On what did analysis, the Freudian discovery at its beginning, on what did it put the accent? On desire. What Freud essentially discovers, what Freud apprehended in symptoms whatever they are, whether it is a question of pathological symptoms or whether it is a matter of what he interpreted in what appeared up to then as being more or less reducible to (3) normal life, namely the dream, for example, is always essentially a desire.

But even more again in dreams, for example, he speaks to us not simply of desire, but of the fulfilment of desire, and this should certainly strike us, namely that it is precisely in the dream that he talks about the satisfaction of desire. He indicates on the other hand that in the symptom itself there is indeed something which resembles this satisfaction, but the problematic character of this satisfaction already seems to me to be fairly well marked, because it is also a sort of inside-out satisfaction (satisfaction a l'envers).

Right away therefore it appears in experience that desire is linked to something which is its appearance, and to say the word, its mask, that the close link that desire as it presents itself to us in analytic experience, has with something that clothes it in a problematical fashion, is indeed what at the very least encourages us to dwell on it as an essential problem.

I underlined several times on these last occasions, the fashion in which desire in so far as it appears to consciousness, manifests itself under a paradoxical form in analytic experience, or more exactly how much analytic experience has promoted this character which is inherent in desire qua perverse desire, which is to be a sort of desire at a second degree of jpuissance of desire qua desire.

(4) In a general fashion, on the whole, all that analysis allows us to perceive about the function of desire, it is not it that discovers it, but it shows us how deeply goes the fact that human desire is not in a way implicated in a direct fashion in a pure and simple relationship with the object that it satisfies, but that it is linked to a position that the subject takes up in the presence of this object, to a position that the subject takes up outside of his relationship with the object which ensures that nothing is ever purely and simply exhausted in this relationship to the object.

On the other hand analysis is also well fitted to recall what has always been known, namely the vagabond, fleeting, ungraspable, character escaping precisely from the synthesis of the ego, that desire is, leaving to this synthesis of the ego, the outcome that it brings of being at every instant, in a way an illusory affirmation of synthesis. I recall that it is always I (moi) who desires, and who in me (moi) can only be grasped in the diversity of its desires.

Behind what we might call this phenomenological diversity, behind this contradiction, this anomaly, this aporia of desire, it is certain on the other hand that there is manifested a deeper relationship, a relationship of the subject to life, (5) a relationship of the subject, as they say, to instincts, and because it is also situated in this path of analysis that advances have made us make in the situation of the subject in relationship to his position as a living being, but precisely analysis teaches us, makes us experience behind every mediation of the realisation of the goals, of the ends of life, and perhaps also of what is beyond life, some teleology or other of primary vital ends, what Freud envisaged as a beyond of the pleasure principle, namely the last ends towards which life would be directed, which is the return to death. All of this, this analysis has permitted us, I do not say to define, but to glimpse.

It is indeed in the measure that it has also permitted us to follow on its journeyings the accomplishment of these desires.

This human desire in its profound, internal relationships to the desire of the other, had always been glimpsed, and you only need to refer to the first chapter of Hegel's Phenomenology of the Spirit, to rediscover the ways in which already a deep enough reflection would permit us to engage in this research.

The novelty that Freud introduces, the originality, the new phenomenon which allows us to throw such an essential light on the nature of desire, is in so far as over against the path that (6) Hegel takes in his first approach to desire, which of course is far from being uniquely a deductive approach as it is thought to be from outside, but which is a grasp of desire through the intermediary of the relationships of self-consciousness with the constitution of the self-consciousness in the other, and the interrogation, the question which arises: how can there be introduced through this intermediary the dialectic of life itself? Which assuredly in Hegel can only be transmitted by a sort of leap which he calls synthesis in this instance.

The Freudian experience shows us another way, and very curiously, very remarkably also, by the way that desire appears as being very profoundly linked to this relationship to the other as such, and presenting itself nevertheless as an unconscious desire.

This is the reason why it is important to put oneself on the level of what was in the experience of Freud himself, this approach to unconscious desire.

Undoubtedly, this is something that we must depict for ourselves, from the first moments at which Freud encountered this experience. We must portray it for ourselves in its character as a surprising novelty, I would not say of intuition, but rather of divination of something which already is portrayed (7) in a human experience, that of Freud, as something which appears as the apprehension of something which is beyond a mask.

We are able, now that psychoanalysis is established, that it has developed into such a widespread and such a mobile discourse, to portray it for ourselves, but we portray rather badly, what the import was of what Freud introduced when he began to read in the symptoms of his patients, in his own dreams, and when he began to introduce us to this notion of unconscious desire, this is precisely moreover what we are lacking in order to appreciate at their just value the interpretations that are presented in Freud. We are always very astonished by the character which very often appears to us in the light of what we allow ourselves by way of interpretation, and I would say in the light of what we can, and cannot any longer allow in it, as being the extraordinarily interventionist character of Freud's interpretations. One could even add, up to a certain point as the inexact character of his interpretations. Have I not pointed out to you a thousand times in connection with Dora's case for example, in connection with his intervention or his interventions in the analysis of a female homosexual whom we spoke about at length here, the degree to which Freud's interpretations, and Freud himself recognises it, were as it (8) were linked precisely to his incomplete knowledge of the psychology, for example, of homosexuals in general. The degree to which this inexact interpretation, the degree to which this interpretation linked to an insufficient knowledge that Freud had at that moment of the psychology, especially of homosexuals, but also of hysterics, is something which ensures that for us Freud's interpretations in more than one case, present themselves with a character which is at once too directive, and almost forced, with a precipitous character which in fact gives to this term of inexact interpretation (interpretation a cote), its full value.

Nevertheless it is certain that these interpretations at that time were what undoubtedly appeared as the interpretation needing to be made up to a certain point, the efficacious interpretation for the resolution of the symptom. What does that mean?

Obviously this poses a problem for us which, in order to clear the ground, we must call to mind that when Freud made interpretations of this order, he found himself before a situation which is completely different from the present situation. It must be literally realised that everything which, in a verdict-type interpretation, which leaves the lips of the analyst in so far as there is properly speaking interpretation, this verdict, what is said and proposed, given as being true, in this instance takes on its value from what is not said. I mean against what background of the unsaid is the (9) interpretation proposed?

At the time when Freud made his interpretations to Dora, when he told her for example that she loved Mr. K, that when all was said and done, he indicated to her without ambiguity that it was with him that normally she should remake her life, there was there something which surprises us, all the more because of course there could be no question of it for the best of reasons, namely that when all is said and done Dora wants to have absolutely nothing to do with it. Nevertheless an interpretation of this order at the moment that Freud made it, is presented against a background of something which, on the part of the subject, of the patient, of Dora, did not involve any sort of assumption that Freud was there to rectify, as one might say, her understanding of the world, to ensure that something in her should be brought to maturity in her relationship to the object. There was nothing yet of what one could call in this instance a sort of cultural ambiance of something which ensures that the subject expects something quite different from the lips of the analyst, that in reality Dora does not know what she is to expect, she is led by the hand and Freud says to her: "Speak!", and there is nothing else appearing in a way on the horizon, from an experience directed in this way, unless it is implicitly just by the fact that she is told to speak, that in fact there must really be something else in operation, which is of the order of the truth. The situation is far from being similar for us, when the subject already comes (10) as one might say to analysis with the notion that the maturation of the personality, of the instincts, of object relations, is something which is already organised, normativised, of which the analyst represents in a way the measure. He is in possession of ways and of secrets of some sort which already appear as a network of relationships, if not all known to the subject, whose major lines at least come to him at least in this notion that he has major lines, that a progress should be accomplished, that the arrests in his development are something which can be conceptualised, in short that a whole background, a whole implication concerning the normativisation of his person, of his instincts - you can make this embrace whatever you wish - implies that the analyst when he intervenes, intervenes in the position as they say, of judgement, of sanction. There is a still more precise word which we will indicate later.

This certainly gives quite a different import to his interpretation. But to grasp properly what is in question when I talk to you about the unconscious desire of the Freudian discovery, we must go back to those fresh times where nothing was implied about the interpretation of the analyst, unless it was this detection in the immediate behind something which appeared paradoxically as something absolutely closed, of (11) something which is beyond, and here everyone waffles on about meaning. I do not believe that the term meaning is anything else here than a type of weakening of what was in question at the beginning.

The term desire, in so far as it may be able to tie together, to assemble [what is] identical to the subject, gives all its import to what is encountered there in this first apprehension of analytic experience, and it is to this that we should go back if we are to try to gather together both the point at which we are at, and that which signifies essentially, not alone our experience, but its possibilities; I mean, that which makes it possible. It is also what should protect us as I might say on this occasion, from sliding down this slope, into this bias, I would almost say, into this trap in which we are ourselves implicated with the patient whom we introduce into an experiment full of presuppositions, to induce him to take a path which would depend in a way on a certain number of questions being begged, I mean on the idea that when all is said and done a final solution to his condition may be given which would permit him at the end of the day to become, let us say the word, entirely identical to some object or other.

Let us come back therefore to this problematical character of desire as it presents itself in analytic experience, namely in the symptom, whatever symptom it may be.

I am talking here about symptom in its most general sense, as much the morbid symptom as a dream, or whatever else may be analysable. What I call symptom, is what is analysable.

The symptom presents itself, let us say, in a masked way, presents itself under a paradoxical form: the pain of the first hysterics that Freud analyses, here is something which appears first of all in a fashion that is quite closed in appearance, and something which Freud little by little, thanks to a sort of patience which may really here be inspired by a sort of bloodhound instinct, refers back to as something which is the prolonged presence of this patient to her sick father, and the occurrence while she was caring for her father, of something else which he glimpses first of all in a sort of fog, namely the desire which was able to connect her at that moment to one of her childhood friend of whom she hoped, let us say, to make a husband, then afterwards to something which appears also in a badly clarified form, namely to her relationships with her two brothers-in-law, namely with two persons who have respectively married two of her sisters, and whom the analysis allows us to glimpse that in different forms, they represented something important for her here: one was detested for some humiliation or other, some vulgarity, some piece of male boorishness; the other (13) on the contrary who seems to have, let us say, completely seduced her. It seems in fact that the symptom was precipitated around a certain number of encounters, and from a sort of oblique meditation about the very successful relationships, of this brother-in-law with one of her younger sisters.

I take this up to fix your ideas in a sort of example.

It is clear that at this time we are at a kind of primitive epoch of analytical experience, and that we now feel after all the experiments that have been carried out subsequently, that the fact of saying, as Freud did not fail to say to the patient, that she was for example purely, in the the last case, purely and simply in love with her brother-in-law, and that it is around this repressed desire that the symptom had crystallized, namely on this occasion the pain in the leg. We sense of course, we know, that in a hysteric this has something just as forced as to have told Dora that she was in love with Mr. K.

What we see when we approach an observation like this one, is that we put our finger on, and Freud expresses the view that I have proposed to you above, there is no need to overthrow Freud's observation to reach it, because without Freud formulating the diagnosis in this way, without him discerning (14) it, he gives all its elements in the clearest fashion, I would say up to a certain point the composition of his case-study allows it to appear, beyond the words that he articulates in his paragraphs, in a fashion still infinitely more convincing than all he says, because what is he going to highlight? He is going precisely to highlight in connection with this experience of Elizabeth von R, that which according to his statement and his experience, links in many cases the appearance of hysterical symptoms to this experience so difficult in itself, of being totally devoted to helping a sick person, to playing the role of nurse, and still more to the importance that this function takes on when the role of nurse is assumed by a subject vis-a-vis one of her relatives, namely where even more because all the laws of affection, of the passion which links the carer to the cared, the subject finds herself in the position of having to satisfy more than on any other occasion, that which can be designated there with the fullest possible accent, as demand.

The total submission, the abnegation even, of the subject with respect to the demand which is imposed on her, is really given by Freud as one of the essential conditions of the situation in so far as in this instance it turns out to be hysterogenic.

This is all the more important because in this particular (15) hysteric, as opposed to others whom he also gives us as examples, the personal as well as the familial antecedents in this sense are extraordinarily evasive, unemphasised, and that in consequence the term here of hysterogenic situation takes all its weight. Besides Freud fully indicates it.

On the other hand, the thing which we can see correlatively to this condition, to which the term, which I isolate here in the middle one of these three formulae: demand-function, we will say that it is in function of this basic position that the something that is in question, and that Freud's only mistake as one might say is, drawn along in a way by the necessities of language, to orient in a premature fashion, to put the subject, to implicate the subject in too definite a fashion in this situation of desire. What is in question, is above all essentially the interest taken by the subject in a situation of desire, it is an interest which is taken, we cannot say since she is a hysteric, and now that we know what a hysteric is, we cannot say completely, from what angle she takes it, because moreover to say already from what angle she takes it, is already to imply in a relationship that one might say is all of a piece,, that she is interested in her brother-in-law from the point of view of her sister, or in her sister from the point of view of her (16) brother-in-law. The fact is precisely that we now know that what can subsist in a fashion correlative to the identification of the hysteric, is double here. Let us say that she is interested, that she is implicated, in the situation of desire, and this indeed is what is essentially represented here by a symptom, which reintroduces the notion of mask.

The notion of mask, namely that this desire in this ambiguous form which precisely does not allow us to orient the subject with respect to this or that object of the situation, is the interest of the subject in the situation as such, namely in the relationship of desire, which is expressed by this something which appears, namely what I call the element of mask of the symptom, and at least it is the case that in Freud's observation, Freud who informs us and who says in this connection that the symptom speaks in the session, the Id which I am always telling you about speaks, it is there from the first articulations of Freud, expressed in the text. Later on he said that the stomach rumblings of his patients came to make themselves heard and to speak in the session, and had the signification of words.

But here what he tells us, is that in the session itself the pains in so far as they reappear, as they become sharper, as they become more or less intolerable during the session itself, form part of the discourse of the subject, that he measures by the tone, by the modulation of his subjects, the degree of (17) weight, of importance, of revelatory value of what the subject is in the course of avowing, of expressing, in the session, the track and the direction of this track, and the centripetal direction, the progress in fact of the analysis is measured by Freud in the very modulation, in the very intensity of the fashion that the subject professes during the session a greater or lesser intensification of her symptom.

I would say therefore that we find ourselves here - and I took this example, I could just as well have taken others, I could just as well take the example of a dream - before something which allows us to centre where the problem of the symptom and of unconscious desire lies, of the link of the desire itself, in so far as the desire itself remains a question mark, an X, an enigma, to the symptom with which it clothes itself, namely with the mask, to permit us in fact to formulate the following: we are told that the symptom qua unconscious is in short something which in itself speaks up to a certain point, of which one can read, with Freud, and with Freud from the beginning, that it articulates itself. The symptom is therefore something which goes in the direction of the recognition of desire, but this symptom in so far as it is there to make this desire recognised, before Freud arrived, and therefore after him, the whole crowd of his disciples, the analysts. It is a recognition which tends (18) to come to light, which seeks to know, but which precisely because it comes to birth, only manifests itself by the creation of what we have called the mask, namely of something closed; this recognition of desire, is a recognition by no one, which is aimed at no one, because up to the moment when its key begins to be learned, no one is able to read it. It is essentially a recognition which presents itself under a form closed to the other. A recognition of desire therefore, but a recognition by no one.

And on the other hand, if it is desire for recognition, in so far as it is desire for recognition, it is something other than desire. Besides, this is what we are clearly told: this desire is a repressed desire. This is the reason why our intervention adds something more than a simple reading. This desire, is a desire which the subject excludes in so far as the subject wishes to make it recognised as a desire for recognition. It is perhaps a desire, but in the last analysis a desire for nothing. It is a desire which is not there, it is a desire which is rejected, it is a desire which is excluded.

It is this double character of unconscious desire which, by identifying it with its mask, makes of it something other than anything whatsoever that is directed towards an object. This is what we should never forget, and this is what permits us literally to read the meaning of what is presented to us as (19) being the analytic dimension of the mapping out of the most essential discoveries, when Freud speaks to us of this debasement, of this Erniedrigung, of love-life which belongs to the depths of the Oedipus complex, when he talks to us of the desire of the mother as being at the source of this for certain subjects, those precisely of whom he says that they have not abandoned the incestuous object, namely the mother, I mean that they have not abandoned it sufficiently, because in the last analysis what we learn, is that the subject never completely abandons it.

Of course there must be something which corresponds to this greater or lesser abandonment, and we call it the diagnostic fixation (diagnostico-fixation) to the mother. It is the case where Freud presents us with the dissociation of love and desire. These are the subjects who are unable, Freud tells us, to envisage approaching a woman, in so far as she enjoys for them her full status of a lovable person, of a human being, of a being in the full, completed sense that this being has, as they say, who can both give, and give herself. In this case there is no desire, therefore, in so far as the object is there, we are told, which means of course that it is there under a mask, because it is not to the mother that this desire is addressed, it is to the woman, we are told, who succeeds her, who takes her place, and then indeed there is no longer desire.

And on the other hand, Freud tells us, this subject will find (20) desire, where? With prostitutes. And what does that mean? Here of course when we are at this kind of first exploration of the darkness surrounding the mysteries of desire, we say: it is in so far precisely as it is completely the opposite of the mother.

Is that fully satisfactory, because it is precisely the opposite of the mother that he can subordinate it (?) We have since made enough progress in our knowledge of images, phantasies of the unconscious, and their characteristics, to know that what the subject is going to look for in prostitutes on this occasion, is nothing other than what Roman antiquity showed us well and truly sculptured and represented at the door of brothels, namely the phallus, the phallus in so far as it is precisely that which dwells in the prostitute.

We know now that what the subject is going to search for in the prostitute, is the phallus of all the other men, it is the phallus as such, it is the anonymous phallus. To be explicit it is also, something which is under an enigmatic form, a mask, something problematical, something which links desire with a privileged object, with something which is here in a certain relationship in the sense that we have only too well learned to see the whole importance of the phallic phase, of its defiles through which subjective experience must pass, in order that the (21) subject may rejoin his natural desire.

In short, we find ourselves, in connection with what we call in this instance desire of the mother, which is here a sort of label, of symbolic designation of something that we verify in the facts, namely the correlative and broken putting forward of the object of desire in two irreconcilable halves, and which on occasion and even in our interpretation, can propose itself as being its object, namely the substitutive object, the woman in so far as she is the inheritor of the function of the mother, finding herself dispossessed, frustrated of the element of desire, the element of desire being itself linked to something other which is extraordinarily problematical, and which presents itself also with a character of mask and of mark, with a character let us say the word, of signifier, as if precisely we were to find ourselves, once it is a question of unconscious desire, in the presence of a necessary mechanism, of a necessary Spaltung which brings it about that the desire which we knew for a long time, and which we presumed to be alienated in a quite special relationship to the other, appears here as marked not only by the necessity of this going through the other as such (ce truchement a l'autre comme tel), but of going through the other by means of the mark of a special signifier, of an elective signifier which is found here to be the necessary way to which, as one might say, the advance of the vital force of (22) desire must adhere on this occasion, and the problematical character in this instance of this particular signifier, the phallus. It is here that there is the question, it is here that we should pause, here is what is proposed in all sorts of difficulties introduced for us by the conception, the very fact of being able to conceive how it happens that we encounter on the path of what is called genital maturation, this obstacle which is not simply an obstacle, which is an essential defile which ensures that it is through the mediation of a certain position taken up with respect to the phallus, by the woman qua lack, by the man qua threatened, that what presents itself as being let us say the most successful outcome must necessarily be realized.

Therefore what we see here, is that in intervening, in naming something, we always do something more, whatever we do, whatever we think we are doing, that in interpreting, the word that I wanted to give you above, the precise word that I called authorised, sanctioned, permit above, is to homologize. We identify the same with the same; we say: "That's it"; we substitute for this person to whom the symptom is addressed in so far as it is there on the way to the recognition of desire, we still fail to see also up to a certain degree the desire which wants to make itself recognised, to the extent that to a (23) certain degree we still assign it its object, since it is not of an object that it is desire, but it is desire of this lack which in the other, designates another desire.

This introduces us to the second chapter, if you like, to a second line of what I proposed to you here in these three formulae, namely to the chapter on demand.

I think that the fashion in which I approach these things and the fashion in which I take them up again, I mean in which I try to articulate for you the originality of the desire that we are dealing with at every moment of analysis, is not in the control that we can have of it in the name of a more or less theoretical idea about the way everyone matures. I think that you should begin to understand that if I talk about the agency of the word, or of the letter in the unconscious, it is certainly not to eliminate this something irreducible, unformulatable, not to prefer the method to the discovery that we can make with it, which is desire. I simply make this remark which up to now the philosophers do not seem to have taken into account; I say it in connection with a remark which someone who was very badly inspired on that occasion took it on himself to make recently about the fact that certain psychoanalysts, as if there were a whole lot of them in this instance, gave too much importance to (24) language, in view of this famous unformulated which, I do not know why, certain philosophers have come to value as being their personal property.

