on him and regarding which he immediately knows that he is not without some relationship to this ghost, when the ghost turns back, he sees that it is himself.

This is what is involved in the entry of o into the world of the real, which it is only returning to. And notice, to end, what is involved. It may seem strange, bizarre to you as a hypothesis, that something resembles this. Notice however that if we put it outside the operation of the visual field, behave like a blind man, close your eyes for a moment, and feeling your way, follow the edge of this transformed vase. But it is a vase like the other, there is only one hole because there is only one edge. it appears to have two of them. And this ambiguity between the one and the two, I think that those who have simply read a little know that it is a common ambiguity concerning the apparition of the phallus in the field of dream appearance - and not only dreams - of the sexual organ where there apparently is no real phallus. Its ordinary mode of apparition is to appear in the form of two phalluses. There, that's enough for today!

I would like to manage to tell you today a certain number of things about what I have taught you to designate as the object o, this object o towards which the aphorism that I put forward the last time about anxiety orients us, namely that it is not without an object. This is why the object o comes this year into the centre of our remarks. And if effectively it is inscribed in the frame of this anxiety that I took as a title, it is precisely for the reason that it is essentially from this angle that it is possible to speak about it, which means again that anxiety is its only subjective expression.

If the o which we are dealing with here was all the same introduced a long time ago and along the path which brings it to you, was therefore announced elsewhere, it was announced in the formula of the phantasy $ « o, desire of o, this is the formula of the phantasy qua support for desire.

My first point will be then to recall, to articulate, to add one more specification certainly for those who have heard me, one not impossible for them to master by themselves, even though it does not seem superfluous to me to underline it today. As a first point - I hope to reach point four - and to specify this function of the object in so far as we define it analytically as object of desire, the mirage coming from a perspective that one could call subjectivist, I mean the one which in the constitution of our experience puts the whole accent on the structure of the subject, this line of elaboration that the modern philosophical tradition brought to its most extreme point, let us say, around Husserl, by separating out the function of intentionality, is one that makes us the captives of a misunderstanding, concerning what can be called the object of desire. The object of desire cannot be conceived of in a fashion which teaches us that there is no noeme, no thinking about something which is not turned towards something, the only point around which idealism can turn in its path towards the Real.

(2) Is this how things are as regards desire? For this level of our listening which exists in everyone and which has need of intuition, I would say: "Is the object of desire out in front? This is the mirage that is involved and which has sterilised everything that in analysis intended to advance in the direction described as object relations. It is in order to rectify it that I have already travelled along many paths. It is a new way of accentuating this rectification that I am going to put forward to you now.

I will not make it as developed as it no doubt should be, reserving, I hope, this formulation for a work which will reach you along a different path.

I think that for most of you listening it will be enough to hear the gross formulae with which I believe I can content myself to emphasise today this point which I have just introduced.

You know how, in the progress of epistemology, the isolation of the notion of cause has produced considerable difficulties. It is not without a series of reductions which end up by leading it to the most tenuous and the most equivocal function that the notion of cause was able to be maintained in the development of what in the largest sense we could call our physics.

It is clear on the other hand that whatever reduction one submits it to, what one might call the mental function of this notion cannot be eliminated, reduced to a sort of metaphysical shadow. We clearly sense that there is something, which it is too little to say that is a recourse to intuition, which makes it subsist, which remains around this function of cause, and I claim that it is starting from the re-examination that we can make of it, starting from analytic experience, that the whole Critique of pure reason, brought up to date with our science, could re-establish a correct status of cause.

I scarcely dare to say to introduce it - for after all what I am going to formulate is here only a discourse event and scarcely anchored in this dialectic - I would say then, to fix our aims, what I intend to make you understand. The object, the object o, this object which is not to be situated in anything whatsoever which is analogous to the intentionality of an noeme, which is not in the intentionality of desire, this object ought to be conceived by us as the cause of desire, and, to take up my (3) metaphor of a little while ago, the object is behind desire.

It is from this object o that there arises this dimension whose omission, whose elision, whose avoidance in the theory of the subject constituted the inadequacy up to the present of this whole coordination whose centre manifests itself as a theory of knowledge, gnoseology.

Moreover this function of the object, in the novel structural topology that it requires, is quite tangible in Freud's formulations, and specifically in those concerning the drive.

Let it suffice for me to - if you want to check it against a text, I would refer you to the XXXIInd lecture from the Introduction to psychoanalysis, which can be found in what is called the new series of Vorlesungen, the one I quoted the last time - it is clear that the distinction between Ziel, the goal of the drive and the Objekt is something quite different to what you first think, that this goal and this object should be at the same place. And the statements of Freud that you will find in this place, in the lecture that I am designating for you, employ very striking terms, the first of which is the term eingeschoben: the object slides in it, goes somewhere - it is the same word which is used for the Verschiebung which designates displacement - the object in its essential function as the something which slips away is here highlighted as such, at the level of understanding which is properly our own.

On the other hand, there is, at this level the explicit opposition between two terms äusseres, external, outside, and inneres, inside. It is specified that the object is no doubt to be situated äusseres, on the outside, and on the other hand that the satisfaction of the tendency is only found to be accomplished in so far as it connects up with something which is to be considered in the inneres, the inside of the body, it is there that it finds its Befriedigung, its satisfaction. This also tells you that what I introduced for you as a topological function allows us to formulate in a clear fashion that what has to be introduced here to resolve this impasse, this riddle, is the notion of an outside before a certain interiorisation, of the outside which is situated here, o, before the subject at the locus of the Other, grasps himself in x in this specular form which introduces for him the distinction between the me and the (4) not-me.

It is to this outside, to this locus of the object before any interiorisation, that there belongs - if you try to take up again the notion of cause - that this notion of cause, I am saying, belongs.

I am going to illustrate it immediately in the simplest fashion to make you hear what I am saying; because moreover I will abstain today from doing any metaphysics.

In order to image it, it is not by chance that I will make use of the fetish as such, where there is unveiled this dimension of the object as cause of desire. Because it is not the slipper, or the breast, nor whatever it may be in which you incarnate the fetish that is desired; but the fetish as cause of desire which hooks onto whatever it can, onto someone who is not absolutely necessarily the one who is wearing the slipper; the slipper can be in her surroundings; it is not even necessary that she should have the breast: the breast can be in the head. But what everyone knows, is that, for the fetishist, it is necessary that the fetish should be there, that it is the condition upon which desire sustains itself.

And I would indicate here, in passing, this term, little used I believe in German and that the vague translations that we have in French, allow to escape completely; it is, when anxiety is involved, the relationship that Freud indicates with Libidoaushalt. We are dealing here with a term which is between Aushaltung which would indicate something of the order of interruption, of breaking and Inhalt which is the content. It is neither one thing nor the other: it is the support of the libido. In a word, this relationship to the object that I am speaking about to you today, is here directed, indicated in a fashion which allows a synthesis to be made between the signal function of anxiety and its relationship all the same to something that we can call an interruption in the support of the libido.

We are going to come back to it because this is one of the points that I intend to advance before you today. Assuming that I have made myself adequately understood by this reference to the fetish, about the maximal difference that there is between two possible perspectives concerning the object as object of desire, two specifications of what is involved, when I put o first in an essential precession, I will illustrate it a little further.

Everything that follows in our discourse will not stop (5) illustrating it further, but already I want you to understand properly what is involved, where our research will lead us: the fact is that it is at the very locus where your mental habits indicate that you should seek for the subject, this something which despite you is outlined as such as subject at the place where for example Freud indicates the source of the tendency, indeed there where there is something which, in discourse, you articulate as being you, there where you say: "I", it is there properly speaking that at the level of the unconscious there is situated o.

At this level, you are o, the object, and everyone knows that this is what is intolerable and not only to discourse itself, which after all betrays it. I am going to illustrate it right away by a remark destined to introduce some displacement, some disturbance even, as regards the ruts in which you are used to leaving the functions described as sadism and masochism as if all that was involved there was the register of a sort of immanent aggression and its reversibility.

It is precisely in the measure that one has to enter into their subjective structure that traits of difference are going to appear, the essential being the one that I am going to designate now. If sadism can be imaged, in a form which is only an abbreviated schema of the same distinctions that the graph organises, in a formula with four vertices of the kind that I am designating here, we have here the side of 0, of the Other, and here that of let us say, of the subject S, of this still unconstituted I of this subject precisely to be questioned, to be revised within our experience, of which we only know that it cannot, in any case, coincide with the traditional formula of the subject, namely the degree of exhaustion there can be in every relationship with the object.

[0 = 7e40]

If there is something there called sadistic desire, with all the enigma it involves, it is only articulatable, it is only formulatable in so far as this schize, this dissociation, that it aims essentially at introducing in the other, by imposing on him, up to a certain limit, that which cannot be tolerated, at the exactly adequate limit where there manifests itself, where there appears in the other this division, this gap there is between his (6) existence as subject and what he undergoes, what he can suffer in his body.

And to such a degree is it this distinction, this division, this gap as essential that is involved and a matter of questioning, that in fact it is not so much the suffering of the other that is sought in the sadistic intention, as his anxiety - precisely here I articulate, I designate, I note this little sign, f8, which in the first formulae that I believe in my second lecture of this year, I introduced concerning anxiety, I taught you to read by the term not 0, I told you, but zero - the anxiety of the other, his essential existence as subject with respect to this anxiety, this is what the sadistic desire wants to make vibrate.

And it is for this reason that, in one of my past seminars, I did not hesitate to relate its structure as properly homologous to what Kant articulated as a condition for the exercise of pure practical reason, of a moral will properly speaking, and, in a word, to situate there the only point where there can be manifested a relationship with a pure moral good.

I apologise for the briefness of this reminder. Those who were present at this rapprochement will remember it; those who were not able to attend will see, I think, appearing in the not too distant future what I took up of it again in a preface to Philosophy in the boudoir which was precisely the text around which I had organised this comparison.

What is important today and the only thing I want to add another touch to, is that what characterises the sadistic desire is properly that he does not know that in the accomplishment of his act, of his ritual - because it involves properly speaking this type of human action in which we find all the structures of ritual - what he does not know, is what he is looking for, and what he is looking for, is properly speaking to realise himself, to make himself appear, to whom - since, in any case, this revelation can only remain obscure to himself - to make himself appear as pure object, black fetish. This is how there can be resumed, in its final term, the manifestation of sadistic desire, in so far as the one who is its agent goes towards such a realisation.

(7) Moreover, if you evoke what is involved in the figure of Sade, you will see then that it is not by chance if, what can be extracted from it, what remains of it, through a sort of transubstantiation through the ages, with the imaginary elaboration of his figure throughout the generations, is a form - Man Ray could do no better when he tried to construct his imaginary portrait - precisely a petrified form. Quite different is, as you know, the position of the masochist for whom this incarnation of himself as object is the declared goal, whether he turns himself into a dog under the table or a piece of merchandise, an item that is treated in a contract by giving it over, by selling it as one among other objects that are on the market, in short, his identification with this other object which I called the common object, the object of exchange, this is the route, this is the path on which he seeks precisely what is impossible, which is to grasp himself for what he is, in so far as like all of us he is an o. .

To know why he is so interested by this recognition, which all the same remains impossible, is of course what many particular conditions of his analysis could reveal. But before even being able to understand these particular conditions, there are certain conjunctions which must be properly established here and which are the most structural ones. This is what we are going to try-to do now.

You should clearly understand that I have not said, without elaboration, that the masochist attains his identification with the object. As for the sadist this identification only appears on the stage. Only, even on this stage, the sadist does not see himself, he only sees the remainder. There is also something that the masochist does not see - we will see what perhaps a little later - but this allows me to introduce right away some formulae the first of which is the following: that to recognise oneself as the object of one's desire, in the sense that I am articulating it today, is always masochistic. This formula has the interest of making the difficulty tangible for you, because it is all too convenient to use our little Punch and to say that if there is masochism, it is because the super-ego is very wicked, for example. We know of course that within masochism we make all the necessary distinctions: erogenous masochism, feminine masochism, moral masochism. But as the simple enunciation of this classification has pretty much the same effect as what I would say if I were to say: "There is this glass, there is the Christian faith, and there is the collapse of (8) Wall Street". This should all the same leave us a little dissatisfied. If the term masochism can have a meaning, it would be well to find a more unitary formula for it and if we were to say that the super-ego is the cause of masochism, we would not be abandoning too much this satisfying intuition, except for the fact that, since we have said before that the object is the cause of desire, we would see that the super-ego shares, at least that it shares the function of this object qua cause, as I have introduced it today in order to make you sense how true it is. I could include it in the catalogue, in the series of these objects as we will have to deploy them before you, by illustrating this place with all the contents, if you wish, that it can have and which are numerable. If I did not do it at the beginning, it was so that you would not lose your heads, by seeing them as contents, and think that they are the same thing that you always discover about analysis. For it is not true. If you think you know the function of the maternal breast, or that of the turd, you know well how much obscurity remains in your minds about the phallus, and when it is the object which comes immediately after that is concerned. I will give it to you all the same, as a way of giving your curiosity something to feed on, namely the eye as such, about it you know nothing at all. This is why it should only be approached with prudence, and for the best of reasons. This is the object involved since, when all is said and done, it is the object without which there is no anxiety, it is because it is a dangerous object. Let us be prudent therefore since I lack, that is to say in the immediate, the opportunity of making appear in what sense I said it - this caught the ear of one of my listeners - I said, two lectures ago, that if desire and the law were the same thing, it is in so far and in this sense that desire and the law have a common object.

It is not enough then in this case to give oneself the consolation that they are, with respect to one another, like the two sides of the wall, or like the front and the back. This is to cheapen the difficulty and, to go straight to the point which makes you sense it, I would say that it is not for any other reason than to make you sense it, that there is value in the (9) central myth which allowed psychoanalysis to take off, namely the Oedipus myth.

The Oedipus myth means nothing else, if not that, at the origin, desire, the desire of the father and the law are one and the same thing, and that the relationship between the law and desire is so close that nothing but the function of the law traces the path of desire, that desire, qua desire of the mother, for the mother, is identical to the function of the law. It is in so far as the law prohibits her that it imposes desiring her: for after all the mother is not in herself the most desirable object. If everything is organised around this desire for the mother, if it is starting from there that it is posed that the woman one should prefer - for this is what is in question - should be other than the mother, what does that mean, if not that a commandment is imposed, is introduced into the very structure of desire; that in a word one desires according to the commandment. What does the whole myth of Oedipus mean, if not that the desire of the father is what has made the law.

From this perspective masochism takes on the value and function of appearing and clearly appearing - it is its only value for the masochist - when desire and the law are found together; for what the masochist tries to make appear - and I add, on his little stage, for one must never forget this dimension - is something where the desire of the Other lays down the law.

We see immediately one of its effects: it is that the masochist himself appears in this function that I would call lopsided (dejet) with respect to this object of ours, the o of which we speak under the appearance of waste (dejete), of what is thrown to the dogs, on the rubbish heap, in the dustbin, to the rejection of the common object, for want of being able to put it elsewhere.

It is one of the aspects in which there can appear the o as it shows itself in perversion. And this does not exhaust in any way what we can only circumscribe by going around it, namely the function of o. But since I have taken this perspective of masochism, since I have introduced it, we must give ourselves other points of reference to situate this function of o. You see one of them at the level of masochism. I remind you that one must first take for its function of gross correlation, that the central effect of this identity which conjoins the desire of the (10) father and the law, is the castration complex in so far as when the law is born by this moulting, this mysterious mutation of the desire of the father after he had been killed, the consequence is, just as much in the history of analytic thought as in everything that we can conceive of as the most certain liaison, is in any case the castration complex.

This is why you have already seen appearing in my schemas the notation (-<J>) at the place where o is missing.

Therefore, a first point today: I spoke to you about the object as cause of desire. Second point, I told you: to recognise oneself as the object of one's desire, is always masochistic; I pointed out to you in this connection what was taking shape for us as a presentation - in a certain incidence of the super-ego, I indicated to you a particularity that is in some way depreciated - of what is happening at the place of this object o in the form of (-$>).

We come to our third point, the one which concerns precisely this possibility of the manifestations of the object o as lack. It is structural to it. And it is in order to make it conceivable that this schema, this image designed to make it familiar to you has been presentified and recalled to you for some time past.

The object o at the level of our analytic subject, of the source of what subsists as body which in part, for us hides from us as I might say its own will, this object o is this rock of which Freud speaks, this final irreducible reserve of libido whose contours it is so pathetic to see him literally punctuating in these texts every time that he encounters it. I will not end my lecture today without telling you where you should go to renew this conviction. This little o, at the place where it is, at the level where it could be recognised if it were possible - because of course a little earlier I told you that to recognise oneself as object of one's desire is always masochistic - if it were possible, the masochist only does it on the stage. And you are going to see what happens when he can no longer remain there, on the stage. We are not always on the stage, even though the stage stretches very far, and even into the domain of our dreams. And qua not on the stage and remaining on this side of it, and trying (11) to read in the Other what he returns from, we find nothing but the lack here at X (schema).

It is this liaison, coordination between the object and its necessary lack there where the subject is constituted at the locus of the Other, namely as far as possible, beyond even what can appear in the return of the repressed and constituting the Urverdrangung, the irreducible of the incognito, because moreover we cannot say absolutely unknowable because we are talking about it, it is here that there is structured, that there is situated what, in our analysis of the transference, I produced before you by the term agalma.

It is in so far as this empty place is aimed at as such that there is established the always more or less neglected - and for good reasons - dimension of transference. That this place as such can be circumscribed by something which is materialised in this image, a certain edge, a certain opening, a certain gap where the constitution of the specular image shows its limits, this is the elective locus of anxiety.

This phenomenon of edge, in what opens like this window on privileged occasions, marks the illusory limit of this world of recognition, of the one that I call the stage. That it should be linked to this edge, to this framing, to this gap which is illustrated in this schema at least twice, in this edge here of the mirror and moreover in this little sign, ^, that this is the locus of anxiety, is what you ought always to retain as the signal of what is to be sought for in the middle.

The text of Freud to which I would ask you to refer, for it is a text that is always more stupefying to read because of this double aspect of weaknesses, of inadequacies which always present themselves to novices at the beginning as the first things to be picked out in the text of Freud and of the depth with which everything that he comes up against - reveals the degree to which Freud was here around this very field that we are trying to designate, of course, it is necessary first of all for you to be familiar with the text of Dora - can, for those who heard my discourse on the Symposium, recall this dimension always eluded when transference is involved, and of the other dimension in parenthesis, namely that transference is not simply something that reproduces a situation, an action, an attitude, an old (12) trauma, and repeats it; the fact is that there is always another coordinate, the one on which I put the accent in connection with the analytic intervention of Socrates, namely specifically in the case where I evoke a love present in the real, and that we can understand nothing about transference if we do not know that it is also the consequence of that love, that it is in connection with this present love - and analysts should remember it during analyses - of a love which is present in different ways, but that at least they should remember it, when it is there visible, that it is in function of what we could call this real love that there is established what is the central question of transference, namely the one the subject poses concerning the agalma, namely what he is lacking. For it is with this lack that he loves. It is not for nothing that for years I have been repeating to you that love is to give what one does not have. This is even the principle of the castration complex: in order to have the phallus, in order to be able to make use of it, it is necessary precisely not to be it.

When one returns to the conditions where it appears that one is it - for one is it just as much for a man, there is no doubt about it, and for a woman we will say again through what incidence she is led to become it - well then it is always very dangerous.

Let it suffice for me to ask you before leaving you to reread attentively this text entirely devoted to the relationships between Freud and his patient, this girl - I remind you - of whom he says that analysis makes there appear that it is essentially around an enigmatic disappointment concerning the birth in her family, the apparition in her household of a little child that she has been oriented towards homosexuality.

With an absolutely admirable touch of the science of analogy, Freud perceives what is involved in this demonstrative love of the young girl for a woman who has undoubtedly a suspect reputation, with regard to whom she behaves herself, Freud tells us, in an essentially virile fashion. And if one limits oneself to reading simply what is there, God knows, virility, we are so used to speaking about it without knowing that we do not see that what he intends to emphasise there, is what I tried to presentify before you in all sorts of ways in stressing that it is the function of what is called courtly love: she behaves like the (13) knight who suffers for his lady, is content with the most impoverished, the least substantial favours, who prefers even to only have those and who finally, the more the object of his love goes in the opposite direction to what one could call reward, the more he overestimates and raises this object to an eminent dignity.

When manifestly the whole public clamour cannot fail to impress on her that effectively the behaviour of her well-beloved is extremely doubtful, this dimension of exaltation only sees there being added to it the supplementary and reinforced aim of saving her. All of this is admirably underlined by Freud and you know how the girl in question had been brought to his consultation room: it is in the measure that one day, this liaison carried out what is more really in defiance of the whole city, in a style whose relationship of provocation with respect to her family Freud perceived right away - and it appears very quickly and very certainly that it is her father - this liaison comes to an end because of an encounter. The young girl in the company of her beloved, we are told, passes, on the way to the office of the father in question, this father who throws an irritated glance at her; the scene then happens very quickly. The person for whom, no doubt, this adventure is only a rather obscure distraction and who is beginning obviously to have enough of it and who, no doubt, does not want to expose herself to great difficulties, tells the young girl that this has lasted long enough and that that is it for the future, that she should stop sending her, as she does everyday, countless flowers, following her everywhere she goes. And at this the girl immediately throws herself over a place as regards which you will remember at one time I explored minutely the maps of Vienna to allow its full meaning to be given to the case of little Hans, I would not go so far today as to tell you the place where something very probably can be found something comparable to what you still see over by Boulevard Pereire, namely a little ditch at the bottom of which there are the rails of a little railway which is not working anymore, this is where the girl throws herself, niederkommt, falls down.

There are many things to say about this niederkommen. If I am introducing it here, it is because it is an act of which it is not sufficient to mention, to recall, the analogy with the meaning of niederkommen in the event of giving to birth, to exhaust its (14) meaning. This neiderkommen is essential for every sudden relating of the subject with what he is as o.

It is not for nothing that the melancholic subject has such a propensity and one always accomplished with a blinding, disconcerting, rapidity for throwing himself through the window.

The window, in so far as it reminds us of this limit between the stage and the world, indicates to us what is meant by this act by which, in a way, the subject returns to this fundamental exclusion he feels himself to be in at the very moment that there is conjoined in the absolute of a subject, which we analysts alone can have an idea of, this conjunction between desire and the law.

This is properly what happens at the moment of the encounter between the couple, the knight of Lesbos and her Kareninian object, if I can express myself in this way, with the father. For it is not enough to say that the father threw an irritated glance to understand how there could have been produced this passage a l'acte. There is something which belongs there to the very basis of the relationship, to the structure; because what is involved? Let us say it briefly in terms that I believe sufficiently prepared for you to understand them: the girl for whom the attachment to the father and the disappointment because of the birth, of a young brother, if I remember rightly, this disappointment was the turning point of her life, is going then to do what? Make of her castration as a woman what the knight does with respect to his lady, to whom precisely he offers the sacrifice of his virile prerogatives to make of her the support of what is linked in the relationship by an inversion to this sacrifice itself, namely the putting in place of the lack, precisely what is lacking to the field of the other, namely the supreme guarantee, the fact that the law is well and truly the desire of the father, that one is sure of it, that there is a law of the father, an absolute phallus,^ .

No doubt resentment and vengeance are decisive in the relationship between this girl and her father. That is what resentment and vengeance are: this law, this supreme phallus, here is where I put it. She is my lady, and since I cannot be your submissive woman, and I your object, I am the one who sustains, who creates, the idealised relationship to what is inadequate in myself, what was repulsed. Let us not forget that the girl had given up on, had let go the culture of her (15) narcissism, her toilet, her coquetry-/ her beauty, to become the servant knight of the lady.

It is in the measure that all of this is contained in this simple encounter and at the level of the father's look, for whom, nevertheless on this whole scene which had completely gained the assent of the subject, that this scene falls under the look of the father, that there is produced what we could call in referring ourselves to the first table that I gave you about the coordinates of anxiety this supreme embarrassment, that emotion - consult this table, you will see its exact coordinates - emotion is added to it by the sudden impossibility of facing up to the scene her friend had put before her; two essential conditions of what is properly speaking called passage a l'acte, (and here I am addressing myself to someone who asked me to anticipate a little on what I can say about this distinction from acting out, we^will have to come back to it), the two conditions of the passage a l'acte as such are realised. What comes at this moment to the subject, is her absolute identification to this o, to which she is reduced. Confrontation with this desire of the father upon which all her behaviour is constructed, with this law which is presentified in the look of the father, it is through this that she feels herself identified and at the same moment, rejected, ejected off the stage.

Only the "letting fall", the "letting oneself fall" can realise it. I do not have the time today to indicate to you the direction that this takes, namely that the celebrated notation by Freud of the identification to the object in mourning, as being something on which there is brought to bear something which he expresses as the revenge of the one who is experiencing the mourning, is not enough. We carry on mourning and we experience the devaluating effects of mourning in so far as the object that we are mourning for was, without us knowing it, the one which had become, that we had made the support for our castration.

Castration returns to us; and we see ourselves for what we are, in so far as we would be essentially returned to this position of castration. You see that I am running out of time and that here I can only give an indication; but what well designates the degree to which this is what is involved there are two things: it is the way in which Freud senses that however spectacular the advances made by the patient in her analysis, it runs off her (16) like water off a duck's back, and if he designates specifically this place which is that of o in the mirror of the Other by all possible coordinates, without of course having the elements of my topology, but one could not say it more clearly, for he says there: "Here, what I come to a halt before, what I run into, (says Freud), is something like what happens in hypnosis". Now what is it that happens in hypnosis? It is that the subject is capable of reading in the mirror of the Other everything that is there at the level of this little vase in dots: one goes for everything that is specularisable. It is not for nothing that the mirror, the stopper of the carafe, indeed the look of the hypnotiser, are the instruments of hypnosis. The only thing that one does not see in hypnosis, is precisely the stopper of the carafe itself, nor the look of the hypnotiser which is the cause of hypnosis.

The cause of hypnosis is not seen in the consequences of hypnosis. The other reference: the doubt of the obsessional. And on what is brought to bear the radical doubt which ensures also that the analyses of obsessionals are pursued for a long time and very nicely? The treatment of an obsession is always a real honeymoon between the analyst and the analysand, in so far as this centre where Freud designates very well the sort of discourse spoken by the obsessional, namely: "He is really a very nice man; he tells me the most beautiful things in the world, the trouble is that I do not quite believe them". If it is central, it is because it is there, in x, in the case of the young homosexual, what is involved, is precisely what ought to illuminate us, namely a certain promotion of the phallus as such, to the place of o and it is here - I feel scrupulous about saying it, because moreover it is a marvellously illuminating text that I do not need to give you the other properties of, but I would beseech you not to take as one of these meaningless repetitions that we have become used to, since that on which, the man in question, who was discovering things at that time, ends his text, namely the distinction between constitutional elements and historical elements - it does not matter which ones - in the determination of homosexuality, and the isolation, this being as such the proper field of analysis, of the object, the object choice (Objektwahl) distinguishing it as such, as including the (17) mechanisms which are original, everything turns effectively around this relationship between the subject and o.

The paradox is the one which is close to what I indicated to you the second time as the point where Freud bequeathed us the question of how to operate at the level of the castration complex, and designated by something which is inscribed in the observation which I am astonished is not a more common object of astonishment among analysts, that this analysis ends with Freud dropping her.

For with Dora - I will come back to it - we can better articulate now what happened; not everything is awkwardly done, far from it, and one can say that if Dora was not completely analysed, Freud sees clearly to the very end. But here, where the function of small o, of the object, is in a way so prevalent in the observation of the homosexual that it even got to the stage of passing into the real in this passage à l'acte whose symbolic revelation he nevertheless understands so well, Freud gives up: "I will not be able to do anything", he says to himself and he passes her on to a female colleague. It is he who takes the initiative of letting her fall.

I will leave you on this term to give you an opportunity of reflecting on it, because you will clearly see that this concern leads us to aim at an essential reference in the analytic handling of the transference.

Seminar 9 : Wednesday 23 January 1963

Today we are going to continue speaking about what I am designating for you as the small o.

To maintain our axis, in other words, in order not to allow you the opportunity of drifting off because of my very explanations, I will begin by recalling its relationship to the subject. Nevertheless, what we have to say, to emphasis today, is its relationship to the big Other, the other connoted by an O, because, as we shall see, it is essential to understand that it is to thic. Other that it owes its isolation, that it is constituted as a remainder in the relationship of the subject to the Other. That is why I have reproduced this schema, the homologue of the apparatus of division. The subject on the top right in so far as by our dialectic it takes its origin from the function of the signifier, the hypothetical subject S at the origin of this dialectic constitutes itself at the locus of the Other as marked by the signifier, the only subject our experience has access to, inversely suspending the whole existence of the Other on a guarantee which is lacking, the barred Other: \bar{O} .

But from this operation, there is a remainder: it is the o. The last time, I initiated, I put before you as an example, not a unique example - for behind this example, that of the case of female homosexuality, there was profiled that of Dora - I put before you as a structural characteristic of this relationship of the subject to o, the essential possibility, what could be called (2) the universal relationship concerning the o, for at every level you will always find it, and I would say that this is the most characteristic connotation, since precisely it is linked to this function of the remainder. This is what I called, borrowed from the vocabulary and the reading of Freud in connection with the passage a l'acte which brought him his case of female homosexuality, the letting drop, the niederkommen lassen. And you no doubt remember that I ended with this remark that, strangely, this is what in connection with the case marked the response of Freud himself to a difficulty that is quite exemplary, for in everything that Freud testified to us by his action, by his behaviour, by his experience, this letting drop is unique at the same time as it is almost so manifest, so provokative in his text, that for some people reading it it becomes quasi-invisible.

This letting drop is the essential correlate that I indicated to you the last time of the passage a l'acte. Again from what side is this letting drop seen, in the passage a l'acte? From the side of the subject, precisely. The passage a l'acte is, if you wish, on the side of the subject in the phantasy in so far as she appears effaced by the bar to the maximum extent. It is at the moment of greatest embarrassment that, with the behavioural addition of emotion as disorder of movement, the subject, as one might say, precipitates herself from where she is, from the locus of the stage where it is only as a fundamentally historicised subject that she can maintain herself in her status of subject, that essentially she topples off the stage, this is the very structure as such of the passage a l'acte.

The woman in the observation on female homosexuality jumps over the little barrier which separates her from the culvert where there runs the little semi-underground tramway in Vienna, Dora at the moment of embarrassment into which - I pointed it out to you (3) a long time ago - the trick sentence, the clumsy trap of Mr K puts her: "My wife means nothing to me", goes into action (passe a l'acte).

The slap, the slap which here can only express nothing but the most complete ambiguity: is it Mr K or Mrs K that she loves? It is certainly not the slap which will tell us. But such a slap is one of the signs, of these crucial moments in destiny which we can see reverberating from generation to generation with its value as a switching point in a particular destiny.

This direction of escaping from the stage, is what allows us to recognise and, you will see, to distinguish the passage a. l'acte with its proper value, from this something quite different which is acting-out.

Will I tell you of another very obvious example? Who would dream of contesting this label for what is called a fugue? And what is a fugue in a subject, always put in a more or less infantile position, who throws himself into it, if not this sort of exit from the stage, this vagabond departure into the pure world, where the subject sets off to search for, to encounter something everywhere refused: he froths with rage (il se fait mousse), as they say; of course, he comes back, he returns, this can be the opportunity to become enraged; and this departure, is indeed this passage from the stage to the world for which moreover it was so useful that, in the first phases of this discourse on anxiety, I posed for you this essential distinction between two registers of the world, the place where the real hurries onto this stage of the Other where man as subject has to constitute himself, to take his place as the one who carries the word, but who can only carry it in a structure which however truly it is established is a structure of fiction.

I will come, in order to tell you at first how this remainder as such asserts itself in the most characteristic way, to speak to (4) you today first of all - I mean before going any further in the function of anxiety - about acting-out.

It may no doubt seem to you, if not astonishing, at least another detour - a further detour, is it not a detour too many? - to hear me in a discourse about anxiety on something which at first sight seems rather to be an avoidance of it. Observe, nevertheless, that you are only rediscovering here what an interrogation which was essential at the beginning, has already punctuated in my discourse, namely whether anxiety is not so absolute a mode of communication between the subject and the Other that to tell the truth one could ask oneself whether anxiety is not properly speaking what is common to the subject and to the Other.

I put here, in order to find it again later, a little mark, a white stone, namely one of the traits which gives us most difficulty and which we must preserve, namely that no discourse about anxiety can fail to recognise that we have to deal with the phenomenon of anxiety in certain animals. And after all, what is there here at first, if not a question, namely how can we be so sure of a feeling in an animal, and perhaps only of this one. For it is the only one that we can have no doubts about when we encounter it in an animal, rediscovering here in an exterior form this character which I already noted anxiety involves, of being this something which does not deceive.

Having posited therefore the outline of what I hope to cover today, I recall first of all as regards this ϕ towards which we advance through its relationship to the Other, to the O , some remarks by way of reminder, and starting from the following, which was already indicated in what I told you up to now, that (5) anxiety - you see it emerging in this schema which here reflects tachygraphically and I apologise if it appears at the same time a little approximate - anxiety, we see, emerging in conformity with the last thinking of Freud, anxiety is a signal in the ego; if it is a signal in the ego, it ought to be there somewhere, at the locus of the ideal ego in the schema; and if it is somewhere, I think I have already sufficiently shown you to begin with that it must be here at x , and it is a phenomenon of the edge in the imaginary field of the ego, this term of edge being legitimated since it is based on the affirmation of Freud himself, that the ego is a surface, and even, he adds, a projection of a surface; I recalled that at one stage. Let us say therefore that it is a colour, as I might say.

I will justify later, when I have the opportunity, the metaphorical use of this term colour, which appears at the edge of the specular surface itself, itself an inversion, qua specular, of the real surface. Here, let us not forget, it is a real image that we call i(o), the ideal ego.

The ideal ego, this function through which the ego is constituted by the series of identifications to what? To certain objects, those in connection with which Freud proposes to us in Das Ich und das Es, essentially the ambiguity between identification and love.

You know he underlines that the problem of this ambiguity leaves him, Freud, perplexed. We will therefore not be astonished that this ambiguity is something we ourselves can only approach with the help of formulae putting to the test the very status of our own subjectivity in discourse - by that I mean in learned or teaching discourse - an ambiguity designated by the relationship of what for a long time I emphasised before you in the proper place, as the relationship between being and having.

(6) The object of identification, o, to underline by a reference point, in the salient points even of Freud's work, is the identification which is essentially at the source of mourning, for example. This o, object of identification, is also o as love object only in so far as it, this o, is what makes of the lover, to use a medieval and traditional term, what tears away this lover metaphorically, to make of him, in proposing himself as lovable, eromenon, by making of him eron the subject of a lack, therefore that through which he constitutes himself properly in love, what gives him, as I might say, the instrument of love, namely - we find it again - that one loves, that one is a lover with what one does not have.

o is called o in our discourse, not simply as the function of an algebraic identity that we specified the other day, but, if I can put it humorously, because it is what one n-o longer has (n'a plus) .

This is why one can rediscover along the regressive path, namely in the form of identification to being, this o, what one no longer has. It is exactly what makes Freud put the term regression exactly at the point where he specifies the relationships between identification and love. But in this regression where o remains what it is, the instrument, it is with what one is that one can, as I might say, have or not have.

It is with this real image constituted here, when it emerges, as i(o), that one catches or not what remains in the neck of this image, the multiplicity of the o-objects represented in my schema by the real flowers caught up or not in the constitution, thanks to the concave mirror at the back, of the symbol of something, let us say, which ought to be rediscovered in the structure of the cortex the foundation for a certain relationship between man and the image of his body and different objects which can be
(7) constituted from this body are or not caught, grasped at the moment when i(o) has the opportunity of constituting itself.

This is why we ought to grasp that before the mirror stage what will be i(o) is there in the disorder of small o's which there is no question yet of having or not. And it is to this that there corresponds the true meaning, the most profound meaning to be given to the term autoerotism is that one lacks self (on manque de soi), as I might say, entirely. It is not the external world that one lacks, as it is incorrectly put, it is oneself.

Here is the possibility of this phantasy of the fragmented body which some of you have recognised, have encountered, in schizophrenics. This does not for all that allow us to decide on the determinants of this phantasy of the fragmented body which those of whom I am speaking have seen being outlined in the schizophrenic. And this is why I also highlighted the merit of a recent research concerning the coordinates of these determinants of schizophrenics, a research which did not claim at all to exhaust these determinants, but which connoted one of their traits by remarking strictly and nothing more in the articulation of the mother of the schizophrenic what her child was when he was in her belly: nothing more than a diversely convenient or embarrassing body, namely the subjectification of o as pure real.

Let us observe once again this moment, this state before the emergence of i(o), before the distinction between all the small o's and this real image with respect to which they are going to be this remainder that one has or does not have.

Yes, let us make this remark: if Freud tells us that anxiety is this phenomenon on the edge, this signal at the limit of the ego, (8) against this other thing, x, which here must not appear in so far as o, the remainder, is abhorred by the Other. How did it happen that this movement of reflection, the guides, the rails of experience led the analysts, Rank first of all and Freud following him on this point, to find the origin of anxiety at this pre-specular, pre-autoerotic level, at this level of birth where who could dream - nobody dreamt of it - in the analytic concert of speaking about the constitution of an ego. There is here something which proves in effect, that if it is possible to define anxiety as a signal, an edge phenomenon in the ego when the ego is constituted, it is surely not exhaustive. This we rediscover quite clearly in one of the phenomena best known to accompany anxiety, those which one designates, in understanding them analytically in an undoubtedly ambiguous fashion to judge from the divergences - for we will have to come back to them - they are the phenomena precisely most contrary to the structure of the ego as such, the phenomena of depersonalisation. This gives rise to the question, that we cannot avoid, of situating depersonalisation authentically.

You know the place that this phenomenon took on in certain reference points proper to one, or several, authors of the French School to whom I already had to refer. I think it will be easy to recognise the relationship between these reference points and what I am developing here, I mean to assume that these reference points are not foreign to the sketches that I was previously able to give of it. The notion of distance, here almost tangible, in the necessity that I have always marked, precisely of the relation between this distance and the existence of the mirror, which gives to the subject this distancing from himself that the dimension of the Other is designed to offer to him, but this does (9) not enable us to conclude either that any bringing closer can give us the solution to any of the difficulties that are generated by the necessity of this distance.

In other words, it is not because the objects are invasive, as I might put it, in psychosis, which constitutes their danger for the ego. It is the very structure of these objects which makes them unsuitable for ego-ising (a la moisisation). This is what I tried to make you grasp with the help of topological references, metaphors if you wish - but I believe that is going too far - which I made use of in so far as they introduce the possibility of a non-specularisable shape into the structure of certain of these objects. Let us say that phenomenologically, depersonalisation begins - let us end our sentence with something which seems to be obvious - with the non-recognition of the specular image. Everyone knows how tangible this is in clinical practice, how frequently it is from not being able to find himself in the mirror or in something else that is analogous, that the subject begins to be seized by depersonalising vacillation. But let us articulate more precisely that this formula given by the event is insufficient, namely that it is because what is seen in the mirror is anxiety-provoking that this cannot be proposed to the recognition of the Other, and to refer to a moment that I marked as characteristic of this mirror experience, as paradigmatic of the constitution of the ideal ego in the space of Other, that a relationship to the specular image is established such that the infant is not able to turn his head, in accordance with this movement which I described to you as familiar, towards this Other, this witness, this adult who is there behind him, to communicate his smile to her, the manifestations of his jubilation about something which makes him (10) communicate with the specular image, that another relationship is established of which he is too captive for this movement to be possible; here the purely dual relationship dispossesses - this feeling of the relationship of dispossession marked by clinicians in psychosis - dispossesses the subject of this relationship to the big Other.

The specularisation is strange, and, as the English say, "odd", unsymmetrical, it is the Horla of Maupassant, the outside of space, in so far as space is the dimension of what can be superimposed. But here at the point that we are at, to stop at what is signified by this separation, this cut linked to the anxiety of birth, in so far as something imprecise exists there from which there are generated all' sorts of confusions. To be honest I do not have the time and I can only indicate it. I will come back to it. You should be aware however that at this place it would be well nevertheless to have great reservations about the structuring of the phenomenon of anxiety. Therefore it will be enough for you to refer to the text of Freud. Freud - as you will see - sees its convenience in the fact that at the level of the anxiety of birth there is constituted a whole constellation of movements, principally vasomotor, respiratory, which he says is "a real constellation", and it is this that will be carried over into its function of signal in the way, he tells us, an hysterical attack is constructed, being itself the reproduction of inherited movements for the expression of certain emotional moments.

Undoubtedly this is altogether inconceivable because precisely of the fact that it is impossible at the beginning to situate this complexity in a relationship with the ego which would allow it subsequently to serve as a signal of the ego, except through the mediation of what we have to seek in terms of structure in the relationship between $i(o)$ and this o .

(11) But in that case the characteristic separation at the beginning, the one which allows us to approach, to conceive of the relationship, is not the separation from the mother.

The cut involved is not that between the child and the mother. The fashion in which the child originally dwells in the mother, poses the whole problem of the character of the relationships of the egg with the body of the mother in mammals, which you know has a whole aspect which makes it with respect to the body of the mother a foreign body, a parasite, a body encrusted by the hairy roots of its chorion in this organ that is specialised to receive it, the uterus, with the mucus of which it has a certain involvement.

The cut which interests us, the one which makes its mark on a certain number of clinically recognisable phenomena and for which then we cannot avoid it, is a cut which, thank God for our conception, is much more satisfying than the cut of the child who is born, when he drops into the world with what? With his envelopes. I have only to refer you to any book of embryology whatsoever which is less than a hundred years old for you to be able to grasp in it that, in order to have a complete notion of this pre-specular totality which is o , you have to consider these envelopes as elements of the body. It is starting from the egg that these envelopes are differentiated, and you will see there very curiously that they are so in such a fashion that they illustrate - I have confidence enough in you after our work of last year around the cross-cap - that you may find very simply the degree to which on the schemas illustrating these chapters of embryology on the envelope, you can see being manifested all the varieties of this inside to outside, of this outside in which the (12) foetus floats, itself enveloped in its amnion, the amniotic cavity itself being enveloped in an ectodermic lamina and presenting its face towards the outside in continuity with the endoblast.

In short the analogy between what is detached with the cut between the embryo and its envelopes, and this separation on the cross-cap of a certain enigmatic o on which I insisted, is tangible here. And if we have to rediscover it subsequently, I think that I have today sufficiently indicated it for that. There remains for us to do today then what I announced to you, concerning what is indicated by acting-out about this essential relationship between o and 0.

In opposition to the passage a l'acte, all acting-out presents itself with certain characteristics which are going to allow us to isolate it. The profound, necessary relationship between acting-out and this o is where I want to lead you, in a way by the hand, in order not to let you drop. Observe moreover in your clinical surveys the degree to which being held by the hand in order not to be let drop is altogether essential in a certain type of relationship of the subject to something which when you encounter it you can absolutely designate as being for him an o. This gives rise to unions of a very widespread type which are not for all that any easier to manage, because moreover the o that is involved can be for the subject the most inconvenient super-ego.

The type of mother that we call, not inappropriately, but without knowing absolutely what we mean, a phallic woman - I would advise you to be careful before applying this label. But if you are dealing with someone who tells you that in the very measure itself that an object is most precious to her, inexplicably she (13) will be appallingly tempted not to hold on to this object if it falls, expecting something or other miraculous from this sort of catastrophe and that the most beloved child is precisely the one that one day she inexplicably lets drop; and you know that in Greek tragedy - this has not escaped the perspicacity of Giraudoux - this is the most profound complaint of Electra about Clytemnestra; it is that one day she had left her fall from her arms.

Here then, you can identify what it is appropriate on this occasion to call a phallic mother. There are no doubt other modes; we are saying that this one appears the least deceptive. And now let us go into acting-out in the case of female homosexuality. If the suicide attempt is a passage a l'acte, I would say that the whole adventure with the woman of doubtful reputation, who is raised to the function of ^supreme object, is an acting-out. If Dora's slap is a passage a l'acte, I would say that all the paradoxical behaviour, that Freud discovers immediately with such perspicacity, of Dora in the K's household is an acting-out.

Acting-out, is essentially something in the behaviour of the subject that shows itself. The demonstrative accent, the orientation towards the Other of every acting-out is something that ought to be highlighted.

In the case of female homosexuality - Freud insists on it - it is before the eyes/bf all, it is in the very measure and all the more when this publicity becomes scandalous, that the behaviour of the young homosexual is accentuated. And what shows itself, when one advances step by step, shows itself essentially as other, other than it is, what it is nobody knows; but nobody doubts that it is other.

(14) What that is in the case of the young homosexual, Freud says all the same; "She wanted a child from her father", he tells us. But if you were satisfied with that, you are not very hard to please, because this child has nothing to do with a maternal need. That indeed is why, a little earlier, I wanted at least to indicate the problematic of the relationship of the child to the mother. Contrary to a whole slippage in the whole of analytic thought, it is necessary to put the elucidation of unconscious desire in what I might call a sort of lateral relationship with respect to the principal current that has been elaborated.

There is in this normal relationship of the mother to the child, in any case in what we can grasp of it through its economic incidence, something full, something rounded out, something closed, something precisely so complete during the gestatory phase that one can say that we need very special care to make it enter, to see how its incidence is applied to this relationship of cutting between i(o) and o. And after all we only need our analytic experience of the transference and to know at what moment of our analyses our analysands become pregnant and the use this is to them, to know clearly that it is always the rampart of a return to the most profound narcissism.

But let us leave that. It is indeed as something else that the young homosexual wants to have this child. And moreover this thing did not escape, thank God, from Freud: she wanted this child as a phallus, namely, as the doctrine announces it in Freud in the most developed form, as a substitute, Ersatz, for something which falls fully then into our dialectic of the cut and of the lack, of the o as dropped, of the o as lacking. This (15) is what allows her, having failed in the realisation of her desire, to realise it at once differently and in the same way, as eron. She makes herself a lover; in other words, she establishes herself on what she does not have, the phallus, and to show clearly that she has it, she gives it. It is in effect a completely demonstrative way. She behaves, Freud tells us, vis-a-vis the Lady with a capital L, like a servant knight, like a man, as one who can sacrifice for her what he has, his phallus.

Let us combine then these two terms, of showing, of demonstrating, and of desire, no doubt a desire whose essence, whose presence, as you see, is to be, to show oneself, as I told you, as other, and while showing herself as other to still designate herself in this way. In the acting-out, we will say then that desire, in a way, to affirm itself as truth, engages itself along a path on which, no doubt, it only manages to do so in a singular fashion. And we know already by our work here that in a certain way one can say that truth of its nature is not in desire. If we recall the formula that essentially it is not articulatable even though it is articulated, we will be less astonished by the phenomenon before which we find ourselves. And I gave you a further link: it is articulated objectively since this object that I am designating here, is what I called the last time the object as its cause.

Acting-out essentially is the demonstration, the no doubt veiled showing, but which is only veiled for us as subject, in so far as it speaks, in so far as it could be true, not veiled in itself, on the contrary visible to the maximum degree, and because of that, for that very reason invisible in a certain register. Showing its cause, it is this remainder, it is its collapse, it is what falls into the affair that is the essential of what is shown.

division

0	S
$	Ø
o

Between the subject here, which is I might say "othered" (autrifiée) in its fictional structure, and the non-authentifiable Other, never completely, what emerges is this remainder o, it is the pound of flesh, ($ in 0), which means, I think - you know who I am quoting - one can make all the borrowings one wishes to plug the holes of desire and of melancholy; there is here the Jew who, for his part, knows something about balancing accounts and who demands at the end: the pound of flesh.

This is the feature that you always find in acting-out. Remember a point of what I wrote about in my report, "The Direction of the Treatment", where I spoke about the observation of Ernest Kris in connection with the case of plagiarism.

Ernest Kris, because he was on a certain path which we will perhaps have to name, wants to reduce it by means of the truth; he shows him in the most irrefutable fashion that he is not a plagiarist; he has read his book; his book is well and truly original, on the contrary it is the others who have copied him.

The subject cannot contest it. Only he does not give a damn about it. And on leaving, what is he going to do? As you know - I think that there are all the same some people, a majority, who read from time to time what I write - he goes and eats fresh brains.

I am not in the process of recalling the mechanism of the case. I am teaching you to recognise an acting-out and what that means, what I am designating as the small o or the pound of flesh.

With the fresh brains, the patient simply indicates to Ernest Kris; "Everything you tell me is true, simply that does not touch the question; there remain the fresh brains. In order to show (17) you, I am going to eat some when I leave in order to tell you about it the next time".

I am insisting. One cannot, in these matters, go too slowly. You will say to me; what is original in that? You will say to me, after all I am making the demands and giving the answers - I would say, I hope not, but since you could all the same say to me if I have not sufficiently emphasised it; "What is original in this, this acting-out and this demonstration of this unknown desire? The symptom is the same. Acting-out is a symptom which shows itself as other, and so does it. The proof is that it has to be interpreted". All right then let us dot the i's carefully. You know that the symptom cannot be interpreted directly; that transference is necessary, namely the introduction of the Other. You do not grasp it properly yet perhaps. Then you are going to say to me, "Well yes, this is what you are in the process of telling us about acting-out."

No, what is involved here, is to tell you that it is not essentially in the nature of the symptom to have to be interpreted; it does not call for interpretation like acting-out, contrary to what you might think. Moreover it has to be said; acting-out calls for an interpretation and the question that I am in the process of posing, is that of knowing whether it is possible. I will show you that it is. But it is in the balance in analytic theory and practice.

In the other case, it is clear that it is possible, but on certain conditions which are added to the symptom, namely that transference of its nature should be established; the symptom is not, like acting-out, calling for an interpretation. For - it is too often forgotten - what we discover in the symptom, in its (18) essence, is not, I say, a call to the Other, is not that which shows to the Other, that the symptom in its nature is jouissance - do not forget it - a backhanded jouissance, no doubt, unterbliebende Befriedigung; the symptom does not need you as acting-out does, it is sufficient of itself; it is of the order of what I have taught you to distinguish from desire as being jouissance, namely that it goes, for its part, towards the Thing, having passed the barrier of the good (a reference to my seminar on Ethics), namely of the pleasure principle, and this is why this jouissance can express itself by an Unlust.

I am not the only one who is either inventing or articulating all of this, it is said in these very terms in Freud; Unlust, unpleasure, for those who have not yet heard this term, in German.

So then let us return to acting-out, as opposed to the symptom, acting-out for its part is the beginning of transference. It is wild transference. There is no need for analysis - as you no doubt know - for there to be transference. But transference without analysis is acting-out, acting-out in analysis is transference. The result is that one of the questions to be posed, is, concerning the organisation of transference - I mean the organisation, the Handlung of transference - that one of the ways of posing the question is to ask how one can domesticate the wild transference, how one gets the wild elephant into the enclosure or how one can get the horse into the ring, where one makes him turn round, in the circus.

It is one of the ways of posing the problem of transference which it would be quite useful to pose from this angle, because it is the only way of knowing how to deal with acting-out.

(19) For people who may have to interest themselves in the near future in acting-out, I note the existence, in the Psychoanalytic Quarterly, of the article by Phyllis Greenacre; "General Problems of Acting-Out". It is in Number IV of Volume 19 of 1950, so it is not impossible to find. It is a very interesting article in many ways, and evokes a memory for me: it was at the time about ten years ago when we had already received a visit from some investigators. Phyllis Greenacre, who was one of them, gave me the opportunity to observe a lovely acting-out, namely the frenetic masturbation, which she carried out before my eyes, of a little Japanese mussel fisherman, which I owned and which still carries the traces of it, I mean this object does. I have to say that this furnished the opportunity for a very agreeable conversation, much better than the one punctuated by different passages a l'acte, for example her jumps almost to the ceiling, which I had with the lady.

Therefore this article on "General problems of acting-out", in which there are very pertinent remarks, even though as those of you who read it will see, they gain by being illuminated by the original lines that I am trying to sketch before you.

The question then is to know how to deal with acting-out. There are three of them, she says. There is interpreting it, there is prohibiting it, there is reinforcing the ego.

You should not have any great illusions about interpreting it. Phyllis Greenacre is a very very able woman. Interpreting it, after what I have just told you, promises to have very little effect, as I might say, if only because this is why the acting-out is done. When you look at things closely, most of the time (20) you see that the subject knows very well that what he is doing, is done to offer himself to your interpretation by acting-out. Only you see, it is not the meaning of what you interpret that counts, whatever it may be; it is the remainder. So that this time at least, without something more, it is an impasse. It is very interesting to spend some time scanning the hypotheses.

To prohibit it, naturally that even makes the author herself smile when she says: all the same, one can do many things, but to say to a subject, "No acting-out", is something which is all the same difficult. Besides nobody dreams of doing it. All the same, in this connection, one observes the amount of prejudicial prohibition there is in analysis. Many things obviously are done to avoid acting-out in the session. Then one tells them not to take decisions that are essential for their existence during the analysis. Why does one do all of this? Indeed it is a fact that wherever one has a hold, has a certain relationship with what one can call danger either for the subject, or for the analyst.

In fact one prohibits much more than one believes. If I say - which I would be quite willing to illustrate - what I have just said, it is because essentially, and because we are doctors, and because we are good, as someone or other has said, one does not want the patient who has come to entrust himself to us to hurt himself. And the funny thing is that one manages it.

Acting-out is the sign all the same that one is preventing a lot of things. Is this what is involved, when Mrs Greenacre speaks about allowing a more solid transference to be established? What I would like to remark on here, is that a certain aspect of analysis that is not seen is its accident-insurance, sickness-insurance aspect; because it is very funny all the same how much (21) at least from the moment that an analyst has taken on that experience that is called, namely all that he most often ignores in his own attitude, the degree to which short-term illnesses are rare during analyses, the degree to which, in an analysis which lasts for a certain time, colds, flues, all of that is effaced, and even long-term illnesses; indeed, if there were more analyses in society, I think that social insurance, as well as life insurance, would have to take the proportion of analyses in the population into account in order to modify their rates.

Inversely, when an accident happens - an accident, I am not speaking dimly about acting-out - it is very regularly attributed by the patient and by his entourage to the analysis, it is in a way naturally attributed to the analysis. They are right; it is an acting-out, therefore it is addressed to the Other. And if one is an analyst, it is therefore addressed to the analyst. If he has taken up this place, so much the worse for him. He has all the same the responsibility which belongs to this place which he has agreed to occupy.

These questions are designed perhaps to clarify for you what I mean when I speak about the desire of the analyst and when I question it. Without dwelling for a moment on the question which changes the question of the way in which we domesticate the transference - for you see that I am in the process of saying that it is not simple without stopping for a moment to say what it is I am always opposed to, namely that what is involved here is reinforcing the ego - because on the admission even of those who are engaged along this path for more than a decade and more exactly for so many decades that people are beginning to speak less about it nowadays, this can only mean, as we see in the (22) literature, leading the subject to the identification, not at all with this image as a reflection of the ideal ego in the Other, but to the ego of the analyst with the result that Balint describes for us, the really manic terminal crisis that he describes for us as being that of the end of an analysis characterised in this way, and which represents the insurrection of the o which has remained absolutely untouched.

Let us return then to Freud and to the observation of the case of female homosexuality, in connection with which we have all sorts of quite admirable notations, because at the same time as he tells us that he is quite clear that there is no hint here of something called transference being produced, he says at the same time, and at this time and in this case which designates some blind spot or other in his position, he says all the same that there is no question of stopping for an instant at the hypothesis that there is no transference.

This is to fail to recognise what is involved in the transference relationship. We find it expressly formulated in this discourse of Freud about his case of female homosexuality. It nonetheless remains that Freud, the day he had a patient who - the thing is articulated as such - who lied to him in a dream, for this is how Freud characterises the case, the agalma, what is precious in this discourse on female homosexuality, is that Freud stops for a moment, flabbergasted, before the following - he also makes demands and gives the answers - he says, "What is happening here, the unconscious can lie?", for the dreams, as you know, of this patient, mark every day greater and greater progress towards the sex to which she is destined. Freud does not believe it for a single moment - and with good reason! - for the patient who brings him her dreams tells him at the same time: "But, yes of course, this will allow me to marry, and allow me at the same (14) time to occupy myself all the more with women". Therefore, she herself is telling him that she is lying. And moreover Freud has no doubt about it. It is precisely the absence of any appearance of the transference relationship. But what does he pause at then, this unconscious that we are used to considering as being the most profound, the truly true? It then can deceive us. And it is around this that the whole debate turns, it is around this Zutrauen, of this trust we should have: can we still preserve it, he says.

He affirms it in a sentence which is very characteristic because it is so elliptical and concentrated, that is has this character almost of stumbling over words; what is really involved - I will read the sentence again for you, I did not bring it with me, I will bring it the next time, it is really very lovely - it is still a question of a squabble.

This unconscious still deserves trust. The discourse of the dream, he tells us, is not the same thing as the unconscious; it is constructed by a desire coming from the unconscious, but he admits at the same time that it is this desire that is expressed, to the point of formulating it: it must be then that the desire comes from something, and coming from the unconscious, and it is this desire which is expressed through lies.

She tells him herself that her dreams are lying. What Freud pauses at, is the problem of any symptomatic lie. You see what a lie is for a child is what the subject means by lying. The strange thing, is that Freud lets things drop in the face of this seizing up of the whole machine; he does not interest himself precisely in what makes it seize up, namely the waste scraps, the little remainder, what has brought everything to a halt and what is here that comes into question.

Without seeing what he is embarrassed by, he is undoubtedly moved, as he shows, by this threat to the fidelity of the unconscious, he goes into action (passee a.l 'acte) . It is the point at which Freud refuses to see the structure of fiction at the origin of the truth, which is his passion.

This is where he has not sufficiently meditated on what, speaking about the phantasy, I emphasised before you in a recent discourse on the paradox of Epimenides, on the "I am lying" and its complete acceptability, in so far as what lies is desire in the moment that affirming itself as desire it delivers the subject to this logical cancelling-out on which the philosopher pauses, when he sees the contradiction of "I am lying".

But after all what Freud is missing, as we know, is what he is missing in his discourse. It is what has always remained as a question for him as a question: "What does a woman want?". The stumbling of Freud's thinking upon something that we can call provisionally - do not make me say that woman as such is a liar, but that femininity conceals itself and that there is something of that angle there.

To employ the terms of liquid, it is that flowing sweetness, something before which Freud almost died of suffocation because of a nocturnal stroll taken by his fiancée, the very day that they exchanged the two final vows, with a vague cousin, I no longer remember very well, I did not look up the biography, I call him a vague cousin, it is some indifferent person, it is one of these young gallants who have as they say an assured future, which means that they do not have any - with whom he had discovered a little later that she had taken a little stroll, and this is where the blind spot is: Freud wants her to tell him everything. The woman did indeed do her talking cure, and as regards chimney sweeping she was well swept!

(25) For some time, people have not been stubborn about it; the important thing is to be together in the same chimney. The question, when you emerge - as you know, it was recalled at the end of one of my articles, borrowed from the Talmud - when you emerge together from a chimney, which of the two is going to wash his face? Yes, I advise you to re-read this article, and not alone that one, but also the one that I wrote on "The Freudian thing". The Freudian thing - you can see designated there, with a certain amount of emphasis I might say - is this Diana that I designate as showing the continuation of this hunt which continues. The Freudian thing, is what Freud let drop, but it is still what leads, in the shape of all of us, the whole hunt after his death. We will continue this pursuit the next time.

Seminar 10: Wednesday 30 January 1963

Anxiety, we have always been taught, is a fear without an object. A chant in which, we could say here, another discourse already announces itself, a chant which however scientific it may be is close to that of the child who reassures himself. For the truth that I am enunciating for you, I formulate in the following way: "It is not without an object". Which is not to say that this object is accessible along the same path as all the others. At the time I said it, I underlined that it would be another way of ridding oneself of anxiety to say that a homologous discourse, similar to every other part of scientific discourse, could symbolise this object, put us in that relationship of symbol with it to which, in this connection, we are going to return.

Anxiety sustains this relationship of not being without an object subject to the reservation that this is not to say nor to be able to say, as we could for something different, what object is involved.

In other words, anxiety introduces us with the accent of maximal communicability to the function of lack, in so far as it is radical for our field. This relationship to lack is so fundamental for the constitution of any logic and in such a way that one can say that the history of logic is that of its success in masking it, which means that it appears to be akin to a sort of vast parapraxis, if we give to this term its positive sense.

This indeed is why you see me, along one path, always coming back to these paradoxes of logic which are designed to suggest to you the paths, the ways in, by which there is regulated, there is imposed on us the certain style by which we are able for our part (2) to succeed with this parapraxis: not to miss the lack (ne pas manquer au manque).

That is why I thought once more of introducing my discourse today by something which of course is only an apologue, and on which you cannot base yourself on any analogy properly speaking in order to find in it what might be the support for situating this lack, but which nevertheless is useful in order to reopen in a way this dimension which in a way every discourse, every discourse of analytic literature itself, gives you, in the intervals, I would say, of the one in which here from week to week, I catch up with you, necessarily to rediscover the hinge of something which might close in our experience, and, by whatever gap it intends to designate this lack, would find in it something that this discourse could fill.

The little apologue then, the first one that came to me. There could be others, and after all, all I want to do here is to go quickly. I told you in short at one time that there is no lack in the real; the lack is only graspable through the mediation of the symbolic. It is at the level of the library, one might say: here such a volume is not in its place (manque a sa place), this place which is a place designated already by the introduction, into the real, of the symbolic. And here, this lack here that I am speaking about, this lack which the symbol in a way easily fills, designates the place, designates the absence, presentifies what is not there. But notice that the volume in question carries on the first page - a volume which I acquired this week, and this is what inspired this little apologue - carries on the first page the notation: "the four engravings from such and such to such and such are missing". Does this mean, in accordance with the function of the double negation, that because the volume is not in its place, the lack of these four engravings is (3) removed, that the engravings come back to it. Clearly, there is no question of it.

This may appear a bit stupid to you, but I would point out to you that here we have the whole question of logic, of logic transposed into these intuitive terms of the Eulerian schema, of the included lack. What is the position of the family in the genus, of the individual in the species, what constitutes a hole within a plane circle?

If I made you do so much topology last year, it was indeed to suggest to you that the function of the hole is not univocal. And this indeed is how you must understand that there is always introduced along this path of thinking that we describe in different forms as metaphorical in different forms, but always indeed being referred to something, this planification, this implication of the very simple plane as constituting fundamentally the intuitive support of the surface. Now this relationship to the surface is infinitely more complex; and of course by simply introducing to you the ring, the torus, you are able to see that it is enough to elaborate what is in appearance the most simple surface to imagine, to see there being diversified, on condition that we consider it indeed as it is, as a surface, to see there being diversified strangely there the function of the hole.

I point out to you once again how it is to be understood; because everything that is in effect to be known, how a hole can be filled, can be completed, we will see that no circle whatsoever drawn on this surface of the hole is able - for this is the problem - to constrict itself to the stage of being nothing but this vanishing limit, the point, and of disappearing.

(4) For of course there are holes which can, on which we can operate in this way, and it is enough for us to draw our circle in the following way - if I draw it, it is in order not to express myself otherwise - or in that way to see that they cannot reduce themselves to zero. There are structures which do not involve the filling of the hole

The essence of the cross-cap, as I showed it to you last year is the following: it is that apparently whatever cut you draw on the surface - I will not spend any more time on it, I would ask you to test it out for yourselves - we will not have apparently this diversity; if we draw this cut in this way, which is homologous at the level of the cross-cap to the cut which on the torus is repeated as follows, namely which partakes of two other types of circle, which reunites them in itself, the two first that I have just drawn, if you draw them here on the cross-cap in this way, if you draw this cut, passing in this way through this privileged point to which I drew your attention last year, you will always have something which in appearance will be always able to be reduced to the minimal surface, but not without - as I pointed out to you - there remaining at the end - I repeat - whatever the sort of cut, there remaining at the end only something which is symbolised not like a concentric reduction, but irreducibly in this shape or in that one which is the same, and that one cannot as such not differentiate from I what I earlier called concentric (5) punctualisation.

It is in this that the cross-cap was for us another contributing path in what concerns the possibility of an irreducible type of lack. The lack is radical. It is radical for the very constitution of subjectivity, as it appears to us on the path of analytical experience. Which, if you wish, I would like to enunciate in this formula: "Once it is known, once something of the Real comes to be known, there is something lost; and the surest way to approach this something lost, is to conceive of it as a fragment of the body".

Here is the truth which in this opaque, gross form is the one that analytic experience gives us, and which it introduces with its irreducible character into any reflection henceforth possible on any conceivable form of our condition. This point, it must be clearly said, involves enough of the intolerable for us to ceaselessly try to distort it, which has no doubt two aspects, namely that in this very effort we are doing more than sketching out its outlines and that we are always tempted, in the very measure that we approach this outline, to forget it in function of the very structure that this lack represents.

Whence it results, another truth, that we could say that every turn of our experience rests on the fact that the relationship to the Other, in so far as it is that in which there is situated every possibility of symbolisation and the locus of discourse, is connected with a structural flaw, and that we are obliged - this is the further step - to conceive that we are touching here on what makes possible this relationship to the Other, namely this point from which it emerges that there is signifier (du signifiant), is the one which in a way cannot be signified. This (6) is what is meant by what I call the "lack of signifier" point.

And recently, I heard someone who does not understand me too badly at all, responding to me, questioning me, whether this does not mean that we refer ourselves to that which in any signifier is in a way the imaginary material, the shape of the word or that of the Chinese character, if you wish, what is irreducible in the fact that it is necessary that every signifier should have an intuitive support like the others, like all the rest.

Well, precisely not. For of course, this is the temptation that arises in this connection. This is not what is involved as regards this lack. And in order to make you sense it, I will refer to definitions which I have already given you and which ought to be enough. I told you: "There is no lack which is not of the symbolic order. But privation, for its part, is something real." What we are speaking about is something real; what my discourse turns around, when I try to represent for you this decisive point, which nevertheless we always forget, not only in our theory, but in our practice of analytic experience, is a privation which manifests itself as much in the theory as in the practice, it is a real privation and which as such can be reduced. Is it enough to designate it in order to remove it? If we manage to circumscribe it scientifically - which is perfectly conceivable - it is enough to work over the analytic literature, an example of which I will give you in a little while, namely a sample, to begin with - there is no other way of doing this - I took the first volume of the International Journal which came to hand and I will show you that almost everywhere we find the problem involved: whether one speaks about anxiety, about acting-out or about - since it is the title of the article to (7) which I will allude later - about R - I am not the only one who makes use of letters - the total response. The total response of the analyst in the analytic situation, by someone whom it happens we rediscover, of whom I spoke in the second year of my seminar, Margaret Little by name, we will find this problem very well centred and we can define it: where is the privation situated, where obviously does she slip up in the measure that she attempts to get closer and closer to the problem that a certain type of patient poses for her? It is not this, the reduction, the privation, the symbolisation, its articulation here which will remove the lack. This is what we have to keep clearly in mind from the start, and if it is only to understand what is signified from one point of view by a mode of appearance of this lack: as I told you, privation is something real. It is clear that a woman does not have a penis. But if you do not symbolise the penis as the essential element to have or not to have, she will know nothing of this privation. Lack for its part is symbolic.

Castration appears in the course of analysis, in so far as this relationship with the Other, which moreover did not wait for analysis to be constituted, is fundamental. Castration, as I told you, is symbolic, namely it refers to a certain phenomenon of lack, and at the level of this symbolisation, namely, in the relationship to the Other, in so far as the subject has to constitute himself in the analytic discourse. One of the possible forms of the appearance of the lack is here the (-○), the original support which is only one of the possible ^ expressions of the original lack, of the structural flaw inscribed in the being in the world of the subject with whom we (8) have to deal. And in these conditions it is conceivable, normal to ask oneself why, by bringing analytic experience to a certain point - and not beyond - this term of castration complex, that Freud gives us as final in the man, he tells us, and of Penisneid in the woman, can be put in question. It is not necessary that it should be final.

This indeed is why it is an essential approach in our experience to conceive of this function of lack in its original structure. And it is necessary to come back to it many times in order not to miss it.

Another fable: the insect who moves along the surface of the Moebius strip - I have now I think spoken enough about it for you to know immediately what I mean - this insect can believe that at every moment, if this insect has the representation of what a surface is, there is a face, the one always on the reverse side of the one on which he is moving, that he has not explored. He can believe in this reverse side. Now as you know there is not one. He, without knowing it, explores what is not the two faces, explores the single face that is there: and nevertheless at every instant, there is indeed a reverse. What he lacks in order to perceive that he has gone to the reverse side, is the little missing piece, the one outlined for you in this way of cutting the cross-cap and that one day I materialised, to put it in your hands, constructed, this missing little piece. It is a way of turning here in a short circuit around the point which brings it back by the shortest path to the reverse side of the point where he was the instant before.

This little missing piece, the o as it happens, does this mean, because we are describing it there in a paradigmatic form, that the affair is resolved for all that? Absolutely not, since it is (9) the fact that this piece is missing, that gives all its reality to the world around which the little insect is moving.

The little interior eight is well and truly irreducible: it is a lack for which the symbol does not supply. It is not then in the first place, an absence which the symbol can make up for.

Nor is it a cancellation or a dénégation; for cancellation and dénégation, forms constituted from the relationship that the symbol allows to be introduced into the real, namely the definition of absence, cancellation and dénégation is an attempt to undo that which in the signifier separates us from the origin and from this structural flaw. It is an attempt to rejoin its sign function; it is what the obsessional, for all that, strives and exhausts himself for. Cancellation and dénégation aim then at this point of lack, but do not rejoin it for all that; because as Freud explains, all they do is to duplicate the function of the signifier in applying it to themselves, and the more I say it is not that, the more it is that.

The spot of blood, intellectual or not, whether it is the one that Lady Macbeth exhausts herself with or what Lautréamont designates under the term "intellectual", is impossible to efface because it is the nature of the signifier precisely to strive to efface a trace. And the more one tries to efface it, to rediscover the trace, the more the trace insists as signifier.

Whence it results that we have to deal, as regards the relationship to the fact that the little o manifests itself as cause of desire, with an always ambiguous problematic. In effect when it is inscribed in our schema, which is always to be renewed, there are two ways in which the relationship of the Other to the small o can appear.

(10) If we can rejoin them, it is precisely by the function of anxiety, in so far as anxiety, wherever it is produced, is the signal of it and there is no other way of being able to interpret what is said to us in analytic literature about anxiety.

Because after all notice how strange it is to bring together these two aspects of analytic discourse: on the one hand that anxiety is the greatest, most radical defence and that it is necessary here for the discourse about it to be divided into two references: 1) one to the real in so far as anxiety is the response to the most original danger, to the unsurmountable Hilflosigkeit, to the absolute distress of entering into the world and that 2) on the other hand, it is going to be able to be subsequently taken up by the ego as a signal of infinitely slighter dangers, of dangers, as we are told somewhere by Jones, who on this point shows a tact and a measure which is often greatly lacking in the bombast of analytic discourse, about what he calls the threats of the Id, of the fa, of the Es, which Jones simply calls a "buried desire", un desir enterre. As he remarks, is this return of a buried desire so dangerous after all, and does this merit the mobilisation of such a major signal as this ultimate, final signal which anxiety is supposed to be, if in order to explain it we are obliged to have recourse to the most absolute vital danger.

(11) And this paradox is found again a little further on. For there is no analytic discourse which, after having made of anxiety the final element of every defence, does not speak to us about defence against anxiety. So that this instrument which is so useful for warning us about danger, is the very one that we have to defend ourselves against; and it is in this way that one explains all sorts of reactions, of constructions, of formations, in the field of psychopathology. Is there not some paradox here which requires things to be formulated differently, namely that the defence is not against anxiety, but against that of which anxiety is the signal and that what is involved is not defence against anxiety, but against a certain lack, except for the fact that we know that there are different structures, definable as such, of this lack, that the lack of the single edge, which is that of the relationship with the narcissistic image, is not the same as that of the double edge which I am speaking to you about, and which is referred to the least extreme cut and to the one which concerns the o as such, in so far as it appears, as it manifests itself, that it is with it, that we have, that we can, that we ought to be dealing, at a certain level of the handling of the transference.

Here there will appear, it seems to me, better than elsewhere that the lack of handling is not the handling of the lack and that what needs to be picked out is what you always find every time a discourse is pushed far enough about the relationship that we have as Other to the one that we have in analysis, that the question is posed as to what our relationship with this o ought to be.

There is an obvious gap between the permanent, profound putting in question which the analytic experience in itself is supposed to be, always referring the subject on to something different

(12) to what he manifests to us whatever its nature may be. Transference is only, as one of my women patients said to me not long ago: "If I was sure that it was only transference". The function of the "only (ne que): "it is only transference" the reverse side of "He has only to do it in this way", this form of the verb which is conjugated, but not, as you believe, the one which makes one say: "II n'a qu'avait", that one sees flowering spontaneously in a spontaneous discourse.

It is the other aspect of what is explained to us as being, it seems, the charge, the burden of the hero analyst of having to interiorise this o, to take it into himself, as a good or bad object, but as an internal object and that it is from there that there is supposed to emerge all the creativity through which he ought to restore the subject's access to the world.

Both things are true, even though they are not connected: it is precisely for this reason that they are confused and that by confusing them, nothing clear is said about what concerns the handling of this transferential relationship, the one which turns around the o. But it is this that is sufficiently explained by the remark that I made to you, that what distinguishes the position of the subject with respect to o, and the very constitution as such of his desire, is, to say things in a summary fashion, that whether we are dealing with a pervert or a psychotic, the relationship of the phantasy $O o is established in this way (Schema p 6), and it is here that in order to handle the transferential relationship we have in effect to take into ourselves like a foreign body, an incorporation of which we are the patient, the o in question, namely the object which is absolutely foreign to the subject who is speaking to us, in so far as it is the cause of his lack.

In the case of neurosis, the position is different in so far as - as I told you - something appears here which distinguishes the function of the phantasy in the neurotic. Here there appears (13) at X something of his phantasy which is an o, and which only appears so (le parait). And which only appears so because this little o is not specularisable and cannot appear here, as I might say, in person, but only as a substitute. And it is only there that there is applied the profound questioning of any authenticity in the classical analysis of transference.

But this is not to say that we have here the cause of transference, and we have to deal with this little o which, for its part, is not on the stage, but which only asks at every instant to be allowed to mount it to introduce its discourse there, even if this were to sow, in the one who continues to ho! the stage, to sow confusion, disorder, to say: "Stop the tragedy", just as much as "Stop the comedy", even though this is a little better. There is no drama. Why does Ajax get himself into such a stew, as they say, when after all if all he did was to exterminate the sheep that is so much the better? It is all the same less serious than if he had exterminated all the Greeks since he did not exterminate all the Greeks, he is all the less dishonoured; and if he indulges in this ridiculous manifestation everyone knows it is because Minerva cast a spell on him.

Comedy is less easy to exorcise. As everyone knows, it is more gay, and even if one exorcises it, what happens on the stage can very easily continue; one begins again at the song of the billygoat's foot, at the true history of what is involved from the beginning, at the origin of desire. And this is the reason why moreover tragedy bears in itself, in its term, in its name, its designation, this reference to the billygoat and the satyr, (14) whose place moreover was always reserved at the end of a trilogy.

The billygoat who jumps onto the stage, is what acting-out is. And the acting-out I am speaking about, namely the inverse movement of what modern theatre aspires to, namely that the actors go down among the audience: it is the spectators who mount the stage and say there what they have to say.

And this is why someone like Margaret Little, chosen from among others - and as I told you - really in the way that one blindfolds oneself and lays out pages to make a divination by spinning a knife.

Margaret Little, in her article on "The analyst's total response to his patient's needs", of May-August 1957, Parts III-IV of Volume 38 of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis, pursues the discourse that I already dwelt on at a point in my seminar when this article had not yet appeared. Those who were there will remember the remarks that I made, about a certain anxiety-ridden discourse on her part and her attempts to master it in connection with counter-transference. They no doubt remember that I did not stop at the first appearance of the problem, namely the effects of an inexact interpretation, namely that one day an analyst says to one of his patients who comes back from having made a broadcast, a broadcast on a subject which interests the analyst himself - we see more or less the milieu in which this could have happened: "You spoke very well yesterday, but I see you are very depressed today; it is surely because of the fear you have of having hurt me by invading an area that I am interested in". Two years have to pass before the subject perceives, in connection with the return of an anniversary, that what had caused him to be so sad was linked to the feeling he (15) had, having made this broadcast, of having revived in himself the feeling of mourning that he had about the recent death of his mother who, he says, could therefore not see success represented for her son at being in this way momentarily promoted to the position of a star.

Margaret Little is struck, because it is a patient that she had taken on from this analyst, by the fact that effectively the analyst in making his interpretation had done no more than interpret what was passing through his own unconscious, namely that effectively he was very sorry at the success of his patient.

What is involved nevertheless is something quite different, namely that it is not enough to talk about mourning and even to see the repetition of the mourning that the subject was suffering at that time, the one that two years later he was having for his analyst, but to see what is involved in the function of mourning itself and here at the same time to take a little further what Freud tells us about mourning as identification with the lost object. It is not an adequate definition of mourning. We are only in mourning about someone of whom we can say "I was his lack (j'etais son manque)". We mourn people that we have either well or badly treated and vis-a-vis whom we do not know whether we fulfill this function of being at the place of their lack.

What we give in love, is essentially what we do not have and, when what we do not have returns to us, there is undoubtedly a regression and at the same time a revelation of the way in which we have failed the person (manque a la personne) in representing his lack.

But here, because of the irreducible character of the miscognition concerning the lack, this miscognition simply is reversed, namely that this function that we had of being his lack, we now believe we are able to express in the fact that we (16) have been lacking to him, even though it was precisely for this reason that we were precious and indispensable to him.