I say that contrary to this formula which consisted in the person whom I qualify on this occasion as being very badly inspired, which is the least I might say about him, and which made someone say that the formula was not perhaps unformulatable, I would answer him with the following, which he would be better off paying attention to than trying to involve everyone in these internal squabbles. It is in a perspective which is quite the opposite, it is not a reason why something is not articulatable, namely desire, for it not to be articulated, I mean in itself, desire is articulated in so far as it is linked to the presence of the signifier in man, and this does not mean for all that, precisely because it is a question essentially of this link with the signifier, it is not a reason, far from it, it is even precisely the reason why in a particular case it is never fully articulatable.

Let us come back now to this second chapter which is that of the demand.

Here we are dealing with the articulated which is articulatable, with what is actually articulated. It is indeed the link between desire and demand that is in question for the moment, (25) and we will not arrive today at the end of this discourse, but the next time I want to show you how between these two terms of desire and demand, and the paradoxes which we have designated above in this desire as being essentially masked desire, to show you how this is certainly and necessarily articulated in the demand, and that it is precisely because we cannot approach it except by way of some demand, that once the patient approaches us and comes to us, it is to ask something of us, and we already go an enormously long way in terms of engaging with, of clarifying the situation by saying to him simply: "I'm listening."

So we must now start again with what we can call the premises of the demand, with what makes demand after demand, with what makes the situation of the demand, and the fashion in which it meshes into an individual life.

Here we must go back to what establishes it at the beginning. I am not going to go over again the dialectic of ".....". Demand is linked first and foremost to this something which is in the very premises of language, namely in the existence of an appeal which is at once the source of presence and the term which permits it to be rejected, the game of presence and absence, and which ensures from the first articulation through which the object is summoned, the something (26) because of which it is already more than an object, a symbol, that it becomes what desire for presence makes of it, not as is said, an object. The primary dialectic is not that of the partial object of the mother as breast, or of the mother as food, or of the mother as total object as if it were a question of a kind of conquest made little by little: the child at the breast perceives that the breast extends into an armpit, into a neck and on to hair: the object that is in question, is the symbolic bracketing of this presence within which there is the sum of all the objects that it can bring, which means that this symbolic bracketing is right away more precious than any good, and that any one of the goods that it contains, cannot in itself and all by itself satisfy what is the appeal for presence, that as I already expressed for you on several occasions, none of these good things in particular can serve, and only serves in this instance, to crush as one might say the source of this appeal, namely that the child feeds himself perhaps and begins to sleep. At that moment obviously it is no longer a question of an appeal, all the relationships to any so-called partial object whatsoever, within the maternal presence, are here only substitutes, crushings of desire, not satisfactions as such, and this, namely the primordial character of this symbolisation of the object here in so far as it is object of an (27) appeal, is here and now marked by the fact that we ourselves have also read, but as always, we do not know how to draw to their ultimate conclusions the consequences of what we read, that here and now in the object, in the object of which there is question, in the object of presence, the dimension of the mask appears.

What does our good friend, Mr. Spitz have to say, if it is not that? It is that first of all what is recognised is this kind of direct frontal, framework, this mask, and the character of beyond which characterises this presence, qua symbolised, namely of a seeking beyond for this presence, in so far as it is masked, as it is symptomatised, symbolised; it is this beyond which the child designates to us in his behaviour, that he has its dimensions, because it is sufficient. I already spoke in another connection of the very particular reaction of the child before the mask, I mean the game with the child, as I told you already: the joy that the fact of taking off the mask gives him, and this particularly anxious character of what happens if underneath the mask, another mask appears, because then he does not laugh any longer. But there is no need even to give oneself over to these sort of little exercises, it is enough to observe a child to perceive that before the word, the communication, the first communication, you would have to have never simply observed a child in his development in the first (28) months, in order not to perceive, that the first communication qua true communication, namely communication with the beyond of what you are before him as symbolised presence, is laughter. Before any word, the child laughs. He laughs when the laugh is of course linked to smiling and to relaxation, and the whole physiological mechanism of laughter is always linked to a certain satisfaction. People have spoken about this outline of a smile of the satiated child, but the child in so far as he laughs at you, laughs at you precisely in a certain relationship of course with his satisfaction of desire, but above and beyond this satisfaction, in so far as it is still present and alert, and that it is to this beyond of this presence in so far as it is capable of satisfying him, that it contains in itself something that accords with his desire, that laughter appears and that the familiar presence, the presence that he is used to and knows to be able to satisfy his desires in all their diversity, is there summoned, apprehended, recognised in this modality which is so specific, so special as are in the infant before speech, these first laughs in the presence of certain presences which look after him, which nourish him, which respond to him.

Laughter corresponds also moreover to all these maternal games which are the first exercises in which modulation, articulation as such are put before him. Laughter, in so far as precisely (29) it is linked to what I called during all the first articulations of this year's lectures, the witticism, is beyond, beyond the immediate, beyond any demand. Desire in so far as it is properly speaking linked to a signifier, in this instance the signifier of presence, it is to the beyond of this presence to the subject behind it that the first laughs are addressed, and we find there from that moment on, from the origin as one might say, the root of identification, because identification in so far as it will successively occur in the course of the development of the child with one or other person, with the mother first of all, with the father afterwards, and I am not saying that this step exhausts the question, but that we find here a root of it, identification is very exactly the correlative of this laughter, because the opposite of laughter of course is not tears. Tears express colic, express need, tears are not a communication, tears are an expression. But laughter, in so far as I am forced to articulate why, is a communication.

On the contrary, what corresponds to the opposite of laughter? In so far as laughter affirms, communicates, is addressed to the one who beyond this signified presence, is the mainspring, the source of the pleasure, the identification? It is the contrary, there is no more laughter, one is as serious as a pope or as a daddy, and one lets nothing on because the one who is (30) there and who presents you with a certain wooden expression, because no doubt it is not the time to laugh, it is not the time to laugh because at this particular time needs are not to be satisfied, desire as they say, is modelled on the one who holds the power of satisfying it, who opposes the resistance of reality, as they say, which is perhaps not quite what they say it is, but which assuredly appears here in a certain form, and to be explicit, here and now in this dialectic of demand. We see according to my old schema, being produced what is in question when the demand comes here to its right destination, namely beyond the mask, encounters here, not satisfaction, but the message of this presence, in the fashion in which the subject realises that he really has before him the source of all good, here laughter certainly explodes, and in this case the process does not need either to be continued here any longer.

But it may have to be continued further on, because the wooden expression shows that the demand has been refused, and then as I have told you, what is at the origin of this need and desire, appears here in a transformed form, the wooden expression transfers itself in the circuit to come here; moreover to a place where it is not for nothing that it is there that we encounter the image of the other, and that there is given here (31) this transformation of demand which is called the ego ideal, while, in fact on the signifying line, the source, the place is beginning to appear of what is called prohibition and super ego, of what as such articulates itself as coming from the other.

All the difficulties that analytic theory always has to reconcile the existence, the co-existence, the co-dimensionality of the ego ideal and the super ego; but they undoubtedly correspond to different formations and productions. It would be enough to make the essential distinction that there is between need and the word which demands it, to understand how these two products can be at once co-dimensional and different. It is on the line of signifying articulation, namely of prohibition, that the super ego is formulated, even in its most primitive forms, while it is in the line of the transformation of desire in so far as desire is always linked to a certain mask, that the ego ideal is produced.

In other words, the link in demand of satisfaction with the mask, of their opposition which ensures that the mask is constituted in dissatisfaction, and through the intermediary of the demand which refuses, this is the point to which I wished to lead you today. But then what would result from it? It is that there would be in fact as many masks as there are forms of dissatisfaction.

(32) Yes, this indeed is how things appear, and you will be able to guide yourself on this with certitude, that in the psychological dimension which unfolds, which is deployed starting from frustration which is so alive in certain subjects, you will be able to notice in their very declarations, this sort of relationship between dissatisfaction and the mask, which will mean that up to a certain degree, there are as many masks as dissatisfactions. This plurality of relationships of the subject to the other, according to the diversity of his dissatisfactions, is indeed here something which poses a problem, and precisely one of which one can say that up to a certain point, it will make of every personality a type of moving mosaic of identifications, and I would say that it is precisely in the intervention of the third dimension which I will leave to one side for today, which I reserve for the next time, that which is not introduced as people say it is, by genital maturation, nor the gift, nor oblativity, nor other moralising banalities which are quite secondary characteristics of the question, but by something of which we will say that there intervenes in fact from a certain moment, a desire; a desire which is not need, but which is Eros, a desire which is not autoerotic, but as they say, allo-erotic, because they are exactly ways of saying the same thing.

(33) Only it is not enough to say that, because in truth this genital maturity is not enough to bring about the subjective modifications which are going to be decisive modifications, which are going to allow us to grasp the link between desire and the mask. We will see the next time this characteristic, this essential condition which links to a prevailing, privileged signifier, which we call not by chance, but because concretely it is this signifier, namely the phallus, this level, and we will see paradoxically that it is precisely at this level that there is realised both this something which allows the subject to rediscover himself as one through the diversity of these masks, but which on the other hand makes him fundamentally divided, fundamentally marked by an essential Spaltung between what in him is desire, and what is mask.

Seminar 20; Wednesday 23 April 1958

It is a matter of continuing to deepen this distinction between desire and demand, which we consider to be so essential for the proper conduct of an analysis, and in the absence of which we believe it slides inevitably around a practical speculation based on the terms of frustration on the one hand and of gratification on the other hand, which in our eyes constitute a veritable deviation from its path.

It is a matter then of continuing in the direction of something to which we have already given a name: the distance between desire and demand. It is not some sort of Spaltung, it is not a term that I use by chance, a term which was, if not introduced, at least strongly accentuated in Freud's very last essay, the (2) one in the course of which as one might say, the pen fell from his hand, because it was simply snatched from him by death.

This Ich-spaltung as a real point of convergence towards which Freud's final meditation, as one might say led him and brought him back, is something of which we have no longer any more than a fragment, some pages which are in Volume 17 of the Gesammelte Werke.

Delusion, to stimulate in you the presence in Freud's mind of the question that it raises. You will also see there with what force he accentuates that the synthetic function of the ego is far from being the whole story when it is a question of the psychoanalytic Ich.

The last time then, to take up again what we have said, because I believe that we will not be able to progress here except by taking three steps forward and two back, and to recommence and each time to gain a little step, and I am going to try to recall all the same fairly quickly what I insisted on the last time in speaking on the one hand about desire and on the other hand about demand, namely in terms of what there is in desire of what I called its character of being bound to, of being inseparable from the mask, I illustrated it for you very especially by recalling the following: that it is an over-simplification to distinguish the symptom as being a simple underlay to something external.

(3) I spoke to you about the patient Elizabeth von R, about whom

I told you in fact that simply by reading Freud's text, one could say, and Freud says it, articulates it, that her pain high up on her right thigh, is the desire of her father, and the desire of the friend of her youth, that it is every time that she evokes in the history of her illness, the moment that she was entirely subjected to the desire of her father, to the demand of her father, and when scarcely on the margin there was being exercised this attraction of the desire of the friend of her youth which she reproached herself for taking into consideration; and that the pain in her left thigh, is the desire of her two brothers-in-law, in so far as one represents the good masculine desire, the one who had married her younger sister, and the other the bad who besides has been considered by all of these women, as a very bad man.

Beyond this remark, namely of what must be considered before understanding what our interpretation of desire means, the fact is that in the symptom, and that is what conversion means, desire is identical with the somatic manifestation which is its front just as it is its back.

On the other hand I introduced, because also if we have advanced, it is because things are only introduced in a problematical form, (4) this problematic of desire in so far as analysis shows it to us as determined by an act of signification; but that desire should be determined by an act of signification, does not at all give us its meaning in any complete sense. It may be that desire is a by-product, if I can express myself in this way, of this act of signification. In one of the articles which I quoted as being constitutive of the veritable introduction to the question of perversion, in so far as it also appears as a symptom, and not just as a pure and simple manifestation of an unconscious desire, representing for us the moment when the authors perceive that there is just as much Verdrangung in a perversion as in a symptom; in one of these articles published in the International Journal, Volume 4 "Perversion and Neurosis", there is question of the case of a neurotic subject, and the author dwells on this fact that a subject, after having satisfactorily achieved his first act of intercourse, does not mean that other things will not subsequently happen, but immediately after this first act of intercourse he carries out this mysterious, really unique act: coming home, returning from the house of the lady who has accorded him her favours, he gives himself over to this particularly successful exhibition - I think moreover I already alluded to it in one of my seminars - particularly successful in this sense that it is carried out with (5) the maximum of completeness, and on the other hand of security: he takes down his pants and exhibits himself along a railway track, and in the light of a passing train he finds himself thus able to exhibit himself to a whole crowd without, of course, running the slightest risk, and this act is interpreted by the author in the general economy of the neurosis of the subject, in a more or less successful way.

I am not going to develop this side of things, but I am going to pause at something which is the following: that this, for an analyst, is what is called a signifying act, is sure and certain, but what is its signification? What does it mean to say that it even has one?

I repeat that he had just copulated for the first time. What does it mean that he still puts at everyone's disposition, what has now, as it were, become his personal property? What does he mean in a way by showing it? Does he wish by showing it to efface himself behind what he shows, to be no longer anything more than the phallus?

All of this is equally plausible, and even within one single act, one single subjective context, that which appears here to be extremely important and worth accentuating, I would say more than anything else, and that it is well underlined, confirmed by the statements of the patient, by the context of the observation, even by what subsequently happens, that this first coitus was (6) completely satisfying.

What the act in question shows first and foremost, before any other interpretation, is that he has had and has realised his satisfaction; this act indicates what is left over to be desired beyond satisfaction.

I simply recall this little example to fix your ideas on what I mean, on the problematic of desire in so far as it is determined by an act of signification, and in so far as it is distinct from any meaning that can be grasped. I also wish to recall in this connection, and to add it to what I said the last time, that considerations of this kind, those which show the profound coherence, coalescence of desire with the symptom, the mask, with what appears in its manifestation, is something which puts in their place, many useless questions that are always being asked about hysteria, but much more about all sorts of sociological, ethnographical and other facts, where one always sees people getting completely confused about the question.

Let us take an example. There has just appeared an excellent booklet as a number in a small little collection: L'homme, which is published by Plon. It is a book by Michel Leiris on the effect of possession and on the theatrical aspects of possession, something that he develops in terms of his experience among the (7) Ethiopians of Gondar. In reading this excellent volume, one sees how well trance events of an incontestable consistency, go along with, are perfectly married with a certain externally typified, determined, expected, located in advance, known, character of "spirits" who are thought to do away with the subjectivity of the persons who manifest all these singular manifestations, who observe the ceremonies which are called , because this is what is in question in the country we are talking about, and much more, that this is not simply that conventional part which can be noticed, which is manifested, which is reproduced in connection with the manifestation of the incarnation of this or that spirit. It is the disciplined character of these manifestations, and up to a certain point so disciplined, that the subjects perceive it as something which is a training of the spirits, who are nevertheless the ones who are thought to be taking them over. But matters are reversed: these spirits are in fact trained to conduct themselves properly.

The phenomenon of possession, with all that it involves in terms of phenomena powerfully inscribed in the emotions, in a whole passivity in which the subject is entirely possessed throughout the time of the manifestation, is perfectly compatible with this whole richness linked to the insignia of the god, of the spirit, (8) and which create in only a completely artificial way, a sort of problem which our mentality might try to situate as a type of simulation, imitation, or other terms of this kind. The very identity of the desiring manifestation with these forms, is quite tangible there.

The other point, the other term in which there is inscribed this dialectic, this problematic of desire, is that on which on the contrary I insisted the last time, it is this eccentricity of desire with respect to any satisfaction, which allows us to understand what in general is its profound affinity with pain. This is to say that at the limit, that which desire purely and simply approaches, no longer in its developed forms, in its masked forms, but in its pure and simple form, is this pain of existence which represents the other pole, the space we might say of the interior area from which its manifestation appears to us.

At the opposite therefore of this problematic, in describing thus what I call the area of desire, its eccentricity with respect to satisfaction, in describing it thus I do not claim of course to resolve it, it is not an explanation that I am giving here, it is a positioning of the problem, and this indeed is what we have to go further into today.

I recall on the other hand the other element of the diptych, of (9) the opposition which I proposed the last time, it is the one which is linked to the character of the identifying function, the idealizing function in so far as it is found to depend on the dialectic of the demand, in so far as the identification of everything which happens in this register, is based on a certain relationship to the signifier, in the other signifier here which is in general characterized, and in connection with the demand, as being the sign of the presence of the other, and how there is also established there something which must be related to the problem of desire, which is the way in which this sign of presence comes to dominate the satisfactions that this presence brings, the way it comes about that the human being so fundamentally pays with fine words (se paye de paroles), in such a widespread, constant fashion, just as much or at least as much in a tangible, very measured proportion compared to the more substantial satisfactions, there is simply recalled the fundamental characteristic which refers to what I have just recalled.

Does that mean moreover that it is only human beings? Here again a supplementary parenthesis to what I said the last time: it is absolutely not just the human being who pays with words.

To a certain degree, we know that certain domestic animals, and it is not false to think this way, have some satisfactions linked (10) to human speech. I do not need to evoke things here, but we do learn some strange things. It seems to have the degree of credibility that one can give to the statements of those who are called, in a more or less appropriate fashion, specialists. I have been told that mink who are kept in captivity for money, namely for the profit that can be gained from their fur, grow sickly and only give fairly mediocre products to the furriers if they are not spoken to. This apparently makes the rearing of mink very onerous and increases its costs.

It would seem therefore that in any case something is manifested here whose problematic we do not have the means of getting any further into either, but which certainly must be linked to the very fact of their being enclosed, because mink in their wild state do not, to all appearances, have the possibility, as far as we know, of encountering this sort of satisfaction.

To be explicit, I would simply like to indicate the relationship, the direction in which we can see in relationship to our problem, the Pavlovian studies of conditioned reflexes. In the last analysis, what are conditioned reflexes?

In their most widespread forms, those which are the most widely experienced, conditioned reflexes are the intervention into a (11) cycle which is more or less predetermined, innate, a cycle of instinctive behaviour. All these little electric signals, these little bells, these little ringings with which one deafens these little animals, to succeed in making them secrete to order their different physiological productions, their gastric juices, are all the same signifiers, and nothing else. They are fabricated by humans. In every case, the experimenters, for whom the world is quite clearly constituted by a certain number of objective relationships, among which those one can justly isolate as properly signifying, constitute a large part of this world.

In addition, moreover, it is with the purpose of showing along what kind of way, of progressive substitution, psychical progress is conceivable, that all these things are constructed and elaborated.

Up to a certain point, one could ask the question why, when all is said and done, this does not amount to teaching these animals who are so well trained a certain type of language. It is not the only thing that deserves to be noticed, it is precisely that the leap is not made, and that when the Pavlovian theory comes to take cognisance of what appears in man in connection with language, he/it (Pavlov or the theory), takes the very correct (12) approach of talking about language, not as the prolongation of the system of significations as it is put into operation in conditioned reflexes, but as a second system of significations, namely of implicitly recognising what is perhaps not fully articulated in the theory, but of recognising that there is something different between one and the other. And what is different, we will say that we can try to define this distinction, this difference in the fact that it must be situated in what we call the relationship to the big Other, in so far as this constitutes the locus of a unitary signifying system, or again we would say that what is lacking in this discourse of signals, is concatenation for the subject who is involved, that is to say for the animal.

When all is said and done, what would formulate it simply, we would announce it in this form of saying that in fact, no matter how far these experiments are taken, what is not found, and perhaps what there is no question of finding, is the law under which these signifiers which are brought into play, are ordered, and which amounts to saying that it is the law which in the long run animals obey.

It is quite clear in fact that there is no trace of a reference to such a law, namely to anything which is beyond a signal, or (13) that from a short chain of signals once established, no sort of legalizing extrapolation, is perceptible in it, and this is indeed why one can say that one never succeeds in establishing the law. I repeat: this is not to say for all that that there is no dimension of the Other with a capital O for the animal. Nothing is effectively articulated within qua discourse.

Therefore what we arrive at, if we resume what is in question in the relationship of the subject to the signifier in the other, namely what happens in the dialectic of the demand, is essentially that which characterises the signifier, not as substituted, which is the case in conditioned reflexes, as substituted for the needs of the subject, but the signifier itself as being able to be substituted for itself, as being essentially of a substitutive nature, and it is in this direction that we see the dominance of what is involved, namely the place which it occupies in the Other. What we see pointing in this direction, is what I try to formulate here in different ways as essential to the signifying structure, namely this topographical not to say typographical space, which constitutes precisely the law of its substitution, this numbering of places, these numbered places which give the fundamental structure of a signifying system as such.

(14) It is to the degree that the subject, it is in so far as he senses his presence within a world thus structured in the position of the Other, that this something - it is a fact highlighted by experience - which is called identification, is produced. It is to the degree that in the absence of satisfaction, it is to the subject who can accede to the demand that the subject identifies himself.

I left you the last time, posing the question: Then why is there not the greatest multiplicity of identifications? As many identifications as there are unsatisfied demands? As many identifications as there are others who pose themselves in the presence of the subject as being the one who responds or does not respond to the demand?

The key to this distance, to this Spaltung which is here found reflected by the construction of this little schema which I put on the blackboard for you today for the first time, and which constitutes something which we should discover in the three lines which I already repeated for you twice. I think that you have them in your notes, but I can recall them to you namely the line which links the little d of desire on one side, through the intermediary of this relationship of the subject to little o, to the image of o and to e, that is to say the ego; the second line representing precisely the demand, in so far as it goes from demand to identification, passing through the position of the (15) Other with respect to desire, which means that you see here the Other being decomposed in so far as it is beyond it that desire exists, and in passing by way of the signified of the Other which at this level would be placed here, I mean in a first stage of the schema which was the one that I made for you the last time, that is to the fact that it only corresponds to demand, and which precisely, because of something which is what we are searching for in a second moment, is going to be divided in this relationship which is not single, but double, which I moreover already began in other ways, in two signifying chains: the first which is here when it is alone and single at the level of demand, being here in so far as it is a signifying chain through which demand has to reveal itself. Something else is going to intervene which doubles this signifying relationship, it is this doubling of the signifying relationship, in so far as you can for example, among other things, but naturally not in a univocal fashion, identify it, as has been done up to present, with the response of the mother.

As far as the lower line goes, that is to say as regards what happens in short at the level of demand, at the level where the reply of the mother lays down the law all by itself, namely in fact submits the subject to her arbitrariness, the other line representing the intervention of another agency corresponding to (16) the maternal presence and to the way in which its function makes itself felt beyond the mother, and of course it is not so simple, and if everything in fact was a question of Mammy and Daddy, I can scarcely see how we could account, at least for the facts with which we have to deal.

It is therefore to the question of this Spaltung which is purely and simply that which is identical, responsible for this gap between desire and demand, for this discordance, for this divergence which is established between desire and demand, that we are now going to be introduced, and that is why we must once again come back to pose again the question of what a signifier is.

I know that every time we part you ask yourselves: "What, when all is said and done, is he trying to say?" You are right to ask yourselves that, because undoubtedly if it is not said like that, it is not something of any great interest.

Let us take up the question of what a signifier is at the elementary level.

I propose that you should let your thoughts dwell on a certain number of remarks. For example do you not believe that we are touching here something which is at least some example or other, something perhaps in connection with what one could call (17) emergence? If we notice what is specific in the fact, not of a trace, because a trace is a imprint, it is not a signifier, one senses however that there could be a connection, and that in truth what one calls the material of the signifier always participates a little bit in the fleeting character of the trace. This seems to be one of the conditions for the existence of this signifying material. This however is not a signifier, even the footprint of Friday which Robinson Crusoe discovers during his walk around the island, is not a signifier, but on the contrary, if we suppose that he, Robinson, for whatever reason, effaces this trace, there we clearly introduce the dimension of signifier. It is from the moment that one effaces, where it has a meaning to efface it, that the something which is a trace is clearly constituted as signified.

One sees in effect that if here the signifier is a melting pot (creuset) in so far as it bears witness to a presence that is past, and that inversely in what is signifying, there is always in the fully developed signifier which the word is, there is always a passage, namely something which is beyond each one of the elements which are articulated, and which are of their nature fleeting, vanishing, that it is the passage from one to the other which constitutes the essential of what we call the signifying chain, (18) and that this passage qua vanishing, is this very thing which can be trusted (qui se fait foi).

I do not even say signifying articulation. It may be that it is an articulation which remains enigmatic, but that that which sustains it can be trusted; it is also at this level that there emerges what corresponds to what we have first of all designated in the signifier as testifying to a presence which is past inversely in a real passage which manifests itself, it is something which deepens it, which is beyond and which can be trusted.

In fact there again what we rediscover, is that just as after it is effaced, what remains, if there is a text, namely if this signifier is inscribed among other signifiers, what remains, is the place where it has been effaced, and it is indeed this place also which sustains the transmission, which is this essential thing thanks to which that which succeeds it in the passage takes on the consistency of something that can be trusted.

There we are really only at the level and at the point of emergence, but a point that is essential to grasp: that which ensures that the signifier as such, is something that can be effaced, which leaves nothing more than its place, that is to say that one can no longer find it. The fact is that this property which is essential, and which means that if one can speak about emergence, one cannot speak about development. In reality the (19) signifier contains it in itself. I mean that one of the fundamental dimensions of the signifier, is to be able to cancel itself out. There is a possibility for this which we can in this instance qualify as a mode of the signifier itself, and which is materialised by something very simple and which we all know, and whose originality we cannot allow to be dissimulated by the triviality of usage, it is the bar. Every signifier of any kind is of its nature something which can be barred.

There has been a lot of talk, ever since there are philosophers who think, about the Aufhebung, and they have learned to make use of it in a more or less cunning way. This word means both cancellation, and essentially this is what it means: for example I cancel my subscription to a newspaper, or my reservation somewhere; it also means, thanks to an ambiguity of meaning which makes it precious in the German language, to raise to a higher power or situation. It does not seem to me that sufficient attention is paid to the following, that to be able properly speaking to talk about being cancelled, there is only properly speaking only one kind of thing, I would say roughly speaking, which can be, that is a signifier, because to tell the truth, when we cancel anything else, whether it is imaginary or real, it is simply because strictly speaking in doing so, and by that very (20) fact, we not only cancel what is in question, we raise it by a grade, to the qualification of signifier.

There is therefore within the signifier, in its chain and in its manoeuvring, in its manipulation, something which is always capable of stripping it of its function in the line or in the lineage. The bar is a sign of bastardy by stripping it as such, by reason of this properly signifying function, of what we will call general consideration. I mean of that in which in the given of the signifying battery, in so far as it constitutes a certain system of available signs, and in an actual, concrete discourse, the signifier falls out of the function which constitutes its place which I extracted from this consideration or constellation which the signifier institutes by applying itself to the world, by punctuating it, and that from there it falls from consideration into designation, namely that it is marked precisely by the fact that it leaves something to be desired.

I am not playing with words to amuse myself. I simply mean by this use of words, to indicate for you a direction along which we get closer to this link between the signifying manipulation of our object which is that of desire, and its opposition between consideration and desideration marked by the bar of the signifier, being here of course only destined to indicate a direction, a beginning.

(21) This of course does not resolve the question of desire, whatever may be the economy to which this conjunction of two terms in the Latin etymology of the word desire in French lends itself. It remains that it is properly speaking in so far as the signifier presents itself as cancelled, as marked by the bar, that we have properly speaking, what can be called a product of the symbolic function, produced in so far precisely as it is isolated, as it is distinct from the general chain of the signifier and of the law that it institutes. It is only from the moment that it can be barred, that any signifier whatsoever has its proper status, namely that it enters into this dimension which ensures that in principle every signifier, to distinguish here what I mean, comes from the cancelling which is so essential.

The term employed in Freud is in quite funny places where no one seems to have gone to the trouble of locating it. As well as that if all of a sudden it is Freud who uses cancellation, that does not mean it has the same resonance. In principle every signifier can be revoked. So that something results once we have made these remarks which are the following, namely that for everything that is not signifier, namely in particular on this occasion for the real, the bar becomes one of the surest and the (22) shortest modes of its elevation to the dignity of signifier, and this I already pointed out to you in an extremely precise manner in connection with the phantasy of the beaten child when I pointed out to you that in the second stage of the evolution of this phantasy, namely the one that Freud points out as having to be reconstructed, and as having never been perceived, except from an angle and in exceptional cases, this sign which at the first stage was that of the humiliation of the hated brother, namely that he was beaten by the father.

In the second moment, and when it is a question of the subject herself, it becomes on the contrary the sign that she is loved, she, the subject, accedes in fact to the the order of love, to the state of being loved, because she is beaten, which all the same poses us a problem given the change of meaning that this action has taken on in the interval, and this is not properly speaking conceivable except in the case precisely where this same act which, when it is a question of the other, is taken as a punishment and is perceived as such by the subject as the sign that the other is not loved, when it is the subject who becomes its support at a certain given moment of her position with respect to the other, this act takes on its essential value, and through its function as signifier, it is because it is in the measure that in this act the subject herself is found raised to this dignity of signifying subject, that she is caught up at that (23) moment in its positive register, in its inaugural register, it establishes her properly speaking as a subject with whom there can be a question of love.

This is what Freud - we must always come back to Freud's phrases, they are always absolutely lapidary - in "Some psychical consequences of the anatomical distinction between the sexes", expresses: "The child who is thus beaten becomes loved, appreciated on the plane of love" (Das Kind, das da geschlagen - geliebt wird..... " GW XIV 26; cf. SE XIX 254). And it is precisely at this moment, namely in this article that I am talking to you about, that Freud introduces the remark which was simply implicit in: "A child is being beaten", namely what I began by an analysis of the text, but which Freud formulates there quite literally, he formulates it absolutely without motivating it, but orienting it with this type of prodigious flair which is his, and which is all that is in question in this dialectic of the recognition of this beyond of desire. He says:

"The peculiar rigidity which struck me so much in the monotonous formula a child is being beaten' can probably be interpreted in a special way: the child who is beaten here is because of this fact appreciated." (ibid.)

In this study he is dealing with little girls, and what Freud recognises by this Starrheit, the word is very difficult to translate in French because it has an ambiguous meaning in German, it means both fixed in the sense of a fixed stare, and (24) rigid. It is not absolutely related, even though what we have here is a contamination of two meanings, they have an analogy in history, and this is what is in question, it is a question for us of seeing indicated here this something whose place I already marked for you as a knot which it is now a matter of untying, namely this relationship that there is between the subject as such, the phallus here as problematical object, and the essentially signifying function of the bar, in so far as it comes into play in the phantasy of the beaten child.

For this it is not sufficient for us to be content with this clitoris which in so many respects, leaves much to be desired. It is a matter of seeing why it is in a certain position, is so ambiguous that in the long run, if Freud recognises it in what is beaten, in this instance the fact is that the subject on the contrary does not recognise it as such. It is a question of the phallus in so far as it occupies a certain place in the economy of the development of the subject, in so far as it is the indispensable support for this subjective construction, in as much as it pivots around the castration complex and the Penisneid, and it is now a matter of seeing how there comes into play in this relationship, this hold, this grip of the signifier on the subject, or inversely of what is meant by this signifying (25) structure whose essential terms I have recalled here.

For this it is appropriate for us to dwell for a moment on what in the last analysis is the mode under which the phallus can be considered. Why do we talk about the phallus, and not purely and simply about the penis? Why moreover do we effectively see it as something different to the mode in which we make the phallus intervene? The fashion in which the penis succeeds in supplying for it in a more or less satisfactory fashion, both for the masculine subject and for the feminine subject, is a different matter. Also in what measure is the clitoris on this occasion involved in what we can call the economic functions of the phallus?

Let us look at what the phallus, the phallos, originally is. The place where we see it attested for the first time in the texts, is namely in Greek antiquity, where, if we go to look for the texts where they are, in different parts of Aristophanes, of Herodotus, etc., we see first of all that the phallus is in no way identical to the organ as an appurtenance of the body, a prolongation, a member, a functional organ as one might say; the phallos, this is the fashion which dominates by far, is employed in connection with a simulacrum, with an insignium, whatever the mode in which it is presented, whether it is a question of a (26) raised staff from which the virile organs are appended, or a question of an imitation of the virile organ, whether it is a question of a piece of wood, of a piece of leather, or of a series of varieties in which it is presented, it is something which is a substitutive object and at the same time it has the property that this substitution is in a way very different from substitution in the sense we have just heard about it, from sign substitution. One could say that almost and up to including the usage of this substitution, it has all the characters of a real substitute, this type of object that we call on in good stories, and always with more or less of a smile, which treat of the most singular objects as one might say, by the remarkable character that there is in human industry. It is all the same something which we cannot but take into account as regards its existence and its very possibility.

The lisbos in Greek is often confused with the phallos. In short, what is striking in the very special function of this object which, for the ancients, beyond any doubt, played the role in the mysteries, of the object around which as one might say, there was placed, and also it seems, to such a point that initiation lifted the last veils, namely of an object which for the revelation of meaning, was considered as a final significant (27) character.

Does not all of this put us on the right path of what is in question, namely that in short this prevalent economic role of the phallus as such, namely as that which represents in fact desire in its most manifest form?

I would oppose it term by term to what I said about the signifier which is essentially hollow, that it is fully introduced into the world. Inversely what is manifested in the phallus is that which in life is manifested in the purest fashion as tumescence, as growth, and we really feel the image of the phallus at the very basis of all the terms we use, which means for example that in French it is under the form of pulsion that the German term Trieb was able to be translated, this privileged object, as one might say, of the world of life, which moreover in its Greek appellation is linked to everything which is of the order of flux, of sap, even of luck itself, because it seems that there is the same root in and in phallos. It seems therefore that things are so arranged that the most manifest, the most manifested point of desire in its vital appearances, is precisely what finds itself unable to enter into the arena of the signifier, except as one might say by unleashing the bar in it. Everything that is of the order of intrusion, of the vital surge (28) as such, will find itself, in the measure that it comes to a point here, maximised in this form or in this image, will be something - this is what experience shows us, all we are doing here is reading it - which inaugurates as such everything which presents itself, either as connotation of an absence where it does not have to be, because it is not, namely that which makes the human being who does not have the phallus be considered as castrated, and inversely which for the one who has something which can claim to resemble it, as menaced by castration.

Effectively because I am alluding to the ancient mysteries, it is quite striking to see that on the murals, the rare frescoes that we have conserved in a remarkable integrity, those of the Villa of Mysteries at Pompeii, it is very precisely just beside the place where there appears the unveiling of the phallus that there arise represented with a very impressive size, these life size personages, these sort of demons that we can identify through a certain number of overlaps. There is one on a vase in the Louvre, and in some other places. These demons, winged, booted, not helmeted, but almost, and in any case armed with a flagellum, are beginning to apply the ritual punishment to one of the (29) aspirants, the initiates who are in the image, namely give rise to the phantasy of flagellation in its most direct form, in the most immediate connection with the unveiling of the phallus.

It is also quite clear, that by all sorts of tests, of attestations which are brought to us by an experience which is not proven, and which does not demand any kind of investigation into the depths of the mysteries, that in the ancients cults, it is in the very measure that one approaches the cult, namely the signifying manifestation of the fruitful potency of the great goddess, that everything which refers to the phallus is the object of amputations, of marks of castration, or of more and more accentuated prohibitions, the eunuch character of the priests of the great goddess, the Syrian goddess, being one of the most recognised, established things in all sorts of texts.

It is in so far therefore as the phallus finds itself situated, always covered by something which is castration, the bar put on its accession to the signifying domain, namely on its place in the Other with a capital O, something by which in development, castration is introduced. It is never - observe it directly in the case histories - by way of the prohibition on masturbation for example. If you read the case of little Hans, you will see (30) that the first prohibitions have no effect on him. If you read the story of Andre Gide, you will see that his parents struggled for all his early years to stop him doing it, and that Professor Brouhardel, showing him the big needles and the big knives that he had, because it was already the fashion among doctors to surround themselves with impressive implements, promised him that if he began again, it would be cut off. And the young Gide reports very clearly that he did not believe for a single instant in such a threat, because in fact it seemed to him to be exaggerated, in other words, nothing other than the episodic manifestation of the phantasies of Professor Brouhardel himself.

This is not what is in question at all. As the texts and the case studies also indicated to us, it is in so far as the one being in the world, after all on the plane of reality, who would have the least reason to be presumed to be castrated, namely the one who had the occasion to be, that is the mother, it is nevertheless from this angle, namely at the level of the Other, at the place where castration manifests itself in the Other, where it is the desire of the other which is marked by the signifying bar of capital $ here, it is along this path essentially that for men just as for women, there is introduced the specific thing which functions as complex of castration.

(31) When we spoke about the Oedipus complex at the beginning of the last trimestre, I stressed this by putting it in the form that first and foremost the first person to be castrated in the intra-subjective dialectic, is the mother. It is there that the position of castration is first encountered, it is because of this, that in accordance with destinies which are different for men and for women, in the little girl because castration is first of all encountered in the Other, that the little girl first links up this perception with what the mother has frustrated her of, namely that at first it is in the form of a reproach to the mother that what is perceived in the mother as castration is therefore also like a castration for her. It is in the mode of this recrimination, which comes to be added to the other antecedent frustrations, that the castration complex - Freud insists on it - first appears in the girl.

And it is because the father only comes here in the position of replacement for what she finds herself first of all frustrated of, that she goes on to the level of the experience of privation. It is because already it is at the symbolic level that there appears the real penis of the father which we are told she expects as a substitute for what she has perceived she is frustrated of, that we can talk at that moment of privation, and (32) the crisis that this privation engenders, and the choice that it offers to the subject of renouncing, either her object, namely the father, or her instincts, namely to identify herself with the father.

From this there results a curious consequence: it is that the penis, precisely because it has been introduced into the castration complex of the woman in this form of symbolic substitute, is at the source in women of all sorts of conflicts of the type that are called conflicts of jealousy, or again of the infidelity of the partner. This is experienced as a real privation, I mean with an accent completely different from what the same conflict can represent seen from the man's side.

I am passing quickly over this, I will come back to it, but there is one thing that we must see, it is that if the phallus is found under the barred form in which it has its place as indicating the desire of the Other, everything that follows in our development is going to show us how the subject is going to have to find her place as desired object with respect to this desire of the Other, and in consequence it is always, as Freud indicates in connection with his remarkable insight on "a child is being beaten", it is always in so far as she has not the phallus, that the subject must, when all is said and done, be situated, that she will find her identification as subject, in so (33) far - as we will see - as the subject is as such herself a subject marked by the bar.

This is manifested in a clear fashion in the woman the incidences on whose development with respect to the phallus I approached today by a simple indication. The fact is that in fact the woman - the man also indeed - finds herself caught in an insoluble dilemma which is the one around which there must be placed all the typical manifestations of femininity, neurotic or not. It is as I indicated to you, in terms of finding her satisfaction, namely first of all the man's penis, then afterwards by substitution the desire for the child. This is classical. I am only indicating here what is commonplace in analytic theory.

What does that mean? It is that, when all is said and done, to rediscover such a deepseated, such a fundamental satisfaction as maternity - just as exigent indeed, just as instinctual - the fact is that she only finds what satisfaction is along the paths of the substitutive line. It is in as much, I would say, as the penis is first of all a substitute, I would go as far as to say a fetish, then afterwards that the child also from a certain angle is a fetish, that the woman rejoins what is, let us say, her instinct and its natural satisfaction.

Inversely, for everything that is on the line of her desire, she finds herself bound to the necessity implied by the function of (34) the phallos, to be, to a certain degree that is variable, but to be this phallos, in so far as it is the very sign of what is desired, and it is indeed effectively to this that there correspond , which are the function of the phallos, that which in what is considered as properly speaking femininity, and the whole exhibitionist phase, namely the way in which the woman proposes herself as object of desire, everything that in the feminine function, to the degree that she exhibits herself and proposes herself as object of desire, identifies her in a latent and secret fashion to the phallos, namely in fact situates her being as subject as desired phallos, as signifier of the desire of the Other, situates this being, beyond what can be called the feminine masquerade, because, when all is said and done, everything that she shows of her femininity is precisely linked to this profound identification to a signifier which is the most closely linked to her femininity.

We see appearing there the role and the root of what one can call in the completion of the subject along the path of the desire of the Other, her profound Verwerfung, her profound rejection qua being, of that in which she appears as properly speaking in the feminine mode. Her satisfaction therefore passes along a substitutive path, and her desire manifests itself on a plane where it can only end up with a profound Verwerfung, at a (35) profound estrangement from her being, from the way in which she must appear.

You should not believe that for man the situation is any better. It is even more comic. He, the poor unfortunate, has the phallos, and it is in fact knowing that his mother does not have it which traumatises him, because then since she is much stronger, where are we going to end up? It is there, in this primitive fear of women, that Karen Horney showed one of the most essential sources of the disturbances of the castration complex. Just as the woman was caught in one dilemma, the man is caught in another. It is along the line of satisfaction that the masquerade is established for him, because in the last analysis he will resolve the question of the danger which threatens what he effectively has, by what we know well, namely the pure and simple identification with the one who has its insignia, with the one who to all appearances has escaped the danger, namely the father, and, when all is said and done, the man is never virile except by an indefinite series of proxies: these come to him from all his grandparents and from all his ancestors, passing through the direct ancestor.

But inversely, along the line of desire, namely in so far as he has to find his satisfaction from a woman, he too will search for the phallos, and we have all the clinical and other testimonies (36) - I will come back to it the next day - and it is precisely because this phallos, is not found by him where he searches for it, that he searches for it everywhere else.

In other words, the symbolic penis for the woman is within, as one might say, the field of her desire, whereas for man it is outside it; this in order to explain to you why men in a relationship always have centrifugal tendencies.