Here is what I would ask you: if it is possible, pick out this and a certain number of other reference points, if you are willing to work at it, in Margaret Little's article. It is a further phase of reflection which is considerably deeper, if not better. Because it is not better. The very problematic definition of counter-transference is absolutely not advanced and I would say up to a certain point that we can be grateful to her; because if she had advanced into it, it would have been mathematically, into error. All she wants - as you will see - to consider from then on is the total response of the analyst, namely just as much the fact that he is there as analyst as the things which, for him the analyst, as this present example shows, can escape from his own unconscious, as the fact that like every other living being she experiences feelings in the course of analysis, and that after all she does not say it like that, but this is what is involved: being the Other, she is in the position that I told you about the last time, namely from the beginning one of entire responsibility.

It is therefore with this class, this "immense total", as she says, of her position as analyst, that she intends to respond before us and respond honestly about what she conceives to be the response of the analyst. The result is that she goes as far as to take the most contrary positions - that does not mean that they are false - to the classical formulations, namely that far from remaining outside the game, the analyst must suppose in principle that he is involved up to the hilt, consider himself on occasion effectively as responsible and in any case, never (17) refuse to testify, if concerning what happens in the analysis she is for example summoned, by her subject, to answer before a court of law.

I am not saying here that this attitude can be sustained, I am saying that to evoke it, to place within this perspective the function of the analyst is something which undoubtedly will appear to you of an originality which gives rise to problems, that the feelings - I mean all the feelings of the analyst - can be in some cases summoned, as I might say, to justify themselves, not only at the tribunal of the analyst himself - which everyone will admit - but even with respect to the subject, and that the weight of all the feelings that the analyst may experience with regard to one or other subject who is engaged with him in the analytic enterprise, can be not alone invoked, but be promoted into something which will be not an interpretation, but an avowal, entering in this way on a path whose first introduction into analysis by Ferenczi was the object on the part of classical analysts of the most extreme reservations.

Undoubtedly, our author divides the patients with whom she is dealing into three parts. Since she seems to admit a very large range of cases under her charge, we have on the one hand the psychoses, for whom it is necessary that she should admit that, if only for the hospitalisation that is sometimes necessary, it is necessary for her to discharge a part of her responsibilities onto other supports; the neuroses, of which she tells us that the greatest share of responsibility of which we discharge ourselves also in neuroses, is put on the subject's shoulders - giving proof of remarkable lucidity -; but, between the two, the subjects she defines as the third class, character neuroses or reactional personalities, whatever you like, what Alexander defines again as "neurotic characters", in short this whole area around which there are developed such problematic indications or classifications, while in reality it is not a kind of subject that is involved, but a zone of relationship, the one that I am defining here as acting-out. And it is indeed in effect what is involved, in the case that she is going to develop for us, which is the case of a subject who has come to her because she performs acts which are classed within the frame of kleptomania, who for a year moreover does not make the slightest allusion to these thefts, and who goes through a whole long time of analysis, under the total and vigorous fire on the part of our analyst, of the most repeated here-and-now transference interpretations in the sense taken nowadays, along the path generally adopted, as that which ought to be from a certain moment staunch, sponged up ceaselessly right through the analysis.

None of these interpretations, however subtle and varied she makes them, touch for an instant the defence of her subject. If someone - I am going to end with this - would be willing to do me the service, at a date that we are going to fix, of entering into the detailed exposition of this case, of doing this thing that I cannot do before you because it is too long and because I have other things to tell you, you will see, in all its details, there being manifested the relevance of remarks that I am in the process of making to you now.

The analysis only begins to move, she tells us, at the moment that one day her patient came with her face swollen with weeping, and the tears that she is weeping about the loss, the death, in a country that she had left a long time before with her parents, namely the Germany of that time, Nazi Germany, of a person who was not distinguished among those who had looked after her during her childhood, except that she was a friend of her parents and no (19) doubt a friend with whom she had very different relationships than her relationships with her parents; for it is a fact that she never showed such mourning for anyone else (247).

Before this passionate, surprising reaction, what is the reaction of our analyst? Undoubtedly one of interpreting as one always does. She varies them again, as a way of seeing which one will work. The classic interpretation, namely that this mourning is a need for retortion against the object, that this mourning is perhaps addressed to her, the analyst, that it is a way, using the person that she is mourning for as a screen, of bringing to her, the analyst all the reproaches that she has against her. Nothing works.

Something begins to be freed up when the analyst - literally - as you will see, it is very visible in the text - admits before the subject that she is completely confused and that to see her like that was painful to the analyst herself. And immediately our analyst deduces that it is the positive, the real, the living element of a feeling which gave its movement to the analysis. The whole text bears sufficient witness to it, the subject chosen, the style as well as the order of its development, for us to be able to say what is involved and what undoubtedly touches the subject, what makes it possible for her, which allows her to transfer properly speaking in her relationship to the analyst the reaction involved in this mourning, namely the appearance of the following, that there was a person for whom she was able to be a lack: the fact is that the intervention of the analyst makes there appear to her - in the analyst - this thing which is called anxiety. It is in function of where we are at the limit of something which designates in the analysis the place of the lack that this insertion, that this graft, as I might say, this (20) layering which allows a subject whose whole relationship with her parents is defined - you will see in the observation that in no relationship was this female subject able to grasp herself as a lack - to find here a way to open up.

It is not qua positive feeling that the interpretation - if one can call it that, because it is well described for us in the observation: the subject drops her arms and gives up - at this place, that this "interpretation", if one can describe it as such, reached, it is as an introduction in an involuntary way of something that is in question and that always ought to come into question at whatever point it may be, even if it is at the end, in the analysis, namely the function of the cut. And what is going to allow you to locate it, to designate it, is that the turning points - the decisive ones of the analysis - are two moments: the moment that the analyst taking courage in the name of the ideology of life, of the real, of anything you wish, makes all the same the most unusual intervention, to be situated as decisive with respect to this perspective that I would call sentimental; one fine day when the subject was going over again all her stories about money quarrels - if I remember correctly, with her mother, she ceaselessly comes back to it - the analyst says to her in the clearest terms: "Listen! Stop that, because literally I can no longer listen to it! You are sending me to sleep". (248)

The second time - I am not giving you this as a model of technique, I am asking you to follow the problems which are posed for an analyst who is obviously as experienced as she is burning with authenticity - the second time, it involved slight modifications which had been carried out in the analyst's house, what she calls the redecoration of her office - if we are to go (21) on the average redecoration carried out by our colleagues, it must have been lovely - already our Margaret Little had been pestered all day by the remarks of her patients: "It's nice, it's not nice, the brown is disgusting, that green is lovely....": and now here is our patient who starts again towards the end of the day, she tells us, and puts that in terms that are, let us say, a little bit more aggressive than the others, and she says to her textually: "I really don't care what you think about it". (248)

The patient, I have to say, like the first time, is profoundly shocked, astounded. After which she emerges from her silence with enthusiastic cries: "Everything you have done there is marvellous". I will spare you the details of the progress of this analysis. What I would simply like to designate here, is that in connection with this case which is favourable and, if you wish, chosen in a part of the field particularly favourable to this problematic, what is decisive in this factor of progress which consists essentially in introducing the function of the cut, is in so far as she tells her in her first interpretation the following: "You're leaving me out of it completely: you are sending me to sleep", and in the other case she literally puts her in her place: "You can think what you want about my decoration, of my office. I don't care about it in the slightest!", that something decisive was mobilised in the transferential relationship that is in question here.

This allows us to designate what is involved for the subject. The problem for her, one of her problems is that she had never been able to produce the slightest feeling of mourning for a father whom she admired. But the stories - as you will see - which are reported to us, show us that, if there is something over-emphasised in her relationships with her father, it was well and (22) truly that in any case there was no question in his regard of representing in any way something which could be, from whatever angle it was taken, being lacking to her father.

There was a little stroll with him and a very significant scene about with a little stick quite symbolic of the penis, because the patient herself underlines it and it seems in a rather innocent way - the father throws this little stick into the water without making any comment on it. This story is not the same as the dimanches de Ville d'Avray.

And as regards the mother, the one who is involved in the closest fashion in determining the thefts, this because undoubtedly she has never been able to make of this child anything other than a sort of prolongation of herself, a piece of furniture, an instrument of menace and blackmail on occasion, but in no case something which with respect to her own desire, the desire of the subject, could have been a causal relationship.

It is to designate the following, namely that her desire - she does not know which one of course - could be taken into consideration, that each time the mother approaches, enters into the field of induction where she can have some effect, the subject very regularly steals something, a theft which like all the thefts of the kleptomaniac has only a signification of particular interest which means simply: "I am showing you an object that I stole by force or by cleverness and which means that there is somewhere another object, my one, the o, the one which deserves to be considered, to be allowed to isolate itself for a moment". This function of isolation, of being alone (etre-seul) has the closest relationship, is in a way the correlative (23) pole of this function of anxiety as you will see in what follows. "Life", we are told somewhere by someone who is not an analyst, Etienne Gilson, "existence is an uninterrupted power of active separations".

I think that you will not confuse, after today's discourse, this remark with the one which is usually made about frustrations. Something else is involved. What is involved is the frontier, the limit where the place of the lack is established.

A continuous, I mean varied reflection about the different, metonymical forms in which there appear in clinical practice the focal points of this lack, will constitute the continuation of our discourse. But we cannot but treat it ceaselessly along with the putting into question of what one can call the goals of analysis. The positions taken up in this respect are so instructive, educative that I would like at the point that we are at, that besides this article to which it would be appropriate to return, to follow it in detail, you should read another article by someone called Szasz on the goals of analytic treatment, "On the theory of psychoanalytic treatment", in which you will see that there is advanced the following: it is that the aims of analysis are given by its rule. And that its rule, and at the same time its aims can only be defined as promoting as a final goal of analysis, of every analysis whether it is didactic or not, the initiation of the patient into a scientific point of view - that is how the author expresses himself - concerning his own movements.

Is that a definition? I am not saying that we can accept it or reject it, it is one of the extreme positions, it is undoubtedly a very singular and specialised position. I am not saying: is it a definition that we could accept? I am saying: what can that definition teach us? You have heard enough here to know that (24) undoubtedly, that if there is something that I have often put in question it is precisely the relationship of the scientific point of view, in so far as its aim is always to consider the lack as being able to be filled in every case, with the problematic of an experience including in itself, of taking the lack as such into account.

It nevertheless remains that such a point of view is useful to pinpoint, especially if one relates it, if one links it to an article by another analyst, an older article by Barbara Low, concerning what she calls the Entschädigung, the compensations of the position of the analyst. You will see produced there a completely opposite reference, which is not to that of the scholar, but to that of the artist, and that moreover what is involved in analysis is something quite comparable, she tells us - it is certainly not any less remarkable as an analysis as regard the firmness of its conceptions - quite comparable, she tells us, to the sublimation which presides over artistic creation. Could we not with these three texts - the third of which is in the International Zeitschrift of year 20, I mean the 20th year of the International Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse in German: despite its rarity I will make it available to whoever is willing to take responsibility for it - could we not decide that on the 20th February, which is the day that my return - since I am going to absent myself now - is possible, but not certain, could we not decide that two or three persons, two persons who are here and whom I questioned earlier, by dividing up the roles among themselves as they see fit, one to present, the other to criticise or comment, or on the contrary alternating like a choir the two parts that these two opposing presentations would constitute, could these two persons, linking up if necessary with a third for the third article - it is not unthinkable - commit themselves to not leaving this rostrum empty for too long and to take my place if I am not there, with me in the audience if I return, this problem, namely to occupy themselves exactly with the three articles that I have just spoken about.

I think I have obtained from two of them - I mean Granoff and Perrier - their consent earlier; I invite you here then to listen to them on the 20th February, namely in exactly three weeks time.

Seminar 12: Wednesday 27 February 1963

Good! Well here I am back from winter sports. The greater part of my reflections there were of course as usual concerned with being of service to you. Not exclusively however. That is why the winter sports this year, apart from the fact that I enjoyed them, which is not always the case, struck me by something or other which appeared to me and which brought me back to a problem of which they seem to be an obvious incarnation, a living materialisation, it is the contemporary one of the function of the concentration camp for the wealthy old, which as everyone knows will become more and more of a problem with the advance of our civilisation given the advance of the average age over time: that reminded me that obviously this problem of the concentration camp and of its function at this epoch of our history has really been completely missed up to now, completely masked by the era of cretinous moralising which immediately followed the end of the war, and the absurd idea that we were going to be able to finish just as quickly with them, I am still talking about concentration camps. Indeed I will not go on any longer about the different commercial travellers who made a specialty of stifling the affair, in the first rank of whom there was, as you know, one who received the Nobel Prize. We saw the degree to which he was up to his heroism of the absurd when he had to make up his mind about a serious contemporary question.

All of that to remind us - because moreover in parallel with these reflections I was rereading, I say it again as I did earlier, in order to be of service to you, my seminar on Ethics of a few years ago and this to renew the well founded nature of what I believe I articulated there as being the most essential according to our master Freud, what I think I emphasised there in a fashion worthy of the truth that was involved, that all morality is to be sought in its origin, in its source, on the side of the Real. Again you have to know of course what is meant by that. I think that for those who understood this seminar more precisely morality is to be sought on the side of the real and more especially in politics. This is not to encourage you to go looking for it in the Common Market!

So now I am going not only to invite to speak but also give the presiding role, as they say, or more exactly the position of chairman to the one who occupied it the last time, Granoff, who is going to come up here, because he is going to have to reply -

(2) since he gave a general introduction - to the three parts, and is going to have say at least a few words in reply to Madame Aulagnier who is going to complete today the loop of what was begun the last time.

Granoff here then, and Aulagnier here. Aulagnier is going to tell us what she extracted from her work on the article by Margaret Little.

Madame Aulagnier on Margaret Little's article, pp 3 - 13.

Lacan: Would you like to say the few concluding words that I suggested, that you were going to give, according to what I read - I will tell you later how I learned what was said the last time - but anyway I know enough about it to know that you announced that you should bring things to a close.

Granoff concludes, pp 13-17.

(17) It was not at all a bad idea of mine to ask Granoff to conclude, not simply because he has freed me from a part of my task of criticism, but because I believe he has completed in a satisfactory fashion and at the same time clarified what I believe I picked up from a rapid reading of the introductory talk that he gave the last time, and which - perhaps not rightly, but after all, I say in a rapid reading - left me a little unsatisfied.

I must say that with respect to the task that had been reserved to him, specifically as regards the article by Barbara Low, I found him a little bit short of the truth, in a word, not to have exhausted everything that can be drawn from this article which is certainly by far the most extraordinary and the most remarkable of the three.

I saw a little bit the sign of an evasion in the fact that he sent us back, referred us to the most modern form of intervention on the subject in the shape of this article by Lucia Tower; on the other hand I am on the whole grateful to him because this article has now been introduced, and I would not have done it for many reasons myself this year, but now we can no longer avoid it.

We will have to find a way of making this article of Lucia Tower, which he was not able to summarise, available; at least bring it to the knowledge of a certain number of people to whom it would be of the greatest interest.

This to orient things in the way I want to tackle them now for the half-hour or the thirty-five minutes that remain to us. I am not going to say much more to you about what I know each one of you contributed, even though I am very grateful to Perrier for having sent me yesterday a little summary of what he for his part contributed, a summary that was made necessary by the fact which I do not need to labour too much, that I was not able to have in time even a typed account of what was said the last time.

Whether it is the effect of chance or of bad organisation, it is certainly not because of me that things have happened in this way; because during the whole of the intervening time I tried to (18) take every possible precaution that such an accident would not happen.

Therefore I am leaving myself time. And perhaps even to be better informed, to make an allusion to the points of detail that I would like to pick up. The authors of these interventions will therefore lose nothing by waiting for a little while. I think that in general you know enough about what I wanted to contribute by referring to these articles which at first appear to be and are effectively all centred on counter-transference, which is precisely a subject which I do not claim to see in any way being even specified for you in the way it deserves, and therefore to have done this from the perspective of what I have to say to you about anxiety, more exactly about the function that this reference to anxiety ought to fulfill in the general sequence of my teaching.

The fact is that effectively these remarks about anxiety can no longer be kept at a distance from a more precise approach to what has been present in an always more insistent fashion for some time in my discourse, namely the problem of the desire of the analyst.

For when all is said and done, this at least cannot fail to escape the hardest-hearing ears: the fact is that in the difficulty of the approach of these authors to counter-transference, it is the problem of the desire of the analyst which creates the obstacle, which creates the obstacle because in short taken generally, namely not elaborated as we have done it here, every intervention of this order, however surprising this may appear after sixty years of analytic development, seems to share a fundamental imprudence.

The people involved, whether we are dealing with Szasz, or with Barbara Low herself, whether we are dealing still more with Margaret Little - and I will say later how things have been advanced in this respect in the extraordinary confidences in which Lucia Tower, the most recent author, has spoken about very profoundly on this subject, more specifically has made a very profound avowal of her experience - none of these authors can avoid putting things on the plane of desire. The term counter-transference, as it is envisaged, namely, in general, broadly speaking the participation of the analyst, but let us not forget that more essential than the engagement of the analyst, in connection with which you see there being produced in the texts the most extreme vacillations from their hundred-percent responsibility to staying completely out of it

(19) I believe that in this respect the final article, the one which you unfortunately know only under an indicative form, the one by Lucia Tower, highlights well, not for the first time, but for the first time in an articulated manner something that is much more suggestive in this order, namely that which in the analytic relationship can occur on the side of the analyst in terms of what she calls a small change for him, the analyst - this reciprocity of action is here something which I am not saying at all is the essential term, let us say that the simple evocation of it is well designed to reestablish the question at the level at which it should be posed. It is not a matter in effect of definition, even of an exact definition of counter-transference, which could be given very simply, which is simply nothing other than the following which has only one drawback as a definition, which is that it abandons completely the question which is posed about its import, namely that counter-transference is everything that the psychoanalyst represses of what he receives as signifier in the analysis. It is nothing else and this is why this question of counter-transference is really not the question. It is from the state of confusion that it is brought to us in that it takes on its signification. This signification alone is the one from which no author can escape precisely in the measure that he tackles it and in the measure that this is what interests him, it is the desire of the analyst.

If this question is not simply not resolved, but finally has not even begun to be resolved, it is simply because there is not in analytic theory up to the present, I mean up to this seminar precisely, any exact positioning of what desire is.

It is no doubt because to do it is not a small undertaking. Moreover you can see that I never claimed to do it in one step. For example: the fashion in which I introduced it of distinguishing, of teaching you to situate desire as distinct compared to demand. And specifically at the beginning of this year I introduced something new, suggesting it to you first to see your response or your reactions, at they say, which were not lacking, namely the identity, as I put it, of desire and the law.

It is rather curious that something so obvious - because it is an obvious fact inscribed in the first steps of analytic doctrine itself - that something so evident can only be introduced or (20) reintroduced if you wish with such precautions.

This is why I come back today to this plane to show certain aspects, indeed implications of it. Desire then is the law. It is not only the fact that in analytic doctrine, with the Oedipus complex as its central corpus, it is clear that what constitutes the substance of the law is the desire for the mother, that inversely what normatives desire itself, what situates it as desire, is what is called the law of the prohibition of incest.

Let us take things from the angle, through the way in, defined by this word which has a presentified meaning in the very times in which we live, erotism.

We know, that its Sadean if not its sadistic manifestation, is the most exemplary one. Desire presents itself as a will to jouissance from whatever angle it appears - I spoke about the Sadean angle, I did not say the sadistic one, it is just as true for what is called masochism.

It is quite clear that if something is revealed by analytic experience, it is that even in perversion where desire in sum appears by presenting itself as what lays down the law, namely as a subversion of the law, it is in fact well and truly the support of a law. If there is something that we now know about the pervert, it is that what appears from the outside as satisfaction without restraint is defence, is well and truly the bringing into play, into action of a law in so far as it restrains, it suspends, it stops, precisely on the path of this jouissance.

The will to jouissance in the pervert as in everyone else, is a will which fails, which encounters its own limit, its own restraint, in the very exercise as such of the perverse desire. In a word, the pervert does not know, as was very well emphasised by one of the people who spoke today at my request, he does not know at the service of what jouissance his activity is exercised. It is not in any case at the service of his own.

It is this which allows there to be situated what is involved at the level of the neurotic. The neurotic is characterised by the following - and this is why he was the place of passage, the path to lead us to this discovery, which is a decisive path in morality - that the true nature of desire in so far as this decisive path is not taken except from the moment that here (21) attention has been focussed on what I am expressly in the process of articulating before you just now, the neurotic was this exemplary path in the sense that he shows us, for his part, that it is by way of the search for, the establishment of the law itself that he needs to pass to give its status to his desire, to sustain his desire. The neurotic more than anybody else highlights this exemplary fact that he can only desire in accordance with the law. He cannot for his part sustain, give its status to his desire except as unsatisfied for himself or as impossible. It remains that I am giving myself the easier task in speaking to you only of the hysteric or the obsessional, because this is to leave completely outside the field of the neurosis ;;hat we are still embarrassed by along the whole path we have taken, namely anxiety neurosis about which I hope this year, as regards what we have engaged on here, to make you take the necessary step. Let us not forget that it is from this that Freud began and that, if death, his death, deprived us of something, if is not to have allowed him fully the time to come back to it. We are therefore placed, however paradoxical this may appear to you as regards the subject of anxiety, we are placed, we are brought back to this crucial plane, to this crucial point that I will call the myth of the moral law, namely that any healthy position of the moral law is supposed to be sought in the sense of an autonomy' of the subject.

The very accent of this research, the always greater emphasising in the course of the history of these ethical theories, of this notion of autonomy sufficiently shows what is involved, namely a defence, that what it is a matter of swallowing, is this first and obvious truth that the moral law is heteronomous; this is why I insist on the fact that it proceeds from what I am calling the real in so far as it intervenes, as it intervenes when it intervenes essentially, as Freud tells us, by eliding the subject, by determining by its very intervention what is called repression and which only takes on its full meaning if we start from this synchronic function, in so far as I articulated it before you by pointing out to you, in a first approximation, what effacing traces means. This is obviously only a first approximation because everyone knows precisely that the traces are not effaced and that this is what constitutes the aporia of this affair, the aporia which is not one for you, since it is very precisely for this reason that there is elaborated before (22) you the notion of signifier, and that what is involved is, not the effacing of traces, but the return of the signifier to the state of trace, the abolition of this passage from the trace to the signifier which is constituted by what I tried to get you to sense, to describe for you by putting in the parenthesis of the trace, an underlining, a dam, a mark of the trace. This is what is demolished with the intervention of the real. The real referring the subject back to the trace, abolishes the subject also at the same time: for there is no subject except through the signifier, through this passage to the signifier: a signifier is that which represents the subject for another signifier.

To grasp the source of what is involved here, not in the always too facile perspective of history and of memory, because forgetting appears to be a too material, too natural thing for it to be believed that it does not happen all by itself, even though it is the most mysterious thing in the world from the moment that memory is posited as existing. That is why I am trying to introduce you into a dimension which is transversal, not yet as synchronic as the other.

Let us take the masochist. The maso, as they say, it appears, somewhere, namely the most enigmatic to be put in suspense from the point of view of perversion. He, you are going to tell me., for his part knows well that it is the Other who enjoys. This would be then the pervert who has brought his truth to light. He would be the exception to everything that I said earlier about the pervert not knowing how to enjoy: of course, it is always the Other, and the maso is supposed to know it. Well then I will no doubt come back to it. As of now I want to emphasise that what escapes the masochist and what puts him in the same position as all the perverts, is that he believes of course that what he is looking for, is the jouissance of the Other; but precisely, since he believes it, that is not what he is looking for. What escapes him, even though it is a tangible truth, really lying about everywhere and within everybody's reach, but for all that never seen at its true level of functioning, is that he seeks the anxiety of the Other.

Which does not mean that he is trying to annoy him. Because for want of understanding what is meant by seeking the anxiety of the Other - naturally it is at its gross, even stupid level that things are brought to by a sort of common sense - for want of (23) being able to see the truth there is behind that, of course one abandons this shell in which something more profound is contained, which is formulated in the way that I have just told you.

This is why it is necessary for us to return to the theory of anxiety, of anxiety as signal, and for us to see the difference, or more exactly to the new thing that is contributed by the dimension introduced by the teaching of Lacan about anxiety in so far as not opposing Freud, but placed for the moment in two columns. We will say that Freud at the end of his elaboration, speaks about anxiety as signal being produced in the ego about what? An internal danger. It is a sign representing something for someone: the internal danger for the ego. The transition, the essential passage which allows this structure itself to be used by giving it its full meaning and this notion of internal, of internal danger to be suppressed: there is no internal danger because - as paradoxically to the eyes of distracted ears, I say, as paradoxically when I returned to it when I gave you my seminar on Ethics, namely to the topology of the Entwurf - there is no internal danger because this envelope of the neurological apparatus, in so far as it is a theory of this apparatus which is given, this envelope has no interior because it has only a single surface, that the Psi-system as Aufbau, as structure, as that which interposes itself between perception and consciousness, is situated in another dimension as other qua locus of the signifier; that henceforward anxiety is introduced at first, as I did it before the seminar of this year, last year, as a specific manifestation at this level of the desire of the Other as such.

What does the desire of the Other represent qua coming from this angle? It is here that the signal takes on its value, the signal that, if it is produced in a place that one can call the ego topologically, clearly concerns someone else. The ego is the locus of the signal. But it is not for the ego that the signal is given. It is quite obvious that if this lights up at the level of the ego, it is in order that the subject - one cannot call it anything else - should be warned about something.

He is warned about this something which is a desire, namely a demand which does not concern any need, which does not concern anything other than my very being, namely which puts me in question - let us say that it cancels it out: in principle it is (24) not addressed to me as present - which is addressed to me, if you wish, as expected, which is addressed to me much more again as lost and which, in order that the Other should be able to locate himself (s'y retrouve) requests my loss.

That is what anxiety is. The desire of the Other does not recognise me, as Hegel believes, which renders the question quite easy. For if he recognises me, since he will never recognise me sufficiently, all that is left to me is to use violence. Therefore he neither recognises me nor miscognises me. Because that would be too easy: I can always escape from it by struggle and violence. He puts me in question, interrogates me at the very root of my own desire as o, as cause of this desire and not as object, and it is because he is aiming at this in a relationship of antecedence, in a temporal relationship, that I can do nothing to break this grip except by engaging myself in it. It is this temporal dimension which is anxiety, and it is this temporal dimension which is that of analysis. It is because the desire of the analyst stimulates in me this dimension of expectation that I am caught in this something which is the efficacy of the analysis. I would really like him to see me as such and such, for him to make of me an object. The relationship to the other, the Hegelian one here, is very convenient, because then in effect I have all sorts of resistances against that, and against this other dimension let us say a good part of the resistance slips. Only for that it is necessary to know what desire is and to see its function, not at all simply on the plane of the struggle, but there where Hegel - and for good reason - did not want to go looking for it, on the plane of love.

Now, if you go - and perhaps you will go with me, because after all the more I think about it and the more I speak about it and the more I find indispensable to illustrate the things I am speaking about - if you read the article by Lucia Tower, you will see this story: two gentlemen (bonshommes) - to speak as one spoke after the war, when one spoke about ladies (des bonnes femmes) in a certain milieu - you will see two gentlemen with whom, what she recounts, what she recounts is particularly illustrative and efficacious, they are two love stories.

Why did the thing succeed? In one case when she was touched herself, it is not she who touched the other, it is the other who put her on to the plane of love; and in the other case the other did not get to it and that is not interpretation, because it is written down and she says why.

(23) And this is designed to induce in us some reflections on the fact that, if there are some people who have said something sensible about counter-transference, it is uniquely women.

You will say to me: Michael Balint? Only it is rather striking that he wrote his article with Alice. Ella Sharpe, Margaret Little, Barbara Low, Lucia Tower. Why is it that it is women who, let us already simply say, have dared to speak about the thing in an overwhelming majority and that they should have said interesting things? It is a question that will be completely clarified if we take it from the angle I am talking about, namely the function of desire, the function of desire in love in connection with which, I think, you are mature enough to hear the following - which moreover is a truth which has always been well known, but to which its place has never been given, it is that in so far as desire intervenes in love and has as I might say an essential stake in it, desire does not concern the beloved object.

As long as this primary truth around which alone can turn a valid dialectic of love is put for you in the ranks of an Erniedrigung an accident of love life, of an Oedipus complex which grows paws, well then, you will understand absolutely nothing about what is involved, about the way the question should be posed as regards what the desire of the analyst may be. It is because it is necessary to start from the experience of love, as I did in the year of my seminar on transference, to situate the topology in which this transference can be inscribed, it is because it is necessary to start from there that today I am bringing you back to it.

But no doubt my discourse will take on, from the fact that I am going to terminate it here, an interrupted appearance. What I produced there at the final term as a formula, can be taken as a pause, a chapter heading or conclusion as you wish. After all it is permissible for you to take it as a stumbling block or if you wish as a banality. But it is here that I intend that we should take up the next time the rest of our discourse to situate in it exactly the indicative function of anxiety and what it will allow us subsequently to gain access to.

Seminar 13: Wednesday 6 March 1963

We are going then to continue our journey of approach to anxiety, which I would like you to understand is indeed of the order of an approach. Of course, you are already sufficiently advised by what I am producing here, that I want to teach you that anxiety is not what shallow people think. Nevertheless you will see, in rereading afterwards the texts on this major point, that what you have learned is far from being absent from them; simply it is masked and veiled at the same time, it is masked by formulae which are styles perhaps that are too cautious under their coating, as one might say, their carapace. The best authors allow there to appear what I already put the accent on for you, that it is not objektlos, that it is not without an object.

The sentence which in Hemmung, Symptom und Angst precedes, in Appendix B "Ergänzung zur Angst", "Supplementary remarks on anxiety", the very sentence which precedes the reference that Freud makes, following in this the tradition of indétermination, to the Objektlosigkeit of anxiety - and after all I would only need to remind you of the bulk of the article itself to say that this characteristic of being without an object cannot be retained - but the sentence just before, Freud says anxiety is "Die Angst ist Angst vor etwas", it is essentially anxiety about something.

Can we be satisfied with this formula? Of course not. I think that we ought to go much further, say more about this structure, this structure which already, as you see, opposes it by contrast, if it is a fact that anxiety, being the relationship with this object that I approached which is the cause of desire, is opposed by contrast with this vor, how has this thing which I placed for you promoting desire behind desire, gone in front of it, this is perhaps one of the sources of the problem.

In any case, let us underline clearly that we find ourselves in the tradition before what is called an almost literary theme, a commonplace, the one between fear and anxiety which all the authors, referring to the semantic position, oppose at least at the beginning, even if subsequently they tend to bring them together or to reduce them to one another - which is not the case among the best of them. At the beginning undoubtedly one tends to emphasise this opposition between fear and anxiety by, let us say, differentiating their position with respect to the object.

And it is really tangible, paradoxical, significant of the error (2) thus committed that one is led to stress that fear, for its part, has one, has an object.

Breaking through a certain characteristic, there is here an objective danger, Gefahr, dangeite, Gef "áhrdung, a danger situation, the entry of the subject into danger, which would after all deserve a pause: what is a danger? We are going to be told that fear is by its nature, adequate to, in correspondence with, entsprechend to the object from which the danger comes.

The article of Goldstein on the problem of anxiety on which we will pause, is in this regard very significant of this sort of slipping, of seduction, of capture, as one might say, of the pen of an author - who in this matter was able to gather together, as you will see, the essential and very precious characteristics of our subject - the seduction of the pen by a thesis, insisting in a fashion which one can say is in no way required by its subject in this respect - because it is anxiety that is involved - insisting, as one might say on the oriented character of fear, as if fear were already made up completely of the locating of the object, of the organisation of the response, of the opposition, of the Entgegendstehen between what is Umwelt and everything which in the subject has to face up to it.

It is not enough to evoke the first reference summoned to my memory by such propositions: I remembered what I believe I had already underlined for you in a little, one cannot call that a short story, notation, impression of Chekov which was translated using the term "frights (frayeurs)". I tried it in vain to inform myself of the title of this short story in Russian; because, inexplicably, none of my Russian-speaking listeners were able to find for me this notation, which is perfectly well located with its year in the French translation, even with the help of this date, in the editions of Chekov which are nevertheless in general produced chronologically. It is peculiar, it is upsetting and I cannot say that I am not disappointed about it - in this notation under the term "Frights", the frights that Chekov himself experienced - I already pointed out to you once, I believe, what was involved - one day, with a young boy who was driving his sledge - his droschka, I believe it is called, something like that - he is going along a plane, and, in the distance, at sunset, the sun already setting on the horizon, he sees in a church tower which appears, at a range that he could reasonably see its details, he sees flickering through a skylight on a very (3) high storey of the tower to which he knows, because he knows the place, one cannot gain entry in any way, a mysterious inexplicable flame which nothing allows him to attribute to any effect of reflection; there is here obviously the mapping out of something: he makes a short reckoning of what can or cannot account for the existence of this phenomenon and, having really excluded every kind of known cause," he is all of a sudden gripped by something which I believe in reading this text can in no way be called anxiety, he is gripped by what he himself calls moreover, for want obviously of being able to have at present the Russian term, which was translated by frights - I believe this is what corresponds best to the text - it is of the order not of anxiety, but of fear (peur); and what he is afraid of, is not anything that threatens him, it is something which has precisely this character of referring to the unknown in what is manifesting itself to him. The examples that he gives subsequently under this same heading, namely the fact that one day, he sees passing along the horizon, on the railway, a type of wagon which gives him the impression, to hear his description, of a phantom wagon, because nothing is pulling it, nothing explains its movement: a wagon passes at full speed along the curve of the railway which is there at that moment before him. Where has it come from? Where is it going? This sort of apparition torn away in appearance from any determinism that can be located, here again is something that throws him for a moment into disorder, a veritable panic, which is well and truly of the order of fear: there is no menace there either and the characteristic of anxiety is undoubtedly lacking in this sense that the subject is neither seized, nor involved in this innermost part of himself which is the aspect by which anxiety is characterised, on which I am insisting.

The third example, is the example of a thoroughbred dog which nothing allows him, given the fact that he has completely mapped out everything that surrounds him, whose presence nothing allows him to explain at this time, in this place; he begins to foment the mystery of Faust's dog, thinks he can see the form under which the devil is approaching him; it is well and truly from the side of the unknown that fear develops here, and it is not of an object, it is not of the dog who is there that he is afraid, it is of something else, it is behind the dog.

On the other hand, it is clear that what is insisted on, that the effects of fear have in a way a character of adequation, in (4) principle, namely of unleashing a flight reaction, is sufficiently compromised by what one must indeed put the accent on, that in many cases paralysing fear manifests itself in an inhibiting, even fully disorganising action, indeed can throw the subject into a disarray which is least adapted to the response, least adapted to the finality, which might be supposed to be the adequate subjective form.

It is elsewhere, therefore, that there must be sought the distinction, the reference by which anxiety is to be distinguished from it. And you can well imagine that it is not simply a paradox, a desire to play with an inversion, if I put forward here before you that anxiety is not without object, a formula whose form undoubtedly designates this subjective relationship which is that of a halting-place, a starting-place from which I want to advance further today; because of course the term object has been long prepared here by me with an accent which is distinguished from what the authors have up to now defined as object when they speak about the object of fear.

It is easy to give immediately its support to this vor Etwas of Freud, of course, because Freud articulates it in the article and in all sorts of ways: it is what he calls the internal danger, Gefahr or Gefährdung, the one which comes from within. As I told you: it is a matter of not contenting yourself with this notion of danger, Gefahr or Gefährdung. Because, if I already signalled earlier its problematic character when an external danger is involved - in other words, what warns the subject that it is a danger if not the fear itself, if not the anxiety - but the sense that the term internal danger can have is too linked to the function of a whole structure that must be preserved, of a whole order of what we call defence, for us not to see that in the very term defence the function of danger is itself implied, but is not for all that clarified.

Let us try therefore to follow the structure in a more step by step way and to designate clearly where we intend to fix, to locate this trait of signal on which indeed Freud dwelt as being the one which is the most proper to indicate to us, to us analysts, the usage that we can make of the function of anxiety. This is what I aim at reaching along the path that I am trying to lead you.

Only the notion of the real, in the opaque function which is the one from which you know I begin in order to oppose to it that of the signifier, allows us to orientate ourselves and to say already that this Etwas before which anxiety operates as a (5) signal, is something which is let us say for man "necessary"- in quotation marks - an irreducible aspect of this real. It is in this sense that I risked giving you the formula that among all the signals, anxiety is the one which does not deceive.

Anxiety then is the signal of the real and - as I told you - of an irreducible mode under which this real presents itself in experience, this is just now, at the point that we are at, the guide, the guiding thread that I would ask you to hold onto to see where it leads us.

This real and its place, is exactly what with the support of the sign, of the bar there can be inscribed the operation which, arithmetically, is called division. I already taught you to situate the process of subjectification in so far as it is at the locus of the Other, under the primary species of the signifier, that the subject has to be constituted; at the locus of the Other and upon the given of this treasury of the signifier already constituted in the Other and just as essential for any advent of human life as everything that we can conceive of in the natural Umwelt. It is with respect to the treasury of the signifier which already awaits him, constitutes the deviation where he has to situate himself, that the subject, the subject at this mythical level which does not yet exist, which only exists starting from the signifier, which is prior to it, which is constitutive with respect to it, that the subject carries out this first interrogative operation: in you wish, how many times S?

0, if

0	S	X
0	∅	Anxiety
$	⊕	desire

And the operation being posited here in a certain fashion which is here in the 0 marked by this interrogation appears here, the difference between this response 0 and the given 0, something that is the remainder, the irreducible of the subject, it is o. o is what remains irreducible in this total operation of the advent of the subject to the locus of the Other, and it is from this that it is going to take on its function.

The relationship of this o to the S, the o in so far as it is precisely that which represents the S in a real and irreducible fashion, this o over S, o/S , this is what completes the operation of division, that which in effect since 0, as one might say, is something which has no common denominator, is outside the common denominator between the o and the S. If we wish conventionally to complete the operation all the same, we put as numerator the remainder, o, as denominator the divisor, the S. $$$ is equivalent to o over S, o/S .

(6) This remainder, therefore, in so far as it is the end (chute), as one might say, of the subjective operation, this remainder, we recognise in it here structurally, in an analogy from calculation, the lost object; this is what we have to deal with, on the one hand in desire, on the other hand in anxiety. We have to deal with it in anxiety, logically, as one might say, before the moment that we have to deal with it in desire.

And if you wish, to connote the three stages of this operation, we will say that here there is an X which we can only name retroactively, and which is properly speaking the approach of the Other, the essential line of sight where the subject has to pose himself and whose name I will give you afterwards. We have here the level of anxiety in so far as it is constitutive of the apparition of the function o and it is at the third term that there appears the ^ as subject of desire.

To illustrate now, to bring alive this no doubt extreme abstraction that I have just articulated, I am going to lead you to the obviousness of the image and this of course all the more legitimately in that it is an image that is involved, that this irreducible of o is of the order of the image.

He who possessed the object of desire and of the law, he who had enjoyed his mother, Oedipus to give him his name, takes this further step, he sees what he has done. You know what happens then. How choose the word, how can one say what is of the order of the unsayable and whose image nevertheless I want to make emerge for you? The fact that he sees what he has done has as a consequence that he sees - this is the word before which I stumble - the moment afterwards his own eyes swollen with their vitreous humours on the ground, a confused pile of filth since - how can we put it? - because since he had torn his eyes from their sockets he had quite obviously lost his sight. And nevertheless it is not that he does not see them, see them as such, as cause-object finally unveiled of the final, the ultimate, no longer guilty, but beyond the limits, concupiscence, that of having wanted to know.

The tradition even says that it is starting from that moment that he really becomes a seer. At Colonus he sees as far as it is possible to see and so far ahead that he sees the future destiny of Athens.

What is the moment of anxiety? Is it what makes possible this gesture through which Oedipus can tear out his eyes, make this sacrifice of them, this offering, this ransom of blindness in which his destiny is accomplished? Is that what anxiety is, the possibility, let us say, that man has of mutilating himself? No. (7) It is properly that which through this image, I am striving to designate for you: it is that an impossible sight threatens you of your own eyes on the ground.

Here I believe is the surest key that you can always rediscover under whatever style of approach the phenomenon of anxiety presents itself for you.

And then, however expressive, however provocative may be, as one might say, the narrowness of the locality that I designate for you as being that which is circumscribed by anxiety, you should notice that this image is found there as beyond the limits, not because of some preciousness in my choice, it is not an eccentric choice; it is, once I have designated it for you, well and truly frequent to encounter it. Go to the first exhibition currently open to the public, at the Musee des Arts Decoratifs and you will see two Zurbarans, one from Montpellier, the other from somewhere else which represent for you I believe, Lucy and Agatha each one with their eyes on a plate, the match of their breasts. Martyrs, let us say, which means witnesses of what is seen here moreover, that it is not, as I told you, what is possible, namely the fact that these eyes being denucleated, these breasts being torn off, which is anxiety. Because in truth, something which also deserves to be noticed, these Christian images are not especially badly tolerated, despite the fact that some people for reasons which are not always the best are a bit fastidious about them. Stendhal, speaking about San Stefano il Rotondo in Rome finds that these images which are on the walls are disgusting. Undoubtedly in the place he names they are rather lacking in art so that one is introduced, I must say, in a more lively fashion to their signification.

But these charming persons that Zurbaran presents to us, by presenting these objects on a plate, present us with nothing other than something that could be on occasion - and we do not deprive ourselves of it - the object of our desire: in no way do these images introduce us, I think, for the majority of us, to the order of anxiety.

For this, it would be necessary for him to be more personally concerned, for him to be a sadist or a masochist, for example. Once a true masochist, a true sadist is involved, which does not mean someone who can have phantasies that we pinpoint as sadistic or masochistic, provided they reproduce the fundamental position (8) of the sadist or the masochist, the true sadist, in so far as we can locate, coordinate, construct his essential condition, the true masochist, in so far as we find ourselves, by successive mapping out, elimination, required to push further the plan of his position than what is given to us by others as Erlebnis, an Erlebnis itself more homogeneous, the Erlebnis of the neurotic, but an Erlebnis which is only a reference, a dependence, the image of something beyond, which constitutes the specificity of the perverse position and with regard to which the neurotic takes in a way his reference and his support for ends to which we will return.

Let us try therefore to say what we can presume about what this sadistic or masochistic position is, what the images of Lucy and Agatha may really interest: the key to it is anxiety. But it is necessary to seek out, know why. The masochist - I told you the other day, the last time - what is his position? What masks his phantasy from him? To be the object of a jouissance of the Other which is his own will to jouissance; for after all, the masochist does not necessarily, as a humorous apologue already quoted here reminds you, meet his partner. What does this position of object mask, if it is not to rejoin himself, to posit himself in the function of human rag, of this poor scrap separated from the body which is presented to us here. And this is why I tell you that the aim of the jouissance of the Other is a phantastical aim. What is sought, is in the Other, the response to this essential collapse of the subject into his final misery which is anxiety. Where is this Other that is involved? Here indeed is the reason why there was produced in this circle the third term always present in perverse jouissance: the profound ambiguity in which there is situated an apparently dual relationship is rediscovered here. Because moreover I have to make you sense where I intend to indicate this anxiety to you. We could say - and the thing is sufficiently highlighted by all sorts of features of history - that this anxiety which is the blind aim of the masochist - for his phantasy masks it from him - is nonetheless really what we could call the anxiety of God.

Do I need to appeal to the most fundamental Christian myth to give substance to everything that I am advancing here, namely that if the whole Christian adventure is not engaged in this central, inaugural, attempt, incarnated by a man whose every word is to be reheard again as those of someone who pushed things to their final term of an anxiety which only finds its veritable cycle at the level of him for whom the sacrifice is set up, namely at the level of the father.

God has no soul. That is quite obvious. No theologian has ever dreamt of attributing one to him. Nevertheless the total, radical change of perspective of the relationship to God began with a drama, a passion in which someone made himself the soul of God. Since it is because the place of the soul is also situated at this level of the residue of the fallen object that is involved, that is essentially involved, that there is no living conception of the soul, with the whole dramatic cortege in which this notion appears and functions in our cultural domain, unless it is accompanied precisely in the most essential fashion by this image of the fall.

Everything that Kierkegaard articulates is only a reference to these great structural reference points. Now then observe that I began with the masochist. It was the more difficult; but as a matter of fact it was the one which avoided confusions. Because one can understand better what a sadist is; and the snare involved here in making of it only the reversal, the other side, the inverted position of the masochist, unless one proceeds - which is what is usually done - in the opposite sense.

In the sadist, anxiety is less hidden. It is even so little so that it comes to the fore in the phantasy, which, if one analyses it makes of the anxiety of the victim an altogether required condition. Only this is the very thing which ought to make us suspicious. What the sadist seeks in the Other - because it is quite clear that for him the Other exists and it is not because he takes him as object that we ought to say that there is some relationship or other that we could call immature or again, as it is put, pregenital, the Other is absolutely essential and this indeed is what I wanted to articulate when I gave you my seminar on Ethics by bringing together Sade and Kant, the essential putting into question of the Other which goes so far as to simulate, and not by chance, the requirements of the moral law, which are indeed there to show us that the reference to the Other as such forms part of his aim - what is he searching for there?

It is here that the texts, the texts that we can hold onto, I (10) mean those which give some hold on an adequate critique, take on their value, of course, a value signaled by the strangeness of some moments, of some detours which in a way detach themselves, explode with respect to the line that is being followed. I will leave you to search in Juliette, even in the One hundred and twenty days, these few passages where the characters, completely occupied in slaking on these chosen victims their greed for torments, enter into this bizarre, singular and curious trance, indicated, I repeat, on several occasions in the text of Sade, which is expressed in these strange words, in effect that it is necessary for me to articulate here: "I had," cries the tormentor, "I had the skin of the cunt".

This is not a feature which is obvious along the track of the imaginable, and the privileged character, the moment of enthusiasm, the character of supreme trophy brandished at the high point of the chapter is something which, I believe, is sufficiently indicative of the following: it is that something is sought which is in a way the reverse (l'envers) of the subject, which takes on here its signification from this feature of the glove turned inside-out which underlines the feminine essence of the victim. It is the passage to the outside of what is most hidden that is involved; but let us observe at the same time that this moment is in a way indicated in the text itself as being totally impenetrated by the subject, allowing there precisely to be masked here the trait of his own anxiety.

In a word, if there is something for that matter which evokes how little light we can throw on the truly sadistic relationship, that the form of explanatory texts turn aside from the phantasy, if there is something that they suggest to us, it is in a way the instrumental character to which the function of the agent is reduced. That which in a way is hidden, except in a flash, the aim of his action, is the work aspect of his operation. He also has a relationship with God, this is what is exposed everywhere in Sade's text. He cannot take a step forward without this reference to the supremely wicked being and it is just as clear for him as for the one who is speaking that it is God that is involved.

For his part he goes to all sorts of exhausting trouble, even to the extent of missing his goal, to realise - which, thank God, it has to be said, Sade spares us having to reconstruct, for he articulates it as such - to realise the jouissance of God.

I think I have shown you here the game of occultation through which anxiety and object, in the one and in the other, are (11) brought to the forefront, one at the expense of the other term, but how also in the structures there is designated, there is declared the radical link between anxiety and this object in so far as it falls. In that very way its essential function is approached, its decisive function as remainder of the subject, the subject as a real. Undoubtedly this invites us to look again, to place a greater accent on the reality of these objects. And in moving on to this following chapter, I cannot fail to remark the degree to which this real status of objects, already nevertheless located for us, has been left to one side, been badly defined by people who would nevertheless like to consider themselves as the biologising reference points and bearings of psychoanalysis for you.

Is it not the occasion to notice a certain number of outstanding features which I would wish, as best I can and pushing my plough in front of me, to introduce you to. Because the breasts, since we have them there for example on Saint Agatha's plate, is it not an opportunity to reflect, since - it has been said already a long time ago - anxiety appears in separation; but then - we see it clearly - if they are separable objects, they are not separable by chance like the leg of a grasshopper, they are separable because they already have, as I might say, very sufficiently, anatomically a certain stuck on character, they are hung there. This very particular character of certain anatomical parts completely specifies a sector of the animal scale, the one that one calls precisely, not without reason, it is even rather curious that this quite essential, properly speaking signifying character of this trait has been noticed; because after all it seems that there are more structural things than the mammary to designate a certain animal grouping which has many other traits of homogeneity through which it could be designated.

This trait was no doubt chosen, and it was not a mistake. But it is indeed one of the cases where one sees the fact that the objectifying spirit is itself not uninfluenced by the pregnancy of psychological functions, I would say, to make myself understood by those who have not yet understood, a certain feature of pregnancy which is not simply significant, which induces in us certain significations in which we are very much engaged.

Viviparous-oviparous: a division really made to confuse us. Because all animals are viviparous because they generate eggs in which there is a living being and all animals are oviparous because there is no vivipar which was not vivipared inside an egg.

But why not really give all its importance to this fact which is really completely analogous to this breast which I earlier spoke to you about, that for the eggs which have a certain time of intrauterine life, there is this element, irreducible to the division of the egg in itself, which is called the placenta, that there is here also something stuck on and that in a word it is not so much the child who pumps milk from the mother as the breast, just as it is the existence of the placenta which gives to the position of the child inside the body of the mother its characteristics - sometimes manifested on a pathological plane - of parasitic nesting. You see where I intend to put the emphasis: on the privilege at a certain level of elements that we could qualify as amboceptors.

On what side is this breast? On the side of the one who sucks or on the side of the one who is sucked? And after all I am doing nothing here other than reminding you of something that effectively analytic theory was led to, namely to speak, I would not say indifferently, but with ambiguity in certain sentences, of the breast or of the mother, underlining of course that it is not the same thing. But has everything been said when the breast is qualified as a partial object?

When I say amboceptor, I am underlining that it is as necessary to articulate the relationship of the maternal subject to the breast as that of the suckling to the breast. The cut does not happen in the same place for the two; there are two cuts so distant that they even leave different residues (dechets) for the two. Because the cutting of the cord for the child leaves separated from him droppings (chutes) which are called the envelopes. This is homogeneous with himself and in continuity with his ectoderm and his endoderm.

The placenta is not particularly involved in the affair. For the mother, the cut is placed at the level of the dropping of the placenta, that is even the reason why these are called des caduques and the decay (caducite) of this object o is here what constitutes its function.

Well then, all of this is not meant to make you revise immediately some of the relations deduced, imprudently deduced from a hasty sketching of what I am calling the line of separation where there is produced the dropping, the niederfallen typical of the approach of an o which is nevertheless more essential to the subject than any other part of himself.

(13) But for the moment to make you steer straight towards what is essential, namely for you to perceive where this questioning leads, to the level of castration.

For with castration also we are dealing with an organ, before we get to the castration threat, namely what I have called the possible gesture, could we not, analogously to the image that I produced today before you, see whether we do not have the indication that anxiety is to be placed elsewhere?

Because a phallus, because people are always gargling on about biology, approaching it in an unbelievably frivolous way, a phallus is not limited to the field of mammals. There are a whole lot of insects, all revolting in different ways, from the black beetle to the cockroach, which have what? Stings (des dards). The sting goes a long way in effect in the animal. The sting is an instrument, and in many cases - I do not want to give you a course in comparative anatomy today, I would ask you to refer to the authors, if necessary I will indicate them to you - the sting is an instrument: it is used for hooking on. We know nothing about the amorous enjoyments of the black beetle or the cockroach. Nothing indicates however that they are deprived of it. It is even rather probable that jouissance and sexual union are always in the closest possible relationship.

And what does it matter! Our experience as men and the experience that we can presume to be those of mammals who most resemble us conjoin the locus of the jouissance and the instrument, the sting.

While we take the thing as being self-explanatory, nothing indicates that even where the copulatory instrument is a sting or a claw, an object for hooking on, in any case neither a tumescent nor detumescent object, jouissance is linked to the function of the object.

That jouissance, orgasm in our case, to limit ourselves to ourselves, coincides with as I might say the putting out of action, the putting out of operation of the instrument by detumescence, is something that altogether deserves that we should not hold it to be something, as I might say, which is as Goldstein expresses it, part of the Wesenheit, an essential part of the organism.

(14) This coincidence of approach has nothing rigorous about it once one begins to think about it; and then it is not, as I might say, in the nature of human things. In fact what do we see in Freud's first intuition about a certain source of anxiety?

Coitus interruptus. It is precisely the case in which by the very nature of the operations being carried out the instrument is revealed in its suddenly failed function of being an accompaniment to orgasm, in so far as orgasm is supposed to signify a common satisfaction.

I leave this question in suspense. I am saying simply that anxiety is put forward by Freud in its essential function there precisely where the accompaniment of the orgasmic build-up with what is called the exercise of the instrument is precisely disjointed. The subject can reach ejaculation, but it is an ejaculation outside; and the anxiety is precisely provoked by this fact which is highlighted, what I called earlier the putting out of action of the apparatus, of the instrument of jouissance. Subjectivity, if you wish, is focussed on the collapse of the phallus. This collapse of the phallus, exists in any case in a normally completed orgasm. It is precisely to this that our attention should be directed to highlight one of the dimensions of castration.

How is copulation between man and woman experienced, this is what allows the function of castration, namely the fact that the phallus is more significant in human experience by its collapse, by its possibility of being a fallen object, than by its presence, this is what designates the possibility of the place of castration in the history of desire.

It is essential to highlight this. Because what did I end with the last time, if not by telling you: as long as desire is not structurally situated, is not distinguished from the dimension of jouissance, as long as the question is not that of knowing what is the relationship, and whether there is a relationship for each partner between desire - specifically the desire of the Other - and jouissance, the whole affair is condemned to obscurity.

Thanks to Freud we have the plane of cleavage. That is miraculous in itself. In the ultra-precocious perception that Freud had of its essential character, we have the function of castration as intimately linked to the traits of the decayed (caduc) object, of caducity as characterising it essentially. It (15) is only starting from this decayed object that we can see what is meant by speaking about partial object. In fact I will tell you right away: the partial object, is an invention of the neurotic, it is a phantasy. It is he who makes a partial object of it. As regards the orgasm and its essential relationship with the function that we define as the fall of the most real of the subject, have you not had - those who have here the experience of being analysts - the testimony of it more than once? How often have you been told that a subject had, I am not saying his first, but one of his first orgasms when he had to hand up in a great hurry the copy of a composition or of a drawing that he had to finish quickly and where there was collected what? His work, at the moment when it was absolutely expected that something would be torn from him. The collection of the copies: at that moment he ejaculates. He ejaculates at the high-point of anxiety of course.

When people speak to us about this famous eroticisation of anxiety, is it not first of all necessary to know what relation anxiety already has with Eros? What the respective aspects of this anxiety are from the side of jouissance and from the side of desire, is what we will try to disengage the next time.

Seminar 14: Wednesday 13 March 1963

СТРАНЫ \j СТРАХА ГЛВЗ*

н е б о с ь б о ю с ь , г т о о н н г г р и л г т

Several of you were kind enough to respond to my complaint the last time of not yet having been able to find the Russian term which corresponded to this piece by Chekov which I learned about - I am saying this in passing - through Mr Kaufmann - I will come back to it later. It is Mr Kaufmann himself who, even though he is not a Russian speaker, brought me today the exact text which I asked Smirnoff for example as a Russian speaker to comment on rapidly.

I mean - indeed I scarcely dare to articulate these sounds - I do not know the phonology - to say what is involved in the title, СТсflXW which is the plural of the which СТPhXB gives the words that concern dread, fear, anxiety, terror, anguish and poses for us very difficult problems of translation.

It is a little bit - I am thinking about it as an improvisation, I thought of it just now - like what was raised in connection with the problem of colours, whose connotation surely does not overlap from one tongue to another. The difficulty - I already signaled it for you - that we have in grasping the term which in Russian would correspond precisely to anxiety - because this is where our troubles begin - shows it clearly.

In any case, if I correctly understood, from the debates among the Russian speakers here that this word gave rise to, it appears that in one way what I advanced the last time here was correct, namely that Chekov had not intended by this to speak about anxiety.

At this point, I come back to what wanted to render to Kaufmann, it is then very exactly the following: I used this example the last time to clarify, as one might say, in a lateral fashion, the thing whose reversal I was' trying to operate before you, namely to introduce the question, I said that it would be just as legitimate to say in fact that fear has no object; and, as I was going to announce in any case, as I already had done previously, that anxiety, for its part, was not without an object, that had a certain interest for me. But it is obvious that this absolutely does not exhaust the question of what are these fears or frights or dreads or whatever else, which are (2) designated in the examples of Chekov.

Now, since - I do not think I am misrepresenting him - Mr Kaufmann is trying to articulate something quite precise and focussed precisely on these Chekovian frights, I think it is important to underline that I only made a lateral usage of it and one that was dependent on the one that will be brought forward by him in a work that is to be done later.

And on this point, I think that before beginning today I am going to allow you to profit from a little discovery, due again to Mr Kaufmann, who is not a Russian speaker, which is that in the course of this research he found another term, the most common term for "I am afraid", which it appears is £iCltO£b. it is the first word that you see written there in the two sentences; and then, in this connection, he amused himself by recognising that, if I am not mistaken, in Russian as in French, the negation described as expletive, the one on which I put such a stress, because I find in it nothing less than the signifying trace in the sentence of what I call the subject of enunciating, as distinct from the subject of the enunciation, that in Russian also, there is the affirmative sentence, I mean the sentence which designates in the affirmative, the object of my fear, what I fear, it is not that it should not come, it is that it should come, and I say: that it will come (qu'il ne vienne), where I find myself confirmed by Russian, in saying that it is not enough to qualify this expletive ne as discordant, namely to mark the discordance that there is between my fear: since I am afraid that it will come, I hope that it will not come.

Well then, it seems that in Russian we see this with still more specificity - and this goes in the direction of the value that I give this expletive ne - namely that it is indeed the subject of enunciating as such that it represents and not simply his feeling; for if again I understood correctly a little earlier, discordance in Russian is already indicated by a special nuance, namely that the ZT06 which is there is already in itself a "that not, que ne", but marked by a different nuance. If I correctly understood Smirnoff, the b which distinguishes this "2.TQ& from the simple "that" of the Z.T0 in the second sentence, opens, indicates a nuance of the verb, a sort of conditional aspect, in such a way that this discordance is already marked at the level of the letter £> that you see here. Which does not prevent the ne of negation, which is still more expletive therefore, from the simple point of view of the signified, functioning all the same in Russian as in French leaving open then the question of its (3) interpretation and I have just said how I resolve it. There we are!

And now how am I going to get into today's material? I will say that this morning, remarkably enough, thinking about what I was going to produce here, I started all of a sudden to evoke the time when one of my most intelligent analysands - there are still some of those - insistently posed me the question: "What can be driving you that makes you go to all this trouble to tell them that?" It was in the arid years when linguistics, indeed the calculus of probabilities, had some place here.

In other words, I told myself that after all, it was not a bad angle either for introducing the desire of the analyst to recall that there is also a question of the desire of the teacher (l'enseignant).

I will not give you the word here and for good reasons. But it is striking that when, through a hint of culpability that I experience at the level of what one could call human tenderness, I think of the tranquillities that I am striving for, I am very ready to put forward the excuse - you saw it being highlighted on several occasions - that for example I would not be teaching if the split had not happened.

But it is not true. But, indeed, obviously, I would have liked to devote myself to more limited, more intermittent work; but fundamentally that does not change anything.

In short the fact that one can pose the question of the desire of the teacher to someone is the sign I would say, as Monsieur de La Palisse would say, that the question exists; it is also the sign that there is a teaching. But this introduces us when all is said and done to this curious remark that, where one does not pose the question, it is because there is a professor. The professor exists every time the response to this question is, as I might say, written, written in his appearance or in his behaviour, in this sort of conditioning that one can situate at the level of what, in short, in analysis we call the preconscious, namely of something that one can make emerge, wherever it comes from, from institutions or even from what are called his penchants.

At this level it is not useless to see then that the professor is defined as the one who teaches about teachings, in other words: he carves up teachings. If this truth were better known, that what is involved in fact at the level of the professor is something analogous to a collage, if this truth were better known (4) it would allow them to do it with more consummate art, which precisely the collage which has taken its meaning through a work of art shows us the way to. Namely if they made their collage in a way that is less concerned about fitting together, less restrained, they would have some chance of ending up at the very result that collage aims at, of evoking properly speaking this lack which gives all its value to the figurative work itself, when it succeeds of course. Along this path therefore they would manage to connect up with the proper effect of what is precisely a teaching.

There you are! This then to situate, to pay homage to those who are willing to take the trouble to see by their presence what is taught here, not alone to pay tribute to them, but to thank them for taking this trouble.

On this, for my own part, I am going - because moreover I have sometimes to deal with listeners who only come here in an intermittent fashion - to attempt to make myself for a moment the professor of my own teaching and since the last time I brought you the elements that I believe are sufficiently massive, to recall the major point of what I contributed the last time.

Starting then from the distinction between anxiety and fear, I tried as I reminded you just now, at least as a first step to upset the opposition at which there came to a stop the last development of the distinction between them which is accepted by everyone today.

It is certainly not in the direction of a transition from one to the other that the movement goes. If traces of it remain in Freud, that can only be because of the error of attributing to him the idea of this reduction of one to the other, an error founded on what I reminded you there was in him precisely as a beginning of what in reality is this reversal of positions, in this sense that if he says precisely, despite the fact that at one or other detour of his sentences the term objektlos turns up, he says that anxiety is "Angst vor Etwas", an anxiety about something, it is certainly not to reduce it to being another form of fear, because what he underlines, is the essential distinction between the provenance of what provokes the one and the other.

Therefore it is indeed on the side of the refusal of any emphasis that tends to isolate fear from the entgegenstehen, from what poses itself in front, from fear as response, entgegen precisely, that what I said in passing about fear has to be retained.

(5) On the contrary, it is indeed to recall at first that in anxiety, the subject is, I would say held, concerned, involved in the innermost part of himself, that simply on the phenomenological plane we see already the beginnings of what I tried to articulate further in a more precise fashion. I recalled in this connection the close relationship between anxiety and the whole apparatus of what are called "defences". And on this path I highlighted again, not without having already articulated, prepared it in all sorts of ways, that it is indeed from the side of the real, as a first approximation, that we have to seek anxiety as that which does not deceive.

This is not to say that the real exhausts the notion of what anxiety aims at. What anxiety aims at in the real, that with respect to which it presents itself as a signal, is that whose position I tried to show you in the table called, as I might say, that of the signifying division of the subject in which the X of a primitive

(S) Jouissance	namely his becoming as subject, this relationship
\emptyset Anxiety	of 0 over S, according to the figure of a
desire	division, of a subject s with respect to the 0 of the Other, in so far as it is along this path of the Other that the subject has to realise himself.

It is this subject - I left it undetermined for you as regards subject moves towards his becoming (avenement), its denomination in the first terms of these columns of division whose other terms are found posited according to the forms which I already commented on - that I inscribe here as (^).

The end of my discourse, I think, sufficiently allowed you to recognise how at this mythical level, S, prior to any coming into play of the operation, the subject could be denominated, in so far as this term has a sense and precisely for reasons to which we will return, that one cannot in any way isolate it as subject; and mythically we will call it today the subject of jouissance. For, as you know - I wrote it the last time, I believe - the three stages to which they correspond the three moments of this operation are jouissance, anxiety and desire respectively. It is into these stages that I am going to advance today to show not the mediating, but the median, function of anxiety between jouissance and desire.

How could we comment again on this important moment of our presentation, except by saying the following - the different terms of which I would ask you to take in the fullest sense that can be given them - that jouissance would not know the Other, O, except by this remainder o, which henceforth, in so far as I told you that there is no way of operating with this remainder, and (6) therefore that what comes at the lower stage, is the advent, at the end of the operation, of the barred subject, the subject qua implicated in the phantasy, in so far then as it is one of terms which constitute the support of desire. I say only one of the terms; for the phantasy is in a certain relationship of opposition to o, a relationship whose polyvalence and multiplicity are sufficiently defined by the composite character of this diamond shape, O, which is just as much disjunction, V./, as conjunction, / ^, which is just as much greater, >, and lesser, <, $ qua term of this operation has the form of division, since o is irreducible, is unable in this fashion of imaging it in mathematical forms, can only represent the reminder, that if division were carried out, further on, it would be the relationship of o to S which would be involved in the

$$\S : \frac{o}{S}$$

o	Ⓢ	Jouissance
o	∅	Anxiety
$		Desire

What does that mean? That to outline the translation of what I am designating in this way, I could suggest that o has taken on a sort of metaphor-function of the subject of jouissance. It would only be so, it would not be correct except in the very measure that o is assimilable to a signifier: and precisely, it is what resists this assimilation to the function of signifier. It is indeed for that reason that o symbolises what in the sphere of the signifier is always what presents itself as lost, as what is lost to signification. Now it is precisely the residue, this fall, what resists signification, that comes to find itself constituting the foundation as such of the desiring subject, no longer the subject of jouissance, but the subject in so far as on the path of his search, in so far as he enjoys (il jouit), which is not the search for his jouissance, but it is to want to make this jouissance enter the locus of the Other, as locus of the signifier, it is there on this path that the subject precipitates himself, anticipates himself as desiring.

Now, if there is precipitation, anticipation here, it is not in the sense that this step skips over, goes more quickly than its own stages. It is in the sense that it approaches, on this hither side of its realisation, this gap between desire and jouissance; this is where anxiety is situated. And this is so (7) sure that the moment of anxiety is not absent, as is marked by this way of ordering the terms, in the constitution of desire, even if this moment is elided, not locatable in the concrete, it is essential. I would ask you, for those to whom I need here to suggest an authority for them to have confidence that I am not making any mistake here, to remember in this connection what in the analysis of "Ein Kind wird geschlagen", in the first not only structural but finalist analysis of phantasy given by Freud, Freud for his part also speaks precisely about a second moment, always elided in its constitution, elided to such an extent that even analysis can only reconstruct it. Which is not to say that this moment of anxiety is always so inaccessible at many levels that are phenomenologically locatable. I said anxiety qua intermediary term between jouissance and desire, in so far as it is having gone through anxiety, founded on the moment of anxiety that desire is constituted.

It remains that the rest of my discourse was constructed to illustrate something which had been perceived for a long time, that at the heart of - we do not know how to take full advantage when it is a question for us of understanding to what there corresponds something that in our experience as analysts takes on a different value, the complex of castration - that at the heart, I was saying, of the experience of desire, there is something which remains when desire is "satisfied", that which remains, as one might say, at the end of desire, an end which is always a false end, an end which is always the result of a mistake.

The value taken on by, something you will allow me to telescope in what I sufficiently articulated the last time in connection with detumescence, namely what is manifested, what is represented of this function of the remainder, by the phallus in its exhausted stage. And this synchronic element which is as stupid as a cabbage, or even a cabbage-stalk, as Petrone puts it, is there to remind us that the object drops from the subject essentially in his relation to desire. That the object should be in this drop, is a dimension that must essentially be emphasised to take this further little step to which I want to lead you today, namely what could, with a little attention, already have appeared to you the last time in my discourse, when I tried to show you the shape in which there is incarnated this object o of the phantasy, support of desire.

Did it not strike you that I spoke to you about the breast or the eyes, making these objects o start from Zurbaran, from Lucy and Agatha, where they present themselves under what I might call a (8) positive form? These breasts and these eyes that I showed you there on the plate on which the two worthy saints carry them, or even on the bitter soil where Oedipus' feet carry him, appear here with a sign different from the one I showed you subsequently in the phallus as specified by the fact that at a certain level of the animal order jouissance coincides with detumescence, pointing out to you that there is nothing necessary about this, necessary nor linked to the Wesenheit, the essence of the organism, in the Goldsteinien sense of the word.

At the level of o, it is because the phallus, the phallus in so far as it is, in copulation, not alone the instrument of desire, but an instrument functioning in a certain fashion, at a certain animal level, it is for this reason that it presents itself in the position o with a (-) sign.

This is essential to articulate clearly, to differentiate, something that is important here, from castration anxiety, from what functions in the subject at the end of an analysis when what Freud designates as a castration threat is maintained there. If there is something which allows us to put our finger on the fact that this is a point that can be gone beyond, that it is absolutely not necessary that the subject remains suspended when he is a male at the castration threat, suspended, when she is of the other sex at Penisneid, it is precisely this distinction. To know how we could go beyond this limiting point, what must be known, this is why an analysis guided in a certain direction culminates at this impasse through which the negative which marks the physiological functioning of copulation in the human being finds itself promoted to the level of the subject in the shape of an irreducible lack. This is what will be found again subsequently as a question, as a direction of our path, and I think it is important to have marked it here.

What I subsequently contributed during our last meeting, is the articulation of two very important points concerning sadism and masochism, the essential of which I resume here for you, the essential that it is altogether capital to maintain, to sustain, in so far as by holding onto it, you can give their full meaning to the very elaborated things that are said in the current state of things about what is involved, namely sadism and masochism. What is to be retained in what I enounced there concerns at first masochism, as regards which you can see that, if the authors have really laboured a great deal to the point of taking very far, so (9) far that something I read recently here, was able to surprise me myself, I will mention later an author who took things to my surprise, I must say to my joy also, as close as possible to the point that I will attempt this year, from our own angle here, to lead to you as regards masochism. • The fact remains that this very article, whose title I will give you later, remains, like all the others, strictly incomprehensible for the simple reason that already at the beginning there is in a way elided, because it is there indeed absolutely under his nose, as one might say, from the evidence, something that I am going to enunciate in a moment. People try, people manage to avoid putting the accent on that which, at first approach, involves, collides most with our finalism, namely the intervention of the function of pain. This, people have managed to understand, is not the essential thing.

Also people have succeeded, thank God, in an experience like that of analysis, in seeing that the Other is aimed at, that in the transference one can perceive that these masochistic manoeuvres are situated at a level which are not without a relationship to the Other.

Naturally many other authors take advantage of it to go no further, to jump on an insight whose superficial character can be seen at a glance, however handy it has shown itself to be in certain cases. For having only arrived at this level, one cannot say that the function of narcissism, which an author who is not without a certain talent for presentation, Ludwig Heidelberg, has emphasised, is something that can suffice for us. This is what, without at all having made you penetrate for all that into the structure - as we will be led to do - of masochistic functioning, what I wanted simply to stress the last time, because what the light which illuminates the details of the table in a completely new way, is to remind you of what is given apparently immediately - this is why it is not seen in the masochist's perspective, in the most banal approach to these perspectives - that the masochist is aiming at the jouissance of the Other; and what I stressed the last time as another term of that for which I intend to put forward everything that will allow there to be undone, as one might say, the manoeuvre which is hidden by this idea, is that what he is aiming at, what he wants, this of course being the eventual term of our research, of which he can only be fully justified by a verification of the moments which prove that it is the final term, the last term is what he is aiming at, the anxiety of the Other.

(10) I said other things that I intend to remind you of today, it is the essential of what is irreducible in it that you must retain, at least until you can make your judgement on what I have organised around it.

On the side of sadism, with an entirely analogous remark, namely that the first term is elided and that it has nevertheless the same obviousness as on the side of masochism, what is aimed at in sadism in all its forms, at all its levels, is something which also promotes the function of the Other, and that precisely there what is open to view is that what is sought is the anxiety of the Other, just as in masochism, what is masked by that, is, not at all, by an inverse process of reversal, the jouissance of the Other - sadism is not the reverse of masochism for the simple reason that they are not a reversible couple, the structure is more complex, I insist on it, even though today, I am only isolating two terms in each; to illustrate if you wish what I mean, I would say that, as you might assume after several of my essential schemas, they are functions with four terms, they are if you wish squared functions, and that the passage from one to the other is carried out by a rotation of a quarter of a turn and not by any symmetry or inversion.

You do not see this appearing at the level that I am now designating for you. But what I pointed out to you the last time is hidden behind this search for the anxiety of the Other, is in sadism the search for the object o. It is to this that I brought as a reference, an expressive term taken from Sadean phantasies "the skin of the cunt". I will not recall for you now this text from Sade's work.

We find ourselves therefore between sadism and masochism in the presence of that which at the second level, at the level hidden from the perspective of each one of these two tendencies, is presented as the alternation, in reality the reciprocal occultation of anxiety in the first case, of the object o in the other (sadism).

I will end with a brief reminder which returns to what I already said precisely about this o, this object, namely the emphasising of what I could call, essentially, the manifest character that we know well, even though we do not perceive its importance, the manifest character with which is marked what? The mode in which there enters this anatomy which Freud is wrong to say without any further precision, is destiny.

(11) It is the conjunction between a certain anatomy, the one that I tried to characterise for you the last time at the level of the object o by the existence of what I called the caduques, namely precisely what exists at only a certain level, the mammal level, among the organisms, the conjunction between the caduques and something which is effectively destiny, namely the agalma, through which jouissance has to confront itself with a signifier, namely the mainspring of the limitation to which in the case of man the destiny of desire is submitted, namely this encounter with the object in a certain function, in so far as this function localises him, precipitates him onto this level which I called that of the existence of caduques and of everything which can serve as caduques, a term which will help us among others to explore better, I mean to hope to give an exhaustive catalogue and limit of the frontiers, the moments of cutting, where anxiety can be expected, and to confirm that it is indeed there that it emerges.

Then, I ended, I remind you, by one of the best known clinical examples with a reminder of the close connection, to which we will have to return, and which because of this fact is much less accidental than is believed, the conjunction, I am saying, between orgasm and anxiety in so far as both the one and the other together can be defined by an exemplary situation, the one that I defined in the form of a certain expectation of the other - and of an expectation which is not an indifferent one - the one that, in the shape of a blank page or not, the candidate must hand up at a particular moment is an absolutely gripping example of what can be for him for an instant the o.

After all these reminders, we are going to try to advance a little further. I will do it along a path which is not perhaps, as I said, quite the one that I would have determined on of my own accord. You will see later what I mean by that. There is something that I pointed out to you in connection with counter-transference, namely how women seem to be more at ease in the area. Have no doubt about it: if they are more at ease about it in their writings, theoretically, it is because I presume, they do not manage it too badly either in their practice, even if they do not see, do not articulate - for on this after all why not credit them with a little mental restriction - if they do not articulate its mainspring in a very obvious and clear fashion.

(12) What is at stake here obviously is to attack something which is of the order of the relationship (ressort) of desire to jouissance. Let us note at first the fact that it seems, if we refer to some works, that women understand very very well what the desire of the analyst is. How does that happen? It is certain that we have to take things up here again at the point that I left them with this table, by telling you that anxiety is the middle term between desire and jouissance. I will put forward here some formulae that I will leave each of you to find your way about in from your own experience; they will be aphoristic. It is easy to understand why. On a subject as delicate as the still undecided one of the relationships between man and woman, to articulate everything that could render licit, justify, the permanence of a necessary misunderstanding, could not avoid having the altogether degrading effect of allowing each one of my listeners to drown his personal difficulties, which are very much on this hither side of what I am going to aim at here, in the assurance that this misunderstanding is structural.

Now, as you will see if you know how to listen to me, to speak about misunderstanding here is not at all equivalent to speaking about a necessary failure. I do not see why, if this real is always implicated, the most effj.cacious jouissance could not be reached along the very paths of misunderstanding.

From these aphorisms then, I will choose, I would say strongly - the only thing that distinguishes the aphorism from doctrinal development is that it renounces a preconceived order - I would advance here some forms. For example this one which may speak to you in a fashion, as one might say, less likely to have you rolling about laughing, this formula that only love allows jouissance to condescend to desire. We will put forward some others also which are deduced from our little table where it is shown that o as such, and nothing else, is the access, not to jouissance, but to the Other, that it is all that remains, from the moment that the subject wants to make his entry there, into that Other. The following finally, to dissipate, it seems, to the final term, this term, this poisonous ghost from the year 1927, of oblativity invented by the grammarian Pichon - God knows that I recognise the merit of his grammar - regarding whom one cannot regret too much that what one might call an absent analysis, left him entirely in the presentation of psychoanalytic theory, left him entirely captured in the ideas that he previously had and which were none other than Maurrasian ideas.

When S reemerges from this access to the Other, it is the unconscious, namely this, the barred Other, \emptyset , as I told you earlier, all that remains to him is to make of \emptyset something of which it is less the metaphorical function which is important than the dropping relationship in which he is going to find himself with respect to this \emptyset .

To desire the Other, \emptyset , then, is never anything but to desire \emptyset . It remains, since it is from love that I began in my first aphorism, that to treat of love, as to treat of sublimation, it must be remembered what the moralists before Freud - I am speaking of those of the good tradition, and specifically of the French tradition, the one which passes, into what I called its scansion in "The man of pleasure" - what the moralists had already fully articulated, and whose acquisition it would be well for us not to consider as out of date, that love is the sublimation of desire. From this it results that we cannot at all make use of love as first or of final term. However primordial it may present itself to be in our theorisation, love is a cultural fact; and as La Rochefoucauld well articulated it, it is not simply "how many people would never have loved if they had never heard speak of love", it is: there would be no question of love if there were no culture.

This ought to encourage us to pose elsewhere the arches of what we have to say concerning - because this is what is involved, at this point that Freud himself says it, underlining that this detour could have been produced elsewhere, and I will come back to why I am doing it now - therefore we have to pose differently the arches of this subject of the conjunction between man and woman. I continue my aphoristic way.