It is to the degree therefore, that in the last analysis she is not herself, to the degree that she is in the field of her desire, namely in so far as in the field of her desire she must be the phallos, that the woman will experience the Verwerfung, that the subjective identification of the one who produces at the level of the second line, that which ends there in a delta; and it is in so far as he is not himself either, in so far as he satisfies, namely that he provides the satisfaction of the other, that man finds himself in love outside his other. Therefore it is in so far, I would say, as he perceives himself only as instrument of satisfaction, and this is the reason that, when all is said and done, the problem of love is the problem of this profound division that it introduces within the activities of the subject, it is always because what is in question, according to the very definition of love, is to give what he does not have, it (37) is for man, to give what he does not have to a being who does not have what he does not have, namely who does not have the phallus.

Seminar 21; Wednesday 7 May 1958

We are going to begin from the current event which those of you who were present last night at the scientific communication of the Society were able to appreciate. You heard an address on the subject of the heterosexual relationship.

This is just what I also am going to try to speak about.

The heterosexual relationship showed itself in this perspective as essentially formative. It was in brief a primary given of the evolutionary tension between the parents and the child.

The thing which appears in another perspective, which is exactly my point of departure, and is without any doubt in conformity with a primary experience, is that it is just that which is in question: is the heterosexual relationship between human beings something simple?

In truth, if we hold with our experience, it does not appear to be. If it were simple, it seems that it would at least be (2) capable of constituting within the human world a series of islands of harmony, at least for those who would have managed to remove the unpleasant briars from it. It does not seem that up to the present we can consider that there is unanimity on the part of analysts, and after all is there any need to invoke analysts on the question, that even when it has arrived at its fullness, the heterosexual relationship for man presents itself as something , because precisely its whole problem, the least that can be said - take the writings of Balint for example, which are fairly well centred on it since it is in the very title of the collection on Genital Love - revolves around this. There is attested the coexistence of an altogether terminal Spaltung, the juxtaposition of the current of desire and the current of tenderness. It is in terms of this juxtaposition that the whole problem of the heterosexual relationship is composed.

This does not take away the interest of what was said to us last evening, far from it, if it were only for the terms of reference which were employed, and for example of this aesthetic condition, this conscious and aesthetic valorisation, to take up the terms of the lecturer, which constitute a fundamental stage according to her perspective, in the oedipal relationship.

His sexual organ, his symbol appears, Madame Dolto told us, as a (3) beautifully proportioned form (une belle et bonne forme). The sexual organ is beautiful, she added. What we have here obviously is a perspective of the person who is speaking, which is certainly very flattering for the bearers of this male sexual organ. At any rate one which it does not seem to be a datum that we can adopt in a univocal fashion, I mean if we refer to all the reservations of one of the people who intervened, with authority, on this subject, who gave us the benefit of what one can call ethnological observations, all the same if we refer to the savages, to the good savages who are always a reference point for anthropologists, it does not really seem that it is a primary datum, if indeed this savage is the first example of this beautifully proportioned form of the phallus. To tell the truth, all the the documents - I am not talking about learned documents, about the things that are afterwards elaborated in the ethnographer's office, but about the experience that one can find in those ethnographers who have been in the field, who have been among these so-called savages, whether good or bad - it seems precisely that it is really a foundation and a principle of the relationships between the sexes, even in the most backward tribes, that at least the erection of the phallus is hidden. The existence, even among the tribes which only possess the most primitive style of dress, (4) of something which consists precisely in hiding the phallus, of the cache-sexe for example, sometimes demonstrated by the general public as the strict residue of what remains as clothing, is something quite striking.

On the other hand, a good number of ethnographers have testified to the sort of irritation that persons of the female sex experience in the presence of manifestations concerning the erection of the phallus as being a really primary reaction. For example in the very rare cases where no clothes at all are worn - among the Nambikoina whom as you know our friend Lévi-Strauss visited on many occasions, and about whom he has spoken at length - Lévi-Strauss testified to this when I questioned him on this matter - and moreover what I am telling you now reflects what was said and what he himself says in his book - that he never observed in front of the group, and in a fashion that he himself could see, an erection in the male. Sexual relations take place without any special concealment, a couple of feet from the group, in the evening around the camp fire, but erection, either during the day, or at that time, is not seen in public, and does not appear.

This is not altogether a matter of indifference for our subject.

On the other hand this notion of the beautifully proportioned (5) form, if the signification of the phallus has to be situated like that, is a perspective which we will see to be rather onesided. On the other hand, I know well that there is the beautifully proportioned form of the woman. It undoubtedly is valorised by every civilized group, but one cannot say that here, if only because of its individual diversity, we can talk about a beautifully proportioned form in a univocal fashion. Let us say that in practice this beautifully proportioned form in any case allows more variation than the other one. No doubt behind every woman there appears in silhouette the form of Venus de Milo, or of the Aphrodite of Eucnide, but it is not always with results that are univocally favourable. Daumier was much reproached for having given to the gods of Greece, the slightly sloppy forms, of the male and female bourgeoisie of his epoch. He was reproached as if he had committed a sacrilege. It is precisely here that there is situated the problem that I am indicating: it is that obviously if it is so deplorable to humanize gods, it is because humans are not always so easily divinized.

In brief, it is quite clear that if the necessity of perpetuating the human race is given over to the subject of the beautifully proportioned form, on the whole the indication seems to be that we should be satisfied with average requirements that (6) the term beautifully proportioned form is perhaps not entirely destined to fulfil, or remains in any case rather enigmatic.

In fact, everything that was said in a timely and remarkable way to valorise this beautifully proportioned form of the phallus, is precisely what is in question here, which of course does not eliminate its prepossessing, dominant form, but the discourse that we are pursuing here, and in so far as it is founded, as it directly prolongs, not alone the Freudian discourse, but the Freudian experience, is there to give us a different idea of the signification of the phallus.

The phallus is not a form, is not an objectal form, in so far as it remains the captivating form, the fascinating form, at least in a sense, because the problem still remains in the Other. The attraction between the sexes, is an infinitely more complex thing, as the whole economy of the analytic doctrine reveals to us, and what we are engaged in, is to give it a solution, according to this formula which naturally is itself nothing more than a formula which must be developed in order to be understood: it is that the phallus is neither a phantasy, nor an image, nor an object, even a partial one, even an internal one, that it is a signifier, and that the fact that it is signifier, is the only thing which allows us to articulate, to conceive of (7) the different functions that it takes on at different levels of the inter-sexual encounter.

A signifier. It is not enough to say that it is a signifier. Which one? It is a signifier, it is the signifier of desire, and of course this poses again a question which goes further: the signifier of desire, what does that mean? It is quite certain that the import of this affirmation that it is the signifier of desire, implies that we should know, and that we should say, that we should articulate first of all what is in its formula, what desire is.

Desire in fact is not something which is self-explanatory in the function that it occupies in our experience. It is not simply the inter-sexual appetite, the inter-sexual attraction, the sexual instinct, it is of course understood that this does not eliminate either the existence of what are tendencies more or less accentuated, variable according to individuals, which have this primary character of manifesting themselves as something which is, let us say in general, the greater or lesser potency of one or other individual, with respect to sexual union, that this is something which in no way resolves the question of the constitution of desire as we see it in such and such an individual, whether he is neurotic or not. The constitution of his desire is something other than what he has, if you wish, in (8) terms of sexual potency.

This is why we are going, as a way of setting out again after the disorientation that we may perhaps have suffered from the perspectives of last evening, we are going quite simply to take up Freud's text again.

I should say that I did not wait until today to make the remark, but I communicate it to you today: people have marvelled at the existence of this text of the Traumdeutung, people have marvelled at it as a sort of miracle, because it is really not too much to say that one can read it as something which is thought on the march. But it is even much more: matters are introduced according to moments which correspond to a composition with several overdetermined planes. This is indeed where the word would be applicable, which means that in simply taking as I told you I was doing the last time, namely the first dreams, the import of what comes first goes far beyond the reasons which are given for putting them first in the chapter headings. It is in connection with the memories of the previous day, in so far as they are taken into account in the determination of dreams, that certain of these first dreams, the one for example that I commented on the last day for you, namely the dream of the butcher's beautiful wife, as I called it, appear there.

You have seen that from another angle it is really to approach (9) the question of demand and desire - it is not I who put them into the dream, they are there, demand and desire are there, and Freud does not put them there, it is Freud who read them there, he saw that the patient needed to create an unsatisfied desire, it is Freud who says it, and already just by itself, with everything that we know since, and Freud of course when he wrote it, was not completely in the dark when he gave the name, he had already taken a certain perspective on the matter. If he put things in this order, it is because he is pushed by a requirement in the approach and in the composition which may go well beyond the division of his chapters, and makes of this dream something which is really a special introduction to the problem which is fundamental in the perspective that I am trying here to promote for you, therefore desire and demand.

It is hardly necessary to say that it also is everywhere, because if the dream has been produced, it is because a friend has asked to come to dine in her house. Moreover in the dream itself, the demand is there in its clearest form. The patient knows that everything is closed that day, that she cannot make up for the inadequacy of her material, of provisions, to tackle a supper party that she must give, and then she demands in the clearest, the most isolated fashion, that one can present a demand, she demands over the telephone, which at the time - this (10) is part of the first edition of the Traumdeutung - was not in widespread use, it is really there with its full symbolic power.

Let us go a little further. What are the first dreams that we are going to encounter?

We enter therefore into "The material and sources of dreams" and we encounter first of all the dream of the botanical monograph which is one of Freud's dreams. I will pass over it, but it is not because it does not contribute exactly what we are now waiting for, namely what I am going to try to show you today, precisely the functioning of the relationships of the phallic signifier with desire, only, because it is one of Freud's dreams, naturally it would be a little bit longer, and a little bit more complicated to show it to you. I will do it if I have the time. It is absolutely clear, structured exactly according to the little schema that I gave you the last time, which I began to sketch out for you in connection with the desire of the hysteric, the last time. But Freud is not purely and simply a hysteric; if he has with hysteria the relationship which every relationship with desire involves, it is in a slightly more elaborated way.

We will skip therefore the dream of the botanical monograph, and we arrive at a patient who Freud tells us is a hysteric, and we take up again the desire of the hysteric.

(11) "An intelligent and cultivated young woman, reserved and undemonstrative in her behaviour reported as follows: I dreamt that I arrived too late at the market and could get nothing either, from the butcher or from the woman who sells vegetables. An innocent dream, no doubt; but dreams are not as simple as that, so I asked to be told in greater detail. She thereupon gave me the following account. She dreamed that she was going to the market with her cook, who was carrying the basket. After she had asked for something, the butcher said to her: That's not obtainable any longer, and offered her something else, adding this is good too. She rejected it and went to the woman who sells vegetables, who tried to get her to buy a peculiar vegetable that was tied up in bundles but was of black colour. She said: I don't recognise that; I won't take it." (SE IV 183)

Freud's commentary is essential here, because we were not the ones who analysed this patient. What is in question, is to see what Freud believes he himself can do, in a work which at the time is a little bit as if the first work on the atomic theory had come out, without any type of liaison with, nor any preparation by the physics which preceded it. Moreover it was in fact received by an almost total silence. It is therefore in the first pages of his book, that in order to speak about the (12) presence of what is recent and indifferent in the dream.

Freud calmly adds on for his readers the following commentary:

(He tries to attach this dream to the events of the previous day): "She had actually gone to the market too late and had got nothing. The meat-shop was closed."

But he does not say that it was the patient who said that, he has already gone rather quickly in saying that it must be like that.

"I pulled myself up: was not that, or rather its opposite, a vulgar description of a certain sort of slovenliness in a man's dress"

In other words, it seems that in the language of Vienna, one would say that about someone who had forgotten to button his fly, and that it would be common, at least using familiar language, to indicate it to him by the phrase: "Your meat-shop is not closed." However the dreamer had not employed this phrase, Freud tells us, and he adds:

"She may perhaps have avoided using it. Let us endeavour then to arrive at an interpretation of the details of the dream. When anything in a dream has the character of direct speech, that is to say, when it is said or heard and not merely thought (and it is easy as a rule to make the distinction with certainty) "

It is a question therefore of words in so far as they are inscribed in the dream as if on a banner. They are not simply (13) implied in the situation. It is a question of what can be distinguished with certainty, Freud tells us, namely the language element which Freud invites us to take always as an element which is valid in itself.

"It is derived from something actually spoken in waking life - though, to be sure, this something is merely treated as raw material and may be cut up and slightly altered and, more especially, divorced from its context. In carrying out an interpretation, one method is to start from spoken phrases of this kind. What then was the origin of the butcher's remark 'That's not obtainable any longer?' (Das ist nicht mehr zu haben) .

This sentence is taken up by Freud when he is writing the Wo Ifman, as a proof that he gives the reader that for a long time he had been interested in this question of the difficulty that there is of re-constructing what is pre-amnesic in the life of the subject, of what there is from before infantile amnesia. It is indeed in this connection that he told this to the patient:

"The answer was that it came from me myself. A few days earlier I had explained to the patient that the earliest experiences of childhood were not obtainable any longer as such', but were replaced in analysis by 'transferences' and dreams. So I was the butcher and she was rejecting these transferences into the (14) present of old habits of thinking and feeling. What, again, was the origin of her own remark in the dream "I don't recognise that; I won't take it?"

Which in French is translated by adding: ca.

"For the purpose of the analysis this had to be divided up. I don't recognise that was something she had said the day before to her cook, with whom she had had a dispute; but at the time she had gone on: Behave yourself properly¹ (Benehmen Sie sich anständig¹) "

It does not matter what she said to her cook, because this is taken under the guise of an element of the sentence, and as Freud says, it is precisely in the measure - "Das kenne Ich nicht, das nehme Ich nicht" (GW II/III 190) - that what is retained from this phrase is precisely the part which does not have signification, that precisely which the censorship tends to exclude, is what is also said to the servant. Freud remarks that it is in the measure that this is retained in what is dreamt, that the meaning corresponds to: "Das kenne Ich nicht, das nehme Ich nicht."

One could add something else again, if one were more rigorous, like: "Das kenne Ich nicht, benehmen Sie sich anständig."

"At this point there had clearly been a displacement. Of the two phrases that she had used in the dispute with her cook....it (15) was only the suppressed one. Behave yourself properly that fitted in with the rest of the content of the dream: these would have been the appropriate words to use if someone had ventured to make improper suggestions and had forgotten to close his meat-shop."

The French translation is not very correct, because it omits the notion of improper suggestions and forgetting to close his meat shop. The translation is pure fantasy.

"The allusions underlying the incident with the vegetable-seller were a further confirmation that our interpretation was on the right track. A vegetable tied up in bundles and is also black could only be a dream combination of asparagus and black (Spanish) radishes. No knowledgeable person of either sex will ask for an interpretation of asparagus. But the other vegetable also seems to hint at...."

The word allusion [French translation] is not in the German text. "It refers", says the German text, "to a sexual term."

"....this same sexual topic which we suspected at the beginning, when we felt inclined to introduce the phrase about the meat shop being closed into the original account of the dream. We need not enquire now into the full meaning of the dream. So much is quite clear: it had a meaning and that meaning was far from innocent."

(16) I apologise if this seems to you to be a bit long. I simply wished to re-centre things on this little dream, now that we know so much, that we tend to read a little bit quickly.

Here there is represented in the clearest fashion, another relationship of the hysteric with something which is this super-ego. We focus for a moment on our goal. The last time I indicated that the hysteric, in her dreams and in her symptoms, requires that there be marked somewhere the place of desire as such. Here something else is in question, it is the place of the signifier phallus.

Let us blend in our theoretical discourse with these references to the dream concerning the hysteric, in order to vary things a little for you, and also to relax your attention.

There are three other dreams of the same patient that follow, and we will make use of them when it is appropriate. Let us pause for a moment at what it is now a question of highlighting.

It is the same problem, the same phenomenon of which there was question the other day, namely the place to be given to desire. But here it is not a place which is marked in the field outside the subject, of a desire as such, in so far as she refuses it for herself beyond the demand, in so far as in the dream she assumes it as being the desire of the other, of her friend. It is a question of desire in so far as it is supported by its (17) signifier, the signifier phallus by hypothesis, because that is what we are talking about.

It is a question of knowing what function the signifier plays on this occasion.

Freud, as you see here, introduces without any kind of hesitation, without any kind of ambiguity, the signifier phallus, which is what is at stake when we are dealing with something which is the only element that he did not highlight as such in his analysis, because he had to leave us something to do, but which is quite striking. In fact, the whole ambiguity of the behaviour of the subject with regard to the phallus, since the phallus is not the object of desire, but the signifier of desire, all this ambiguity will reside in this dilemma, namely that the subject can have or can be this signifier. It is because it is a signifier that this dilemma is proposed, and this dilemma is absolutely essential, it is it which is at the root of all the slippages, of all the transmutations, of all the sleights of hand, I might say, of the castration complex.

Why does the phallus come into this dream? I do not think that we are going beyond anything in an inappropriate way from this perspective, if we say that this dream is actualised, that the phallus is actualised as such in the dream of this hysteric, around Freud's phrase: Das ist nicht mehr zu haben. ("That's (18) not obtainable any longer"; "on ne peut plus en avoir").

I had the usage of avoir (to have) confirmed for me, I mean in the absolute sense, as it manifests itself in linguistic usage, which makes us say l'avoir, or not, or better still in French: en avoir, or not, which also has a certain import in German. It is a matter here in this phrase, of the phallus in so far as it arises as the object which is lacking, the object which is lacking to whom? This is of course what it is important to know, but nothing is less certain than that it is purely and simply the object which is lacking to the subject as a biological subject. Let us say that first and foremost all of this is presented in signifying terms, and in so far as it is a sentence which introduces it, a sentence articulated as something which is linked to the sentence which articulates: Das ist nicht mehr zu haben, that this, is what one can no longer have. It is not a frustrating experience, it is a signification, it is a signifying articulation of the lack of the object as such.

This of course accords with the notion which is the one that I put here on the one hand in the foreground, it is that the phallus is the signifier here, in so far as who does not have it? As the Other does not have it, because it is a question of something which is articulated on the plane of language, and which situates itself as such on the plane of the Other. It is the signifier of desire in so far as desire is articulated as (19) the desire of the Other.

I will come back to this in a while.

We are now going to take the second dream.

The second dream that there is question of, from the same patient is a so-called innocent dream. "Her husband asked her: Don't you think we ought to have the piano tuned? And she replied: It's not worth while (Es lohnt nicht)." - That means something like: "It does not pay." - "The hammers need reconditioning in any case." "This was a repetition of a real event of the previous day. But what was the explanation of her dreaming it? She told me that the piano was a disgusting old box, that it made an ugly noise, that it had been in her husband's possession before their marriage, and so on. This last was a substitute for the opposite idea, as the course of the analysis will make clear. Namely that her husband did not have it before his marriage."

"But the key to the solution was only given by her words: It's not worth while." She had said them the previous day, says Freud, while she was visiting a friend, she had been invited to take off her jacket, but had refused with the words: "Thank you but it's not worth while; I can only stop a minute. As she was telling me this, I recollected that during the previous day's analysis she had suddenly caught hold of her jacket, one of the buttons having come undone. Thus it was as though she were saying: Please don't look; it's not worthwhile." In the same (20) way the box was a substitute for a chest; and the interpretation of the dream led us back at once to the time of her physical development at puberty, when she had begun to be dissatisfied by her figure. We can hardly doubt that it led back to still earlier tiroes, if we take the word disgusting into account and the ugly noise, and if we remember how oftenthe lesser hemispheres of a woman's body are used for the larger ones." (SE IV 185-6; GW II/III 191-2)

Here we find ourselves dealing with the other side of the question. If the phallus is the signifier of desire, and of the desire of the Other, here is the other aspect of the problem for the subject, at the first step in this dialectic of desire: It is a question of being or of not being the phallus.

Let us trust squarely in this function of signifier that we accord to the phallus, saying the following: just as one cannot be and have been, one cannot either be and not be, and if it is necessary that what one is not is what one should be, there remains not to be what one is, namely to reject what one is into the apparent (le paraître), which is very exactly what the position of the woman is in hysteria. As woman she makes herself mask, she makes herself mask precisely in order behind this mask, to be the phallus, and all the behaviour of the hysteric, this behaviour in so far as it manifests itself by putting a hand on a button whose meaning the eye of Freud a long, long time ago helped us to see, but accompanied by the phrase: "It is not worth while." Why is it not worth while? (21) Because of course it is a question of you not looking behind, because behind, what is of course in question is that the phallus should be there. But it is really not worth while to go looking there, because precisely one will not find it there. What is in question for the hysteric, as Freud immediately tells us in a note addressed to those whom he calls : Die Wissbegierige, which is translated in French by "to those who wish to go deeper". That means, more precisely : "to lovers of knowledge", to be more rigorous. (SE IV 185 ni)

This carries us into the heart of what perhaps I already designated by this term borrowed from a morality which despite everything remains marked by a human experience which is perhaps richer than many others, the theological morality which is called the Cupido Sciendi, which gives us the term which we can choose to translate desire. These are delicate questions, these equivalences between languages relating to desire, I know that I already obtained from my German-speaking pupils, Begierde. You find it in Hegel, but some find that it is too animal. It is funny that Hegel should have employed it in connection with the Master and the Slave, which is not too marked with animality.

"I may add", says Freud, "that the dream concealed a fantasy of my behaving in an improper and sexually provocative manner, and (22) of the patient putting up a defence against my conduct."

In short, he indicates again for us what is in fact a fundamental behaviour of the hysteric, but at the same time in this context we see its meaning. The hysteric's provocation, is precisely something which tends to constitute desire, but beyond what is called defence, to indicate the place beyond this appearance, this mask, something which is essentially what is presented to desire, and which it of course cannot accede to because it is something which is presented behind a veil, but on the other hand of course not being able to be found there. It is not worth your while opening my bodice, because you will not find the phallus there, but if I put my hand to my bodice, it is so that you may designate, behind my bodice, the phallus, namely the signifier of desire.

This leads us perhaps to begin to ask ourselves how we must define this desire in all strictness, in order all the same to give you a proper sense of what we are talking about, I mean not to limit ourselves to what someone in a dialogue with me, has called - appropriately enough in my opinion - in connection with the little interwoven lines that I put before you from time to time, and which you should not lose sight of, has called a little Calder mobile. Why?

(23) Let us try to articulate what we mean by desire as such. We pose desire in this dialectic as something which is found on the little mobile, beyond the demand. Why is there need for a beyond of the demand? There is need for a beyond of the demand in so far as I told you, that demand by the necessities of its articulation, deflects, changes, transposes need. There is therefore the possibility of a residue. It is in so far as man is caught in the signifying dialectic, that there is something which does not succeed, whatever may be thought by the optimistic people who no doubt point out to us the successful discovery of the other sex, which happens between children and parents. There is only one thing missing, it is that things should go just as smoothly between the parents. Now, here precisely is the whole level at which I approach the question.

There is therefore a residue. How does it appear? How must it necessarily appear? It is no longer now a question of sexual desire. We will see why sexual desire must come to this place. But from the moment that there is a general relationship of a need in man with the signifier, we find ourselves before the following, namely whether something makes good the margin of deviation marked by the incidence of the signifier on needs, and how this beyond appears, if it does appear?

(24) Experience proves that it does appear, and that it is this that we call desire, but as a possible form of its appearance, here is more or less how we can articulate it.

The fashion in which desire must appear in the human subject, depends on what is determined by the dialectic of demand. If demand has a certain effect on needs, it has on the other hand its own characteristics. These proper characteristics, I have already articulated them here. It is that the demand fundamentally in its existence, by the very fact that it is articulated as demand, poses even if it does not expressly demand it, the other as absent or present, and giving or not this absence or this presence, namely as demand for love, for this something which is nothing, not any particular satisfaction, which is what this subject contributes by a pure and simple reply to the demand.

It is here that there is situated the originality of the introduction of the symbolic under the form of demand. It is in this unconditionality of demand, namely that is was, that it is demand, that it is against the background of a demand for love, that there is situated the originality of the introduction of demand with respect to need.

If this involves some loss with respect to need, under any form (25) whatsoever, must this be rediscovered beyond demand? It is quite clear that if this must be rediscovered beyond demand, namely beyond what in fact introduces distortion into need, this dimension of demand, it is to the extent that beyond we should rediscover something where the Other loses its prevalence, or if you wish, need in so far as it originates in the subject, regains the primary place.

Nevertheless, because need has already passed through the filter of demand to the plane and the stage of unconditionality, it is in the guise, as one might say, of a second negation that we are going to find beyond, what it is precisely a question of finding, which is the margin of what is lost in this demand, and the beyond is precisely the character of absolute condition which is in desire, what presents itself in desire as such is this something which is of course borrowed from need. How could we construct our desires, if not by borrowing the raw material from our needs? But this passes over to a state of being unconditioned, not because it is a question of something borrowed from a particular need, but of an absolute condition out of all proportion to the need for any object whatsoever, and in so far as this condition is perhaps called for precisely in this, that it abolishes here the dimension of the other, that it is a requirement in which the other does not have to reply yes (26) or no. It is this which is the fundamental dimension, character of human desire as such.

Any desire whatsoever, at the state of pure desire, is this, it is something extracted from the soil of needs, which takes the form of absolute condition with respect to the other. It is precisely the margin, the result of the subtraction as one might say, of the exigency of need with respect to the demand for love. That is to say that inversely desire is going to present itself as that which in the demand for love is a pointer to any reduction to a need, because in reality that satisfies nothing other than one's self, namely desire as absolute condition.

It is for this reason that sexual desire will come to this place, precisely in the measure that sexual desire presents itself with respect to the subject, with respect to the individual, as essentially problematical, and on the two planes, on the plane of need - Freud is not the first to underline this, from the beginning of time people have been asking themselves how the human being who is a being who has the property of recognising what is advantageous for him, how he can take on, how he can admit a need which incontestably pushes him to aberrant extremes, because it does not correspond to any need which can be immediately rationalised, but which introduces into the individual, let us say what has been called the dialectic of (27) the species.

Of its nature sexual need will already present itself with a certain problematic for a subject who is precisely what we have just said, even if the philosophers have articulated it otherwise, namely someone who can rationalise his needs, namely articulate them in terms of equivalence, namely of the signifier.

On the other hand, with regard to the demand for love, the expression of sexual desire will precisely become desire, and it will be called desire because it can only place itself there, at the level of desire as we have just defined it. Even though at first sexual desire presents itself with respect to the demand for love, in a problematical fashion, whatever may be said about it, and whatever holy water one tries to throw on it by using the term oblativity, the question of desire with regard to the formulation of what is called in every tongue, formulating one's demand, is problematical in as much as to express things in the form of language, the most usual thing, which is revealing here, it is a question, when all is said and done, whatever may be the mode in which the demand is formulated, that the following emerges: it is that the other comes into play from the moment that sexual desire is in question in the form of instrument of desire.

This is the reason why it is at the level of desire as we have (28) thus defined it, that sexual desire is posed in so far as it is a question, namely in so far as it is a question, that it cannot really be articulated. There is really no word (mot), hear it from my own lips, because it perhaps will not do any harm for me to say that everything is not reducible to language. I have always said it, of course, but if it has not been heard, there is no word to express something, and something which has a name, and it is precisely desire, to express desire, as popular wisdom knows very well, there is only empty talk.

The question of the signifier of desire is therefore posed as such, and it is for that reason that what expresses it is not a signifier like the others. It is something which in fact is borrowed from a dominant form of the surge of the vital flux in this order, but which is no less caught up in this dialectic as a signifier, with this passage to the register of the signifier which involves the mortification that affects everything which accedes to this dimension of signifier. Here the ambiguous mortification appears very precisely under the form of the veil, of the veil which we see being reproduced every day in the form of the hysteric's bodice, namely the fundamental position of woman with respect to man concerning desire, namely that above all you must not look behind the blouse, because of course there (29) is nothing, there is nothing except the signifier. Which is precisely not nothing, but the signifier of desire.

Behind this veil, there is either something which must not be shown, and it is in this that the demon whom I spoke to you about the last time or the second last time in connection with the unveiling of the phallus in the antique mysteries, is presented and articulated, and is named as the demon of shame, and shame has a different meaning and import in man and in woman. I made an allusion to that, whatever its origin may be, whether it is the horror that the woman has of it, or whether it is something which arises quite naturally from the delicate soul of men. I alluded to this veil which in man very regularly covers the phallus. It is exactly the same thing which covers more or less normally the totality of the being of the woman, in so far as what there is a question of there being behind, what is veiled, is the signifier of the phallus. And the unveiling of something which would only show nothing, namely the absence of what is unveiled, it is very precisely to this that there is attached what Freud called in connection with the feminine sexual organs, the Grauen in connection with the head of Medusa, or the horror which corresponds to absence revealed as such (GW XVII 47; SE XVIII 273).

When all is said and done, what is in question in this perspective, namely in this interplay of the subject of desire (30) and the signifier of desire, is something which is not exhausted, at the point that we have got to, which has only begun, but you can see well, that it completely reverses a notion for example like that which obscures the whole dialectic of the contribution of the Other in the sexual relationship, and that supposedly matured by the sexual relationship, progress would be from a partial object to a total object.

There is here properly speaking one might say, a veritable camouflage, avoidance, because to be blunt, it would rather be the problem which arises from the fact that in acceding to the place of desire, the other does not at all become as we are told, the total object, but the problem is the following: it is that he becomes totally object, qua instrument of desire. This indeed is what he becomes, and it is a question of maintaining as compatible, this position of the other qua Other, namely qua locus of the word, the one to whom the demand is addressed, and the one whose radical irreducibility as Other is manifested in so far as he can give love, that is to say something which is all the more totally gratuitous, because there is no support for love, that as I have told you: to give one's love, is very precisely and essentially to give as such nothing of what one has, because it is precisely in so far as one does not have it that there is question of love.

(31) It is a question of this discordance between what is absolute in the subjectivity which gives or does not give love, and the fact that one's access to him as object of desire, makes it very precisely necessary that he should become totally object. It is in this essentially vertiginous, essentially nauseous, discrepancy to call it by its name, that there is situated the difficulty of access in the approach to sexual desire.

Freud alludes somewhere in the most precise fashion to the symptom, which, in the hysteric is manifested in the form of nausea and of disgust, by relating it to the phenomena of vertigo in so far as It is not Freud who says it, but it is in Breuer's text (SE JEI 210 n3). Breuer's text refers to Mach and to the works of Mach on motor sensations, in order to point out with some intuition that it is in the discordance between optical sensations and motor sensation that there lies the essential source of this labyrinthic phenomenon which is supposed to manifest itself, which we see emerging the series: vertigo, nausea and disgust.

Effectively it is perfectly observable, and I have already observed it in more than one person, that the realisation, the perception of the contribution of the Other in desire, in the form of the signifier phallus with this sort of short circuit which results at the point where the analysis of such a thing is (32) possible, this short circuit which is set up between this signifier phallus and this something which then at this moment in the subject, can only appear as empty, namely at the place which the organ should normally occupy, I mean the place between the two legs, which at that moment is only evoked as a place, is something which is accompanied, and I would have ten observations to propose to you on this subject, in all sorts of forms, which are either clear, crude and raw, or in various symbolic forms, the subject despite everything saying quite clearly, that it is in so far as the other as object of desire, is perceived as phallus, and that as such she is perceived as lack at the place of her own phallus, that he experiences something which resembles a very curious vertigo, that someone went so far as to relate to me to a sort of metaphysical vertigo experienced in other circumstances, the rarest ones encountered in subjects in connection with the notion of being itself, in so far as it underlies everything that is.

This is where I will end today. We will come back therefore to this dialectic of being or having of the hysteric. We will go further. You will see where this will take us in the obsessional.

I am telling you right away that you should all the same clearly sense that this is not unrelated to a whole dialectic, a (33) different imaginary one whose theory has only been proposed to you, but which is imposed in a more or less forced fashion on patients in a certain technique concerning obsessional neuroses, and in so far as the phallus as imaginary element plays the dominant role in it. We will see the rectifications that can be brought about, in theory and in technique, by the consideration of the phallus, no longer as image or as phantasy, but as signifier.

in this dialectic

We are going to try to continue to advance along this path where, as you see, the theme of the phallus plays a quite essential role, in so far as it leads us to circumscribe more closely what is said in analysis, what is put forward there, and the way in which the notion of object effectively is used.

You should be beginning to sense clearly that we should normally both get closer to, centre our attention on the effective function that this relationship to the object has in current (2) analytic practice, and that at the same time, by focusing the fashion in which it is employed, the uses it is put to, attempt a more elaborated articulation of what in fact we designate simply in a precise fashion by talking about the phallus, which also permits us to criticise this use of object-relations.

If we take a report which has taken on a historical value with the passage of time, and which appeared in the Revue Française de Psychanalyse on "Le moi dans la névrose obsessionnelle", a quite inadequate title because in reality it is only a question of object-relations in the obsessional, it would perhaps be something to explore, we will get an idea from it, namely why the author wanted to mention the ego in obsessional neurosis, in his title, because in fact nothing is really said about it in obsessional neurosis, except that it is weak, or that it is strong. On this point the author all things considered prompted by something which he understood at that time, remained in an attitude of prudence which one can only find praiseworthy. But what dominates this report in which two previous articles by the same author culminate, namely the first which dates from December 1949 and appeared in 1950 in the Revue Française de Psychanalyse : "Incidences thérapeutiques de la prise de conscience de l'envie de penis dans la névrose obsessionnelle féminine". This was his first clinical report on the function (3) of the penis in obsessional neurosis. It is the freshness of this first approach which gives a quite important value to this article, in so far as it shows how things went rather downhill afterwards, because undoubtedly at the level at which in an experience which was still new this penis envy in the female obsessional neurosis has something which reflects a freshness of experience which is extremely interesting.

Afterwards there is another article which is published in the Revue Française de Psychanalyse (July-September 1948), which is on the homosexual relationship in the transference.

The third article is a report on the ego in obsessional neurosis.

I believe that we have here three things which ought to be read because there are not all that many articles written in French on the subject. In fact this indicates rather well the level that things have come to here with respect to these problems. On the other hand rereading it carefully cannot fail to make an overall impression which will give in a way a background to what we ourselves can arrive at here, it seems to me, by approaching the exact articulation of what allows us to situate in sum the value and the importance of a therapy which is centred in such a way. Because when all is said and done one can see there very clearly that there is something of the blind window about these (4) object-relations which are articulated in the synoptic tables where we see the progressive constitution of the object in subjects. I do not believe that the genital object, or the pre-genital object are very significant or important things here, except for the beauty of these aforesaid synoptic tables. But in the last analysis what gives to these object-relations their value, what is their pivot, is that which in fact introduced the notion of object into the analytic dialectic. It is first and foremost what is called the partial object, a term borrowed from the vocabulary and the terms of Abraham, in a fashion moreover that is not quite exact, because what Abraham spoke about, is the partial love of the object, which is obviously not quite the same thing, and already this slippage of itself has some significance.

This partial object, there is no need for a great effort to recognise it, to identify it purely and simply with this phallus that we are talking about, that we should be able to speak about all the more easily because we have precisely given it its importance, which at the same time spares us any kind of embarrassment in making use of it as a privileged object. We know why it merits this privilege, it is precisely under the heading of signifier, it is precisely because of this extraordinary embarrassment of giving this privilege to a particular organ, that the authors have precisely ended up by no (5) longer talking about it at all, while on the contrary it is quasi-omnipresent in the whole of analysis.

Effectively you will be able to verify, if you reread these articles, the absolutely manifest usage; it is an outstanding fact, of the first order, which runs through all these pages, that it is taken by the psychoanalyst, not only by the psychoanalyst in question, but by all those who listened to him. It is taken at the level of phantasy, namely that one can say that in the perspective of the author whose three articles I have just cited, the treatment of obsessional neurosis entirely revolves around an incorporation - these are the terms that the author employs - or of an imaginary introjection of this phallus which appears in the analytic dialogue, is referred to in all these phantasies under the form of the phallus attributed to the analyst.

There would therefore be two phases here: a first where the phantasies of the incorporation, the devouring of this phantastical phallus are supposed to have a clearly aggressive, sadistic character as they say, at the same time as being felt as horrible and dangerous. Even this phantasy therefore is supposed to have a value that is quite revelatory of something which is supposed to belong to the very position of the subject with respect to what is called in the perspective of object - relations, the corresponding object, the constitutive object of his stage, namely in this instance of a particular second phase (6) of the anal-sadistic stage in which one is supposed to pass from tendencies fundamentally destructive of the object to something which would begin to respect the autonomy of this object at least under this partial form.

In fact the whole dialectic of the moment where there is situated the subjective moment, as we would say here, where there is situated the sufferer of the obsessional neurosis, would be as the author explains to us, dependent on the maintenance of a certain form of this partial object around which can be established a world which would not be entirely destined to fundamental destruction, because of the stage immediately underlying this precarious equilibrium at which the obsessional is supposed to have arrived. The obsessional is really represented to us as always ready to tip over into a destruction of the world, because just as these things can only be thought of in terms of the relationship of the subject to his environment, in the perspective within which the author expresses himself, and it is by the maintenance of this partial object, a maintenance which requires of course a whole edifice, a whole scaffolding which is precisely what constitutes the obsessional neurosis, that the obsessional is supposed to avoid tipping over into the psychosis which is always threatening him.

This is very certainly considered, by the author, to be the very basis of the problem.

One cannot fail all the same to object here that whatever may be (7) the parapsychotic symptoms, the symptoms for example of depersonalisation, of ego disturbance, of feelings of strangeness, of a clouding of the world, sentiments which obviously touch on the complexion, even perhaps on the structure of the ego, despite all that we cannot avoid remarking that cases of transition between obsession and psychosis have always existed, but have always been extremely rare.

The authors have seen for a long time that on the contrary there was indeed a sort of false hope of incompatibility between the two mental conditions, and on the other hand, it is indeed when we are dealing with a true obsessional neurosis, the thing we run the least risk of in psychoanalysis. There is a danger that one will not cure an obsessional, but the danger of seeing him tip over into psychosis, is really a risk which seems to me extraordinarily phantasmatic in itself, because it is extremely rare. The obsessional who for whatever reason has tipped over into psychosis in the course of analysis, or even during an unfortunate or even wild therapeutic intervention, is very very rare. Personally I have never seen one in my practice. Thanks be to God! I never had the impression either that it was a risk that I was running with these patients.

There must be something in a judgement like that, which betrays something a little more than clinical experience.

(8) This necessity for the coherence of the theory which takes the author further than he wishes, or even very probably something which goes further, a certain position of his own before the obsessional, which cannot then fail to open up problems onto something which one cannot describe of course as being those of any particular person. Naturally there is no question here of talking about countertransference in the personal sense, but of countertransference in a more general sense where one can consider it as being constituted by what I often call the prejudices of the analyst, in other words the background of things said or not said against which his discourse is articulated.

To begin to situate what can be represented therefore by a practice, which is led to pivot entirely in the particular therapy of obsessional neurosis around this phantasy of the imaginary incorporation of the phallus, and of the phallus of the analyst, in showing really a little mysteriously, because one does not see very well at what moment, nor why this reversal comes about, if it is not by what one can suppose to be a sort of effect of attrition, of the acceptance of something by the subject, because there is a moment, we are told, when by reason of a , of insistence of the treatment, of its presence as treatment, the incorporation of this tragic phantasy is something which appears to the subject as having a phallic value.

(9) A quite different value, namely the introduction into him of something which is suddenly of a different nature, which appears to have been the incorporation of an object which is dangerous and rejected in a way in the phantasies, becomes the welcomed object, an object which is the source of power. The source, it should be noted - the word is there, it is not I who constructed the comparisons and the metaphors.

Does not this sort of introjection which plays a preservative role, have features in common with religious communion, we are told on page 172? At least in the obsessional neurosis where one swallows without chewing, he adds, because it is a question of commenting on the sentiments of happiness in this phantasy which involves no destruction comparable to the phantasies of sucking and of melancholy that Abraham speaks about. This sort of introjection which one could qualify as passive, seems to preserve better the name preservative. "Does it not have features in common with religious communion, where one swallows without chewing?"

What we have here are not features chosen, I would say, in a tendentious fashion. Abraham's melancholia. It is indeed in terms of something which we sense is happening, in terms of a sort of practice or acesis operating principally on phantasies, that no doubt with a careful dosing, with barriers, with an application of the brakes, with stages, with all the precautions that are involved in the technique, we see being realised this (10) something which would permit the subject of obsessional neurosis to adopt relationships which when all is said and done we cannot really see the reason for, but which undoubtedly concern what is called the distance taken from the object. In sum, if I understand it properly, it is a question of allowing the subject to approach more closely on the plane of phantasy, to pass through a phase where this distance is cancelled out in order no doubt, at least it must be hoped, to be reconquered afterwards; this distance from an object which has successively concentrated in itself all the forces of fear, and danger, in order subsequently to become in fact the symbol through which there is established a libidinal relationship which is considered to be more normal, which is described as genital.

In fact we remain perhaps, when we have a particular perspective, namely our own, a little bit more severe than the author in applauding the fact of having reached this goal when, speaking of a female patient, he received at the end of a certain number of months of treatment, the following declaration (p. 164):

"Now she told me this: I had an extraordinary experience, that of being able to enjoy (jouir de) the happiness of my husband. I was extremely moved in ascertaining his joy, and his pleasure made mine."

I would ask you to weigh these terms. They are certainly not without value. They describe very well a sort of experience (11) which absolutely does not imply, I must say, any removal of the previous frigidity of the said patient; the extraordinary experience of being able to enjoy the happiness of one's husband, is something which is frequently observed, but this does not mean for all that that the patient has in any way reached orgasm. In fact we are told, the patient remains, we are told, semi-frigid. This is why one is perhaps a little bit surprised that there is immediately added afterwards:

"Is this not the best way to characterise adult genital relationships?"