If we have to refer to desire and to jouissance we will say that, to put myself forward as desiring, eron, is to put myself forward as lack of \emptyset , and that what must be sustained in our account is the following, the fact is that it is along this path that I open the door to the jouissance of my being. The aporic character of my position, I think, cannot fail to appear to you, nor to escape you. But there are a few more steps to be taken. The aporic character, do I even need to underline it in passing, I will come back to. For I think that you have already grasped, because I told you it a long time ago, that if it is at the level of eron that I am, that I open the door to the jouissance of my being, it is quite clear that the closest decline which presents itself to this enterprise, is that I should be appreciated as eronemos, namely as lovable, something which without fatuousness does not fail to happen, but in which there can be already read that something has gone wrong in the business. This is not

(14) aphoristic, but already a commentary. I thought I ought to give it for two reasons: first of all because I made a kind of little lapse by using a double negation, which ought to warn me of something, and secondly, I thought I glimpsed the miracle of incomprehension shining on certain faces.

I continue. Every exigency for o along the path of this enterprise, let us say, since I have taken the androcentric perspective, of encountering a woman, cannot but unleash the anxiety o2 the other, precisely because of the fact that I no longer make her anything but o, that my desire o -'s her, as I might say. And here, my little circuit of aphorisms bites its own tail: this indeed is the reason why sublimation-love allows jouissance, to repeat myself, to condescend to desire.

What noble propositions! You see that I am not afraid of the ridiculous. This may sound a little bit like preaching to you, which is obviously something one cannot fail to run the risk of every time one ventures onto this terrain. But it seemed to me that all the same you are taking your time to have a good laugh. I can only thank you for it and I start off again.

I will only start off again today for a brief moment. But allow me again to take a few small steps: because it is along the same path with an air that has, like that, for you a little appearance of heroism that we can advance in the opposite direction, by noting very curiously once more, confirming the non-reversibility of their journeys, that you are going to see arising something which will appear to you perhaps to have a less conquering tone.

What the Other necessarily wants along this path which condescends to my desire, what he wants even if he does not know at all what he wants, is nevertheless necessarily my anxiety. For it is not enough to say that the woman, to name her, overcomes her's by love. We will return to it, we will have to see.

Let us proceed along the path that I chose today. I still leave to one side - this will be for the next time - how the partners are defined at the beginning. The order of things in which we are involved always implies that it should be so, that we should take things up en route, and even occasionally at the arrival; we cannot take them up at the start.

In any case, it is in so far as she wants my jouissance, namely to enjoy me - this can have no other meaning - that the woman (15) stirs up my anxiety, and this for the very simple reason inscribed for a long time in our theory; the fact is that there is no desire realisable on the path that we are situated on unless it implies castration. It is in the measure that jouissance is involved, namely when she is aiming at my being, that the woman can only reach me by castrating me. Let this not lead you - I am speaking to the masculine part of my audience - to any resignation as regards the always manifest effects of this primary truth in what is called in a classificatory term conjugal life. For the definition of a primary ananke has absolutely nothing to do with its accidental incidences. It nevertheless remains that one clarifies many things by articulating them properly. Now to articulate as I have done, even though it overlaps experience in the most manifest fashion, is precisely what runs the danger that I have signaled on many occasions, namely that one sees what is called in common language a fatality, which means that it is written down. It is not because I say it - that you must think that it is written down. Moreover if I wrote it I would put more shape on it; and this shape would consist precisely in entering into detail, namely in giving the why.

Let us suppose - something which is obvious - that with reference to what I made the key of this function of the object of desire, the woman - which is quite evident - does not lack anything. Because one would be completely wrong to consider that Penisneid is a final term. I told you already that this would be the originality on this point of what I am trying to advance before you this year.

The fact that she has nothing to desire on this point - and perhaps I will try to articulate very very precisely why anatomically; for this affair of the clitoris-penis analogy is far from being absolutely grounded: a clitoris is not simply a smaller penis, it is a part of the penis, it corresponds to the cavernous bodies and to nothing else; now, a penis, as far as I know, except in the case of hypospadias, is not limited to the cavernous bodies; this is only a parenthesis - the fact of having (16) nothing to desire along the path of jouissance does not absolutely settle for her the question of desire, precisely in the measure that the function of o for her as for us plays its full role. But all the same, this question of desire, simplifies it a lot; I mean for her; not for us; in the presence of their desire. But after all to interest themselves in the object as object of our desire, creates far fewer complications for them.

Time is passing. I am leaving things at the point that I was able to bring them to.- I think that this point is sufficiently tempting for many of my listeners to want to know what comes next.

To give you some foretaste of it, to announce to you the fact that I intend to bring things to the level of the function of the woman, in so far as it may allow us to see further at a certain level in the experience of analysis, I will tell you that, if a title can be given to what I will enunciate the next time, it would be something like "The relationship between the woman as analyst and the position of Don Juan".

Seminar 15: Wednesday 20 March 1963

Today we are going to move forward. We will try to articulate why, in order to situate anxiety for you, I am led, I announced that I will have to deal with this central field, already outlined in the Seminar on Ethics, as being that of jouissance. You already know through a certain number of approaches, and specifically the one that I made that year, that it is necessary to conceive of this jouissance so mythically, that we ought to situate its point as profoundly independent of the articulation of desire, because desire is constituted on this hither side of the zone which separates jouissance and desire from one another and which is the break (la faille) where anxiety is produced.

It is understood of course - and I said enough about it for you to sense it - that I am not saying that desire in its status does not concern the real other, the one who is involved in the jouissance; I would say that it is normative that desire does not concern this other, that the law which constitutes it as desire does not manage to concern it in its centre, that it only concerns it eccentrically and to one side, o substitute for O.

And therefore all the Erniedrigungen, all the degradations of love life punctuated by Freud which come to emerge, are the effects of a fundamental irreducible structure. This is the gap that we have no intention of masking, though on the other hand we think that the castration complex and Penisneid which flourish here, are not themselves the final terms for designating it.

This domain, the domain of jouissance, is the point where as I might say, the point thanks to which woman proves herself to be superior precisely in this, that her link to the knot of desire is much looser. This lack, this "minus" sign, with which the phallic function is marked for man, which means that for him his liaison to the object must pass by this negating of the phallus by the castration complex, this necessity which is the status of the (- (p)) at the centre at man's desire, is something which for the woman is not a necessary knot.

This does not mean that she is for all that without a relationship to the desire of the Other; but precisely, it is indeed with the desire of the Other as such that she is in a way affronted, confronted. It is a great simplification that, as regards this confrontation, this phallic object only comes second for her and in so far as it plays a role in the desire of the Other.

(2) This simplified relationship with the desire of the Other, is what allows the woman, when she works in our noble profession, to be with respect to this desire in a relationship which, it must be said, is manifested each time she approaches this field designated in a confusing way as that of counter-transference, in a relationship which we sense is much freer, this of course notwithstanding each particularity that she may represent in what I might call an essential relationship.

It is because, in her relationship to the Other, she does not hold to it as essentially as the man, that she has this greater freedom essentially, Wesentlich. What does that mean in a particular case? That means she does not hold to it as essentially as man does as regards the nature of jouissance.

And here I cannot avoid having to remind you, along the same line as that which the other day I incarnated for you at the level of the fall (chute) of Oedipus' eyes, that Tiresias, the seer, who ought to be the patron of psychoanalysts, was blinded, by an act of vengeance of the supreme goddess, Juno, the jealous one; and as Ovid explains very well to us in the third book of the Metamorphoses, from verse 316 to verse 338 - I would ask you to consult this text of which Mr T S Eliot in a note to The Wasteland underlines what he calls the very great anthropological interest - if Tiresias offended Juno, it is because, consulted like that, for a joke - the Gods do not always measure the consequences of their acts - by Jupiter who for once was having a relaxed relationship with his wife and teasing her about the fact that undoubtedly "the pleasure that you experience is greater" - he is the one who is speaking - "than that experienced by the man". But then he says: "But, by the way, what am I thinking of? Tiresias was a woman for seven years". Seven years, every seven years - the baker's wife changed her skin, sang Guillaume Apollinaire - Tiresias changes sex not by simple periodicity, but because of an accident: he met the two coupling snakes, the ones we see in our caduceus, and he was unwise enough to disturb their coupling. We will leave to one side the meaning of these snakes that one cannot unknot without running such great danger. It is by renewing his attempt that he also rediscovers his first position, that of a man.

(3) In any case, for seven years he was a woman. This is why he can testify before Jupiter and Juno, that whatever might be the consequences he must testify to the truth and corroborate what Jupiter says: it is women who enjoy (jouissent).

Their jouissance is greater, whether it is a quarter or a tenth more than that of the man - there are more precise versions. The proportion does not matter much because it only depends, in short, on the limitation his relationship to desire imposes on man, namely what I am designating as situating the object for him in the negative column, the (-$>) . Contrary to what the prophet of absolute knowledge teaches this man, namely that he makes his hole in the real, which is called negativity in Hegel, what is involved is something else: the hole begins at the bottom of his belly, at least if we want to remount to the source of what constitutes for him the status of desire. Obviously it is here that a post-Hegelian Sartre, with what I would call his marvellous talent for misleading, has slipped in his own image, the one that you know well, the image of the little child that he makes a born bourgeois for us, as a way naturally of giving flavour to the affair, who sticks his finger into the sand of the beach, mimicing in his eyes and for our intention an act which is supposed to be the fundamental act. Of course starting from there a well-deserved derision can be exercised against the pretention of this new shape that we have given to the little man which is in man, namely that now we incarnate this little man in the child, without noticing that the child deserves all the philosophical objections that were made against the little man.

But after all beneath this figure in which Sartre represents it for us, it works, because what does it make resonate in the unconscious? Well then, by God, nothing other than this engulfment into the womb of mother earth desired by his whole body, whose meaning Freud unveils in a proper sense when he says textually at the end of one of the chapters of Hemmung, Symptom und Angst that the return to the maternal womb is the phantasy of someone who is impotent [cf SE XX 139].

Thus the orphan child that Sartre tries to hatch out in this man and whom through all his work, he urges to share the only glue of existence, will allow itself to be this phallus - the accent here is on the to be - the phallus that you can see by incarnating it in an image which is within the range of your research, the one that is found hidden in the valves of these little animals that are called razor fish and if that is lacking in your experience, (4) I hope that all of you have been able to see them on occasion suddenly .sticking out their tongues at you in the soup tureen where you put those you have collected, a procedure carried out the way you collect asparagus with a long penknife and a simple length of wire that one hooks under the sand.

I do not know whether you have all seen that already, in the opisthotones, these tongues emerging from the ra-zor back; in any case it is a unique spectacle that you should treat yourself to if you have not already seen it, and whose relationship appears to me quite obvious with this phantasy, on which you know Sartre insists in La Nausee, of seeing such tongues dart out suddenly from a wall or from any other surface, this according to the thematic that rejects the image of the world into an unfathomable facticity.

Well then, one might ask: "So what?" I do not believe that in order to exorcise the cosmos - because when all is said and done that is what is involved; it is to undermine, after the fundamental terms of theology, the cosmology which is of the same nature of course - I do not believe that it is this curious usage of tongues which is the right path, but much more rather than to believe it to be, like earlier, essentially redoubled by Wesentlich - and I would like to have been able to score it for you in many others - I find myself in a Babel-like atmosphere which will end up, if I am roused, by making it one of the key points of what I have to defend.

In any case, this reference indicates to you why my own experience of what one sees on the beach, when one is a small child on the beach, where one cannot make a hole without water rising up in it, well then, to be frank, it is an irritation which also rises - but in me - at this oblique approach of a crab always ready to hide his intention of pinching your fingers.

A crab is very skillful! You could give him a pack of cards to shuffle - it is much less difficult than opening a mussel, which is something he does every day - well then, even if there are only two cards, he will always try to mix them up.

So it is said for example: the real is always full. That has an effect, that sounds a little bit like what is said here which lends credence to it, that of a genuine Lacanism. Who speaks like that about the real. I do.

The problem for me, is that I never said that. The real is full of holes and one can even make a vacuum in it. What I say, is that it does not lack anything, which is quite different.

(5) I added that if you makes pots, even if they are all the same, it is quite certain that they are different pots. It is even quite extraordinary that, under the name of the principle of individuation, this still gives just as much trouble to classical thought.

Look where we are still at in Bertrand Russell: to sustain the distinction between individuals, it is necessary to mobilise the whole of time and space, which, you must admit-, is a real joke.

The next phase for my pots, is that the identity, namely what is substitutable between the pots, is the void around which the pot is made. The third phase is that human action began when this void was barred, to be filled with what is going to constitute the void of the pot next to it, in other words when to be half full is the same- thing for a pot as to be half empty, in other words when it is not leaking all over the place.

And in every culture, you can be sure that a complete civilisation already obtains when there are the first ceramics.

I sometimes contemplate in my house in the country a very beautiful collection that I have of vases. Obviously, for these people, at that time, as many other cultures bear witness, it was their principal wealth; but in these vases, obviously, even if we cannot read what is magnificently, luxuriously, painted on their sides, translate it into an articulated language of rituals and myths, we know that in these vases there is everything, that this is enough, that the relationship between man and the object and desire is here completely tangible and surviving.

This is what moreover, to take a step backwards, legitimises this famous mustard pot which made one of my colleagues gnash his teeth for more than a year to the point that I, nice as I always am, ended up by putting it back on the shelf with the pots of glue, even though, as I told him from the beginning, this mustard pot served me as an example, by the fact that it is - you know well, it is something striking in experience - that on the table it is always empty, that there is never any mustard except when it gets up your nose.

There we are! Now this having been said, it remains that on the usage of these pots, since recently there was posed for us a problem of this order, I am not looking at all as you might think at Piera Aulagnier, who is a clear-headed person in the way that women know how to be - and that is even what she is blamed for - knows very well that it is allowable to put the label "gooseberry jam" on the pot which contains the rhubarb. It is enough to know (6) what one wants to purge by this means and wait to collect what one wanted from the subject.

All the same, when I bring you here batteries of tarted-up pots - for do not believe that it is ever without having broken a lot of them; I also, in my time, gave whole discourses in which the action, the thought, the word, did the rounds in a way that made symmetry stink, well then, it has been thrown in the waste paper basket.

When I put impediment on top of the column which contains acting-out, embarrassment at the top of the next one which contains the passage a l'acte, if you wish, Piera, to distinguish the cases of acting-out that you have so carefully observed, if you wish to distinguish it as being what you call transference in act (transfert agi) - which is of course a distinct idea of your own, which deserves discussion - it nevertheless remains that it is to my table that you refer since you invoke in the text the embarrassment that your subject found himself in. And since this term is scarcely used outside of this place, it is here that you have noted it down.

Now it is manifest in the observation that the patient had been impeded by the midwife from attending the birth of his offspring, outside the maternal gates, and it is the dismay of being incapable of overcoming a new impediment of this order which threatens him, which precipitates him to throw the police into anxiety by the written claim of the right of the father to what I would call illiophagia, to specify the notion which is there to represent the image of the devouring of Saturn: because after all it is written in this observation that this gentleman presents himself at the police station to say that there is nothing in the law which impedes him from eating his baby who had just died. On the contrary it is obviously the embarrassment into which he is plunged on this occasion by the calmness of the policeman - who did not come down in the last shower - and the shock of the dismay that he wanted to provoke which makes him act impulsively (passer a l'acte), with acts of a kind that have him put in prison.

So then, not to recognise, when obviously you are involved, that I could not find a better observation to explain what you know, that you are really involved, that you have put your finger on it, this is a certain betrayal of yourself, which of course could not be reproached to a person when what is involved is handling something like that which has been freshly minted. One could well put a little in it. But this all the same authorises me to recall that my own work is only of interest when it is properly used - this is not addressed to you, Piera, it is (7) not a matter of using it, as people have got into the habit, the bad habit of doing with respect to notions which are in general grouped together in teaching in a sort of collecting together which is only done for decoration. Having recalled this about what gives you the right to watch over what I bring you, what I have chosen for you with so much care, I take up my remarks again.

And to come to the woman, I also am going to try with one of my observations, to make you sense what I mean as regards her relationship to jouissance and to desire.

Here then is a woman who one day - the coordinates of longitude and latitude - remarks to me that her husband, whose insistence, as I might say, is the foundation of their marriage, has abandoned her for a little too long a time for her not to notice it. Given the way that she always receives what she senses from him as being more or less clumsy, this is rather a matter of relief to her.

Nevertheless, I am all the same going to extract a sentence in which - do not rush immediately to smell an irony which it would be quite wrong to attribute to me - she expresses herself as follows: "It does not matter to me whether he desires me or not, provided he does not desire someone else".

I would not go so far as to say that this is the common or the regular position. This can only take on its value from what follows ^{ixi} the constellation as it is going to be unfolded by the associations which make up this monologue. Here then she is going to speak about her own state, she speaks about it - one swallow does not make a summer - with a particular precision. Tumescence not being the privilege of the man, I think, I am not surprised that she, who has a quite normal sexuality - I am speaking about this woman - should testify, should say that, if for example when she is driving something alarms her which moves her say: "Good God! a car!", well then, inexplicably, this is what strikes her that day: she becomes aware of the existence of a vaginal swelling which she notes as responding at certain times to the sudden emergence in her field of any specific object whatsoever which in appearance is quite foreign to sexual images or space. This state, she says, which is not disagreeable, but rather inconvenient in its nature, goes away by itself.

At that point, she says, it bothers me to link up with what I am going to tell you, because of course it is not related. She tells me then that every one of her initiatives is dedicated to me, to myself. "I say it is" - I think you have understood for a some time: I am her analyst - "I cannot say consecrated, that (8) would mean doing it with a certain aim. No, any object whatsoever obliges me to evoke you as a witness, not even to have the approval of what I see. No, simply the look. In saying that, I am even going a little too far. Let us say that this look helps me to get its meaning from everything."

At this point, the ironic evocation of the theme encountered at a younger stage of her life, of the well-known title of the play by Steve Fasseur "Je vivrai un grand amour". Had she experienced at other moments of her life this reference to the other? This made her refer back to the beginning of her married life, then go further and testify in effect to the one who had been in effect, the one who is never forgotten, her first love.

It was a student from whom she was quickly parted, with whom she remained in correspondence in the full sense of the term. And everything that she wrote to him, she says, was really "a tissue of lies".

"I created a character bit by bit, what I wanted to be in his eyes, and what I in no way was. It was, I fear, a purely romantic enterprise which I pursued in the most obstinate way". To envelop myself, she says, in a kind of cocoon. She adds very gently: "You know, it was not easy for him to get over it..... "

At this point, she comes back on what she does with reference to me personally: "What I am striving to be here is the complete opposite: I try always to be true with you. I am not writing a novel when I am with you; I write it when I am not with you" . She returns to the weaving, always thread by thread, of this dedicating of every gesture which is not necessarily a gesture which she thinks would please me, nor even one which is necessarily one that agrees with me. It cannot be said that she forces her talent. What she wants after all, is not so much that I should look at her, it is that my look should come to substitute for her own: "It is the help of yourself that I summon. My own look is not enough to capture everything that is to be absorbed from the outside. It is not a matter of watching me doing something, it is a matter of doing something for me."

In short, I will finish here with something that I still have a large page on from which I only wish to extract the only word of bad taste which occurs on this final page:

"I am," she says, "operated by remote control, which is not in any way a metaphor, believe me. There is no feeling of being influenced. But if I make use of this formula, it is in order to remind you that you may have read in the papers about this left-(9) wing figure who after being conned in a bogus assassination attempt, thought he ought to give this immortal example that in politics the left is in effect always remotely controlled by the right. This is the way moreover that a strict relation of parity can be established between these two parts."

So then where does all of this lead us? To the vase, to the feminine vase: is it empty, is it full? It does not matter, since even if it is, as my patient says, to be consumed stupidly, it is sufficient in itself. It lacks nothing. The presence of the object there is, as one might say, an addition. Why? Because this presence is not linked to the lack of the object cause of desire, to the ^{to} which it is linked in man. The anxiety of man is linked to the possibility of not being able, hence the myth which makes of the woman - it is a completely masculine myth - the equivalent of one of his ribs: this rib has been taken out of him, it is not known which one, and moreover, he is not missing any of them. But it is clear that in the myth of the rib what is involved precisely is this lost object, that woman for man is an object who is made with that.

Anxiety exists in the woman also. And even Kierkegaard, who must have had more of the nature of Tiresias probably than I have - I am fond of my eyes - Kierkegaard says that the woman is more open to anxiety. Must we believe this? In truth what is important for us, is to grasp its link to what we can call the infinite, indeterminate possibilities of desire around her in her field. She tempts herself in tempting the other, which is a way that the myth can also be of use to us here. After all, anything can be used to tempt him, as the complement of the earlier myth shows, the famous history of the apple; any object whatsoever, even one that is superfluous for her. For after all, what is she doing with that apple? She does not know what to do with it any more than a fish would. But it happens that this apple is already good enough to hook for her the little fish, to hook the fisherman on the line. It is the desire of the other which interests her. To put the accent a little bit better, I would say that it is the price of this desire in the market - for desire is a mercantile thing: there is a share listing of desire which rises and falls culturally - it is on the price that one gives to desire on the market that there depends at every moment the style and the level of love.

In so far as it itself is a value, as the philosophers put it very well, it is from the idealisation of desire that it is made up. I say the idealisation, for it is not at all as a sick (10) person that our patient earlier spoke in this way about the desire of her husband. That it is important to her is love. That it is not all that important for him to manifest it is not necessary, but it is in the order of things.

In this respect, experience teaches us that in the jouissance properly speaking of the woman, which merits - and it is perhaps a good thing - there being concentrated on her all sorts of attentions from her partner, the impotence, properly speaking, the technical mistakes, the impotence of this partner may be very well accepted. And this can also be seen when a fiasco occurs, as Stendhal pointed out to us a long time ago, that in the relationships where this impotence is long-lasting, and where it seems that if on occasion, after some time, one sees the woman taking to herself some assistant with a reputation for being more efficacious, this is rather through a kind of shame, so that it will not be said that she is being refused it, for whatever reason.

In passing, I remind you of my formulae about masochism that I gave the last time. They are designed, as you will see, to restore to masochism, whether it is the masochism of the pervert, or moral masochism, or feminine masochism that is involved, a unity that is otherwise difficult to grasp. And you will see that feminine masochism takes on a quite different, rather ironic, meaning if this relationship of occultation in the other of the alleged, apparent jouissance of the other, the occultation by this sort of jouissance of the other of an anxiety which it is undoubtedly a question of awakening.

This gives to feminine masochism a quite different import which can only be laid hold of by clearly grasping first what must be posited at the beginning, namely that it is a masculine phantasy.

The second thing, is that in this phantasy in short, it is by procurement and in relation to this structure imagined in the woman, that man makes his jouissance be sustained by something which is his own anxiety, something which overlaps for man the object and the condition of desire. Jouissance depends on this condition. Now desire for its part, only covers anxiety. You see then the distance that remains for it to travel to have jouissance within its range. For the woman, the desire of the other is the means for what? For her jouissance to have what I might call an appropriate object! Her anxiety is only before the desire of the other which she does not know very clearly when all is said and done what it covers. And to go further in my formulae, I would say that because of this fact in the kingdom of the man there is always some imposture present.

(11) In that of the woman, as we already said at one time - remember the article by Joan Riviere - if something corresponds to it, it is the masquerade; but it is something quite different. Woman in general is much more real and much truer in the fact that she knows what she is dealing with in desire is worth, that she passes through this in a very tranquil manner, that she has, as I might say, a certain contempt for her misapprehension, a luxury which the man cannot offer himself. He cannot have contempt for the misapprehension about desire, because it is his quality as a man to prize it. To allow his desire to be seen by a woman is obviously anxiety-provoking in some cases. Why? Because it is to allow there to be seen (laisser voir)- and I would ask you in passing to note the distinction between this dimension of allowing there to be seen compared to the voyeurism-exhibitionism couple, it is not simply to show it and to see it: there is the allowing it to be seen for the woman, for whom at most the danger comes from the masquerade - what is to be allowed to be seen, is what is there of course. If there is not much, it is anxiety-provoking: but it is always what is there, instead of letting her desire for the man be seen, it is essentially letting there be seen what is not there.

So, you see, that you should not believe for all that that this situation, the proof of which may appear rather complex to you, is to be seen as all that hopeless. If undoubtedly it did not represent it to you as easy, could you ignore in it the access for man to jouissance. It remains nonetheless that this is quite manageable if one is only expecting happiness from it.

This remark being conclusive, we will go into the example which I find myself in short in a position to allow you to take advantage of, from the favour that we all owe Granoff for having introduced it here, namely Lucia Tower.

As I told you: in order to understand what Lucia Tower tells us about two males she was dealing with, I do not believe I can find a better preamble than the image of Don Juan.

I have worked over the question again a good deal these days for you. I cannot make you go through the labyrinth again. Read this appalling book which is called: Die Don Juan Gestalt by Rank; a cat could not find her kittens in it; but if you have -che thread that I am going to give you, it will appear much clearer.

Don Juan is a feminine dream. What is necessary in this case, is a man who is perfectly at ease with himself, who in a certain fashion with respect to men, the woman can pride herself on (12) being, a man to whom nothing is lacking. This is perfectly tangible in the term to which I will have to return in connection with the general structure of masochism, which is that Don Juan - this sounds really banal to say it to you - the relationship of Don Juan to this image of the father, qua uncastrated, namely a pure image, a feminine image.

The relationship can be clearly read in what you find in the labyrinth and in the detours of Rank, that what is involved in Don Juan, if we can manage to, link him to a certain state of myths and of rituals: Don Juan represents, Rank tells us - and here he is following his nose - the one who in olden days is capable of damning a soul without losing his own for all that. The famous jus primae noctis is supposed to be based on this, the existence, which you know is mythical, of the priest who deflowers on the first night, is here in this zone.

But Don Juan is a beautiful story which works and has its effect, even for those who do not know all its niceties, which undoubtedly are not absent from Mozart's song and which are to be found in the Marriage of Figaro rather than in Don Giovanni.

The tangible trace of what I am putting forward to you about Don Juan, is that the complex relationship of man to his object is effaced for him, but at the price of accepting his radical imposture. The prestige of Don Juan is linked to an acceptance of this imposture. It is always there, at the place of another:

it is, as I might say, the absolute object.

Note that it is not at all said that he inspires desire. If he slips into women's beds, one does not know how he is there. One could even say that he does not have one either, that he is in a relationship with something vis-a-vis which he fulfills a certain function. This something, call it the odor di femina, and that takes us a good way. But desire plays so little part in the affair, that when the odor di femina passes he is capable of not noticing that it is Dona Elvira, namely someone with whom he has supped to the full, who has just crossed the stage.

It has to be said, he is not what for the woman is an anxiety-provoking character. It can happen that the woman really senses herself to be the object at the centre of a desire. Well then, believe me, it is then that she really flees! We are now going to enter, if we can, into Lucia Towers' story.

(13) She has two men - I mean in analysis. By God, as she tells it, she always had very satisfying relations with them from a human point of view.

Do not imagine I am saying that the affair is simple, nor that they do not hold out for a long while. They are two anxiety neurotics. At least that is the diagnosis that she posits, having examined everything carefully.

These two men who have had, as it should be, some difficulties with their mothers, and with what are called "female siblings", which means sisters, but which situates them as being equivalent to brothers, these two men now find themselves intimately acquainted with women, we are told, that they have well and truly chosen in order to exercise a certain number of aggressive and other tendencies, and to protect themselves in this way from a penchant, that by God is not analytically contestable, for the other sex.

"With both men", she tells us, "I was quite aware of the contributions which they themselves made to the difficulties with their wives, namely that both were too submissive, too hostile, in a sense too devoted, and both wives", she tells us - for she enters boldly into an appreciation of the point of view with a lorgnette - "were frustrated for lack of sufficient uninhibited masculine assertiveness from their husbands", a way of affirming themselves as men in an uninhibited way. (cf 240)

In other words - we immediately enter into the heart of the subject, she has her ideas about things - they do not pretend enough. For her part, of course, without knowing what might trap her in this, she herself feels very "protective", a little too "protective" although differently in the case of the first man: she protects, she tells us, his wife a little bit too much, and in the second case him a little bit too much.

In fact, what reassures her, is that she has a much greater attraction for the second, and this - you have to read the things all the same in their innocence and their freshness - because the first one has all the same some "psychosexual problems" that are not too attractive.

This one, the first one, shows himself in a way which is not all that much distinguished from that of the other. Both really tire her with their mumbling, their halting speech, their circumstantiality - that means they go on and on - their repetitiveness, and minutiae. But after all she is an analyst: what she notices in the first one, is this tendency to attack her own power as an analyst.

The other has a different tendency: for him it is rather a matter of taking an object from her than properly speaking of destroying it as frustrating. And of course in this connection, she says to herself: "Well now, after all, by God, it is perhaps because the second one is more narcissistic."

*In fact this does not hold up, as those who have a little culture can remark, with the other references that we have about narcissism. For on the other hand it is not so much narcissism which concerns him here as what is called the anaclitic aspect, as she will clearly see from what follows.

Moreover on the other hand, she tells us, however long, however fastidious may be the path which is taken with the one and the other without anything showing the efficacy of the analysis of transference, it nevertheless remains that there remains in all of this something which does not have anything fundamentally disagreeable about it, and that in fact all the counter-transference responses that she perceives in herself do not at all, she says, reasonably go beyond this limit where one could say that any female analyst would risk losing her way in connection with such valuable characters if she were not on her guard. She is very specially so. And very especially, she pays attention at what is happening on the side of this woman over whom she watches perhaps a little more specifically: the wife of her first patient. She learns that she has had a little psychosomatic accident. She says to herself: "By God, that's not too bad. Since what I feared, was that she was drifting towards a psychosis, here we have an anxiety that is well bound."

And then she thinks no more about it. She thinks no more about it and the situation continues, namely that one may well analyse everything that happens in the transference, and therefore even the use made of it in his analysis by the patient - I am speaking about the first one that is involved - of his conflicts with his wife, to obtain from his analyst all the more attention, to obtain from her the compensations that he had never found with his mother, still no progress is made.

What is going to release things, make them progress? A dream, she tells us, which happens to her, to her the analyst. A dream in which what happens? In which she sees that perhaps it is not all that sure that things are going so badly for this woman. First of all because in the dream she welcomes her, the analyst, extremely well, that she shows her in all sorts of ways that she has no intention - this is in the dream - of torpedoing the analysis of her husband - which was one of the presuppositions of the business - and that this woman is therefore prepared to show (15) a disposition that we would call, to translate the atmosphere of the dream, a cooperative one.

This makes our analyst, Lucia Tower, prick up her ears. She understands that there is something to be completely revised. This chap is really someone who in his home really tries to do everything necessary to make his wife more comfortable, in other words, the desire of this gentleman, is in no way as aimless as all that. Our little pal takes himself seriously all the same; there is a way of dealing with him, in other words, he is capable of taking himself for what is at stake, the dignity of which had been refused him up to then: to take himself for a man, to get involved in the game. When she makes this discovery, when she re-orientes her relationship to the desire of her patient, when she perceives that she has miscognised up to now where things were situated, she can really undertake with him a revision of everything that had been played out with her up to then in a deceptive way. The claims of the transference were themselves an imposture. And, she tells us, from that moment on everything changes. But how does everything change and in what sense?

You have to read her to understand that it is at that moment that the analysis becomes something particularly difficult to tolerate. For, she says, from that moment on everything happens in the midst of this storm of depressive movements and of naked rage, as if he were putting me the analyst to the test in each one of my smallest fragments.

If a moment of inattention, she tells us, meant that each one of these little fragments does not sound right, if one of them was sham, I had the feeling that my patient would shatter into pieces.

She herself qualifies as best she can - she does not see everything but she clearly names what she meets up with - that what is involved is something, she tells us, which really belongs to phallic sadism couched in oral language.

What are we going to retain from this? Two things: firstly the confirmation by the very terms that are used of what I designated for you as being the nature of sadism - for the not entirely attractive anomalies of the patient are certainly of this order - that what is sought for in the sadistic search is this little fragment which is lacking in the object: it is the object, and it is a search for the object that is involved in the way in which, once the truth of his desire has been recognised, the patient behaves.

(16) This to show you also that it is in no way masochistic to put oneself in the line through which the search for the sadistic object passes. Our Lucia Tower does not accuse herself of any such thing and we have no need either to impute it to her.

Simply she draws a storm down on herself, and - she underlines it with a particular courage - with respect to a character with whom she only entered into a relationship from that moment when his desire interested her.

She does not conceal that it is in function of the fact that she herself is in a posture of rivalry with the characters of his history and that obviously that his desire was not entirely involved in her, that she supports therefore the consequences of this desire to the point that she experiences this phenomenon that the analysts circumscribe and have called "carry-over", which means report or designate where most obviously one can denote the effects of the counter-transference when you continue to think about a patient when you are with another one. And nevertheless, she tells us, all of this, when I had almost reached the end of my tether, disappeared by chance "amusingly", really in the most amusing and sudden fashion, which means that going on holidays during one of the annual breaks, well, by God, goodness, she notices that nothing remains of this business, this business is of absolutely no interest to her, namely that she is really incarnating in the freest and most airy mythical position Don Juan as he leaves the room where he has committed his usual idiocies.

After this break, her efficacy, her adaptation in this case and, as I might say, the implacable nakedness of her look is very essentially possible in the measure that a relationship which for once is only a relationship to a desire as such, however complex moreover you may suppose it to be - and she indicates that she also has her problems - is never when all is said and done anything but a relationship with which she can keep her distance. It is on this point that I will continue the next time.

Seminar 16: Wednesday 26 March 1963

....[it is] because of our Lucia Tower that I find myself to have taken here as an example, from a certain angle of what I would call the "facilities of the feminine position" - this term facility (facilite) having an ambiguous import - as regards its relationship to desire; let us say that what I formulated consisted in this sort of lesser implication which, as someone in the analytic position, allowed her to reason it out for us, let us say, in her article on "Countertransference", if not more soundly, at least more freely. It is certain, if you read this text, that it is in the measure and through what I would call her "internal self-criticism" she noticed that through the effect of what she calls - here soundly enough - her counter-transference she had neglected something about what one could call the correct appreciation or orientation of the desire of her patient, that, without her properly speaking telling us what she said to him at that moment, because she does not tell us anything, except that she returned once again to the "transference requirements" of this patient, but by straightening things out for him, therefore she was only able in doing this to give him the impression that she was sensitive to what she herself had just discovered, namely that this patient, in brief, was paying great attention to his wife, was more "the manager" of what was happening in the conjugal circle than she had suspected. It seems indeed that because of this - we can only trust her, for this is the way she expresses herself - that the patient is only able on this occasion to translate this rectification in these terms - which are those of Lucia Tower herself - that in short the patient's own desire is much less deprived of a hold on his analyst than he believed, that effectively it is not ruled out that up to a certain point he can make something of this woman who is his analyst, bend her (la courber) - "to stoop" in English; "She stoops to conquer", is the title of one of Sheridan's [Goldsmith's] comedies - bend her to his desire. This at least is what Lucia Tower tells us in her own words. This does not mean of course - she also underlines this - that there is any question even for a moment of this happening; she is, in this respect, as she tells us, very sufficiently on her guard, she is not a baby - indeed, when is a woman one! - in any case "too aware of " - this is the term she uses - she is well and truly on her guard. But that is not where the question lies. Through this intervention, this rectification which appeared to the analysand here as a concession, as an opening out, the desire of the patient is truly put back in its place; what is really the whole question, is that he had never been able to find this place. This is what his anxiety neurosis is. What she encounters at that moment, is - we said it the last time - this unleashing in the patient of what she expresses, namely: from this moment on, I was subjected to a pressure, which means that I was scrutee, scrutinsee, as they say in English "to scrutinise", in a way that felt to me that I could not make the slightest false move. If it appeared for a single instant that I was not up to responding to what I was being tested on, cell by cell, well then, it is my patient who would fall apart.

Having therefore, for her part, sought the desire of the man, what she encounters as a response, is not the search for her own desire, it is the search for o, for the object, for the true object, for what is involved in desire which is not the Other, 0, which is this remainder, this o, the true object.

It is here there lies the key, there lies the accent of what I would like today, among other things, to demonstrate to you. The fact that she sustains this search, this is what she calls herself having more masochism than she had believed. Here - I told you this because she wrote it - you should clearly understand that she is wrong: she is not at all suited to enter into the masochistic dialogue, as her relationship with the other patient, the other male that she fails so well with - as you are going to see - sufficiently demonstrates. She simply holds out very well, even though it is exhausting, that she is able for no more, as I told you the last time, as her vacation approaches, luckily there are vacations, and, as I told you, in a way that is for her as surprising as it is amusing, "amusingly", in its suddenness, suddenly she perceives that after all all of this, once it has stopped, it does not last very long. She gives herself a shake and thinks about something else, why? It is because after all she knows very well that he can always search, that there has never been any question of him finding. This is precisely what is involved: for him to realise that there is nothing to find. There is nothing to be found there, because that which for the man, for male desire in this case, is the object of the search only concerns, as I might say, himself. This is the object of my lecture today.

What he searches for, is the (-0); it is, as I might say, what he is lacking. It is a male or a mens' affair. She knows very well - let me say it and do not get too worked up about it - she knows very well that she is not missing anything or rather - we will return to it later - the mode in which lack operates in female development is not to be situated at this level, at the place that it is sought by the desire of the man when what is involved properly speaking - and this is why I emphasised it at first - is a sadistic search: to make sprout up what ought to be at the place, in the partner, at the supposed place of the lack. This (3) is what he has to give up as lost. I am saying that because in the text she articulates extremely well that what they did together, is this work of mourning. Once he has given up this search as lost, namely the hope of finding on this occasion in his partner, in so far as she had posed herself, without knowing too well - it has to be said - what she was doing, as a female partner, when he has given up as lost the hope of finding in this partner his own lack, (-$>), the primary fundamental castration of the man, as I have designated it for you here - you should note - at the level of its biological root, of the particularities of the instrument of copulation at this level of the animal scale, when he has given it up as lost - it is Lucia Tower who tells us this - everything is going to work out well, namely that we are going, with this gentleman who had never up to then reached this level, to be able to enter into what you will allow me on this occasion zo call "the Oedipal comedy", in other words we are going to be able to enjoy ourselves: it is Daddy who did all that! Because when all is said and done this is what is involved, as has been known for a long time, remember Jones and the moralisches Entgegenkommen, the concession to moral intervention: if he is castrated, it is because of the law. We are going to play out the comedy of the law, we are much more comfortable there; it is well known and it has been mapped out. In short, we see the desire of our gentleman taking the paths already traced by what? Precisely by the law, demonstrating once more that the norm of desire and of the law are one and the same thing.

Do I make myself sufficiently understood? Not sufficiently, because I have not told you the difference, what was there before and what is gone beyond at this level as a stage and thanks to this mourning. What was there before, was properly speaking transgression (la faute): he carried all the burden, all the weight of his (-^>). He was - remember the use that I made at one time of the passage of St Paul - he was "a sinner beyond all measure".

I take the next step then: the woman has indeed, as you see, no trouble and, let us say, up to a certain point, runs no risk in seeking what is involved in the desire of the man. But I cannot do less on this occasion than to remind you of the celebrated passage of the text attributed to Solomon which I quoted a long time before this seminar, and which I give you here in Latin where it takes on all its savour: "Tria sunt difficilia mihi," says the wise king, "et quartum penitus ignoro" - there are four things about which I can say nothing, because they leave no trace: "viam aquilae in coelo" - the track of the eagle in the heavens, that of the snake on the earth, that of the ship in the sea - "et viam viri in adolescentula" and the track of man, the accent is put even on the young girl. No trace. What is involved here is desire, and not what happens when it is the object as such that is put forward. This leaves to one side therefore the effects, on the adolescentula, of many things, (4) beginning with the exhibitionist and behind that the primal scene. But it is something different that is involved here.

So then how should we tackle things in order to conceive of how there operates in the case of the woman this thing that we suspect, where she also has a way into lack - it is sufficiently dinned into our ears - with this business of Penisneid? It is here that I believe it necessary to emphasise the difference: for her too of course there is also the constitution of the object o of desire, since as it happens women also speak. One may regret it, but it is a fact. She also for her part also wants the object, and even an object in so far as she does not have it. This is what Freud explains to us, that for her this claiming of the penis will remain up to the end essentially linked to the relationship to the mother, namely to demand. It is in dependence on the demand that there is constituted this object o for the woman. She knows very well - dare I say: something knows in her - that in the Oedipus complex what is involved is not to be stronger, more desirable than the mother - at bottom she notices quickly enough that time is on her side - it is to have the object. The fundamental dissatisfaction that is involved in the structure of desire is, as I might say, pre-castrational. If it happens that she becomes interested in castration, ^{as} such, it is in so far as she enters into the man's problems, it is secondary, it is deuterio-phallic as Jones very correctly articulated it, and it is around this that there turns the whole obscurity of the debate that, when all is said and done, has never been disentangled, about this famous phallicism of the woman, a debate in which I would say, all the authors are equally right, for want of knowing where the articulation really is. I am not claiming that you are going to keep it in mind immediately in a sustained, present, lively and locatable fashion, but I intend all the same to take you right through it along a sufficient number of paths for you to end up by knowing where it passes and where something is skipped over when people theorise. For the woman, it is initially what she does not have as such which is going to become, to constitute at the beginning the object of her desire; while at the beginning for the man it is what he is not, it is where he fails. That is why I made you advance along the path of the Don Juan phantasy. The phantasy of Don Juan - and this is why it is a feminine phantasy - is this wish in the woman for an image which plays its function, its phantastical function, that there is at least one man who has it from the beginning, which is obviously, from the point of view of experience, an obvious miscognition of reality, but much better still: that he always has it, that he cannot lose it. What the position of Don Juan in the phantasy implies precisely, is that no woman can take it from him, this is what is essential and it is obviously - this is why I have said that it is a feminine phantasy - what he has in this case in common with the woman whom, of course, one cannot take it from, because she does not have it. What the woman sees in the homage of masculine (5) desire is that this object, let us say, let us be prudent, becomes something belonging to her. This means nothing more than what I have previously put forward: that it should not be lost. The lost member of Osiris, such is the object of the quest and of the protection of the woman. The fundamental myth of the sexual dialectic between man and woman is here sufficiently accentuated by a whole tradition, and moreover what "psychological" (in inverted commas) experience, in the sense that this word has in the writings of Paul Bourget, about the woman does not tell us is that a woman always thinks that a man loses himself, goes astray with another woman. Don Juan reassures her that there is a man who never loses himself in any circumstance.

Obviously there are other privileged, typical fashions of resolving the difficult problem of the relationship to o for the woman, another phantasy, if you wish. But in truth, this is not the genuine article, she is not the one who invented it. She finds it ready made. Of course to be interested in it, it is necessary that she should have, as I might say, a certain sort of stomach; I envisage, if I may say here in the order of the normal, this type of rugged fucker which St Teresa of Avila gives us the most noble example of, access to which, a more imaginary one, is given by the type of the woman who falls in love with priests, another notch: the erotomaniac. The nuance, the difference between them is, as I might say, at the level at which the desire of man collaborates in a more or less imaginary fashion as being entirely confused with the o. I alluded to St Teresa of Avila, I could also have spoken about Blessed Marguerite Mary Alacoque, she has the advantage of allowing us to recognise the very form of the o in the Sacred Heart. For the woman who loves priests, it is certain that it is in the measure that something that we cannot simply describe crudely as institutionalised castration is enough to establish, it is all the same in this direction - you are going to see that we are going to advance - that the small o as such is put forward in a perfectly isolated way, proposed as the elective object of her desire. For the erotomaniac, there is no need for the work to be prepared: she does it for herself.

And now we have come back to the earlier problem, namely what we can articulate about the relationships of man - it is he, he alone, who can give us its key - of the relationship of these diverse o's which are proposed or impose themselves or which one more or less disposes of, to what is not discerned, is not defined, and is not distinguished as such, namely giving its final status to the object of desire, in this relationship to castration.

I would ask you to return for a moment to my mirror stage. Once upon a time a film was shown which was made somewhere in England; in a school which made a specialised effort to harmonise what infant observation could give us compared to psychoanalytic development, the value of this document being all the greater (6) because this observation, this shooting, was made without the slightest preconceived idea. It involved, because the whole field of what can be observed had been covered, the confrontation of the little male and female baby with the mirror. The initial and terminal dates that I had given were, by the way, fully confirmed in it. I remember that this film was one of the last things to be presented at the Society Psychanalytique de Paris before we separated from it. The separation was very near and it was perhaps viewed at that time a little distractedly; but I had, I assure you, all my wits about me and I still remember this gripping image in which the little girl confronted with the mirror was represented. If there is something which illustrates this reference to the non-specularisable, which illustrates, which materialises, concretises this reference to the non-specularisable which I put forward last year, it is indeed the gesture of this little girl, this hand which passes rapidly over the gamma of the junction of the tummy and the two thighs like a kind of moment of vertigo before what she sees.

The little boy for his part, the poor clown, looks at his little problematic tap. He vaguely suspects that it is something a little bizarre. For his part, he has to learn - at his own expense as you know - that, as one might say, what is there does not exist, I mean compared to what Daddy has, to what his big brothers etc...., have, you know the whole first dialectic of comparison. He will subsequently learn that, not only does it not exist, but that it wants to know nothing or more exactly that it behaves exactly as it wishes. In a word, it is only step by step in his individual experience, that he has to learn to erase it from the map of his narcissism, precisely so that it can begin to be of some use. I am not saying that it is all that simple, it would be really senseless to attribute that to me. Of course, naturally, as soon as, as I might say, the more it is buried, the more it remounts to the surface and, when all is said and done, that this operation - I am only giving you an indication here, but after all an indication which will link up, I think, sufficiently with what has been indicated to you about the fundamental structure of what is ridiculously called perversion - that this operation here, is the source of homosexual attachment. Homosexual attachment is: I play the game of the loser wins. At every moment in homosexual attachment, it is this castration which is at stake, and this castration which assures the homosexual, that it is really it, the , which is the object of the game. It is in the measure that he loses that he wins.

Now then I come to illustrate something which to my astonishment gave rise to problems the last time in my reminder of the mustard pot. One of my particularly attentive listeners said to me: "That went down well, that mustard pot, at least there were a certain number of us who were not too put off by it. But now you are introducing the question of the contents. You half fill it with what?" So let's go at it. The (-f) is the emptiness of the vase, the same one as defines the homo faber. If woman, we are told, is primarily a weaver, man undoubtedly is the potter and this is even the only angle through which there is realised in the human species a grounding for the jingle which tells us, the thread is for the needle like the girl is for the boy; this kind of reference which claims to be natural, is not as natural as all that.

The woman, of course, presents herself under the appearance of a vase. And obviously this is what deceives the partner, the homo faber in question, the potter. He imagines that this vase may contain the object of his desire. Only look carefully where that leads us, it is inscribed in our experience, it has been spelled out step by step - and this is what removes from what I am telling you any kind of appearance of deduction, of reconstruction - the thing was perceived without in any way starting from the proper place in the premisses, but it was perceived well before understanding what it meant. The phantastical presence of the phallus, I mean of the phallus of another man, at the bottom of this vase is a daily object of our analytic experience. It is quite clear that I do not need to return once again to Solomon to tell you that this presence is an entirely phantastical presence. Of course, there are things which are found in this vase, things that are very interesting for desire: the egg for example; but after all it comes from the inside and proves to us that if there is a vase, the schema must be complicated a little bit more. Of course, the egg can take advantage of the encounters that the fundamental misunderstanding prepares, I mean that it is not useless for it to encounter here the sperm, but after all parthenogenesis is not excluded in the future and meanwhile insemination can take on quite different forms. Besides, it is, as I might say, in the back room of the shop that there is found in this case the really interesting vase, the uterus. It is objectively interesting, it is also psychically so to the highest degree, I mean that once there is maternity, it is largely sufficient to invest the whole interest of the woman, and when pregnancy arrives all these stories about the desire of the man become, as everyone knows, slightly superfluous.

So then since we have to do it let us come to the pot we mentioned the other day, to the honorable little pot of the first ceramics and let us identify it with (-o). Allow me for the purposes of demonstration to put here for a moment in a neighbouring little pot what for man can be constituted as o, the object of desire. It is an apologue; this apologue is designed to emphasise that o only has meaning for man when it has been poured back into the emptiness of primordial castration.

(8) Therefore this cannot be produced in this form, namely constituting the first knot of male desire with castration, unless on3 starts from secondary narcissism, namely at the moment that o is detached, falls from i(o), the narcissistic image. There is there what I would call, indicating it today in order to return to it, and besides - I think that you remember it - not introducing here anything that I have not already emphasised, a phenomenon which is the constitutive phenomenon of what one can call the "edge". As I told you last year in connection with my topological analysis, there is nothing more structuring of the shape of the vase than the shape of its edge, than the cut by which it is isolated as vase.

At a time - now distant - when there was outlined the possibility of a veritable logic remade in accordance with the psychoanalytic field - it is still to be done, even though I have given you more than one beginning for it - a major and a minor logic, I am saying logic not dialectic, at the time when someone like Imre Hermann had begun to devote himself to it in what was certainly a very confusing fashion, for want of any dialectical articulation - but after all this has been outlined - the phenomenon that he qualifies as Randbevorzugung, of choice, of preference by the phenomenal analytic field for "edge" phenomena had already been - I will come back to it with you - articulated by this author.

This edge of the little pot, of the castration-pot is an edge, for its part, that is completely round, as I might say, completely straight forward. It has none of these complicating refinements to which I introduced you with the Mobius strip and which it is easy moreover, as I showed you - you remember it, I think - once on the blackboard, to realise with a quite material vase: it is enough to join up two opposite points of its edge while in the process turning back the surfaces in such a way that they join up like in the Mobius ribbon and we find ourselves before a vase on which, in a surprising fashion, one can pass with the greatest of ease from the inside face to the outside face without ever having to cross the edge. That happens at the level of other little pots and it is here that anxiety begins.

Of course a metaphor like this is not enough to reproduce what must be explained to you. But that this original little pot has the closest relationship with what is involved as regards sexual potency, with the intermittent springing forth of its force, is what everything that I could call a series of images, that are easy to put before your eyes, of an eroto-propaedeutics, indeed even properly speaking of an erotics, gives a quite easy access to. A crowd of images of this type, Chinese, Japanese and others and, I imagine ones that are not difficult to find either in our culture, will bear witness to it for you. This is not what is anxiety-provoking. That the decanting (transvasement) here allows us to grasp how the o takes on its value because it comes into the pot of ($\sim\langle p \rangle$), takes on its value by being here -o, the (9) vase half-empty at the same time as it is half-full - this is what I told you the last time - it is obvious that to really complete my image it is necessary that I should underline that it is not the phenomenon of decanting that is essential, it is the phenomenon to which I have just alluded of the transfiguration of the vase, namely that this vase here becomes anxiety-provoking, why? Because what comes to half-fill the hollow constituted from the original castration, is the small o in so far as it comes from elsewhere, that it is only supported, constituted through the mediation of the desire of the Other. And it is there that we rediscover anxiety and the ambiguous shape of this edge which, because of the way it is made at the level of the other vase, does not allow us to distinguish either the inside or the outside.

Anxiety therefore comes to constitute itself, to take its place in a relationship beyond this emptiness of what I might call a first phase of castration. And this is why the subject has only one desire as regards this primary castration, which is to return to it.

I will speak to you at length, after the interruption that we are going to have, about masochism and there is of course no question of my tackling it today. If you want to prepare yourselves for it, to understand me about it, I am giving now - it is a lapse on my part if I did not do it earlier when I began to speak to you - information about an article, which is extremely precious because it is the fruit of very substantial experience. It is an article by a man who is indeed one of those in connection with whom I feel the greatest sorrow that circumstances deprived me of his collaboration, it is the article by Grunberger: "Esquisse d'une théorie psycho-dynamique du masochisme" in the April-June 1954, number 2, of volume XVIII of the Revue Française de Psychanalyse. I do not even know if this article has been given the fate it merits elsewhere; but whether this forgetfulness is due to the fact that it appeared in the shadow of the display surrounding the foundation of the Institut de Psychanalyse, is something I will not try to settle. But you will see there - this is not at all the final word - you will see noted - I am only invoking it here to show you right away the value of the material that one can find in it - you will see noted, at the high point of the day-by-day observation of the analytic session, how having recourse to the very image of castration, to the fact that I would like them to be cut off, can come as a peaceful, salutary outcome to the anxiety of the masochist. What we have here - I underline it - is not a phenomenon which is the final word of this complex structure; but moreover on this point I have sufficiently initiated my formula for you to know that I am on this occasion, I mean as regards the link between anxiety and masochism, aiming at a point which is quite different to this point within what I could call the momentary dismay of the subject. It is only an indication that I find there. But this phase of castration in so far as the subject returns to it, in so far as it becomes a point he aims at, brings us back to what I (10) already emphasised at the end of one of my last seminars about circumcision.

I do not know, Stein, where you have got to in the commentary that you are pursuing of Totem and Taboo and whether this has yet led you to tackle Moses and Monotheism. I think that you cannot but come to it and be struck in it then by the total avoidance of what is nevertheless a structuring problem if one is to find in the Mosaic institution something which reflects the inaugural cultural complex, namely what was on this point the function of the institution of circumcision. You should notice that in any case there is something in this removal of the prepuce which you cannot fail to connect with this funny little twisted object that I one day passed around among you in a material way, so that you could see how it is structured once there has been realised in the shape of a little piece of cardboard, this result of the central cut on what I illustrated, incarnated for you here in the shape of the cross-cap, in order to show you how this isolation of something, which is defined precisely as a shape incarnating as such the non-specularisable, can have to do with the constitution of the autonomy of the o, of the object of desire.

That something like an order can be brought into this hole, this constitutive failure of primordial castration, is what I believe circumcision incarnates in the proper sense of the word. The circumcised person, and circumcision, have by all their coordinates, all the ritual, indeed mythical configuration, the primordial initiatory entrances which are those where it operates, the most obvious relationship with the normativizing of the object of desire. The circumcised person is consecrated, though less consecrated to a law than to a certain relationship to the Other, to the big O, and that is the reason why the small o is involved. It remains that we are, at the point that I intend to bring the fire of sunlight, namely at the level that we can find in the configuration of history something which is supported by a big O, who is there more or less the God of the Judaeo-Christian tradition, it remains to be seen what circumcision signifies. It is extremely astonishing that in a milieu as Judaeic as the psychoanalytic milieu, that texts gone over a hundred thousand times, from the Fathers of the Church to the Fathers of the Reformation, that is to say up to the eighteenth century - and again, to tell you the fruitful periods of the Reformation - that these texts have not been reinterrogated. No doubt what we are told in Chapter XVII of the Book of Genesis, concerning the fundamental character of the law of circumcision in so far as it forms part of the pact given by Yahweh in the bush, the reference of this law to the time of Abraham - this is what Chapter XVII consists of, it is to date the institution of circumcision from Abraham, no doubt this passage is, it seems, an addition according to critical exegesis, a Priestly addition, namely very noticeably later than the Yahwistic and the Elohist tradition, namely than the two primitive texts from which the books of the law are composed - we have nevertheless in Chapter XXXIV the famous episode which does not lack humour which concerns - as you know - the rape of Dinah, the sister of Simeon and Levi, the daughter of Jacob. To get her - because it is a matter for the man from Shechem who kidnapped her of getting her from her brothers - Simeon and Levi demand that they should be circumcised: "We cannot give our sister to an uncircumcised man, we would be dishonoured". We have obviously here the superimposition of two texts, and we do not know whether it is a single man or all the Shechemites who are done at the same time, in this proposition of an alliance which, of course, could not be made in the name of just two families, but of two races, all the Shechemites have themselves circumcised; the result is that they are out of action for three days which the others take advantage of in order to come and butcher them. It is one of those charming episodes which Monsieur Voltaire could not understand and which made him say so many bad things about this book which is so admirable as regards the revelation of what is called the signifier as such.

This is all the same done to make us think that it is not simply from Moses that the law of circumcision dates. Here I am only highlighting the problems raised in this connection.

Undoubtedly all the same, because Moses is involved and because Moses in our domain is recognised as being an Egyptian, it would not be altogether useless for us to pose the question of what is involved as regards the relationship of Judaeic circumcision with the circumcision of the Egyptians.

This will make me apologise for prolonging again, let us say by five or seven minutes, what I have to say to you today so that what I have written on the board will not be lost for you.

We have the assurance, through a certain number of authors in antiquity and specifically this old Herodotus who no doubt talks nonsense in some places, but who is often very precious, and in any case who leaves no kind of doubt that at his time, namely at a very low time for the Jews, the Egyptians on the whole practiced circumcision; he even makes such a prevalent state of it that he says that it is to the Egyptians that all the Semites of Syria and of Palestine owe this usage. A lot has been said on this point; after all we are not at all forced to believe him. This he bizarrely puts forward in connection with the Colohidians which he pretends are an Egyptian colony. But let us leave that to one side.

He makes of it, Greek as he is - and after all at his time, he could scarcely have made anything else of it - a measure of cleanliness. He underlines for us that the Egyptians prefer being clean, katarrinao, to what is described as a beautiful appearance, hence Herodotus, Greek as he is, does not conceal from us that it seems to him that to circumcise oneself is always (12) to disfigure oneself a little.

We have luckily more direct testimonies and supports about Egyptian circumcision. We have two testimonies that I will describe as iconographic - you will tell me that this is not a lot - : one is from the old empire, it is at Saqqarah in the tomb of Doctor Ank Maror (?). It is said that he is a doctor because the walls of the tomb are covered with figures of operations. One of these walls shows us two representations of circumcision, the other is to the right of this one, I have represented for you the one on the left; I do not know how I succeeded in making readable or whether I succeeded in making readable my drawing which has as an ambition to limit itself and to emphasise perhaps a little in this case the lines as they are presented; here is the boy who is being circumcised and here is the organ. A boy, who is behind him, holds his hands because it is necessary; a personage who is a priest, about whose description I will say no more today, is here; in one hand - it is the left hand - he holds the organ of the other, this oblong object is a stone knife. This stone knife, we rediscover in another text which has remained up to now completely enigmatic, a biblical text which says that after the episode of the. Burning Bush, when Moses is advised that nobody in Egypt remembers, more exactly that all of those who remembered the murder that he carried out of an Egyptian, have disappeared, that he can return; he returns and, on the way, the biblical text tells us - on the road where he stops, it used to be translated in a hostelry; but let us leave that - Yahwe attacks him in order to kill him. This is all that is said. Zipporah, his wife, then circumcises her son who is a small child and touching Moses, who is not circumcised, with the prepuce protects him mysteriously by this operation, by this contact, from the attacks of Yahweh who then goes away and leaves him, brings his attack to a halt. It is said that Zipporah circumcised her son with a stone knife.

Some forty years later - because there is also the whole episode of the trials imposed on the Egyptians and the ten plagues - at the time of entering into the land of Canaan, Joshua receives the order: "Take a stone knife and circumcise all those who are here, who are going to enter into the land of Canaan". It is those and only those who are born during the years in the desert; during the years in the desert, they were not circumcised. Yahwe adds: "Now I will have rolled away from on top of you" - which is translated by lifted, suspended - "the contempt of the Egyptians". (Joshua V:VI)

I remind of you of these texts, not because I have the intention of using them all, but to stimulate in you at least the desire, the need, to consult them. For the moment, I will stop at the stone knife.

The stone knife indicates in any case a very ancient origin for this ceremony, which is confirmed by the discovery by Elliot Smith, near Luxor, if I remember rightly, probably at Magadeh (?) which has so many other reasons for attracting our interest as (13) regards this very question of circumcision, of corpses from the pre-historic period - namely not corpses which are mummified according to norms which allows them to be dated in Egyptian history - which carry the traces of circumcision. The stone knife, all by itself, should designate for us a date, an origin for this ceremony which is at least at the epoch that is defined as the Neolithic Age.

Besides so that there should be no doubt, three Egyptian letters, these three, which are respectively an S, a B, and a T, S(e)B(e)T, expressly indicate to us that it is circumcision that is involved. The sign marked here is an hapax, it is found nowhere but there; it seems that it is an effaced, a worn down lorme of the determinant of the phallus. We find it in other inscriptions where you see it inscribed much more clearly.

Another way of designating circumcision is the one which is in this line and which is read "FaHeT", F, the aspirated H which is here this sign which is here the placenta and here the T which is the same as what you see here. Here a determinant which is the determinant of linge (?), it is not pronounced. I would ask you to take note of it today because I will come back to it. Here another F designates "he" and here the PaN which means the prepuce, PaN means "to be separated from one's prepuce". This has also all its importance, for circumcision is not to be taken uniquely as what I might call a totalitarian operation, a sign. The "to be separated from something" is from that moment here, in an Egyptian inscription, articulated properly speaking. As I told you, I am only going so far in order not to have wasted my time writing that here today.

This function of the prepuce, which is in a way the goal, the value which in these inscriptions is given, as one might say to the weight of the least word, the maintenance, as I might say, of the prepuce as the object of the operation, just as much as the one who undergoes it, is something whose emphasis I would ask you to retain here because we rediscover it in a text of Jeremiah which is just as enigmatic, just as uninterpreted up to the present, as the one to which I have just alluded before you, specifically the one about the circumcision by Zipporah of her son, I will then have an opportunity to come back to it.

I think I have already sufficiently initiated the function of circumcision, I mean not simply in its coordinates of celebration, of initiation, of introduction to a special consecration, but in its very structure as a reference, which is essentially interesting for us, to castration as regards its relationships with the structuring of the object of desire, I think have sufficiently initiated things in this direction to be able effectively to take them further with you on the day that I have given you for our next appointment.

Seminar 17: Wednesday 8 May 196 3

I left you on a remark which put in question the function of circumcision in the economy of desire, in the economy of the object, in the sense that analysis grounds it as an object of desire. This lecture ended on a text, on a passage from Jeremiah - verses 24 and 25 of Chapter 9 - which in truth has posed some difficulties for translators throughout the ages, because the Hebrew text - I have too much to say to you today to delay on the letter of the text - for the Hebrew text, I am saying, should be translated: "I will punish every circumcised man in his prepuce", a paradoxical term that the translators have tried to get around, even one of the best of them, Paul Dorn, by the formula: "I will punish every circumcised man as if he were uncircumcised".

I am only recalling this point here to indicate to you that it is indeed some permanent relationship to a lost object as such that is involved and that it is only in the dialectic of this object o as cut and as now sustaining, presentifying a relationship essential to this relation itself, that effectively we can conceive of what is involved at this point in the Bible, which is not unique, but a point which illuminates by its extreme paradox what is involved every time the term of circumcised and uncircumcised is effectively employed in the Bible. It is not at all in effect, far from it, limited to this little bit of flesh which constitutes the object of the ritual. "Uncircumcised lips", "uncircumcised heart", these are terms which right through this text, appear numerous, almost current, almost common, underlining that what is involved is always an essential separation from a certain part of the body, a certain appendix, from something which in a function becomes symbolic of a relationship to the body itself henceforth alienated, and fundamental for the subject.

I will take things up today from a broader, higher, more distant point of view. You know, some of you know, that I have just returned from a journey which brought me some new experiences and which also brought me, in its essence in any case, the approach, the view, the encounter with some of these works without which the most attentive study of texts, of the letter, of the doctrine, specifically that of Buddhism in this case, must remain in some way incomplete and lifeless.

I think that to give you some report of what this approach was, (2) of the way in which, for me and for you also I think, it can be inserted into what is this year our fundamental question, the point where the dialectic of anxiety takes place, namely the question of desire, which in our approach can from now on be, can represent for us from now on, a contribution.

Desire in effect constitutes the essential basis, the goal, the aim, the practice also of everything here that is denominated and announced about the Freudian message. Something absolutely essential, new, passes through this message. This is the path along which - who among you, there is surely someone among you, some people, I hope, who can pick it up - along which this message passes. We should justify at the point that we are at, namely at every point of a renewal of our remotivated elan, what is involved in this locus this year, this subtle locus, this locus that we are trying to circumscribe, to define, to coordinate, that this locus never located up to now in what we could call its ultra-subjective influence, this central locus of what one could call the pure function of desire. This locus into which we are advancing a little further this year with our discourse about anxiety, is the locus where I am demonstrating for you how o is formed.

o, the object of objects, the object for which our vocabulary has put forward the term objectality in so far as it is opposed to that of objectivity.

To sum up this opposition in some formulae - I apologise that they have to be so rapid - we will say that objectivity is the final term of Western scientific analytic thinking, that objectivity is the correlate of a pure reason which, when all is said and done, is the final term which for us is expressed, is resumed by, is articulated in, a logical formalism.

Objectality, if you have been following my teaching of about the past five or six years, objectality is something else and to highlight it at its most crucial point, I would say, I would formulate, that in contra-distinction to the preceding formula which I have just given, objectality is the correlate of a pathos about the cut, and precisely of the one through which this same formalism, logical formalism, in the Kantian sense of this term, this same formalism rejoins its miscognised effect in the Critique of pure reason, an effect which accounts for this formalism even in Kant, in Kant especially I would say, remains hewn out of causality, remains suspended on the justification that no a priori has up to now managed to reduce, of this function which is nevertheless essential to the whole mechanism of the lived experience of our mental life, the function of the cause. Everywhere the cause and its function prove to be (3) irrefutable even if it is irreducible, almost ungraspable for critical thinking. What is this function? How can we justify its survival against every attempt to reduce it, an attempt which constitutes almost the sustained movement of the whole critical progress of Western philosophy, a movement of course which was never completed. If this, this cause, proves to be so irreducible, it is in so far as it is superimposed, as it is identical in its function to what I am teaching you this year to circumscribe, to handle, namely precisely this part of ourselves, this part of our flesh which necessarily remains, as I might say, caught up in the formal machine. That without which this logical formalism would be absolutely nothing for us, namely that it does not just provide us with, that it does not just give us the framework, not alone of our thinking, but of our own transcendental aesthetic, that it lays hold of us somewhere and that, this part that we give, not alone the material, not alone the incarnation as thinking being, but the fleshy piece as such torn from ourselves, it is this piece in so far as it is what circulates in logical formalism as it has already been elaborated by our work on the use of the signifier, it is this part of ourselves caught up in the machine, that can never be recuperated, this object as lost at different levels of corporal experience where the cut is produced, is the support, the authentic substratum of every function as such of the cause. This part of ourselves, this corporal part is therefore essentially and by function partial. Of course it is well to recall that it is body, that we are only objectal (objectaux) - which means object of desire - as bodies, an essential point, an essential point to recall because it is one of the creative fields of negation to appeal to something else, to some substitute; this is what nevertheless always remains at the final term, the desire for the body, the desire for the body of the other, and nothing but the desire for his body. One can say, one certainly says, "It is your heart that I want, nothing else", and by this one intends to say something spiritual: the essence of your being or again your love; but here, as always, language betrays the truth. This heart here is only a metaphor if we do not forget that there is nothing in the metaphor which justifies the common usage of books of grammar in opposing the proper sense to the figurative sense. This heart can mean many things, different things are metaphorised according to cultures and tongues. For the Semites, for example, the heart is the organ of (4) intelligence itself. And it is not these nuances, these differences that are at stake, that is not what I want to draw your attention to. This heart, in this formula: "It is your heart that I want", is here, like every other organ- metaphor, to be taken literally. It is as a part of the body that it functions, it is, as I might say, as guts.

After all, why have some metaphors subsisted for so long - and we know the places, I have alluded to them, where they still live, specifically in the cult of the Sacred Heart - why, since the time of the living literature of Hebrew and Akkadian regarding which this little book by Edouard Dorn reminds us of the degree to which the metaphorical use of names of the parts of the body is fundamental to any understanding of these ancient texts, why this remarkable lack in Toutes les parties du corps, which I recommend to you, which can be found, which has just been re-issued by Gallimard: if all the parts of the body are paraded in their properly metaphorical functions, the sexual organ and especially the male sexual organ, even though all the texts which I evoked earlier on circumcision were there to be evoked, the male sexual organ and the prepuce are remarkably, very strangely omitted, they are not even in the table of contents.

How can the still living, metaphorical usage of this part of the body to express that which in desire, beyond appearances, is properly what is required in this haunting memory of what I would call causal guts (la tripe causale), how can it be explained, if not by the fact that the cause is already lodged in the gut, as I might say, figured in the lack; and moreover in all the mythical discussion of the functions of causality, it is always tangible that references go from the most classical positions to those which are the most modernised, for example that of Maine de Biran: when it is by the sense of effort that he tries to make us sense the subtle balance around which there is played out the position of what is determined, of what is free when all is said and done, it is always to this corporal experience that we refer. What I will still put forward to give a sense of what is involved in the order of the cause is what, when all is said and done? My arm, but my arm in so far as I isolate it, that considering it as such, as an intermediary between my will and my act, if I dwell on its function, it is in so far as it is isolated for an instant, and that I must at all costs and from whatever angle I recuperate it, that I must right away modify the fact that, if it (5) is an instrument, it is nevertheless not free, that I must remain on my guard, as I might say against the fact, not immediately of its amputation, but of its non-control, against the fact that someone else may take it over, that I may become the right arm or the left arm of someone else, or simply against the fact that like a vulgar umbrella, - just like the corsets which it appears were found there in abundance a few years ago - I may forget it in the Metro.

We analysts for our part know what that means - the experience of the hysteric is something sufficiently significant for us - which means that this comparison in which it can be glimpsed that the arm can be forgotten, neither more nor less like a mechanical arm, is not a forced metaphor. This is the reason why I reassure myself of its belonging with the function of determinism: it is very important to me that even when I forget its functioning, I know that it functions in an automatic fashion, that an inferior stage assures me that whether tonic or voluntary, all sorts of reflexes, all sorts of conditionings assure me that it will not escape, even when one takes into account an instant of inattention on my part.

The cause therefore, the cause always arises in correlation with the fact that something is omitted in the consideration of knowledge, something which is precisely the desire which animates the function of knowledge. Every time the cause is invoked, in its most traditional register, is in a way the shade, the pendant, of what is the blind spot in the function of this knowledge itself. This of course is something that we did not have to wait for Freud to invoke. Already well before Freud - do I need to evoke Nietzsche and others before him - others had put in question the desire involved in the function of knowledge, others had questioned what Plato had in mind that made him believe in the central, original, creative function of the "Sovereign Good", what Aristotle had in mind which made him believe in this singular prime mover which comes to put itself in the place of the Anaxagorian nous, which nevertheless can only be for him a deaf and blind mover to what it sustains, namely the whole cosmos. The desire for knowledge with its consequences had been put in question, and always in order to put in question what knowledge believes itself obliged to forge precisely as final cause.

This sort of critique culminates at what? At what I might call a sort of sentimental putting in question of what appears to be most stripped of sentiment, namely elaborated, purified, in its (6) final consequences. It contributes to the creation of a myth which will be the myth of the psychological origin of knowledge: these are aspirations, instincts, needs: by all means add on religious, you will only be taking another step: we will be responsible for all the deviations of reason, the Kantian Schwarmerein with all its implicit openings onto fanaticism.

Is this a critique that we can be satisfied with? Can we not take further what is involved? Articulate it in a more daring fashion beyond the psychological, which is inscribed in its structure. It is hardly necessary to say that this is exactly what we are doing. What is involved is not simply a feeling which requires its satisfaction. What is involved is a structural necessity: the relationship of the subject to the signifier necessitates the structuring of desire in the phantasy. The functioning of the phantasy implies a temporally definable syncope of the function of o which necessarily at some phase of phantastical functioning is effaced and disappears. This aphanisis of the o, this disappearance of the object in so far as it structures a certain level of the phantasy, this is what we have the reflection of in the function of the cause; and every time we find ourselves confronted with the same unthinkable handling of critical thinking which nevertheless is irreducible, even to critical thinking; every time we find ourselves confronted with this final functioning of the cause, we ought to search for its foundation, its root in this hidden object, in this object qua syncope. A hidden object is at the source of this faith in the prime mover of Aristotle which I presented to you earlier as deaf and blind to what causes it. The certainty, this very contestable certainty, always linked to derision, this certainty which is attached to what I would call the essentialist proof, which is not only that of Saint Anselm - because you will also rediscover it in Descartes - the one which tends to found itself on the objective perfection of the idea in order to found in it its existence, if this precarious and derisory certainty maintains itself despite all criticism, if we are always forced from some angle to come back to it, it is only because it is the shadow of something else, of another certainty; and this certainty here, I already named it, you can recognise it, because I already called it by its name: it is that of the anxiety linked to the approach to the object, this anxiety which I told you must be defined as that which does not deceive, the only certainty, which is founded, unambiguous, that of anxiety: anxiety precisely in so far as every object escapes it. And the certainty linked to the recourse to the primary cause and the shadow of this fundamental certainty, its shadowlike character is what gives it this essentially precarious aspect, this aspect which is only really surmounted by this affirmative articulation which always characterises what I have called the essentialist argument, this something which forever is for it what is in it, what does not convince. This certainty, therefore, by being sought in this way, in its true foundation proves what it is: it is a displacement, a secondary certainty, and the displacement involved is the certainty of anxiety.

What does this imply? Undoubtedly a more radical putting in question than has ever been articulated in our Western philosophy, the putting in question as such of the function of knowledge, not at all that this putting in question - I hope to make you glimpse this - has not been done elsewhere. With us, it can only begin to be done in the most radical fashion if we grasp what is meant by this formula that there is already knowledge in the phantasy.

And what is the nature of this knowledge which is already in the phantasy? It is nothing other than the following which I repeat right away: man, if he speaks, the subject once he speaks is already implicated in his body by this word. The root of knowledge is this engagement of his body. But it is not this sort of engagement that undoubtedly, in a fruitful fashion, in a subjective fashion, contemporary phenomenology has tried to engage with by reminding us that in every perception, the totality of the corporal function - the structure of the organism of Goldstein, the structure of behaviour of Maurice Merleau-Ponty - that the totality of corporal presence is engaged.

Notice that what is happening along this path, is something which undoubtedly has always appeared to us to be very desirable: the solution of the body-spirit dualism. But it is not because a phenomenology, which has moreover reaped a rich harvest of facts, makes for us of this body, taken at the functional level, as I might put it, a sort of double, of opposite to all the functions of the spirit, that we ought to find ourselves satisfied. Because indeed there is here all the same some evasion. And moreover everyone knows that the reactions which are undoubtedly of a philosophical nature or even of a fideist nature that contemporary phenomenology has been able to produce among the servants of what could be called the materialist cause, that these reactions that it has given rise to are undoubtedly not (8) unjustified. The body as it is thus articulated, indeed banished from experience in the sort of exploration inaugurated by contemporary phenomenology, the body becomes something altogether irreducible to material mechanisms. After long centuries succeeded in making a spiritualised body for us in art, the body of contemporary phenomenology is a corporalised soul.

What interests us in the question of what the dialectic involved must be brought back to, in so far as it is the dialectic of the cause, is not that the body participates in it, as one might say, in its totality. It is not the fact of pointing out that eyes are not all that are necessary in order to see, but that undoubtedly our reactions are different according as our skin, as was pointed out by Goldstein, who was not lacking in perfectly valid experiments, according as our skin is bathed or not in a certain atmosphere of colour. That is not the order of events involved here in this reminder of the function of the body. The engagement of the man who speaks in the chain of the signifier with all its consequences, with this henceforth fundamental springing forth, this elective point that I earlier called that of an ultra-subjective radiation, this foundation of desire in a word, it is in so far as, it is not that the body in its functioning would allow us to reduce everything, to explain everything in a reduction to the dualism of the Umwelt and the Innenwelt, it is because there is always in the body, and by the very fact of this engagement in the signifying dialectic, something separated, something statuefied, something inert from then on: that there is a pound of flesh.

One cannot but be astonished once again at this turn, at the unbelievable genius which guided the person we call Shakespeare to fix in the figure of the Merchant of Venice this theme of the pound of flesh which reminds us of this law of debt and of gift, this total social fact, as it is expressed, has been expressed since Marcel Mauss - but it was certainly not a dimension that was allowed to escape at the dawn of the seventeenth century: this law of debt does not take its weight from any element that we could consider purely and simply as a third, in the sense of an outside third, the exchange of women or of goods as Lévi-Strauss recalls in his Elementary Structures. What is at stake in a pact, can only be and only is this pound of flesh, as it is put in the text of The Merchant: "to be cut off by him nearest the heart".

(9) Undoubtedly it is not for nothing that after having animated one of his most fiery plays with this thematic, Shakespeare pushed by a sort of divination which is nothing but the reflection of something always touched on and never attacked at its deepest level, attributes it, situates it with respect to this merchant who is Shylock, who is a Jew. The fact is moreover that I believe that no history, no written history, no sacred book, no Bible, to say the word, is better designed than the Hebrew Bible to make us sense this sacred zone in which the moment of truth is evoked, that we can express in religious terms by this implacable aspect of the relationship to God, this divine wickedness which ensures that it is always with our flesh that we must discharge our debt.

This domain which I told you is scarcely touched on must be called by its name. This designation precisely in so far as ix. gives for us the value of different biblical texts, is essentially correlative to what so many analysts felt obliged, and sometimes not without success, to question themselves about, namely the sources of what is called anti-Semitic feeling. It is precisely in the sense that this sacred and I would almost say forbidden zone is there more lively, better articulated than any other place, and that it is not only articulated, but after all alive and still carried in the life of this people in so far as it presents itself, in so far as it subsists of itself in the function that, in connection with o, I already articulated with a name which I described as that of the remainder - it is something which survives the ordeal of the division of the field of the Other by the presence of the subject - of something which is that which in a particular biblical passage is formally metaphorised in the image of the stump, of the cut trunk from which a new trunk re-emerges in this living function in the name of Isaiah's second son Shear-Jashub, a remainder, a remnant, will come back in this Shorit that we also find in a particular passage of Isaiah, the function of the remainder, the irreducible function, the one which survives every ordeal of the encounter with the pure signifier, this is the point where already the end of my last lecture with the remarks of Jeremiah, of the passage of Jeremiah about circumcision, this is the point that I have led you to already.

This is also the one of which I indicated the Christian solution and I must say attenuation, namely the whole mirage which in the Christian solution can be said to be attached at its root to the masochistic outcome, can be attributed to this irreducible relationship to the object of the cut.

(10) In so far as the Christian has learnt through the dialectic of redemption to identify himself ideally to the one who at a particular time identified himself to this very object, to this refuse left by divine vengeance, it is in so far as this solution has been lived, orchestrated, ornamented, poeticised, that I was able, no later than 48 hours ago, to have once again such a comic encounter with the Westerner who returns from the East and who finds that over there they lack heart. They are wily people, hypocrites, dealers, even cheats. Good God, they get involved in all sorts of little schemes. The Westerner who was talking to me, was a very average illustrator, even though in his own eyes he considered himself to be a rather superior sort of star. He thought that over there, in Japan, if he had been well received, my goodness, it was because in the families it was advantageous for them to show that they had relations with someone who had almost won the Prix Goncourt. These are things, he told me, which of course in my - here I censor the name of his province, let us say a province with has no chance of being mentioned - let us say in my native Camargue would never happen. Everyone knows that here we all wear our hearts on our sleeves, we are much more honest, you never have these underhand manoeuvres.

Such is the illusion of the Christian who always believes he has more heart than the others, and God knows why this is? The matter no doubt appears more clearly - this is what I believe I have helped you to see as being essential, it is the basis of masochism - this attempt to provoke the anxiety of the Other, become here the anxiety of God, is effectively second nature for the Christian, namely that this hypocrisy - and everyone knows that in other perverse positions, we are always capable in experience of sensing the playfulness and the ambiguity that are always there - namely that this hypocrisy is more or less the same as what he experiences for his part more as oriental hypocrisy.

He is right to feel that it is not the same, because the Orient is not Christianised. And this is what we are going to try to advance into.

I am not going to do a Kaiserlin here, I am not going to explain to you what oriental psychology is, first of all because there is no oriental psychology. Nowadays, thank God, one goes directly to Japan by the North Pole. This has one advantage: it is to make us sense that it could very easily be considered as a peninsula, as an island off Europe. I assure you that this is in (11) effect what it is. And I predict that one day you will see appearing some Japanese Robert Musil. He will show us where we have got to, and the degree to which this relationship of the Christian to the heart is still alive or whether it is fossilised.

But this is not where I want to lead you today. I want to take an angle, use an experience, stylise an encounter I had and which I indicated to you earlier, to approach something from the field of what is still alive in terms of Buddhist practices and specifically those of Zen. You may well suspect that it is not during such a short raid that I could have brought you back anything. I will tell you perhaps, at the end of what we are now going to go through, a sentence simply gathered from the priest of one of these convents, at Kamakura precisely, with whom a meeting was arranged for me, and who, I assure you, without any urging on my part, brought me a sentence which does not appear to me out of place in what we are trying to define here about the relationship of the subject to the signifier. But this is rather a field to be reserved for the future. The encounters I spoke about earlier were more modest, more accessible encounters, more possible to insert into this sort of lightning journey which are the ones the type of life we lead reduces us to. It is specifically the encounter with works of art.

It may seem astonishing to you that I speak about works of art while what is in question are statues, and statues which have a religious function, which were not constructed in principle with the goal of representing works of art. They undoubtedly are so however in their intention, in their origin. They have always been accepted and felt to be such, independently of this function.

It is therefore absolutely not out of place for us to take this way in, in order to receive from them something which leads us, I would not say, to their message, but to what precisely they can represent, which is the thing which interests us: a certain relationship of the human subject to desire.

I made in haste, with the aim of preserving an integrity which I think is important - I recall it to you as I am passing them out to you - a little montage of three photos of a single statue, of a statue which is among the most beautiful which can I believe be seen in this zone which has no lack of them, what is involved is a statue whose qualifications, denominations I am going to give you and whose function I am going to make you glimpse, and which is found at the women's monastery, at the nunnery of Todai-Ji at Nara. This will allow me to inform you that Nara was the locus of the exercise of imperial authority for several centuries, which are placed modestly before the 10th century. There are statues there which date from the 10th century. It is one of these statues, one of the most beautiful, the one which is found in the women's monastery of Todai-Ji. I will tell you in a moment what function is involved. So handle them carefully. Because I would like to get the three photographs back later. There are two of them which are copies of one another, they are the same with one enlarged with respect to the other.

We are going into Buddhism. You already know enough, I think, to know that the aims, the principles of the dogmatic source as well as the ascetical practice which can be referred to it, can be resumed, moreover are resumed in this formula which interests us in the keenest possible way in terms of what we have to articulate here, that desire is illusion. What does that mean? The illusion here cannot but be referred to the register of truth. The truth involved cannot be a final truth. The enunciating of "is illusion" in this case is to be taken in the direction which remains to be specified of what the function of the creature (l'etre) may or may not be. To say that desire is illusion is to say that it has no support, that it has no outcome in nor aim towards anything.

You have heard speak, I think, if only in Freud, about the reference to Nirvana. I think that you may have here and there heard speak of it in such a fashion that you could not identify it to a pure reduction to nothingness. The very usage of negation which is current in Zen for example, and the recourse to the sign "mou" which is that of negation here, should not deceive you, the sign "mou" involved being moreover a very particular negation which is a "not to have". This just by itself should be enough to put us on our guard. What is involved, at least in the median stage of the relationship to Nirvana, is well and truly articulated in an absolutely widespread fashion in every formulation of Buddhist truth: it is always articulated in the sense of a non-dualism.

If there is an object of your desire, it is nothing other than yourself. I underline that am not giving you the original feature of Buddhism here; "Tat tuam asi", the "it is yourself" that you recognise in the other is already inscribed in the Vedanta.

Let us say that I am recalling it here, not being able in any way to give you the history, or a criticism, of Buddhism, that I am only recalling it here in order to approach by the shortest paths that to which by this experience, which you are going to see was (13) very particular, that if I localise it there it is because this experience constituted around this statue, an experience I had myself, is characteristic and is usable by us.

The Buddhist experience, in so far as by stages and by advances, it tends to make for the one who lives it, who becomes engaged in its paths, and also moreover those who engage in it in a properly-ascetic fashion - ascetics are a rarity - presupposes a striking reference to the function of the mirror in our relationship to the object. Effectively this metaphor is habitual. A long time ago I made an allusion in one of my texts, because of what I already knew about it, an allusion to this surfaceless mirror in which nothing is reflected. Such was the term, the stage if you wish, the phase to which I intended to refer for the precise goal that I was aiming at at that time: it was in an article on psychic causality.

You should notice here that this mirror-like relationship to the object is absolutely common to every gnosis. The absolutely common character of this reference is what makes every reference to the notion of projection so easy for us to accede to and also so easy to make an error about. We know how easy it is for outside things to take on the complexion of our soul, and even its form, and even for them to come towards us in the shape of a double.

But if we introduce the object o as essential in this relationship to desire, the business of dualism and of non-dualism takes on a completely different relief. If that which is most myself in the outside is there, not so much because I projected it there, but because it was cut off from me, the fact of my rejoining it or not and the paths that I will take to ensure this recuperation take on all sorts of possibilities, of eventual varieties.

It is here, to give a sense which is not of the order of trickery, of conjuring, of magic, to the function of the mirror, I mean in this dialectic about the recognition of what we contribute or not with desire, that it is worthwhile making some remarks, the first of which is that in a fashion which I would ask you to note does not mean taking the path of idealism, therefore the first is this remark that the eye is already a mirror, that the eye, I would go so far as to say, organises the world in space, that it reflects what in the mirror is reflection, but which reflection is visible to the most piercing eye, the reflection that it itself carries of the world in this eye that it sees in the mirror, that in a word there is no need (14) for two opposing mirrors for there to be already created the infinite reflections of the hall of mirrors.

This remark about the infinite deployment of inter-reflected images, which are produced once there is an eye and a mirror, is not here simply for the ingeniousness of the remark, which one cannot see too well moreover where it would end up, but on the contrary to bring us back to the privileged point which is at the origin, which is the same as the one in which there is bound up the original difficulty of arithmetic, the foundation of the one and the zero.

The one image, the one which is made in the eye, I mean the one that you can see in the pupil, requires from the beginning of this development a correlate which for its part is not an image at all. If the surface of the mirror is not there to support the world, it is not because nothing reflects this world, the consequences of which we have to draw, it is not because the world vanishes with the absence of the subject, it is properly what I said in my first formula: it is that nothing is reflected; that means that before space, there is a one which contains multiplicity as such, which is prior to the deployment of space as such, which is never anything but a chosen space where there can only be sustained juxtaposed things as long as there is room. Whether this room is indefinite or infinite does nothing to change the question. But in order to make you understand what I mean as regards this one which is not mono but poly, all in the plural - I will simply show you what you can see at Kamakura - it is the work of a sculptor whose name is well known; Kamakura is up to the end of the 12th century - : it is Buddha represented, materially represented by a statue three metres high, and materially represented by a thousand others. It creates a certain impression, and all the more so because one passes in front of them along a rather narrow corridor and a thousand statues take up some room, especially when they are all of human size, perfectly made and individualised; this work took the sculptor and his school a hundred years. You are going to be able to consider from the front and here from an oblique perspective the effect that has as you advance along the corridor.

This is done to materialise before you that the monotheism-polytheism opposition is perhaps not something as clear as it is usually represented for you. For the thousand and one statues which are there are all properly and identically the same Buddha. Besides, by right, each one of you is a Buddha, I say by right (15) because for particular reasons you may have been thrown into the world with some defect which may constitute a more or less irreducible obstacle to gaining access to it.

It nevertheless remains that this identity of the subjective one in its multiplicity, its infinite variability, to a final one with its completed access to non-dualism, in its access to the beyond of every pathetic variation, to the beyond of every cosmic wordly change, is something in which we have less reason to interest ourselves in as a phenomenon, than the fact that it allows us to approach the relationships that it demonstrates by the consequences that it had historically, structurally in the thoughts of men.

In truth, I said that what is there under a thousand and one supports, in reality these thousand and one supports, thanks to the effects of multiplication inscribed in what you can see, the multiplicity of their arms and of some heads which crown the central head, ought to be multiplied in such a way that there are in reality here 33,333 of the same identical beings. This is only a detail.

I told you what a Buddha was. It is not absolutely speaking a God, it is a bodhisattva, which means to go quickly and create a void, as I might say, an almost Buddha. It would be completely a Buddha if precisely it was not there; but since it is there, and under this multiplied form, which has demanded, as you see, a lot of trouble, this is only the image of the trouble that he for his part takes to be there. He is there for you. He is a Buddha who has not yet succeeded in disinteresting himself, no doubt because of one of these obstacles to which I alluded earlier, to disinterest himself in the salvation of humanity. That is the reason why, if you are Buddhists, you prostrate yourself before this sumptuous gathering. It is because in effect you owe, I think, recognition to the unity which has troubled itself in such a great number to remain within range of bringing you help. For there is also said - the iconography enumerates it - the cases in which they will bring you help.

The bodhisattva in question is called in Sanscrit - you have already heard tell of him, I hope; his name is widely known, especially in our own day; all of this turns around this sphere vaguely called the element for anyone who does yoga - the bodhisattva in question here is Avalokitesvara.

The first image, the one of the statue that I passed around among you, is a historical avatar of this Avalokitesvara. I thus took (16) the right path before becoming interested in Japanese. Fate decreed that I should have elucidated with my good master Demieville, in the years when psychoanalysis allowed me more leisure, this book, this book which is called The lotus and the true law which was written in Chinese to translate a Sanscrit text by Kumarajiva. This text is more or less the historical turning point at which there appears the avatar, the singular metamorphosis that I am going to ask you to remember, namely that this bodhisattva, Avalokitesvara, the one who hears the tears of the world, is transformed from the time of Kumarajiva, who seems to be a little responsible for it, is transformed into a female divinity. This female divinity with whom I think you are also ever so little in accord with, in harmony with, is called Kuan-yin or again Kuan-shih-yin, this is also the meaning that Avalokitesvara has: it is the one who considers, who goes, who is in agreement. That is Kuan; this is the word I spoke to you about earlier and that is her wailing or her tears. Kuan-shih-yin - the "shih" can sometimes be effaced - the Kuan-yin is a female divinity. In China there is no ambiguity: the Kuan-yin always appears in a female form and it is at this transformation and on this transformation that I would ask you to dwell for a moment. In Japan these same words are written Kannon or Kann-ze-non, according to whether one inserts there or not the character of the world. Not all the forms of Kannon are feminine. I would even say that the majority of them are not. And because you have before your eyes the image of the statues of this temple, the same sanctity, divinity - a term which is to be left in suspense here - which is represented in this multiple form, you can see that the characters are provided with little moustaches and with tiny outlines of beards. Here therefore they are in a masculine form, which corresponds in effect to the canonical structure these statues represent, the number of arms and of heads involved.

But it is exactly the same being that is involved as in the first statue whose representations I circulated among you. It is even this form which is specified, can be seen as "Nio-i-Yin", Kannon or Kann-ze-non. "Nio-i-yin" in this case, which is therefore to be remembered here - there is a character which is going to be a little stifled, but after all not too much so - "Nio-i-yin" means "like the wheel of desires". It is exactly the meaning that its correspondent in Sanscrit has.

Here then is what we find ourselves confronted with: what is (17) involved is rediscovering in the most well-attested fashion the assimilation of pre-Buddhic divinities into the different stages of this hierarchy which thenceforth is articulated as the levels, the stages, the forms of access to the final realisation of beauty, namely to the final understanding of the radically illusory character of all desire.

Nevertheless within what one might call this multiplicity converging towards a centre, which is in essence a centre of nowhere, you see here reappearing, reemerging, I would say almost in the most incarnated fashion, what can be described as most living, most real, most animated, most human, most pathetic in a first relationship to the divine world, for its part essentially nourished and as it were punctuated by all the variations of desire, that [in] which the divinity, as one might say, or the Holiness with a capital H, which is almost the most central for acceding to beauty, is incarnated in the shape of the female divinity which has gone so far as to be identified at the origin with neither more nor less than the re-appearance of the Indian Shakti, namely something which is identical to the female principle of the world, the soul of the world; this is something which ought to make us pause for a moment.

In a word, I do not know whether this statue, the photographs of which I brought you, has succeeded in establishing for you this vibration, this communication in whose presence I assure you one can be sensitive, one can be sensitive not simply because as chance would have it accompanied by my guide, who is one of those Japanese for whom neither Maupassant nor Merimee have any secrets, nor indeed anything else in our literature - I will pass over Valéry because people talk about nothing else but Valéry all over the world, the success of this Mallarmé of the nouveaux riches is one of the most troubling things that one can meet with in our time; therefore let us recover our serenity - I enter the little hall where this statue is and I find there on his knees a man of thirty to thirty-five years old, a sort of very low-grade employee, perhaps a craftsman, already really very worn out by existence. He was on his knees before this statue and obviously he was praying. This after all is not something that we would be tempted to participate in. But after having prayed, he came very close to the statue - because there is nothing to prevent it being touched on the right, on the left and underneath - he looked at it in this way for a time that I could not measure, I did not really see the end of it, it was superimposed itself on the time of my own look. It was obviously an overflowing look (18) whose character was all the more extraordinary because it was a matter there, not I would say of an ordinary man - because a man who behaves in this way could not be such - but of someone that nothing seemed to predestine, if only because of the evident burden that he was carrying on this shoulders from his work, for this sort of artistic communion.

The other volet of this apprehension I am going to give you in another form. You have seen the statue, its face, this expression which is absolutely astonishing because of the fact that it is impossible to read in it whether it is completely for you or completely inward looking. I did not know then that it was a Nio-i-yin, Kan-ze-non but I had heard tell for a long time of the Kuan-yin. I asked in connection with this statue and in connection with others also, "Is it a man or a woman?" I will skip over the debates, the detours of what happened around this question which is full of meaning, I repeat, in Japan, given that the Kannon are not all in a univocal fashion in a female form. And it is there that I can say that what I collected is a little bit like a survey at the level of the Kinsey Report, the fact is that I acquired the certainty that, for this cultured young man, familiar with Merimee and Maupassant and for a great number of his friends whom I questioned, the question before a statue of this kind, as to whether it is male or female, never arose for them.

I think there is here a highly important fact for tackling what we could call the variety of solutions with respect to the problem of the object, of an object which I think I have sufficiently shown you, by everything that I have just told you about my first approach to this object, the degree to which it is an object for desire. Because if you still need other details, you can notice that there is no opening of the eyes in this statue. Now the Buddhist statues always have an eye which one cannot describe as being either closed or half-closed - it is a position of the eye which can only be acquired by learning: it is a lowered lid which only allows to pass through a line of the white of the eye and an edge of the pupil - all the statues of Buddha are realised in this way. You have been able to see that this statue has nothing of this kind: it has simply, at the level of the eye, a kind of sharp ridge which means moreover that with the reflection of the wood, it always seems that there is an eye operating above, but nothing in the wood corresponds to it. I assure you that I carefully examined the wood, I informed myself, and the solution that I was given, without being able myself to settle how much faith should be accorded it, it was given to me by someone who is very specialised, very serious, Professor Hando to give him his name, the fact is that this split of the eye on this statue disappeared in the course of the centuries because of the rubbing it undergoes I think more or less daily at the hands of the nuns of the convent, of which it is the most precious treasure, when they want to wipe away the tears from this figure par excellence of divine recourse. Besides, the whole statue is treated in the same fashion as this edge of the eye by the hands of the religious, and represents in its polish this unbelievable something of which the photo here can only give you a vague reflection of what is the inverted radiation onto it of what one cannot fail to recognise as something like a long desire borne throughout the centuries by these recluses towards this divinity of psychologically indeterminable sex.

I think that this - the time today has advanced far enough for me not to take my discourse here any further - will allow us to illuminate this passage to which we have now come.

There is at the oral stage a certain relationship between demand and the veiled desire of the mother; there is at the anal stage, the coming into play for desire of the demand of the mother; there is at the stage of phallic castration, the "minus-phallus" the entry of negativity with respect to the instrument of desire at the moment of the arousal of sexual desire as such in the field of the other. But the limit at which we ought to rediscover the structure of o as separated does not stop for us here at these three stages. It is not for nothing that today I spoke to you about a mirror, not about the mirror of the mirror stage, of narcissistic experience, of the image of the body as a whole, but of the mirror in so far as it is this field of the Other where there must appear for the first time, if not the o, at least its place, in short the radical mainspring which causes the passage from the level of castration to the mirage of the object of desire.

What is the function of castration in this strange fact that the most moving type of object, because it is at once our image and something else, can appear at this level in a certain context, in a certain culture as being unrelated to sex, here is the fact, which I believe to be characteristic, to which I intended leading you today.

Seminar 18: Wednesday 15 May 1963

If we begin from the function of the object in Freudian theory, the oral object, the anal object, the phallic object - you know that I question whether the genital object is homogeneous with the series - everything that I already initiated, as much in my past teaching as more especially in that of last year, indicates to you that this object defined in its function by its place as o, the remainder of the dialectic between the subject and the Other, that the list of these objects ought to be completed. It is quite sure that we have to define the object o, functioning as a remainder of this dialectic, in the field of desire at other levels about which I have already indicated enough for you to sense, if you wish, that in general it is some cut happening in the field of the eye, of which the desire attached to the image is a function. Another thing, beyond what we know already and where we rediscover this character of fundamental certainty already located by traditional philosophy and articulated by Kant in the shape of consciousness, the fact is that this method of approach in the shape of o will allow us to situate in its place what up to now has appeared as enigmatic in the shape of a certain imperative described as categorical.

The path along which we are proceeding, which revivifies this whole dialectic by our very approach, namely desire, this path along which we are proceeding this year, which is anxiety, I chose because it is the only one which allows us to produce, to introduce a new clarity as regards the function of the object with respect to desire.

How - this is what my last lecture was intended to presentify before you - how was a whole field of human experience, an experience which puts itself forward as that of a form, of a sort of salvation, the Buddhist experience, able to posit at its origin that desire is illusion? What does that mean? It is easy to smile at the rapidity of the assertion that everything is nothing. Moreover, as I told you, this is not what is involved in Buddhism.

But if for our experience also this assertion that desire is only illusion can have a sense, it is a matter of knowing where the sense can be introduced and in a word where the lure is.

I teach you to locate desire, to link it to the function of the cut, to put it in a certain relation with the function of the remainder. This remainder is what sustains it, what animates it (2) and it is what we learn to locate in the analytic function of the partial object.

Nevertheless the lack to which satisfaction is linked is a different thing. This distance between the locus of the lack in its relationship to desire as structured by the phantasy, by the vacillation of the subject in his relationship to the partial object, this non-coincidence between the lack that is involved and the function of desire, as I might say, in act, is what creates anxiety, and anxiety alone finds itself aiming at the truth of this lack. This is why at every level, at every stage of the structuring of desire, if we wish to understand what is involved in this function of desire, we ought to locate what I will call the anxiety point (le point d'angoisse).

This is going to make us retrace our steps a little, and in a movement determined by all our experience, because everything happens as if, having come with Freud's experience face to face with an impasse, an impasse which I put forward as being only apparent and up to now never broken through, that of the castration complex, everything happens as if this obstacle which has to be explained - which perhaps will allow us today to conclude on some affirmation regarding what is meant by Freud's being brought to a halt on the castration complex - and for the moment let us remember its consequences in analytic theory: something like a reflux, like a return which leads the theory to search in the final resort for the most radical functioning of the drive at the oral level.

It is a singular fact that in analysis, a glimpse which initially was that of the nodal function of what is properly sexual in the whole formation of desire, has been led more and more in the course of its historical evolution to search for the origin of all the accidents, of all the anomalies, of all the gaps which can be produced at the level of the structuring of desire in something which is not fully explained by saying that it is chronologically original, the oral drive, but which must still be justified as structurally original, it is to it that when all is said and done, we ought to bring back the origin and the aetiology of all the difficulties that we have to deal with.

Moreover I have already tackled what, I believe, ought to reopen for us the question of this reduction to the oral drive, in showing the way it currently functions, namely as a metaphorical mode of tackling what is happening at the level of the phallic object, a metaphor which allows there to be eluded the impasse created by the fact, which was never resolved by Freud in the (3) final term, of what the functioning of the castration complex is, which veils it in a way, which allows it to be spoken of without encountering the impasse.

But if the metaphor is correct, we ought, at its very level, to see the beginnings of what is involved, of what explains why it is here only a metaphor. And that is why it is at the level of this oral drive that once already I tried to take up the relative function of the cut of the object, of the locus of satisfaction and of anxiety, to take the step which is now proposed to us, the one that I led you to the last time, namely the point of junction between the o functioning as $(-<P)$, namely the castration complex and this level that we will call visual or spatial, according to the aspect we are going to envisage it under, which is properly speaking the one where we can best see what the lure of desire means. In order to make this passage, which is our goal today, work, we ought for a moment make a backwards reference, return to the analysis of the oral drive, to ask ourselves, to specify clearly where at this level the function of the cut is. The nursing and the breast, it is around these that there have come to be confronted for us all the clouds of analytic theatre, the origin of the first aggressive drives, their reflection, indeed their retortion, the source of the most fundamental handicaps in the libidinal development of the subject. Let us therefore take up this thematic which - it ought not to be forgotten - is founded on an original act, essential for the biological subsistence of the subject in the order of mammals, that of sucking.

What is it about, what is it that functions in sucking? Apparently the lips, the lips in which we rediscover the functioning of what has appeared to us as essential in the structure of erotogeneity, the function of an edge.

That the lip presents the appearance of something which is, in a way the very image of the edge, of the cut, this is in effect something that ought to indicate to us, after I tried to picture, to define o for you last year in the topology, here is something which ought to make us sense that we are on solid ground.

Moreover it is clear that the lip, itself the incarnation, as one might say of a cut, that the lip in a singular way evokes what (4) exists at a quite different level, at the level of signifying articulation, at the level of the most fundamental phonemes, those most linked to the cut, the consonantal elements of the phoneme, the suspension of a cut, being for their most basic stock essentially modulated at the level of the lips.

I will return perhaps, if we have the time, to what I already indicated on several occasions about the question of fundamental words and their apparent specificity, "mama" and "papa". These are in any case labial articulations, even if something may put in doubt their apparently specific, apparently general, if not universal distribution.

That the lip, on the other hand, should be the place where symbolically, there can be grasped in the form of a ritual, the function of the cut, that the lip should be something which can be at the level of initiation rites, pierced, spread out, triturated in a thousand different ways, is also something which provides us with a reference that we are indeed in a living field and one recognised for a long time in human practices.

Is that all? There is behind the lip what Homer called the enclosure of the teeth and of the bite. It is around this that what we bring into play, in the way that with the dialectic of the oral drive we brandish its aggressive thematic, the phantastical isolation of the extremity of the breast, of the nipple, this virtual bite implied by the existence of what is called a lacteal dentition, here is the thing around which we have to make revolve the possibility of the phantasy of the extremity of the breast as isolated, something which already presents itself as an object that is not simply partial but sectioned. It is through this that there are introduced into the first phantasies which allow me to conceive of the function of fragmentation as inaugural, this is in truth what we have been content with up to this.

Does that mean that we can maintain this position? As you know, since I already emphasised in a seminar which was, if I remember rightly, the one that I gave on 6 March, how the whole dialectic of what is called weaning, of separation ought to be taken up again in function even of what our experience has allowed us to enlarge, has appeared to us as its resonances, as its natural reverberations, namely weaning and the primordial separation, namely that of birth. And that of birth, if we look at it closely, if we put a bit more physiology into it, is something (5) well designed to illuminate things for us.

The cut, as I told you, is somewhere other than where we put it. It is not conditioned by aggression towards the maternal body. The cut, as analysis teaches us, if we hold - and quite correctly so - if we have recognised in our experience that there is an analogy between oral weaning and the weaning of birth, the cut is inside the individual, primordial unity as it is presented at the level of birth, where the cut is made between what is going to become the individual thrown into the outside world and these envelopes which form part of himself, which are qua elements of the egg homogeneous with what has been produced in ovular development, which are the direct prolongation of his ectoderm, as of his endoderm, which form part of himself, the separation is made inside the unit of the egg.

Now the emphasis that I intend to put here, depends on the specificity in the organismic structure of what is called the mammal organisation. That which, for almost the totality of mammals, specifies the development of the egg, is the existence of the placenta and even of a very special type of placenta, the one that is called chorio-allantoidian, the one by means of which for a whole phase of its development the egg in its intra-uterine position presents itself in a semi-parasitic relationship to the organism of the mother.

There is something suggestive, indicative for us in the study of the totality of this mammal organisation. At a certain level of the appearance of this organismic structure, specifically that of two orders, as one might say, that are called the most primitive of the class of mammals, the one specifically of the monotremes and the marsupials. We have the notion in the case of the marsupials of the existence of a different type of placenta, which is not chorio-allantoid, but chorio-vitellin. We will not dwell on this nuance; but in the monotremes - I think that since childhood you have at least an image of them in the shape of these animals which in the Petit Larousse swarm in troops, as if they were pressing at the door of a new Noah's Ark, namely that there are two, and sometimes only one of them per species; you have the ornithorhynchus and also the image of what is called the echinoidea type. They are mammals. They are mammals in whom (6) the egg, even though placed in the uterus, has no placental relationship with the maternal organism. The mammary nevertheless already exists, the mammary in its essential relationship as defining the relationship of the offspring to the mother, the mammary already exists at the level of the monotremes, of the ornithorhynchus and allows there to be seen better at this level what its original function is. To clarify immediately what I intend to say here, I would say that the mammary presents itself as something intermediary, and that it is necessary for us to conceive that the cut lies between the mammary and the maternal organism. Even before the placenta shows us that the nourishing relationship at a certain level of the living organism is prolonged beyond the function of the egg which, charged with all the baggage which allows its development, will make the infant rejoin his begetters in a common experience of seeking for food, we have this function of the relationship that I have called parasitic, this ambiguous function where there intervenes this amboceptor organ; the relationship of the child in other words to the mammary, is homologous - and what allows us to say it, is that it is more primitive than the appearance of the placenta - is homologous with something which means that there is on one side the child and the mammary and that the mammary is in a certain way stuck onto, implanted on the mother; it is this which allows the mammary to function structurally at the level of o.

It is because the o is something from which the child is separated in a fashion that is in a way internal to the sphere of his own existence, that it is well and truly the small o.

You are going to see what results as a consequence of this: the link of the oral drive is made to this amboceptor object. What constitutes the object of the oral drive is what we usually call the partial object, the mother's breast. Where at this level is what I earlier called the anxiety point? It is precisely beyond this sphere. For the anxiety point is at the level of the mother. The anxiety of the lack of the mother in the child, is the anxiety about the drying up of the breast. The anxiety point is not confused with the locus of the relation to the object of desire.

The thing is imaged in a singular way by these animals that in a quite unexpected way I brought out here effectively in the shape of these representatives of the order of monotremes. Everything happens as if this image of biological organisation had been fabricated by some farseeing creator in order to manifest for us the true relationship which exists at the level of the oral drive (7) with this privileged object which the mammary is. For, whether you know it or not, the small ornithorhynchus, after its birth, spends a some time outside the cloaca in a place situated on the stomach of the mother called the incubatorium. It is still at that time in its envelopes, which are the envelopes of a sort of hard egg from which it emerges, from which it emerges with the help of a tooth called a hatching tooth reduplicated, because one must be precise, with something which is situated at the level of the upper lip and which is called the caronculus.

These organs are not special to it. They exist already before the appearance of mammals; these organs which allow a foetus to emerge from the egg exist already at the level of the snake where they are specialised, snakes only having, if I remember rightly, the hatching tooth while the other varieties of reptiles more exactly - they are not snakes - namely tortoises and crocodiles have only the caronculus.

The important thing is the following: it seems that the mammary, the mammary of the mother of the ornithorhynchus, needs the stimulation of this little armoured point that the muzzle of the little ornithorhynchus presents, to unleash, as one might say, its organisation and its function and that it seems that for a week or so it is necessary for this little ornithorhynchus to work at the unleashing of that which appears indeed much more dependent on his presence, on his activity than on something which belongs as a matter of fact to the organism of the mother, for that matter besides, it gives us curiously the image of a relationship in a way the inverse of the one of the mammary protuberance, because these mammaries of the ornithorhynchus are mammaries of a hollow kind into which the beak of the baby is inserted. Here more or less is the place where the glandular elements, the milk-producing lobules exist. It is here that this snout which is already armoured, which has not yet hardened in the form of a beak as it will later become, that this snout comes to lodge itself.

The existence, therefore, of the distinction between two original points in the mammal organisation, the relationship to the mammary as such will remain structuring for the subsistence, the support of the relationship to desire, for the maintenance of the mammary specifically as an object which will subsequently become the phantastical object, and on the other hand the situation moreover in the Other, at the level of the mother and in a way not coinciding, displaced, of the anxiety point as being that by which the subject has a relationship with what is involved, with his lack, with what he is suspended on, the existence of the (8) mother's organism, is what we may be allowed to structure in a more articulated fashion by this simple consideration of a physiology which shows us that the o is an object separated from the child's organism, that the relationship to the mother is at this level no doubt an essential relationship which is isolated with respect to this organismic totality where the o is separated, and is moreover miscognised as such as having isolated itself from this organism, this relationship to the mother, the relationship of lack is situated beyond the locus where there has been played out the distinction of the partial object as functioning in the relationship of desire.

Of course the relationship is still more complex and the existence in the function of sucking on the side of the lips, the existence of this enigmatic organ which has long been noted as such - remember Aesop's fable - which is the tongue, also allows us to bring into play at this level the something which in the underpinnings of our analysis is there to nourish the homology with the phallic function and its singular asymmetry, one to which we will return in a moment, namely that the tongue plays in sucking this essential role of functioning through what one can call aspiration, supports a void, whose power of appeal is essentially what allows the function to be effective, and on the other hand to be this something which can give us the image of the most intimate emergence, of this secret of sucking, to give us in a first form this something which will remain - I have marked it out for you - in the state of phantasy, at bottom everything that we can articulate around the phallic function, namely the turning inside-out of a glove, the possibility of an eversion of what is at the most profound point of the secret of the interior.

That the anxiety point is beyond the locus where there operates the function, the locus where the phantasy is fixed in its essential relationship to the partial object, this is what appears in this prolongation of the phantasy which is an image that always remains more or less as an underlay to the credence we put in a certain mode of oral relationship, the one which is expressed in the image of a function described as vampirism.

It is true that if in one or other mode of his relationship to the mother the child is a little vampire, if he poses himself as an organism suspended for a time in the parasitic position, it nevertheless remains that he is not this vampire either, namely that at no moment is it with his teeth, or at source that he is going to search in the mother for the hot and living source of his food.

(9) Nevertheless the image of the vampire, however mythical it may be, is there to reveal to us, by the aura of anxiety that surrounds it, the truth of this relationship beyond, which is profiled in the relationship of the message, the one which gives it its most profound accent, the one which adds the dimension of the possibility of the realised lack beyond what anxiety conceals in terms of virtual fears - the drying up of the breast. What puts in question the function of the mother as such, is a relationship which is distinguished, in so far as it is profiled in the image of vampirism, is distinguished as an anxiety-provoking relationship. A distinction therefore, I underline it well, between the reality of organismic functioning and what is outlined of it beyond, this is what is going to allow us to distinguish the anxiety point from the point of desire. Which shows us that at the level of the oral drive the anxiety point is at the level of the Other, that it is there that we experience it.

Freud tells us: "Anatomy is destiny". As you know, I have rebelled at certain moments against this formula because of its incompleteness. It becomes true, as you see, if we give to the term "anatomy" its strict and, I might say, etymological sense, the one which highlights - ana-tomy - the function of the cut, which means that everything that we know about anatomy is linked to vivisection. And in so far as there is conceivable this fragmentation, this cutting of one's own body, which there is the locus of elective moments of functioning, it is in so far as destiny, namely the relationship of man to this function which is called desire, takes on all its animation.

The fundamental "separation", not separation, but partition within, this is what is found at the origin and from the level from the oral drive on, inscribed in what will be the structuring of desire. Hence the astonishment at the fact that we have gone to this level to find some more accessible image for what has always remained for us - and why? - a paradox up to now, namely that in phallic functioning, in the one linked to copulation, it is also the image of a cut, of a separation, of what we improperly call castration, because it is an image of gelding that functions. It is no doubt not by chance, nor no doubt in a misguided way, that we went searching in older phantasies for the justification of what we did not know very well how to justify at the level of the phallic phase, it must nevertheless be noted that at this level something has been produced which is going to (10) allow us to find our bearings in the whole subsequent dialectic.

How in effect, as I have just announced it to you, how in effect has there occurred the division, that I have taught you to distinguish at the topological level, between desire, between its function, and anxiety? The anxiety point is at the level of the Other, at the level of the body of the mother. The functioning of desire, namely of phantasy, of the vacillation which closely unites the subject to o, that through which the subject finds himself essentially suspended, identified with this always elided, always hidden o, that we have to detect underpinning every relationship of the subject to any object whatsoever. You see it here, and to call arbitrarily here S the level of the subject, that which in my schema, if you wish, my schema of the vase reflected in the mirror of the Other, is found on the hither side of the mirror, here is where at the level of the oral drive the relationships are found.

The cut, as I told you, is inside the field of the subject; desire functions - we rediscover here the Freudian notion of autoerotism - inside a world which, even though fragmented, bears the trace of its first enclosure within what remains imaginary, virtual, the envelope of the egg.

What is going to happen to it at the level that the castration complex is produced? At this level we witness a veritable reversal of the point of desire and the locus of anxiety. If something is promoted by the no doubt still imperfect style, but one charged with all the relief of a painful conquest, made step by step, and this since the origin of the Freudian discovery, which revealed it in the structure, it is the close relationship between castration, between the relation to the object in the phallic relationship, as an implicit container of the privation of the organ.

If there were no Other - and it does not matter whether we should call this Other here the castrating mother or the father of the original prohibition - there would be no castration.

The essential relationship henceforth between castration and all copulatory functioning has already urged us to try - after all, following the indication of Freud himself who indeed told us, without justifying it in any way, that at this level it is some biological rock that we are touching - has thus stimulated us to (11) articulate as lying in a particularity of the function of the copulatory organ at a certain biological level - I pointed out to you at other levels, in other orders, in other animal branches, the copulatory organ is a hook, it is an organ of fixation, and can be called the male organ in the most summarily analogical fashion - it sufficiently indicates to us that it is important to distinguish the particular functioning, at the level of the organisations of what are called superior animals, of this copulatory organ; it is essential not to confuse its avatars, specifically the mechanism of tumescence and of detumescence, with something that is, in itself, essential for orgasm.

Without any doubt we find ourselves here, as I might say, in what could be called an imitation of experience. We are not going, as I have already told you, to try to conceive of what orgasm may be in a copulatory relationship that is differently structured. Besides there are enough impressive natural spectacles; it is enough for you to take a stroll some evening on the edge of a pond to see two dragonflies flying closely intertwined and this spectacle alone says enough about what we can conceive of as being a "long-orgasm" if you will allow me to construct a word, by inserting a hyphen. And moreover it is not for nothing that I evoked here the phantastical image of the vampire which is not at all dreamt of or conceived of by human imagination otherwise than as this mode of fusion or of primary subtraction at the very source of life, where the aggressor subject can find the source of his jouissance. Undoubtedly the very existence of the mechanism of detumescence in the copulation of organisms most analogous to the human organism, is already sufficient by itself to mark the link between orgasm and something which well and truly presents itself as the first image, outline, of what can be called the cut, separation, weakening, aphanisis, disappearance at a certain moment of the function of the organ.

But then, if we take things from this angle, we will recognise that the homologue of the anxiety point in this case is found in a strictly inverted position to the one where it was found at the level of the oral drive; the homologue of the anxiety point is the orgasm itself as a subjective experience. And this is what allows us to justify what clinical experience shows us very frequently, the sort of fundamental equivalence there is between orgasm and at least certain forms of anxiety. The possibility of (12) the production of an orgasm at the high point of an anxiety-provoking situation, the eroticisation, we are told from every side, the eventual eroticisation of an anxiety-provoking situation sought for as such, and inversely a mode of clarifying, which means that if we believe the universally renewed human testimony - it is worth the trouble after all to note that someone and someone of Freud's level dares to write it - the attestation of this fact that there is nothing which when all is said and done, which represents, when all is said and done, for the human being a greater satisfaction than orgasm itself, a satisfaction which undoubtedly goes beyond, because it can be articulated in this way, as being not simply put in the balance, but to be given the function of primacy and precedence with respect to anything that man is given to experience. If the function of the orgasm can reach this eminence, is it not because at the basis of the realised orgasm there is something that I called the certainty linked to anxiety, is it not in the measure that the orgasm is the very realisation of what anxiety indicates as a point of reference, as a direction of the locus of certainty, that the orgasm, among all anxieties, is the only one which is really completed. Moreover, it is indeed for this reason that orgasm is not such a common attainment and that, if we may be permitted to indicate its eventual function in the sex in which there is precisely no phallic reality except in the form of a shadow, it is also in this very sex that orgasm remains for us most enigmatic, most shut off, and perhaps up to now never authentically situated in its final essence.

What is indicated to us by this parallel, this symmetry, this reversion established in the relationship between the anxiety point and the point of desire, if not that in neither of the two cases do they coincide. And it is here, no doubt, that we ought to see the source of the enigma that is bequeathed to us by Freudian experience.

In the whole measure that the situation of desire virtually implied in our experience, whose entire texture as I might say is not nevertheless truly articulated in Freud, the end of analysis comes up against something which makes the sign implied in the phallic relationship take on its form: the ($\langle p \rangle$) in so far as it functions structurally as ($-\epsilon \rangle$) which makes it take on this form while being the essential correlate of satisfaction.

If at the end of Freudian analysis the patient whoever he may be, (13) male or female, lays claim to the phallus that we owe him, it is in function of this insufficiency through which the relationship of desire to the object which is fundamental, is not distinguished at every level from what is involved as a lack constitutive of satisfaction.

Desire is illusory. Why? Because it is always addressed elsewhere, to a remainder, to a remainder constituted by the relationship of the subject to the Other who comes to substitute himself there.

But this leaves open the locus where there can be found what we designate under the name of certainty. No fixed phallus, no omnipotent phallus is capable of closing the dialectic of the relationship of the subject to the Other and to the real by anything whatsoever that is of a pacifying order. Does that mean that if we touch here the structuring function of the lure, we ought to remain there, to admit that our impotence, our limit is the point where the distinction between finite and indefinite analysis is broken? I do not believe it is anything of the kind. And it is here that there intervenes what is concealed in the most secret core of what I put forward a long time ago before you in the form of the mirror stage, and which obliges us to try to order in the same relationship, desire, object and anxiety point, what is involved when there intervenes this new object o for which the last lecture was the introduction, the bringing into play, namely the eye.

Of course, this partial object is not new in analysis, and I will here only have to evoke the article of the most classic author, the one most universally accepted in analysis, namely Mr Fenichel, on the subject of the relationships of the scopophilic function to identification, and even the homologues that he is going to discover between the relationships of this function and the oral relationship.

Nevertheless everything that has been said on this subject can justly appear insufficient. The eye is not an affair which only refers us to the origin just of mammals or even of vertebrates or even of chordata; the eye appears in the animal scale in an extraordinarily differentiated fashion - and in its whole anatomical appearance essentially similar to the one that we have - at the level of organisms which have nothing in common with us.

There is no need - I already repeated it on several occasions, and the images that I tried to make functional - to recall that the eye exists at the level of the praying mantis, but also at the level, what is more at the level of the octopus. I mean the eye with this particularity about which we ought to introduce (14) from the beginning this remark: it is always a double organ, and an organ which in general functions in a dependency on a chiasma, namely that it is linked to the intersecting knot which links two parts of the body that we call "symmetrical".

The relationship of the eye to a more or less apparent symmetry - for no organism is entirely symmetrical - is something that ought to be taken into account by us in the highest degree. If there is something that my reflections of the last time, if you remember them, namely the radical function of the mirage which is included from the first functioning of the eye, this fact that the eye is already mirror and already implies in a way in its structure, the transcendental aesthetic foundation as one might say of a constituted space is something that must yield its place to this: the fact is that, when we speak about this transcendental structure of space as an irreducible given of aesthetic apprehension of a certain field of the world, this structure only excludes one thing: that of the function of the eye itself, of what it is.

It is a matter of finding the traces of this excluded function which is already sufficiently indicated for us as a homologue of the function of o in the phenomenology of vision itself. Here we can only proceed by punctuation, indication, remark.

Undoubtedly for a long time all of those, specifically the mystics, who have attached themselves to what I could call the realism of desire, for whom every attempt to reach the essential is indicated as overcoming this glue-like stickiness that there is in an appearance which is always conceived of as visual appearance, these already put us on the path of something which moreover all sorts of natural phenomena bear witness to, namely the fact that, outside such a register, there remains enigmatic, namely, I am saying, what are called mimetic appearances which manifest themselves in the animal scale exactly at the same level, at the same point that the eye appears. At the level of insects where we might be astonished - why not - that a pair of eyes should be a pair constructed like our own, at the same level there appears this existence of a double stain which the physiologists, whether they are evolutionists or not, torment themselves about by asking what is it that can condition something whose functioning in any case is that of exercising a fascination on the other whether it is a predator or not.

The linking of the pair of eyes and, if you wish, the look, to an (15) element of fascination that is enigmatic in itself, to this intermediary point at which every subjective subsistence seems to be lost and to be absorbed, to go out of the world, this indeed is what is called fascination in the function of the look. Here is, if I may say, the point of radiation which allows us to put in question what the field of vision reveals to us in the function of desire. Moreover it is striking that in the attempt to apprehend, to reason, to logicize the mystery of the eye, and this at the level of all those who have attached themselves to this form of major capture of human desire, the phantasy of the third eye is everywhere manifest. I do not need to tell you, that on the images of the Buddha which I gave an account of the last time, the third eye in some manner is always indicated. Do I need to remind you that this third eye which is promulgated, promoted, articulated in the most ancient magico-religious tradition, that this third eye rebounds up to the level of Descartes who, a curious thing, only finds its substratum in a regressive, rudimentary organ that of the epiphysis, of which one can say perhaps that at a point of the animal scale something appears, is realised, which will carry the trace of an ancient emergence. But this after all is only a reverie. We have no testimony, fossil or otherwise, of the existence of the emergence of this apparatus described as a third eye.

In this method of approaching the function of the partial object which is the eye, in this new field of its relationship to desire, what appears as correlative of the small o function of the object of the phantasy, is something that we can call a zero point whose influence over the whole field of vision is what gives to this field, a source for us of a sort of pacification expressed for a long time, from earliest times, in the term contemplation, of suspension from the tearing apart of desire, a fragile suspension certainly, as fragile as a curtain always ready to be pulled back to unmask the mystery that it hides. This zero point towards which the image of the Buddha seems to carry us in the very measure that his lowered eyelids protect us from the fascination of the look while at the same time indicating to us this figure which in the visible is always turned towards the invisible, but who spares us it, this figure in a word takes entire charge of the point of anxiety here, it is not for nothing that it suspends, that it apparently cancels out the mystery of castration.

(16) This is what I wanted to indicate to you the last time by my remarks and the little survey that I had made about the apparent psychological ambiguity of these figures. Does that mean that there is in any way the possibility of entrusting oneself, of assuring oneself, in a sort of field which has been called Apollinian, you can see it also as noetic, contemplative, where desire could be supported by a sort of punctual cancellation from its central point, by an identification of o with this zero point between the two eyes which is the only locus of unease which remains, in our relationship to the world, when this world is a spatial world? Undoubtedly not, because precisely there remains this zero point which prevents us from finding in the formula of desire-illusion the final term of experience.

Here the point of desire and the anxiety point coincide, but they are not confused, they even leave open to us this "nevertheless" on which there eternally rebounds the dialectic of our apprehension of the world. And we always see it reemerging in our patients, and nevertheless - I looked to see how one says "nevertheless" in Hebrew, that will amuse you - and nevertheless this desire which here is resumed in the nullification of its central object, is not without this other object that summons anxiety: it is not without object. It is not for nothing that in this "not without, pas sans" I gave you the formula, the essential articulation of the identification to desire. It is beyond "it is not without an object" that there is posed for us the question of knowing where the impasse of the castration complex can be gone beyond. This is what we will tackle the next time.

Seminar 19: Wednesday 22 May 1963

Roughly speaking, to provide a summary orientation for someone who might arrive by chance in the middle of this discourse, I would say, that to complete, as I announced to you, what could be called the range (gamme) of object relations seen in the schema which is being developed this year around the experience of anxiety, he might think that we were required to add to the oral object, the anal object, the phallic object, precisely in so far as each one is generator of and correlative to a type of anxiety, two other stages of the object, bringing to five then these objectal stages in the measure that they will allow us to find our bearings this year.

You have, I think, sufficiently understood that for our last two meetings I have been dealing with the eye stage, I will not for all that leave it today but rather find my bearings from there by making you pass on to the stage that must be tackled today, that of the ear.

Naturally, as I told you, my first word was "roughly" and I repeated "summarily" in the following sentence, it would be completely absurd to believe that this is what is involved except in a grossly esoteric and obscurantist fashion.

It is a matter at all of these levels of mapping out what the function of desire is and none of them can be separated from the repercussions that it has on all the others and from a more intimate solidarity, the one expressed in the foundation of the subject in the Other along the path of the signifier, with the completion of this function of mapping out in the advent of a remainder around which there turns the drama of desire, a drama which would remain opaque to us if anxiety were not there in order to allow us to reveal its meaning.

This often leads us, apparently, to what I might call erudite kinds of digressions, in which certain people may see some charm or other to be experienced or reproved in my teaching. Believe me that it is not without reticence that I advance into them, and that moreover the method according to which I proceed in the teaching that I give here will be studied - it is surely not for me to spell out here its rigour - the day when people will search, in the texts that may exist, be transmissible, be still understood of what I am giving you here, it will be seen that this method is not essentially distinguished from the object which is being tackled.

(2) Only I remind you that it arises from a necessity. The truth of psychoanalysis is only, at least in part, accessible to the experience of the psychoanalyst. The very principle of a public teaching starts from the idea that it is nevertheless communicable elsewhere. This having been posited, nothing is resolved, since the psychoanalytic experience itself must be oriented, otherwise it goes astray. It goes astray if it becomes partial, as we have not ceased from the beginning of this teaching to point out in different parts of the analytic movement, specifically in that which, far from being a deepening, a complement given to the indications of Freud's last doctrine in the exploration of the mainsprings and of the status of the ego, far from being a continuation of his indications and of this work, we have seen there being produced what is properly speaking a deviation, a reduction, a veritable aberration of the field of experience, no doubt determined also by something that we can call a certain opacity which occurred in the first field of analytic exploration, the one which for us characterises, which is characterised by the style of illumination, the sort of brilliance which remains attached to the first decades of the diffusion of Freudian teaching, to the form of the researches of this first generation one of whom I will make intervene today more quickly still, Theodore Reik I believe, and specifically among the numerous and immense technical and clinical works, one of these works quite incorrectly described as applied psychoanalysis, the ones that he produced on ritual.

We will see in it - what is involved here specifically is the article which appeared in Imago somewhere, I think I remember around the eighth year, I think more or less, I forgot to bring the text here today, which appeared in Imago around the eighth year - I believe, on something whose name you see here written in Hebrew letters - a study on the shofar of such verve, of such brilliance, of such fecundity, of which one can say that the style, the promises, the characteristics of the epoch in which it is inscribed, saw themselves suddenly extinguished, that nothing equivalent to what was produced at that period went on afterwards. And therefore it has to be asked, why this interruption itself.

שֹׁפָר
shofar

The fact is though that, if you wish, in this article you will see there being manifested, I would say, despite all the praise that I might give to its penetration, to its high signification, you will see there being manifested to the highest degree this source of confusion, this profound lack of grounding whose most (3) tangible and most manifest form is in what I would call the purely analogical use of the symbol. I believe that I must first of all clarify what this shofar is, unsure as I am that everybody here knows what it designates. If I bring forward this object today, for it is an object which is going to serve me as a pivot, as an example, to materialise, to substantiate before you what I mean about the function of o, the object precisely at this stage, the final one, which in its functioning will allow us to reveal the function of sustentation which links desire to anxiety in what is its final knot.

You will understand why, rather than immediately naming what this 0 in function is, at a level which goes beyond that of the occultation of anxiety in desire, since it is linked to a ritual object, rather than naming it immediately you will understand why 1 approach it by handling an object, a ritual object, this shofar, which is what? A horn, a horn into which one blows and which allows a sound to be heard, which, undoubtedly, I can only say to those here who have not heard it, to treat themselves at the ritual detour of Jewish feasts, the ones which follow the New Year, which is called Rosh ha-Shanah, which end on the day of the Great Pardon, the Yom Kippur, to treat themselves to an audition, in the synagogue, of the thrice repeated sound of the shofar.
 This horn, which in German is called the Widderhorn, is also called the ram's horn, Quren ha yobel, in his commentary, his explanation in the Hebrew text. It is not always a ram's horn;
 besides these examples of it which are reproduced in Reik's text, which are three particularly precious and celebrated Shofars belonging- if I remember rightly, to the synagogues of London and of Amsterdam respectively, present themselves as objects whose general outline, which is more or less like this, makes one think rather of what it is, for this is how it is classically. The Jewish authors, who have been interested in this object, and h;?.ve made a catalogue of the diverse shapes, note that there is a form of the shofar which is a sort of horn, which is made of the horn of a wild goat.

Naturally this object which undoubtedly has this appearance must much more probably- be the result of manufacture, of alteration, of reduction - who knows? It is an object of considerable length, bigger than the one that I am presenting for you there on the blackboard - the result therefore perhaps of the instrumentalisation of a goat's horn.

(4) Those then who have treated themselves, or who will treat themselves, to this experience will bear witness, I think, as is generally the case, to the character, to remain within limits which are not at all lyrical, to the profoundly moving, stirring character, to the arousal of an emotion whose resonances present themselves independently of the atmosphere of recollection, of faith, indeed of repentance in which it manifests itself, which resonates along the mysterious paths of properly auricular affect which cannot fail to touch to a really unusual, inhabitual degree all of those who come within range of hearing its sound.

Around the questioning which Reik carries on around the function of this shofar, one cannot fail to perceive - and this is what seems to me characteristic of the epoch to which this work belongs - to be struck at once by the relevance, by the subtlety, by the depth of the reflections with which this study teems. It is not simply strewn with them, really it produces them round about some centre or other of intuition, of flair. There is even the date that this appeared. No doubt we have since learnt perhaps by some resifting or other, also by the erosion of the method, the resonance of what is happening, of what emerges from these first blase works at the time - and I can bear witness to you of it - compared to everything that was produced in terms of erudite works, and believe me: you know that everything I bring here is nourished on my part by what are often in appearance enquiries carried to the very limits of the superfluous. Believe me: because of the difference in effect of this mode of interrogating the biblical texts, those in which the shofar is named as correlative to the major circumstances of the revelation given to Israel, one cannot fail to be struck that Reik, from a position which in principle, at the very least repudiates all traditional attachments, indeed places itself even in an almost radical and critical position, not to say one of scepticism, how much much more profoundly than all the apparently more respectful commentators, the ones more careful to preserve the essential of a message goes for his part, goes more directly to what appears essentially to be the truth of the historical advent in these biblical passages which I ceaselessly evoked, and reported by them.

I will return to this. But it is nonetheless also striking, if you consult these articles, to see the degree to which at the end, he gets himself - and undoubtedly for want of any of these (5) theoretical supports which allow a style of study to give itself its proper limits - into inextricable confusion. It is not enough for the shofar and the voice that it supports to be presented as an analogy of the phallic function - and in effect why not - but how and at what level is where the question begins, it is also there that he comes to a halt. It is not enough that such an intuitive, analogical handling of the symbol, leaves the interpreter, at a certain limit, stripped of all criteria for there not to appear at the same time the degree to which there is telescoped together, the degree to which there turns into a sort of mixture and confusion that is properly speaking unnameable, everything that Theodore Reik ends up with at the final term in his last chapter. To give you an idea of it, I will only indicate to you that these points, step by step and through the intermediary precisely of the ram's horn, of the indication which is given to us by this of what is quite obvious, of the underpinning, more exactly of the correlation, why not say for that matter of the conflict with a whole reality, with a whole social totemic structure in the midst of which the whole historical adventure of Israel is plunged. How, along what path, how does it happen that no barrier stops Reik in his analysis to prevent him at the end from identifying Yahwe with the golden calf? Moses coming down from Sinai, radiating with the sublimity of the love of the father, had already killed him, and the proof, he tells us, is what he becomes: this veritable enraged being who is going to destroy the golden calf and make the Hebrews eat it in a powdered form. In this, of course, you will recognise the dimension of the totemic meal. The strangest thing, is that since the requirements of the proof have to pass through the identification of Yahwe not with a calf, but with a bull,, the calf in question will therefore necessarily represent a son-divinity alongside a father-divinity. We were told about the calf only to confuse the issue, to leave us in ignorance of the fact that there was also a bull. So therefore, since Moses here is the son, murderer of the father, what Moses has destroyed in the calf through the sequence of all the displacements followed in a way that quite obviously makes us sense that we lack any reference points, any compass capable of orientating us, this is supposed to be therefore Moses' own ensign: everything is consumed in a sort of self-destruction. This is only indicated to you, I am only giving you here a certain number of points which show you the extremes at which a certain form of analysis can arrive by its excesses. We will have other examples in the (6) lectures which follow.

For our part, we are going to see what seems to us to deserve to be retained here, and for this reason to know, to know what we are searching for, this is what emerges from what I was introducing earlier as constituting the necessity of our research, namely not to abandon what in a certain text, which is none other, after all, than the foundational text of a society, my own, the one which is the reason why I am here in the position of giving you this teaching: the fact is that in the principle which determines the very necessity of a teaching, if there is in the first place the necessity of correctly situating psychoanalysis among the sciences, this can only happen by submitting its technique to the examination of what it really presupposes and accomplishes.

As regards this text, I indeed have the right to remember that I had to defend it and to impose it, even if those after all who allowed themselves to be drawn along by it saw in it perhaps nothing but empty words. This text appears to me to be fundamental; for what this technique presupposes and accomplishes in fact is our supporting point, the one around which we ought to make revolve the whole arrangement, even the structural one, of what we have to deploy.

If we overlook the fact that what is involved in our technique, is a handling, an interference, indeed at the limit a rectification of desire, but which leaves entirely open and in suspense the notion of desire itself and which necessitates its perpetual putting in question, we will undoubtedly, on the one hand wander about in the infinite network of the signifier or, going back to the beginning, relapse into the most ordinary paths of traditional psychology. What Reik discovers in the course of this study, which is also what he cannot draw any advantage from in his day, for want of knowing where to put the result of his discovery, is the following: he discovers through the analysis of biblical texts - I will not enumerate all of them for you - but those which are historical - I mean those which claim to refer to a revelatory event and are in The Book of Exodus in Chapter 19 and 20, respectively, verses 16 to 19 for Chapter 19, verse 18 for Chapter 20. It is said in this first reference that in this thundering dialogue carried on very enigmatically in a sort of tumult, a veritable storm of sounds between Moses and the Lord, there is mentioned the sound of the-shofar, an enigmatic fragment (7) of this verse also indicates that at that time it was severely prohibited, and not only for any man, but for any living being, to approach the circle surrounded by lightning and flashes, in which this dialogue is taking place. The people can go up when they hear the voice of the shofar.

A point that is so contradictory and enigmatic that in the translation the sense is weakened, and it is said that some can come up. As regards who, the affair remains obscure. The shofar is also expressly mentioned again after the description of the dialogue. It is the presence in everything that is perceived by the people who are supposed to be assembled around this major event, the sound of the shofar is mentioned again.

Reik's analysis which he cannot find anything to say to characterise, to justify, other than the following, which is that an analytic exploration consists in seeking the truth in details, undoubtedly this characteristic is neither false nor inexact, but we cannot fail to see that, if it is a sort of external criterion, that, if this is the assurance of a style, it is not for all that either something which carries in itself this critical element, that of discerning what detail ought to be retained.

Undoubtedly we have always known that this detail which guides us, is the very one which appears to escape even the intention of the author, appears to remain in a way opaque, shut off with respect to the intention of his preaching, but again it is not necessary to find among them a criterion, if not of hierarchy, at least of order, of precedence.

In any case, we cannot fail to sense - I am forced to go through the steps of his proof - that something correct is touched, as regards ordering, articulating, the fundamental original texts mentioning the function of the shofar, those which complete those of Exodus which I have just named for you which those of Samuel, the second book in Chapter VI, with those of the first book of Chronicles, Chapter XIII, the function of the shofar being mentioned every time it is a matter of refounding, of renewing in some new departure, whether it is periodic or whether it is historical, the alliance with God. The comparison of these texts with, in addition, other occasional uses of the instrument, at first those which are perpetuated in these feasts, annual feasts in so far as they themselves refer to the repetition, and the remembering properly speaking of the alliance, an exceptional occasion also, the function of the shofar in what is called the (8) ceremony of excommunication, the one under which, as you know, on 27 July 1656 Spinoza fell, was excluded from the Hebrew community according to the most complete forms, those which specifically involved, in addition to the formula of malediction pronounced by the high priest, the sounding of the shofar.

This shofar, through the illumination which is completed by bringing together different occasions when it is both signalled for us and effectively enters into operation, is well and truly - and nothing other, Reik tells us - than the voice of God, of Yahwe, I mean the voice of God himself.

This point, which does not appear from a quick reading to be something open to exploitation by us, takes on in a perspective which is the one precisely to which I am forming you here - for it is not the same thing to introduce some more or less well-marked criterion or for these criteria moreover in their novelty, with the efficacy they involve, to constitute what is called a formation, that is to say a reformation of the mind in its capacity for tackling things.

Undoubtedly for us, such a formula can delay us only in so far as it makes us perceive something which completes the relationship of the subject to the signifier in what from a certain first grasp one could call his [its?] passage a l'acte.

Of course, I have here at the extreme left of the audience someone who cannot fail to be interested by this reference, it is our friend Stein, and I can tell you on this occasion the satisfaction I experienced in seeing that his analysis of Totem and Taboo, and of what can be retained for us in it, led him to this sort of necessity which makes him speak about something that he calls both primordial signifiers, and that he cannot detach at the same time from what he also calls act, namely what happens when the signifier is not simply articulated, which only supposes its liaison, its coherence with the others in a chain, but when it is properly speaking uttered and vocalised.

I, for my part, here, would have some, even many reservations about the introduction of the term act with no further commentary. I only want for the moment to retain the following which puts us in the presence of a certain form, not of the act, but of the object o in so far as we have learned to locate it, in so far as it is supported by this something which must be detached from the phonematisation as such, which is - linguistics has taught us to notice it - which is nothing other than a system of opposition with which it introduces (9) possibilities of substitution, of displacement, of metaphor and of metonymies, and which moreover is supported by any material whatsoever capable of being organised in these distinctive oppositions between one and all. The existence of the properly vocal dimension, of the passage to something of this system, into an utterance which is presented every time as isolated, and as a dimension in itself from the moment that we perceive into what there is plunged corporally the possibility of this dimension of utterance. And it is here that you will understand, if you have not already guessed it, that there takes on its value as an exemplary introduction - you can well imagine that it is not the only one that I could have made use of - this exemplary object which I took this time in the shofar, because it is within our reach, because it is, if it is truly what it is said to be, that it is at a source-point from which there sprang forth a tradition which is our own, because already one of our ancestors has busied himself with it and has highlighted it in analytic enunciating - but for that matter the tuba, the trumpet, and other instruments - for it is not necessary, even though it cannot be just any instrument whatsoever, that it should be a wind instrument: in the Abyssinian tradition it is the drum. If I had continued to give you an account of my trip since I returned from Japan, I could have given an account of the very particular function which in Japanese theatre, in its most characteristic form, that of the No, is played precisely by the style, the form, of certain types of pulsations in so far as they have, with respect to what we could call the precipitation and the kernel of interest, a really precipitating and binding function. I could also, in referring to the ethnographical field, find myself, as moreover Reik himself does, reminding you of the function of what is called the "bull roarer", namely this instrument which is very close to a kind of top, even though it is constructed very differently, that in the ceremonies of certain Australian tribes, gives rise to a certain type of droning that the name of the instrument compares to nothing other than the bellowing of an ox, the name designates it, and which deserves in effect to be linked in Reik's study to this function of the shofar in so far as it too is made equivalent to what other passages of biblical texts call the roaring, the bellowing of God. The interest of this object is to show us the locus of the voice - and of what voice, we will see its meaning by taking our bearings in its connection in the topography of the relationship of the big Other; let us not go too quickly - but by thus presenting this voice to us in the exemplary form where (10) it is in a certain fashion in potency, in a separated form; because it is what is going to allow us at least to give rise to a certain number of questions which are hardly ever raised.

The function of the shofar enters into action at certain periodic moments which are presented at first sight as the renewals of what? Of the pact, of the Alliance. The shofars do not articulate the basic principles, the commandments of this pact. It is nevertheless quite obviously presented, even down to the dogmatic articulation inscribed, in its connection, in the very name that is current of the moment that it intervenes, as having the function of remembering, Zikor, to remember.

Zikor, to remember, a function supported by three signs. 7103 which support the function or memory in so far as it appears appropriate here. What I might call the median moment in these three solemn blasts of the shofar, at the end of the days of fasting of Rosh Hashanah, is called Zikron and what is involved, Zikron Terway, designates properly the sort of tremolo which is proper to a certain way of sounding the shofar; let us say that it is the sound of the shofar, the Zikronot, which is the remembrance that is linked to this sound. The remembrance, is no doubt the remembrance of something, of something on which one meditates in the preceding moments, the remembrance of the Hakada.

The Hakada, is the moment of Abraham's sacrifice, the precise one at which God stops his already consenting hand to substitute for the victim, Isaac, the ram that you know about or think you know about. Does that mean nevertheless that this very moment of the pact is entirely included in the sound of the shofar, the memory of the sound of the shofar, the sound of the shofar as sustaining the memory? Is the question not posed of who has to remember? Why think that it is the faithful, since they have just spent a certain time of recollection about this memory?

The question has a very great importance, because it leads us properly speaking onto the terrain where there was outlined, in the mind of Freud, in the most striking way, the function of repetition. Is the function of repetition only automatic and linked in a way to the return, to the necessary transporting into the battery of the signifier, or has it indeed another dimension which it does not appear inevitable to meet with in our experience, if it has a meaning and the one which gives meaning to this interrogation carried by the definition of the locus of the Other which is characteristic of what I am trying to sustain before you, that to which, in a word, I am trying to accommodate your mental style. Is the one whose memory must be awakened, I mean to ensure that he for his part remembers, not God himself?

Such is the point to which we are brought, I would not say by this very simple instrument, because in truth each one can only experience, before the existence and the function of such an (11) apparatus, at the very least a profound feeling of embarrassment.

But what is involved for us now is to know where it is to be inserted as a separate object, in what domain, not at all in the opposition of inside to outside, whose whole inadequacy you sense clearly in this case, but with reference to the Other, in the stages of the emergence, of the progressive establishment of the subject, with reference to this enigmatic field which is the Other, at what moment can there intervene such a type of object with its face finally unveiled in its separable form and which is now called something that we know well, the voice, which we know well, which we believe we know well in its waste scraps, the dead leaves, in the form of voices, the stray voices of psychosis, and its parasitic character in the form of the interrupted imperatives of the super-ego. It is here that we must in -order to orientate ourselves, to map out the true place, the difference of this new object which rightly or wrongly for reasons of presentation I thought I should tackle for you today, present under a form that is somehow manageable, if not exemplary, it is here now that we have to map out, to see the difference, the newness it introduces compared to the previously articulated stage, the one which concerned the structure of desire in another exemplary form - but as you cannot but sense, a very different one - and regarding which it seems that everything which is revealed in this new dimension can only be, and cannot but be, at first masked in this other previous stage, that we must for a moment return to it to make better emerge, stand out from the new thing that is contributed by the level at which there appears the form of o which is called the voice.

Let us return to the level of the eye which is also that of space, not the space that we question in the shape of a fixed transcendental aesthetic, even though undoubtedly the reference to what Kant contributed in this terrain is very useful to us, or as least very handy, but in what space presents for us as characteristic in its relationship to desire.

The origin, the basis, the structure of the function of desire as such is, in a style, in a form each time to be specified, this central object o in so far as it is not alone separated, but elided, always elsewhere than where desire supports it and nevertheless in a profound relationship with it. This character of elision is nowhere more manifest than at the level of the function of the eye. And this is why the most satisfying support of the function of desire, the phantasy, is always marked by a relationship with the visual models in which it functions commonly, as one might say, in which it gives the tone of our desiring life.

In space nevertheless - and it is in this "nevertheless" that (12) there belongs the whole import of the remark - apparently nothing is separated. Space is always homogeneous, when we think in terms of the space of this body, our own, from which its function emerges. It is not idealism, it is not at all because space is a function of the mind that it cannot justify any kind of Berkeleyanism; space is not an idea, space is something which has a certain relationship not with the mind but with the eye.

Even this body has a function. What one? This body is appended. Once we think about space, we must in a way neutralise it by localising it there. Think simply of the way in which the physicist mentions on the blackboard the function of a body in space. A body is anything whatsoever and it is nothing; it is a point, it is something which all the same must be localised there by something foreign to the dimensions of space, except by producing there insoluble questions about the problem of individuation, in connection with which you have already heard on more than one occasion, I think, the manifestation, the expression of my derision.

A body in space, is simply something which at the very least is presented as impenetrable; there is a certain realism about space that is completely untenable and - as you know because I am not going to spell out its antinomies for you here - necessary. The very usage of the function of space, however punctual you may suppose it to be, supposes an indivisible unity, at once necessary and unsustainable, which is called the atom, completely impossible of course to identify with what is described in physics by this term which, as you know, has nothing atomic about it, I mean that it is in no way indivisible.

Space is of no interest unless there is supposed this final resistance to division, because it has no real usage unless it is discontinuous, namely if the unit which operates there cannot be in two points at the same time.

What does that mean for us? It is that this spatial unit, the point, can only be recognised as inalienable, which means for us that it cannot in any case be o.

What does what I am in the process of telling you mean? I press forward to make you fall again into the nets of what you have already heard. This means that through the form $i(o)$, my image, my presence in the Other is without a remainder. I cannot see what I am losing there. This is the meaning of the mirror stage and the meaning of this schema that was forged for you, whose place you now see exactly, since it is the schema destined to ground the function of the ideal ego/ego-ideal in the fashion in which the relationship of the subject to the Other functions, when the specular relationship, called in this case the mirror of the big Other, dominates it.

(13) This image $i(o)$, the specular image, the characteristic object of the mirror stage, has more than one seduction which is not simply linked to the structure of each subject, but also to the function of knowledge. It is complete, I mean closed, it is Gestalt-like, namely marked by the predominance of the good shape, and is also intended to put us on our guard against this function of the Gestalt, in so far as it is founded on the experience of the good shape, an experience precisely that is characteristic of this field. For to reveal the degree of "appearance" in this satisfying character of the form as such, indeed of the idea of its rootedness in the visual eidos, to see and tear apart what is illusory in it, it is enough to make a stain on it: to see where this point of desire is really attached, to perform "the function", if you will allow me the equivocal usage of a current term to support what I want to get you to hear, a stain is enough to perform the "function" of beauty spot (grain de beauté).

The spots and outcomes - you will allow me here to continue the equivocation - of beauty show the place of o , here reduced to this zero point whose function I evoked the last time. The beauty spot, more than the shape that it stains, is what looks at me. And it is because it looks at me that it draws me so paradoxically, sometimes more - and with more right - than the look of my partner; for this look reflects me after all and in so far as it reflects me, it is only my reflection, an imaginary buoy. There is no need for the crystalline lens to be thickened by a cataract to blind vision, to blind it in any case to the following: the elision of castration at the level of desire in so far as it is projected into the image.

The blankness of the eye of the blind man, or to take another image in this moment, which I hope you remember, even though it is an echo of another year, the jet-setters of La dolce vita, at the final phantastical moments of the film when they advance as it were jumping from one shadow to another of the pine wood through which they make their way to get to the beach, they see the inert eye of the marine creature that the fishermen are in the process of dragging ashore, it is by this that we are most looked at, and it shows how anxiety emerges in the vision of the locus of desire that it determines.

This is the virtue of tattooing, and I do not need to recall for you this admirable passage of Levi-Strauss, when he evokes the outbreak of desire of the parched colonisers when they get to this zone of Parana where there await them these women entirely covered with shimmering overlapping drawings in the greatest variety of shapes and of colours.

At the other end, what I would evoke, is that, as I might say, in referring to the emergence which, as you know, is more marked (14) for me by creationist rather than evolutionist style of forms, the appearance of the visual apparatus itself, at the level of the fringes of the lamellibranchiata, begins with a pigmentary stain, the first appearance of a differentiated organ in the sense of a sensibility which is already properly speaking visual. And of course there is nothing more blind than a stain! To the spot (mouche) mentioned earlier, I would add the spots before the eyes (mouche volante) which give the first warning of organic danger to people in their fifties.

Zero of o, it is through this that visual desire masks the anxiety of what is essentially lacking to desire, of what determines us when all is said and done, if we remain with this field of vision, to grasp only, to be ever only able to grasp any living being as what he is in the field of the pure visual signal, what ethology calls a dummy, a puppet, an appearance.

o, what is lacking, is non-specular, it is not graspable in the image. I highlighted for you the blank eye of the blind man as being at once the revealed and the irremediably hidden image of scopophilic desire. The eye of the voyeur itself appears to the other as what it is: as impotent. This indeed is what allows our civilisation to put in a box what supports it in different forms that are perfectly homogeneous with the dividends and the bank reserves that it determines.

This relationship of desire to anxiety in this radically masked form, linked by that very fact to the structure, of desire in its most deceptive functions, dimensions, is the specifically defined stage to which we have now to oppose how much openness is brought to it by the other function, that which I introduced today with this accessory, which is not nevertheless accidental, of the shofar.

Do I need, in closing my discourse, to anticipate on what I will articulate step by step the next time, namely how our most elementary tradition, that of Freud's first steps, commands us to distinguish this other dimension. What does it tell us? Here again I would pay homage to my friend Stein for having articulated it very well in his discourse: if desire, he says - and I subscribe to his formula, because I find it more than brilliant - if desire were primordial, if it were the desire of the mother which determined the bringing into the play of the original crime, we would be in the field of vaudeville. The origin, Freud tells us in the most formal fashion - and by forgetting it the whole chain is undone and it is because of not having secured this beginning of the chain that analysis, I am speaking about analysis in theory as in practice, seems to undergo this form of dispersion where one can ask oneself on certain occasions whether there is anything that can still preserve its coherence - it is because the murder of the father and everything that it determines is what reverberates - if one is to understand what one hopes is only a metaphor in Reik's mouth - as the bellowing of a felled bull which still makes itself heard in the sound of the shofar, let us say more simply that it is from the original fact inscribed in the myth of murder as the starting point of something whose function we have henceforth to grasp in the economy of desire, it is starting from that as a prohibition impossible to transgress that there is constituted in the most fundamental form the original desire.

It is secondary with respect to a dimension that we have to tackle here with respect to the essential object which functions as o, this function of the voice and what it contributes in terms of new dimensions in the relationship of desire to anxiety. This is the detour through which the functions of desire, object, anxiety are going to regain their value at every stage, right up to the stage of the origin. And in order not to fail to anticipate your questions and to tell you also perhaps, to tell those who have posed them, that I am not forgetting this field and the furrows that I have to trace in it in order to be complete, you may have noticed that I have not given an account either of the anal object or of the anal stage, at least since we have taken up our talks again: it is as a matter because it is properly speaking impossible if it is not within the context of a total reworking of the function of desire, starting from this point which because it was enounced here the last time is the most original, the one that I will take up the next time around the object of the voice.

Seminar 20: Wednesday 29 May 1963

On reading, these days, some works which have recently appeared about the relationships of language to thought, I was led to re-present for myself what after all I can indeed at every moment put in question for myself, namely the place and the nature of the angle from which I am trying to attack something, which in any case can only be, - without that what would I have to tell you - an inevitable, necessary limit to your understanding. This does not present any particular difficulty, in its objective principle, all progress of a science depending as much and more on the phasic handling of its concepts as on the extension of its grasp, which may give rise here - I mean in the psychoanalytic field - to an obstacle which deserves particular reflection; it is not as easily soluble as the passage from one conceptual system to another, for example from the Copernican system to the Einsteinian system. For after all one may suppose that for sufficiently well developed minds, that does not create a difficulty for very long. For minds sufficiently open to mathematics, it does not take too long for it to become clear that the Einsteinian equations hold up, are included in the ones which preceded them, that it situates them as particular cases, therefore completely resolves them.

That does not mean that there may not be, as the experience of history proves, a moment of resistance, but it is short. In the whole measure that, as analysts - I mean in the whole measure of our implication, whether it is more or less: to interest oneself a little in psychoanalysis is already to be a little implicated in it - in the whole measure of our implication in psychoanalytic technique, we have to encounter in the development of concepts the same obstacle designated, recognised, as constituting the limits of analytic experience, namely castration anxiety.

It is as if what reaches me from different distances from where I am speaking - and not necessarily always to respond to what I am saying, but certainly in a certain zone of response - it is as if at certain moments a hardening takes place in certain technical (2) positions, strictly correlative in this matter to what I can call the limits of understanding; it is also as if to overcome these limits I had chosen a path that is perfectly defined, at the level of school-going age, by a pedagogical school that poses in a certain fashion the problems of the relationship between teaching in school and the maturation of the thinking of the child, it is as if I were adhering - and I adhere in effect, if one looks closely at this pedagogical debate - to this style of pedagogical procedure which is far, believe me, you can check it out, there are some of you who are closer to it than others, more required to be interested in these pedagogical procedures, you will see that the schools are far from being in agreement on the procedure that I am now going to articulate and define. For one school, if you wish, put it wherever you like, for the moment on my left, that means nothing more, everything is determined by an autonomous maturation of intelligence, all one does is follow it, I mean at school-going age; for the others there is a fault, a gap. The first, let us designate it for example by the theories of Stern - I did not say it immediately because I think that a good number of you have never opened the works of this psychologist who is nevertheless universally recognised - for the others, let us say, take Piaget, there is a gap, a fault between what childish thinking is capable of forming and what can be brought to it along these scientific paths. It is clear, if you look carefully at it, it means in both cases reducing the efficaciousness of teaching as such to zero.

Teaching exists: what makes numerous spirits in the scientific arena able to overlook it, is that effectively, in the scientific field, once one has reached it, what is properly of the order of teaching, in the sense that I am going to specify it, can be, in effect, considered elidable, namely that, when one has broken through a certain stage of mathematical understanding, once it is done, it is done; one no longer needs to search out its paths. One can, as I might say, reach it without any difficulty provided one belongs to the generation to whom these things were taught in this form, in this formalisation, as a primary intention.

Extremely complicated concepts, or more exactly ones which (3) appeared at an earlier stage of mathematics to be extremely complicated, are immediately accessible to very young minds. It is certain that one needs no intermediary when one is of school-going age and that the whole interest of school pedagogy depends on grasping, on ascertaining this central point or to anticipate, by problems which go slightly beyond them, what are called the mental capacities of the child. And by helping him - I am saying: simply by helping him - to tackle these problems, one does something which has an effect, not simply pre-maturing the effect of haste on maturation, but an effect which in certain periods that one can call - they have been called that - "sensitive" - those who know a little about this subject can see where; I continue, because the important thing is my discourse, and not my references - one can obtain veritable effects of unleashing, of opening out of certain apprehensive activities in certain domains, effects of a quite special fecundity.