This notion of adult genital relationships is evidently what gives to this whole perspective what I call the construction of blind windows in the adult genital relationship. One cannot see very well what that really means, when one looks closely at it. We have seen that once the authors try to explain it, they do not seem to have found there either the simplicity or the unity that all this seems to imply.

"As regards the affirmation of the coherence of the ego, it emerges not alone from the disappearance of the obsessional symptomatology and the phenomena of depersonalisation, but also expresses itself by the accession to a feeling of liberty, of unity, which is a new experience for these subjects."

These optimistic approximations perhaps do not quite represent (12) either something which at least for me corresponds in my experience to what really represents a progress and a cure in obsessional neurosis.

This having been said, we can see clearly the kind of mountain, of wall, of ready made conceptions we have to deal with when it is a question of situating somewhere, of appreciating what is an obsessional constitution, an obsessional structure, the way in which it is lived and the way in which it evolves.

Here we are trying to articulate things in a completely different register, because we believe that even though it is not any more complicated than others - I do not believe that if you succeed in familiarising yourselves, in counting the number of measures that we bring into play here, you will find when all is said and done that it involves many more things, simply that it is perhaps articulated differently, in a multilinear fashion, even though, of course, the desire to have a synoptic table corresponding to or opposing that of Madame Brunswick, is deep in the heart of many listeners. We will get to it perhaps one day, but obviously before reaching it it would perhaps be appropriate to go step by step and to see what we mean when we think that this action of the partial object of the phallus must be re-criticised, and must be put in its place in order to be (13) put to use, and perhaps to also see the dangers of a certain usage which is the current usage.

It is this place that we try to articulate by this little schema. We could cover the whole of this with signs and equations, but I do not wish to give you the impression of artificiality, even though these things are things which I tried as far as possible to reduce to their essential necessity.

We have already placed here the capital O of the big Other, where the code is found and which receives the demand, and we have seen that it is in the passage here from O to the point where the message is, that the signified of the Other is produced, after which the need begun here is found there in a state of transformation at different levels, is qualified differently, which, if we take this line as being the line of (14) the realisation of the subject, is expressed here by something which always more or less culminates in an identification, namely in the passage, in the remodelling, in the transformation also, in the passage when all is said and done of the subject's need into the defiles of the demand.

We know that this is not sufficient to constitute a satisfactory subject, a subject who is based on the number of supporting points that are necessary for him, let us say four, and who knows? It is precisely in this beyond of the demand that there is articulated a Verdrangt. We have already tried to define it the last time by qualifying it as of desire, at its topological place where it was formally in this way that I presented it to you, where there is in a way a necessity linked to this topology, that it must be in this field of the beyond of the demand that there comes to be situated, and at the same time to be necessarily articulated, to be subjected to the particular articulation of this beyond, sexual desire.

There is here in fact a coincidence between the place where the sexual drive, the tendency as such can find its place, and the structural necessity which links it to being at this place in the beyond of the demand. It is in sum to the degree that there intervenes this something which in the totality of signifiers on which there comes to be superimposed to make of it a signified, namely that we usually put underneath the bar of (15) our articulation, capital S over little s, here the / signified which is first of all an a-signified (un assignifie) .

The phallus is indeed therefore this particular signifier which in the body of signifiers, is specialised to designate as such the totality of the effects of the signifier on the signified, as such, namely in so far as they are the effects of the signifier on the signified.

This goes very far, and there is no way of going less far if we wish to give the phallus its signification, namely this something which ensures that it occupies here this privileged place in what is going to appear as such as signifier, in this beyond which is here called the beyond of desire. Namely the whole field which is here beyond the field of demand.

In so far as this beyond of desire is symbolised, it is there, and in so far as it is thus that we see the possibility, it is a simple articulation of the meaning of what we are saying, the possibility of there being here a relationship of the subject to the demand as such, because it is quite obvious that for there to be a relationship of the subject to the demand, he must not be completely included until this beyond is constituted, if it is the case that by hypothesis he is constituted by articulating himself thanks to the signifier phallus. It is at this moment that here, beyond the pure and simple Other who up to then (16) totally lays down the law of the constitution of the subject, simply in his bodily existence, by the fact that the mother is a speaking being, the fact that she is a speaking being is something absolutely essential, whatever contemporary analysts may think. It is not just little cuddles and dabs of Eau de Cologne that need to be given to the infant in order to constitute a relationship to the mother. It is necessary that the mother should speak to him. Everybody knows that. Not only that she should speak to him, but everyone knows that the child has a very particular relationship, and that a mute nurse will not fail to produce some fairly visible consequences in the development of the infant.

Beyond this Other, if there is here something of the signifier which is constituted which is called the beyond of desire, we have the possibility of this relationship D, namely the subject as such, a less complete subject, namely that he is barred. This means that a complete human subject is never a pure and simple subject, the subject of knowledge as he is constructed by the whole of philosophy, well and truly corresponding to the percipiens of this perceptum which is the world. We know that there is no human subject who is pure subject of knowledge, unless it is the human subject in so far as we reduce him to something or other like a photo-electric cell or an eye, or again to what can be called in philosophy a consciousness. But because we are analysts, we know that there (17) is always a Spaltung, namely that there are always two lines on which he constitutes himself, and it is for this reason moreover that all the problems of structure that we have originate.

Here, what must be constituted? It is precisely what I have called no longer the signified of 0, but the signifier of 0, S(0), in so far as he knows this Spaltung, that he is himself structured by this Spaltung, in other words in so far as he, 0, has already undergone the effects of this Spaltung. Here this is reversed, that means: the one who is signified by the signifier phallus is already marked by this effect of the signifier. It is therefore the 0 if you wish, in so far as the phallus is barred in it, raised to the state of signifier. It is the Other qua castrated, which here is represented at the place of the message. The message of desire, is that.

The message of desire, is that. This is not to say for all that that it is easy to receive because precisely the whole problem of this difficulty of articulating desire which ensures that there is an unconscious, in other words that in fact what appears here as being at the upper level as one might say of the schema, is on the contrary ordinarily something that we must imagine as being at the lower level, as not being articulated in the consciousness of the subject, even though it is well and truly articulated in his unconscious, and it is even because it (18) is articulated in his unconscious that it can up to a certain point - it is precisely a matter of knowing which, it is the question that we pose here - be articulated in the consciousness of the subject.

What does the hysteric whom we spoke about the last day show us? The hysteric of course is not psychoanalysed, otherwise she would no longer be hysterical by hypothesis. The hysteric, we have said, poses, situates this beyond in the form of a desire qua desire of the other.

To fix your ideas, I will justify this for you a little bit more in what follows, but right away, because it is necessary, if one tries to articulate something, to begin by articulating, by giving a commentary on it, I shall say that things happen in the following way, that just as here in the first loop, the subject by the manifestation of need, of his tension, causes this path of the first signifying line of demand to be crossed over, in the same way it is here that we can, to topologise things, put the relationship which is that of the ego to the image of the other as such, and in the same way it is here, namely in sum in so far as that which in the Other as such, qua capital O, not in the other qua little o, in the imaginary other, that which in the Other qua capital O permits the subject to tackle this beyond of the signified which is precisely the field that we are in the process of exploring, that of his desire, this little d (19) of desire occupies the same place as the little e occupies with respect to the subject, which expresses the following, simply and precisely it is in this place where the subject has sought to articulate his desire that he will encounter the desire of the other as such, and what we express is precisely something which is founded on experience, and which I already for a long time articulated for you in other forms, but which I also articulated for you in this one that the desire that is in question, namely desire in its unconscious function is the desire of the Other. This indeed is what we saw when we spoke the last time about the hysteric in connection with the dream. These are not selected dreams, any more than I give you selected texts from Freud. I assure you, if, as is apparently beginning to happen, you set about reading Freud, I cannot advise you too strongly to read him completely, otherwise it is you who run the danger of coming upon passages which will be perhaps not selected, but which will be none the less the source of all sorts of errors, or even of mistaken identity, if you do not see the place at which one or other text is situated in I would not say the development of a thought, even though this strictly speaking would be what should be said, but ever since people have spoken about thought, it has become such a bizarre term that no one ever knows too well what is being spoken about, it is not enough to talk about thought for one to be able to say (20) that one is speaking about the same thing. It is even the development of a research, of an effort by someone who himself, has a certain idea of its magnetic pole, as one might say, and who can only reach it by a certain detour, and it is in terms of the whole journey that each one of these detours must be judged.

Therefore I did not choose the two dreams of the last day of the patient, of the hysteric, at random. I explained to you how I chose them. I took the first dream because I encountered it after the other dreams having explained to you the reasons why I did not take them first. I will return to them. Namely, because the dream of the Botanical Monograph, which may be something which helps us to understand what has to be demonstrated, is one of Freud's dreams which it will be more convenient to explain later.

I continue first the articulation of the dream of the hysteric. What the hysteric has shown us, is that she finds her supporting point - these are not terms which are reserved to me, if you read Mr. Glover writing about obsessional neurosis, you will see that he employs exactly the same term to say that it appears that when one has removed their obsession from obsessional neurotics, they lack for example a supporting point. You see that the usage which I make here of terms, is a usage which I (21) have in common with the other authors, namely that we try to metaphorise our experience, our little impressions - we have said that the hysteric takes her point of support in a desire which is the desire of the other. This is essential, this creation of a desire beyond demand. It is something that we have, I believe, sufficiently articulated.

One could mention here a third dream which I did not have time to tackle the last time, but which I may as well read for you now.

"She was putting a candle into a candlestick; but the candle broke so that it wouldn't stand up properly. The girls at her school said she was clumsy; but the mistress said it was not her fault."

In this case again, here is how Freud relates this dream to real events:

"The day before she had actually put a candle into a candlestick, though it did not break. Some transparent symbolism was being used in this dream. A candle is an object which can excite the female genitals; and, if it is broken, so that it cannot stand up properly, it means the man is impotent"

And Freud underlines:

"It was not her fault. But how could a carefully brought up young woman, who had been screened from the impact of anything ugly, have known that a candle might be put to such use?" In (22) this connection we learn that while they were in a rowing boat she had heard a very vulgar student song about the use that the Queen of Sweden, behind closed shutters, made of Apollo candles. She had not understood the last word. Her husband had of course explained behind closed shutters, the meaning of Apollo, and all of this is rediscovered and appropriately felt in this instance.

The important thing is that here we then see appearing in its naked and isolated state as I might say, in the state of a partial, even a flying object, the signifier phallus, and that the point which is important, is of course that we do not know from what moment of the analysis of this patient, because it is certainly a patient who is in analysis, the subject of this dream was taken. The important point is obviously here in the it was not her fault.

This it was not her fault is the fact that it is at the level of others. It is before all the others, it is in function of the mistress that all her fellow pupils no longer mock her. Here the symbol is evoked, and this is what I want to get to, which overlaps and confirms as one might say what was already in the dream of the butcher's beautiful wife, it is namely that the accent is to be put on the fact that for the hysteric, and the hysteric in sum is a constitutive mode of the subject concerning precisely her sexual desire, is the mode upon which she adopted (23) what is to be stressed in the case of the hysteric. It is of course the dimension of desire in so far as it is opposed to that of demand. But it is first and foremost in the term desire of the Other (with a capital O), the position, the place in the other which is to be underlined.

I reminded you how Dora lived up to the moment when her hysterical position came apart. She is very much at ease, apart from a few little symptoms, but which are precisely those which constitute her as hysterical, and which are read in the relationship of the distinction, the Spaltung between these two lines. We will return to the way in which we can articulate the overdetermination of the symptom. It is linked to the existence of two signifying lines as such. But what we showed the other day, is that what Dora wanted, is that in sum she should subsist as a subject in so far as she demands love, no doubt like every good hysteric, but that she sustains the desire of the Other as such. It is she who sustains it. It is she who is its support. Things go very well in so far as the things happening between her father and the aforesaid Madame K proceed most successfully, and without anyone needing to see in it, the term that she sustains, the desire of the Other is here the term which best fits the style of her action and of her position with respect to her father, to Madame K, and it is here (24) that I indicated something to you; it is in as much as she is able to identify with Mr. K, that the whole little construction is possible. It is in a certain relationship to the other, in this case the imaginary other, as such; it is in as much as faced with this desire she sustains him at this place, namely at the place which corresponds to her own.

You have clearly seen that in fact there is sketched out a little square whose four vertices are represented by the ego, the image of the other, the relationship of the subject thus constituted to the imaginary other as such, and here desire. We thus find here the four legs on which a human subject constituted as such can normally be based, that is to say one who is neither more nor less aware of the mechanism and of the strings pulling the puppet of another there where she sees.

namely where she is capable or more or less capable, of locating herself in this essential component.

It is here and at that level, faced with the desire of the other, and besides I showed it the last time, without for all that things going beyond, because after all one could say that in the hysteric the return line was more effaced. Moreover this is the reason why the hysteric has all sorts of difficulties with her imaginary world, here represented in the image of the other, and is likely to see produced in it the effects of fragmentation, of different disintegrations, which are strictly speaking what are of service to her in her symptoms.

(25) I am simply recalling this at the hysterical level - how are we going to be able to articulate what happens at the level of the obsessional? I mean in an obsessional structure.

The classical theory, I tell you, tells you how it is articulated in Freud, and how it is articulated in Freud in the final word of Freud on obsessional neurosis. Obsessional neurosis, is clearly a bit more complicated than hysterical neurosis, but not all that much. If one can manage to focus things on the essential, it can be articulated, but if one does not focus things on the essential, which is certainly the case of the author about whom I spoke to you above, one literally gets lost in it, namely one splashes around between the sadistic, the anal, the partial object, incorporation, the distance from the object. One literally does not know any longer where to turn, to find one's bearings in it. Now it is extremely varied from a clinical point of view, as the author shows us in observations which it seems scarcely possible to unify under one clinical heading, under the names of Pierre and of Paul without counting the Moniques and the Jeannes who are in the background. But I would like to say that in the author's clinical material, at the level of the report on the ego, there are only Pierre and Paul. Pierre and Paul are manifestly completely different subjects from the point of view of the (26) texture of a single object. One can scarcely put them under the same heading, which of course is not in itself an objection either, because we are not particularly well able either to articulate for the moment, different nosological headings.

It is very very striking to see how, after having spent so much time on obsessional neurosis, we are incapable of dismembering it as clinical work manifestly requires us, given the diversity of the aspects which it presents to us. You remember in Aristotle what is called the correct path of the cook's knife, of the good cook, the one who knows how to cut along the joints. In the present state of things, nobody, particularly those who have occupied themselves with obsessional neurosis, is capable of correctly articulating it. It is a sure sign of some theoretical deficiencies.

Let us take things up at the point that we have got to.

What does the obsessional do, in order to consist qua subject? He is also like the hysteric, and as you can suspect, there is not such a profound relationship between the hysteric and the obsessional neurotic, that already before any kind of serious elaboration, namely before Freud, a Mr. Janet could produce this very curious kind of work of geometrical superposition as one (27) might call it of point by point correspondence, of images which are called in geometry I believe, transformations of figures, which means that the obsessional is really conceived as something which is the transformed face of a hysteric as one might say.

The obsessional is also oriented of course towards desire. If there was not a question in all of this, first and foremost of desire, there would be no kind of homogeneity between the neuroses.

Only look at the classical theory, Freud's theory, Freud's final articulations. What does he tell us? That obsessional neurosis - he said many things in the course of his career, he had first of all discovered that what one can call the primitive trauma is different to the primitive trauma of the hysteric. In the hysteric it is a sudden seduction, an intrusion, an eruption of the sexual into the life of the subject. He saw very clearly that in as much as this psychic trauma can stand up to the critique of reconstruction, it is a question on the contrary of something in which the subject had had an active role, as he said, in which he had taken pleasure.

That was the first approximation. Then subsequently there is the whole development in the Ratman, namely the appearance of the extreme complexity of the affective relationships of the obsessional, and namely the stressing, the focusing of the accent on affective ambivalence, on the fundamental (28) active/passive, masculine/feminine oppositions, and the most important thing, the love/hate antagonism. The Ratman moreover should be reread like the Bible. The Ratman is still rich in everything which is still to be said about obsessional neurosis, it is a topic to work on.

Finally what did Freud end up with as a last metapsychological formulation? The fact is, he says, there had been at that time clinical experiences and metapsychological elaborations which had brought to light the aggressive tendencies and which had already caused Freud to make this fundamental distinction of life instincts and death instincts, which are still tormenting psychoanalysts.

What Freud tells us, is that there was precocious defusion, separation, of the life instincts and the death instincts. In other words, that the detachment of the destructive tendencies as such, happened at too early a stage in the obsessional not to mark his whole subsequent development, namely his installation in his own particular subjectivity, as obsessional.

How is this going to be inserted into this dialectic? Much more immediately, concretely, tangibly, it seems to me. If these terms of demand and desire, begin to seem logical to your (29) minds, you will find them of use every day, and in any case quite usable in your day-to-day analytic practice. I mean that you can make some habitual use of them before they become worn out, but you will always find yourself asking here whether it is a question of desire and demand, or of desire or of demand.

What does what we have just recalled regarding the instincts of destruction mean here, namely something which is manifest in experience, in an experience which must first be taken at the popular, common level of what we know about obsessionals, but not even the obsessionals that we analyse, the obsessionals that simply as knowledgeable psychologists, we can see around us and on whose behaviour we are able to measure its effects?

It is quite certain that the obsessional tends to destroy his object. This is something which is almost a truth of experience. It is a matter simply of not contenting oneself with that, to see what is this destructive activity of the obsessional.

Here is what I propose to you. I propose to you to consider that unlike the hysteric, who lives entirely at the level of the other - the accent for her is to be at the level of the other, (30) and it is for this reason that she needs a desire of the other, because without that, what would the other be, if not the law? But it is first of all at the level of the other that there is posed as one might say the centre of gravity of the constitutive movement of the hysteric.

For reasons which are not at all impossible to articulate, and which are in fact identical with what Freud tells us in speaking of the precocious effusion and defusion of instincts, it is the seeking, the aiming at desire itself, at the beyond of the demand which is constitutive of the obsessional.

I would like you to have had some little experience of what a child who is going to become an obsessional is like. I believe that there are no young subjects in whom we see more tangibly what I tried to articulate for you the last time when I argued that in this margin of need which is necessarily of a limited range, as one talks about a company with limited responsibilities, need is always something with a limited range. In this margin between need and the unconditional characteristics of the demand for love, there is situated this something which I called desire, and how did I define this desire as such? As something which precisely because it must be situated in this beyond, as I might say, denies the element of alterity which is included in the demand for love.

(31) But to preserve this unconditioned character by transforming it into the character of the absolute condition of desire, into desire as such in a pure state, the other is denied, but need from the fact that the subject has had to break through, to know this final, limiting character of the unconditionally of the demand for love, we see that this character remains transferred onto need as such.

The young child who will become an obsessional, is the young child of whom the parents say - here is a convergence of common language with the language of the psychologists - : "He has fixed ideas". He does not have ideas that are more extraordinary than any other child, if on the contrary we focus on the material of his demand, namely that he demands a little box. A little box is really not such an important thing, and there are many children on whom one will not pause for a single instant when they demand the little box, except of course psychoanalysts, who will see all sorts of subtle allusions in it. In fact they would not be wrong, but I find it more important to see that there are certain children among others, who demand little boxes, from whom their parents find this demand for the little box to be properly speaking an intolerable demand, and it is intolerable.

One would be quite wrong to believe that it is enough to send (32) the aforesaid parents to a school for parents so that they can get over it, because contrary to what is said, parents are of course involved in it too. That means that it is not for nothing either than one is an obsessional. For that to happen there must be a model somewhere. Of course, but in the reception itself, the fixed idea aspect that the parents notice is quite discernible, and always immediately discerned even by people who do not form part of the parental couple.

In this very particular exigency which manifests itself in the way that the child demands a little box, what is strictly speaking intolerable for the other, on this occasion is precisely what people call in an approximate way fixed ideas, namely that it is not a demand like the others, in other words that it has the character of absolute condition which is what I designated for you as being that of desire. And the obsessional, is precisely a child who for reasons whose correspondence you see with what is called in this instance the defusion of drives which are very strong in this instance, which is going to be the element I might say of the first foundation of this tripod which must afterwards in order to be able to stand firmly, have four legs: in his case the stress is put on desire, not only on desire, but on desire as such, namely that in its constitution it involves this destruction of the other. (33) It is the unconditioned form of need, need which has passed over to the state of absolute condition, and precisely in as much as it is beyond this unconditioned exigency of love of which on occasion it can come to be a test, but as such it is something which denies the other as such, and it is this indeed when acquired which makes it, like the little child's desire for the small box, so intolerable.

Pay close attention, because you should understand that I am not saying the same thing when I say that the desire is the destruction of the other, and when I say the hysteric is going to search for her desire in the desire of the other.

When I say that the hysteric searches for her desire in the desire of the other, it is the desire that she attributes to the other as such.