It is exactly what seems to me can be obtained in the domain that we are advancing into together here in so far as, because of the specificity of its field, there is always involved in it something which it would be well for pedagogues to map out one day. There have already been beginnings in the works of authors whose testimony is all the more interesting to retain in that they have no notion of what their experience may contribute to us: the fact that one pedagogue was able to formulate that there is real access to the concept only from the age of puberty on - I mean experimenters who know nothing about, who do not want to recognise anything about analysis - is something which would merit our taking our own look at it, sticking our nose into it, grasping - in the place where I am speaking to you, there are a thousand tangible traces - that it is properly speaking in function of a link which can be made about the maturation of the object o as such, namely as I define it, at this age of puberty that one can conceive of a quite different mapping out than the one which is made by these authors of what they call "the limit moment" when there is truly the functioning of the concept, and not this sort of use of language that they call in this case, not conceptual, but "complexual", by a sort of homonymy which is a pure encounter with the term "complex" that we use.

(4) This position of o at the moment of its passage, through what I symbolise with the formula of $(-\langle p)$ is one of the goals of our explanations this year. It cannot be valorised, taken up by your ears, it cannot be validly transmitted, except by some approach, which can here only be a detour, to what constitutes this moment characterised by the notation $(-\langle P)$, and which is and can only be castration anxiety.

It is because this anxiety here cannot in any way be made present as such, but only mapped out by this sort of concentric path which makes me, as you see, oscillate between the oral stage and something which I said the last time was supported by the evocation, in a separated form, materialised in an object which is the voice, of this shofar - you will allow me today to take it up and to put it aside in a moment - that we can now return to the central point that I evoke in speaking about castration. What really is this relationship between anxiety and castration? It is not enough for us to know that it is experienced as such, at one or other phase of analysis which is described as terminal or non-terminal, for us to really know what it is.

To say things immediately as they are going to be articulated at the next step, I would say that the function of the phallus as imaginary, functions everywhere at every level, high up and low down, that I defined, characterised by a certain relationship of the subject to o, the phallus functions everywhere, except where one expects it, as a mediating function, specifically at the phallic stage, and it is this lack as such of the phallus which is present, detectable, often to our great surprise everywhere else, it is this vanishing of the phallic function as such, at this level where it is expected to function, which is the principle of this castration anxiety.

Hence the notation $(-\langle p)$ denoting what I might call this positive absence, and since this was never formulated in such a manner in this form, no place was allowed either for its consequences to be drawn.

To make tangible the truth of this formula, I will take different paths in accordance with the mode which I described earlier as

(5) that of turning around. And since the last time I recalled to you the proper structure of the visual field concerning what I called both the sustentation and the occultation in this field of the object o, I cannot do less than return to it when, in a fashion that we know to be traumatic, it is in this field that there is presented the first approach to the phallic presence, namely what is called the primal scene.

Everyone knows that despite the fact that it is present, visible in the shape of a functioning of the penis, that what is striking in the evocation of the reality of the phantasised form of the primal scene, is always some ambiguity concerning precisely this presence.

How often can one say precisely that it is not seen at its place, and even sometimes that the essential of the traumatic effect of the scene is precisely the forms under which it disappears, is conjured away.

Moreover I would only have to evoke, in its exemplary form, the mode of apparition - where in any case, for our purposes, we should not deceive ourselves, the anxiety which accompanies it sufficiently signals that we are indeed on the path that we are seeking - the mode of apparition of this primal scene in the story of the Wolfman. We have heard it said somewhere that there was something obsessional, it appears, in the fact that we return here I do not think every time that I am in your presence, but in the fact that we return to these original examples of the Freudian discovery; these examples are more than the supports, more even than the metaphors, they make us put our finger on the very substance of what we have to deal with.

The essential in the revelation of what appears to the Wolfman through the gap which prefigures in a way what I made into a function, that of the open window, that which appears in its frame identifiable in its form to the very function of phantasy in its most anxiety-provoking mode, it is manifest that the essential in it is not to know where the phallus is; it is there, as I might say, identical everywhere to what I could call the "catatonia of the image": the tree, the wolves perched on it who - you can find in this the echo of what I articulated for you the last time - look fixedly at the subject, there is no need to search in this fur, repeated five times, in the tail of the five animals, for what is involved and which is there - as I told you - in the very reflection that the image supports of a catatonia which is nothing other than that of the subject himself, of the child petrified, fascinated by what he sees, paralysed by this fascination to the point that what is looking at him in the scene and which is in a way everywhere invisible, we can indeed conceive of as an image which here is nothing other than the transposition of his arrested state, of his own body transformed here into this tree, that we might describe as, to echo a celebrated title, "the tree covered with wolves, l'arbre couvert de loups".

That what is involved is something that echoes this experiential pole that we have defined as that of jouissance, appears to me to be unquestionable. This sort of jouissance, akin to what moreover Freud calls the horror of the jouissance the Ratman is unaware of, a jouissance going beyond any possible mapping out by the subject, is here presentified in this erect form, the subject is no longer anything but erection in this grip which makes of him a phallus, makes a tree of him, horrifies him (l'arborifie, l'arb-horrifie), which completely immobilises him.

Something happens which Freud testifies to us as only having been reconstructed on this occasion: essential though it may be, the symptomatic development of the effects of this scene is so essential that the analysis Freud gives of it could not even be put forward for a moment, if we do not admit this element which remains the only one not integrated up to the end by the subject and presentifying on this occasion what Freud articulated later about reconstruction as such: it is the response of the subject to the traumatic scene by a defecation. The first time, or the quasi-first time, the first time in any case that Freud has to note in a particular fashion this function of the appearance of the excremental object at a critical moment, note - consult the text - that in a thousand forms he articulates it as a function to which we can give no other name than the one that it was thought necessary to articulate later as characteristic of the genital stage, namely as a function of oblativity. It is a gift, he tells us. Moreover everyone knows that Freud underlined from the first the character of gift on all the occasions that you will allow me to call in passing and with no further commentary, (7) if you remember my reference points, the cases of passage a. l'acte in which the little child inopportunately releases some of his intestinal contents.

And in the text of the Wolfman things go even further, giving its true sense, the one that we have drowned under a wave of moralising assumptions about oblativity, Freud speaks in this connection about sacrifice, something which - you will admit - given Freud's reading - for example, we know that he had read for example, Robertson Smith - that, when he spoke about sacrifice, he was not speaking about something up in the air, a kind of vague moral analogy, Freud speaks about sacrifice in connection with the apparition of this excremental object in the field. After all that must mean something.

It is here that we will take up the thing at the level, if you wish, of the normal act, of the act rightly or wrongly qualified as mature, that at the level of which I thought I could in my seminar before last, if I remember rightly, articulate orgasm as being the equivalent of anxiety and situating itself in the inner field of the subject, while I provisionally left castration with this single mark. It is quite obvious that one could not detach from it the sign of the intervention of the other as such; this characteristic in reality having always been, from the beginning, attributed to it, it is therefore the other who threatens castration.

I pointed out in this connection that by assimilating, by making equivalent orgasm as such and anxiety, I was taking up the position which rejoined what I had previously said about anxiety as a reference, a signal of the only relationship which does not deceive, that we could find in it the reason for what could be satisfying in orgasm. It is from something that happens in the perspective in which it is confirmed that anxiety is not without an object, that we can understand the function of orgasm and more especially what I called "the satisfaction that it carries with it".

I believed at that time that I could not say any more if I was to be understood. It nevertheless remains that an echo has come to me, let us say to put it mildly, of some perplexity in the terms that were interchanged, if this echo is correct, precisely in the case of two people that I believed I had formed particularly well. It is all the more surprising that they could interrogate themselves in this case about what I meant by this satisfaction.

(8) Is what is involved then, they asked one another, jouissance? Is it a way of returning in a certain fashion to this derisory absolute that certain people want to put into genital fusion, so called? And then, since it was a matter of seeing the relationship between this anxiety point - put into this point all the ambiguity that you wish - a point where there is no longer anxiety if the orgasm covers it over, and this point of desire in so far as it is marked by the absence of the object o in the form of $(-P)$, what happens, they asked themselves to this relationship in the case of the woman? Answer: I did not say that the satisfaction of orgasm was identified with what I defined in the seminar on Ethics about the locus of jouissance. Answer - it even appears ironic to underline it-: the little satisfaction, even if it is sufficient, brought by orgasm, why should it be the same and at the same point as this other little which is offered to a woman even in a successful copulation? This is what should be articulated in the most precise fashion. It is not enough to say vaguely that the satisfaction of orgasm is comparable to what I call elsewhere, on the oral plane, the crushing of demand under the satisfaction of need. At this oral level, the distinction between need and demand is easy to sustain, and besides does not fail to pose us the problem of where the drive is situated. If by some artifice one can equivocate at the oral level about what is original in the grounding of demand in what we analysts call drive, this is what we do not in any case have any right to do at the genital level. And precisely there where it would seem that we are dealing with the most primitive instinct, the sexual instinct, it is there less than anywhere else that we cannot fail to refer to the structure of the drive as being supported by the formula $$ \rightarrow D$: $ relationship of desire to demand.

What is demanded at the genital level and from whom? That effectively the experience which is so common, fundamental that it ends up in its obviousness by no longer noticing its relief, effectively interhuman copulation with the transcendence it has compared to individual existence - we needed the detour of a rather advanced biology to be able to notice the strict emergence of the function of individual death, but after all people always had a presentiment that in this act where there is bound closely, then, what we ought to call the survival of the species conjoined with something which cannot fail, if the words have a meaning, to involve what we have located at the final term as the death drive, after all why should we refuse to see what is immediately tangible in facts that we know quite well, which are signified in the most common usages of the tongue - we demand - I have not yet said from whom, but after all since it is necessary always to demand something from someone, it happens that it is from our partner, is it quite sure that it is from her, we will have to see in a second phase - but what we demand is what? It is to satisfy a demand which has a certain relationship with death. What we demand does not go very far: it is the little death (la petit mort); but after all it is clear that we demanded it. That the drive is intimately mingled with this drive of the demand, that we demand to make love (l'amour), if you wish to make "l'amourir", it is to die (mourir), it is even to die laughing (de rire)² It is not for nothing that I underline that which in love participates in what I call the comic feeling. In any case it is indeed here that there ought to reside post-orgasmic relaxation. If what is satisfied is this demand, well then God knows, it is to be really satisfied, one gets out of it!

(9) correlation between the appearance of bisexuality and the

The advantage of this conception is to make appear, to give the reason, why anxiety appears in a certain number of ways of obtaining orgasm. In the whole measure that orgasm is detached from this field of the demand of the other - it is the first apprehension that Freud had of it in coitus interruptus - anxiety appears, as one might say, in this margin of the loss of signification. But as such, it continues to designate what is aimed at in terms of a certain relationship to the other. I am precisely not in the process of saying that castration anxiety is an anxiety about death; it is an anxiety which refers to the field where death is closely bound up with the renewal of life, it is an anxiety which, if we localise it at this point, allows us to understand very well why it is equivalently interpretable as the reason why it is given to us, in Freud's final conception, as the signal of a threat to the status of the defended "I". It refers to a beyond of this defended "I", at this point of appeal (10) for a jouissance which goes beyond our limits, in so far as here the other is properly speaking evoked in this register of the real which is how a certain type, a certain form of life is transmitted and is sustained. Call that whatever you wish, God or the genius of the species. I think that I have already sufficiently implied in my discourse that this does not carry us towards any metaphysical heights. What is involved here is a real, this something which maintains what Freud articulated at the level of his Nirvana principle as being this property of life, of having, in order to reach death, to repass by forms which reproduce the ones which had given to the individual form the occasion of appearing through the conjunction of two sexual cells.

What does that mean? What does that mean as regards what happens at the level of the object? What does it mean, if not that in short this result, that I called such a successful result, is only realised in such a satisfactory fashion in the course of a certain automatic cycle that remains to be defined and because precisely of the fact that the organ is never able to hold up very long on the path of the appeal for jouissance. With regard to this end of jouissance and to reaching this appeal of the other in a term which would be tragic, the amboceptor organ can always be said to give way prematurely.

At the moment, I might say, that it could be the sacrificial object, well then, let us say in the ordinary case it has long disappeared from the scene. It is no longer anything but a little rag, it is no longer there except as a testimony, as a memory for the partner in tenderness. In the castration complex, this is what is involved, in other words this only becomes a drama in so far as there is raised, pushed in a certain direction - one which places all its trust in genital consummation - the putting in question of desire.

If we let go of this ideal of genital achievement, by seeing what is structurally, happily alluring in it, there is no reason why the anxiety linked to castration should not appear to us in a much more supple correlation with its symbolic object, and with an opening out that is quite different to the objects of other levels, as this moreover has always been implied by the premises (11) of Freudian theory, which put desire in a completely different relationship to a purely and simply natural one to the natural partner as regards its structuring.

I would like, to make you better sense what is at stake, to recall all the same what is involved in what one might say are, at first, savage relationships between man and woman. After all, a woman who does not know whom she is dealing with, it is indeed, in accordance with what I put forward to you about the relationship between anxiety and the desire of the Other, because she is not before the man without a certain unease about where exactly this path of desire is going to lead her. When the man, by God, makes love like everyone else and is disarmed, if the woman - something which as you know is very conceivable - does not draw, I would say, any obvious profit from it, there is in every case something that she has gained, it is that she is henceforth altogether at ease about the intentions of her partner.

In the same chapter of The Wasteland, by T S Elliot, to which I referred on a particular day when I thought it well to confront with our experience the old theory about the superiority of woman on the plane of jouissance, the one in which T S Elliot allows Tiresias to speak, we find these verses - whose irony made it always seem to me that they ought one day to have their place here in our discourse - when the carbuncular young dandy, the little clerk from the building society, has finished with the typist whose surroundings are all along depicted for us, has finished his little affair, T S Elliot expresses himself as follows:

"When lovely woman stoops to folly and Paces about her room again, alone,
She smooths her hair with automatic hand,
And puts a record on the gramophone."

What is meant by: "When lovely woman stoops to folly", is not to be translated, it is a song from the Vicar of Wakefield, when a beautiful woman abandons herself to folly - "stoops" is not the same thing as "s'abandonne" - lowers herself to folly, and then finally finds herself alone, she strides across the room stroking her hair automatically with her hand, and changes the record.

This by way of response to the question my pupils were posing amongst themselves about what is involved in the question of the desire of the woman. The desire of the woman is determined by (12) the question, for her also, of her jouissance. The fact that she is not simply much closer than man to jouissance, but doubly determined by it, is something that analytic theory has always taught us. That the locus of this jouissance is linked for us to the enigmatic, unsituatable character of her orgasm, is something that our analyses have been able to take far enough for us to be able to say that this locus is a rather archaic point since it is older than the present separation of the cloaca, something that was perfectly well located from a certain analytic perspective by a particular analyst of the female sex.

That desire, which is not at all jouissance, is in her case naturally where it ought to be according to nature, tubular (tubaire) ■ is something that the desire of those we call hysterics designates perfectly. The fact that we should have classified these subjects as hysterics changes nothing in the fact that desire thus situated is true, is organically true.

It is because man will never carry the point of his desire to that extreme, that one can say that the jouissance of the man and of the woman are not organically conjoined. It is indeed in the measure of the failure of the desire of man that the woman is led, as I might say, normally to the idea of having the man's organ, in so far as it is supposed to be a veritable amboceptor: this is what is called the phallus. It is because the phallus does not realise, except in its evanescence, the meeting of desires, that it becomes the common locus of anxiety.

What the woman demands from us analysts, at the end of an analysis conducted in accordance with Freud, is no doubt the penis, Penisneid, but in order to do better than the man. There is something, there are many things, there are a thousand things which confirm all of that. Without analysis what is there for the woman as a way of overcoming this Penisneid, if we suppose it to be always implicit; we know it very well, it is the most ordinary mode of seduction between the sexes, it is to offer to the desire of man the object involved in phallic claims, the non-detumescent object to sustain his desire, it is to make of her feminine attributes the signs of the omnipotence of man. And (13) it is this that - I would ask you to refer to my old seminars - this is what I thought it worth while valorising by underlining, after Joan Riviere, the correct function of what she calls "Womanliness as masquerade". She has simply to forget about her jouissance.

In the measure that we leave her in a way on this path, we find ourselves signing the decree of the renewal of the phallic claim, which becomes, I would not say the compensation, but as it were the hostage of what one demands from her in fact for taking charge of the failure of the other.

Such are the paths on which there are presented, in considering the genital plane, genital realisation as a term, what we could call the impasses of desire, if there were not the opening up of anxiety. We will see, restarting from the point that today I have led you to, how the whole analytic experience shows us that it is in the measure that it is summoned as object of propitiation in a failed conjunction, that the phallus which proves to be missing, constitutes castration itself as a point that it is impossible to get round in the relationships of the subject to the Other, and as a point that has been resolved as regards its anxiety function.

Seminar 21:Wednesday 5 June 1963

What I told you the last time ended, I believe, significantly with the silence which greeted my remarks, no one it seems having preserved enough sangfroid to reward them with a little applause. Either I am wrong or perhaps after all it is not too much to see in this the result of what I had expressly announced in beginning these remarks, namely that it was not possible to tackle castration anxiety head on without provoking, let us say, some echo of it. And after all this is not an excessive pretension, since what I told you is, if fact, something that could be qualified as not very encouraging, because it concerned the union between man and woman, an ever-present problem all the same, and one that quite correctly always has, and I hope that it still finds, a place in the preoccupations of psychoanalysts.

Jones circled for a long time around this problem materialised, incarnated by what is supposed to be implied in the phallo-centric perspective of primal ignorance, not only of man, but of woman herself, about the locus of conjunction, the vagina. And all the partly fruitful, even though incomplete detours that Jones went into on this path, show very well their aim in what he invokes - as I recalled for you at one stage - the famous "Man and woman he created them" which moreover is so ambiguous. For after all - one is entitled to say - Jones did not meditate on the Hebrew text of this verse 27 of Book 1 of Genesis.

In any case, to try to support what I said the last time on my little schema constructed by using these Euler circles, this could be supported as follows: the field opened up by man and woman in what one could call, in the biblical sense, their knowledge of one another, only intersects because the zone in which they could effectively overlap, where their desires carry them to reach one another, is qualified by the lack of that which would be their middle term, the phallus. For each of them, it is that which, when it is attained, alienates it precisely from the other.

The woman can undoubtedly be the symbol of the man, in his desire for phallic omnipotence, and precisely in so far as she is no longer the woman. As regards the woman, it is quite clear through all that we have discovered, what we have called Penisneid, that she can only take the phallus for what it is not,

(2) namely either o the object, or her own too small (jp) , which only gives her a jouissance approximating to what she imagines is the jouissance of the other, which she can no doubt share through a sort of mental phantasy, but only by straying from her own jouissance.

In other words, she can only enjoy (&) because it is not at its place, at the place of her jouissance, where her jouissance can be realised. I am going to give you a little illustration of it that is a little controversial, somewhat marginal, but contemporary. In an audience like this, how often, do we analysts, how often, to the point that it becomes something constant in our practice, do women want to be analysed like their husbands, and often by the same psychoanalyst? What does that mean, if not that the supposedly rewarded desire of their husband which they have the ambition to share, the - (-P) the re-positiving of (<p) that they suppose operates in the analytic field, this is what they have the ambition to attain.

That the phallus is not found where it is expected, where it is required, namely on the plane of genital mediation, is what explains that anxiety is the truth of sexuality, namely what appears every time its flow retreats, runs into the sand. Castration is the price of this structure, it substitutes itself for this cruth. But in truth, this is an illusory game; there is no castration because, at the place where it has to happen, there is no object to castrate. For that, it would be necessary for the phallus to be there. But it is only there so that there will be no anxiety.

The phallus, where it is expected as sexual, never appears except as lack, and this is its link with anxiety. And all of this means that the phallus is called on to function as an instrument of potency. Now potency, I mean what we are speaking about when we speak about potency, when we speak about it in a fashion which vacillates about what is involved - for it is always to omnipotence that we refer ourselves; now that is not what is involved, omnipotence is already the slippage, the evasion with respect to this point at which all potency fails - one does not demand potency to be everywhere, one demands it to be where it is present. It is precisely, because it fails where it is expected, (3) that we begin to foment omnipotence. In other words: the phallus is present, it is present everywhere it is not up to it.

For it is the aspect which allows us to pierce this illusion of the claim engendered by castration, in so far as it covers the anxiety presentified by every actualisation of jouissance; it is this confusion between jouissance and the instruments of potency. Human impotence, with the progress of institutions, becomes better than this state of fundamental misery where it constitutes itself into a profession, I mean a profession in every sense of the word, from the sense of the profession of faith, up to the term, to the aim that we find in the professional ideal.

Everything that shelters behind the dignity of any profession, is always this central lack which is impotence. Impotence, as one might say, in its most general formula, is what destined man to be only able to orgasm (jouir) from his relationship to the support of (+), namely from a deceptive potency. If I remind you that this structure holds up after what I articulated the last time, it is to lead you towards some remarkable facts which control the structure articulated in this way; the famous term homosexuality, which in our doctrine, our theory, the Freudian one, is seen as the principle of social bonding, let us note that Freud always remarked, never raised a doubt on the point, that it is the privilege of the male. This libidinal cement of the social bond, in so far as it is only produced in the community of males, is linked to the aspect of sexual failure which is imparted to it very specially because of the fact of castration.

On the contrary female homosexuality has perhaps a great cultural importance, but no value as a social function, because it is brought to bear, for its part, on the proper field of sexual rivalry, namely there where in appearance it would have the least chance of succeeding, were it not for the fact that precisely in this field those who are at an advantage, are precisely those who do not have the phallus, namely that omnipotence, the greatest liveliness of desire is produced at the level of this love which is called Uranian, which I believe has marked by its bonding the most radical affinity to what one can call female homosexuality.

An idealistic love, the presentification of the essential mediation of the phallus as (-f>). This (jP) therefore, for both sexes, is what I desire and what I can only have qua (-jp). It is (4) this minus which is found, in the field of sexual conjunction, to be the universal third term, to be this ego, my dear Reboul, which is not at all the reciprocal Hegelian one, but in so far as it constitutes the field of the Other as lack, I only accede to in so far as I take this very path, that I attach myself to the fact that this "I" makes me disappear, that I only rediscover myself in what Hegel perceived of course, but which he justifies without this interval, only in a generalised o, only in this idea of the ego in so far as it is everywhere, namely in so far as it is nowhere. The support of desire is not designed for sexual union; for generalised, it does not specify me more as a man or a woman, but as one or the other. The function of this field described here as that of sexual union, poses for each of the two sexes the alternative: the other is either the other or the phallus in the sense of exclusion. This field here is empty, but this field here, if I make it positive, the "or" takes on this other meaning which means that one is substitutable for the other at every moment.

This is the reason why it was not by chance that I introduced the field of the eye hidden behind every spatial universe, with a reference to these beings-images on the encounter with whom there is played out a certain path of salvation, specifically the Buddhist path, by introducing the one that I designated for you as Kuan Yin or in other words Avalokitesvara with its complete sexual ambiguity. The more the Avalokitecvara is presentified as male, the more it takes on female aspects. I will show you, if that amuses you, some other day the images of Tibetan paintings or statues, there is a superabundance of them and the trait that I designated for you is absolutely obvious here. What is at stake today is to grasp how this alternative between desire and jouissance can find its way. The difference between dialectical thinking and our experience, is that we do not believe in the synthesis. If there is a way through where the antinomy is closed off, it is because it was already there before the constitution of the antinomy.

For the object o, in which the impasse of the access from desire to the thing is incarnated, to give him passage, it is necessary to return to the beginning; there is nothing which prepares this passage before the capture of desire in specular space, there is no way out. For let us not omit to say that the possibility of this very impasse is linked to a moment which anticipates and conditions what has come to be marked in the sexual failure of man. It is the bringing into play of the specular tension which eroticises so precociously and so profoundly the field of insight.

(5) What is outlined in the anthropoid about the conductive character of this field has been known since Kohler; that he is not without intelligence, because he can do a lot of things provided he can see what he has to reach.

I alluded last night to the fact that this is the whole point, it is not that the primate is any more incapable of speaking than ourselves, but he cannot make his word enter into this operational field. But that is not the only difference. The difference, marked by the fact that for the animal there is no mirror stage, is what has gone under the name of narcissism, from a certain ubiquitous subtraction of libido, from an injection of the libido into the field of insight, of which specularised vision gives the form. But this form hides from us the phenomenon of the occultation of the eye, which henceforth ought to look from everywhere at the one that we are, with the universality of sight.

We know that this can happen and it is what is called the Unheimlich, but very particular circumstances are necessary. Usually, what is satisfying precisely in the specular form is the masking of the possibility of this apparition. In other words, the eye establishes the fundamental relationship of the desirable in the fact that it always tends to make it miscognised, in the relationship to the other, that under this desirable there is a desirer.

Let us reflect a little on the import of this formula which I believe I can give as being the most general one of what constitutes the arousal of the Unheimlich. Imagine that you are dealing with the most relaxing of desirable things, in its most pacifying form, the divine statue which is only divine. What would be more Unheimlich than to see it coming to life, namely to see it showing itself as desiring!

Now, not alone is it the structuring hypothesis that we pose for the genesis of o that it is born elsewhere and before this, before this capture which hides it, it is not simply this hypothesis, itself founded on our praxis, it is of course from this that I introduce it: (1) either our praxis is faulty, I mean faulty with respect to itself; or (2) it supposes that our field, which is that of desire, is engendered from this relationship of S to 0 which is the one in which we cannot rediscover what is our goal except in the measure that we reproduce its terms. Either our praxis is faulty with respect to itself or it presupposes (6) this. What our praxis engenders, if you wish, is this universe here, symbolised here in the final term in the famous division which has been guiding us for some time through the three phases in which the subject S that is still unknown has to constitute himself in the Other, and in which the o appears as the remainder of this operation.

I would point out to you in passing that the alternative: either our praxis is faulty or it presupposes this, is not an exclusive alternative. Our praxis can allow itself to be faulty in part with respect to itself, and that there should be a residue since precisely this is what is predicted.

A big presumption that we risk very little by engaging ourselves in a formalisation which is imposed as also being necessary* But this relationship of S to 0, must indeed be situated as going far beyond in its complexity, which is nevertheless so simple, inaugural, what those who bequeathed to us the definition of the signifier believed it to be their duty to pose at the beginning of the operation they organise, namely the notion of communication. Communication as such is not what is primal since, at the origin S has nothing to communicate for the reason that all the instruments of communication are on the other side, in the field of the Other, and because he has to receive them from him. As I have always said, this has as a result and consequence that it is always principally from the Other that he receives his own message, the first emergence, the one which is inscribed on the board is only an unconscious, because unformulatable, "Who am I?", to which there responds before it is formulated, a "You are", namely that he receives first of all his own message in an inverted form, as I have said for a long time. I am adding today if you understand it, that he receives it in a form that is at first interrupted, that he hears first of all a "You are..." without attribution. And, nevertheless, however interrupted this message may be and therefore however insufficient, it is never unformed, starting from this fact that language exists in the real, that it is on a journey, in circulation, and that for its part the S, in its supposedly primal interrogation, that with regard to it, many things in this language are already regulated.

Now to take up a phrase I used earlier, it is not simply by hypothesis, a hypothesis that I founded in our very own practice, identifying it with this praxis and up to its limits, to take this phrase up again, I would say that observable facts - and why so badly observed, this is the major question that experience presents to us - observable facts show us the autonomous operation of the word as it is presupposed in this schema. I think that there are here enough mothers not afflicted with deafness to know that a very small child, at the age when the mirror phase is far from having finished its work, that a very small child, once he has a few words, monologues before he goes to sleep.

Time prevents me today from reading for you a big page. I promise you something satisfying from it the next time or the one after that; for undoubtedly I will not fail to do it. As luck would have it, after my friend Roman Jakobson had for ten years begged all his pupils to put a tape recorder in the nursery, it only happened two or three years ago. Thanks to this, we finally have a publication of one of those primordial monologues, and I repeat that you will get some satisfaction from it. If I make you wait a little, it is because, in truth, it is useful for showing you a lot of other things that I want to outline today.

It is necessary all the same for what I have to outline today, to evoke the references of existence, as regards which the fact that I can only do so without knowing too much about what may (7) correspond to it in your own knowledge, shows the degree to which we are fated to move around in a field in which, whatever one thinks about it and whatever expense in terms of courses and conferences about it are made, your education is nothing less than adequate.

In any case, if some people here remember what Piaget calls egocentric language, to which I do not know whether we will be able to return this year - I think that you know what it is and that under a name that is perhaps defensible, but is undoubtedly open to all sorts of misunderstandings - there is for example, this characteristic that egocentric language, namely these sorts of monologues a child carries on aloud, when he is set to a common task with some comrades, which is very obviously a monologue directed at himself, can only be produced precisely in a certain community. This is not to object to the qualification of egocentric, if one specifies the meaning of this "egocentric" - in any case, as regards egocentrism, it may appear striking that the subject as enunciated is so often elided in it. I recall this reference, it is perhaps to encourage you to make contact again and get to know the phenomenon in the text of Piaget for any useful end it may have in the future, but also to note that at least a problem is posed: that of situating, of knowing what is this hypnopompic monologue, which is quite primal compared to this manifestation, as you know, of a much later stage.

Here and now, I indicate to you that as regards these problems, as you see, of genesis and of development, this famous schema which has bored you so much throughout these years, will regain its value. In any case, this monologue of the small child that I am speaking to you about, never happens when someone else is there: a younger brother, another baby in the room, is enough for it not to happen. Many other characteristics indicate that what is happening at this level, which, as you -will see, is so astonishingly revelatory of the precociousness of what are described as the primordial tensions in the unconscious, we cannot doubt that we have here something that is at every point analogous to the function of the dream.

Everything happens on "another stage" with the accent that I have given to this term. And ought we not to be guided here by the little door itself - it is never anything but a bad way through which I introduce you here to the problem - namely concerning what is involved, which is the constitution of o as remainder, that in any case, if its conditions are indeed the ones I have (8) told you about, we for our part only have this phenomenon in the state of a remainder, namely on the tape of the recorder. In other words, we have at the very most the distant murmur that is always ready to be interrupted when we appear.

Does this not prompt us to consider that a way is presented to us to grasp that for the subject who is in the process of constituting himself, it is also in a voice detached from its support that we ought to search for this remainder.

Pay very careful attention: we must not go too quickly here. Ordinary experience is that everything the subject receives from the Other through language is received in a vocal form. But we know very well, in an experience which is not all that rare, even though one evokes always the most spectacular cases, Helen Keller, that there are ways other than the vocal one to receive language, there are other ways for receiving language, language is not vocalisation (cf the deaf).

Nevertheless, I believe that we can advance in the direction that a relationship that is more than accidental links language to sonority. And we will believe perhaps that we even are advancing along the right path in trying to articulate things closely in qualifying this sonority, for example, as instrumental. It is a fact that physiology opens the path here. We do not know everything about the functioning of the ear, but we know all the same that the cochlea is a resonator, a complex or composite resonator, if you wish, but after all a composite resonator is decomposed into a composition of elementary resonators. This leads us along a path which is the following, that what is proper to resonance is that it is the apparatus which dominates in it. It is the apparatus which resonates. It does not resonate to just anything, it only resonates, if you wish, in order not to complicate things too much, to its own note, to its own frequency.

This leads us to a certain remark about the sort of resonator that we are dealing with, I mean concretely, in the sensory apparatus in question, our ear: to a resonator which is not an indifferent one, to a resonator which is a kind of tube. The distance of the journey involved in a certain return that the vibration makes, always carried from the oval window, passing from the scala tympani to the scala vestibuli, appears to be closely linked to the length of the space travelled in a closed conduit. It operates therefore in the same way, if you wish, as some tube, whatever it may be, a flute or an organ.

(9) Obviously the matter is complicated, this apparatus does not resemble any other musical instrument. It is a tube which could be, as I might say, a tube with keys, in this sense that it seems that it is the cell put in the position of a cord, but which does not function like a cord, which is involved at the point of the return of the wave, which takes charge of connoting the resonance involved.

I apologise all the more for this detour because it is quite certain that it is not in this direction that we will find the last word on the matter. This reminder is all the same designed to actualise the fact that in the form, the organic form, there is something which appears to us akin to these primary, topological, transpatial data which made us interest ourselves very especially in the most elementary form of the created or creative constitution of a void, the one that we have incarnated in the form of an apologetic for you in the story of the pot.

A pot also is a tube, and one that can resonate. And the question of what we have said, that ten absolutely similar pots absolutely do not fail to impose themselves as individually different, but the question can be posed as to whether if, when one puts one in the place of the other, the void which was successively at the heart of each one of them is always the same.

Now, it is indeed from the commandment which imposes the void at the heart of the acoustic tube for anything of this reality which may resonate there which opens out onto a further step of our progress, which is not so simple to define, namely what is called a breath, namely that for all possible breaths, a flute at the level of one of its openings imposes the same vibration. If it is not the law, indicating for us this something where the o involved, functions with a real function of mediation.

Well now let us not yield to this illusion. All of this is only of interest as a metaphor. If the voice, in the sense that we understand it, has an importance, it is not that of resonating in any spatial void, it is in so far as the formula, the most simple elision in what is called linguistically its phatic function, which is believed to be a simplemaking contact, which is indeed something else, resonates in a void which is the void of the Other as such, the ex nihilo properly speaking. The voice responds to what is said, but it cannot answer for it. In other words: in order for it to respond, we have to incorporate the voice as otherness of what is said.

(10) It is indeed for this reason, and not for any other, that detached from ourselves, our voice appears to us to have a strange sound. The structure of the Other, in itself, constitutes a certain void, the void of its lack of guarantee. The truth enters the world with the signifier and before any control. It is experienced, it refers itself on only by its echoes into the real. Now, it is in this void that the voice qua distinct from sonorities, the not modulated but articulated voice resonates. The voice involved, is the voice qua imperative, in so far as it calls for obedience or conviction, that it situates itself, not with respect to music, but with respect to the word.

It would be interesting to see the distance that exists, in connection with this well-known miscognition of the recorded voice, between the experience of the singer and that of the orator. I propose to those who are willing to do some research for free on this, to do it: I do not have the time to do it myself.

But I believe that it is here that we put our finger on this distinct form of identification that I was not able to approach last year, which ensures that the identification of the voice gives us at least the first model which ensures that in certain cases we are not speaking about the same identification as in the others, we speak about Einverleibung, of incorporation.

The psychoanalysts of the right generation were aware of this. There was a certain Mr Isakover who wrote in the 20th year of the International Journal a very remarkable article which moreover to my mind is only of interest because of the need he felt to give a really striking image of what was distinct in this type of identification. Because, as you will see, he is going to look for it in something whose relationships - as you will see - are singularly more distant from the phenomenon than For that purpose, if he interests himself in the little animal which is called the [Palaemon], if I remember rightly, because I have not had time to check this memory - which is called, I believe, Daphnia and which without being at all a shrimp you can present it to yourself as greatly resembling it. In any case, this animal which lives in salt water has the curious habit, as we would say in our language, of plugging the shell during its metamorphoses with tiny grains of sand, of introducing them into what it has in terms of a reduced apparatus described as (11) stato-acoustic, in other words into the utricles - for it does not have our extraordinary cochlea - into the utricles, having introduced these lumps of sand - because it has to put them in from outside, because it does not produce them of itself in any way - the utricle closes again and here it is inside these little bells that are necessary for its equilibrium. It brings them in from outside. You must admit that the relationship with the constitution of the superego is rather distant; nevertheless what interests me, is that Mr Isakover did not think he could find any better comparison than to refer himself to this operation. You have all the same, I hope, heard being awakened in yourselves the echoes of physiology, and you know that malicious experimenters substituted grains of steel for grains of sand, as a way of amusing themselves subsequently with the Daphnia and a magnet.

A voice therefore is not assimilated but it is incorporated, this is what can give it a function in modelling our void. And we rediscover here my instrument of the other day, the shofar of the synagogue. What gives its meaning to this possibility that for an instant it can be entirely musical - is this elementary fifth even music, this deviation of a fifth in it? - that it can be a substitute for the word, by powerfully wrenching our ear away from all its customary harmonies. It models the locus of our anxiety, but, let us note, only after the desire of the Other has taken the form of a commandment. That is why it can play its eminent function of giving to anxiety its resolution, whether it is called guilt or pardon, and which is precisely the introduction of a different order. The fact that desire is a lack is fundamental here, we will say that it is its "primordial fault", fault in the sense that something is lacking (fait default). Change the meaning of this fault by giving it a content in the articulation of what? Let us leave it in suspense. And this is what explains the birth of guilt and its relationship to anxiety.

In order to know what can be made of it, it is necessary for me to lead you into a field which is not that of this year, but which we must engage a little with here. I said that I did not know what, in the shofar, let us say the clamour of guilt, is articulated from the Other who covers anxiety. If our formula is correct, something like the desire of the Other must be involved in it.

I will give myself three more minutes to introduce something which prepares the way and next time we will be able to take our next step, namely to tell you that what is here most favourably prepared to be illuminated reciprocally, is the notion of (12) sacrifice.

Many other people besides me have tried to tackle what is involved in sacrifice. I will tell you - we are short of time - briefly, that sacrifice is destined, not at all to be an offering or a gift which spreads itself into a quite different dimension, but to be the capture of the Other as such in the network of desire.

The matter should already be perceptible, namely what it is reduced to for us on the ethical plane. It is a common experience that we do not live our lives, whoever we are, without ceaselessly offering to some unknown divinity or other the sacrifice of some little mutilation that we impose on ourselves, validly or not, in the field of our desires

Not all the underpinnings of the operation are visible. That it is a matter of something which refers to o as pole of our desire is not in doubt. But it will be necessary, the next time, for me to show you that something more is necessary, and specifically - I hope that at this meeting I will have a large convent of obsessionals - and specifically that this o is something already consecrated, which is something that cannot be conceived of except by taking up again in its original form what is involved in sacrifice.

We no doubt have for our part, lost our gods in the great fair of civilisation, but a rather prolonged time at the origin of all peoples shows that there is linked into them from the beginning like real persons, not omnipotent gods, but gods powerful where they were. The whole question was to know whether these gods desired something. Sacrifice consisted in behaving as if they desired like us: therefore o has the same structure. That does not mean that they are going to eat what is sacrificed to them, nor even that it can be of any use to them; but the important thing is that they desire it and, I would say further, that this does not provoke anxiety in them.

For there is something else that up to the present no one, I believe, has resolved in a satisfactory fashion: the victims always had to be without stain. Now remember what I told you about the stain at the level of the specular field: with the stain there appears, there is prepared the possibility of the resurgence, in the field of desire, of what is hidden behind, namely in this case this eye whose relationship with this field must necessarily be elided in order that desire can remain there with this ubiquitous, even vagabond possibility, which in any case allows it to escape from anxiety. To tame the god in the snare of desire is essential, and not to awaken anxiety.

Time forces me to end. You will see that, however lyrical this last diversion may appear to you, it will serve us as a guide in the much more day-to-day realities of our experience.

Seminar 22: Wednesday 12 June 1963

Anxiety lies in this fundamental relationship that the subject is in with what I have called up to now the desire of the Other.

Analysis has, has always had and keeps as its object the discovery of a desire. It is - you will admit - for some structural reasons that I am led, this year, to disengage, to bring into function as such in a circumscribed, articulated way, and this just as much by what we could call an algebraic definition, as by an articulation in which the function appears in a sort of gap, of residue of the signifying function as such; but I also did it piece by piece, this is the path that I will take today.

In every advance, in every becoming of this o as such, anxiety appears precisely in function of its relationship to the desire of the Other. But what is its relationship to the desire of the subject? It is absolutely situatable in the form that I already advanced at the appropriate time: o is not the object of desire, the one that we search to reveal in analysis, it is its cause.

This feature is essential; for if anxiety marks the dependency of every constitution of the subject - his dependency on the Other - the desire of the subject is thus found appended to this relationship through the mediation of the first, antecedent constitution of o.

This is the interest that pushes me to remind you how this presence of o as cause of desire announces itself. From the first data of analytic research, it announces itself in a more or less veiled fashion precisely in the function of the cause.

This function can be mapped out in the data of our field, the one in which research engages, namely the field of the symptom. In every symptom, in so far as a term of this name is what interests us, this dimension that I am going to try to bring into play today before you manifests itself. To make you sense it, I will start from a symptom which it is not for nothing has - as you will see after the event - this exemplary function, namely the symptom of the obsessional. But - I am indicating it right away - if I put it forward, it is because it allows us once again to go into this mapping out of the function of o, in so far as it unveils itself functioning in the first givens of the symptom in the dimension of the cause.

(2) What does the obsessional present to us in the pathognomic form of his position? The obsession or the compulsion, articulated or not as a motivation in his inner language: "Do this or that; check whether the door is closed or not, whether the tap is on". As we will see later perhaps, it is the symptom which takes in its most exemplary form, implies as I might say, that not following the line awakens anxiety. It is this which brings it about that the symptom, I would say, indicates in its very phenomenon that we are at the most favourable level to link the position of o as much to the relationships of anxiety as to the relationships of desire.

Anxiety, in fact, appears - because desire, at the beginning, historically before Freudian research, before the analysis of our praxis, is hidden, and we know the trouble we have to unmask it, if we ever do unmask it!

But here there deserves to be highlighted this datum of our experience which appears from the very first observations of Freud and which, I would say, constitutes, even if it has not been situated as such, perhaps the most essential step in the advance into obsessional neurosis, it is that Freud, and we ourselves every day have recognised, can recognise this fact that the analytic procedure does not begin from the enunciation of the symptom as I have just described it to you, namely according to its classical form, the one which had already been defined much earlier, the compulsion with the anxious struggle which accompanies it, but in the recognition of the following: the fact is that it functions like that. This recognition is not an effect detached from the functioning of this symptom, it is not epiphenomenally that the subject has to perceive that it functions like that.

The symptom is only constituted when the subject becomes aware of it; because we know from experience that there are forms of obsessional behaviour in which the subject, not only has not noticed his obsessions, but has not even constituted them as such. And the first step, in this case, of the analysis - the passages of Freud on this point are celebrated - is that the symptom is constituted in its classical form. Without this, there is no means of getting out of it and not simply because there is no way of speaking about it, but because there is no way of catching it by the ear. What is this ear in question? It is this something of the symptom that we can say is unassimilated by the subject.

(3) In order for the symptom to emerge from the state of an as yet unformulated enigma, the step is not that it should be formulated, it is that in the subject something should be outlined whose character is that it is suggested to him that there is a cause for that. This is the original dimension taken on here in the form of the phenomenon, and I will show you besides where one can rediscover it.

This dimension - that there is a cause for that - in which simply the implication of the subject in his behaviour is broken, this rupture is the necessary complement for the symptom to be approachable by us. What I intend to say to you and to show you, is that this sign does not constitute a step in what I could call the understanding of the situation, that it is something more, that there is a reason why this step is essential in the treatment of the obsessional.

This is impossible to articulate if we do not display in an altogether radical fashion the relationship between the function of o, the cause of desire, and the mental dimension of cause as such. This, I already indicated in what I might call some asides in my discourse, and I wrote it somewhere at a point that I could find again in the article "Kant with Sade" which appeared in the April edition of the journal Critique. It is on this point that I intend today to bring to bear the main part of my discourse.

From now on you see the interest in marking, in making it likely, that this dimension of the cause indicates - and only indicates - the emergence, the presentification, in the starting data of the analysis of the obsessional, of this o around which - this is in the future of what I am trying for the moment to explain to you - around which there has to turn the whole analysis of the transference in order not to be obliged, required to turn in a circle. A circle certainly is not nothing, the circuit is gone through; but it is clear that there is - and I am not the one who enounced it - a problem about the end of the analysis, one which is enounced as follows: the irreducibility of a transference neurosis. This transference neurosis is or is not the same as the one which was detectable at the beginning. Undoubtedly it is different in being entirely present, it appears to us sometimes in an impasse, that is to say sometimes culminates in a complete stagnation of the relationships between the analysand and the analyst. Its only difference to everything that is produced in an analogous way, at the beginning of the analysis, is that it is completely collected together.

(4) One enters analysis through an enigmatic door: for the transference neurosis is there in each and every one, even in Alcibiades: it is Agathon that he loves. But in a being as free as Alcibiades, the transference is obvious. Even though this love is what is called a real love, what we too often call a lateral transference, this is where the transference is. The astonishing thing is that one goes into analysis despite all the things that hold us back in the transference functioning as real.

The real subject of astonishment as regards the circuit of the analysis, is how, going into it despite the transference neurosis, one can obtain the transference neurosis itself on the way out. No doubt it is because there is some misunderstanding about the analysis of transference. Without this one would not see there being manifested sometimes, this satisfaction which I have heard expressed, that to have given energy to this transference neurosis is not perhaps perfection, but it is all the same a result; it is true - but it is all the same a result that is itself rather perplexing.

If I enounce that the path passes through o, the only object to be proposed for analysis, for the analysis of transference, this does not mean that this does not leave open, as you will see, another problem. It is precisely in this subtraction that there can appear this essential dimension, that of a question always posed, in short, but certainly not resolved - for every time it is posed the inadequacy of the answers is really tangible, evident, striking to every eye - that of the desire of the analyst.

This short reminder to show you the interest of what is presently at stake, this short reminder having been given, let us return to o. o is the cause, the cause of desire. I pointed out to you that to return to the enigma which the functioning of the category of the cause proposes to us is not a bad way of understanding it. For after all it is quite clear that whatever critique, whatever effort of reduction, phenomenological or not, that we apply to it, this category functions, and not simply as an archaic stage of our development.

What is indicated by the way in which I intend to refer it here to the original function of the object o as cause of desire, signifies the transference of the question of the category of causality, from what I would call with Kant the transcendental aesthetic, to that which - if you are willing to agree to it - I would call my "transcendental ethics".

(5) And here I am forced to advance onto a terrain that I am forced to propose simply, in order to sweep the sides of it with a searchlight. Without being able even to insist, it would be well, I would say, for the philosophers to do their work and notice for example, and dare to formulate something which would allow us truly to situate in its place this operation which I am indicating in saying that I extract the function of cause from the field of "the transcendental aesthetic", from that of Kant, it would be fitting for others to indicate to you that this is only a sort of completely pedagogical extraction, because there are many things, other things, that it would be fitting to extract from this "transcendental aesthetic".

Here I have to do, at least by way of indication, what I succeeded in eluding the last time by a conjuring trick, when I spoke to you about the scopic field of desire. I cannot avoid it. It is necessary all the same that I say, that I indicate here, at the very moment that I am advancing further, what was implied in what I was telling you, namely that space is not at all an a priori category of sensible intuition, that it is very astonishing that at the point of advancement that we are at in science no one has yet attacked directly something that everything encourages us to do: to formulate that space is not a feature of our subjective constitution beyond which the thing in itself would find, as one might say, a free field, namely that space forms part of the real, and that, after all, in what I enounced, articulated, drew here before your eyes last year with all this topology, there is something whose note some of you certainly felt: this topological dimension, in the sense that its symbolic handling transcends space, evoked for many, not only for some, so many shapes which are presentified for us by the schemas of the development of the embryo, shapes that are singular through this common singular Gestalt which is theirs and which carries us very very far from the direction in which the Gestalt has advanced, namely in the direction of the good shape, shows us, on the contrary something which is everywhere reproduced, and regarding which, in an impressionistic notation, I would say that it is tangible in a sort of torsion to which the organisation of life seems to be obligated in order to lodge itself in real space.

The thing is everywhere present in what I explained to you last year, and also moreover this year, for it is precisely at these points of torsion that there are also produced the points of (6) rupture whose importance I tried to show you in more than one case in a fashion linked to our own topology, that of the S, of the 0 and the of the o, in a fashion which is more efficacious, more true, more conform to the operation of functions than anything that is mapped out in the doctrine of Freud, in the way that the differences, the vacillations are themselves already indicative of the necessity of what I am doing there, which is linked to the ambiguity on his part for example about the relationships between ego/non-ego, container/contained, ego/outside world. It leaps to the eyes that all of these divisions do not overlap. Why?

It is necessary to grasp what is involved and to have found other reference points of this subjective topology that we are exploring here. I will finish with it with this indication, whose import I know that at least some of you know very well from having heard me now, that the reality of space qua three dimensional space is something essential to grasp in order to define the form taken at the level of the stage that I tried to illuminate in my first lecture, as the function of the scopic stage, the form taken on there by the presence of desire, specifically as phantasy, namely that what I tried to define in the structure of the phantasy, namely the function of the frame - understand by that the window - is not a metaphor. If the frame exists, it is because space is real.

As regards the cause, let us try to grasp in the very thing which is the common undergrowth of the understandings you have which are bequeathed to you from a certain hubbub of philosophical discussions because of having passed through a class designated by this name, La Philosophie, because it is quite clear that an index of this origin of the function of the cause is very clearly given us in history by the following: the fact is that it is in the measure of the critique of this function of cause, of the attempt to remark that it is ungraspable, that what it is necessarily, is always at least a cause behind a cause, and what is necessary for it to be other in order to be equivalent to this incomprehensible, without which moreover we cannot even begin to articulate anything whatsoever. But of course, this critique has its fecundity and one sees it in history: the more the cause is criticised, the more the exigencies that one can describe as those of determinism impose themselves on thought. The less the cause is graspable, the more everything appears caused, and up to (7) the final term, the one that has been called the meaning of history.

One can say nothing other than that "everything is caused", except for the fact that everything that happens there presides and always begins from a "sufficiently caused", in the name of which there is reproduced in history a beginning, an un-caused which I would not dare to call absolute, but which was certainly unexpected and which classically leaves lots of work to be done nachträglich by the prophets, which is the daily bread of the aforesaid prophets, who are the professional interpreters of the meaning of history.

Now let us say very simply how we envisage this function of the cause. We envisage it, this function everywhere present in our thinking about the cause, I would say first of all to make myself understood, as the shadow cast, but very precisely and better the metaphor of this primordial cause, substance of this function of the cause which is precisely the o qua anterior to all this phenomenology. We have defined o as the remainder of the constitution of the subject at the locus of the Other in so far as it has to constitute itself as a speaking subject, a barred subject, $.

If the symptom is what we are saying, namely entirely implicatable in this process of the constitution of the subject, in so far as he has to construct himself in the locus of the Other, the implication of the cause in the becoming of the symptom as I defined it for you earlier, is a legitimate part of this becoming. This means that the cause implicated in the question of the symptom is literally, if you wish, a question, but one of which the symptom is not the effect. It is the result of it. The effect is the desire. But it is a unique effect and quite strange in that it is what is going to explain to us, or at the very least make us understand, all the difficulties that arose from linking the common relationship which is imposed on the mind between the cause and the effect. The fact is that the primordial effect of this cause, o, at the level of desire, this effect which is called desire and this effect which I have just qualified as strange since, you should note, since it is precisely desire, it is an effect which has nothing effected about it.

Desire taken in this perspective is situated in effect essentially as a lack of effect. The cause is thus constituted as supposing the effects of the fact that primordially the effect is lacking there. And this is rediscovered, you will rediscover it, in every phenomenology. The gap between cause and effect, in the measure that it is filled - this indeed is what is called in a certain perspective the progress of science - makes the (8) function of the cause vanish, I mean there where it is filled.

Moreover the explanation of anything whatsoever culminates in the measure that it is completed, in leaving only signifying connections, in volatilising what animated it at its origin, what was pushing to be explained, namely what one does not understand, namely the effective gap. And there is no cause which is constituted in the mind as such, which does not imply this gap. All of this may seem to you quite superfluous. Nevertheless this is what allows there to be grasped what I would call the naivety of some of the research done by psychologists and specifically that of Piaget.

The paths along which I am leading you this year - you have already seen it announcing itself - pass by way of a certain evocation of what Piaget calls "egocentric language". As Piaget himself recognises - he has written it, I am not interpreting him here - hi3 idea of the egocentricity of a certain childish discourse starts from this supposition: he believes he has demonstrated that children do not understand one another, that they speak for themselves.

The world of suppositions that lies beneath this is, I would not say unfathomable; one can specify them for the greater part: it is an excessively wide-spread supposition, namely that the word is made to communicate. That is not true. If Piaget cannot grasp this sort of gap there again which he himself nevertheless designates - and this is really what is important in reading his works, I beg you between now and the time that I return or I do not return, to get hold of The language and thought of the child which is an altogether admirable book; it illustrates at every moment the degree to which what Piaget collects in terms of facts in this approach, which is aberrant in principle, demonstrates something quite different to what he thinks; naturally since he is far from being a fool, it happens that Piaget's own remarks go along that very path, in any case for example the problem as to why this language of the subject is essentially made for him, never happens in a group.

What he lacks, I would ask you to read these pages because I cannot go through them with you, but at every moment you will see how his thinking slips, clings to a position of the question which is precisely the one which veils the phenomenon which, as a matter of fact, is very clearly displayed, and the essential of it is essentially the fact that it is a different thing to say that the word has essentially for effect to communicate, while (9) the effect of the word, the effect of the signifier is to give rise in the subject to the dimension of the signified essentially. I will return to it again if necessary.

That this relationship to the other that is depicted for us here as being the key, under the name of the socialisation of language, the key to the turning point between egocentric language and completed language, this turning point is not, in its function, a point of effect, of effective impact, it is nameable as a desire to communicate. It is indeed moreover because this desire is disappointed in Piaget - it is quite tangible - that his whole pedagogy here gives rise to systems and ghosts that are, in fact, rather affected. That the child appears to him to only half-understand him, he adds: "They do not even understand one another". But is that where the question lies?

One sees very well in his text how the question is not there. One sees it in the way that he articulates what he calls understanding between children. As you know this is how he proceeds; -he begins by taking for example the following schema which is going to be depicted on an image which is going to be the support of the explanations, the schema of a tap. That gives us something more or less like that, this being the cross-section of the tap; you say to the child, as often as necessary: "You see the little tube here - it will also be called the door - it is blocked; which means that the water there cannot get through in order to flow here into what will also be called in a certain fashion the outlet, etc".

He explains. Here is this schema, if you want to test it. He thought moreover - I point this out to you in passing - he should complete it himself with the presence of the basin which will absolutely not intervene in the six or nine, seven points of explanation that he gives us.

He will be very struck by the following: the fact is that the child repeats very well all the terms of the explanation that he, Piaget, has given him. He is going to make use of this child as an explainer for another child, whom he will bizarrely call the reproducer.

First phase: he notices, not without some astonishment, that what the child has repeated so well, which means for him that he obviously has understood - I am not saying that he is wrong, I am saying that Piaget does not even ask himself the question - that what the child has repeated to him, Piaget, in the test that he carried out with a view to seeing what the child had understood, (10) is not going to be in any way identical to what he is then going to explain. At which Piaget makes this very correct remark, that what he elides in his explanations, is precisely what the child has understood, without seeing that in giving this explanation this would imply that the child for his part would explain nothing if he had really understood everything, as Piaget says. It is of course not true that he has understood everything - as you are going to see - any more than anybody else.

With these very insufficient explanations that the explainer gives to the reproducer, what astonishes Piaget, is that in a field like that of these examples, namely the field that he calls that of explanations - because I am leaving to one side, for lack of time, the field that he describes as that of "stories".

For stories things function differently. But what does Piaget call stories? I assure you that he has a way of transcribing the story of Niobe which is a pure scandal. Because it does not seem even to occur to him that in speaking about Niobe, one is speaking about a myth and that there is perhaps a dimension of myth which imposes itself, which absolutely clings to the simple term which is put forward under this proper name Niobe, and that to transform it into a sort of emollient hogwash - I would ask you to consult this text which is simply incredible - one is proposing perhaps to the child something within his range, which is simply something which signals a profound deficit in the experimenter, Piaget himself, with regard to what are the functions of language. If one is proposing a myth, let it be one, and not this vague little story: "Once upon a time there was a lady called Niobe who had twelve sons and twelve daughters. She met a fairy who had only one son and no daughter; now the lady mocked the fairy because she had only one boy; the fairy then became angry and tied the lady to a rock. The lady cried for ten years, and then she was changed into a stream, her tears had made a stream which still flows".

This has really no equivalent except the two other stories that Piaget proposes, that of the little black boy who breaks his cake on the way out and melts the pat of butter on the return journey, and the still worse one of children transformed into swans, who remain all their lives separated from their parents because of this curse, but who, when they return, not alone find their (11) parents dead, but regaining their first shape - this is not indicated in the mythical dimension - in regaining their first shape, they have nevertheless aged. I do not know if there is a single myth which allows the aging process to continue during a transformation. In a word, the invention of these stories of Piaget have one thing in common with those of Binet in that they reflect the profound wickedness of every pedagogical position.

I apologise to you for wandering off into this parenthesis. Let us come back to my explanations. At least you will have grasped in it this dimension noted by Piaget himself of this sort of wastage, of entropy, as I might put, of comprehension which is going to be necessarily degraded by the very fact of the explanation being necessarily verbal. He himself notes to his great surprise that there is an enormous contrast between the explanations, when what is involved is an explanatory one like that, and what happens in his "stories", "stories", that I repeat I put in inverted commas. Because it is very probable that if the "stories" confirm his theory regarding the entropy, if I may express myself thus, of comprehension, it is precisely because they are not "stories", and that, if they were "stories", the true myth, there v/ould probably be no wastage.

In any case, I for my part propose a little sign to you, it is that, when one of these children, when he has to repeat the story of Niobe, makes emerge, at the point that Piaget tells us that the lady had been tied to a rock - never, in any form, has the myth of Niobe articulated such a moment - of course, it is easy, playing, you will be told, on something misheard and on a pun, but why precisely this one makes emerge the dimension of a rock which has a stain, restoring the dimension that in my previous seminar I made emerge for you as being essential for the victim of sacrifice, that of not having any. But let us leave it. It is of course not a proof, but simply a suggestion.

I return to my explanation and to the remark of Piaget that, despite the defects of the explanation, I mean the fact that the explainer explains badly, the one to whom he is explaining understands much better than the explainer, by his inadequate explanations, bears witness to having understood. Of course here the explanation always arises: he himself does the work again. Because how does he define the rate of understanding between children? What the reproducer has understood
What the explainer has understood

(12) I do not know if you notice that there is one thing here that is never spoken about, it is what Piaget himself has understood! It is nevertheless essential, because we do not leave the children to spontaneous language, namely to see what they understand.

Now it is clear that what Piaget seems not to have seen, is that his own explanation, from the point of view of anyone at all, of some other third person, cannot be understood at all. For as I told you earlier, if this little blocked tube here is switched on, thanks to something that Piaget gives all its importance to, the operation of the fingers which make the tap turn in such a way that the water can flow, does that mean that it flows? There are absolutely no details about this in Piaget who of course knows well that if there is no pressure, nothing will come out of the tap even if you turn it on, but who believes he is able to omit this because he is placing himself at the level of the so-called mind of the child. Let me continue. This seems to be completely stupid, all of this, but you are going to see. The coming into view, the springing forth; the meaning of the whole adventure does not emerge from my speculations, but from experience. You will see.

It emerges all the same from this remark that I have made to you - I who do not claim to have understood exhaustively - that there is one thing that is very certain: it is that the explanation of the tap is not well done, if what is involved is the tap as cause, by saying that it operates sometimes on and sometimes off. A tap is made to be turned off. It is enough that once, because of a strike, you no longer know when the pressure is going to come back to know that, if you have left it on, there are lots of inconveniences, that it ought therefore to be turned off even when there is no pressure.

Now what is marked in what happens in the transmission from the explainer to the reproducer? It is something that Piaget deplores, which is that the so called reproducer child no longer has the slightest interest in anything that is involved concerning two branches, the operation of the fingers and everything that follows from it. Nevertheless, he points out, the other has transmitted a certain part of it to him. The wastage in comprehension seems to be enormous to him; but I assure you, if you read the explanations of the little third party, of the little reproducer, of little Riv in the text in question, you will notice that what he precisely puts the stress on, are two things: namely the effect of the tap as something (13) which can be turned off and the result, namely that thanks to a tap one can fill a basin without it overflowing, the emergence as such of the dimension of the tap as cause. Why does Piaget so completely miss the phenomenon which is produced, if not because he totally fails to recognise that what there is for a child in a tap as cause, are the desires that the tap provokes in him, namely that for example it makes him want to have a pee or, like every time one is in the presence of water, that one is with respect to that water a communicating vessel and that it is not for nothing that in order to speak to you about libido I took this metaphor of what happens between the subject and his specular image.

If man had a tendency to forget that in the presence of water he is a communicating vessel, there is in the childhood of most the washtub to remind him that effectively, what happens in a child of the age of those that Piaget designates for us, in the presence of a tap, is this irresistible type of acting-out which consists in doing something which runs the greatest risk of upsetting it, and thus the tap finds itself once again in the place of the cause, namely at the level also of the phallic dimension, as that which necessarily introduces the fact that the little tap is something which can have a relationship with the plumber, that one can unscrew, dismantle, replace... etc: it is (-^). It is not the fact of omitting these elements of experience - that moreover Piaget, who is very well informed about analytical matters, is not ignorant of - that I intend to underline, it is that he does not see the link between these relationships that we call, for our part, "complexual" and the whole original constitution of what he claims to question, the function of the cause.

We will return to this language of the child. I pointed out to you that the new evidence of original works, which one can only be astonished were not performed up to now, allows us now to grasp in statu nascendi the first operation of the signifier in these hypnopompic monologues of the very small child, almost two years old, and to grasp in them - I will read you these texts at the proper time - in the fascinating form of the Oedipus complex itself here and now; already articulated, giving here the experimental proof of the idea that I always put forward to you that the unconscious is essentially the effect of the signifier.

(14) I will finish in this connection with the position of the psychologists, for the work that I am speaking to you about is prefaced by a psychologist who is very attractive at first sight in the sense that he admits that it has never happened that a psychologist has interested himself in these functions starting from, he tells us - a psychologist's own admission - from the supposition that nothing interesting is notable about the coming into play of language in the subject, except at the level of education: in effect it is something that is learned.

But what makes language, outside the field of learning? It required the suggestion of a linguist for an interest to begin to be taken in it, and we believe that here the psychologist lays down his arms. For it is certainly with some humour that he highlights this deficit in psychological research up to now.

Well that is not at all the case. At the end of his preface, he makes two remarks which show the point to which the habit of the psychologist is really inveterate. The first is that, since this constitutes a volume of about three hundred pages and is a considerable weight since these monologues were collected for a month and a complete chronological list of them was made, at this rate of going think of all the research that we are going to have to do! This is the first remark.

And the second one is even better. It is extremely interesting to note all that; but it seems to me for my part, says this psychologist who is called George Miller, that the only thing that would be interesting, is to know: "How much of that does he know?" What does the child know about what is telling you? Now it is precisely there that the question lies. It is precisely, if he does not know what he is saying, that it is very important to note that he says all the same, what he will know or will not know later on, namely the elements of the Oedipus complex.

It is ten minutes past two. I would like all the same to give you the little schema of what I am going to advance towards today concerning the obsessional. In five minutes, the question as it presents itself.

If the five stages, if I can express myself thus, of the constitution of o in this relationship of S to O , whose first operation you see here, the second phase here not being outside the range of your understanding after the division I already added on as being the following - it is far from the transformation of S into ϵ when it passes from this part to that (15) one, the Euler circle having obviously to be specified - if the five stages therefore of this definition of o are definable as I am going to tell you now, if, I think, it is sufficiently posited from this resume of what I advanced step by step in the preceding lectures at the level of the relationship to the oral object, that it is, let us say to be clear today, not need of the Other - this ambiguity is rich and we will certainly not refuse ourselves the use of it - but need in the Other, at the level of the Other, it is in function of the dependence on the maternal being that there is produced the function of the disjunction between this subject and o , the nipple, whose veritable import you will only be able to perceive if, as I very sufficiently indicated to you, you see that the nipple forms part of the inner world of the subject and not of the body of the mother. I pass on

At the second stage of the anal object, you have the demand in the Other, the educative demand par excellence in so far as it refers to the anal object. There is no way of grasping, of seizing what the veritable function of this anal object is, if you do not sense it as being the remainder in the demand of the Other, which I am calling here to make myself clearly understood "demand in the Other". The whole dialectic of what I have taught you to recognise in the function of $(-o)$ f a function unique compared to all the other functions of o in so far as it is defined by a lack, by the lack of an object, this lack manifests itself as such in this effectively central relationship - and this is what justifies the whole axing of analysis on sexuality - that we will call here jouissance in the Other.

The relationship between this jouissance in the Other as such, and any introduction of the missing instrument that $(-p)$ designates, is an inverse relationship. This is what-T articulated in my two last lectures and which is the sufficiently solid base of every sufficiently effective situation of what we are calling castration anxiety.

At the scopic stage which is properly that of phantasy, the one with which we have to deal with at the level of o , it is the power in the Other, this power in the Other which is the mirage of human desire that we condemn in what is for it the major dominant form of every possession, contemplative possession, because it fails to recognise what is involved, namely a mirage of power.

As you see I am going very quickly. At the fifth and final stage, what is there at the level of o ? Provisionally we will say that it is there that there ought to emerge in a pure form - I am saying that this is only a provisional formulation - something which is of course present at all the stages, namely the desire in the Other. What confirms it for us, in any case (16) what signals it for us in the example that we started from, namely the obsessional, is the apparent dominance of anxiety in its phenomenology. It is the structural fact that we are the only ones to perceive up to a certain moment of analysis, that whatever he does, that at whatever refinement there culminate, as there are being constructed, his phantasies and his practices, what the obsessional grasps in them - check out the bearing of this formula - is always the desire in the Other. It is in the measure of the return of this desire in the Other, in so far as in his case it is essentially repressed, that everything is determined in the symptomatology of the obsessional, and specifically in the symptoms where the dimension of the cause is glimpsed as anxiety-provoking. The solution is known: to cover the desire of the Other, the obsessional has one way: it is to have recourse to his demand. Observe an obsessional in his biographical behaviour, what I called earlier his attempts at getting by with respect to desire. His attempts, however audacious they may be, are always marked by an original condemnation against rejoining their goal. However refined, however complicated, however luxuriant and perverse his attempts at getting by, he always has to have them authorised: it is necessary for the Other to demand it of him. This is the mainspring of what is produced at a certain turning point in every analysis of an obsessional.

In the whole measure that the analysis sustains an analogical dimension, that of demand, something subsists up to a very-advanced point - can it even be gone beyond? - of this mode of escape of the obsessional. But see what the consequences of it are. It is in the measure that the avoidance of the obsessional is the covering up of the desire in the Other by the demand in the Other, it is in this measure that o, the object as cause, comes to be situated where demand dominates, namely at the anal stage where o is, not purely and simply excrement, but like that: it is excrement qua demanded.

Now nothing had ever been analysed about this relationship to the anal object in these coordinates which are its veritable coordinates. To understand the source of what one can call anal anxiety, in so far as it emerges from an analysis of an obsessional pursued to that point - something that never happens - the veritable dominance, the character of irreducible and almost in certain cases unmasterable kernel of the apparition of anxiety at this point which ought to appear a final point, this is something that we will be able to locate the next time only on condition that we articulate everything that results from the relationship between the anal object as cause of desire and the demand which requires it, which has nothing to do with this mode of desire which is, through this cause, determining.

As someone pointed out to me after my last talk, this definition that I am pursuing this year before you of the function of the object o, tends to oppose to the linking of this object to stages, to what one might call the "Abrahamic" - I mean the psychoanalyst - conception of its mutations, what one might call its circular constitution, the fact that at all these levels it holds up qua object o, that under the different forms in which it manifests itself, it is always the same function that is involved, namely how o is linked to the constitution of the subject at the locus of the Other and represents it.

It is true that its central function, at the level of the phallic stage where the function of o is essentially represented by a lack, by the absence of the phallus as constituting the disjunction which joins desire to jouissance - this is what is expressed by what I remind you we are calling here by convention level 3 of the different stages of the object that we have described - it is true, I am saying, that this stage has what we could call an extreme position, that stage 4 and stage 5, if you wish, are in a return position which brings them into correlation with stage 1 and stage 2. Everyone knows - and this is all that this little schema is designed to recall - the links between the oral stage and its object and the primary manipulations of the super-ego, regarding which I have already indicated to you - by recalling to you the obvious connection with this form of the object o which is the voice - already recalled, that there cannot be a valid analytic conception of the super-ego which forgets that at its deepest phase the voice is one of the forms of the object o.

These two signs "an" for anal and "scop" for scopophilic recall to you the long-remarked connection between the anal stage and scopophilia. It nevertheless remains that, however conjoined, two by two, the stage-forms 1,2,3, 4,5 may be, they are all oriented in accordance with this mounting and then descending arrow. This is what ensures that in every analytic phase of the reconstitution of the data of repressed desire in a regression, there is a progressive aspect, that in every progressive access to the stage here posed by the very inscription as being superior, there is a regressive aspect.

(2) Such is, such are the indications that I want to recall to you so that they may remain present in your mind throughout the whole of my discourse today, with which I am now going to continue.

As I told you the last time, it is a matter of illustrating, explaining the function of a certain object which is, if you wish, shit, to call it by its name, in the constitution of anal desire. You know after all, that it is the privilege of analysis to have made emerge in the history of thought the determining function of this unpleasant object in the economy of desire.

I pointed out to you the last time that with respect to desire, the object o always presents itself as a cause function, to the point of possibly being for us, if you understand me, if you are following me, the root point at which there is elaborated in the subject the function of the cause itself. If this primordial form is the cause of a desire, about which I underlined for you that here there is marked the necessity through which the cause can subsist in its mental function, always requires the existence of a gap between it and its effect, a gap that is so necessary that we are only able to still think cause where there is a risk of it being filled in, we have to make a veil subsist over the tight determinism, over the connections through which the cause acts, something that I illustrated the last time by the example of the tap, namely that only the child who neglected in that case, as was said, because he did not understand, the narrow mechanism that was represented to him in the shape of a section, of a schema of the tap, only to him who dispensed with or failed at this level of what Piaget calls understanding, to him alone is there revealed the essence of the function of the tap as cause, namely as concept of tap.

The origin of this necessity for the subsistence of the cause lies in the fact that in its primary form, it is cause of desire, namely of something essentially not effected. It is indeed for this reason that consistently with this conception, we can absolutely not confuse anal desire with what mothers, as much as the partisans of catharsis, might call in this case, the effect: has it had an effect? Excrement does not play the role of effect of what we are situating as anal desire, it is the cause of it.

In truth, if we are going to dwell on this singular object, it is as much because of the importance of its function, always reiterated for our attention, and especially - as you know - in the analysis of the obsessional, as for the fact that it (3) illustrates for us, once more, how appropriate it is to conceive that there subsist, for us, different modes of the object o.

It is in effect, at first sight, a little apart compared to the rest of these modes: the mammary constitution, the phallic functioning of the copulatory organ, the plasticity of the human larynx to the phonematic imprint, the anticipatory value of the specular image to the neo-natal prematuration of the nervous system, all these anatomical facts which I have recalled to you recently, one after the other, to show you the way in which they conjoin with the function of o, all these anatomical facts regarding which you can see, by simply enumerating them, the degree to which their place is dispersed under the tree of organic determinations, only take on in man their value as destiny, as Freud says, because they come, this I showed you for each one, to block out a key place on the chess board whose squares are structured from the subjectifying constitution as it results from the dominance of the subject who speaks over the subject who understands, over the subject of insight whose limits we know in the shape of the chimpanzee.

Whatever may be the supposed superiority of the capacities of man over the chimpanzee, it is clear that the fact that he goes further is linked to this dominance I have just spoken about, the dominance of the subject who speaks, which has for result in practice that the human being undoubtedly goes further. In doing this, he believes he reaches the concept, namely he believes that he is able to grasp the real by a signifier which determines this real according to its innermost causality.

The difficulties that we analysts have encountered in the field of intersubjective relationships - which the psychologists do not seem to make so much of a problem of, they constitute a rather greater one for us - these difficulties, provided we claim to account for the way in which the function of the signifier is originally mixed into these intersubjective relationships, these difficulties are the ones which lead us to a new critique of reason which it would be a kind of scholastic nonsense to see as some sort of recession in the all-conquering movement of the aforesaid reason.

This critique in effect is directed towards mapping out how this reason is already woven in at the level of the most opaque dynamism of the subject, where there is modified what he experiences in this dynamism as need into always more or less paradoxical - I say paradoxical as regards their supposed (4) naturalness - forms of what is called desire.

This critique thus proves, in what I have shown you to be the cause of desire - is it too high a price to pay? - that it has to be conjoined to this revelation that the notion of cause is found because of this to reveal its origin there. Obviously, it would be too psychologistic, with all the absurd consequences that this has concerning the legality of reason, to reduce it to a recourse, to a development of some events or other. But precisely this is not what we are doing, because the subjectification that is involved is not psychological or developmental. It shows what joins to the accidents of development - those which I first of all enumerated just now by reminding you of the list of them, the anatomical particularities that are involved in the case of man - joining therefore to these accidents of development the effect of a signifier whose transcendence is henceforth evident with respect to the aforesaid development.

Transcendence, and then what? There is no need to be startled! This transcendence is neither more nor less marked, at this level, than any other incidence of the real, this real that in biology is called on this occasion the Umwelt as a way of taming it. And precisely the existence of anxiety in the animal completely dismisses the spiritualist imputations which, from whatever quarter, may appear in my regard in connection with this situation of the signifier that I posit as transcendent on this occasion.

On every occasion of animal anxiety what is involved is indeed a perception of a beyond of the aforesaid Umwelt. It is because something has shaken this Umwelt to its foundations that the animal shows itself to be aware when he is stampeded by an earthquake for example or any other type of meteoric accident. And once more there is revealed the truth of the formula that anxiety is what does not deceive. The proof is, that when you see animals becoming excited in this way in the regions where these incidents can occur, you would do well to take account, before you are aware of it yourself, of what they are signalling to you about what is happening, what is imminent. For them as for us, it is the manifestation of a locus of the Other, of something else which manifests itself here as such, which does not mean that I am saying - and with good reason - that there is anywhere, on the other hand, that this locus of the Other can lodge itself outside real space, as I recalled the last time.

(5) We are now going to go into the following: into the particularity of the case which ensures that excrement can come to function at this point which is determined by the necessity in which the subject finds himself of constituting himself first of all in the signifier. The point is important because after all here - perhaps more than elsewhere - a sort of shadow of confusion reigns in a singular way. One is supposed to get closer to the matter - as it is appropriately called - or the concrete, in so far as we for our part know how to take into account the most disagreeable aspects of life; that it is there, and not in the Emyrean that we have to seek precisely the domain of causes. It is very amusing to grasp in the first introductory remarks of Jones, in an article whose reading cannot be too highly recommended to you because it is one in a thousand: it is the article which in the collection of his Selected Papers is called "The Madonna's conception through the year", the conception of the Madonna, the virginal conception, the conception of the Virgin through the ear. This is the subject that this Welshman, whose Protestant malice, I have to say, can absolutely not be eliminated from the background of complacency that he puts into it, to which this Welshman attaches himself in a 1914 article, as he emerged himself precisely from his first apprehensions, which had really been illuminating for him, about the prevalence of the anal function in the first few serious obsessionals that he had in hand, a few years after Freud's obsessionals; they are observations - I sought them out in their original text, the two editions precisely which precede the publication of this article in the Jahrbuch - they are obviously sensational dates, even though we have seen others since.

Here right away Jones tackles the subject by telling us that the fertilising breath is a lovely idea, and that everywhere in myth, in legend, in poetry, we have traces of it. What could be more beautiful than this awakening of being at the passage of the breath of the eternal! Jones for his part who knows a little bit more about it - it is true that his science is still of recent date, but in any case he is full of enthusiasm - is going to show us what sort of wind is involved: what is involved is anal wind.

And, as he tells us, it is clear that experience proves to us that the interest, and this is a presupposition, that the interest - it is the living interest, it is the biological interest, it is the interest that the subject, as he is discovered in analysis, shows in his excrements, in the shit that he produces - is infinitely more present more advanced, more (6) evident, more dominant than this something which no doubt he would have a lot of reasons to be preoccupied with, namely respiration, which scarcely seems, according to Jones, to attract his attention, and this for the simple reason, of course, that respiration is habitual.

The argument is weak. The argument is weak in a field, a discipline, which all the same cannot fail to highlight, and which subsequently highlighted, the importance of suffocation, of respiratory difficulty, in the altogether original establishment of the function of anxiety. That the living subject, even the human subject, that the living subject has not in this respect any warning about the importance of this function is surprising; I mean surprising as an initial introductory argument by Jones, especially since it is at the time where all the same there was already something well designed to highlight the eventual relationship between the respiratory function and what is involved: the fruitful moment of the sexual relationship; it is that this breathing, in the form of paternal or maternal panting, formed part indeed of the first phenomenology of the traumatic scene, to the point of entering quite legitimately into this sphere of what could emerge from it for the child in terms of sexual theory.

So that whatever may be the value of what Jones subsequently deploys, one can say that without it having to be refuted - for it is a fact that the path on which he engages here finds so many correlates in a mass of anthropological domains that one cannot say that his research indicated nothing, I am not speaking about the fact that one can easily find all sorts of references in mythological literature to the function of this lower breath, and even in the Upanishads where under the term Apana it is supposed to be specified that it is from the breathing of his behind that Brahma generated the human species in particular; there are a thousand other correlates designed to remind us on this occasion of the timeliness in such a text of these reminders - in truth on the particular subject, if you consult this article, you will see that its very extension, which borders on diffidence, sufficiently shows that in the end it is not - far from it - absolutely convincing.

But this is for us only a further stimulation, when it is a matter of questioning the subject about how it is that the function of excrement can play this privileged role in this mode (7) of subjective constitution which we define, to which we give the term, as being that of anal desire.

We will see that by taking it up again, we will see that this can only be settled by making intervene in a more ordered, more structural fashion, which is in accord with the spirit of our research, why it can come to occupy this place.

It is obvious that, apriori, this function of excrement which as compared to the different accidents that I evoked earlier, from the anatomical place of the mammary to the plasticity of the human larynx, and in between the specular image of castration linked after all, in short, to the particular conformity of the copulatory organ at a rather elevated level of the animal scale, excrement has been there from the beginning and even before the differentiation between the mouth and the anus: at the level of the blastopore, we already see it functioning. But it seems that if we construct for ourselves - it is always inadequate - a certain biological idea about the relationships of the living being and his milieu, excrement is characterised, all the same, as something rejected and as a consequence it is rather in the sense, in the current, in the flow of that which the living being as such tends to disinterest himself in. What interests him is what enters; what goes out, seems to imply in the structure that he has no tendency to retain it.

So that starting precisely from biological considerations, it may be indicated, it seems interesting to ask ourselves exactly how at the level of the living being it takes on this importance, this subjectified importance, because of course it is possible and it is even probable, and it is even observable that at the level of what one could call the living economy, excrement continues to have its importance in the milieu that it can manage also in certain conditions to saturate, to saturate sometimes to the point of rendering it incompatible with life; other times, when it saturates it in a fashion which at least for other organisms only takes on a function of support in the external milieu. There is a whole economy, of course, of the function of excrement, an intra-living and an inter-living economy.

Nor is this absent from human happenings, and I searched in vain in my library to show, to get you started on this track - I will find it again, it is lost, like excrement, an admirable little book, like many others by my friend Aldous Huxley, called Adonis and the Alphabet. Within this promising container you will find (8) a superb article about a factory-type organisation, in a town in the American West, for the recuperation of excrement at the urban level.

This has value only as an example, this happens in many other places besides industrial America. You certainly have not the slightest suspicion of the riches that can be reconstituted simply with the help of the excrements of a mass of humans. Besides it is not untimely to recall in this connection what a certain progress of interhuman relationships, of human relations, which is so much in vogue since the last war, was able to do during the aforesaid last war in terms of the reduction of entire human masses to the function of excrement. The transformation of numerous individuals of a people, chosen precisely because they were a people chosen among others, by means of the crematory furnace, to the state of something which finally, it appears, was distributed in Mittel europa as soap, is also something which shows us that in the economic circuit the perspective of man as being reducible to excrement is not absent.

But we analysts for our part we limit ourselves to the question of subjectification. Along what path does excrement enter into subjectification? Well, this is quite clear in the analytic references, where at least at first sight it appears quite clear, through the mediation of the demand of the Other represented in this case by the mother. When we have found that, we are quite content; here we have connected up with observational data: it involves education in what is called cleanliness, which commands the child to retain - this is something that is not all that obvious; the choice: the necessity to retain for too long a time - to retain the excrement and because of this already to outline its introduction into the domain of belonging, of a part of the body, which for at least a certain time must be considered as not to be alienated, then after that to release it, always on demand. We know the familiar scenes. They are fundamental, in common use: there is no need to criticise, nor to refrain, nor above all, good God, to accompany it with a lot of recommendations; the education of parents, always on the agenda, causes all too much damage in all these domains. After all, in short, thanks to the fact that the demand also becomes here a determining part in the releasing in question, to do something different here, which (9) quite obviously is destined to valorise this thing recognised for a moment and henceforth elevated to the function, all the same, of a part which the subject has some apprehension he is taking on, this part becoming at least valorised by the fact that it gives its satisfaction to the demand of the Other, besides being accompanied by all the caring we know about, in the measure that the other, not only pays attention to it, but adds to it all these supplementary dimensions that I do not need to evoke - it is like physics-for-fun in other domains - the sniffing, the approval, even the wiping, whose erotogenic effects are incontestable as everyone knows. They become all the more obvious when it happens - and as you know its not rare - that a mother continues to wipe her son's bottom until he is twelve years old. That is seen every day, so that of course, it would seem - my question is not all that important - that we see very well how the caca very easily takes on this function that I have called, God knows, that of agalma, an agalma whose passage after all to the register of the nauseating only occurs as an effect of the discipline itself of which it is an integral part.

Well then, it is precisely - that leaps to the eyes - something that would not allow you to state in any way, nevertheless, in a way that could satisfy us, the fullness of the effects which are attached to this special agalmatic relationship of the mother to the excrement of her child, if it were not necessary, to understand it, to put it, which is the factual data of analytic understanding, to put it into connection with the other forms of o, with the fact that the agalma in itself is not conceivable without its relationship to the phallus, to its absence and to phallic anxiety as such. In other words, it is qua symbolising castration - we know it right away - that the excremental o has come within the range of our attention.

I propose, I add, that we can understand nothing about the phenomenology - which is so fundamental for all our speculation - of obsession, if we do not grasp at the same time in a much more intimate, motivated, regular way than we habitually do, this link between excrement and, not just the (-<p) of the phallus, but with the other forms evoked here in what we could call the classification of stages, the other forms of o.

(10) Let us take things up regressively, with the reservation that I made at first, that this regressive has necessarily a progressive aspect. What is involved is grounded at the level of the oral stage: the fact is that the object o at the oral stage, the breast, the nipple, as you wish, the subject constituting himself originally, as much as completing himself, in the commandment of the voice, the subject does not know, cannot know the degree to which he is himself this being stuck on the breast of his mother in the form of the nipple. After also having been this parasite plunging his villosities into the uterine mucus in the form of placenta, he does not know, he cannot know that o, the breast, the placenta, is the reality of himself, of o with respect to the Other, 0. He believes that o is the Other; that in dealing with o, he is dealing with the Other, with the big Other, the mother.

Therefore compared to this stage, the anal level is the first time that he has occasion to recognise himself in something - but let us not go too quickly - in something, in an object around which there turns - for it turns - this demand of the mother, that is involved: "Hold onto it; give it up". And if I give it up, where does it go? There is no need all the same for those who have the slightest analytical experience, for the others, good God, who only read about it provided they open what I called the psychoanalytic dunghill, analytical literature, I do not need - dunghill means a little pile of shit - I do not need to remind you of the importance of these two phases, their determining importance for what? This little pile in question this time, is the one I spoke about just now; this little pile of shit, is obtained on demand, it is admired: "What lovely caca!". But this demand also implies at the same time that it should be as I might say disavowed, because he is taught all the same that he must not have too many relationships with this lovely caca, except along the well known path that analysis has also picked out, of sublimated satisfactions: if one smears, obviously everyone knows that it is with that that one does it: but one prefers all the same to indicate to the child that it is better to do it with something else, with the little plastics of the child analysts, or with nice colours that do not smell so badly.

We find ourselves there then at the level of a recognition. What is there in this first relationship to the demand of the Other, (11) is at once him and something that must not be him; or at the very least and even more, it is not from him.

Well now we are making progress, these satisfactions are being delineated, which means that we could easily see here the whole origin of obsessional ambivalence in a certain fashion; this is, in effect, something that we can see being inscribed in a formula whose structure we recognise: o is here the cause of this ambivalence, of this yes and no: it is from me - symptom - but nevertheless it is not from me. The bad thoughts that I have vis-a-vis you the analyst, obviously I indicate them, but after all it is not at all true that I consider you to be a shit, for example. So that in short we see here, in any case, an order of causality which is being sketched out, that we cannot, all the same, immediately ratify as being that of desire.

But in any case it is a result, as I was saying the last time, in speaking precisely in a general fashion about the symptom, at this level, if you wish, a structure is outlined which is of something which would give us immediately that of the symptom, of the symptom precisely as result. I point out that it still leaves outside its circuit the thing that interests us, what interests us if the theory that I expose to you is correct, namely the liaison to what is properly speaking desire. We have there a certain relationship of the constitution of the subject as divided, as ambivalent, in relation to a demand of the Other. We do not see why all of this, for example, should not pass completely into the background, should not be swept away with the introduction of the dimension of something which is supposed to be henceforth completely external, foreign, the relationship of desire and specifically that of sexual desire.

In fact we already know why sexual desire does not sweep it away, far from it. The fact is that this object manages, by its very duplicity, to symbolise marvellously, at least through one of its phases, what is involved with the advent of the phallic stage, namely this something which it is precisely a matter of symbolising, namely the phallus, in so far as its disappearance, its aphanisis - to employ Jones term, the one Jones applies to desire and which does not apply to the phallus - that his aphanisis is the go-between in man of the relationships between the sexes.

(12) Is there any need, in order to justify what begins to function here, namely that the evacuation of the result of the anal function qua commanded, is going to take on all its import at the phallic level as imaging the loss of the phallus. It is clearly understood that all of this is only valid within the reminder that I have to give once more to the thinking of some people who may have been absent from what I previously said, about the essential nature of this central (-<P) phase, central with respect to all these schémas through which - I would ask you to retain these formulae - the moment of the advance of jouissance, of the jouissance of the Other and towards the jouissance of the Other, involves the constitution of castration as a pledge of this encounter.

5)		o	desire of 0
4)	image	power of 0
3)	desire	anxiety - ϕ	jouissance of 0
2)	trace	demand of 0
1)	anxiety	o	desire x of 0

The fact that male desire encounters its own collapse before the entry into the jouissance of the feminine partner, just as, as one might say the jouissance of the woman is crushed (s'ecra.se) - to take up a term borrowed from the phenomenology of the breast and of the nursling - is crushed in phallic nostalgia and henceforth is required, I would say almost condemned to only love the male other at a point situated beyond the one at which, she also, stops him as desire: this beyond is aimed at in love; it is a beyond - let us say it clearly - either transverberated by castration, or transfigured in terms of potency. It is not the other as if it were a matter of being united to the other. The jouissance of the woman is in herself and is not connected to the Other. If I recall in this way the central function - let us say as obstacle, it is not at all an obstacle, it is the locus of anxiety - of what one might call the caducity of the organ, in so far as it encounters in a different fashion from each side what one can call the insatiability of desire, it is because it is only through this reminder that we see the necessity of symbolisations which in this connection display themselves with a hysterical aspect or an obsessional aspect.

Today we are on the second of these aspects. And what the second of these aspects reminds us of, is that simply by reason of the structure evoked, man is only in woman through the delegation of his presence under the form of this .decayed organ, of this organ of which he is fundamentally, in the sexual relationship and through the sexual relationship, castrated.

This means that the metaphors of gift here are only metaphors. And as is only too obvious, he gives nothing. The woman neither.

(13) And nevertheless the symbol of the gift is essential for the relationship to the Other; it is the supreme act, we are told, and even the total social act. It is here indeed that our experience has made us always put our finger on the fact that the metaphor of gift is borrowed from the anal sphere. For a long time it has been noted in the child that the turd, to begin to speak more politely, is the gift in essence, the gift of love. In this connection many other things have been picked out, up to and including, in a particular form of delinquency, in what is called, after the burglar has gone, the signature that every policeman and the books of legal medicine know well, this bizarre fact, but one which ended up all the same by being noticed, that the guy who has been using the jemmy in your house, and opening the drawers, always has at that moment an attack of colic. This obviously would allow us to find our bearings quickly at the level of what I called earlier manifest conditionings. It is at the level of mammals that we locate, at least in what we know about animal ecology, the function of the fecal trace, more exactly of faeces as trace, and a trace here also certainly profoundly linked to the essential nature of the place of what the organismic subject assures himself of at the same time in terms of possession, in the world, of territory and of security for sexual union.

You have seen described, in places which now all the same are sufficiently defused, this fact that these subjects, the hypopothamus certainly and even - this goes further than the mammals - the robin, feel themselves to be invincible within the limits of the territory and that all of a sudden there is a turning point: the limit precisely where curiously he becomes very timid.

The relationship, in mammals, between this limit and the fecal trace has been noticed for a long time. A reason once more to see there what prefigures, what prepares for this function of representing the subject, and finding there the roots in the biological background of the object o in so far as it is the anal fruit.

Are we still going to be satisfied with this? Is this all that we can draw from questioning the function of o in this relationship to a certain type of desire, that of the obsessional? This is where we take the next step which is also the essential step. We have justified nothing up to the present (14) other than the subject installed or not in his limits, and within these limits, more or less divided. But the access to the symbolic function that he takes on from the fact that these limits, are seen, at the level of sexual union in man, to be so singularly repressed, even this does not yet tell us anything about what is involved and what we are in the process of requiring, namely how all this whole process manages to justify the function of desire.

And it is experience which gives us the trace of this, namely that up to the present nothing explains to us the very particular relationships of the obsessional to his desire. It is precisely because up to this level everything is symbolised, the divided subject and the impossible union, and it appears altogether striking to us that one thing is not, namely desire itself.

It is precisely in this effort, in this necessity that the subject finds himself of having to complete his position as desire, that he is going to complete himself in the category of potency, namely at the level of the fourth stage. The relationship between the specular reflection of the narcissistic support of the mastery of self and the field, the locus, of the Other, is the link here. You know it already and this would only be to make you retravel a well trodden path. This is why I want here to mark the originality - otherwise it would never have come to our knowledge - of our interrogation, the originality of what the facts reveal to us.

And to start from the heart of things, and from a fact that you know well, I would say without delaying any longer on the fact that I recalled a thousand times about what I called just now the relationships of the obsessional subject to his desire, namely that, as I told you the last time, the degree of luxuriance reached by his phantasies, which are ordinarily never carried out, but after all it can happen that through all sorts of conditions which postpone more or less indefinitely the putting into action, he gets there, he gets there better, it even happens that others overcome for him the space of the obstacle, a subject who develops very early as a magnificent obsessional may happen to be in a family of dissolute people. Case II in Volume 5 of the Jahrbuch, to which I alluded earlier, on which Jones based himself for his phenomenology of the anal function in the obsessional, Case II - and I could quote a thousand others in the literature - is one of those.

All the sisters - and they are numerous - without counting the mother, the aunt, the mother's different lovers, and even I believe - God forgive me - the grandmother - all had taken turns (15) on the belly of this little kid when he was about five years old. He is nevertheless an obsessional, an established obsessional, with desires of the only kind that he can manage to constitute in the register of potency: impossible desires, in this sense that whatever he does to realise them, he is not in them. The obsessional is never, at the end of his search for satisfaction, in these registers. So then the question that I am posing you, is just as living and brilliant in this observation as in many others, it is in a form that I called just now living and brilliant - it is the image of a little fish that is evoked here, and I can say, under my hand, and with good reason - this ictus, as you see it everywhere in the field of the obsessional, provided he is from our cultural space - and we do not know any different one - this ictus, is Jesus Christ himself. One might speculate a good deal about what kind of blasphematory necessity - I must say that up to the present it has never been properly justified as such - why is it that such a subject, like many other obsessionals cannot carry out one or other of these more or less atypical acts in which his sexual research spends itself, without immediately phantasising Christ as associated in it. Even though the fact may have been present to our eyes for a long time, I do not think the last word has been said about it. It is quite clear first of all that Christ on this occasion - and this is why it is a blasphemy - Christ is a God. He is a God for many people, and even for so many people that in truth it is very-difficult even with all the manipulations of historical and psychological criticism, to dislodge him from this place.

But after all he is not just any God.

You will allow me to doubt that obsessionals at the time of Theophrastes, the one who wrote the Characters, amused themselves by mentally making Apollo participate in their base deeds.

Here we can see the importance of the little mark in passing, the beginning of an explanation that I thought it worthwhile giving in passing that the God, whether we like it or not, and even if we no longer have with the God or the Gods - for they are rather plural than singular - any relationship, this God is an element of the real. So that they are always there, it is quite clear that they walk around incognito. But there is one thing that is very certain: it is that the relationship of the God is very different from ours to the object of his desire.

(16) I spoke a little earlier about Apollo. Apollo is not castrated either before or afterwards. Afterwards something else happens him. We are told that it is Daphne who was transformed into a tree. It is here that something is hidden from you. And it is hidden from you, it is very astonishing because it is not hidden from you. The laurel tree, after the transformation, is not Daphne, it is Apollo. The proper of the God is that he is transformed, once he is satisfied, into the object of his desire, even if by that he becomes petrified in it.

In other words, a God, if he is real, gives here the image of his power. His power is there where it is. It is true of all the Gods, even of Elohim, even of Yahwea, who is one of them, even though his place is quite particular. Only something intervened there which has a different origin. Let us call it, on this occasion and because it is historically true - but no doubt this historical truth has to go a step beyond - let us call him Plato.

He told us things which, as you have seen, remain very manageable within the ethics of jouissance, because they have allowed us to trace the border of entry, the barrier that the Beautiful constitutes with respect to this supreme Good. Only, mixed in with a Christianity that was coming to birth, that gave something, something people believe was always there, and always in the Bible, but we will have to return to it no doubt later, if we are all still here next year. The matter is debatable, the matter that I am going to tell you about, namely the phantasy of an omnipotent God, which means of a God who is powerful everywhere at the same time, and of a God who is powerful for everyone; for it is indeed to that that one is forced to come, if the world is as it is, it is clear that the power of God is exercised at the same time in every direction.

Now the correlation between this omnipotence and something which is, as I might say all seeingness, sufficiently signals here to us what is involved. It involves something which is outlined in the field beyond the mirage of power, of this projection of the subject into the field of the ideal, reduplicated between the specular alter-ego, the ideal ego, and this something beyond which is the ego-ideal.

The ego-ideal, when at this level what it is a matter of covering over, is anxiety, takes the omnipotent form. The phantasy of ubiquity in the obsessional, the phantasy which is also the support on which there come and go the multiplicity of his desires, which are always to be rejected further away, it is (17) there that he seeks and finds the complement of what is necessary for him to constitute himself in desire.

From this it results - I will only quote here for you the little corollaries that can be drawn from this - that a question which was raised in what I could call the heated circles of analysis, the ones in which there still lives the movement of a primary inspiration, namely whether the analyst ought or ought not to be an atheist and if the subject, at the end of analysis, can consider his analyst terminated if he still believes in God.

It is the question that I am not going to treat today, I mean to settle. But on the road of such a question, I point out to you that whatever an obsessional testifies to you in his remarks, if he has not been routed out of his obsessional structure, you can be quite persuaded that qua obsessional he still believes in God, I mean that he believes in the God that everybody or almost everybody in our cultural arena, I mean in the God that everybody believes in without believing in him, namely this universal eye that is brought to bear on all our actions.

Here this dimension is as solid in its frame as the window of the phantasy that I spoke about the other day. Simply it is also required by it, I mean, even for the greatest believers that they do not believe in it. First of all because if they believed in it, it would be seen. And because if they are as believing as all that, one would notice the consequences of this belief, which in fact remains strictly invisible in events.

Such is the veritable dimension of atheism: the one which is supposed to have succeeded in eliminating the phantasy of the Omnipotent. Well then, a gentleman called Voltaire and who all the same knew something about anti-religious criticism, held very strongly to his deism, which means to the existence of the Almighty, and thought that Diderot was mad because he found that inconsistent. It is not sure that Diderot was really an atheist; to me his work seems rather to bear witness to it, given the way in which he brought into operation the intersubjective at the level of the Other in his major dialogues, Le neveu de Rameau and Jacques le Fataliste. He is only able to do it nevertheless in the style of derision.

The existence therefore of the atheist in the true sense can only be conceived of in effect at the limit of an ascesis, which indeed appears to us can only be a psychoanalytic ascesis, I mean (18) of an atheism conceived of as a negation of this dimension of presence, at the basis of the world of omnipotence. This does not mean that the term atheism and the existence of the atheist does not have its historical correspondent. But it is of a quite different nature. Its affirmation is directed precisely towards the side of the existence of gods qua real. It neither denies it nor affirms it, it is directed at that. The atheist of the tragedy L'athee - I am alluding to Elizabethan tragedy - the atheist gjxa combatant, qua revolutionary, is not the one who denies God in his omnipotent function, it is the one who affirms himself as not serving any God.

And this is the dramatic, essential value, the one which always gives its passion to the question of atheism. I apologise for this little digression, which, as you may well imagine, is only preparatory.

You see where our little circuit today has led us: to the fundamental liaison between these two stages framing the fundamental impossibility, the one which divides at the sexual level, desire and jouissance. The style of detour, the style of encompassing, the impossible foundation that the obsessional gives to his desire, has allowed us, in the course of our analysis today, to see there being outlined something, namely that this link to a lost object of the most disgusting type, shows its necessary liaison, there in effect with the highest idealistic production. This circuit is nevertheless not yet completed. We see clearly how desire is appended to this structure of the object. It still remains for us - this is what we will articulate the next time - to highlight what this median table which, I hope, you have all copied, indicates to you as being our next field, to highlight the relationship between the obsessional phantasy, posed as a structure of his desire, and the anxiety which determines it.

Seminar 24: Wednesday 26 June 1963

In order to advance today in our account, I am going to take up the things that concern the constitution of desire in the obsessional and its relation to anxiety. And to do it, I am going to return to a sort of table, of matrix, of double entry table that I gave you during the very first lectures of this year's Seminar in the form reproduced here, bracketed by the white line and written in pink.

Inhibition	Impediment	Embarrassment
Emotion	Symptom	Passage à l'acte
Dismay	Acting-out	Anxiety

The intention of this table then was to mark the sort of derangement, of staggering represented by the three terms which Freud came to and which he inscribed in the title of his article Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety. Around these three terms, I punctuated something that we can designate as moments, as a certain number of definable moments in the terms which are here inscribed in this table, and which have as a characteristic, for each term, of referring to the start of its column above, to the start of the row on the left. You find there a correlation which can, when put to the test, be proposed for interrogation as suitable for being confirmed or disproved in its structural function.

Again these terms were presented to you at that time in a certain incompleteness, involving therefore some suspensions, riddles; specifically, the distinction for example between "emotion" and "dismay" may have been, despite the etymological references that I made at the time, may have been all the same for you a matter of interrogation which it was not entirely possible for you to resolve with your own resources.

Assuredly, what I will contribute today seems to me to be of a nature to bring you specifications -which, I have no doubt, for most of you, if not for all, can only be new or even unexpected. And in particular, to begin with this dismay, whose origin, quite distinct from that of the term emotion, is not "motion outwards, motion hors", movement outside the organised, adapted field for example of motor action, as undoubtedly emotion etymologically, - I am not saying that this is something that we can entirely trust - as emotion etymologically indicates and refers to, dismay is to be sought quite elsewhere if it is to be understood; and etymologically - it was the indication that I gave you for it - the etymology in esmayer referring to a German root, to mogen, a quite primitive Germanic root, gives the indication of something (2) which posits the principle of power as outside - outside of what?

A riddle therefore, around something which is not unrelated to power, and I would say that perhaps even, to take the form that it has taken in French, that it is something of the order of "outside me, hors de moi", "outside oneself, hors de soi" that, in an approach which - here it is almost necessary to refer to the pun - is no less important, we have to direct our minds, to see clearly, to glimpse at least, the direction in which we are going to go today.

To go immediately to the heart of things - it is because the obsessional illustrates it by his phenomenology immediately and in a very tangible way - I would say that at the point that we are at I can tell you very crudely, straight out, that dismay, the that is involved, is nothing other, at least in the correlations that we are trying to explore, to specify, to disentangle, to create today, namely the relations between desire and anxiety, dismay in this correlation is nothing other than the o itself.

In the conjuncture between anxiety and its strange ambiguity, I taught you to circumscribe in the closest possible way throughout the discourse of this year, the ambiguity which allows us for our part, after this elaboration, to formulate what is striking in its phenomenology, what we can preserve of it, and what authors from elsewhere make slips and errors about, and what we introduce a distinction into, this characteristic of being without cause, but not without object; this is a distinction on which I base my efforts. To situate it, I have directed you: not alone is it without object, but it designates very probably what I might call the most profound object, the final object, the Thing. It is in this sense that I taught you to say that it is what does not deceive.

This "without cause", so obvious on the contrary in its phenomenon, is something which is better illuminated to our view by the way in which I tried to situate for you where the notion of cause begins.

This reference to dismay is henceforth that through which anxiety, while being linked to it, does not depend on it, but on the contrary determines this dismay. Anxiety finds itself suspended between what one might call the prior form of the relationship to the cause, the "what is it?" which is going to be formulated as cause, embarrassment, and something which cannot (3) hold onto this cause, since primarily it is anxiety which literally produces this cause.

Something happens which illustrates in an abject and thus all the more striking fashion what I put at the origin of my explanation of the obsessional in the confrontation of the Wolfman and his major repetitive dream, in the anxiety-provoking confrontation with something which appears as a showing forth of his final reality, this thing which is produced, which never reaches his consciousness, but can only be in a way reconstructed as a link for the whole subsequent determination, anal dismay to call it by its name and its product, here at the level of the obsessional is the primary form in which there intervenes the emergence of the object o which is at the origin of everything that is going to flow from it in the mode of effect.

It is because here the object o is found to be given in an original moment in which it plays a certain function on which we are now going to try to dwell in order to specify carefully its value, its incidence, its import, its primary coordinates, the ones before the others are added on, it is because the o is that in its original production that it can subsequently function in the dialectic of desire which is that of the obsessional.

A coordinate therefore, at the moment of its apparition, of this at the traumatic unveiling, where anxiety reveals that it is indeed what does not deceive at the moment that the field of the Other, as one might say, is rent and opens out onto its foundations, what is it, this o, what is its function with respect to the subject?

If we can grasp it here in a way in a pure fashion with respect to this question, it is precisely in the measure that in this radical, traumatic, confrontation the subject cedes (cede) to the situation. But at this level, at this moment, what does this "yields" mean, how is it to be understood? It is not that he either vacillates or weakens, as you know well. Remember the attitude schematised by the fascination of this subject of the dream of the Wolfman before the window opening onto the tree covered with wolves. In a situation whose immobilisation suspends before our eyes its primitively inarticulatable character and by which nevertheless he will remain marked forever, what was produced is literally something which gives its true sense to this "yields" of the subject, it is literally a ceding (cession).

(4) This characteristic of cedable object (objet cessible) is one of the characteristics of o which is so important that I would ask you please to follow me in a brief review to see whether it is a characteristic which marks all the forms of o that we have enumerated. It here appears to us that the fixation points of the libido are always around one of these moments which nature presents for this eventual structure of subjective ceding.

The first moment of anxiety, the one that analytic experience got closer to bit by bit, let us say at the level, around the trauma of birth, henceforth, with this remark, allows us to accentuate it as something more precise, more precisely articulatable than what was first of all roughly approached in the form of frustration and to ask ourselves, and to notice, after we have asked ourselves, that the most decisive moment in the anxiety-involved, the weaning anxiety, is not so much that on a particular occasion the breast is missing when he needs it, it is rather that this little child cedes this breast which, when he is appended to it, is indeed like a part of himself.

Let us never forget, what I put to you - and I am not the only one to have noticed it, I refer specifically here to Bergler - that the breast forms part of the individual at the nursing stage, that he does not find himself, as I told you in a vivid expression, except as stuck onto his mother. That he is able in a way to hold onto this breast or let it go, is where there is produced the most primal moment of surprise, sometimes really graspable in the expression of the newborn, on which for the first time there passes the reflection of something related to this abandonment of this organ which is much more the subject himself, than something which is already an object, something which gives its support, its root, to what in another register was perceived, called, as regards the subject, dereliction.

But for that matter for us, as for all the other objects o, do we have any other manifest control than this emphasis I give to the possibility of replacing the natural object by a mechanical object, if I can express myself in that way? What I am designating here, is first of all the possible replacement of this object by any other object which may be encountered, another partner, the nurse who gave rise to so many questions for the first proponents of natural education, for the Rousseau-style theme of feeding by the mother, but beyond it to this something (5) which, God knows, did not always exist - at least so we imagine - and which cultural progress has manufactured, has constituted, the soother, namely the possibility of putting o in reserve, in stock, in circulation in the shops and moreover to isolate it in sterile tubes.

This characteristic therefore of ceding the object is expressed by the appearance in the chain, the function of human manufacture, the appearance of cedable objects (objets cessibles) which are, which can be, their equivalents. And if this reminder is not out of season here, it is because from this angle I intend to attach to it here the function on which I have laid stress for a long time, that of the transitional object, to take the term, whether it is correct or not, but henceforth consecrated, with which it was pinpointed by its creator, the person who spotted it, namely Winnicott.

Here, in effect, at this level, one sees clearly what constitutes this object that he calls transitional, in this function of the object that I call a cedable object: it is a little piece, torn from something, most often a piece of cloth, and one clearly sees what is involved as regards the relationship of the subject to the support that he finds in this object. He is not dissolved in it, he is comforted by it, he is comforted by it in his quite original function as subject, from this position of collapse, as I might say, with respect to the signifying confrontation. Here we have, not an investment of o, but what I might call an investiture. Here, it is the substitute (suppleant) for the subject, and substitute in position, in a way, preceded, it is this relationship o with respect to something which secondarily reappears after this disappearance. This primitive mythical subject who is posed at the beginning as having to constitute himself in the confrontation, but that we never grasp - and for good reason - that it is because the o has preceded him, and because it is in a way itself marked by this primitive substitution, that it has to re-emerge beyond.

This function of the cedable object as a separable fragment, carrying in a way primitively something of the identity of the body which antecedes the body itself as regards the constitution of the subject, since I spoke about a manifestation in the history o^ human production which can in a way for us have the value of confirmation, of revelation, in this sense I cannot possibly not evoke now, at the extreme term of this historical evolution, or more exactly of this manifestation in history of problems which are going to pose us, I am saying, at what one could call the most radical essentiality of the subject, the (6) probably immense extension already engaged in more than, I would say, common consciousness - and even that of practitioners like ourselves - may be aware of, the questions going to be posed by the fact of organ transplants, which take on an appearance which is undoubtedly surprising and well designed to suspend the mind around some question or other: how far should we, or how far are we going to, consent to it? Just how far will go the fact which is opened out here, with what I would call the mine, the mainspring, the principle of these astonishing possibilities, is perhaps going to be found soon in the artificial maintenance of certain subjects in a state, which we cannot, which we will no longer be able to say is one of life or of death, since as you know Angstrom's methods allow us to make subsist in a living state the tissues of subjects in whom everything indicates that the functioning of their central nervous system cannot be restored, no brain waves, mydriasis, unrecoverable absence of reflexes? What is involved, what do we do when it is from a subject in this state that we borrow an organ? Do you not sense that there is here an emergence into the real, of something of a kind to reawaken, in altogether new terms, the question of the essentiality of the person, and of what it is attached to, to beg these doctrinal authorities who can on occasion provide material for juridicism, to earnestly request them to see how far, in practice this time, the question of whether the subject is a soul or indeed a body can be taken?

I will not go any further along this path today because as a matter of fact these doctrinal authorities seem already to have evoked quite singular responses that it would be well to study very closely in order to see their consistency with respect to certain positions which have been taken for a long time, and where for example there is radically distinguished, on the very plane of the relationship, of the identification of the person with something immortal which is supposed to be called the soul, a doctrine which articulates in its principles something that is the contrary of the Platonic tradition, namely that there can be no resurrection other than that of the body.

Moreover the domain evoked here is not so linked to this industrial advance in singular possibilities, for it not to have been evoked for a long time in visionary fabulations, and here I have only to refer you once more to the Unheimlich function of (7) the eyes in so far as to manipulate, to make a living being change into his automaton, the character incarnated by Hoffmann is put at the centre, by Freud, of his article on the Unheimlich, this Coppélius, the one who hollows out eye sockets, who is going to seek down to their root what is somewhere the capital, essential object to present itself as the beyond - and the most anxiety-provoking - of the desire which constitutes it, the eye itself.

I said enough in passing about the same function of the voice and the way in which it appears to us, will appear to us no doubt with so many technical improvements, to be all the more able to be here of the order of these cedable objects, of these objects which can be placed on the shelves of a library, in the form of disks or of tapes, and regarding which in this case we only need to evoke one or other old or new episode, to know the singular relationship it can have with the arousal of a particular conjuncture of anxiety. Simply, let us add to it properly speaking the following, at the moment that there emerges in a cultural area in which it arises for the first time, the possibility also of the image, I mean of the specular image, of the image of the body, in a detached state, in a cedable state, in the form of photographs or even of drawings, and of the lure, of the repugnance that this provokes in the sensibility of those who see it emerging suddenly in this form, at once indefinitely multipliar>le and able to be distributed everywhere, the repugnance, indeed the horror that these cultural things in areas that there is no reason for us to call primitive, the apparition of this possibility gives rise to, with the refusal to allow these images to be taken since God alone knows, it must be said, where they may go afterwards.

It is in this function, in this function of cedable object and in short the most natural one, whose naturalness can only be explained from having taken on this function, that the anal object intervenes in the function of desire, that here, it is here that we have to grasp the way in which it intervenes, and to put to the test, not forget the guidance that our formula gives us, that this object is then, not the end, the goal of desire but its cause, the cause of desire in so far as it is itself something non-effective, that it is this sort of effect founded, constituted on the function of lack, which only appears as effect where in effect there is situated alone the notion of cause, namely at the level of the signifying chain where this desire is what gives it this sort of consistency in which the subject is constituted essentially as metonymy. But how are we going to (8) qualify this desire here, at the level of the constitution of the subject, where we grasp it in its incidence, in the constitution of the subject? It is not the contingent fact, the facticity of education in cleanliness which gives it this function of retaining, which gives its fundamental structure to anal desire. It is a more general form that is involved here and that we must grasp in this desire to retain.

In its polar relationship to anxiety, desire is to be situated there where I put it for you, corresponding with this old matrix, at the level of inhibition. This is why desire - as we know - can take on the function of what is called a defence. But let us go step by step to see how this happens eventually. What is inhibition? For us, in our experience, it is not enough for us to have this experience and for us to manipulate it as such for us yet to have correctly articulated its function, and this is what we are going to try to do. What is inhibition if not the introduction into a function - perhaps not an indifferent one; in his article, Freud takes as support, for example, the motor function - the introduction of what? Of a different desire to the one that the function satisfies naturally.

This after all we know, and I am not claiming here to discover anything new; but I believe that in articulating it in this way, I am introducing a new formulation, the deductions flowing from which escape us without this very formulation.

For this locus of inhibition where we learn to recognise, while I am underlining it, the correlations this matrix indicates, the locus properly speaking where desire is exercised, and where we grasp one of the roots of what analysis designates as Urverdrangung, what I might call this structural occultation of desire behind inhibition - it is something which makes us say habitually that if Mr So-and-so has writer's cramp, it is because he eroticises the function of his hand, I think this is familiar to everybody - it is this which urges us to bring into play, to appreciate in this situation at the same place these three terms, the first two of which I have already named: "inhibition", "desire", the third being the act. For when it is a question for us of defining what the act is, the only possible, polar correlative in the place of anxiety, we can only do it by situating it there where it is: at the place of inhibition in (9) this matrix.

The act cannot be defined for us, or for anybody else, as something which only happens as I might say, in the real field, in the sense that movement, the motor effect, it will be said, defines it, but as something which in this field - and no doubt in the form of movement on occasion, but not only that - whatever share there may still remain there of a motor effect which is expressed in this field, the field of the real in which the movement response is exercised, which is expressed in such a way that there is expressed in it another field, which is not simply the one of sensory stimulation for example, as it is articulated by considering only the reflex arc, which is not to be articulated either as a realisation of the subject.

This is the conception of the personalist myth in so far precisely as it eludes, in this field of the realisation of the subject, the priority of o which inaugurates and henceforth preserves this privilege in the field of the realisation of the subject, of the subject as such who is only realised in the objects which belong to the same series, which are from the same place, let us say, in this matrix, as the function o, which are always cedable objects: and these are what for a long time have been called "works" with all the meaning that this term has even in the field of moral theology.

So then what happens in the act of this other field which I am speaking about, and whose incidence, agency, insistence in the real is what connotes an action as act? How are we going to define it? Is it simply this polar relationship and in a way what happens in it in terms of overcoming anxiety, if I can express myself in this way?

Let us say, in formulae which can only approach after all what an act is, that we speak about act when an action has the character, let us say, of a signifying manifestation in which there is inscribed what can be called the the gap (l'ecart) of desire. An act is an action, let us say, in so far as there is manifested in it the very desire which is supposed to have been designed to inhibit it. It is in this foundation of the notion, of the function of the act in its relationship to inhibition, and there alone, that one can be justified in calling "act" things which in principle appear to be so little related to what one could call, in the full, ethical, sense of the word an act: a sexual act on one hand and on the other a testamentary act.

Well then, it is here in this relationship of o to the constitution of a desire - and what it reveals to us about the relationship of desire to the natural function - that our (10) obsessional has for us his most exemplary value. In his case we put our finger all the time on this characteristic, whose enigmatic aspect can be effaced for us only out of habit, that in his case desires manifest themselves always in this dimension that I went so far as to call earlier, anticipating a little no doubt, the function of defence.

How can this be conceived of simply, on what basis does this incidence of desire in inhibition deserve to be called defence? It is because, as I told you, that - it was in an anticipatory fashion that I was able to speak about defence as an essential function of the incidence of desire - it is uniquely in so far as this effect of desire, signalled in this way by inhibition, can be introduced into an action already caught up in the induction of another desire - this is also for us a common fact of experience - and after all, without mentioning the fact that we are always dealing with something of this order, let us observe that, not to leave our obsessional, this is already the position of anal desire, defined in this way, by the desire to retain centred on a primordial object, to which it is going to give its value, it is already here that there is situated the desire that is situated as anal. It has no meaning for us except in the economy of the libido, namely in its liaisons with sexual desire.

It is fitting to recall here that in the inter urinas et faeces nascimur of St. Augustine, the important thing is not so much that we are born between urine and faeces, at least for us analysts, it is that we make love between urine and faeces. We piss before and we shit afterwards or inversely.

And this is one of the further correlations and one to which we give too little attention as regards a phenomenology that after all we allow to come into analysis. That is why it is necessary to have one's ear pricked, and to pick out in the cases in which this emerges, the relationship which links to the sexual act the fomenting, as I might say, of that which will appear of course as unnoticed, as perhaps unevoked, in the history of the Wolfman, his primal little present, the habitual fomenting, in the sexual act, of something which of course does not seem to be very important, but which takes importance from being indicative of the relationship I am speaking about, the fomenting of the little shit, whose subsequent evacuation has no doubt not the same signification for every subject, depending on whether for example (11) they are on the obsessional slope or on another one.

So then let us take up our path at the point that I left you on it, namely: what about the point that I am now directing you towards, as regards this underlay of desire in desire, and how to conceive here what in this path leads us towards the elucidation of its meaning, leads us to it I mean not simply in fact, but of necessity? Are we going to be able to conceive in this interpretation of desire/defense and what it is defending against, namely another desire, that we are simply led, as I might say, quite naturally by what leads the obsessional in a movement of recurrence of the process of desire generated by this implicit effort of subjectivication which is already in his symptoms in which he tends to lay hold of its stages again, in so far as he has symptoms, and what is meant by the correlation inscribed here in the matrix, with impediment, with emotion? This is what the titles that I put in its reduplication explained here underneath, designate for you.

Desire	Not to be able	Cause
Not to know
o		Anxiety

What is the impediment that is involved? It is that something intervenes, the impediment: "impedicare", caught in the trap, which is not the reduplication of inhibition. A term had to be chosen. The fact is that the subject is quite impeded in retaining his desire to retain, and that, in the case of the obsessional this is what manifests itself as compulsion.

The dimension of emotion here, borrowed from a psychology which is not our own, a psychology of adaptation, of the catastrophic reaction, also intervenes here in a quite different sense to this classic and habitual definition. The emotion involved is the one which is supposed to highlight the experiences based on being confronted with a task, namely that the fact that the subject does not know how to respond, is where he connects up with our "not to know, ne pas savoir", : he did not know that it was that and that is why at the level of the point where he cannot stop himself (s'empêcher) that he allows things to happen, which are these comings and goings of the signifier, that alternately posit and efface, which all go along this equally unknown path of rediscovering the primal trace; what the obsessional subject seeks in what I called earlier - and you will see why the choice of this word - its recurrence in the process of desire, is well and truly to rediscover the authentic cause of this whole process. And it is because this cause is nothing other than this final, abject and derisory object, that he remains in suspense in this search, that there is always manifested there, at the level of acting-out, something that is going to give to this search for the object its moments of suspension, its wrong directions, its mistaken paths, its lateral divergences which will make the search turn indefinitely, and which are manifested in this fundamental symptom of doubt which for him is going to affect the value of all his objects of substitution.

Here not to be able - is not to be able to what? - to stop oneself (s'empêcher). The compulsion here, the doubt, concerns precisely these doubtful objects thanks to which there is pushed back the moment of access to the final object which would be the end, in the full sense of the term, namely the loss of the subject on the path where he is always exposed to entering along the path of embarrassment, of embarrassment where there is introduced as such the question of the cause, which is that through which he enters into transference.

What should retain us here? Have we seen, circumscribed, even approached, the question I posed about the incidence of another desire which with respect to this one whose path I have travelled along, might play the role of defence? Manifestly not. I traced the path of the return to the final object with its correlation of anxiety; for it is here there lies the motive for the growing arousal of anxiety. And in the measure that the analysis of an obsessional is pushed further towards its term, provided only it is guided along this path, the question then remains open, if not of what I meant - for I think that you have already glimpsed that - but about what the incidence as defence is, a defence no doubt working and working very hard to put off the expiry date (echéance) that I have just outlined, as defence of another desire.

How is this possible? We cannot conceive of it except by giving its central position, which is something I already did earlier, to sexual desire, I mean to the desire that is called genital, to natural desire in so far as in the case of man, and precisely in function of this structuring proper to desire around the mediation of an object, it posits itself as having anxiety at its heart and separating desire from jouissance.

This function of o which at this level of genital desire is symbolised analogically by the dominance, by the pregnancy of o in the economy of desire, is symbolised at the level of genital desire by the (-tí>) which appears here as the subjective residue at the level of copulation, in other words, which shows us that the copula is everywhere, and that it only unites by being lacking there where precisely it would be properly copulatory.

(13) It is to this central hole which gives its privileged value to castration anxiety, namely to the only level at which anxiety is produced at the very locus of the lack of the object, it is to this that, specifically in the obsessional, the coming into play of another desire is due. This other desire, as I might say, gives its foundation to what can be called the eccentric position, the one that I have been trying to describe for you, of the desire of the obsessional with respect to genital desire.

For the desire of the obsessional is not conceivable either in its agency or in its mechanism, except in so far as it is situated as a substitute for what it is impossible to supply elsewhere, namely at its place. In a word, the obsessional, like every neurotic, has already acceded to the phallic stage, but it is with respect to the impossibility of being satisfied at the level of this stage, that his own object, the excremental o, the o cause of desire to retain, and which, if I really wished to conjoin here its function with everything that I said about the relations to inhibition, I would rather call the cork, it is with respect to it that this object is going to take on what I could call developed values. And it is here that we cut through to the origin of what I could call the analytic phantasy about oblativity. I already said and repeated, that it is an obsessional phantasy. For of course everyone would love to think that genital union is a gift: I give myself, you give yourself, we give ourselves. Unfortunately there is no trace of gift in a genital copulatory act, however successful you may imagine it to be. There is only a gift precisely where it has always been well and truly and perfectly located: at the anal level, in the measure that here something is outlined, emerges, of what is here precisely at this level designed to satisfy, to bring the subject to a halt with the realisation of the gap, of the central hole, which at the genital level prevents anything whatsoever which might function as object of gift from being grasped.

Since I spoke about a cork, by which you can recognise that it is the most primitive form of what I called, of what I introduced the other day to you as the exemplary object that I called the tap through the discussion of the function of the cause, well then how could we illustrate, with respect to what determines the function of the object stopper or tap with its consequence, the desire to close, how could there be situated the different elements of our matrix?

(14) The relationship to the cause - what is that? What can one do with a tap? It is the initial point at which there comes into play from observation, in the experience of the child, this attraction that we see, contrary to any other little animal whatsoever, manifesting itself for something which announces itself as representing this fundamental type of object.

The "not to be able" to make something of it, as well as the "not to know", and in their distinction there is indicated here sufficiently what the symptom is: it is a leak (fuite) in the tap. The passage a l'acte is to open it, but opening it without knowing what one is doing. This is what is characteristic of the passage a l'acte. Something happens by which a cause is liberated, by means which have nothing to do with this cause. For, as I pointed out to you, the tap only plays its function of cause in so far as everything that can come out of it comes from elsewhere. It is because there is the appeal of the genital, with its phallic hole at the centre, that everything that can happen at the level of the anal comes into play because it takes on its meaning.

As regards acting-out, if we wish to situate it with respect to the metaphor of the tap, it is not the fact of opening the tap as the child does, without knowing what he is doing, it is simply the presence or not of the jet of water. Acting-out, is the jet, namely what is always produced from an event which comes from somewhere other than the cause that one has just acted on. And this is something that our experience indicates to us. It is not the fact that our intervention, let us say, for example on the plane of an anal interpretation is false which provokes the acting-out, it is that where it is brought to bear, it leaves room for something which comes from elsewhere. In other words: one must not inconsiderately pester the cause of desire.

Here therefore there is introduced the possibility of the function which on this terrain where there is played out the destiny of the desire of the obsessional, of his symptoms and of his sublimations, of something that will take on its meaning from being that which skirts around, as I might say, the central gap of phallic desire, what is happening at the scopic level, in so far as the specular image enters into an "analogous" function because it is in a correlative position with respect to the phallic stage.

Everything that we have just said about the function of o as "analogous" object of gift, designed to hold back the subject on the edge of the castrating hole, everything that we have just said about it, we can transpose onto the image. And here there (15) intervenes this ambiguity in the obsessional subject about the function of love which is underlined in all the observations. What is this idealised love that we find as much in the Ratman and the Wolfman as in every observation of an obsessional that has been taken a certain distance, what is the enigma of this function, given to the other - to the woman in this case - of this exalted object as regards which people have certainly not had to wait for either you or me or the teaching given here, to know that it represents surreptitiously the negation of his desire? In any case women for their part are not deceived by it.

What would distinguish this type of love from an eroto-maniacal love, if we did not seek out what the obsessional engages of himself in love?

Do you believe that for the obsessional, if this is indeed the way things are as regards the final object that may be revealed in his analysis, along a certain recurrent path - I told you which one - excrement is the divinatory source for finding oneself to be a loveable object!

I would beg you to try to illuminate with your pocket torch what the position of the obsessional is in this regard. It is not doubt which prevails here, it is that he prefers not even to look at it. This prudence is something you will always find. And nevertheless if love takes on for him these forms of an exalted bond, it is because what he intends should be loved, is a certain image of himself, that this image he gives to the other, and to such an extent that he imagines that if this image were faulty in any way, the other would no longer know what to hold onto. It is the foundation of what I called elsewhere the altruistic dimension of this mythical love founded on a mythical oblativity.

But the maintenance of this image is what attaches him to a whole distance from himself which is precisely what it is most difficult to reduce, and which gave the illusion to a particular person, (Bouvet), who had, of course, a good deal of experience of these subjects, but not the apparatus - and for reasons which remain to be explored - to formulate it, to put such an accent on this notion of distance: the distance involved is this distance of the subject from himself with respect to which everything that he does is never anything for him in the final term - and, without analysis, is left to its solitude - but something that he sees as a game, when all is said and done, which only profited this other of whom I am speaking, this image.

(16) This dimension is the one that is usually highlighted, as regards the narcissistic dimension in which there develops everything that in the case of the obsessional is not so much central, namely symptomatic, but if you wish behavioural or experienced and which gives its veritable foundation, that through which what is involved for him, namely to realise at least the first phase of what is never permitted for him, what is never permitted to manifest itself in act, namely his desire, how this desire is sustained, as I might say, by doing the round of all the possibilities, at the phallic and genital level, which determine the impossible.

When I say that the obsessional sustains his desire as impossible, I mean that he sustains his desire at the level of the impossibilities of desire. The image of the hole, of the hole that is involved, I would ask you to find the reference to it - I told you about it once and that is why I insisted on it at such length - the reference to the topology of the torus, the circle of the obsessional is precisely one of these circles which because of its topological place can never be reduced to a point. It is because from the oral to the anal, from the anal to the phallic, from the phallic to the scopic and from the scopic to the vociferous, it never turns back onto itself except by-passing again through its point of departure.

It is around these structures that the next time I will give its conclusive formulation to what this example, which is sufficiently demonstrative to be elaborated as an example, and is transposable moreover from these data into other structures, the hysteric specifically, that starting from this example, we are able in the final term to situate about the position and the function of anxiety.

Seminar 25: Wednesday 3 July 19 6 3

I will conclude today what I had set myself to say to you this year about anxiety. I will mark out its limit and its function, thus indicating where I intend there to continue the positions which alone allow us, will allow us settle, if it is possible, what is involved in our role as analysts.

Freud designated anxiety at the end of his work as a signal. He designated it as a signal distinct from the effect of the traumatic situation, an articulated signal of what he called danger; the word "danger" for him is linked to the function, to the notion, not elucidated it must be said, of "vital danger".

The original thing that I have articulated for you this year, is the specification of what this danger is. This danger is, in conformity with the Freudian indication, but more precisely articulated, what is linked to the ceding characteristic of the constitutive moment of the object o.

What, henceforth, for us, should anxiety be considered the signal of, at this point of our development? Here again we will articulate it differently to Freud: this moment, this moment of the function of anxiety is prior to this ceding of the object. For experience prohibits us from not, as the very necessity of his articulation obliges Freud, situating something more primal than the articulation of the situation of danger, once we define it as we have just done: at a level, at a moment prior to this ceding of the object.

Anxiety, I announced to you first in the Seminar of two years ago, anxiety manifests itself tangibly in a first approach as referring - and in a complex fashion - to the desire of the Other. From this first approach, I indicated that the anxiety-provoking function of the desire of the Other was linked to the fact that I do not know what object o I am for this desire.

I will emphasis today that this is only fully articulated, only takes on an exemplary form at what I called, designated here, in a sign on the blackboard, the fourth level definable as characteristic of the function of the constitution of the subject in his relation to the Other, in so far as we can articulate it as centered around the function of anxiety.

(2) There alone the specific plenitude by which human desire is function of the desire of the Other, there alone at this level is this form fulfilled. Anxiety, as I told you, is linked to the fact that I do not know what object o I am for the desire of the Other. But this when all is said and done is only linked to the level at which I can give this exemplary fable of it, in which the Other would be a radically Other, would be this praying mantis with a voracious desire, to which no common factor links me. On the contrary, something links me to the human Other which is my quality of being his fellow. What remains of the anxiety-provoking "I do not know" is fundamentally miscognition, miscognition at this special level of what is, in the economy of my desire as man, the o.

This is why, paradoxically, it is at what is described as the fourth level, at the level of scopic desire, that the structure of desire is for us most fully developed in its fundamental alienation, it is there also that the object o is most masked, and with it the subject is, as regards anxiety, most secured.

This is what makes it necessary for us to seek elsewhere than at this level the trace of o as regards the moment of its constitution. Since the Other, in effect, is in essence always there in its full reality, and therefore this reality, in so far as it takes on a subjective presence, can always manifest itself by one of its sharp edges, it is clear that development does not give an equal access to this reality of the Other.

At the first level, this reality of the Other is presentified, as is quite clear in the original impotence of the nurseling, through need. It is only in the second phase that with the demand of the Other something properly speaking detaches itself and allows us to articulate in a complete way the constitution of little o with respect to the function of the locus of the signifying chain, a function which I hear from the Other.

But I cannot today leave this first level without clearly highlighting that anxiety appears before any articulation as such of the demand of the Other. But, singularly, I would ask you for a moment to dwell on the paradox which connects the starting point of this first effect of ceding, which is anxiety, with what will be at the end something like its point of arrival: this manifestation of anxiety coinciding with the very emergence into the world of the one who will be the subject, is the scream, the scream whose function I have situated for a long time as not at (3) all an original but a terminal relationship to what we ought to consider as being the very heart of this other, in so far as he reaches completion for us at a moment as the neighbour.

This scream which escapes from the nurseling, he can do nothing about it. If he has ceded something here, nothing connects him to it. But this anxiety, this original anxiety, am I the first, have not all the authors emphasised its character in a certain traumatic relationship to the emergence of the organism - human on this occasion - into a certain world where it is going to live.

Can we not see certain contradictory features in these multiple and confusing indications? Can we retain as valid Ferenczi's indication that for ontogenesis itself, there is the emergence from some primitive aqueous milieu or other which is the homologue of the marine milieu, namely the relationship between the amniotic liquid and this water in which there can take place this exchange between the inside and the outside, which takes place in the animal living in such a milieu at the level of the brachiopoda, which is something that never functions at any moment of the human embryo. I would ask you rather to retain - for everything that is indicated to us in this often confused speculation which is psychoanalytic speculation ought to be considered by us as not without meaning, to be on the path of something indicative, that it skips over, delays on and sometimes illuminates, because phylogenesis is mentioned on occasion - I would ask you - from the point of view of a schematised exchange in the form of an organism with, at its border and on this border, a certain number of chosen points of exchange, to notice the degree to which in effect it is something unbelievable, if it is the case that the most basic schema of vital exchange is effectively created by the function of this wall, of this border, of this osmosis between an outside milieu and an inside milieu, between which there can be a common factor - to consider the strangeness of the leap by which living beings have emerged from their primitive milieu, have passed into the air therefore with an organ whose arbitrary character I would ask you to consult in the books on embryology, one cannot fail to be struck by what one might call the arbitrary character of the development of the neo-formation. There is just as much strangeness in this intrusion, inside the organism, of this system, in the whole adaptation of the nervous system to be accommodated for a long time before it really functions as a good pump, there is just as much strangeness in the leap constituted by the apparition of (4) this organ, as one might say there is in the fact that at a moment of human history, one saw human beings breathing in an iron lung, or again taking off into what is called inaccurately the cosmos, with something around them which for its vital function is not essentially different from what I am evoking here as a reserve of air.

Should we not recognise the essential feature of the fact that anxiety was in a way - it is Freud who indicates it to us here - chosen as a signal of something, this radical intrusion of something so other to the living human being which passing into the atmosphere already is; here we have the essential feature which means that the living human being who emerges into this world where he has to breathe, is first of all literally stifled, suffocated by what has been called the trauma - there is no other one - the trauma of birth, which is not the separation from the mother, but the aspiration into oneself of this fundamentally different milieu. Of course, the link between this moment and what can be called separation and weaning is not clear; but I question you, I ask you to gather the elements of your own experience, your experience as analysts, as observers of children, the experience also of everything that must be reconstructed, of everything that proves itself to be for us necessary if we wish to give a sense to the term of weaning, to see that the relationship of weaning to this first moment is not a simple relationship, a relationship of phenomena which overlap, but much more rather some relationship of contemporaneity.

It is not essentially true that the child is weaned: he weans himself, he detaches himself from the breast, he plays, in accordance with this first experience, whose already subjectivised character is manifested just as tangibly by the passage on his face, simply outlining the first signs of mimicry, of surprise, he plays at detaching himself from this breast and taking it up again; and if there were not already something active enough for us to articulate it in the direction of a desire for weaning, how could we even conceive of the very primitive, the very primordial facts in their appearance, in their dating, the refusal of the breast, the first forms of anorexia, the correlations of which our experience teaches us to seek immediately at the level of the big Other.

What is lacking to this first object that we call the breast for it to function authentically as what it is supposed to be in the (5) classical theory, namely the rupture of the link with the Other, what is lacking is its full link to the Other, and this is why I strongly emphasised that its link is closer to the first little neo-natal subject, it is not of the Other, it is not the link to the Other that has to be broken, it is at the very most the first sign of this link. This is why it has a relationship with anxiety, but also why, from the first, it is in fact the first form of, and the form which makes possible, the function of the transitional object.

Moreover, it is not at this level the only object which offers itself to fulfill this function. And if later another object, the one on which the last time - one more again - I insisted at length, the anal object, comes to fulfill this function in a clearer fashion at the very moment that the Other elaborates her own in the shape of the demand - one can see the wisdom of the ages which ensures that these watchers over the coming into the world of the human animal, the midwives, have always dwelt on, have always been brought to a halt before this singular and so tiny object, the meconium, which comes with the appearance of the child - I will not return today, since I have already done it, to the much more characteristic articulation that this object, the anal object, allows us to give of the function of the object o, the object o in so far as it is found to be the first support of subjectivation in the relationship to the Other, I mean the way in which, or that through which, the subject is first required by the Other to manifest himself as subject, as a subject in the full sense of the term, as a subject who already here has to give what he is, in so far as this passage, this entrance into the world of what he is can only be as a remainder, as irreducible with respect to what is imposed on him in terms of a symbolic imprint.

What he is there, is what he has first of all to give; and it is to this object that there is appended, as to a causal object, what is going to identify him primordially to the desire to retain. The first developmental form of desire is thus and as such akin to the order of inhibition. When desire appears for the first time, it opposes itself to the very act through which its originality as desire is introduced.

If it was already clear at the preceding stage that it is indeed to the object that there is appended the first form of desire, in so far as we elaborate it as desire for separation, for the second form, it is clear that the function of cause that I give (6) to the object is manifested in the fact that the form of desire is turned against the function which introduces the object o as such. For of course it must be seen that this object, as I recalled earlier, is here already given, already produced, and primitively produced, put at the disposition of this function that is determined by the introduction of the demand through something which is prior, that it was there already as a product of anxiety.

Here then it is neither the object in itself, nor the subject who autonomises himself, as it is imagined, in a vague and confused priority of totality which is involved here, but from the first initially an object chosen for its quality of being specially negotiable, of being originally an object of purchase (objet d'achat).

You see what is in question here: it is to realise that in this primal point of insertion of desire, which is linked to the conjunction within the same brackets of the o and of the D of demand, there is this on one side and on the other side anxiety, and it is in the interchanging of these positions of anxiety and of what has for the subject to be constituted in its function which will remain, up to the end, essentially represented by o, it is here that there is found the level at which we can, at which we must maintain ourselves, to sustain ourselves, if we wish to consider what is involved in our technical function.

This anxiety here, here it is then - we have known it for a long time - as it were set aside, dissimulated in this relationship of the obsessional that we call "ambivalent", this relationship that we simplify, that we abbreviate, that we even elude when we limit it to being one of aggressivity.

This object that he cannot prevent himself from retaining as the good which makes him worthwhile, and which is also only what is expelled, what is evacuated from himself, are the two aspects by which it determines the subject even as compulsion and as doubt. It is on this very oscillation between these two extreme points that there depends the passage, the momentary, possible passage of the subject through this zero point where it is, when all is said and done, entirely at the mercy of the other - here in the dual sense of the small other - that the subject finds himself.

And that is why, from my second lecture on, I pointed out to you, in opposing the structure of the relationship of desire to the desire of the Other, in the sense that I teach you it, to the structure in which it is articulated, defined, algebrised in the Hegelian dialectic, and that I told you that the point at which they overlap, a partial point, the very one which allows us to (7) define this relationship as a relationship of aggressivity, is the one which the formula defined at the point that we make equal to zero the moment - I mean here in the physical sense - of this desire, namely of what I wrote here as $d(o) : 0 > d(0)$, in other words desire qua determined by the first characteristically negotiable object. Here effectively one can say that the subject finds himself confronted with what is expressed in Hegelian phenomenology, by the impossibility of the co-existence of self-consciousnesses, and which is nothing but the impossibility for the subject, at the level of desire, of finding in himself, as subject, his cause.

Here you ought to see already the beginning of the consistency between this function of cause and this phantasy, this phantasy characteristic of a thinking that is in a way forced, for human speculation, about this notion of causa sui in which this thinking takes comfort from the existence somewhere of a being to whom his cause would not be foreign.

Compensation, phantasy, the arbitrary surmounting of this aspect of our condition, that the human being is first of all subjected to having produced the cause of his desire in a danger that he does not know. To this is linked this supreme and magisterial tone with which there reverberates, and ceaselessly reverberates, at the heart of Sacred Scripture, despite its blasphematory aspect, the text which has remained from Ecclesiastes, and what gives it its tone, its accent, if not the fact that "All is vanity", vanity, what we translate in that way, is in Hebrew the following,, pronounced ruach, whose three radical letters I am writing for you and which means wind, or again breath, a mist, if you wish, something which is effaced, which leads us back to an ambiguity, I believe, more legitimate to evoke here, as regards the most abject aspect of this breath, than anything that Jones elaborated in connection with the conception of the Madonna through the ear.

This theme, this thematic of vanity, is indeed what gives its accent, its resonance, its ever present import to the Hegelian definition of this, of the original and fruitful struggle from which there begins the Phenomenology of the spirit, he tells us, of the fight to the death for pure prestige, he tells us, which has indeed the accent of meaning the fight for nothing.

To make the treatment of obsession turn around aggressivity, is, in an obvious and I might say avowed fashion - even if it is not deliberate - to introduce at its principle the subduction of the desire of the subject to the desire of the analyst, in so far as, (8) like every desire, it is articulated elsewhere than in its internal reference to o , this desire is identified to an ideal to which, in a necessary way, the desire of the patient will be bent, in so far as this ideal is the position that the analyst has obtained or believes he has obtained with respect to reality.

Now the o that is involved, marked thus as cause of desire, is not this vanity, nor this tearing apart. If it is indeed in its function what I am articulating, namely this object defined as a remainder, as that which is irreducible to symbolisation at the locus of the Other - which depends on it certainly, for otherwise how would this remainder be constituted - if o is the unique of existence in so far as it puts itself forward, not at all, as has been said, in its facticity - for this facticity is only situated in its reference to a so-called mythical noetic necessity, which itself is supposed to be posited as the primary reference - there is no facticity in this remainder in which there is rooted the desire which will manage, more or less, to culminate in existence.

The more or less extreme severity of its reduction, namely what makes it irreducible, and in which everyone can recognise the exact level to which it has raised itself at the locus of the Other, here is what is defined in this dialogue which is played out on a stage, from which the principle of this desire, after having mounted it, has to fall off it through the test of what it will have left there in a relationship of tragedy, or more often of comedy.

It is played out there, of course, as a role; but it is not the role that counts - and this we all know from experience and from previous certainty - but what remains beyond this role. A remainder that is precarious and delivered up no doubt, for I am always a cedable object, as everyone knows in our day: an object of exchange. And this object is the principle which makes me desire, which makes me the desirer of a lack which is not a lack of the subject, but a failure brought about in the jouissance which is situated at the level of the Other.

This is why every function of the o refers only to this central gap which separates desire from the locus of jouissance at the sexual level, which condemns us from this necessity which means that jouissance is not naturally promised to desire for us, that desire can only go out to meet it, that in order to meet it desire must not only understand, but break through the very phantasy which sustains it and constructs it, the one that we have discovered as this stopping point which is called castration anxiety. But why not castration desire, since at the central lack which disjoins desire and jouissance, there is also (9) suspended a desire whose threat to everyone is only constructed from its recognition in the desire of the Other. At the limit, the other, whoever he may be, appears in the phantasy to be the castrator, the agent of castration.

Undoubtedly here the positions are different and one can say that for the woman the position is more comfortable, the business is already done; and this indeed is what gives her a much more special link with the desire of the Other.

This indeed is also why Kierkegaard can say this singular and, I believe, profoundly correct thing that the woman is more anxiety-ridden than the man. How would this be possible, if precisely at this central level anxiety was not constructed precisely, and as such, from the relationship to the desire of the Other.

Desire, in so far as it is desire of desire, namely temptation, is what at its heart brings us back to this anxiety in its most original function.

Anxiety, at the level of castration, represents the Other, since encountering a weakening of the apparatus gives us the object here in the form of a lack (carence).

Do I need to recall what in the analytic tradition, confirms here what I am in the process of articulating? Who is the one who gives us the first example of a castration, attracted, assumed, desired as such, if not Oedipus?

Oedipus is not first of all the father. This is what I have meant for a long time in pointing out ironically that Oedipus could not have had an Oedipus complex.

Oedipus is the one who wishes to pass authentically - and mythically also - to the fourth level, which I must indeed tackle along his exemplary path, the one who wishes to violate the prohibition concerning the conjunction of o - here (-J>) - with anxiety, the one who wishes to see what is beyond the most complete satisfaction of his desire. The sin of Oedipus, is the cupido sciendi, he wants to know. And this is paid for by the horror that I described, that what he finally sees are his own eyes, o, thrown on the ground.

Does this mean that this is the structure of the fourth level, and that there is always present somewhere this bloody ritual of blinding? No. It is not necessary - and this is why the human drama is not tragedy, but comedy: they have eyes in order not to see - it is not necessary for them to tear them out. (10) Anxiety is sufficiently rejected, miscognised by the simple capture of the specular image, i(o), for which the best that can be wished is that it is reflected in the eyes of the Other. But there is no need even, because there is the mirror.

And here the articulation according to the table of reference that I described the last time for you: the inhibition, symptom, anxiety of the fourth level, here is more or less how I would describe it:

- At the level of inhibition, it is the desire not to see which, given the arrangement of phenomena, scarcely needs to be sustained. Everything is satisfactory there. Miscognition as structural at the level of the "not to see" is there.

- On the second line and on the third, as dismay, as ego-ideal, namely that which of the Other is, as they say, is the easiest to introject. Of course, it is not at all without reason that this term introjection is introduced here; nevertheless I would ask you not to accept it without reservation. For in truth the ambiguity which remains between this introjection and projection, sufficiently indicates to us that it is necessary, in order to give its full meaning to the term introjection, to introduce another level at the heart of the central "symptom" of this level as it is specially incarnated at the level of the obsessional that I already designated: it is the phantasy of omnipotence correlative to the fundamental impotence to sustain this desire not to see.

Here what we will put at the level of acting-out, is the function of mourning, in so far as I am going to ask you to recognise in a moment what in the course of last year I taught you to see in it, a fundamental structure in the constitution of desire.

Here at the level of the passage à l'acte, a phantasy of suicide whose character and authenticity are to be put in question essentially within this dialectic.

Here anxiety always in so far as it is masked.

Here at the level of embarrassment what we will legitimately call - for I do not know if enough account is taken of the audacity of what Kierkegaard contributes in speaking about the concept of anxiety; what can that mean, if not the affirmation that: either there is the function of the concept according to Hegel, namely somewhere symbolically a veritable (11) hold on the real, or the only hold that we have - and this is where it is necessary to choose - is the one that anxiety gives us, the only final apprehension as such of all reality. The concept of anxiety as such only arises therefore at the limit of a meditation which nothing indicates to us is not going to encounter its stopping-point very soon.

I	Desire not to see	Impotence	Concept of anxiety
S	Miscognition (desire not to know)	Omnipotence	Suicide
A	Ideal	Mourning	Anxiety

But what matters for us, is to rediscover here the confirmation of truths that we have already tackled from other angles. What does Freud articulate at the end of his speculation about anxiety, if not this: "After all", he says, "I have just told you, put forward, about the relationships between anxiety and the loss of the object, what is it that can distinguish it from mourning?" And this whole codicil, this appendix to his article - you can consult it - only marks the most extreme embarrassment in defining the fashion in which one can understand that these two functions, to which he gives the same reference, have such diverse manifestations.

I would ask you here to dwell with me for a moment on what I think I ought to remind you of, that what our interrogation here led us to when we were speaking about Hamlet as an eminent dramatic personage, as emergence at the dawn of modern ethics of the relationship of the subject to his desire, what I highlighted that it is at once the absence of mourning - and simply and properly speaking of mourning by his mother - which made there vanish, dissipate, collapse in the most radical way in him the possible elan of a desire in this being who is presented to us moreover well enough, I believe, for one or other person to have recognised him, even identified to the very style of the hero of the Renaissance, Baldassare Castiglione, for example. Do I need to remind you of him: he is the personage about whom the least that can be said is that he does not retreat before very much, and that he does not lack daring! The only thing that he cannot do, is precisely the act that he is made to do, because the desire is lacking, the desire is lacking because the ideal has collapsed. What can be more doubtful in the words of Hamlet than this sort of idolatrous relationship that he outlines of the reverence of his father, of his father for this creature whom we are astonished that this supreme king, the old Hamlet, the dead Hamlet, literally bows down before to pay her homage, ensconced in his loving allegiance? Do we not have here the signs even of (12) something too forced, something too exalted, not to be of the order of an unique love, of a mythical love, of a love akin to this style of what I called courtly love, which, outside its properly cultural and ritual references, through which it is obvious that it is addressed to something other than the woman, is the sign on the contrary of some lack or other, of some alibi or other, before the difficult paths that the access to a true love represents.

The correspondence between the animal evasion of the maternal Gertrude from this whole dialectic, and the overvaluation which is presented to us in Hamlet's memories about the attitude of his father is obvious here; and the result, is that, when this ideal is contradicted, when it collapses - let us notice it - what disappears in Hamlet is the power of desire which will not, as I showed you, be restored until the vision outside of a mourning, a true one, with which he enters into competition, that of Laertes for his sister, for the object loved by Hamlet, and from whom he had found himself suddenly, through lack of desire, separated.

Does this not open the door for us, does it not give us the key which allows us to articulate better than Freud does and along the line of his own interrogation what is meant by mourning. Freud points out to us that the subject of mourning has to perform a task which is, in a way, to consummate a second time the loss provoked by the accident of the destiny of the beloved object.

What does that mean? Does the work of mourning not appear to us, in a light that is at once identical and contrary, as the work which is done to maintain, to sustain all these links in detail. And God knows how much Freud insists, and quite rightly, on the scrupulous and detailed aspect of the remembering of mourning concerning everything that was experienced in terms of a link with the beloved object.

It is this link that must be restored with the fundamental object, the masked object, the object o, the veritable object of the relationship, for which subsequently a substitute may be provided which will not have, when all is said and done, any more importance than the one who first occupied the place.

As one of you, a humorist, said to me during one of our Journees Provinciales, there is a story well designed to show us in the cinema that any "irreplaceable German" whatsoever - he was alluding to the adventure that is described for us in the film Hiroshima mon amour - this irreplaceable German can find an (13) immediate and perfectly valid substitute in the first Japanese encountered at the street corner.

The problem of mourning is that of the persistence of what? The bonds through which desire is suspended, not at all on the object o at the fourth level, but on i(o) through which every love, in so far as this term implies the idealised dimension that I have spoken of, is structured narcissistically.

And this is what makes the difference between what happens in melancholy and mania. If we do not distinguish the object o from i(o), we cannot conceive of what Freud, in the same note, recalls and powerfully articulates, just as in the well-known article on "Mourning and melancholia", about the radical difference there is between melancholia and mourning.

Do I need to refer to my notes and to remind you of this pass.-: where, after having become engaged in the notion of the return, of the reversion of the supposedly "objectal" libido onto the subject's own ego, he admits: in melancholia, it is obvious that this process - he is the one who says it - does not reach a conclusion, the object overcomes its direction, it is the object that triumphs. And since what is involved as a return of the libido in mourning is something different, it is also for that reason that the whole process, that the whole dialectic is constructed differently, namely that this object o, Freud tells us that it is necessary then, - and why in this case? I am leaving it to one side here - it is necessary then that the subject explain himself, but that, since this object o is usually masked behind the i(o) of narcissism, that the i(o) of narcissism is there so that, at the fourth level, the o should be masked, miscognised in its essence, this is what makes it necessary for the melancholic to pass, as I might say, through his own image, and to attack it first in order to reach in this object o, which transcends it, the thing whose control escapes him, the thing whose collapse will lead him into precipitation, suicide, with this automatism, this mechanism, this necessary and fundamentally alienated character with which as you know the suicides of melancholies are carried out, and not in an indifferent context: and if this happens so often by a window, if not through a window, this is not by chance, it is the recourse to a structure which is none other than the one that I emphasise as being that of the phantasy.

We can only grasp this relationship to o, through which there is distinguished everything that belongs to the "mania-melancholy" cycle, everything that belongs to the "ideal", the reference "mourning or desire", in the accentuation of the difference of (14) the function of o as compared to i(o), as compared to something which makes this reference to o fundamental, radical, more rooting for the subject than any other relationship whatsoever, but also as fundamentally miscognised, alienated, in the narcissistic relationship.

Let us say right away, in passing, that in mania, it is the non-function of o, and not simply its miscognition that is at stake. It is the something through which the subject is no longer ballasted by any o, which delivers him, sometimes without any possibility of freedom, to the infinite and purely playful metonymy of the signifying chain.

This - no doubt I have here avoided many things - this is going to allow us to conclude, at the level where this year I intend to leave you. If desire, as such, and in its most alienated, most fundamentally phantastical character, is what characterises the fourth level, you can remark that if I initiated the structure of the fifth, that if I indicated that at this level the o is resharpened, this time openly alienated, as support of the desire of the Other, who this time is named, it is also to tell you why I will stop this year at this term.

The whole dialectic in effect of what is happening at the level of this fifth level implies a more detailed articulation than has ever been carried out with what I designated earlier as introjection, which implies as such - I was content to only indicate it - the auditory dimension, which implies also the paternal function.

If, next year, things turn out in a way that allows me to continue my Seminar along the path I anticipate, it is around, not simply the name, but the names of the father that I will make a rendezvous with you.

It is not for nothing that in the Freudian myth the father intervenes in the most obviously mythical way as being the one whose desire submerges, crushes, is imposed on, all the others. Is there not here an obvious contradiction with this fact obviously given by experience that through his voice it is precisely something quite different that takes place, namely the normalisation of desire along the paths of the law?

But is that everything? Necessity itself, alongside what is here traced, represented, rendered tangible by experience, and even down to the facts frequently weighed by us about the absence (carence) of the function of the father, does the necessity of maintaining the myth not draw our attention to something else, to the necessity for the articulation, for the support, for the maintaining of a function which is the following, which is that the father, in the manifestation of his desire, knows for his part to what o this desire is referred. The father is not causa sui, in accordance with the religious myth, but a subject who has gone far enough in the realisation of his desire to integrate it to its cause whatever it may be, to what is irreducible in this function of o qua - I ask you to grasp - what allows us to articulate, at the origin of our research itself and without avoiding it in any way, that there is no human subject who does not have to posit himself as a finite object to which are appended finite desires, which only take on the appearance of becoming infinite in so far as by escaping from one another always further from their centre, they carry the subject always away further from any authentic realisation.

Now this relationship, this miscognition of o, is something which leaves a door open. We have always known it, there was no need even for analysis to show it to us, since I believe I was able to show it to you in a dialogue of Plato, The Symposium. The object o, in so far as at the term - a term no doubt never achieved - it is our most radical existence, is the only path along which desire can deliver us that in which we will have to recognise ourselves, this object o is to be situated as such in the field of the Other, and not only is it to be situated there, but it is situated there by each and every one. And this is what is called the possibility of transference.

The interpretation that we give is always brought to bear on the greater or lesser dependence of desires with respect to one another. But it is not a confrontation of anxiety. There is only an overcoming of anxiety when the Other has named himself. There is no love except that for a name, as everyone knows from experience. And the moment that the name is pronounced of him or of her to whom our love is addressed, we know very well that it is a threshold which is of the greatest importance.

This is only a trace, a trace of this something which goes from the existence of o to its passage into history. What makes of a psychoanalysis a unique adventure is this search for the agalma in the field of the Other. I have often questioned you about what the desire of the analyst should be in order that, there where we are trying to push things beyond the limit of anxiety, work is possible.

Undoubtedly it is fitting that the analyst should be one who has been able, however little it may be, from some angle, from some tack, to make his desire sufficiently enter into this irreducible o to offer to the question of the concept of anxiety a real guarantee.

Seminar 24: Wednesday 23 June 1965

Our last meeting for this year. I wanted it to be one of the seminars described as closed, namely, this moment or this place where I manifested, this year, the desire to hear, in short, a certain number of eventual responses to what I was led to put forward to you in my lectures.

It is an enterprise which has not revealed itself, this year, to be too risky. Nevertheless, we have almost, for this last meeting, not perhaps all that I was expecting from certain people who had expressly manifested the desire to be present by speaking at one of my seminars of this year, but found themselves, as happens to psychoanalysts, always very busy, and caught for time.

Good. With that, point I had a pleasant surprise. There was brought to me, at the last minute, a text on a book which, as you are going to see, seems to me to be very very important. You will see why it seems to me to be very important. It is not only because I could talk to you about it very relevantly as relating to certain reference (2) points that I think I very clearly elucidated before you, this year, concerning what is called desire.

And then, subsequently, you will have an intervention from someone you have already heard who forms part of this new stratum always ready to go into battle when perhaps older people take things more slowly.

So then, I am going to give the floor, without delaying any longer, to the person who is going to give you her commentary on this work whose name I will not take the freshness off before she speaks about it. It is Madame Montrelay who was kind enough to give me this pleasant surprise.

Madame Montrelay: On this eve of vacation, perhaps it is not too frivolous to suggest to those of you who have not already done so, to read Marguerite Duras' last novel, The ravishing of Lol V Stein. This book appeared last year, and was not always favourably welcomed by the critics. They reproached her for an excessively enigmatic subtlety. One finds there, in fact, the usual style of Marguerite Duras: a slow rhythm, an ambiguity of texture, a passionate understanding of words and also of the heart.

The ravishing of Lol V Stein goes in the same direction as the preceding narratives by (3) Marguerite Duras, in its search for a lost moment. This instant, which occurs completely by chance, fascinates the principal character of the narrative - remember the scenario of Hiroshima mon amour - it fascinates him because it is there that his certainty is inscribed.

This certainty is extremely tangible, moreover, in the style of Marguerite Duras which irritates a lot of people, which is quite comprehensible because it insists the more it slips away. It seems to coincide with memory or rather what Jacques Lacan calls a memory (une mémoire).

If I evoke this last term it is not in order to note, purely and simply, that it constitutes the mainspring of the novel. This affirmation is just as true of the works of Proust, Butor, Simon and so many others. It is perhaps truer than about the works of Marguerite Duras where memory does not constitute so much the mainspring as the object of the narrative, which is curiously spoken by another. I mean that it appears here with a particular clarity that it is the desiring discourse of the other that we are living, with the subject Lol V Stein, the event which holds her prisoner.

It goes without saying that this novel is the nth narrative which has been made in the third person. What is surprising is that the unaccustomed relief of the first person who speaks about the third, this relief is in a third dimension in which the subject Lol emerges infinitely more present, more disturbing, than one can account for, by the unique use of the first person. These dimensions which Jacques Lacan has designated for us this year, to which I just alluded, particularly what was named by him last week, the dialectic of the relationship with the other qua relationship of alienation, these dimensions even structure Marguerite Duras' novel which it is time for me to summarise for you.