When I say that the obsessional gets his desire across, this means above all precisely that he is going to look for it in a beyond by aiming for it as such in its constitution as desire, namely in as much as he destroys the other as such. And this is the secret of this profound contradiction that there is between the obsessional and his desire. It is that aimed at in this way, desire carries in itself this internal contradiction which makes of it the impasse of the desire of the obsessional, which the authors try to express by talking about these kinds of perpetual and instantaneous comings and goings, between introjection and projection.

(34) I must say that this is something which is extremely difficult to portray for oneself, especially when one has sufficiently indicated as the author does in certain places, the extent to which the mechanism of introjection and the mechanism of projection are unrelated. I articulated it for you more strongly than this author, but you must all the same begin with this, namely that the mechanism of projection is imaginary, and that the mechanism of introjection is a symbolic mechanism. They are absolutely unrelated.

On the contrary it seems to me, you can conceive, and moreover discover in experience if you carefully observe your obsessionals, that the obsessional is inhabited by desires which are precisely all those that you see, on condition that you familiarise yourself a little with it, which you see swarming like a kind of extraordinary vermin which, in a particularly suitable kind of cultural milieu, if you in fact direct, it does not require a great effort, it is enough to have the elements of your transference that I spoke about a while ago, if you direct the culture of the obsessional neurosis into the culture of the phantasy, you will see the aforesaid vermin proliferating almost everywhere. That is why the culture of the obsessional neurosis does not last very long.

But in fact, if you try to see the essential, namely what happens when the obsessional from time to time, taking his (35) courage in his hands, sets himself to try to break through the barrier of the demand, namely to head off to find the object of his desire, first of all he does not find it easily, but there are many things all the same, because he has already had the practice, there are many things which can serve him as a support for it, even if it is only the little box.

It is quite clear that it is on this route that the most extraordinary accidents happen to him, namely something that people will try to find the motive for at different levels by the intervention of the superego and of a thousand other things which of course do exist.

But much more radically than all that, the obsessional in so far as his fundamental movement is directed towards desire as such, and above all in its constitution as desire, implies in every movement towards the attainment of this desire what we call the destruction of the other, even though it is in the nature of desire as such to require this support of the other. This desire of the other is not a way of access to the desire of the subject, it is quite simply the place of desire, and every movement in the obsessional towards his desire runs into something which is absolutely tangible in, what I may call, the movement of their libido. The more something plays the role in the psychology of an obsessional of object, even a momentary one, of desire, the more the law of approach as one might say of (36) the obsessional with respect to this object, will be conditioned by something which manifests itself literally in what one can call a veritable lowering of libidinal tension at the moment that he approaches it, and to the extent that at the moment that he holds this object of his desire, for him nothing more exists.

You will see this. It is absolutely observable.

I will try to articulate it for you, to show you by examples. The whole problem for the obsessional, is therefore to give to this desire which for him conditions this destruction of the other, when desire itself has disappeared, the only thing which can give it this appearance of support; namely this corresponding point that the hysteric for her part, thanks to her identifications, occupies so easily, and which on this occasion, because precisely from the fact that there is no Other, no big Other here, I mean of course in so far as it is a question of desire, I am not saying that the big Other does not exist for the obsessional, I am saying that when it is a question of his desire, there is none, and it is for this reason that he is searching for the only thing which can maintain in its place this desire as such, outside this reference point. It is something which is opposite, which comes to take this place, which is the other formula of ϕ with respect to little o. What takes the place of the identification of the hysteric - it is its function in the obsessional - is an object, and this (37) object is always in a veiled form, no doubt, but is always perfectly equivalent, identifiable and reducible to the signifier phallus.

This is where I must end today. You will see subsequently what this involves as regards the behaviour of the obsessional vis-a-vis this object, and also his behaviour vis-a-vis the small other. You will see, I will show you the next time, how a certain number of much more current truths can be deduced from it, namely for example that the subject cannot really show his desire except by opposing himself to what we will call an absolute virility, and that on the other hand, in so far as he must show his desire, because it is for him the essential exigency, he can moreover only show it, where it exists, and very precisely show it in something where he must perform some exploit, I mean that the performance aspect of the activity of the obsessional is something which finds here its reasons and its motives.

Seminar 23t Wednesday 21 May 1958

Through the exploration that we are pursuing of the neurotic structures in so far as they are conditioned by what we call the formations of the unconscious, we came the last day to talk about the obsessional. We finished our discourse on the obsessional by saying in fact that he has to constitute himself somewhere in face of his evanescent desire. We began to indicate in the formula of desire as being the desire of the other, why in the case of the obsessional this desire is evanescent. This desire is evanescent because of a fundamental difficulty in his relationship with the Other, with the big Other as such, this big Other in so far as it is the locus where the signifier orders desire.

It is this dimension that we are trying to articulate here, because we believe that it is for lack of this dimension that there are introduced, both difficulties in the theory and also (2) deviations in practice.

We would like in passing to weave in a way into this discourse, to make you experience - it is the meaning of the whole of Freud's work if you look at it after having gone through it sufficiently - that this discovery is the signifier which orders desire. But of course within this phenomenon, the subject tries to express, to manifest in an effect of the signifier as such, what happens in his own approach to the signified.

Up to a certain point the work of Freud can itself be inserted in this effort. There has been a lot of talk in connection with Freud's work about a naturalism, an effort to reduce human reality to nature. This is not the case at all. Freud's work is an attempt to make a pact between this being of man and nature, and a pact which undoubtedly is sought elsewhere than in a relationship of innateness. It is by starting from the fact that man has been constituted, is constituted, qua subject of the word, qua I of the act of speech, that man is always experienced in Freud's work, and how can this be denied because precisely in analysis he is never experienced otherwise? He therefore finds himself essentially before nature in a posture other than that of an immanent bearer of life. It is within this experience which (3) makes of him the subject of the word, that the link, his relationship with nature has to be articulated, to be formulated.

It is this relationship to life, which is found to be symbolised in this sort of lure that he extracts from the forms of life in the signifier of the phallus, and it is here that there can be found the central point, the most tangible, the most significant of all these signifying crossroads that we explore during the analysis of the subject. The phallus is in a way the summit, the point of equilibrium, the signifier par excellence of this relationship of man to the signified, and of course by this very fact, it is in a position, we would say, with respect to which the insertion of man into the dialectic of sexual desire is destined to be absolutely specially problematic. The first [problem] is that it has to find its place in something which preceded it, which is the dialectic of demand in so far as demand always demands something which is more than, and beyond satisfaction, to which it appeals, - hence as one might say, the ambiguous character of the place where desire must be situated, this place which is always problematic, and is beyond the demand, it is of course beyond in so far as the demand aims at the satisfaction of need, and is on this side of the demand. Yes, it is on this side in so far as the demand, because of the fact that it is articulated in symbolic terms, is a demand which goes (4) beyond all the satisfactions it calls for in so far as it is a demand for love, in so far as it is a demand aiming at the being of the other, at obtaining from the other this essential presence (presentification) which means that the other gives this something which is beyond all possible satisfaction, which is his very being, which is precisely what is aimed at in love.

It is in this virtual space between the appeal for satisfaction and the demand for love, that desire has to organise itself, has to find its place, and it is for this reason that in order to situate desire we find ourselves always in this double position, which with respect to demand makes of it something which is at once beyond it and on this side of it, according to the face or the aspect under which we envisage the demand, namely qua demand connected with a need, or demand qua structured in signifying terms, which as such always supercedes any kind of response which is at the level of satisfaction, which of itself calls for a sort of absolute response which then is going to project its essential character of absolute condition onto everything that is going to be organised in this interval, this interval within as it were the two planes of the demand, the signified plane and the signifying plane of the demand, where desire has to be articulated, to take its place.

It is precisely because it has to be articulated and to take its (5) place in this place, that once the subject approaches this desire, the other becomes the relay, the other qua locus of the word, and precisely in so far as it is to him that the demand is addressed, is going also to be the locus where desire must be discovered, where there must be discovered the possible formulation of desire. It is here that the contradiction operates at every instant, because within this other in so far as he is possessed by a desire, by a desire which in fact from the beginning and fundamentally is foreign to the subject, the difficulties in the formulation of this desire are those on which the subject is going to come to grief, and going all the more significantly come to grief, precisely because we see him develop the structures which are those which analytic discovery has allowed to be delineated.

We have said that these structures are different, depending on whether the accent is put upon the character of the unsatisfaction essential to desire - this is the way by which the hysteric approaches its field and its necessity - or whether the accent is put on the essential dependency on the other, in order to accede to this desire, and this is the fashion in which this approach is proposed to the obsessional.

We said as we were finishing the last day, that something happens here which is different to this hysterical identification, this (6) hysterical identification which comes essentially from the fact that the hysteric, in order to envisage this desire which for her is an enigmatic point, is something to which we always bring as I might say, a sort of forced interpretation which is the one which characterises all the first approaches that Freud made in the analysis of hysteria. Freud did not say that desire is situated for the hysteric, in such a position that to say to her: here is the man or woman whom you desire, is always a forced interpretation, always an inexact interpretation, always an interpretation that misses the point. There is no example where a hysteric, either in Freud's first observations, or later, or in the case of Dora, or even if we extend the meaning of hysteria to the homosexual case that we commented on at length here, where Freud did not in a way make a error, and did not in any case end up without exception at the refusal of the patient to accede to the meaning of her desire, of her symptoms and of her acts, every time that he proceeded in this fashion. In fact the desire of the hysteric is essentially and as such not the desire of an object, but the desire of a desire, the effort to maintain herself before this point where she calls her desire, the point where the desire of the other is. On the contrary she identifies herself with an object. Dora identifies herself with (7) Mr. K. The woman that I spoke to you about, Elizabeth von R also identifies herself with different persons in her family or in her entourage. It is the point from which she identifies herself with someone for whom the term of ego or ego ideal are equally inappropriate in the case of the hysteric, someone who becomes for her her alter ego, precisely this object whose choice as object of identification was always expressly articulated by Freud in a fashion that is in conformity with what I am telling you, namely that it is in so far as he or she recognises in another man, or in another woman, the indices as one might say of their desire, namely that he or she is faced with the same problem of desire as him or her, that identification is produced, and all the forms of contagion, of crisis, of epidemic, of symptomatic manifestation which are so characteristic of hysteria.

The obsessional has different solutions, because the problem of the desire of the other appears to him in a quite different way. In order to articulate it we are going to try to accede to it by the stages which experience has furnished us with concerning the obsessional.

I would say that in one way, it does not matter from what end we take the living experience of the obsessional. What is in question, is not to forget its diversity. The ways traced by analysis, the path along which what must be called our tentative (8) experience has encouraged us to resolve, to find the solution of the problem of the obsessional, the ways are partial and incomplete: of themselves they of course give us material, the way in which this material is utilised, we can explain in different ways with respect to the results which have been obtained.

First of all we can also criticise them in themselves. This critique should be in a way a convergent one. The impression that we have when we spell out this experience as it has become oriented in practice, is undoubtedly that the theory like the practice tends to be centred on the utilisation of the phantasies of the subject. This role of phantasy in the case of obsessional neurosis has something enigmatic about it, in so far as the term phantasy is never defined. We have spoken here a good deal, and for a long time about the imaginary relationships of the function of the image as a guide as one might say, of instinct, as a channel, an indication along the path of instinctual realisations. On the other hand we know the degree to which this use of the function of the image is reduced, is diminished, is impoverished in the case of man, in as much as one can detect it with certainty, because it seems to be reduced to the narcissistic image, to the specular image, is, I would say, reduced to an extremely polyvalent function; I am not saying neutralised because also functioning on the plane of aggressive (9) and erotic relationships.

How can we articulate the undoubtedly essential, prevalent, imaginary functions of which everybody speaks, which are at the heart of analytic experience, those of the phantasy, at the point that we have arrived at?

I believe that in this connection we should see that the schema presented here opens up for us the possibility of articulating, of situating the function of the phantasy. It is no doubt through a sort of intuitive approach to this topology, that I ask you to begin in the first instance to represent it for yourselves. It is not a question of course of a real space, but it is a question of something in which homologues can be delineated.

(10) If the relationship to the image of the other is constituted in effect somewhere at the level of an experience which is integrated into the circuit of demand, to the primitive circuit of demand, that in which the subject addresses himself in the first instance to the other for the satisfaction of his needs, and if it is somewhere on this circuit that there is constituted this sort of transitive accommodation to a striking presence (d'effet de prestance) which puts the subject in a certain relationship to his counterpart as such, if therefore the relationship to the image is found there at the level of the experiences and of the very moments of entry into the operation of the word at the limit of the passage from the infans state to the speaking state, we will say this: in this field where we search for the pathways of the realisation of the desire of the subject through the access to the desire of the other, it is in a homologous point that there is found the function and the situation of the phantasy.

The phantasy we will define, if you wish, as the imaginary which is taken up into a certain signifying usage. So this is important and is manifested and is observed in a characteristic fashion, if only in the fact that when we speak about phantasies, sadistic phantasies for example, which play such an important role in the economy of the obsessional, it is not enough to qualify these manifestations as phantastical by the fact that they represent something which is a tendency qualified as (11) sadistic, in connection with a certain literary work which itself does not present itself as an investigation of instincts, but as an operation which the term imaginary would be far from sufficient to describe, because it is a literary work, that there are scenes, in fact .that there are scenarios, that it is something which is profoundly articulated in the signifier that is in question. And all things considered, I believe that every time that we speak about the phantasy, we must not overlook this scenario aspect, this story aspect which forms an essential dimension of it. It is not, as one might say, a sort of blind image of the destructive instinct; it is not something where the subject as one might say - I will try to give you an image myself to explain what I mean - all of a sudden sees red in front of the prey that it is in question. It is something which the subject not only articulates in a scenario, but in which the subject brings himself into play in this scenario.

The formula S with the little bar, namely the subject at the most articulated point of his presentification with respect to little o , is indeed here something valid in every kind of properly phantastical deployment of what we are calling in this instance the sadistic tendency, in so far as it may be implied in the economy of the obsessional.

(12) You will notice that there is always a scene in which the subject is presented as such in differently masked forms in the scenario, in the form of implications in diversified images of the other in which an other qua counterpart, and also qua reflection of the subject, is here made present. I would say further: not enough stress is put on the character of presence of a certain type of instrument. I already made an allusion, following Freud, to the importance for example of the phantasy of flagellation, this phantasy which Freud especially articulated in so far as it seemed to play a very particular role. It was one of the aspects of his article, of the precise communication that he made on this subject. It is on its role in the female psyche. He made it because he approached it from this angle, and from a certain angle of his experience.

This phantasy is of course far from being limited to the field and to the cases that Freud spoke about on this occasion, but if one looks closely at it, it is its quite legitimately limited field in as much as this phantasy plays a particular role at a certain turning point of development, and a particular point in the development of feminine sexuality, and very precisely in so far as the intervention of the function of the signifier phallus which plays its particular role within obsessional neurosis, and (13) in all the cases where we see emerging what are called sadistic phantasies.

The presence, the predominance of what is, when all is said and done, this enigmatic element gives its prevalence to this instrument which one cannot say is explained properly in any way in terms of biological functions. One can imagine in it or find in it some relationship or other to superficial excitations; the stimulation of the skin. You sense the degree that this would be incomplete, almost artificial and obvious in character; that in the function of this element which appears so often within this phantasy, that to this function there is attached a signifying multivalency which puts the whole weight of the balance much more on the side of the signified than of anything which might be attached to a deduction of the biological order, of the order of needs, of any order whatsoever.

This notion of phantasy therefore as something which no doubt participates in the imaginary order, but which only takes up its function of phantasy in the economy, and wherever it is articulated, through its signifying function, is something which appears to me - it has not been formulated up to the present like this - which seems essential to me in order to talk about the phantasy. I would say more: I do not believe that there is another way of conceiving what are called unconscious phantasies. (14) What are unconscious phantasies, if not the latency of something which - we know it through everything that we have learned about the organisation, about the structure of the unconscious - is quite possible qua signifying chain? That there are in the unconscious signifying chains which subsist as such, and which from their structure, act on the organism, influence what appears from the outside as a symptom, this is the whole basis of analytic experience. It is much more difficult to conceive of the unconscious agency and incidence of something that is imaginary, to put the phantasy itself at the level of that which by common measure is what appears for us at the level of the unconscious, namely at the level of the signifier. The phantasy is essentially an imaginary taken up into a certain signifying function.

I cannot articulate this approach any further for the moment. It is a certain way simply of proposing to you what will later be articulated in a more precise fashion, namely the situating at the point $$$ with respect to little o , of the phantastical event, the phantastical fact, being in fact itself an articulated and always complex relationship, a scenario. This is its characteristic, it is something which consequently can do without, and remain latent for a long time at a certain point, (15) something unconscious which nevertheless is already organised like a dream for example which cannot be conceived of without the function of the signifier being the only thing to give it its structure and its consistency, and at the same time its insistence.

These sadistic phantasies for example which it is a part of common experience from the beginning of the analytic investigation of obsessionals to have seen the place they occupy in the obsessional; that they occupy, but that they do not necessarily occupy in an obvious and open manner, but only in the obsessional transformation metabolism, the attempts that the subject as such makes towards a re-equilibrium of what is the object of his research, an equilibrium, namely of something which is to recognise himself in relation to his desire. Of course when we see a raw obsessional, in his natural state, as happens or is supposed to happen in the published cases, what we find, is someone who speaks above all about all sorts of hindrances, of inhibitions, of barriers, of fears, of doubts, of interdictions. We also know that here and now this is not the moment that he will speak to us about this phantasy life. We also know that it is in the obsessionals with regard to whom, either therapeutic interventions, or autonomous attempts at a solution, a way out, (16) an elaboration of their own properly obsessional difficulty, that we will see appearing in a more or less predominant fashion, the invasion in his previous life, in his psychic life of these phantasies which we qualify on this occasion by the simple etiquette of sadistic, namely of those phantasies which already propose to us as one might say their enigma in so far as we cannot be content with articulating them as manifestations of a tendency, but of an organisation itself signifying relationships of the subject to the other as such.

You know on the other hand the degree to which these phantasies can take on in certain subjects a really invasive, absorbing, captivating form, which can swallow up as one might say parts, whole areas of their psychical life, of their living experience, of their mental preoccupations. It is a question indeed in this instance of trying to construct for ourselves a formula for the economic role of this phantasy in so far as it is articulated and subsistent here.

These phantasies have the characteristic of being phantasies which remain in these subjects at the state of phantasies, which are not realised except in an altogether exceptional fashion, and which in any case are moreover always disappointing for the subject, in as much precisely as we ourselves observe on this occasion the mechanics of this relationship of the subject to

(17) desire, namely in the measure that he may try in ways which are proposed to him, to approach, it is precisely to this degree that the approach to his desires comes to be extinguished, to be deadened and to disappear. The obsessional is a Tantulus, I might say, if Tantulus were not an image which is presented to us by the authentic and fairly rich infernal iconography, as an image which is above all oral. But it is nevertheless not for nothing that I present it to you, and as such, because we will see that this oral underlay to what constitutes the point of equilibrium, the level, the situation of the phantasy of the obsessional as such, must all the same exist because after all it is this plane which on the phantastical plane is rejoined by the therapist, by the analyst himself, in as much as, as you have seen, I referred to it in connection with the therapeutic line which is traced in the series of three articles, it is to a sort of phantastical absorption that certain therapists and a major part of analytic practice has committed itself, with no doubt certain results which remain to be criticised, has committed itself to finding the way in which a new mode of equilibrium, a certain tempering as one might say is made accessible to the obsessional along this path of the realisation of his desire.

(18) Let us observe nevertheless that by taking things from this angle, we only see one aspect of the problem. From the other aspect, we must deploy this range successively, and of course we are not overlooking what appears in the most obvious fashion in the symptoms of the obsessional, that which is usually presented in the form of what is called the exigencies of the super ego.

We are now going to deal with the fashion in which we should conceive of these exigencies, the root of these exigencies in the obsessional. I believe that we can indicate and read what happens in the obsessional, at the level of this schema in a fashion which I believe will reveal itself subsequently to be no less fruitful.

One could say that the obsessional is always in the process of asking for permission. This I believe is something that you will find at the concrete level, at the level of what the obsessional tells you in his symptoms. This is even inscribed, and very often articulated. He is always in the process of asking for permission, and we will see what the next step is, but the fact that if we trust this schema, what happens at this level is important. To ask for permission, is precisely to have as subject a certain relationship with one's demand. A permission (19) for the obsessional is after all the reinstatement of this Other (with a capital O) who is precisely what we have said, in order to enter into this dialectic which was threatened, put in question, even put in danger, to place himself in the most extreme dependence with respect to the Other (with a capital O), namely with the Other in so far as he speaks. This already is something which indicates for us the degree to which it is essential for the obsessional to maintain this place. I would even say that it is indeed here that we see the pertinence in Freud of what he always calls Versagung, refusal, refusal and permission moreover implied at the basis, the pact of something which is refused, as one might say, against a background of promise, instead of talking about frustration.