Lola Valerie Stein, nineteen years old, American, on the point of marrying, is suddenly separated at the end of a ball, not from her fiancé, Michael Richardson, but from the couple formed by her fiancé and Anne Marie Stretter, these two having, in the course of the ball, having recognised one another in a passion that is as sudden as it is definitive.

This, I think, is how things ought to be said. Lol, who has seen the couple beginning to fall in love by the simple - I borrow this term from Serge Leclair - circuit of the look, looks on, for her part also she does not intend to stop looking.

We must underline right away the strangeness of Lol's character, indifferent, absent, here is the first presentation that is given of her by her friend. At college, she says, I was not the only one to think it, there was already something missing in Lol for her to (5) be "there", she says. "She gave the impression of of being in a state of passive boredom, putting up with a person she knew she was supposed to be but whom she forgot at the slightest occasion. A miracle of sweetness but also of indifference." (3)

If Lol V Stein is so indifferent it is naturally because she does not clearly distinguish between herself and her surroundings. Anne-Marie Stretter, who appears on the contrary to be perfectly well defined, sure of herself, allows Lol, I imagine, to make the distinction, thanks to her, the distinction between a woman, this woman who is Lol V Stein and the desire of Michael Richardson.

This desire takes on for Lol, a significant value that was unsuspected up to then, even though she no longer loves her fiancé. Lol V Stein suffers the mark of this signifier in the shape of her forgetting. Lol's forgetting, its negation, are going to constitute her delight at being finally in the presence of the couple and her own presence or the present of presence, if I can invert in that way a formula that Heidegger gives for anxiety, in order to illustrate the opposite, namely, satisfaction, where the present of presence takes an absolute value which represents the dead time of the ball, walled in, it is written, in its nocturnal light.

But more again than what we are told about the multiple aspects of the ball, what holds Lol is its ending, more precisely again the moment when she has just perceived the dawn while they do not know it yet.

(6) At that moment, Lol senses in terror that something is going to happen, that "it is going to happen". And if I take up the terms recently quoted by Jacques Lacan, it is because they seem perfectly to express in their ambiguity the event that is sensed by Lol of her body as a waste scrap, or rather the becoming of her body as a waste scrap, a remainder, rejected more by the dawn than by the couple.

I take up this passage with more detail: "she knows," writes Marguerite Duras, and she adds a little bit further on "they do not yet", "at this precise moment, something ought to have been attempted which was not" (37). This was Lol's temptation: strengthened by the knowledge of which she possesses the privilege for a brief moment, she senses herself on the point of using it, first to circumscribe, to perpetuate, this common fascination, which would be still possible if we were to suppose that Lol discovers for herself a sudden incantatory power.

But this is not the essential. What Lol desires, in the possession of her brief and fragile knowledge, is to be able to say why, really, the couple flees. And this is absolutely impossible.

If the words existed, to circumscribe what is being manifested, played out, before her about the reality of sex, the couple would remain. Lol is sure of it and we also participate in this certainty. We are totally suspended on it for a brief instant. We are (7) nostalgic for it.

I cannot read here the two splendid pages which lead us to this moment. I will content myself with quoting this expression of regret, this mourning of Lol:

"I like to believe - since I love her - that if Lol is silent in her daily life, it is because she believed for a fleeting moment, that this word might exist. It would have been an absence-word, a hole-word whose centre would have been hollowed out into a hole, the kind of hole in which all the other words would have been buried." (38) Lol is very well aware that she is not able to articulate this word.

So Marguerite Duras continues in the same vein:

“It would have been impossible to utter it, but it would have been made to reverberate. Enormous, endless, an empty gong, it would have held back anyone who wanted to leave, it would have convinced them of the impossible, it would have made them deaf to any other word save that one, in one fell swoop it would have defined the future and the moment themselves.” “What can convince us of the impossible, who can say the truth about reality, beginning with that of sex”, Jacques Lacan asked a little while ago, “if not God. But God is absent.”

“Lol”, continues Marguerite Duras, “is not yet God, nor anyone” (39) Issuing from the absence of a word, from the absence of God, there remains nothing more than the body of Lol, horrible, terrible to sustain, the o-object which it is going to be henceforth (8) necessary to abolish. How can one tackle that? By ensuring that the throw of the dice which was Lol’s first forgetting is renewed but makes, as one might say, two blows from one stone. The forgetting of Lol by a real couple, must coincide with the abolition of her body experienced as o-object.

Then alone will this event be the arrival of the ravishing of Lol V Stein. And this in both senses of the term. The way in which Lol V Stein imposes on the reality of the beings who surround her the grid of her phantasy which is none other than the reconstitution on the rebound of the first chance, I will tell you later.

We will now make a few remarks, first of all in connection with this o-object as it appears in the course of the narrative. The first is that it constitutes in Marguerite Duras, as in Flaubert, Maupassant and also in the new novel, this tangible, palpable, material of the narrative which only properly speaking becomes an event through the intervention of the desire of the other.

In The ravishing of Lol V Stein, the object is the body, the look, but it is above all the missing word which, because it is lacking, does not exist any the less and in the most horrible fashion from the moment that its existence is raised, put in question. This word as hole, this hole of flesh, this “bloody incompleteness”, I quote, “this dead dog on the beach”(38), how many times already has it resonated in your ears, this word is, Lol.

(9) Lola, such a feminine first name with its final little “a”, and its sexed character. It harmonises in a curious fashion with the little bit of Valerie that remains, a “V”, and the brief density of the surname.

Dr Lacan: Madame Montrelay, do you think you would have the courage to take the plunge. What you have so well picked out in this work and in this text, try to get it across with your notes of course to sustain you, which are not notes, but a text, but without reading this text, because I think all the same that, not that it is not getting across, but that it has less impact than if you were to say, improvise, tell us the same thing as you are absolutely capable of doing, because I believe that it is important Madame Montrelay: I have not prepared an improvisation.

Dr Lacan: Do not improvise but say what you have to say. In short, it is a question of something which might be a hisstory, a psychological history, namely, that one could in effect go back to the childhood of Lol V Stein. The originality of this is diminished by the fact that you know the American usage of giving in the form of an initial, to represent the presence of a second fore name in the form of an initial.

(10) The first name is a shortened name, its Lola. This Lol V Stein is absolutely not psychology, I mean people speak about her in terms of what was already strange about her, but the important thing is what happens to her at a moment given as unique, upon which she remains, one could say from outside if we were doing psychology, she remains hooked. She remains hooked up to the fact that one fine evening, with her then fiancé, it happens that a third person, a charming woman enters, the fiancé looks at her, and the affair is settled, they will leave together at the end of the evening, and everything happens really in full sight not just of Lol, but of everyone.

Everything that happens in the rest of Lol V Stein's life and specifically what is reported to us, what is reported to us by a narrator whom we do not know. There is a moment when in the middle of the book, the distance is covered and the narrator unveils himself, the distance is covered, it is I. He is the one who is speaking and who rejoins his own entry into the life of Lol V Stein.

What is going to happen with this character, how this character is encountered, is something which manifests the state in which Lol V Stein has remained in connection with this traumatic scene. What she is, essentially, after that, is what Madame Montrelay is going to try to explain to you. What I was able to say this year about the (11) subject and his supports is here truly illustrated, illustrated in a fashion which does not for a single instant have structuralist or analytic pretensions, simply by stating things with the words that best illuminate it. It emerges that the very structure is written there. Earlier, Madame Montrelay read a text to you where there is this word hole for example. That is in the text. There are many other things in the text which is a text which seems, without our having done anything, Marguerite Duras and I, to meet, they are texts that are congruent with the very theme of what I put forward to you this year.

Take it up again, as you are able, and speak a little bit louder, with a little bit more rhythm. And if you can, leave your text. I would be very happy with that. Because you have certainly more than one thing to say. Or indeed read the pieces from Marguerite Duras when necessary: it is absolutely necessary that this should get across.

Madame Montrelay: The best way is perhaps is if I read first what I have here and afterwards we will see....

I was saying then that this object was a word, it was Lol. I was also saying that Lola had lost the a of Lola, that it had lost its sexed character and made her anonymous. But that, on the contrary, I believe that I have not yet said that with Lol V Stein, you have a mouthful.

(12) In fact we find in this verbal sequence, the characteristics, it seem to me, which were underlined by Serge Leclair in connection with this secret formula of poord'jeli. These characteristics seem to me to be the following:

- 1) The brevity with which there arises the formula which renders well the apparition of a nothing-at-all-something that we have previously encountered,
- 2) The acme, figured in an inverted form in the V in the centre, a fork, an incomplete triangle,
- 3) The natural reversion as regards the word Lol where the front is the same as the back but precisely, then, can we speak about reversion? It is something different.
- 4) The magical character of this formula, magical at least in the way it appears in the novel because it represents the master word that Lol should have said in order to close for ever the circuit of sense.

These are only suppositions. Nevertheless if, as Marguerite Duras underlines, Lol, when she pronounces a proper name, is incapable of naming - I can find the quotation later - it is quite possible that this present-absent word, far from sustaining here the symbolic order, only serves to want to justify the inexplicable, namely, the mystery of birth.

We will note, secondly, and very briefly, the ambiguity, the incoherence, with which (13) there is manifested in the narrative the femininity of Lol. It is tempting to think that Lol, counting for nothing, forgotten by the couple, apparently not desired by her parents, ceaselessly repeats this experience because this would allow her to articulate for someone else, but especially for herself, her enigmatic femininity.

One is struck in this novel by the absence of reference points, the rarity of phallic signifiers, it seems that Lol's sexuality is situated well on this hither side of an oedipal structure, in this relationship to the void that was evoked by Perrier and one of his collaborators in volume VII of La psychanalyse.

But before ending this presentation, it is perhaps necessary for us to give a glimpse of the rest of the novel. Lol V Stein, after the ball, after the crisis, the time of madness which follows it, gets married, has three children and lives in conformity to norms, in a small American town.

After ten years of marriage she returns to her native town and in the course of these afternoons where tirelessly she walks her body as one would walk a child, she encounters a couple, another one, made up of her old friend and a man whom she lays claim to, whom she decides to love in the most bizarre fashion.

(14) In fact, this man was to forget her as often, as absolutely as possible with a woman who is and who must above all be considered by him as possessing the fullness of femininity. That this woman had also attended the ball which is also her ball, is of course, for her, an essential condition for the charm of things.

The lover of Tatiana now tries to decipher, bit by bit, this immense phantasy conceived by Lol V Stein, for reasons that are now easy to locate. "I desperately want", he declares, "to be part of the word which emerges from the lips of Lol V Stein, I want to be part of this lie that she has forged. Let her bear me with her, let our affair take from this point forth, a different course, let her consume and crush me with the rest, I shall bend to her will, let my hope be crushed with the rest, to be bent to her will" (97).

This is what Jack Hold, the narrator, accepts to do. To meet Tatiana in a hotel near the town while Lol V Stein lying in a field of rye looks, looks. Looks at what? The lovers who at first pass sometimes near the window, and afterwards, naturally, nothing. At the window the forgetting of Lol V Stein that Jack Hold tries to bring about for the greater satisfaction of the trio. What secret plan has taken hold of Marguerite Duras which led her to construct a story that is so frightening, so mad, so logically illogical in its smallest details?

(15) It is here that we must make a third series of remarks in connection with the use of persons in the narrative, particularly the unaccustomed, unusual breadth which was given to the first person, that of Jack Hold.

There follows first of all:

First remark: In the measure that our unique knowledge is established in a desire, a desire itself caught up in the net of a phantasy, that this knowledge is never fixed, always relative, possibility, one story among others. This is the way I believe certain contemporary musical works present themselves, those of Stockhausen for example.

Second remark: The desire of the other conditions the space of the novel, in other words its structure, a space open to all the winds where the desire of the one, let us say outside, can intersect at every point that of the other, supposed to be inside. How can the desire of the one be sutured to the desire of the other. It is in function of the o-object but we are going to find that later.

Third remark: It would have been absolutely impossible to account for the subject Lol, to make her emerge in this quality of being, of truth, which sometimes leave you breathless, in other words it would have been impossible to grasp Lol at the zero point of her desire if it were not in the discourse of the desire of the other.

Fourth remark: This subject we grasp, well on the hither side of the cogito. Nothing (16) of it is ever formulated in the form of the one, of the unique. Here is what her lover says about it: "That was my initial discovery about her: to know nothing about Lol V Stein was already to know her. One could, it seemed to me, know even less about her, less and less about Lol V Stein" (72).

Let it be said in passing that this definition of love is not so bad, it seems to me. But what interests us here is that this cloudy, insipid subject, who has no ideas, who has not a single one, is the only subject of the novel who thinks she can manoeuvre her world, tracking, manipulating the couple of lovers into what kind of situations I will later say.

The fact is that the subject is to be grasped in a perpetual division between the desire of the other and the o-object. Here she is anew this object, more present than ever in the second part of the novel. These eyes fixed wide open, which devour, absorb, decide about everything, this immense look lost in the bristling of the straw in a field of rye, is this o-object which fascinates Jack Hold, which draws him into the phantasy, into her phantasy, or into the phantasy of the novel.

What Lacan told us, I believe, last week. I quote him textually: "It is in so far as I am the o-object that my desire is the desire of the other".

So then, in this narrative, the third person is made the first, the first is to be taken as (17) the third. An operation of syntax, of desire, that certain novels of the eighteenth century depicted, I am thinking in particular of Aux égarements du coeur et de l'esprit by Crébillon the younger "For a while, the marquise was ejected, leaving at five o'clock".

The new novel, to be located since Flaubert operates between the one who speaks and the luxuriance, the proliferation of the object, an interval, a lack, a pause, a silence which is the subject. Let us make no mistake about it, Marguerite Duras, who knows how to make silence heard, also speaks in the third person.

Dr Lacan: You have just heard a very important and very interesting text. We will try to arrange for you to have it. Is there here, I know that already, among people close to me, there are several people who have not allowed this text of Marguerite Duras to escape them. If they want to give an opinion now on what they have heard, I would be satisfied.

Does someone have something to say about it now? To give you the tone of the novel, I am going to read for you a little piece of the central chapter that I have chosen. I think it will be clear enough, in so far as the voice of the person who has spoken here has reached you, to be clear enough as regards the texture, the texture of (18) the novel for this chapter to take on its value.

The young girl, the young woman in question married rather quickly a very altruistic type of chap, who had, in a way, taken her under his protection as a sort of waif.

After ten years this waif has survived rather well and has come back to her native place, to her hometown which is called South Tahla, of which one could have warned her as regards the dangers that it presented for her, specifically as regards what are called memories that it is necessary to avoid for people for who are suffering from a bereavement, lives again in this town and it is there that, wandering around one day, she is going to meet someone who had already announced himself at the horizon of her vision, one could not say in a meeting, he entered into the field of her window, it is the narrator, at the same time he is the entity, the typical lover, but he is also someone she follows, who is there, the one who is going to take the place of the hole, of this gap, around which, in short, her whole being as subject is organised.

Following him, having met him on the street, she waits for what he is waiting, namely, the woman with whom she has a presentiment, she presumes he has an appointment.

“She did in fact arrive, she descended from a bus crowded with people on their way home from work.

The moment she heads towards him, with that very slow, very gentle, circular movement of her hips which makes her at every step, the object of some secret, ceaseless, caressing self-flattery, as soon as Lol sees the black mass of dry, mist-like (19) with the tiny, white, triangular face beneath, that face dominated completely by those very large, very bright eyes, gravely disturbed by their ineffable remorse at belonging to this adulterous body. Lol admits that she recognised Tatiana Karl”, namely the woman who was the witness of the initial scene. Then and then only she believes the name that had been hovering on the edge of her consciousness for weeks was there: Tatiana Karl.

She was discreetly dressed in a casual black suit. But her hair was done with great care, there was a gray flower in it, she had pinned it up with gold combs. She had taken great care to fix the fragile hair-do with a long, wide, black hair band which, where it passed close to her face, framed her bright eyes, made them look even larger, even more sorrowful, and this hair-do, which would have been destroyed by the lightest exposure to the wind, which in fact a mere look would undo, she must have - Lol is speculating now - she must have had to imprison in a dark hair net so that, at the proper moment, he would be the only one who could breach and destroy its admirable artificiality, one single movement of his hand would bathe her in its fallen tresses, that marvellous head of hair which, suddenly, Lol remembers and sees again, luminously juxtaposed to this one.”

Then she sees them meeting one another : “They were walking a step apart and (20) scarcely spoke.

I think I can see what Lol V Stein must have seen:

There is between them an incredible contact which does not stem from any intimate knowledge but on the contrary from a disdain for such knowledge. They have the same expression of silent consternation, of fright, of profound indifference. They go more quickly as they approach their destination. Lol V Stein spies, watches, invents these lovers. Their way they look does not deceive her. They do not love one another. What is there for her to say? Others will say it, she would say it differently. But she does not speak. Other bonds hold them in a grip which is not that of feeling nor of happiness, it is something else which gives neither pain nor joy. They are neither sad nor happy. Their union is constructed upon indifference, in a way which is general and which they apprehend moment by moment. All preference is banished from it. They are together, two trains which meet and pass. Around them the landscape, sensuous and lushly green is the same. They see it. They are not alone. One could deal with them. By opposite paths, they have arrived at the same result as Lol V Stein. They by doing, saying, trying, deceiving themselves, going away and coming back, lying, losing, winning, advancing, by coming back again, and Lol for her part by doing nothing" (49-52).

(21) This is where she follows them to this place which is the hotel, the hotel in the town where everyone is secure to conceal their clandestine loves. Lol knows this hotel because she went there in her youth with her lover who has abandoned her, Michael Richardson. She has no doubt come there sometimes during her walks. It is there that Michael Richardson had sworn his oath of love to her.

"The memory of the winter afternoon has become bogged down also in forgetfulness, in the slow daily glaciation of South Tahla" - this is the name of the town - "beneath her feet." It is she then, it is she who from there has gone on to the famous scene at the casino which tore from her the one who remained subsequently for her entire life this hole, this hole in the place of which there is no longer anything more than the trace of a lie. This is where they come to.

"I see how she gets there: Very quickly she reaches the field of rye, lets herself slip into it, finds herself sitting, stretches out on it. Before her there is this lighted window but Lol is far from the light.

The idea of what she is doing does not cross her mind. I believe again that it is the first time, that she is there without the faintest idea of being there, if she were questioned, she would say that she was resting there from the fatigue of getting there. From the fatigue that will follow, returning from there. Living, dying she breaths deeply; that evening the air is like honey, cloyingly sweet. She does not ask herself the source of this marvellous weakness which made her lie down in this field; she lets it act on her, fill her up to suffocation, lull her gently until Lol V Stein is fast asleep.

The rye rustles beneath her loins. The young rye of early summer. With her eyes riveted to the lighted window a woman sees the void, knotting, devouring this existing, invisible spectacle, the light of a room where others are.

In the distance with fairy-like fingers the memory of a certain recollection flits past. It grazes Lol a little while after she has lain down in the field, and it shows her at this late hour of the evening a field of rye, this woman who looks at a little rectangular window, a narrow stage, circumscribed as a stone where no actor has yet appeared. And perhaps Lol is afraid - but ever so little - of the eventuality of a still greater separation from the others. She knows all the same that some would fight, they would go running home once a residue of reason made them surprise themselves in this field. But it is the last fear that Lol has learned, the one that others will have in her place that evening. They would bravely destroy it in their breasts, but she quite the contrary, cherishes it, tames it, caresses it, with her hands on the rye.

The horizon on the other side of the hotel had lost all its colour. Night is falling. The shadow of a man crosses the rectangle of light, once and then a second time, in the opposite direction.” (53-55)

(23) And it is there that she follows in the form of this shadow theatre all the goings on of the lovers.

The end, her return to her own house, her husband is in the street. He is waiting for her, alarmed.

“She lies, she is believed. The love that Lol had experienced for Michael Richardson was for her husband the surest guarantee of his wife’s fidelity. She could not find a second time a man who had the measure of the one from Town Beach. Or she would have had to invent him. But she invented nothing, her husband believed.” (57)

You see that the dimensions and the register around which Marguerite Duras operates do not lack some side-long humour.

As regards what here is demonstrated and what can be shown, it is precisely in so far as this being, Lol V Stein, around whom one could recall many of the themes of this year up to and including, as was done earlier, the function of the usage of the proper name which is articulated on several occasions and at several special points of this book with, apparently, God knows, a pertinence which might after all be the object of interrogation if we did not know, through our work this year, the profound consistency of this function of the proper name with everything that is involved in the (24) seat, in this central seat of the subject in so far as she is represented here in the most articulated way by the word hole, by the missing word, the hole-word: either the hole-word - and that it is in the measure that this being, this being designated by this proper name which is the title of the novel by Marguerite Duras, this being is only really specified, incarnated, personified in her novel in the measure that she exists in the form of this core object, this o-object of this something which exists as a look but which is a look, a look that has been set aside, an object-look, a look that we see on several occasions, of course, being renewed on this stage, punctuated, repeated on several occasions up to the end of the novel. Even when she has got to know this man, that she has approached, that she has literally hooked herself onto, as if she were rejoining here this subject divided from herself, the one who alone can support her, who is also in the novel the one who supports her, it is the narrative of this subject that makes her present, the only subject here is this object, this isolated object, this object by itself, in a way, exiled, proscribed, fallen at the horizon of the fundamental scene, which is this pure look that Lola Valerie Stein is, and it is nevertheless, in the novel, the only subject, the one around which there is sustained and turns and exists all the others and that is why the remark that was addressed to you earlier about this sort of sharp turn of the novel, from the old traditional novel, the one that was very prettily (25) illustrated for you by the theme extracted from Cr billon the younger, and also of the novel for the concierge, “the marquise went out at five o’clock,” that from which a certain novel, at a certain moment excluded the rule and style in showing us that things should never be introduced, vivified except in the form of some monologue with which the ferret was passed from one to the other of the protagonists of the novel, it is here that one finds, in the form no doubt of a character who speaks in the third person, but who is the omnipresent character, the one who slips, who passes, who sees things in a way from the outside, contrary to the principle of Politzer, speaks and recounts the narrative in the third person. It is precisely in the measure that this is done that it allows there to be presentified somewhere the object in the form of an object, of a fallen object, of a detached object, of a waste scrap, to be that which is the essential being that we see that we see being incarnated with a degree of presence in a novel that to my eyes, to the eyes I think of those who have already read it, and to the eyes of those who have yet to read it, in the most intense form, what deserves to be called a subjectivity.

This is what, in short, you have been introduced to by what Madame Montrelay was good enough to prepare for you. If someone has a word to say on it, let him say it right away.

(26) Dr Green: Can you remind me of the name Jack Hold? How is it written?

Dr Lacan: H.O.L.D.

Dr Green: Good then, we have Lol V (alerie) Stein.

and then we have	Michael Richardson and then we have	Tatiana Karl Jack Hold.

It is simply some remarks which came to me precisely on the function of the proper name and of the incidence here, all the same, of certain signifiers which are repeated here. The missing “a” here cannot all the same escape the exceptional reduplication of this “a” three times in the first name of Tatiana and precisely also in her family name, constituting the central vowel of that name.

This then is already a first element which it is worth while pinpointing. On the other hand, between Richardson and the Karl we have also something which creates a correspondence; these two fragments of two phonemes in the bonds that unite the two protagonists.

What is lacking here already can be located at the level of the first name, at the level of the “a” which is precisely the syllable amputated from the first name Lola. The “a” I find again here, on the one hand at the level of this “a” we see that it corresponds in Karl with the name of Richardson, and one could obviously ask oneself the measure in (27) which this ending on a sound which obviously implies the birth of a link of filiation.

Finally, obviously, this central vowel of the name Hold being precisely what remains preserved of what is amputated at the level of Lola ought also to attract our attention.

These are some remarks which perhaps it seemed to me could be an object of an investigation for what was presented to us in the course precisely about subjectivity, in the course

Madame Montrelay: There is one thing that I did not say also in connection with Lol, which is that written in lower case letters that gives l o l.

Dr Lacan: Good, so then Jacques-Alain, over to you old chap. You are entering the arena with a little delay. So off you go. In fact I think you are all going to read this little novel during the vacation. You can read it in two and a half hours but then you have to re-read it twenty times. Announce your subject because I did not announce it earlier.

Mr Miller: My only task is to present to you a text which appeared in Diogenes, under the title of Psychoanalysis in America, by Norman Zinberg, a text that Jacques Lacan wanted to be drawn to your attention. I was only made aware of it a few days ago. No one, it appears, among those whom he asked, wanted to do this work which is a little unrewarding.

(28) It is then a not very greatly esteemed text that I am going to simply summarise for you.

But it must not be thought that in these words, I am saying that I lack interest for what I am going to try to make you understand. By informing you about what is involved in psychoanalysis in America according to Mr Norman Zinberg I see this interest at least of giving the opportunity to me who is speaking to you and also to certain of you who are listening to remind you that on all sorts of fronts battles are to be waged, battles which are just as much political as theoretical, it is in the United States of America first of all that we are confronted.

In denouncing the plague that the United States of America has brought to psychoanalysis I am only following the vigilance of which Jacques Lacan as far as I know has never ceased to affirm the imperative as regards what is elaborated starting from Freud in the United States, before whose ideological imperialism the university itself in this country all too often bends the knee.

Norman Zinberg's text takes its value from the fact that its author participates, obviously, in what he is denouncing about psychoanalysis in America. It is not some Lacanian excited by the words of the master who might come to sustain these (29) pretensions by a complicitous description geared to his own ends. This text in question testifies from two angles of the state of psychoanalysis in America:

- 1) By what it announces without prevarication about the plague that reigns there,
- 2) by the fact that it shows that the author himself, who knows that the plague is raging, is nevertheless affected by it.

By way of proof I only need this definition that he gives of the Freudian discipline as being the most comprehensive theory of general psychology because it considers the relationships of the individual with himself and with his milieu in terms of adaptation.

What is more that Mr Zinberg is not a brilliant intellectual, that in a word he is a little bit inadequate on the plane of the intellect, none of you will doubt when I read you this farcical epistemology of psychoanalysis:

“The two most important systems of thought in the first part of the twentieth century were the social Darwinism of Herbert Spencer and the economic determinism of Karl Marx. In broad lines and simplified to the extreme, Spencer’s philosophy sees human essence in terms of battle and of competition, every man for himself, natural selection excluding mutual assistance.

(30) The Marxist theory of society where each person ought to help the others and renounce his individual aspirations for the benefit of more important goals of society is incorporated in the idea that the identity of each one is diffused in the state or even in the factory.

Psychoanalysis as a philosophy finds itself half ways between these two concepts. The first of these social theories appears to be rather close to the unbridled aggressivity of primitive humanity while the second one, the Marxist, even though shining with optimism with regard to man, seems to fear a little bit too much personal aspirations.

Psychoanalysis which takes into account the conflict between the fundamental nature of man in his milieu and which, despite its pessimism with regard to the basis of nature, does not abandon hope of a solution, offers a compromise between the two.”

This is sufficient to paint Mr Zinberg. But this gives all the more value to what he himself thinks of psychoanalysis in America. To say it in a few words, it is a catastrophe. Psychoanalysis is going to die, psychoanalysis is almost dead and the analysts also.

How can it be cured? There is little, very little chance of a second chance.

(30) What Mr Zinberg himself says ending his article by the announcement of a treatment which everything that precedes it makes evident will not succeed of course, except by a radical subversion of American society.

This sentence of Mr Zinberg is: “we ought to resist the promotion of our discipline. We have perhaps a second chance.”

Of what then is psychoanalysis dying in America? Why was the first chance of psychoanalysis in America lost?

Mr Zinberg replies, borrowing from Erik Erikson one of his expressions: “It is dying from an ethical illness” What is an ethical illness? What is this illness, this ethical illness, of which psychoanalysis in America is dying.

One could simply say that it is dying of its success. But this we all know, that no sector of American life, that there is no sector of American life which is not touched by psychoanalysis.

But I will take up simply a passage of this article which bears witness to it: "The newspapers furnish a proof of the way in which the mass media have absorbed and spread psychoanalytic ideas. The great news agencies go so far as to give in the news (32) simple slips of the tongue, it being understood thus that the person that has spoken revealed a feeling the opposite of what he wished to express and, generally speaking, opposed to this. The best examples come from the political campaign of 1960, from the fact that Mr Nixon was subject to slips of the tongue. Speaking about his running mate Henry Cabot Lodge he calls him my distinguished adversary. The news analysts would no doubt be incapable of speaking about the world if they were deprived of this use constant use of ideas of ideas which come originally from psychoanalysis and which it is no longer necessary to signal as of being properly psychoanalytic, there having been completely accepted and forming part of the language."

Dr Lacan: I would like to pinpoint just now, as you have spoken about it, the fact that Erik Erikson in Young man Luther did not speak about an ethical illness affecting psychoanalysis but said the following. : "At the very moment when we were trying" - it is an imperfect - "to invent with a completely scientific determinism, a therapy for a small number, we were led to propagate an ethical illness among the masses." Namely, that Erik Erikson, let us leave to one side where we have to situate Erik Erikson, is all the same much closer to the essential Freudian milieu than Sullivan who is rather a culturist, is that not so?

(33) Erik Erikson writes then that he considers the conclusion of analysis in American society as representing an ethical illness. This means of the body social.

Mr. Miller: As it happens, you are taking me up then on a very precise point which is that this quotation therefore is simply displaced by understanding that psychoanalysis itself was not an ethical illness. But it seems to me that it is precisely about that that I was talking, this ethical illness, one cannot say that it strikes the social body, if it strikes the social body it also strikes the psychoanalyst who effectively forms part of it and this ethical illness has struck him also. Thus effectively what Erik Erikson in this quotation means is: "psychoanalysis has spread an ethical illness". Now he finds that in expanding, it cannot expand it, because it is itself affected and that, in return, this extension of the plague affects it.

Psychoanalysis does not simply serve as a daily language, it also serves as a unifying language for practices which remained in a way fragmentary. For example for the social sciences. With the appearance of the book by Laswell around 1930 the sociologists, like the psychologists, the psycho-sociologists and the anthropologists begin to interest themselves in the individual and his personality in his relationships with the milieu. They utilise psychoanalysis more and more. When the social anthropologists join up with the foregoing there begins the straddling of functions and (34) of interests on a massive scale. What is more an attempt was made to separate out the polarities of thinking, a dichotomy between theory and empiricism, to go towards what Merton called a theory of the golden mean. In other words psychoanalysis here, or the social sciences, served as a necessary agent of liaison; this is what Zinberg says.

And now for a quite different domain, for cinema for example, Mr Zinberg recognises in it the same function: “the writers and the psychoanalysts found in a simplified asceptised psychoanalysis the large human themes that they were searching for.”

Therefore just as much for social sciences as for the cinema, one sees psychoanalysis deformed in this way, serving as a unitary language to gather together fragmentary practices. But the success, the diffusion of psychoanalysis is still not the ethical illness.

What ethical illness of psychoanalysis was spread? What illness did it become? Psychoanalysis, but this we also know, has come to sustain the function of overlooking the class struggle in America. This failure to recognise the class struggle is today implied by American capitalist society. We know it, we have read the articles in Les Temps Modernes, the numerous ones who have denounced it. Here I am (35) simply going to quote the passage because it takes its whole value of still being by Mr Norman Zinberg who has the appearance, who is infested by this plague.

“People appeal to psychoanalysts and to psychoanalytic psychiatrists on the occasion of any organised effort to remedy,” what Mr Zinberg calls, “social insufficiencies”. He is asked to work in collaboration with childrens’ courts, criminal courts, prisons, houses of correction. He is called in for consultation by the agents of and educational institutions from the kindergarten up to the university. His assistance is more and more demanded by industry for the settling of questions of personnel, for the orientation of workers according to their strengths and their capacity. Sometimes people look for his help in connection with larger problems of national or international importance and he forms part today of numerous federal organisations.”

But this is still not the ethical illness of psychoanalysis. Perhaps to know what it is one has to be able to highlight this sentence: “Once it is admitted that it is appropriate to have oneself analysed, the fact of being able to offer oneself such a treatment was in itself a triumph.” What does this mean if not what Mr Zinberg himself calls what (36) regulates the relationships of money in the United States. The attachment to money and to material goods and the desire to display them and to use them with ostentation was noted by all the indigenous and foreign observers ever since Tocqueville. Only if the analysand by going to have himself analysed wants to show ostentatiously that he has the money for it, the analyst himself, Mr Zinberg tells us, what he is trying to do is to sustain his scientific standing. In other words in this relationship in this analytic relationship is it not necessary to mark that it is psychoanalysis itself which has the status of an o-object.

And this might be collected perhaps in this sentence: “Analysis in the United States is analysis for display”. Now one understands that the evil of psychoanalysis is in fact effectively its promotion, as Mr Zinberg says at the end of his article. "Stop promoting psychoanalysis, stop being ostentatious, forget about standing."

And what, for American society as a whole, is the function of this o-object which psychoanalysis has become? Here again we have to look for an apparently banal sentence, that of Mr Zinberg or one that is banal for him: "for the dynamic nouveau riche of the United States everything can be fixed". In effect to overlook the class struggle is only in fact the specification of this general suture which American society (37) gave itself as a goal to realise and which carries this name inscribed in the constitution, the pursuit of happiness. To pursue happiness, to pursue the adequation of man to his milieu, to pursue adaptation, this is perhaps utopia, it is in any case what is essentially demanded by the lure, this lure which is the function of the o-object, this lure which permits the fixing which permits fullness. It seems that it is psychoanalysis which has come to support it in America and this is what is admitted in this article.

So then you understand that the death of psychoanalysis only comes from its inversion. There is in America an inversion of psychoanalysis. If it is true that psychoanalysis is only possible when it is subject to the irreparable, if psychoanalysis is possible only if its term, if this word has a sense, that its term is the assumption of the irreparable which bears the name in Lacanian algebra of the lack of being.

How can one be surprised then at the disarray of the psychoanalyst as regards what? As regards his desire. This again is what can be read in Mr Norman Zinberg : "psychoanalysts have a sort of identity problem with respect to their work. Their principle goal is to try to ameliorate the state of health of humanity, however its conceptual signification may be worked out, should they on the contrary use a technique, a tool of research which allows there to be studied the mechanism of the (38) spirit, or should they construct, on the basis of their daily experience a broad psychological theory destined to explain at once health and illness? The question is: what does the psychoanalyst want, with this singular will which is that of desire? What is the desire of the analyst and we know for a long while that it is one and the same question as the following: what kind of science is psychoanalysis?

After a picture of psychoanalysis in America, another one is lacking, but it would not be very well furnished, the one of psychoanalysis in the socialist world. So then I will not draw this picture for you because I know nothing about it. I will limit myself to quoting a sentence of Jacques Lacan extracted from a seminar of the year 1955/56 - I do not have a more precise reference - where Jacques Lacan said: "I find the prejudice that psychoanalysis encounters in the East, justified."

Yes, no doubt, Lacan was right, better no psychoanalysis than that psychoanalysis, this plague-ridden psychoanalysis. But you, the Lacanians, the Lacanian analysts you ought to know and no doubt you know that you are the guardians of the restored truth of Freud, guardians all the more precious because you are not numerous.

Mr Norman Zinberg promises all of you that the best years of psychoanalysis are still to come. He says at the beginning of his article: "certain signs indicate that the (39) influence of psychoanalysis in America has reached its apogee and perhaps even begun to decline while in Europe and in Japan its popularity is no doubt only beginning." He explains himself in saying : "a prosperous middle class in western Europe and in Japan, a prosperous middle class that will be inevitably materialistic, breaking with traditional society begins to interest itself in psychoanalysis."

Himself at the end of his article puts you on guard. "It is difficult to be patient" - he is addressing himself to Americans - "but perhaps by our example we will perhaps be able one day to help the growing psychoanalytic institutes of Europe and of Japan to avoid our errors and to spare their countries so many bad jokes."

This task, you know that it is yours, and that Jacques Lacan has destined you for this task. You see, with the announcement by Norman Zinberg that what could be called a civilisation of officials is being prepared in imperialist countries. In other words you ought to preserve the consciousness that you are a bastion, namely, that you are under siege. But if this can reassure you, do we not all know that the theories of Americans, like their bombs, are only after all paper tigers.

Dr Lacan: The things one hears! Good, that's fine. I cannot of course put myself forward even for an instant to temper these appeals, God knows, to those precisely whom I cannot foresee what they will make of what I brought them in the course of the years which are now already long and which begin seriously to stretch back into the past.

I would like you to get to know this article, as well as the little novel I was talking about earlier, this article in Diogenes. It really has a great documentary value simply because, whatever may be the limits, in effect, that one can discern in certain of the author's remarks, it is very well informed, and manifestly he is someone who is very very very close to the most consistent analytic milieu and specifically for example very close to the executive whose last representative, Mr Maxwell Kitleson, who is now dead, is quoted in this article and precisely for the fashion in which he held the rudder of this singularly committed ship in a certain adventure.

I believe that the interest it has for you who have been willing, for different times, long or short, to follow my teaching and to trust my word, the interest is in an account (41) which is really very objective, enabling you to see how there is posed, for someone who sincerely tries to situate it, to draw up an account of it, how there is posed the question of what analysis really is. And I think that this has its interest even quite independently of one or other excesses which are denounced and which are always so much more tangible when one knows the area, a certain style.

I remember the way in which I came, more or less truly exasperated, not horrified, from people who had nothing else than the information that I had given them for their first visit over there, of what was being made of it, naturally in a current fashion, in an average, common fashion, as they say, to see all the same the following, I think that for my average listener I will limit myself to expecting from the reading of this article the fact that I am not asking that this should be granted to me as a point, a homage but to know that a certain way of posing the problems must for everyone, and specifically and specially for those here who are analysts, make the handling of their function or the fashion in which they think about it, literally, more breathable

Already if I only had this role and this function which I believe would not be negligible and that the fact of rendering possible a certain mental life which does not engage itself in a certain number of impasses or of false antinomies for example this biologism (42) opposed to a so-called culturalism, which you know precisely is one of the most debatable things in these developments - I am speaking about culturalism - in the developments of psychoanalysis in the United States, is something which is rendered completely tangible, very tangible by this article.

In what I have taught you, or that I continue to teach you, let us say that it is very necessary that I always push it a little bit further on, I mean that if, for example, I had given you something which might correspond to the work that I will end up giving you one day, if I had given it to you at the time of the Rome report, and I did not do so, very intentionally, you will see in it now many things, God knows, which, of which I cannot even say that I have to attribute them to what I have been able to propagate, even admitting that from the little circle to which I have always very specially devoted myself, waves came from elsewhere, that it is too easy to see in echoes, an echo is not always the echo of a noise that one makes, echoes come from elsewhere and in a word, if now even the offices of cultural painting with which the complexes of the bourgeoisie are seasoned since the end of the last war, these offices reverberate for some years in using in a more or less relevant fashion the term of signifier, I would not (44) go so far as to make it a merit of mine, simply that I allowed people, a milieu, which is the medical milieu which in scientific matters one cannot always say to be distinguished by the fact of being especially to the forefront, let us say that I warned it in time that there existed things elsewhere, around linguistics that they should at least take into account if they wanted to be up to date. All of this is the out of date side, as one might say, of what gives me, nevertheless, of course, no less trouble for all that.

If I maintained a milieu, let us say, in an adequate atmosphere from the point of view of what I called earlier and very intentionally the dimension of the breathable, it is of course because this is the most contingent aspect, the one which, God knows, with time will only interest people who are writing the minor history of the époque. It is sure that what is important is the skeleton, the nerve of a certain construction which for its part has slowly come to light in the measure that I believed I was able to sustain it, with qualified examples, from a determined orientation of experience, from something which is not easy to make pass into the forefront of your preoccupations, the forefront of certain forums where things are discussed quite consciously and that what I was able to detach from this usage has obviously more difficult aspects and that (45) it is not easy either to diffuse precisely one or other thing that I can only designate by the letters of an algebra.

This is the point, this is the efficacy of the work to which I convoke those who have ears to hear what I am saying, not as a pleasant music, designed to receive from near or far or elsewhere some echoes, which is something that demands a practical effort and the exercise of this practice of theory which is involved in my discourse.

Let no one be alarmed moreover about what may have been said here about elsewhere, uniquely supporting me from an American text itself, about what may have been said here about the chances, which are always so difficult to measure, the detours also that we may expect, as regards the future of what is happening in America.

For myself, who have not had up to now, God knows, the time or the leisure to go there and see on the spot how the operation is carried out even though one or other person I would say represents me there in a certain fashion and that I have had, God knows, also the surprise that one or other person that I did not expect is interested in what I write, I think for my part, that in truth everything can make itself heard in America and that from the moment that they give themselves the trouble, even the doctrine that you have the goodness, the kindness to call Lacanian may also one day (46) have some tiny effects there and that it is not condemned for all that to be subject there to the effects of a mysterious plague to which one not must not either fall into the mistake of according a too essential consistency.

It is the years to come that will give us an account of all this. You have, this year, been willing to sustain me with your zeal, with your presence and with your friendship; allow me, before wishing you a good vacation, to thank you for that.

Seminar 1: Wednesday 2 December 1964

Colourless green ideas sleep furiously furiously sleep ideas green colourless

*Songe, songe, Céphise, à cette nuit cruelle
Qui fut pour tout un peuple une nuit éternelle [Dream, dream, Cephise, of that cruel night,
Which was for a whole people an eternal night]*

Colourless green ideas sleep furiously.

If I were not in front of a French-speaking audience, I could say right away: “that’s what talking is about”. But since it happens that I must presume that despite the obvious necessity for bilingualism in our culture, there are some people here who are in no way burdened by English, I will give a word-for-word translation of it. The first word means without colour, the second word green, the third word ideas (in the plural), the fourth word means sleep (sommeil), can also mean to go to sleep (dormir), provided you put to before it, and can mean sleep (dorment) in the third person plural of the present indicative. You will see why this is the sense (sens) that we will pause at.

The nature of the indefinite article in English, which is not expressed, allows us therefore to translate up to this word-for-word: “D’incolores vertes idées dorment” - to which there is added what is very obviously an adverb because of its ending - “furieusement.”

I said: “that’s what talking is about”. Is that really talking? How can we know? It (2) is precisely in order to know that this signifying chain - I scarcely dare to say sentence - was forged.

It was forged by a linguist called Noam Chomsky. This example is quoted, introduced in a little book called Syntactic structures published by Mouton in the Hague. What is it about? About structuralism, you can take my word for it, about syntactic structure, syntax.

This would immediately deserve a more precise commentary. I am only going to indicate it.

Syntax, in a structuralist perspective, is to be situated at a precise level that we will call formalisation on the one hand, and on the other hand, as regards the syntagm - the syntagm is the signifying chain considered from the point of view of what concerns the linking of its elements - Syntactic Structures consists in formalising these linkages.

Are all the linkages between these elements equivalent? In other words, can any signifier whatsoever be immediately contiguous to any other signifier. It is obvious that the reply will tend towards the negative, at least as regards what concerns a certain usage of this signifying chain, its usage, let us say, in discourse.

This example is found at the beginning of the work in question. It introduces something which is to be distinguished from the end of this work, namely, the (3) constitution or the initiation, the outline of a reasoning about syntactic structure, it introduces a notion which must be distinguished from it, that of grammar.

He introduced his subject matter, Syntactic structures, by specifying it as having a goal: how can we establish the formalisation, the algebraic signs, let us say, in order to illustrate immediately for you what is involved, which will allow there to be produced in the English language something grammatical, and to prevent there being produced a chain which is not so.

I cannot go on here to judge what the author of this enterprise achieves. What I can indicate, is that, in the particular conditions that are offered to him by this positive tongue that the English tongue is, I mean the tongue as it is spoken, it is not a matter of extracting the logic of the English tongue, it is a matter in a way of something which could be set up, in our day at least, in an electronic machine, so that from it there could emerge only grammatically correct sentences, and, a greater ambition, all the possible forms that his tongue offers to the Englishman, I mean to the speaking subject.

This book is a very seductive one to read because it gives the idea that by pursuing this kind of work a certain rigour emerges, the imposition of a certain real in the (4) usage of the tongue, and a very ingenious, very seductive, very captivating possibility which is demonstrated to us, of managing to mould oneself according to formulae like those, for example, of the most complex connections of auxiliaries, with certain forms which are proper to English, how to generate without error the transformation from the active to the passive, connected to a certain form which is that of the present in its actuality, which in order to say lire distinguishes "I read", from "I am reading" and which generates, in a quite mechanical fashion "I have been reading", for example, by a series of transformations, not of the conjunction of these words but of their composition. There is here something very seductive, but this is not at all what I shall engage myself with.

For what interests me is the reason why this example was forged. It was forged to distinguish the grammatical from another term that the author introduces here of the order of signification. In English that is called meaning.

The author thinks that in constructing this sentence he has produced a sentence which is without meaning, on the pretext that colourless contradicts green, that ideas cannot sleep and that it appears rather problematic for one to sleep furiously.

What strikes him is that he can, on the contrary, obtain from a subject, a subject that he questions, or that he pretends to question but undoubtedly who is his (5) recourse, that this meaningless sentence is a grammatical sentence.

I take this historical example because it is in the history, in the work, on the present-day path of linguistics. I am a little embarrassed because it is not in French, but in fact this ambiguity forms part of our position, as you are going to see. For those who do not know English, I would ask you to make the effort of picturing to yourselves that the reverse order of the words furiously sleep ideas green colourless is not grammatical.

“Y restez cieux aux êtes qui Père Notre” {there remain heavens art in who Father Our} this is what this corresponds to, the reversed sentence of the rather well known sentence of Jacques Prévert: “Notre Père qui êtes aux cieux restez-y” {Our Father who art in heaven, remain there}.

It is clear that being grammatical here does not depend, at least entirely, on what may appear in these few inflected words, namely, the s of ideas which acts as a comfort for the absence of s at the end of sleep, namely a certain formal harmony recognisable by the English speaker and also the ly ending which indicates to us that it is an adverb. Because these characteristics remain in the second sentence; it is nevertheless, for an English person, of a completely different degree as regards the experience of the word, from the first. It is ungrammatical. It will not offer, we might say, any more sense than the ironic, even blasphemous prayer of Prévert (6) - but believe me, in time, it will be baptised: "What respect in this, remain there" - than this sentence once it has been reversed.

This indicates that you should underline in passing, in what I have just articulated, the word sense. We will see the use we can put it to today. We will see what I am introducing here by this means.

In fact Chomsky's undertaking is subjected, understandably, to the discussion of other linguists. It is noted, and quite rightly, that there is some abuse, or in any case that the discussion can begin around this connotation of meaningless, of sans signification.

Undoubtedly meaning is completely extinguished where there is no grammar, but where there is grammar, I mean a grammatical construction, sensed, presumed by the subject, the subject who is being questioned, who here is called on as judge, at the place, at the locus of the Other, to reintroduce the term inscribed in my presentation last year as a reference, where there is a grammatical construction, can one say, that there is no meaning? And it is easy, basing myself always on documents, to refer you to a particular article by Jakobson in the translation Nicolas Ruwet has made of it, for you to find in a particular article in the grammar part, in these articles entitled Essai de linguistique générale, on page 205, the discussion of this example.

(7) It would be easy for me to put forward all sorts of attestations in English usage, in Marvell, for example, "Green thoughts in a green shade", which he immediately translates in parenthesis or rather that the translator translates "une verte pensée dans une ombre verte", or indeed particular Russian expressions completely analogous to the supposed contradiction inscribed here in the sentence. There is no need to go any further. It is enough to remark that to say a round square, in English, another example taken by the same author, is not at all a contradiction in reality, given that a square is very often used to designate a place and that a place ronde can then very easily be called a round square.

What nevertheless are we going to engage with? You see in the equivalents, and to say the word, if I try to show that this sentence can have a meaning, I will certainly be entering on more subtle paths. It is from grammar itself that I will begin. I will observe that whether this phrase is grammatical or not is, for example, because what apparently emerges in this sentence as an adjective, namely colourless green, comes before the substantive, and that here we find ourselves, in English as in French, confronted with a certain number of effects which remain to be described. Provisionally, I continue to call them effects of sense, namely that in (8) relationship of the adjective to the substantive, the adjective, in Greek we call it epithete, usage in English, in French and in every tongue, shows us that even though this usage varies with tongues, this question of the place is important to qualify the effect of sense created by the joining of the adjective to the substantive. In French, for example, an adjective which, as I might say, is identified to the substance is placed before the substantive, une belle femme is different to une femme belle. Epicatathetic usage, one could say, that of the adjective which comes before, is to be distinguished from the epanathetic, from the one which comes after, and that the reference of the woman to beauty in the case of the epanathetic, that is from the adjective which comes after, is something distinguished, while a belle femme is already, that it is within her substance that she is found to be beautiful, and that there is still a third phase to be distinguished, the epamphitetic usage, or that of ambience, which will indicate that this woman appeared beautiful in particular circumstances, that in other words it is not the same thing to say: “furious Hermione - Hermione furious - furious, Hermione” etc, and so on.

In English, the real epamphitetic is where it is permitted to put the adjective after the noun. Epanathetic, like epicatathetic, is always placed in front, but the epicatathetic is always closer to the substantive.

(9) One says: Un / de belle apparence / et pourvu d'une belle barbe, vieil homme” (An old man of handsome appearance with a beautiful beard). It is because the vieil is closer to homme rather than the fact that he has a beautiful beard and a radiant appearance.

Henceforth we are, simply along grammatical paths, in a position to distinguish two planes and as a consequence not to have them meeting in the contradiction, green colourless. In addition some memories of Sheridan that I had noted for you, of a dialogue between Lady Teazle and her husband Sir Peter - naturally it is the notes that one takes that one never finds at the right time - sufficiently teaches us that for example, if Lady Teazle protests at the fact of being tortured about these elegant expenses, about these dépenses élégantes, this is in order to point out to us that the relationship of the adjective to the substantive in spoken usage, when it is a matter precisely of the epicatathete is perhaps not to be taken in English the way it is in French and that you cannot translate elegant expenses by depenses elegantes by strictly inverting the relationship and by saying des élégances coûteuses. Even in Tennyson I also found for you a certain glimmering strangeness which comes from the speaker, emerging from his dream, obviously must be translated by lueurs étranges and not by étrangetés lumineuses. So that here, it is perhaps indeed this (10) idea of greenness, of ideal greenness that is involved, as compared to what, colourless and more decayed, it is something like the shades of ideas which slip away there, losing their colour and in a word, bloodless. They are moving about there, not because they are sleeping, and I would have no trouble, spare me the end of this stylistic exercise, in proving to you that it is perfectly conceivable, that if we grant to sleep, dorment, something of the metaphorical, there is a sleep accompanied by some fury. Besides is it not what we experience every day and in a word, if indeed you excuse me from this vain tail-end of discourse, I leave you with the task of fabricating it. I cannot find, in questioning things in the sense of the link of grammar to meaning, I cannot find in this sentence the evocation properly speaking of the unconscious where it is.

What is the unconscious, if not precisely ideas, thoughts, Gedanken, thoughts whose faded greenness, does not Freud tell us somewhere, that like the shades summoned from hell and returning to the sunlight, want to drink blood, to recover their colours. Is it the thoughts of the unconscious that are involved, that here sleep furiously?

Well, all of that would have been a very pretty exercise but I did not pursue it, I (11) would not say to the end, because I am cutting it short only to suggest that it is quite simply completely idiotic.

The unconscious has nothing to do with these metaphorical meanings, however far we may push them. And to search for meaning in a signifying, grammatical chain is an undertaking of extraordinary futility.

For if, because of the fact that I am before this audience, I was able to give it that meaning, I could just as well have given it a completely different one, and for a simple reason, which is that any signifying chain whatsoever, provided it is grammatical, always generates a meaning, and I would go further, any one whatsoever.

Because I commit myself, in varying, and one can vary to infinity, the surrounding conditions, the situation, but what is more, the situations of dialogue, I can make this sentence mean whatever I want, including for example in a particular case that I am mocking you.

Pay attention! Does there not intervene here at this extreme point something other than a meaning? That I am able, in a particular context, to make any meaning emerge from it, is one thing, but is it really meaning that is involved. Because why did I say that nothing guaranteed the meaning I gave earlier? It is in the very measure that I had given it one with respect to what? With respect to an object, a (12) referent, something that I have brought out there for the needs of the case, namely the unconscious.

In speaking about context, in speaking about dialogue, I allow to disappear, to vanish, to vacillate what is involved, namely, the function of sense. What it is a question here of circumscribing more closely is the distinction between the two. In the final analysis, how does it come about that its very author who chose this sentence, drew comfort so easily from something that is so doubtful, namely that it does not make sense.

How could a linguist, who does not need to take the extreme examples, the round square, which I spoke to you about earlier, to grasp that the things that are most easily accepted, allow there to be completely avoided, the remark of a certain contradiction. Does one not say with common assent, une jeune morte, (a dead young person). Which could be a correct way of saying that she died young (elle est morte jeune) but to describe her as a jeune morte with what the adjective placed before means, the adjective in French, must leave us curiously perplexed! Is it as dead that she is young?

I asked myself what gave this sentence its distinctive character. We cannot believe in such naivety on the part of the person who produced it as a paradigm. And why did he take such an obviously forged paradigm? And nevertheless while I was (13) asking myself what effectively gave this sentence its paradigmatic value I had myself taught how to pronounce it properly. My English phonetics are not especially exemplary, and this exercise had a use for me which was not to torture the ears of those for whom these phonetics are familiar. And in this exercise I noticed something, that between each word, I had to take a little breath.

Colourless, green, ideas, sleep, furiously. Why did I have to take a breath? Have you noticed that this becomes grgr, ideas, sleep, one s linking up with another s and after that fffuriously.

So then I began to interest myself in the consonants. There is one thing that can be said in any case, it is that this text is struck by “amusie”, however you understand it, music or the muses, as Queneau says “avec les arts on s’amuse: on muse avec les lézards” (with the arts one amuses oneself: one muses with the lizards). In noticing, in counting these consonants, the two l’s and the c of colourless, the g of green, the n, a third l, a fourth l, there came to my mind those verses which I hope you adore as much as I do, the ones written at the bottom of the blackboard and which make use very precisely of the consonantal battery of the made-up sentence :

*Songe, songe, Céphise, à cette nuit cruelle
Qui fut pour tout un peuple une nuit éternelle (Dream, dream, Céphise, of that cruel night
Which was for a whole people an eternal night.)*

(14) I can easily do the opposite of the work I did earlier to show you that it is no less strange to speak about a cruel night, than of a round square. That an eternal night is undoubtedly a contradiction in terms, but on the contrary that the moving value of these two lines, is essentially in the repercussion first of all of these four sibilant s’s which are underlined on the blackboard, of the repercussion of Céphise in fut on the second line, in the repercussion of the t four times, of the n of nuit twice, of the primitive labile f promised by its attenuated form fut and of Céphise, in this pour tout un peuple which harmonises, which makes vibrate in a certain fashion something which undoubtedly in these two lines, is the whole sense, the poetic sense, and this is of a nature to force us, to draw us intimately closer to the function of the signifier.

If undoubtedly the two verses in question do not claim in any degree to give the meaning of the formula of the linguist, they force us to question ourselves, whether we are not in this way much closer to what constitutes its sense, to what was for its author above all the true point at which he felt assured of its non-sense. For at a certain level, the requirements of sense are perhaps different to what appears to us at first, namely that at this level of sense, music is a radical objection.

(15) Here is how I decided to introduce, this year, as a way of giving you the tone of it, what I am calling Crucial problems for psychoanalysis.

I spoke last year about the foundations of psychoanalysis. I spoke about the concepts which seemed to me to be essential to structure its experience, and you could see, that at none of these levels, were they true concepts, that I could not make them hold up, except in the measure that I made them rigorous with respect to no referent. That always in some way the subject who carries these concepts is implicated in his very discourse, that I cannot speak about the opening and the closing of the unconscious, without being implicated in my very discourse by this opening and this closing, that I cannot speak about the encounter, as constituting by its very lack the principal of repetition, without rendering ungraspable the very point where this repetition is qualified.

Dante, after some people but before still more, introduced in De vulgari eloquentia, which we will have to speak about this year, the most profound question of linguistics. He says that every science, and for him it is science that is involved, must be able to declare what must be translated as its object, and we all agree except that object, to have its value, in the Latin Dante uses is called here subjectum.

(16) In analysis it is in effect the subject that is involved. Here no displacement is possible to permit him to make an object of it.

That it is the same in linguistics no more escapes any linguist than it escaped Dante and his reader, but the linguist can try to resolve the problem differently from us analysts.

It is precisely for that reason that linguistics is engaged ever further along the path highlighted earlier by the work of our author, along the path of formalisation. It is because, along the path of formalisation, what we are trying to exclude is the subject. Only we analysts should have an exactly contrary aim because this is the pivot of our praxis.

Only you know that on this point I do not retreat before the difficulty, since in short, I posit, I did it last year and in a sufficiently articulated way, that the subject can only be in the final analysis nothing other than that which thinks: Therefore I am. Which means that the supporting point, the navel, as Freud would say of this term subject is properly only the moment at which it vanishes beneath sense, where sense is what makes it disappear as being, for this Therefore I am is only a sense. Is it not there that the discussion on being can find its support?

(17) The relationship of sense to the signifier is what I have always believed to be essential to maintain at the heart of our experience so that our whole discourse does not become debased.

At the centre of this effort of mine, oriented towards a praxis, I placed the notion of signifier. How does it happen, that again quite recently, at one of the meetings of my pupils, I was able to hear one of them, I do not remember who, saying, and after all I know he was not the only one to say it, that the notion of signifier, for Lacan, still left him with some uncertainty in his mind.

If that is how things are, while after all an article like The agency of the letter in the unconscious, which I ask you to re-read, it is a fact that my texts become clearer as the years pass.

There are murmurs, people are asking themselves why? I am saying that it is a fact to which more than one if not all testify, this text is admirably clear and the man-woman example that I evoke, as evoking by its signifying coupling the meaning of a urinal, not by the opposition between the sexes, but as inserting itself, because of the masking of this sense, for two small children who come into a station in a train, a henceforth irremedial division about the spot that they have just passed, one (18) holding that he has passed by man, and the other holding that she has passed by woman. This seems to me all the same a story that is designed to open peoples' ears.

Moreover formulations that are less like apologues, which are that the sign, however it is composed and includes in itself the signifier/signified division, the sign is what represents something for someone, namely at the level of the sign we are at the level of anything at all, of the psychological, of knowledge, that you can refine. There is the authentic sign, the smoke which indicates the fire, that there is the index, and that to see the trace left by the hoof of the gazelle on the sand or on the rock, and that the signifier is something different, and that the fact that the signifier represents the subject for another signifier, a sufficiently firm formulation, that is simply forcing you to locate yourself in it, has certain consequences.

Why then does this discourse on the signifier retain some obscurity? Is it because for a certain time I, for example, wanted it? Yes. And who then is this I?

It is perhaps internal to this knot of language which is produced when language has to give an account of its own essence. Perhaps it is necessary that at this conjunction there is necessarily produced some loss. It is exactly connected to (19) this question of the loss, the loss that is produced every time that language tries to give an account of itself in a discourse, that there is situated the point from which I wish to begin to mark the sense of what I call the relationship of the signifier to the subject.

I describe as philosophical everything that tends to mask the radical character and the originating function of this loss. Every dialectic, and specifically the Hegelian one, which tends to mask, which in any case points towards a recuperation of the effects of this loss is a philosophy.

There are other ways than the pretention of dealing with this loss. There is for example looking elsewhere and specifically turning one's gaze towards meaning, and to make of the subject, this entity that is called the human spirit, to put it before discourse.

It is an old error whose final incarnation is called developmental psychology, or if you wish to illustrate it, Piagetism. It is a matter of knowing whether we can approach a critique of it on its own terrain. An example of the contribution that I hope to make this year to something for psychoanalysis, which shows that the discourse that we are pursuing for it necessitates choices, and specifically the (20) exclusion of a certain number of positions, positions concerning the real. That these positions are false, and that it is not without reason that they are false, that the position we take up is perhaps the only one which allows there to be grounded, at its most radical foundation, the notion of ideology.

I will not allow you to leave today - even though it may be a superfluous talisman - without a formula that can be written on the blackboard because after all I put myself into it, which is the following, that it is true that the relation of the signifier is essentially to the signifier, that the signifier as such, in so far as it is distinguished from the sign, only signifies for another signifier and never signifies anything other than the subject. There must be superabundant proofs of this.

On the very plane of the criticism of Piaget, that I think I will approach the next time, and specifically the function of ego-centric language, I think I will be able to give you at that time proofs as a kind of graph, of simplified graph, indicating the path that we are going to travel and the formula of S/s, signifier over signified, is and always has been in an unambiguous fashion to be interpreted as follows, that there is an order of reference of the signifier which is to, what I called last year, another signifier. This is what defines it essentially.

What then is the signified? The signified is not at all to be conceived of only in relation to the subject.

(21) The relation of the signifier to the subject, in so far as it involves the function of meaning, passes through a referent. The referent, that means the real, and the real is not simply a raw and opaque mass. The real is apparently structured. We have moreover absolutely no knowledge of how as long as we do not have the signifier. I do not mean for all that, that if we do not know it, we have no relations to this structure. At different levels of animality these structures are called tendency, need and even necessarily what is called rightly or wrongly, but in fact in animal psychology, intelligence, one has to pass through this structure.

Intelligence, I do not know why a mistake has been made about this, intelligence is indeed for me, as for everybody else, non-verbal. What I will try to show you the next time, to criticise Piaget, is that it is absolutely indispensable in order not to make the error of thinking that the evolution of the child consists, in accordance with a pre-determined will of the Eternal, from all time, of rendering him more and more able to dialogue with Mr Piaget. This poses the question, even if it does not resolve it, of how intelligence as pre-verbal comes to link itself with language as pre-intellectual. For the moment, I note that in order to conceive anything (22) whatsoever about meaning, you must first take, which does not exhaust anything, and does not force a scaffolding on us, and to preserve the same thing indefinitely, notice that there are two usages of the signifier with respect to the referent, the usage of denotation, comparable to a correspondence which claims to be bi-univocal, let us say a brand, an iron brand on the referent, and a connotation, namely, how it is on this - you will see it the next time - there is going to turn our example of the criticism of Piaget, how a signifier can serve to introduce into the relationship to the referent, something which has a name, which is called the concept. And that is a relationship of connotation.

It is then through the mediation of the relationship of the signifier to the referent that we see the signifier emerge. There are no valid instances of meaning which do not make a circuit, a detour, by way of some referent.

The bar, therefore, is not as has been said, in commenting on me, the simple existence, fallen from heaven in a way, of the obstacle, here entified. It is first of all a question mark about the return circuit. But it is not simply that. It is this other effect of the signifier by means of which the signifier only represents the subject, and a little earlier I wanted to incarnate the subject in what I called sense, where he vanishes as subject.

(23) Well that's it. At the level of the bar an effect of sense is produced, and what I started from today in my example, is there to show you how much the effect of the signified can be bent to every sense, if we do not have the referent at the beginning, but that the effect of sense is something different.

It is so different that the face it presents on the side of the signified, is properly what is not "unmeaning", non-signifiant, but "meaningless", that it is properly speaking, what is translated, because we are in English, by the expression "non-sense", and that it is not possible to properly punctuate what is involved in our analytic experience, except by seeing that what is explored is not the ocean, the infinite sea of meanings, it is what happens in the very measure that it reveals to us this barrier of "non-sense". Which does not mean without meaning, which is the face of refusal that sense presents on the side of the signifier. That is why, when we have passed through this survey of psychological experimentation, we will try to show the degree to which it lacks the facts, by overlooking the true relationship of language to intelligence, we will throw light on it from a different angle, which is that while starting from an experience which no doubt is also, just as much as psychology, different to that of psychoanalysis, a literary experience specifically, by (24) trying to give its proper status, for it is not we who have invented it, it exists, to what is called non-sense, by questioning Alice In Wonderland or some good author of this register, we will see how this enables us to illuminate the status of the signifier.

Seminar 2: Wednesday 9 December 1964

I want to thank my listeners for showing themselves to be so attentive as I take up these lectures again. I saw the last time how numerous they were .

I begin there because, in truth, for me this is a part of a problem that I am going to try, I will not simply say to pose today, with regard to which I would like to define something which could be described as: how are we going to work this year?

I say "are we going to", since I do not imagine that my discourse is deployed in a professorial abstraction, where after all it does not matter who profits from it, for better or for worse, or in what way.

I learned from echoes, which precisely because of the specificity of my position always reach me without delay, that the last time I was didactic: indeed that on this point I was considered to have made progress.

It is certainly not the case, however, it seems to me, that I spared you, as I might say, because to introduce the problem which is going to occupy us from the beginning this year, that of the relationship of the subject to language, as I did it by (2) this non-sense, and to remain with it, to sustain a commentary, a question about it long enough to make you travel along paths, through defiles that I was subsequently able to cancel with a turn of the hand, let us be clear, as regards the results and not as regards the value of the test, in order, at the end, to make you admit and, I would almost say, from my point of view, to get across the "Hey presto!" of a distinct relationship, the one to sense supported, as I showed, by the two sentences which were still there on the blackboard a little earlier, I can only congratulate myself that something of such a discourse reached its goal.

If it is true that there is the gap, whose formulation I began the last time, between something we do not grasp at the very level where the signifier functions as such and as I define it - the signifier is that which represents the subject for another signifier - if it is true that this representation of the subject, that the way in which the signifier is his representative is what is made present in the effect of sense, that there is between that and everything that is constructed as meaning, this sort of neutral field, of gap, of danger point, what has been encountered is not at all articulated in a necessary fashion, namely, what returns as meaning from a certain (3) relationship, I articulated it the last time, which remains to be defined, of the signifier to the referent, to this something articulated or not in the real, on which it is by managing, let us say, to rebound off, to say no more at this time, that the signifier generated the system of meanings.

There is here no doubt, for those you have followed my past discourse, a new emphasis on something whose place you can no doubt find in my preceding schemata, and even see in it that what was involved in the effect of the signified, where I had to lead you to indicate its place, at the moment when last year I was giving the schema of alienation, that this referent existed but at a different place, that this referent was desire in so far as it may have to be situated in the formation, in the establishment of the subject somewhere, hollowing out there, in the interval between the two signifiers essentially evoked in the definition of the signifier itself, that here, not the subject, collapsing into this formulation of what one can call the primordial cell of its constitution, but already in a first metaphor this signified, because of the very position of the subject on the way to collapse, had to be relayed by the function of desire.

An illuminating formula, no doubt, to designate all sorts of developmental effects in our analytic experience, but a relatively obscure formula if we have to map out (4) what is involved, when all is said and done, essentially, in the validity of this formula, and, in a word, about the relationship of development taken in its widest sense, of the relationship of the position of the subject taken in its most radical sense, to the function of language.

If these formulae, produced in a fashion that is more aphoristic than dogmatic, given as a supporting point, starting from which there can be judged, or at least sequenced, the range of different formulations which are given of it at every level at which this questioning tries, attempts, to pursue in a contemporary fashion whether it is the linguist, the psycholinguist, the psychologist, the strategist, the games' theorist, etc.

The terms that I am putting forward, and in the first place that of the signifier representing the subject for another signifier, has in itself something exclusive about it, which recalls what another path attempted to trace out, as regards the status to be given at one or other conceived level of the signifier, something which more or less cancels, crosses a certain gap, is undoubtedly risky, and before letting oneself be taken in by it, one should perhaps look at it more than once. Again there is here, I would say, a quasi-imperative position which, of course, can only be sustained by attempting a reference, which not only finds its recourse in an (5) adequate development of theories and of facts, but which also finds its foundation in some more radical structure and, moreover, all of those who for some years have been able to follow what I have developed before them, know that three years ago in a seminar on identification, it is not unrelated to what I am bringing you now, I was led to the necessity of a certain topology which appeared to me to impose itself, to arise from that very experience which is the most particular, sometimes, often, always perhaps, the most confused, the one that we have to deal with in analysis, namely identification.

Undoubtedly this topology is essential to the structure of language. In speaking about structure one cannot but evoke it. The first remark, I would even say the primary one, that however much we ought to conceive of discourse as unfolding over time, if there is something that structural analysis, as it has been operated in linguistics, is designed to reveal to us, it is that this linear structure is not at all sufficient to account for the chain of concrete discourse, of the signifying chain, that we can only order it, harmonise it in the shape of what is called in musical notation a stave, that this is the least that we have to say and that henceforth, the

(6) question of how we are to conceive the function of this second dimension, and whether this is something which obliges us to take surface into consideration and in what form? The one formulated up to this in the intuition of space as, for example, it can be inscribed in an exemplary fashion in transcendental aesthetics, or whether it is something different, whether it is this surface as it is theorised precisely at the level of what are called in mathematical theory, surfaces, taken strictly from the angle of topology, whether this is sufficient for us, in short if this stave, this stave upon which every unit, every significance or sentence should be inscribed - undoubtedly at its cuts - how, at the two extremities of the sequence of these measures, how does this cut come to circumscribe, striate, section the stave. Let us say that there is here, in this regard, more than one way of questioning oneself, that there are horses for courses.

It is undoubtedly not too soon, faced with this structure, to pose again the question whether indeed effectively, as has seemed self-evident up to the present in a certain natural schema, time is to be reduced to a single dimension.

But let us leave that for the moment. And to stay with this curious uncertainty at about what this surface might be, you see that I require as always indispensable for all our ordinates, the two dimensions of the blackboard. Again it is visible that (7) each line does not at all have a function that is homogenous to the others. And simply to approach it, to shake the intuitive character of this function of space in so far as it interests us, I would go as far here as to point out to you that in this first approach that I evoked from previous years, a certain topology that is very structuring as regards what happens to the subject in our experience, I recall that what I was led to make use of is something which does not at all form part of a space which seems to be so integrated into all our experience, and of which one could well say, that alongside this other it deserves in fact the name of familiar, but also particular space: that there is a space, let us say, less or even unimaginable, in any case with which it is important to familiarise oneself, for the paradox that one easily encounters in it, for the lack of predictability involved when you are introduced to it for the first time.

Forgive me for bringing here, in the form of a kind of toy, something whose shape we will perhaps rediscover subsequently - believe me, I have thought about it. These topological elements, to speak of those that I emphasised, the hole, the torus, the cross-cap, respectively, are really separated by a sort of distinctive world from what we could call the shapes that are called Gestaltist, which, it must be (8) said, have dominated the development of part of a whole geometry, but also of a whole significance - I do not need to refer you to well-known and very meritorious researches, let us cite here simply in passing the Metamorphoses du cercle by Georges Poulet, but there are many others to remind us that throughout the centuries, the significance of the sphere, with all the exclusiveness that it involves, is what dominated a whole way of thinking, perhaps a whole art of thinking, and it is not at all simply by seeing it culminate in one or other great poem, Dante's poem for example, that we can plumb or measure the importance of the sphere, and even what we can link to it as being, as I might say, "belonging to its world", the cone implying everything that had been ratified in geometry as a conic section, this is a world from which there differs the one introduced by the references to which I alluded earlier.

I am going to show you an example of it, questioning you naturally, I will not take any of the topological structures that I enumerated earlier, because they are, in a way, too complicated for our object for the moment, the little shock that I am trying to obtain, and on the other hand, the most familiar shape, the one that everyone ends up hearing pass on his auditory horizon, that of the Moebius strip, (9) do I need to remind you what it is. You see apparently, you will see later what that means, do not bother about the multiplicity of thicknesses, but simply about the shape which ensures that something which might be, if you wish, at the beginning, like a segment of a cylinder, because of the fact that, at the same time, one can go round it on the inner wall, I am expressing myself in terms expressly referred to the material, the object, the inversion that is produced, culminates in the existence of a surface whose most remarkable point is that it has only one face, namely, that wherever one begins from, one can end up along the remaining path, on the face from which one set out, at whatever point it may be of what might make you believe to be one face and the other. There is only one of them. It is also true that there is only one edge.

This of course presumes the putting forward of all sorts of definitions, the definition of an edge, for example, which is essential and which can, for us, be of the greatest use.

What I want to point out to you, and this at first will only be, I would say, for extreme novices to consider, this same object, are you able, I would say, to foresee, if you do not know already, what happens, when this surface is constituted, what happens, if one cuts it, remaining always very exactly at an equal distance from its edges, that is to say that if one cuts it in two, longitudinally?

(10) All of those, of course, who have already opened a few books on the subject know what is involved. This gives the following result: namely, not a divided surface, but a continuous strip, which has moreover the property of being able to reproduce exactly the shape of the first surface, in overlapping itself. It is, in short, a surface that one cannot divide, at least with the first cut of the scissors. Another thing, which is more interesting and which you will not, I believe, because I have never found it there, find in the books. It is the following problem: when the surface has been constituted, can it be duplicated, overlapped by another which is applied exactly onto its shape?

It is very easy to see, to carry out the experiment, that in duplicating, with a surface exactly equal to the first, the one that we are going to apply onto it, we will reach the result that the ending of the second strip that we have introduced into the operation, this ending will stop because it has, at the other ending of the same strip, since we have said by definition that these surfaces are equal, but that these two endings will be separated by the first strip, in other words, that they cannot connect up, except by crossing the first surface.

This is not obvious and is discovered by experimentation. It is closely linked, (11) moreover, with the better known first result that I evoked for you. You must admit that this necessary crossing of the surface by the surface which duplicates it, is something which can appear very useful to us for signifying the relationship of the signifier to the subject. I mean: the first fact, always to be recalled, that in no case can the signifier signify itself, except by reduplicating itself, a point that is very frequently if not always forgotten, and of course forgotten with a lot of disadvantages. It will be all the more necessary to remember it here.

On the other hand, it is perhaps linked to this topological property that we must seek, the something unexpected, fruitful, as I might say, in experience that we can recognise as being at every point comparable to an effect of sense.

I am pushing this business still further, and perhaps you will later see its much more tangible implications; undoubtedly, if we continued the covering of our first surface, the Moebius strip, by a surface which is this time, not equivalent to its length but doubles it, we will manage in effect, in so far as these words have a sense, to envelop it inside and outside. This is what is effectively realised here. You should understand that in the middle there is a Moebius surface, and all around a surface of the type of the reduplicated surface, when a little earlier I cut it with (12) a scissors in the middle, which overlaps it, I repeat, if these words have a sense: inside and outside. In that case you see that these two surfaces are knotted.

In other words, and this in a fashion which is just as necessary, as unexpected for simple intuition, which is there to give us the idea that the signifying chain, since quite often metaphors reach a goal only as a preliminary, they only try to target things in an approximate fashion, that the signifying chain has perhaps a much fuller meaning, in the sense that it implies a link, and another link, which interlock, that we presuppose this at first.

I feel perhaps something like a hesitation before the rather distant character of what I have brought here with respect to our problems.

Nevertheless, the division of the field that this structure can contribute: if we compare the Moebius surface to the surface which completes it in the cross-cap, and which is a plane provided with special properties, it is not simply skewed, it is something, of which one can moreover only say the following, which is that it involves, it involves its eventual connection by a Moebius surface.

Imagine the internal eight, as I called it, where again it is a matter of filling it with an imaginary surface, imagine this simply as a circle, to imagine it for yourselves, (13) simply imagine first of all this heart-shape, and that this part here on the right, has little by little encroached, as you finally see it doing, on the left. It is clear that the edges are continuous, that the homology, the parallelism, if you wish, into which these edges enter with respect to their opposite, this is what will allow you to lodge more easily in it, a surface like the Moebius strip, following the surface that you generate, following thus the space between the opposite edges, you will effectively have this sort of turning back of this surface, which was what I pointed out to you earlier, towards the very definition of the strip.

But here, what happens if we complete this surface by the other one? The fact is that the Moebius strip necessarily cuts the aforesaid portion at another point, therefore in a line whose localisation does not matter but which, for intuition, reveals itself here as the most obvious one.

What does that mean? It means that if we set ourselves, eventually, to make such a cut function in that way, but instead of what the logic of classes taken in extension uses, of what are called the Euler circles, we can highlight certain essential relationships. My discourse does not allow me to push them to the end here, but you should know as regards a syllogism, for example, as problematic as the following:

(14)

All men are mortal
Socrates is a man
Therefore Socrates is mortal

A syllogism as regards which I hope there are here a certain number of ears, if they are willing to admit to the debate something other than meaning, what I called the other day sense, that this syllogism has something which retains us, and that moreover philosophy did not put it forward immediately, or in a pure context; it is nowhere to be found in the Analytics of Aristotle who, I imagine, was careful to avoid it. Not at all certainly, that it would be simply the feeling of reverence or of respect that would have prevented him from putting into play with the rest of men the one from whom there emerged a whole body of thought; but that he did not know that the term Socrates, in this context, can be introduced without care.

And thus we are carried - here I am anticipating - into the very heart of a question of the same order precisely as the one that interests us. It is strange that at a time when linguistics is flourishing, the discussion about what is the proper name, is entirely suspended. I mean that if it appears correct, and you know I think that a certain number, all sorts of remarkable works, all sorts of outstanding viewpoints on the function of the proper name with respect to what seems to be self-evident, (15) the first function of the signifier, denomination, undoubtedly, in order simply to introduce what I mean, the thing that is striking, is that on introducing oneself into one of the different, very categorised developments which have emerged on this theme, what I might call a genuinely fascinating value on all who notice it, it appears with a very great regularity in reading each author that everything that the others say is complete absurdity.

Here is something that is well designed to retain us and, I would say, to introduce this little corner, this little angle into the question of the proper name, something which would begin by this quite simple thing: Socrates - and I really believe that in the end there is no way of avoiding this first apprehension, this first principle - Socrates is the name of the one who is called Socrates. Which does not all mean the same thing, because there is the chap himself, Socrates with his pals, there is Socrates as a designator, I am speaking here about the function of the proper name, it is impossible to integrate it, without asking the question of what is announced at the level of the proper name.

That the proper name has a designatory function, yourself as had been said, which is not true of the individual as such, for by taking this path you will see that we arrive at absurdities, the fact that it has this use does absolutely not exhaust the (15) question of what is announced in the proper name. You will tell me, well say it, but precisely in fact this requires some detour.

But undoubtedly the objection that we have to make to the “Socrates is mortal” of the conclusion is indeed here. Because what is announced in Socrates is undoubtedly in an altogether privileged relationship to death, because if there is something of which we are sure about this man of whom we know nothing, it is that he asked for death, and in these terms: “Take me Socrates as I am, atopic, or else kill me”. This, assured, univocal, and without ambiguity.

And I think that only the use of our little Euler circle - not Eulerian but corrected - allows us by writing right around the circumference in a devouring parallelism

All men, are mortal

Socrates
is mortal

consider that the junction of these formulae, major and conclusion is what is going to allow us to divide up two fields of sense: undoubtedly a field of meaning where it appears quite natural that Socrates is there in parallel to “all men” and is inserted there; a field of sense also which intersects the first and through which the question is posed for us whether we ought to give to “is a man”, which does not (17) come within it, and much more for us than for anyone else in a problematic fashion, the sense of being in the prolongation of this intersection of sense and meaning, namely, whether to be a man requires death, yes or no, namely to see entering, by that means, this simple problem of logic, and by not bringing into play anything but considerations of signifiers, the bringing into play of what Freud introduced as death drive.

I will come back to this example. I spoke earlier about Dante and his topology that is finally illustrated in his great poem. I asked myself the question. I think that if Dante came back, he would have found himself, at least in past years, at ease in my seminar.

I mean, that it is not because for him everything about substance and being pivots around what is called the point, what is at the same time the point of expansion and of vanishing of this sphere, that he would not have found the greatest interest in the way in which we questioned language, because, before his Divine Comedy, he had written De vulgari eloquentia, he had also written Vita Nuova, he had written Vita Nuova about the problem of desire, and in truth the Divine Comedy cannot be understood without this preamble. But undoubtedly in De vulgari eloquentia, he (18) manifests no doubt, with impasses no doubt, with exemplary points of arrival where we know that it is not at all the way to go, it is for that reason that we are trying to reform the topology of questions, he showed the most lively sense of the primary and primitive character of language, of maternal language, he says, in opposing it to everything that in his time was the attachment, the obstinate recourse to a learned language, and in a word the preemption of language by logic.

All the problems of the junction between language and what is called thought, and God knows with what an "accent", when it involves one or other of these in the child, following Mr Piaget for example, everything depends on the false path, in the going astray of research that is otherwise illuminating as regards the meritorious facts, as regards thoughtful groupings, in the accumulation, all of this going astray depends on the miscognition of the order which exists between language and logic.

Everyone knows, everyone reproaches the first logics which emerged, and specifically Aristotle's, with being too grammatical, with suffering too much from the stamp of grammar. Oh how true it is! Is it not precisely this that indicates it to us: that it is from this that they begin. I am speaking even of the most refined forms, the most purified ones that we have managed to give to logic, I am speaking about logics that are called symbolic, mathematical logic, and everything that is (19) most refined in what we have contributed in the order of axiomatising, of logistics, the question for us is not at all to set up this order of thinking, this pure and more and more circumscribed game that, not without the intervention of our progress in the sciences, we are succeeding in perfecting, it is not to substitute it for language, I mean to believe that language is, in a way, the instrument that is involved, because everything proves and in the forefront, precisely, our analytic experience, that the order of language and of grammatical language, for recourse to the maternal tongue, to the first tongue, the one that the suckling and the common man speaks spontaneously, is not an objection for Dante, contrary to the grammarians of his time, to see the exactly correlative importance of the lingua grammatica, it is that grammar which matters to him and it is here that he is sure of finding the pure tongue.

It is the whole space, the whole difference there is between Piaget's mode of approach and that for example of someone like Vygotsky - I hope that this name does not sound strange to all my listeners - he was a psychologist, an experimentalist, who lived immediately after the revolution of 1917 in Russia, and who pursued his work up to the time he died, prematurely, alas, in 1934.

(20) This book should be read, or indeed - since I pose the question: "How are we going to work?" - someone, and I will say later under what conditions, must take responsibility for this work or some other one, in order, as I might say, to illuminate it in the light of the major lines of reference whose status we are trying to establish here, in order to see in it, on the one hand what it contributes, as I might say, to this water, to this mill, and also the way in which it only responds in a more or less naive fashion to it, it is obviously in a case like this the only way to proceed, for if this book, and the method that Vygotsky introduces, are distinguished by a very severe separation, besides so obvious in the facts that one is astonished that in the last article which has appeared by Mr Piaget, one that has appeared in a collection on psycho-linguistics, he maintains unyieldingly, and he could have replied in a little pamphlet that was added to the book quite explicitly in the evolution of his thinking, having regard to the function of language, that he more than ever holds that language no doubt helps the development in the child of concepts which, he thinks that, I am not saying subsequent concepts but the concepts in the child as he encounters a limit in grasping them, (21) that these concepts which are always closely linked to a reference to action, that language is only there as a help, as an instrument, but secondary, and all he wants to highlight in questioning the child is inappropriate usage.

Now, all experience shows, on the contrary, that if anything is striking in the language of the child who is beginning to speak, it is not its inappropriateness, it is the anticipation, it is the paradoxical precession of certain elements of the language, which ought to appear later, as I might say, the concrete elements of insertion, as they say, are sufficiently, it is the precession of particles, of little formulae, of "perhaps not", of "but still", which arise very precociously in the child's language, showing even that provided one looks at it with a bit of freshness, of naivety from a certain point of view, which would allow it to be said, and after all, if necessary I will bring in documents, that grammatical structure is absolutely correlative to all the first appearances of language.

What does that mean, if not that what is important, is not at all to see that what is happening in the mind is undoubtedly something which, with time, is realised because he becomes the adult that we believe we are, it is that if at a certain stage, (22) at certain levels, there are to be highlighted in his adequation to the concept, and there we will be struck that someone like Vygotsky, I am saying it simply in passing, without making any more of it, has precisely posed his interrogation in terms that I am going to tell you, namely, completely different ones to those of Piaget, perceives that even a rigorous handling of concepts, he denotes it by certain signs, can be in a way fallacious, and that the real handling of a concept is acquired, he says, singularly and unfortunately without drawing the consequences of this, only at puberty.

But let us leave that. The important thing would be to study as Vygotsky did, and which is moreover for him the source of an extremely rich apperception, even though it has not been exploited since then in the same circle, what the child does spontaneously with what, with words, without which undoubtedly every one agrees there is no concept. What then does he do with these words, with these words that, as they say, he uses badly, badly compared to what, compared to the concept of the adult who questions him, but which serve him all the same for a very precise usage, a usage of the signifier. What does he make of them, what corresponds in him to the dependency on the word, on the signifier, at the same level where there is going to be introduced, retroactively, through his participation (23) in the culture that we call adult, let us say by the retroactivity of concepts that we will call scientific, if it is a fact that it is these in the end which win out, what does he do with the words which resemble a concept?

I am not here today to give you a summary of Vygotsky, since I hope someone else is going to look after it. What I want to say to you, is the following: it is that we see reappearing the door, in all its freshness, of what Darwin with his genius discovered one day, and which is well known: the case of the child who begins, right at the beginning of his language, to call something, let us say, in French that would be coin coin (quack, quack): in phonetic form, we are talking about an American child, in phonetic form it is quack, that this quack which is the signifier which isolates it, I would say, taken at its original source, because it is the cry of the duck, the duck that he begins by calling quack, he is going to transfer from the duck to the water in which it splashes about, from the water to everything which splashes about in it, this without prejudice to the preservation of the flying form, because this quack also designates all birds, and it ends up by designating what? I will give you a thousand guesses: a monetary unit which is marked with the sign of the eagle, with which it was at that time stamped, I do not know whether it still is, in the United States.

(24) One can say that in many matters, the first observation, the one that strikes, the one that makes its way in the literature, and is sometimes charged with a kind of blessing, it is two extremes of the signifier, which are the cry by which this living being, the duck, makes himself heard and which begins to function as what? Who knows? Is it a concept? Is it his name? Most probably his name because there is a way of questioning the function of denomination which is to take the signifier as something which either sticks onto, or is detached from the individual that it is made to designate, and which culminates at this other thing, which believe me I do not believe is chance or the lucky find of an individual, that it is not for nothing that it involves some participation, very probably no one who the conscience of the child, that it should be to a coin that this finally attaches itself, I see no psychological confirmation in this, let us say that I see in it, as I might say, the augury of what always guides discovery when it does not allow itself to be hindered on its path by prejudice. Here, Darwin, by simply collecting this example from the mouth of a little child, shows us the two terms, the two extreme terms around which there are situated, there are knotted and are inserted, one as problematic as the other, the cry on the one hand and on the other something (25) which perhaps you would be astonished to hear me telling you, that we will have to question in connection with language: the function of money.

A forgotten term in the works of linguists, but as regards which it is clear that before them and among those who have studied money in their text, one sees emerging as they write, in a way necessarily, the reference to language. Language, the signifier as guarantee of something which goes infinitely far beyond the problem of the objective, and which is not either this ideal point where we can place ourselves, of reference to the truth.

It is from this last point, the discrimination, the sieve, the screen to isolate the true proposition, it is from there as you know, it is the principle of the whole axiomatic of Mr Bertrand Russell, and this has produced three enormous volumes which are called Principia Mathematica, which are absolutely fascinating to read, if you are able to maintain yourself through so many pages at the level of pure algebra, and in that regard it seems that, with respect to the progress of mathematics itself, the advantage is not absolutely decisive. This is not our business.

Our business is the following: it is the analysis that Mr Bertrand Russell gives of language. There is more than one of his works to which one could refer, I indicate one that you can find everywhere today, you can buy it, it is the book called Signification et vérité published by Flammarion.

(26) You will see there that by questioning things from the angle of this pure logic, Bertrand Russell conceives of language as a superimposition, a scaffolding, an indeterminate number of a succession of metalanguages.

Each propositional level, being subordinated to the control, to the correction of the proposition on a higher scale, where it is put in question as a first proposition. I am, of course, schematising to an extreme degree what you can see the illustration of in this work. I think that this work, like any other work by Bertrand Russell, is exemplary, in the fact that taking to its final term what I would call the very possibility of a metalanguage, he shows its absurdity precisely in the following: that the fundamental affirmation from which we begin here, and without which there would not be, in effect, any problem about the relationships between language and thought, between language and the subject, is the fact there is no metalanguage.

Every kind of approach, up to and including the structural approach in linguistics, is itself included, is itself dependent, is itself secondary, is itself at a loss compared to the first and pure use of language. Every logical development, whatever it may be, presumes at the origin the language from which it is detached. If we do not hold firmly to this point of view, every question that we pose, here, the whole (27) topology that we are trying to develop is completely vain and futile, and Mr Piaget and Mr Russell - or whoever - are right: the only problem is that not a single one of them manages to agree with any of the others.

What am I doing here, and why am I pursuing this discourse? I am doing so because I am engaged in an experience which absolutely requires it. But how can I pursue it? Since, by the very premisses that I have just reaffirmed here, I cannot sustain this discourse except from an exceptionally precarious place, namely, that I assume this enormous audacity where each time, you may well believe me, I have the feeling of risking everything, this properly speaking untenable place, which is that of the subject.

There is nothing here that is comparable to any position that might be described as that of a professor. I mean that the position of the professor, in so far as it puts between the audience and oneself a certain framed, guaranteed, grounded summa, forming in the communication a sort of intermediary, barrier and rampart, and precisely something that habituates, favours the thing that launches the mind on paths which are the ones that, too briefly, I was earlier able to denounce as being those of Mr Piaget.

There is a problem about psychoanalysts, as you know. Things happen among (28) psychoanalysts, and even things, as I recalled at the beginning of my seminar last year, that are rather comical, I would even say farcical, as there happened to me for three years, to have in the front row of the seminar that I was giving at St Anne, a brochette of people who never missed one, nor a single one of the articulations that I was putting forward, while at the same time actively working to ensure that I was excluded from their community. This is an extreme position, which, in truth, I can only explain by having recourse to a very precise dimension which I described as farce and I will situate it at another time. Another context would have been needed for me to say with Abelard: "Odium mundi me fecit logica." [The hatred of the world made me a logician(?)]

That may perhaps start here. But then that was not what was in question. It was a question of the following: of a rather crude incident, among others, of things that happen all the time in what are called analytic societies. Why did this happen? In the final analysis, because if the formula that I am giving is true, the relationships of the subject to sense, if the psychoanalyst is there in analysis, as everyone knows he is, except that one forgets what that means, to represent sense up to and in the measure that he will represent it effectively, and it happens that, well or badly formed, with time the psychoanalyst more and more fits in with this position.

(29) In that very measure, I mean then, at the level of the best. You can form a judgement about what is involved for the others. Psychoanalysts, in normal conditions, do not communicate with one another. I mean that if sense - this is my radical reference - is what I already approached in fact in connection with the Witz of Freud, which is to be characterised in an order which is certainly communicable, but not codifiable in the currently accepted modes of identical communication and which I called, which I evoked, which I highlighted the last time under the term of non-sense, as being the icy face, the sheer one, where there is marked this limit between the effect of the signifier and what returns to it by reflection of signified facts, if in other words, there is somewhere a pas de sens - it is the term I used in connection with the Witz, playing on the ambiguity of the word pas, negation, and the word pas, crossing - nothing prepares the psychoanalyst effectively to discuss his experience with his neighbour. This is the difficulty - I am not saying it is insurmountable because I am here trying to trace the paths - here is the difficulty moreover that leaps to the eyes, simply you have to know how to formulate it, the difficulty of establishing a psychoanalytic science.

This impasse, which obviously must be resolved by indirect means, this impasse is (30) compensated for by all sorts of artifices, and this indeed is the drama of the communication between analysts.

Of course there is the solution of master-words (maître-mots). And from time to time some of them appear. Not often. From time to time some appear. And our friend Klein introduced a certain number of them. And then, in a certain way, one could say that for myself the signifier is perhaps the master word. No, precisely not. But let us leave this.

The solution of master words is not a solution, even though it is the one with which, in large measure, people are satisfied. If I put forward, if I put forward, the solution of master-words, it is because on the track that we are on today, it is not only analysts who have the need to find it. Mr Bertrand Russell, to compose his language, made up of the scaffolding, of the Babel-like edifice of metalanguages, one on top the other, there must be a foundation, therefore he invented object-language. There must be a level, unfortunately nobody is able to grasp it, where language is in itself pure object. I defy you to put forward a single conjunction of signifiers which could have that function.

Others of course will search for master words at another end of the chain. And when I speak of master words in analytic theory, it is words like those. It is quite (31) clear that whatever meaning is given to this term, it is not sustainable in any sense. The maintaining of nonsense as signifier of the presence of the subject, the Socratic atopia, is essential for this very search.

Nevertheless, by pursuing it, in so far as its path has not been traced, the role of the one who assumes, not at all that of the subject who is presumed to know but of risking himself at the place where he is lacking, is a privileged place and one which has the right to certain rules of the game, specifically, that for all of those who come to hear him, something should not be made of the use of the words that he puts forward, what might be called counterfeit money. I mean that an imperceptible weakening of the use of one or other of the terms that I put forward in the course of the years, signalled long ago and in advance, who would be the people who would follow me in my work, and who would fall by the wayside.

And it is for this reason that I do not want to leave you today without telling you what is the object of my concern about the audience that I am so happy to have gathered together here.

Undoubtedly, one can pursue this research for psychoanalysis, which I spoke about this year, by maintaining oneself in this region which is not at all a frontier one, because analogously to this surface about which I spoke earlier, its inside is the same as its outside.

(32) One can pursue this research concerning the point X, the hole of language. One can pursue it publicly, but it is important that there is a place where I have the response that what has been theoretically preserved in my teaching about the notion of sign, which finally only remained perhaps in the word, the word meant something, but that this takes on a locus and a place, precisely in the measure that my audience has been enlarged.

I have made the following arrangement: the fourth, and when they occur the fifth, Wednesdays, the days that I have the honour of speaking with you here, the fourth and the fifth will be closed sessions. Closed does not mean that anybody in particular is excluded. But that one is admitted on demand. In other words, given that this will not begin this month because there is no fourth Wednesday, I will only speak to you the next time and not the 23rd, the fourth Wednesday of January, anyone who comes here, and who knows, there is no reason why you should not be just as numerous, but it is not sure that all the people who are here will ask me. The relationship $S \rightarrow D$ which is situated somewhere on the right of the graph, which at least some of you know the existence of, has in a discourse such as (33) the one that I am pursuing here, and whose function I have I think sufficiently outlined as analogous, even though inverted, to the analytic relationship, posits as a healthy and normal structure, that the people who have formulated a request to me should participate in a certain order of work. I will be, I give you notice, very open to these demands, provided I am free, on my side, to summon the person to get a sense of their quality and their measure, but it is armed with a card sanctioning the fact that I agreed to their request, that the fourth Wednesdays and the fifth, up to the end of this year, which makes - I worked it out - eight of these sessions, people will come here to work according to a mode in which, I indicate already, I will have for some people, and I would like to meet those who are willing to help me on this point, I would like to allow some people to take the floor instead of me.

$$\frac{S}{\frac{p}{S}} - \frac{a}{S} S$$

Seminar 3 : Wednesday 16 December 1964

If psychology, whatever its object may be, but this object itself, as it is vainly sustained, being able to be defined as unique, in some way being able to lead us, along whatever path, to knowledge, in other words, if the soul existed, if knowledge was connected to the soul, professors of psychology, teachers of psychology ought to be recruited by the same methods by which they apprehend their object and, to illustrate what I mean, they should realise what happens in some sections of the museum - let us name one at random, the most representative one, conchology, the science of shells - and ought in short to realise at one stroke, the totality of teaching personnel and the collection itself. The summary of their university titles serving well enough in this metaphor as an image for the label of provenance stuck onto the aforesaid samples.

Experience proves, even though nothing can be ruled out in the future, that up to the present nothing of the kind has happened. The attempt of a Piaget, which is properly speaking that of limiting in such a narrow way the process, the progress (2) of effective knowledge to the development of something that is supposed to be immanent to a human or other species is something which, undoubtedly, in a fashion that is certainly analogical, since no phenomenology of the spirit, however elementary it may be, can be implicated in it, has to culminate at this sort of selection, of sampling, that I am speaking of, making of the intelligence quotient, in a way, the only possible standard of someone who has to respond to a certain functioning, to a certain integration of the functioning of intelligence.

The object of psychology is so little a unitary one, moreover, that this translation of the word soul to the level at which it serves as a theory of intellectual development is completely insufficient to fulfil its use, and everyone knows that in other registers, we would arrive at the same paradox: that those who have in some way or other to recognise, indeed to administer the field of the soul, ought also to realise in themselves some types, some prototypes or some elective moments of that which, when all is said and done, must be called the beautiful soul.

Luckily, no one dreams of it any longer, the most profound distrust having been cast on this category of the beautiful soul, as you know, by Hegel; the relationship of the beautiful soul to the disorders of the world was once and for all and definitively stigmatised by the undoubtedly penetrating remark which introduces us (3) from every angle to the dialectic applied here, that the beautiful soul has no other support than that disorder itself.

It is clear however that, in the recruitment procedures that psychoanalysts impose on themselves, there is in this whole field, which I was not able to sweep completely with the beam of the searchlight, there is a place which is distinguished by something which comes close in a very remarkable fashion to this paradoxical hypothesis, and that the idea that someone who has to teach, to account for what analytic praxis effectively is, for what it claims to conquer in the real, this someone, in a certain fashion, is himself the one who chooses himself as being a particularly well sorted-out sample of this progress. You will sense, moreover, that what is involved here is something other than something typical, than something static, it is a matter of a certain test, but then it is all the more important to specify the import of this test, and without any doubt the term identification, which is introduced here, for example, by presenting it as the end of the analytic experience, cannot fail at the same time to introduce a quite acute point of this problematic: at what level does this identification occur? At the level of an experience that is itself particular. Is the analysand someone who transmits a certain mode of the experiences of the one who analysed him, as he himself has received it, how can these experiences be (4) oriented with respect to one another, does the preceding one always have something which, in a way, goes beyond and includes the one which emerges from it; on the contrary does it leave the way open for going beyond it ? This, undoubtedly, is the most difficult level at which to pose the problem, it is certainly also the one at which it must be resolved. How can it even be envisaged if we do not grasp the structure of this experience?

For in no way, in analytic theory, can anything that is found at the level of this identification as substantial, in no way can this serve as a module and a measure, and psychoanalysts themselves, even those most entrenched in one or other traditional process, which God knows must not be studied too closely, would laugh if they were told that what it is a matter of transmitting is a function of the ego-ideal type. The identification involved can only be defined, grasped elsewhere.

We cannot of course be content with something which might evoke having been exercised at one time according to a certain dynamic. How could one find there anything whatsoever that would not resolve itself into a sort of endogeny, the awareness of a certain number of displacements grasped from within, but what graspable, what transmissible, what organisable, what in a word scientific thing, (5) can be based on something which would only amount, in that case, to being at the level of a certain type of massage, if you wish, of a type of breathing exercise, even of some kind of relaxation, something as primitively close to the innermost sphere of a test that, in the final analysis, is corporal.

That is why it is so important to attempt to grasp what is involved in an experience which puts itself forward as being, in the fullest sense, which no doubt does not fail to identify itself entirely to something as absolute, as radical, as speaking about the truth, [and] can nevertheless not refuse, I mean at the level of its experience, at the level of its results, this dimension of veracity, of something which, having been conquered, is revealed not simply as liberating but more authentic than that which was included in the knot from which one had to liberate oneself.

Moreover, it is not for nothing that there occur in my discourse elements of metaphor which are so singular, so unnoticed perhaps but also so striking, if we retain them, as those of knot, which bring us back to what already the last time I brought in here, in this little model that I brought to you in the shape of the Moebius strip, by reminding you of the importance of something which is of the order of topology.

(6) And its use is, in a way, immediately suggested by the simple remark that we ought to make, even though it is beginning from a test, from a test which is in a way naive as regards this realism, like that of Piaget, which is undoubtedly that it is not difficult at one or other turning point of the text to highlight the flaw by which he claims that by simply taking language as an instrument of intelligence and by failing to recognise in the most profound fashion that far from it being the instrument of intelligence, he demonstrates at the same time, and along the same path of the same discourse, how is it then that he underlines in the same discourse that this instrument is so inappropriate, that language is precisely what creates difficulties for intelligence. What perhaps should also be brought up for intelligence are the problems posed by language. It is difficult for it to guide an appropriate behaviour at the level of the pure and simple obstacle, of the pure and simple and immediate reality, the one that you come up against by knocking your head against it.

To refer this inappropriateness of language to some primitive state or other of what is called, on this occasion, thinking, is really here only to reject the problem without resolving it in any way, for if, effectively, language was at first some crystallisation which was imposed on the exercise of intelligence as an apparatus, (7) why is it not obvious that intelligence would have made language as appropriate as it made, after all, its primitive instruments which we know to be among all instruments often the most marvellously clever, the most striking for us, to the point that we are scarcely able to restore the perfection of their equilibrium, made with the minimum of material and at the same time the best chosen material, hence the instruments that we may have, these primitive ones, are in a way the most precious from the point of view of the quality of the object, why would language not have been something analogous in its own way, if effectively it was the creation, the secretion, the prolongation of an intelligent act ?

Quite the contrary, if there is something that, in a first approach, we could try to define as being the field of thinking, well then, why not provisionally, if it is absolutely necessary to start from intelligence, would I not say that thinking, and God knows it is a formula which would apply well at different levels, at least in a descriptive fashion, since it appears, at least at first sight, from an approach that thinking is intelligence trying to find its feet in the difficulties that the function of language imposes on it.

(8) Far from us being able in any way, of course - this is the first door that linguistics opens - to content ourselves with this first crude schema, which would make of language the apparatus, the instrument of some bi-univocal correspondence, whatever it may be, is it not clear that this very pursuit which is carried out of reducing it under the critical form of meaning, of logical-positivism and its myth of arriving at an exhaustion of the meaning of meaning, to carry out completely in every use of the signifier the exhaustion of different meanings which once supposedly, we are told, connoted will allow us to have a conversation, a dialogue which will be unambiguous, because we will always know in what sense, in what usage, in what acceptation such a word is brought in, who does not know, who does not see that everything that language contributes in terms of fruitfulness, indeed even in pure and simple functioning, always consists, not at all in operating upon this sort of preformed conjunction, apparatus, which, after which, we would no longer have anything to do except to collect, except to read there the solution of a problem, who does not see that it is precisely this operation which itself constitutes the solution of the problem, that this operation of the function and what I may make bold to call for the moment ideally bi-univocal is precisely what it is a matter of obtaining at the end of every research.

(9) This being posited as being of the order of the simplest introduction of any preface for tackling the difficulty of the problem, we see that if the linguistic approach, which is far from dating properly speaking from our epoch - I was recently questioned about this use of the signifier and the signified, which as I was replying seemed to me now to be really the words that are in vogue, that one begins to hear at every street corner, and which are used, put forward, in the most common replies at meetings - these terms were not invented today or yesterday and the Stoics alone can claim to have introduced them technically in the shape of the signans and the signatum. What is more one can show their roots much further back, and that it is enough to approach the function of language for there to be introduced a certain type of division which is not unambiguous, which is something that is completely radical, and by the situation of the fact that in this radical we are so implicated that we are only subjects, I am saying, by being implicated at this radical level and in a fashion nevertheless which allows us to see what we are implicated in, and that it is nothing other than what is called structure.

The ambiguity that we grasp, and whose trace I am going to make you follow in one or other field more favourable to show it, between sense and meaning, for (10) example, which alone are capable - it is not always pure pleasure to play with the shimmering of what appears final to us because it cannot even be referred to the higher category of being a shimmering of sense, since it is already a division within sense that is involved - it is because it is uniquely at this level that there is resolved, as you will see when it is a question of a certain type of usage of the word, that there are resolved patent contradictions, patent simply by revealing themselves when in connection with the same words, for example with what is called the proper name, you will see some people seeing there what is most indicative, and others what is most arbitrary, therefore what seems to be the least indicative: the one sees in it what is most concrete, the other what seems to go in the opposite direction, what is most empty; the one what is most charged with sense, the other what is most stripped of it, so that taking things, as you will see, in a certain debate, in a certain register, from a certain angle, this function of the proper name, it is clear in the most transparent fashion, is properly speaking for what it is and for what his name indicates, and what is not at all simply the proper name, it is, as Mr Russell says, a word for the particular, un mot pour le particulier, certainly not, certainly not as you will see.

But let us continue .

(11) I would like right away to illustrate the function of tautology for you with something: I spoke earlier about realism, about naive realism, I will oppose to it, I will oppose to it a mode under which the materialism which commonly enters our discourse as, God knows, a very little explored reference, materialism consists of only as admitting as existent material signs. Is that a circle? Certainly not. This suggests a sense. Materiality is certainly not explained but who in our day would feel himself comfortable in explaining it as an essence, as a final substance, but that this term is here expressly referred to signs, to signs at the moment that, on the other hand, where, as a radical reference, I said that signs are what represent something for someone, here is something that at the same time give us the model of what a certain type of apparently tautological reference, for I only said one thing, which is that materialism is what posits as existent only what we have the material signs of, has certainly not touched the sense of the word material, and nevertheless however tautological it is, it bring us a sense and shows us in a way in an exemplary, paradigmatic figure the usefulness of this little knot whose outline I drew for you the other day, this original double point which, by drawing it as being (12) the introductory circle to any possible approach to the function, whether of signifier or of sign, and here already in order to show you that we cannot make use of it as something which can in any way be reduced to the term of a punctual reference, if the circle is favourable to the mythical apprehension of its contraction to some zero point, there always remains something irreducible in a structure which cannot abolish itself by tightening in on itself; and here, after all, encouraged by the fact that there did not at all fall into a void - I was able to take note of that- what I contributed the last time about the Moebius strip, whose implication I will now point out to you in order to illustrate, provide the illumination which pushes, which begins to push to its highest point its exemplary value.

It is Saussure who, speaking about the signified, and everyone knows that he did not at all speak about it in a definitive fashion, if only because of the ambiguities which were swallowed up through the door of his theory, precisely on this point - the most efficacious thing he says about it, is undoubtedly the fact that with regard to the signifier, the signified presents itself in a back-to-front relationship, or if you wish in a front-to-back one. And of course there is something of this order which is suggested to us by the existence of the semantic sign, of the sign in language, (13) what is undoubtedly involved is that if one sticks in the closest possible fashion to phonematic analysis, it is impossible to speak about a sound element in the modern analysis of linguistics without considering it as being closely linked to what ? To what is called meaning and we rediscover here the ambiguity between meaning and sense.

If I began my discourse this year with this example taken from a book on grammar which is an example in which I showed you that whatever about its striving towards asemanatics, from the very fact of being grammatical it did not fail to carry a sense, and undoubtedly in this connection I was able to make you feel the two paths upon which we could search for what is called here sense, and that the one was not the other, and that along the path of meaning where we saw there could be constructed in abundance and almost so super-abundantly that our only difficulty was choosing, it was in the measure that we were operating through something, along some path, and that it is not a matter of indifference to point out - this is why I chose an example in a foreign tongue - that it was easier for me, more natural to lead you along the path of translation. It was by translating it into French, that I managed to make emerge from it pretty well everything that I wished by a very simple operational procedure, and one quite like that of conjuring.

(14) But that something different was involved in the other direction which by making us end up no doubt at the impasse and the closed nature of what constitutes the point of surprise, the charm of a poetic text clearly indicated to us that it was another dimension that was involved.

No doubt what it left in vagueness, mist and cloud as regard this poetic direction is something that can in no way appear sufficient to us. But it is here that I bring you back to the property of this singular surface which, of course, has a front and a back at every point. The important thing is that one should be able, by a certain journey along its circumference to get from any point whatsoever - whether it is from this place, or a corresponding one on the other side is fine - when I tell you that the signifier is essentially structured on the model of the aforesaid Moebius surface, that is what that means, namely, that it is on the same face, constituting the back and the front that we can encounter the material, the material which here is found to be structured on a phonematic opposition and this something which is not translated but which passes, which passes from one signifier to another in its functioning, in the functioning that belongs to language, even the most random one, this is what this poetic experiment demonstrates, in a way, that something which gets across and that this is where the sense is according as the mode that it (15) gets across is differently locatable and differently highlighted. This is what we are going to try to do, this alone is what allows us an exact mapping out of an experience which, from the very fact of being entirely an experience not alone of words but of artificial words, of words structured by a certain number of conditions which inflect the import of the discourse, ought to be mapped out with respect to what I called earlier the usage of the language by something or someone, the subject, the agent, the patient who is caught up in it.

So then I am going to introduce today, introduce one of these shapes, one of these topological shapes, one of these shapes founded on the surface, whose example I gave you the last time, to introduce you, to introduce you into this function because I think that all the same you have heard tell of the Klein bottle.

Let us take up this bottle again. Let us appropriate it to ourselves. And in the Klein bottle, and off we go.

It is extremely interesting. It is going to be of great use to us and you are going to see why. I remind you that I introduced the last time this remark that space, three-dimensional space, is something that is not at all clear, and that before speaking (16) about it like bird-brains, we will have to see the different shapes under which we can apprehend it, precisely along the path of mathematics which is essentially combinatoric; and that it is a completely different thing to consider matters resolved with the shapes that one can call the shapes of the revolution of a surface that gives us what ? After all nothing other than a volume, and it is not for nothing that it is called that. It is called that because it is constructed on the model, and it is not at all by chance, of something which is a rolled-up surface, a surface where one makes a roll, obviously. That takes up a particular little space. After that, you can take it in your hands and amuse yourself with it.

Turning a circle around an axis, is called a sphere. As I have said, turn this thing which I will call a triangle or simply an angle, according to whether I will limit it or not by a line which cuts the two sides, and you will have a cone, a conic section or an infinite cone according to the case.

But there are things that do not behave at all like that, which do not for the moment need to see the space as constructed and which do extremely well.

As I told you, there are three fundamental shapes, the hole - we will come back to it - the torus, as I told you, the cross-cap.

(17) The torus does not seem to be very complicated. Take what ever you like, a ring of black pudding, a bicycle tube, simply, begin in your head to pose little problems. For example the following: make a cut like that in it, exactly like that; and if you have not already done so and if you have not already reflected on the torus, tell me how many pieces that will give, for example. Which proves to you that one can pose questions in this way with what are not, as I pointed out the last time, immediately intuited objects.

But we are not going to delay on these little toys, I simply want to point out to you how these figures are constructed in a simple and combinatory fashion. They are constructed in the following fashion: the most elementary shape of them that can be given is that of a four-sided figure whose sides are vectorialised.

What does this vectorialisation signify here? That signifies that we construct these figures by a suture, that we stitch what is called here an edge, I will spare you the intermediate definition of what edge means here, that it is in the sense of the vectorialisation, namely, that a point being here on the vector, the point (a) culminates at a point (a') which does not correspond to it in a metrical fashion but (18) which is its correspondent in an ordered way, in the sense that a point (b) which is more in the direction of the vector, will then be sewn, whatever it may be and whatever may be the metrically defined distance between (a') and (b'), sewn on to the point (b'). The same thing for the couple on the other side of the aforesaid construction.

It is obviously only strictly square here for the visual, Gestaltic intelligibility of the eye. I could just as well construct it as follows: I will put the same vectors and that would have exactly the same meaning. Why? Because it constructs a torus. How is a torus constructed? A torus is constructed, it is very easy to understand, and that is why I began with it, a torus is constructed by first of all suturing this side with the other, namely by making what for common intuition is a first cylinder, or if you wish, one can suppose that the space in the interval has some function or other - there are people like that, there is St. Thomas, there are people who always want to stuff their fingers into something. It is a human type.

They make black pudding all their lives. In any case if you want to fill it, you will then have a full roll and, starting from there, you can close this roll and you will obtain what is drawn here.

(19) What does that mean? It means that in a structure which is essentially of a spatial order, which has no history, you nevertheless introduce a temporal element.

In order for this to be fully determined you must connote one and one by the same number but by some number or some connotation which implies, only coming after the two operations. You cannot perform them at the same time. It does not matter which comes before the other; it will always have the same result, a torus, but it will not give the same torus, because in some instances that will give two tori, one crossing the other. It is even one of their more interesting functions.

So with that, it is a simple introductory exercise, what is a Klein bottle? A Klein bottle is a construction of exactly the same type, with the simple difference that, if the two vectorialised edges are vectorialised in the same direction, it is let us say in accordance with the torus mode, therefore that like the torus it is suitable for making a black pudding. The other opposite edges - as regards which it does not matter whether the operation of suturing is done before or after the other one, it will give the same result, but which ought to be done in a successive fashion - the two other edges are vectorialised in the opposite direction.

(20) I am going to show you right away on the blackboard what this involves, for those who have not yet heard tell of the Klein bottle. That involves something which, if you wish, in section, in section of course, not wanting to say anything in this register, since we are not introducing the third dimension of space; and in a way for common intuition, for the mapping out which is yours habitually in experience, and after all perhaps one can say customarily, because there is no objection to the dimensions of the topology of surfaces being more immediately accessible and familiar to you; it is enough for you to practice it a bit, this is even what is desirable; here is what this gives in section.

Good. What does that mean? That means that this, as I told you, is a section, namely, that there is here, let us say, a volume which is common, which has a conduit which passes through the centre; in other words this deserves to be called a bottle because, see here the body of the bottle and here is its neck, it is a neck which is supposed to be extended in such a way that, entering the body of the bottle, if you wish, to emphasise it better, I am going to show you the entrance here, it is going to be inserted, to be sutured, to the bottom of this bottle.

(21) So then, without even having recourse to my drawing, in words, in terms, you have a bottle, a Vittel bottle. You twist its neck, you make it go through the side wall of this bottle and you insert it onto the bottom of the bottle. At the same time this insertion opens and you can see that you have here something which is realised, with the characteristics of a completely closed surface, this surface is everywhere closed and nevertheless, one can get into its interior, as I might say, as into a mill.

Its inside communicates completely, integrally with its outside. Nevertheless this surface is completely closed.

This would only be a bit of physics-for-fun except of course for the fact that this bottle is capable of containing a liquid and even under ordinary conditions, as I am going to represent it for you, of not allowing it to be poured out, namely of containing it without one even needing to worry about a cork, this is something that the simplest reflection will allow you to conceive of. If you effectively stand this up, as I have drawn it, and you make it effectively function as a bottle, which is filled once it has its bottom in the air, but if you turn it upside down, put its bottom below, it is quite certain that the liquid will not pour out.

(22) This, I repeat, is of strictly no interest. What is interesting is that the properties of this bottle are such that the surface in question, the surface which encloses it, the surface which composes it, has exactly the same properties as a Moebius strip, namely that there is only one face, as it is easy to verify and affirm.

So that, since this may also appear to be a bit of sleight-of-hand, and is not that at all despite the fact that it could pass for something analogous, an effect of sense, and that it is not at all in an analogical fashion that I intend to talk to you about it.

I am going to try to materialise it for you in a fashion that is completely clear: if we begin from the sphere, we could make of the sphere, a bottle; it is something that is not at all impossible. Supposing that this sphere is a rubber ball, you fold it back a bit like this, onto itself, it is not even necessary that here you have this little twist, it is clearer you can always make a cup out of it by pushing it into itself. I would even say that this is the way that the process of the formation of an animal body begins it is the blastula stage, after the morula stage.

(23) Here what do you have? You have an outside, an inside, an inside; the surface, an original series and an outside. You have, in realising something which can be a container, you have modified nothing of the function of the two faces of the surface with respect to the original sphere.

Something completely different happens, if first taking the sphere and making of it this strangled thing, you take one of the halves of the sphere and insert it into the other. In other words, I am schematising. (Drawing). Have you got it?

From the dumbbell of the double ball which I constructed here by strangulation, from this spherical surface I make, imagine that here is ball 1 what I am going here ... the second ball has entered the interior; here you have the original outside, the inside, and what is brought face to face here is a surface of the first outside with the inside, no longer like in my blastula of above; the inside remaining always face to face. And the inside is here, from the second part of the surface. It that a Klein bottle?

No! To get to the Klein bottle something else is needed. But it is here that I am going to be able to explain something to you which is going to show you the interest of highlighting the aforesaid Klein bottle.

(24) The fact is that, suppose that there is some relationship, some structural relationship, as is all the same well indicated for a long time by the constancy, the permanence of the metaphor of the circle and of the sphere in all cosmological thinking, suppose that it is like this that one has to construct, to represent for oneself in a healthy fashion, that one has to construct what concerns precisely cosmological thinking. Cosmological thinking is founded essentially not on a bi-univocal correspondence but a structural one, the enveloping of the microcosm by the macrocosm; that this microcosm, call it whatever you wish subject, soul, nous, that this cosmos you can call whatever you wish reality, the universe, but suppose that one envelops the other and contains it, and that the one which is contained manifests itself as being, as it were, the result of this cosmos, that which corresponds to it member for member.

It is impossible to extirpate this fundamental hypothesis, and it is from this that there dates a certain stage in thinking, which, if you follow what I said earlier, is about a certain use of language.

And this corresponds to it precisely in the measure, and uniquely in the measure, that in this register of thinking the microcosm, as is fitting, is not made up of a part of the world that is, in a way, turned inside-out in the way one turns a rabbit's skin inside-out.

(25) It is not earlier, like earlier, in my blastula as I drew it, the inside which is outside for the microcosm, it is well and truly also an outside that it has, and which is confronted with the inside of the cosmos. Such is the symbolic function of this stage where I am leading you to in the reconstruction of the Klein bottle.

We are going to see that this schema is, of course, essential for a certain mode of thinking and style, but to represent it for you, I will show you in detail and in the facts, a certain limitation, a certain unawakened implication in the use of language.

The moment of awakening, in so far, as I told you, I highlighted, as I located it historically in the cogito of Descartes, is something that is not at all immediately apparent, precisely in the measure that of this cogito one makes something that has a psychological value. But if one pinpoints exactly what is in question, if it is what I said, namely the making obvious of the function of the signifier, and is nothing other than the fact that the signifier represents the subject for another signifier, it is starting from this discovery that the supposedly pre-established pact of the signifier with some thing being broken, it is established, it is established in history, and since it is from there that science started, it is established that it is from this rupture, even (10) if immediately, and because simply it is taught only incompletely, and it is taught only incompletely because its final principle is not seen, that it is starting from there that a science can be inscribed, starting from the moment where there is broken this parallelism between the subject and the cosmos which envelopes it, and which makes of the subject, psyche, psychology, microcosm, it is starting from the moment that we introduce here a different suture, and one which I called elsewhere an essential buttoning point, which is the one that here opens up a hole, and thanks to which the structure of the Klein bottle is then, and only then, established, namely, that in the sewing which is done at the level of this hole, what is knotted is the surface to itself, in such a way that what we have up to the present taken as outside, is found connected to what we have located up to the present as inside, to what was located as inside, is sutured, knotted to the face that was located up to then as outside.

[Noises off] Is it visible, is it clear enough? Do you see from down there in the bad light? Here we have opened up an orifice crossing both what in my drawing symbolised the enveloping cosmos and what in my drawing symbolised the enveloped microcosm, and it is in this way that we rejoin the structure of the Klein bottle.

(27) Have you seen it enough? No? Well then I'll make it bigger. Otherwise we'll never understand anything. There it is now, completed.

Are you beginning to see that? Are you beginning to see it? Have you grasped the essential of what I explained to you earlier, the structure of the Klein bottle? This blackboard must be really badly lit. Is there no light, since I see down there people craning their necks? It would all the same be important for you to see what I drew. I am leading you here along a difficult path, which given the time and the necessity for explanations will not lead you today directly to its relationship to language. So that, because we have no more than ten minutes, I will try to give you a little amusing explanation of it, whose general relationship with the field of analytical experience you will see.

There is more than one way of expressing this construction. I could give you for it the figure of Gagarin, the cosmonaut. Gagarin, the cosmonaut, apparently is well and truly enclosed - let us say, to simplify and to go quickly, we do not have much more time - like ancient man, in his wandering cosmos. From the biological point of view it is, moreover, between ourselves, allow me to point it out to you in (28) passing, something very curious and which could be punctuated with respect to the evolution of animal descendance. I remind you that it is very difficult to grasp, to grasp in any imaginable way, how an animal who regularly exchanged what he had need of, from the respiratory point of view, with the milieu in which he was plunged at the level of the bronchioles, to realise this absolutely fabulous thing, of being able to emerge out of the water, in the present case, by sending into his own interior, an important fraction of the atmosphere. From this evolutionary point of view, you can notice that Gagarin, in so far as he has the slightest responsibility in all of this, reduplicates the operation, he envelops himself in his own lung. Which requires him in the final analysis to piss inside his own lung, because after all it has to go somewhere. Hence the exemplary syllogism that I will have to develop for you in the future, following the famous syllogism: all men are mortal, Socrates is a man, therefore Socrates is mortal. I found useful for purposes that you will see better later on, but whose introduction is a caricature, a caricature of this famous syllogism on Socrates, that all cosmonauts are pissers, that Gagarin is a cosmonaut, therefore that Gagarin is a pisser.

(29) Which has about as much importance as the formula about Socrates! But let us leave that for the moment.

Far from Gagarin contenting himself with being a pisser, he is not a cosmonaut either. He is not a cosmonaut, because he is not wandering through the cosmos, whatever may be said about it; because the trajectory which carries him was, from the point of view of the cosmos, completely unexpected, and that one can say, in a certain sense, that any god who ever presided over the existence of a cosmos, never expected, never knew anything about the precise trajectory, the necessary trajectory in function of the laws of gravity, and which literally were not able to be discovered except by beginning from an absolute rejection of all cosmic facts. All the contemporaries of Newton rejected, indignantly, the possibility of the existence of an action at a distance, of an action which is not propagated from neighbour to neighbour, because this was up to then, the law of the cosmos, the law of reciprocal interaction between its parts.

There is in Newton's law, in so far as it allows our little projectile which is called a Sputnik, to be something which is held in a perfectly stable way, at the level of a preconceived law; there is here something of an absolutely acosmic nature, as besides from this fact, from the very fact of this point of insertion, the whole development of modern science.

(30) And this is why that the opening that is involved here, namely, that the cosmos itself, that the little cosmos which allows Gagarin to subsist through the spaces, is something which depends on a construction of a profoundly acosmic nature.

It is with this, with the internal sphere, that we are dealing in analysis under the name of reality, an apparent reality which is that of the correspondence, in appearance, the modeling, one on the other, of something called the soul and something called reality. But compared to this apprehension, which remains the psychological apprehension of the world, psychoanalysis gives us two openings : The first, the one which from this forum, from this meeting place, where man believes himself to be the centre of the world, but it is not this notion of centre which is here the important thing in what is called, parrot-like, the Copernican revolution, under the pretext that the centre jumped from the earth to the sun, which is a clear disadvantage, namely, that from the moment that we believe that the centre is the sun, we also believe at the same time that there is an absolute centre, something that the ancients who saw the sun moving according to the seasons did not believe, they were much more relativist than we are. This is not what is important, it that is the psyche, the soul, the subject, in the sense that it is (31) employed in the theory of knowledge, is represented not as centre, but as the lining (doublure) of a reality which at the same time becomes cosmic reality.

What psychoanalysis uncovers for us is: this passage, this passage by which one comes to the between-the-two, on the other side of the lining, where this interval, this interval which appears to be what grounds the correspondence between the inside and the outside, where this interval - and this is the world of the dream, it is the other scene of action - is perceived.

Freud's Heimlich, and it is why it is at the same time Unheimlich, is that, it is that thing, this locus, this secret place where you walk the streets in this singular reality, streets that are so singular that it is on this that I will dwell the next time in order to begin again. Why is it necessary to give streets proper names?

You walk the streets then, and you go from street to street, from place to place, but one day it happens that without knowing why, you cross some limit or other that is invisible to yourself, and you come upon a place where you have never been, and which nevertheless you recognise as being that place where it reminds you of having always been there, and having returned a hundred times, you remember it now, it was there in your memory, like a sort of island apart, something not noticed which suddenly comes together for you.

(32) This place, which has no name, but which is distinguished by the strangeness of its setting, by what Freud highlights precisely so well, precisely the ambiguity which ensures that Heimlich or Unheimlich is one of those words where, in its own negation, we put our finger on the continuity, the identity between its front and its back. This place, which is properly speaking the other scene of action, because it is the one where you see reality, no doubt you know that it comes to birth as a set (décor), and you know that it is not what is at the other side of the set that is the truth, and that if you were there, in front of the stage, it is you who are at the other side of the set, and who are touching something that goes further in the relationship of reality to everything that envelops it.

At one time last year I appeared, or perhaps even something which might deserve it to be said that I spoke ill of love, when I said that its field, the field of Verliebtheit, is a field at once profoundly anchored in the real, in the regulation of pleasure, and at the same time fundamentally narcissistic.

Undoubtedly another dimension is given to us in this special conjunction; the way in which it happens along the most real paths, it is our companion when we come (33) to this special locus of experience, this is an indication that something, of a dimension that no one more than the romantic poet knew how to accentuate in a thrilling way. There are still other ways for us to make it heard, it is the path of non-sense, that of Alice, not in Wonderland, but precisely having carried out this crossing, this impossible crossing into the specular reflection, which is the passage to the other side of the mirror, it is that, through the looking glass, is presented as that which can have this singular encounter, it is this which in another dimension, I said, was explored by romantic experience, this is what is called, with a different accent, love.

But to come back from this place and to understand it, and for it to have been grasped, for it even to have been discovered, for it to exist in this structure which means that here, I encountered the structure of two opposed faces which allow this other scene of action to be constituted, it is necessary that elsewhere there has been realised the structure on which there depends the a-cosmicity of everything, namely that somewhere, what is called structure, the structure of language, is capable of responding to us, not at all of course, it is not a matter here in any way of something which prejudices the absolute adequation of language to the real, but of that which as language introduces into the real everything that is accessible to us in it in an operational fashion. Language enters the real and creates structure in it. We participate in this operation and by participating in it we are included, (34) implicated in a rigorous and coherent topology, so that every discovery, every decisive door pushed at a point of this structure, must be accompanied by the mapping out in a strict exploration, by the definite indication of the point where the other opening is. Here it would be easy for me to evoke the misunderstood passage of Virgil at the end of Chapter VI; the two gates of the dream, are exactly inscribed there; the gate of ivory, he tells us, and the gate of horn. The gate of horn which opens to us the field of what is true in the dream, and it is the field of the dream; and the ivory gate which is the one through which Anchises and Aeneas are sent back with the Sibyl towards the light, it is the one through which erroneous dreams pass, the ivory gate, the most captivating in the locus of the dream, the one most charged with error, is the locus where we believe ourselves to be a subsistent soul at the heart of reality.

Seminar 4: Wednesday 6 January 1965

Problems for psychoanalysis. This is how I agreed to situate my remarks for this year. Why, after all, did I not say: problems for psychoanalysts? The fact is that it is proved by experience that for psychoanalysts, as they say, there is no problem except the following: do people come to psychoanalysis or not?

If people come to their practice, they know that something is going to happen; this the firm position on which the psychoanalyst is anchored. They know that something is going to happen that might be qualified as miraculous, if one understands this term with reference to mirare, which at the extreme could mean to be astonished.

In truth, thank God, there still remains in the experience of the psychoanalyst, this margin that what happens is surprising for him. A psychoanalyst of the heroic epoch, Theodore Reik - it is a good sign, I have just remembered his first name, I had forgotten it this morning, while I was making my notes, and you will see that this has the closest relationship with my remarks today - Theodore Reik, then, entitled one of his books: Der überraschte Psychologe, the surprised (2) psychologist. The fact is, in truth, that in the heroic period of psychoanalytic technique he belonged to, one had even more reasons than now to be astonished, for if I spoke earlier about a margin, it is because the psychoanalyst, step by step throughout the decades, has repressed this astonishment to his frontiers. It is perhaps that now also, this astonishment serves as a frontier for him; namely, to separate him from this world from which people come or do not come to psychoanalysis.

Within these frontiers, he knows what is happening, or believes he knows. He believes he knows because he has traced out its paths. But if there is something that ought to remind him of his experience, it is precisely this share of illusion which threatens every knowledge which is too sure of itself. In Theodore Reik's time this author could give astonishment, Überraschung, as the signal, the illumination, the brilliance, which to the analyst designates that he apprehends the unconscious, that something has revealed itself which is of this order of subjective experience which happens all of a sudden, and moreover, not knowing how he did it, from the other side of the set (décor), that is the Überraschung, and it is on this path, along this way, on this trace that he knows at least that he is on his own road. (3) No doubt at the time Theodore Reik's experience began from, these paths were marked by darkness, and the surprise represented their sudden illumination. Lightning flashes, however brilliant they may be, are not enough to construct a world. And we are going to see that, where Freud saw there being opened the gates to this world, he did not yet know how to properly denominate either the frame or the hinges of these doors.

Is this enough to ensure that the analyst, in so far as he has been able since to map out the regular unfolding of a process, necessarily knows where he is, or even where he is going? Something can be mapped out without being thought and we have enough testimonies that many things about this process, and one could perhaps say almost all, in any case the ends, remain problematic for him.

The question of the ending of the analysis and of the sense of this ending is not at all resolved at the present time. I only evoke it here as a testimony of what I am putting forward concerning what I am calling the mapping out, which is not necessarily a reflected mapping out.

Undoubtedly there is something which remains assured in that experience, which is that it is associated with what we will call effects of unknotting. The unknotting of things charged with sense which cannot be unknotted by other means, this is the (4) solid ground on which the analytic camp is established. If I use this term, it is precisely in order to designate what results from this closure from which I began my discourse today, breaking through or not the frontiers of the camp. The psychoanalyst has the right to affirm that certain things, symptoms, in the analytic sense of the term, which is not that of a sign but of a certain knot whose shape, tightening or thread have never been properly named, that a certain knot of signs to signs, and which is properly at the foundation of what one calls the analytic symptom, namely, something installed in the subjective, which cannot in any way be resolved by reasonable and logical dialogue.

Here the psychoanalyst affirms to the one who suffers from it, to the patient: "you will not be delivered from it, from this knot, except within the camp". But does that mean that there is here, for him, the analyst, more than an empirical truth in the measure that he only operates it, handles it, by reason of the experience that he has of the paths that are traced out in the artificial conditions of analytic experience? Does it mean that everything has been said at the level of what he can bear witness to from his practice, in terms of demands, transference, identification?

It is enough to note the stumbling, the inappropriateness, the insufficiency of the (5) references that are given to these terms of the experience, and to take only the first one, the major one, the turning-plate, transference, to note in the very text of analytic discourse, that properly speaking, at a certain level of this discourse, one can say that the person who carries it out has no idea of what he is doing. For the kind of irreducible residue which remains in all these discourses about transference, in so far as they have still not succeeded, any more than common, everyday language, any more than what has passed of it into the common representation of an affective relationship, as long as this has not been eliminated, since affective has precisely no other sense than that of irrational, one will see as regards one of these terms, transference, and I do not need to return to the others, darkness progressively deepening in the measure that one advances towards the other term of the series, identification, that nothing is grasped, that nothing is theorised about an experience, however sure may be the rules and the precepts accumulated up to now.

It is not enough to know how to do something - turn a vase or sculpt an object - to know what one is working on. Hence the ontological mythology about which the psychoanalyst has been attacked, quite correctly, when he is told: "these terms to which you refer, and which, in the final analysis point towards this confused (6) locus of the tendency, and since it is to this that, in the common philosophy of psychoanalysis, the drive will finally and in an erroneous fashion be brought back; this then is what you are working on, you entify, you ontify, an immanent property into something substantial. Your man, the anthropology of the analyst, we already know for a long time, this old ousia, this soul, still as lively, intact, untouched as ever". But the analyst, though he does not name it exactly by its name, except with a little shame, it is all the same to it that he refers in his thinking, as a result of which he is quite rightly and quite justifiably completely exposed to the attacks, which as you know come at him from all sides where thinking is able, has a right, to claim that it is inadequate to speak about man as a given, of man in the numerous determinations which appear to him, internal as well as external, in other words, which present themselves to him as things, as fatalities, that man does not know that he is at the heart of these supposed things, of these supposed fatalities, that it is from a certain initial relationship, a relationship of production, of which he is the mainspring, that these things are determined, no doubt without his knowing it, nevertheless issuing from him.

It remains to be seen whether in rejoining by what I am teaching, those who correctly put in doubt the given, natural, status of the human being, it remains to be (7) seen whether by doing things in this way, I favour, as I was recently reproached for doing, and by someone very close to me, the resistance of those who have not yet crossed the frontier, who have not come to analysis, or whether the truth of what analysis contributes, can be, yes or no, a way into it. If in a certain fashion, to reject that a discourse may encompass analytic experience, and all the more legitimately because this experience is only possible because of a primordial determination of man by discourse, if by behaving in this way, by opening up the possibility of speaking about analysis outside the analytic field, I am or not favouring the resistance to analysis, and whether the resistance involved is not from within the resistance of the analyst to open his experience to something which might comprehend it.

Our starting point, our given, which is not at all a closed given, is the subject who speaks; what analysis contributes, is that the subject does not speak in order to tell his thoughts. There is no world, the intentional, significant reflection at whatever level it may be - this grotesque infatuated personage who is supposed to be at the centre of the world, predestined from all eternity to give it its sense and its reflection, do you see that this pure spirit, this consciousness announced from all time is supposed to be there as a mirror and to vaticinate - how can it happen then, let us always come back to it, that he may vaticinate in a language which of itself (8) creates an obstacle for him at every instant to manifesting what he experiences as surest in his experience, as is clearly manifested by the contradiction, always embraced by philosophers, between logic and grammar. Since they complain that it is grammar which contaminates their logic, how does it happen that people have always been so attached to speaking in a grammatical language with parts of discourse which ground like themselves, which reflect the pure mirrors, with parts of discourse which they affirm to be the parts that contaminate their logic, and that if they trust it, it is precisely at that moment that they will poke their fingers in their eyes.

We have an experience, an experience which is carried on every day in the office of every analyst - whether he knows it or whether he does not know it is of absolutely no importance - an experience which avoids us having to have recourse to this aspect of the philosophical critique, in so far as it bears witness to its own impasse, an experience in which we put our finger on the fact that because he is speaking, because the subject, the patient, speaks, namely, that he emits these raucous or sweet sounds that are called the material of language, which first determined the path of his thoughts, which determined him at first, to such a degree and in such an original fashion, that he carries the trace of it on his skin like a branded animal, that (9) he is identified at first by this something that may be widespread or restricted, but it is now perceived that it is much more restricted than believed, that a tongue can be contained on a sheet of paper of that size, with the list of its phonemes, and one may well try to continue to preserve the old splits and say that there are two levels in the tongue, the level which does not signify - these are the phonemes- and the others which signify, which are words. Well, I am here today to remind you, that the first apprehensions of the effects of the unconscious were realised by Freud in the years between 1890 and 1900. What gave him the model of it? The article of 1898 on the forgetting of a proper name, the forgetting of the name of Signorelli, as the painter of the celebrated frescoes at Orvieto. I would point out to you that the first manifest, structuring effect for him, for his thinking, and which opened the path was not produced, and he clearly highlighted it, he articulated it in such a well supported fashion in this article, which as you know was reproduced at the beginning of the book on the Psychopathology of everyday life, which would appear six years later. It was from there that he began again, because it was from there that his experience originated. What disappears in this forgetting - what is called forgetting - and from the first steps, you clearly see that what one must always pay attention to is the meaning, because of course, it is not a forgetting, Freudian (10) forgetting is a form of memory, it is even its most precise form; so that it would be better to distrust words like forgetting, Vergessen. Let us say a hole. What disappeared through the hole? Phonemes. What he is missing, is not Signorelli, in so far as Signorelli would remind him of things that would turn his stomach. There is nothing to be repressed precisely, as you are going to see, it is articulated in Freud; he does not repress anything, he knows very well what is involved, and why Signorelli and the frescoes at Orvieto touched him profoundly, are linked to these things which most preoccupy him, the link between death and sexuality, nothing is repressed, but what disappears, are the first two syllables of the word Signorelli. And immediately, he says, he highlights: "this has the closest relationship with what we see with symptoms" - and at that time he still only knows the symptoms of the hysteric. It is at the level of signifying material that there are produced the substitutions, the slippages, the disappearing acts, the avoidances that one has to deal with when one is on the path, on the track of the determination of the symptom and of its unknotting.

Only, at that moment - even though his whole discourse is there to testify to us that he is so much at the quick of what is involved in the phenomenon and he (11) ceaselessly at every turn accentuates, as well as he can, what is involved - he says : "in this case it is an ausserliche Bedingung, an external condition". Secondly, when he comes back to it again, he will say : "one might object to me that there are" - which proves the point to which he senses clearly the difference between two types of phenomena which can be differentiated here - "there may be internally, in effect, some relations between the fact that what is in question is a stumbling on the name Signorelli, and the fact that Signorelli carries with it, given the frescoes at Orvieto, since that is what is involved, it carries with it many things which may interest me a bit more than I myself am aware of."

Nevertheless, he says : "one might object", because it is all he can say, because he knows well that this is not how things are, and we are going to try to see, to enter more deeply into the mechanism, and to demonstrate what in this original case, this model, the first to appear in Freud's thinking of something initial, crucial for us, we are going to see more in detail how it should be conceived, what systems are imposed on us in order to account exactly for what is involved, that we will find some help in this, from the fact that since that time there is something that we have learned to handle like an object, and which is of course called the system of the tongue, it is a help for us but all the more striking is the fact that the first testimony (12) of Freud, of his discourse when he approaches this field, leaves completely in reserve, absolutely outlined that there is absolutely nothing to add to his discourse, it is only necessary to add to it signans and signatum.

What we have here undoubtedly is the function of the proper name, as I announced to you I would be led to make use of it, take a certain interest in it. This notion of the proper name takes on an interest because of the privilege it has won in the discourse of linguists.

Rest easy! Those to whom I am speaking up to the present to a major extent, in the most ad hominem way, the analysts: rest easy! It is not only you who have problems with discourse. You are even precisely the ones who are best protected from it. I would like to tell you that the linguists do not manage too easily with the proper name. A considerable quantity of books have been published on this subject, which are for us, which ought to be for us very interesting to scrutinise in the proper sense of the term, to take bit by bit with notes. As I cannot do everything, I would really like, for example, someone to take responsibility for it in what are called the closed sessions that I am reserving this year in this course in trying to reintroduce into it the function of the seminar. A book, for example by Mr Bigo Brundal on : Les parties du discours, an excellent book published in Copenhagen by Munsgard. Another very attractive one by a Miss Sorensen which (13) is called : The meaning of proper names, also published in Copenhagen. There are places in the world where one can be occupied with interesting things, and not devote oneself entirely to creating atom bombs. And then there is The story of proper names by Sir Allen H Gardiner, a well known Egyptologist, published by Oxford University Press, this one is particularly interesting and I would say "extraordinary". It is really a summa, a sort of concentrated point on the subject of proper names, of everything that one could describe as consummate, obvious, apparent, displayed error.

This error like many others, has its origin on the paths of truth, namely, that it begins from a little remark which had some sense on the paths of the Aufklärung. He remarks that John Stuart Mill, setting up a fundamental difference between the function of the noun in general - nobody up to the present has said what a noun is, but they talk about it - of the noun in general, it has two functions, to denote or to connote. There are nouns which carry in themselves possibilities of development, this sort of riches which is called definition, and which in the dictionary refer you on indefinitely from noun to noun. That, that connotes. And then there are others which are made in order to denote. I call by his name someone who was present here in the first row or in the last one, apparently that only concerns them. I am (14) only denominating him. And starting from there, we will define the proper name as something which only intervenes in the nomination of an object, by reason of the proper virtues of its sonority, it does not have, outside this denotation effect, any kind of significant import. This is what Mr Gardiner teaches us.

Of course this has only some very small disadvantages: for example to force him, at least in a first phase, to eliminate all the proper names - they are numerous - which carry a sense in themselves. Oxford, you can cut it in two and that gives something. That refers to something which has a relationship to an ox and so on I am taking his own examples. Villeneuve, Villefranche, these are proper names, but at the same time they have a meaning. That of itself should make us prick up our ears. But, of course, it is said, it is independently of this meaning that it has, that this serves as a proper name. Unfortunately, it is obvious that if a proper name had no meaning whatsoever, when I introduce someone to someone else, absolutely nothing would happen. While it is clear that if I present myself to you as Jacques Lacan, I am saying something which, right away, involves a certain number of signifying effects for you. First of all because I introduce myself to you (15) in a certain context, if I am in a society, it is because I am not an unknown in this society, on the other hand from the moment that I introduce myself to you as Jacques Lacan, that already rules out that I am a Rockefeller, for example, or the Comte de Paris. There are already a certain number of references which come immediately with a proper name. It may also happen that you have already heard my name somewhere. Then of course it is enriched. To say that a proper name, in a word, is without meaning, is something grossly erroneous. On the contrary it carries with itself much more than meanings, a whole sum of notices.

One cannot in any case designate as its distinctive feature, this arbitrary or conventional character, because that is by definition the property of any kind of signifier, as people have sufficiently insisted, rather awkwardly moreover, on this aspect of language, by emphasising that it is arbitrary and conventional. In reality, it is something different that is aimed at, it is something else that is involved.

It is here that we see the value of this little model that in different shapes, but in reality always the same ones, I am discussing before you, I am speaking about those who have been my listeners in this place since my course of this year and that the others know well for a long time, my Moebius strip, my Klein bottle from the (16) last time, this is what is involved. This is what it returns from, from a model, from a support which it is absolutely not proper to consider as being addressed only to the imagination, because first of all I wanted to make you, as it were, touch with your little comprehender something here, there, behind the forehead, which is characterised precisely by the fact that it does not comprehend, and it is there that Freud in his first attempts placed his hands on the head of the patient whose resistance he wished precisely to lift. It was one of the primitive forms of this operation.

It is not so easy to operate, here, with these topological models. It is no easier for me than for you. It sometimes happens that when I am completely alone I get mixed up. Naturally, when I come before you, I have done my exercises.

So then, to take up my schema from the last time, this kind of little jelly fish, this little floating nautilus; under which I have been left all sorts of figures which ought to clarify the situation for you a good deal. Are you able to see?

If I schematised this Klein bottle for you in this way the last time, namely, in the way that the mathematicians, who are not a bad crowd, tried to blow up, as I might say, this Klein bottle, to amuse the public, if I represent it for you in this way, (17) exactly as the mathematicians have done, for there is a whole aspect of mathematics which happily is introduced from the angle of recreation. A Klein bottle is not complicated. You can have one made. Someone even proposed that we should have a little shop on the way in here where everyone could get his little Klein bottle. It would be a sign of recognition. A Klein bottle does not cost very much, especially if you order a run of them.

As I explained to you, it is a bottle, it is this one here, a bottle whose neck has entered the interior and has, as I have explained to you, inserted itself onto the bottom of the bottle. And if, in addition, you blow up a little this neck that has gone in, then you have this very pretty schema of a double sphere with one comprehending the other, and, as I think you understood the last time, this is a particular happy way to make you put your finger, in the most original way, on the advantage of this model which man discovered very early, in this double and conjugated image of the microcosm and the macrocosm, namely that it would be for me a game that unfortunately I have not the time to devote myself to, I am sketching it out for you, to show you, for example, the first Chinese astronomy, which is a work of genius, I assure you, the first Chinese astronomy, which is (18) called ka inh tien, was composed of an earth formulated in this way, of a heavens which overlapped it like a bowl on top of a bowl and the roots of the heavens being supposed to plunge into something which one tended rather to consider as aqueous and which was borne up as an upturned bowl would be borne up on the water.

This allowed, much more than the very exact mapping out of a certain number of geographical and astronomical coordinates, a whole conception of the world. Order, the order of thoughts as of things and the order of society, being entirely inscribed in a more or less analogical, homological fashion with respect to what such a schema allowed to be marked out about the relationships of what one could call the vertical coordinates, the coordinates to the azimuth, to the equatorial coordinates. When you are in China, of course, the North Pole was placed more or less like that, like a bonnet inclined at an angle, and then the ecliptic pole - people knew perfectly well that it was different - was marked out to one side, that could lend itself to all sorts of differentiations, analogies, as I told you, of classificatory inter-knottings, of correspondences in which everyone could find his place more easily than elsewhere.

This fundamental schema - I am bringing in Chinese astronomy for you, it is an example - you will always find this fundamental schema at every level of metamorphosis in a culture, more or less enriched but obviously the same, more or (19) less dented but with the same outcomes, I mean the necessary outcomes that are more or less camouflaged, because, obviously, here one does not know what is happening, but just as at the basis of analytical experience, one can also dispense with knowing what is happening, namely where the point of suture is, the point of the suture between what I could call the outer skin of the interior, and what I could call the inner skin of the exterior.

No doubt analysis, as I told you, has taught us a certain way into the between-the-two, a certain fashion that the subject may have, in a way, of exiling himself with respect to his situation within the two spheres, the internal sphere and the external sphere, he may manage to put himself in the between-the-two, a strange place, the place of the dream and of Unheimlichkeit.

In short, if you will allow me to cut to the quick, I would say that the question is the following: "When you have once held between your hands, and this would be perhaps a reason to expand in effect the model of this bottle, this Klein bottle, you can pour water into it through the only orifice that it presents to you who are holding it like an object. It will pass here then, along this little swan's neck, and will come to lodge itself here in this between-the-two, thus realising a certain level. By the inverse operation, you can get a few mouthfuls to come out of it, you can (20) even drink from this bottle, but you will see that it is malicious, because once the water has been introduced into the inside it is not all that easy to get it all out."

Here we pass onto the plane of metaphor. What does it mean, in short, to explore the field of the dream or of the uncanny in analysis? It is to try to see what is stuck, as one might say, between the two spheres of a meaning, of a signified, which at first, of which at first the mixture there was made up. One puts some signified into circulation. It is a matter of knowing to what purpose. If we trust the that I am expecting from this little image, it ought to be to evacuate it purely and simply, it is not to put it back again in the inside. It is not in order for us to reconstruct a soul with this soul, which already encumbered us sufficiently, of this slack (ballant) which resisted like, we do not know exactly either the mode or the equilibrium or the constrictions of this emptiness, played on like an absolutely unmasterable ballast, because it is enough to complicate this figure a little bit - I leave this to your fantasy and to your imagination - for you to see that with this single condition, of inscribing some little chambers in it, one can make an instrument of particular stability, an instrument for example that it is enough to incline a tiny little bit for it to precipitate itself immediately and tip over onto the ground, the (21) objective goal of the evacuation of meaning is all the same the first aspect suggested by the aims of our experiment. Up to certain degree, how does it happen that it does not occur more easily. It is because of the deceptive properties of the figure. I will try to explain myself and make you understand what I mean on this occasion.

The figure, the Klein bottle, is drawn here precisely in a deceptive way because it is the way in which effectively the structure deceives us, it is the way in which it seems that our consciousness, that our thinking, that our power to signify, reduplicates like an internal lining what seems to envelope it, which means that all you have to do is to turn the object inside out and you will create this idea of the subject of knowledge, who for his part inversely envelops the object of the world that he proposes.

Only when I said earlier that this does not mean advancing something which is of an intuitive order, that what we have here is not at all even an outline of a new transcendental aesthetics, that I invited you to distrust the imaginative properties of what I wrongly called the model, it is because a true Klein bottle - if I may express myself in this way introducing for the first time here the word truth and at the appropriate level - a true Klein bottle does not have this shape, this shape in which (22) I draw it for you roughly, namely for clarity, in the form of a transversal section, and that, you naturally imagine, as I might say in its volume, I mean, in its roundness. You make each one of its parts revolve around itself, cylindrify itself, which allows you to see [it].

But note that a topological surface is something which requires the distinction between two kinds of these properties, the properties inherent to the surface, and the properties that it takes on from the fact that you put this surface into what is, for its part, real three-dimensional space.

In the same way, everything that can be imaged here about the fundamental meaning of the microcosm/macrocosm relationship, has sense only to the degree that the inherent subjective properties of this topology are immersed in the space of common representation, of what is usually called intersubjectivity, a word that for years I heard a certain number of people, supposedly working with me, gargling at the back of their throats, believing that they held in this word intersubjectivity the equivalent of my teaching. That it is the fact that a subject understands another subject, that a viscount encounters another viscount, that a policeman encounters another policeman, which constitutes the foundations of the mystery and the essence of psychoanalytic experience.

(23) The dimension of intersubjectivity has absolutely nothing to do with the question that we are in the process of elucidating. We can try to approach the true shape, always for your convenience, by putting it into our three-dimensional space. But you are going to see what it is going to suggest to you, about the impasses that are involved in our experience along any other path.

In its essence, what is this Klein bottle? It is quite simply something that is very close to a torus. I mean of a cylinder that you bend back so that it rejoins itself by the suture of two circular cuts which terminate, since this is a truncated cylinder, by which means you will make what is called a ring.

Instead of that, suppose that in this truncated cylinder that you are in the process of transforming into a torus, you leave the circular cut open here, but that this, the other circular cut that it is a question of suturing, you bring, as this little drawing images it for you, in such a way as to leave it open or in such a way that the suture or the stitching - you may evoke your household tasks - where the stitching is done, as one might say, from the inside, in such a way, if you wish, take the example of a sock, here the outside of the sock is going to be joined, be continuous with the inside of the other part of the sock, and the same here on the other side. You will then be able to do what? If you do not plunge it back into the three-
(24) dimensional space of common intersubjectivity, you will have something which is open and closed at the same time, because these surfaces only cross one another in the measure that you are in three-dimensional space. As regards their internal property as surfaces, there is no need to suppose that they cross one another to culminate at this stage of suture.

It is exactly the same schema as the one that I reminded you of when, representing for you the fundamental shape of a Moebius surface, which is this sort of lamina as you may picture it by taking a simple strip and tying it to itself after a simple half-turn, you could only close it by a surface which cuts itself, and if this surface does not cut itself, the Moebius surface will cross it. This is a necessity implied by the plunge into three-dimensional space, but in no way defines in itself the properties of the surface. You will tell me, we are in this three-dimensional space. Well then, in effect, let's go.

Even in three-dimensional space, it remains that this structure has a privileged quality which distinguishes it from any other and which is the following. That which comes to occupy in my schema, the circumference of this entrance, of this hole, of this orifice which specifies it and which makes of it this surface where things are not orientable because they can always go from the front to the back, the (25) place of this opening is essential, structuring, for the properties of the surface. It can be occupied by any point whatsoever of the surface, as a little bit of imagination will be enough to show you, that contrary to a ring, to a torus, which can only in a way turn upon itself, you can make it remain at the same place, but it turns in its whole fabric in a completely contrary way here, since at every place in the fabric there can be produced by a subtle slippage this ring of lack which gives it its structure.

This is not properly speaking what we are trying to consider today concerning the phenomena which, from forgetting to the proper name, the thesis is the following: everything that the theoreticians, and specifically the linguists, have tried to say about the proper name, always stumbles against the fact that, undoubtedly, it is more specially indicative, denotative, than an other, but that people are incapable of saying why. That on the other hand, it has precisely, compared to the others, this property that while being in appearance the most proper name for something particular, it is precisely what is displaced, what travels, what one bequeaths, and in a word, if I were an entomologist, what would I most desire in the world, if not one day to see a tarantula called by my name? What does that mean? Why is it that the proper name, while being supposedly this part of discourse which has the (26) characteristics which absolutely specify it, why precisely is it what one can employ, contrary to what is said on occasion - for one cannot imagine the kind of slippages of the pen such a subject has given rise to among linguists - it can be used perfectly well in the plural as everyone knows, one says the Durands, the Pommodores, anything and everything, the Brosse-à-rebours, in Courteline, you remember the Brosse-à-rebours man: the honour of the Brosse-à-rebours. One can use a name verbally, in function of verbs, in function of adjectives, indeed of adverbs as perhaps I will one day let you put your finger on.

What is this proper name in the ambiguity of this indicative function, which seems to find the compensation of the fact that its referential properties are still not specifically that they belong to the field of signification, become the properties of displacement, of a jump.

Must we say at this level, which is I believe what Claude Lévi-Strauss ends up with in his thinking, and in what he articulates at the level of the chapter on universalisation and particularisation, of the chapter on the individual as a species, in La pensée sauvage, he tries to integrate, to show, that the proper name attaches nothing more specific than the consciously classificatory usage that he gives to the categories in their opposition, so that, in thinking, in its relationship with language, (27) it determines a certain number of fundamental oppositions, of successive cross-checkings, of splits which, in a way, allow savage thinking to rediscover exactly the same method as the one that Plato gives as being the fundamental one for the creation of the concept.

And our proper name would only be, when all is said and done, inserted as the final term of this classificatory process, the one which circumscribes things closely enough to finally reach the individual as a precisely particular point of the species.

It is clear - I would ask you to refer to these chapters - that in the very movement of elucidation for which he strives, Lévi-Strauss encounters the obstacle, and that he designates it, he designates it, he designates it properly speaking in the fact that he encounters, that he encounters the function of the giver of the name. The proper name is the name that is given. By the godfather, you will say, and this in fact may be enough for you if you are resolved to make of the godfather, the someone other. Only it is not only the godfather, there are also all sorts of rules, there are phases, there is a whole configuration which is a configuration of exchange and of social structure, and it is here that Claude Lévi-Strauss will stop to say, quite correctly, that the problem of the proper name cannot be treated without introducing a reference that is foreign to the properly linguistic field, that it (28) cannot be isolated as a part of discourse outside of the function, of the usage which undoes it.

It is very precisely against this, that here I would raise an objection from another register. It is just as false to say that the proper name is here, the circumscribing, the reduction to the level of a unique example, the same mechanism by which one has preceded from the genus to the species, and through which one has advanced the classification, is just as false to do it, and just as dangerous, and just as heavy with consequences as to confuse, in the mathematical theory of sets, what is called a subset, which comprehends only a single object, with this object itself.

And it is here that those who are mistaken, who are committing errors, that those who plunge very deeply and persevere in their error, end up by becoming for us an object of proof. Bertrand Russell has identified the proper name to such an extent with the denotative and the indicative, that he finished up by saying that the demonstrative, the demonstrative "that", as he says in his tongue, is the proper name par excellence. One has to ask why he does not call this point x on the blackboard which is familiar to me, why he does not call it Anthony, for example, and this piece of chalk Honorine.

Why does this sort of result appear to us immediately to be absurd? There are many ways of leading you along the path where I want to lead you and first of all, (29) for example, the following which may immediately strike you as obvious, nobody in his right mind would think of this, because by definition, if I put this point on the board here in a mathematical demonstration, it is precisely in the measure that this point is essentially replaceable, and that is also why I would never call this piece of chalk Honorine.

On the contrary I could call by this name what Diderot called “my old dressing gown” . This is only a hint which introduces the function of the replaceable and at the same time, instead of, and for today, given the time, to make right away the leap which will allow us to articulate better, to link up the next time, I would say that it is not as an example, circumscribed as unique through a certain number of particularities, however exemplary they may seem to be, that the particular is denominated with a proper name, it is in the fact that it is irreplaceable, namely that it can be lacking, that it suggests at the level of lack, the level of the hole, and that it is it not qua individual that I am called Jacques Lacan, but qua something which may be lacking, which means that this name will be for what? To cover over another lack. The proper name, as one might say, is a movable function, and one can say that there is a share of the personnel, of the personnel of the tongue, on the occasions when it is movable (volante).

(30) It is designed to fill the holes, to be a shutter, to close it down, to give it a false appearance of suture. That is the reason, I apologise, it is too late for me to speak for very long more today, but perhaps this is only an opportunity for you, and God knows, one that is easy to take, to consult the texts, to consult the texts which concern this forgetting of the proper name.