It is not at the level of the pure and simple demand that the problem of relationships to the Other is posed when you are dealing with a completed subject. It is posed in this way when we try to have recourse to development, when we imagine for ourselves a little child more or less powerless before its mother, namely when we ourselves make an object of someone who is at the mercy of someone else. But once the subject is in this relationship which we have defined with the Other through the word, there is beyond any response of the Other, and very precisely in so far as the word creates this beyond of his (20) response, there is a virtual point somewhere, no doubt it is not only virtual, but in fact if there had not been analysis, we could not answer for the fact that anyone gets there, except by this sort of masterful and spontaneous analysis which we always suppose to be possible for someone who could realise perfectly the "Know thyself". But it is certain for us that we have every reason to think that this point has never been delineated up to the present in a strict fashion except in analysis.

What the notion of Versagung delineates is in itself properly speaking this situation of the subject with respect to demand, and here what I want to stress, is this, and I would say that it is a little step which I only ask you to make on the same line of advance as the one which I asked you to make in connection with the phantasy. What are we talking about when we talk about the fundamental stages of relationship to the object, that we qualify as oral, as anal, even as genital? There is here a kind of mirage which is established by the fact that reprojecting all of this into development, we get the idea, but which is never anything except a notion that is reconstructed in retrospect, that a certain type of relationship structuring the Umwelt of the (21) subject around a central function, is what defines by development his relationship with the world.

By giving to everything which comes to him from his environment, a special signification, usually there is not even articulated in as elaborated a fashion, precisely the fact that all these actions for example from the environment are supposed to undergo as one might say refraction through the typical oral, anal and genital object: this is very often evaded. People speak purely and simply about an object, then alongside it they speak about environment, and do not dream for a single instant of seeing the difference that there is between this typical object of a certain relationship defined by a certain stage of rejection in the subject, and the concrete environment with its multiple incidences, namely the plurality of this object to which the subject whoever he is, is always submitted, and this whatever may be said about it, from his earliest childhood.

The so-called absence of objects, the so-called lack of objects of the suckling is something about which in the present state of our knowledge we should be very doubtful about. I must tell you as regards myself here and now if you wish to believe me, you will consider this notion as purely illusory, because it is a matter of having recourse to the direct observation of the tiniest infants, namely that there is no question of it, that the objects in the world are both multiple as well as being interesting and stimulating for him.

(22) What then is in question?

The discoveries that we have made, we can define them and articulate them as being in effect a certain style of the subject's demand. Where have we discovered them, these manifestations which have caused us to speak about relationships to the world which are successively oral, anal, even genital? We have discovered them in analyses, in the analyses which were carried out on people who had long ago superseded the stages in question, qua stages of infantile development, and we say that the subject regresses to these stages.

What do we mean when we say that he regresses to these stages?

I believe that to say that there is anything at all which resembles a return to the same imaginary stage, if they are even conceivable, but let us suppose that they can be accepted, which are those of childhood, is something which deceives us and which does not give us the true nature of the phenomenon. When we speak about fixation for example at a certain stage in the neurotic subject, what might we try to articulate that would be more satisfying than what we are usually offered? If effectively what is in question, what is our goal, what is in every case our path, is in fact what we see in analysis, namely that the subject articulates in the course of regression, and we (23) will subsequently see better what this term regression then means, articulates his present demand in analysis, in terms which allow us to recognise a particular relationship which is respectively oral, anal, genital, with a particular object.

Do you not see that this means that at a certain stage, it is in so far as they have passed to the function of signifier, that the relationships of the subject were able to exercise a decisive influence on the whole subsequent development? It is in so far as at a certain level which is the level of the unconscious, that the subject articulates his demand in oral terms, that the subject J is in a certain relationship here at the level of a virtual signifying articulation, which is that of the unconscious, it is in so far as it is in terms of absorption that the subject articulates his desire, that we can talk both of something that will present itself at a moment in our exploration with a certain value called fixation to a particular stage, and that on the other hand it will be important to get to this stage, to make the subject regress to this stage so that something essential can be elucidated from the mode in which his subjective organisation appears. But it is only in so far as what interests us, is not to give to what was more or less correctly called, at a given moment, the unsatisfaction of the subject on the plane of an oral, anal or other demand, the unsatisfaction on (24) which the subject is supposed to have come to a halt, to which we have to give compensation, gravitation, even symbolic return. It is in so far as it is at this moment of his demand that there are posed for him in a certain fashion the problems of his relationship to the Other, in so far as they are going subsequently to be altogether determining for the putting in position, the putting in place of his desire. It is in that respect only that this interests us.

In other words, everything which belongs to the demand in what has been effectively lived by the subject, is once and for all and from now on a thing of the past. The satisfactions, or the compensations which we cannot give him will never be after all but symbolic, and to give them can even be considered to be an error. It is an only an error to the extent of course that it is not completely impossible. We will see why it is not altogether impossible, precisely thanks to the intervention of phantasies, of this something more or less substantial as one might say, which is supported by the phantasy. But I believe that it is an error of orientation in analysis, because when all is said and done at the end of the analysis it leaves the question of the relationships to the Other still to be accounted for.

I am saying that the obsessional, just like the hysteric, needs an unsatisfied desire, namely a desire beyond a demand.

(25) The obsessional resolves the question of the evanescence of his desire by making of it a prohibited desire. He has it supported by the Other, and precisely by the prohibition of the Other. Nevertheless this fashion of having one's desire supported, sustained by the Other, is ambiguous. It is ambiguous, because a prohibited desire does not mean for all that a stifled desire. The prohibition is there to sustain the desire, but in order that it should be sustained, it must present itself. So this is what the obsessional does, and it is a matter of knowing how.

The fashion in which he does it, is as you know, very complex. He both shows it and does not show it at the same time, to put it plainly he camouflages himself, and it is easy to understand why. His intentions, as one might say, are not pure. This, it has already been seen, is what has been designated precisely by the aggressivity of the obsessional, that fundamentally every emergence of his desire would be for him the occasion of this projection or of this fear of retortion which would precisely inhibit all the manifestations of his desire.

I believe that this is a first approach to the question, but that it is not all, and that it is to overlook what is at stake right at the very foundation, to simply say that the obsessional rocks himself on a sort of swing which goes from the manifestation of a (26) desire which by going too far, becomes an aggressive desire, and which from there goes down again and swings back into a disappearance as one might say, into a disappearance which would be linked to this fear of effective retortion on the part of the other, of this aggressivity, namely of undergoing from him a destruction equivalent to that of the desire that he manifests.

I think that it is appropriate to take a more global view of what is in question in this instance, and to do it it is almost necessary to pass by way of the illusions which this relationship to the other develops within ourselves, I mean us analysts, the analytic theory itself.

In the final analysis this notion of the relationship to the other is always solicited by a slippage which tends to reduce desire to the problem of demand. If desire is effectively what I articulated here, namely this something which is produced in the gap that the word opens up in demand, and therefore as such beyond every concrete demand, it is clear that every attempt to reduce desire to something whose satisfaction one demands, comes up against an internal contradiction. I would say up to a certain point that the term oblativity, namely the recognition of the desire of the other as such, that in which analysts almost with one accord, at present, place the summit and acme of a (27) successful realisation of the subject, of what they call genital maturity, and of which I gave you an example the other day in a passage from the author whom I put in question, namely of this profound satisfaction taken in the satisfaction given to the demand of the other, to speak plainly what is called commonly altruism, is precisely this something which allows to escape what is effectively to be resolved in the problem of desire.

To tell the truth, I think that the term oblativity, as it is presented to us in this moralising perspective, can be called without forcing the terms, an obsessional phantasy. It is quite certain that in analysis, to all appearances hysterical temperaments - I am speaking of those which the discipline theorises about for reasons which are very easy to understand - are much more rare than obsessional natures. A part of analytic indoctrination is carried out along the line, along the pathways of obsessional wishes: the illusion, the phantasy even which is within the reach of the obsessional, is that in the final analysis the other as such should consent to his desire.

This involves in itself extreme difficulties, because it is necessary that he should be consenting, but in a completely different way, to the response to any satisfaction, to a response to a demand. But it is completely evaded, the problem is to (28) give us the solution in a short circuit. This is preferable to thinking that all things considered it is enough to be in agreement, and that in order to find happiness in life, it is enough not to inflict on others the frustrations of which one has oneself been the object. One part of the unfortunate and quite confused outcomes of analysis, finds the demand from a certain moment the subject exalted by the perspective of good intentions which are those which are established rapidly in a certain number of presuppositions for the successful termination of analytic treatment, but surrendering oneself to something which is one of the most common penchants of the obsessional, namely this something which is explained more or less: do not do to others what you would not wish to be done to you yourself.

This undoubtedly categorical imperative is quite essential and structuring in morality, but is not always of practical use in existence. It is assuredly completely beside the point when it is a question of a realisation like sexual union.

The order of relationship to the other which consists in putting oneself in his place, is something which certainly is a tempting deviation, all the more tempting in that the analyst being precisely vis-a-vis this other who is the small other, his counterpart, in an aggressive relationship, is quite naturally (29) tempted to be in this position of sparing him, as one might say. Sparing the other, is indeed what is at the basis of a whole series of ceremonials, of precautions, of detours, in short of all the intrigues of the obsessional. If it is in order to indoctrinate, to construct a kind of generalisation of what manifested itself no doubt not without reason in a much more complicated fashion in his symptoms, to make of it a kind of moralising extrapolation, and to propose to him as the goal and the way out of his problems, what can be called the oblativ way out, namely submission to the demands of the other. I believe that it was really not worth the trouble to make this detour, because in fact it is really nothing other than to substitute as experience shows, a symptom, and a very serious symptom, because it does not fail of course to engender what is going to be produced, namely the reemergence in other more or less problematic forms, of desire and the question of desire which has never been, and which could never be resolved in any way whatsoever, by these methods.

It is quite clear that in this perspective one can say that the ways that the obsessional himself finds, the ways that he finds and in which he seeks the solution to the problem of his desire, are much more adequate even though they are not adapted, because (30) the problem can at least be read there in a clear fashion. For example there are several methods of solution, there are methods of solution precisely at the level of an effective relationship with the other. The way in which the obsessional conducts himself with his counterpart when he is still capable, when he is not submerged by his symptoms, and it is rare that he is completely submerged, is something which in itself is characteristic enough and ends up no doubt in a blind alley, but gives all the same an indication which is not so bad as regards direction. For example I have spoken to you about the exploits manifested by the obsessional. What is this exploit?

For there to be exploit, it is necessary that there must be at least three, because one does not perform one's exploit all alone. There must be at least two for there to be something which resembles it, for there to be a winning performance, a sprint; then it is necessary that there should also be someone who registers it and who is the witness. It is quite clear that what the obsessional tries to obtain in the exploit, is very precisely this: he tries to obtain what we have called a little while ago the permission of the other, in the name of something which is very polyvalent. One can say because of the fact, that he had well deserved what he tried to obtain, satisfaction is not something which is classified at all on the terrain where he has well deserved it. Observe the structure of our obsessionals.

(31) What is called an effect of the super-ego, means what? It means that they inflict on themselves all sorts of particularly difficult, particularly testing tasks, that moreover they succeed at them, that they succeed at them all the more easily because precisely they desire to do so, but here they succeed very very brilliantly, and in the name of this they will have the right to a little holiday during which they can do what they wish, hence the well known dialectic of work and holidays. For the obsessional work has power, being there to liberate the time of the long sail which is that of the holidays, and the time spent on holidays usually revealing itself as time that is more or less lost. Why? Because of course what was in question, was to obtain the permission of the other, and since the other - I am speaking about the other as the other who exists - is absolutely uninterested in all this dialectic, for the simple reason that the real other is far too occupied with his own other, he has no reason to fulfil this mission of giving to the exploits of the obsessional their little reward, namely this something which would be precisely the realisation of his desire in so far as this desire has nothing to do with the terrain on which he has demonstrated all his capacities.

(32) This is certainly a very tangible phase, whose humorous side it is well worth the trouble of exposing. But it is not limited to that, it is precisely the interest of concepts like those of the big Other and the little other, that they are applicable to, can structure living relationships in much more than one direction. One could also say from a certain point of view, that in the exploit the subject dominates, and this has been said by other people besides myself, tames, even domesticates what is called a fundamental anxiety, and here again I believe that a dimension of the phenomenon is overlooked, namely that the essential is not in this expertise, in this risk which is run which is always in the case of the obsessional a risk run within certain strict limits, I mean in the fact that a wise economy strictly distinguishes all that the obsessional risks in his exploit, from anything which resembles what can be called the risk of death in the Hegelian dialectic.

There is something in the exploit of the obsessional which remains irremediably fictitious, for the reason that death, I mean the place where the real danger lies, is somewhere quite other than in the adversary which he seems effectively to be defying. It is precisely on the side of this invisible witness, of this Other who is there as spectator, the one who keeps the

(33) score, and the one who is going to say about the other: "Really," - as is said somewhere in Schreber's delusion - "he is quite a stud." But this sort of exclamation was encountered as a way of acknowledging the success, as implicit, as latent, as wished for in all this dialectic of the exploit. The obsessional here puts into a certain relationship the existence of the other as being his counterpart, as being the one in whose place he can put himself, and it is precisely because he cannot put himself in his place that there is in reality no kind of essential risk in the display he puts on, in its effects of cutting a fine figure, of playing a sport, of risks that are more or less taken, this other with whom he plays, is never in the long run anything more than an other who is himself, another who already in any case leaves him the palm, from whatever aspect he approaches things. But the other before whom all of this happens, he is one one who is important, it is he also who must at all costs be preserved, is the point, the locus in which there is registered as one might say the exploit, it is there that there is inscribed as one might say his history, this point which must be maintained at all costs, and which makes him adhere to such an extent to everything which is of the verbal order, to every thing which is of the order of computation, of recapitulation, of inscription, of falsification also, and which means that what the obsessional wants above all to maintain (34) without appearing to do so, while appearing to aim at something else is this Other (with a capital O) in whom things are articulated in terms of signifier.

Here therefore is a first approach by which we can begin to approach this wish, because beyond every demand and what he desires, it is a question of seeing at what the behaviour of the obsessional is aimed in its totality. It is certain that this maintenance of the Other (with a capital O), is for him the essential aim, because it is the first aim, the preliminary aim within which alone there can be given this validation of his desire which is so difficult. What is this validation and what will it be? This is what we will subsequently have to articulate. But first of all it is necessary that the four corners as one might say of the behaviour, should be fixed in such a fashion that the trees as one might say do not hide the forest from us, and that when we see one or other of these little mechanisms, we will not in a way be brought to a halt, fascinated by this mechanism making of it a species, because it has a certain style, finding there this satisfaction. Obviously that one has always to dwell on a particular detail of an organism, is not a completely illegitimate satisfaction, because a detail always reflects well in fact, at least in the domain of natural phenomena, something of the totality, but in a material which is (35) so little organised in a natural way as that of the relationships of the subject to the signifier, we cannot entirely depend on the reconstruction of the whole obsessional organisation, starting from one or other mechanism of defence, because of course all of this, you could find yourself expressing it in a catalogue of mechanisms of defence.

I am trying to do something different. I am trying to help you find the four cardinal corners around which each of the defences of the subject is oriented and polarised.

Here already are two for today, namely this corner that we tackled first, the role of the phantasy. We now see in connection with the exploit that this presence of the other as such, is something which is quite fundamental. There is another point whose chapter heading I would at least like to introduce you to. In hearing me talking about exploit, you have of course thought about all sorts of behaviour of your obsessionals. There is an exploit which does not perhaps deserve to be put under the same heading, it is what is called in analysis acting out. In this connection I have devoted myself - you will devote yourselves also I hope, following my example, even if it is only to confirm what I am advancing - to some investigations of the literature. It is very surprising, to the extent that there is no getting out of it. One person has written the best article (36) on this subject, namely , with the title: "General Problems of Acting Out". It is quite a remarkable article in that it shows that up to the present nothing of value has been articulated on the subject.

I believe that we must limit these problems. I believe that it is quite impossible to limit it, if one holds for example to the general notion that it is a symptom, that it is a compromise, that it has a double meaning, that it is an act of repetition, because this is to drown it in all sorts of repetition compulsions in their most general forms. I believe that if it has a meaning, it is always something which arises in the course of an attempt at resolving this problem of demand and desire, and this is why these sorts of acts that one calls acting out, are produced in a most preferential fashion during analysis, because all the same, whatever one effectively does in analysis, there are always attempts at the solution of the problem of the relationship of desire and demand. Acting out certainly appears along the way, in the field of this realisation of unconscious desire in analysis. It is extremely instructive, because if we examine closely what characterises the facts of acting out, we will find there all sorts of absolutely necessary components which ensure for example that it is this which absolutely (37) distinguishes them from what is called a parapraxis (un acte manqué), namely from what I call here in a more appropriate fashion, a successful act, I mean a symptom in so far as it allows a to clearly appear.

Acting out is something which for example always involves a highly signifying element, and precisely in the fact that it is enigmatic. We will never call acting out anything except an act which appears with this character of being especially unmotivated. This does not at all mean that it does not have a cause, but that precisely from a psychological point of view it cannot be given a motive, because it is always a signified act.

The role on the other hand of an object in acting out, of an object in the material sense of the term, namely that which I will be led to come back the next time, to show you precisely the limited function that should be given in all this dialectic to the role of the object, there always exists in acting out on the other hand the function and the relationship, almost the equivalence that there is between phantasy and acting out, I mean that acting out is in general structured in a way which is very close to that of a scenario. It is in its way something which is at the same level as the phantasy. There is something which distinguishes it from the phantasy and which also distinguishes it from the exploit which is that if the exploit is

Seminar 24t Wednesday 4 June 1958

Freud, in Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, devotes a chapter to identification.

In the last few seminars which remain to us this year, we are going to advance advance into this field of topography opened up by Freud after the First War, around the 1920's. Because, what (2) we have gone over this year in trying to give a dimension of the formations of the unconscious, of what that represents, is the only thing which will allow us not to go astray along the other paths that are usually taken in dealing with topography.

We shall therefore be led to indicate at least what this topography means, and very especially why it came to the forefront of the function of the ego in a quite other, manifestly different, and much more complex sense, than the use that has been made of it since. This is just to show you the direction.

For the moment I am retaining from this chapter on identification - of course you have to read it, you will have to see in what sense it is applicable to the accounts that I will give you of three types of identification which are distinguished by Freud, on the schema here, and in fact which should have for you at the point at which we have reached, precisely a mediating value, of a schema articulating, even interpreting what the structure of the unconscious is, in so far as the structure of the unconscious is fundamentally structured like a word, like a language, and on the other hand of what emerges from it in terms of topography. This is precisely what you are going to see immediately.

Freud distinguishes three types of identification. This is clearly articulated, and in a particular paragraph it is clearly (3) summarised.

"First, identification is the original form of emotional tie with an object;"

The second form is the one which he develops most particularly in this chapter, which moreover is the concrete basis of all Freud's reflection about identification, fundamentally linked to everything connected with the topography.

Let us all the same not forget as a primary fact, before appreciating the different organs as one might say of the Freudian topic, in as much as they emerge from this famous schema in the form of an egg with an eye, which is the schema which you imagine, in which you intuit the relationships of the id, the ego and the superego, an eye and somewhere a sort of pipette which is supposed to enter into the substance which is thought to represent the superego. It is obviously a very handy schema. The inconvenience of it is precisely, that in order to represent topological things, one uses spatial schemas. It is a necessity from which I myself do not escape, since I too represent my topography by a spatial schema. I try to do it with the fewest possible inconveniences, because what distinguishes topography from a spatial schema, is that this schema, this one here for example, my little network, picture this for yourselves: for example if you were to take it and (4) crumple it up, if you were to make a little ball of it and put it in your pocket. In principle the relationships always remain the same, they are relationships of linking, of order. It is obviously more difficult to do it with the schema of the egg because it is entirely oriented towards this spatial projection.

So you imagine for yourselves that by the Id Freud means to designate something which is somewhere, which is an organ on which there is this kind of protuberance which is represented by the ego, which in fact appears there like an eye. But read the text: he makes no allusion to anything at all which appears with this substantial character, something which allows it to be represented as a sort of organised differentiation. The development of bodily organs, is something quite different. The term identification means something completely different. It is on these identifications that there are supported these differentiations which are of another kind, of a quite different order to organic differentiations.

It is very important all the same to recall this, if only because this can go very far. After all there are really people who imagine that when they do anatomy, they are taking out a slice of the superego. And not only do they believe it, but they write about it and they do it with this thought in their heads.

(5) Let us see how Freud articulates the second term of identification: "Secondly, in a regressive way it becomes a substitute for a libidinal object tie, as it were by means of introjection of the object into the ego;".

I repeat, this second form of identification is the one which throughout Freud's discourse in Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, but also in , poses most problems for him, its ambiguous relationship with the object. It is here also that all the problems of analysis come together, the problem of the inverted Oedipus complex in particular.

Why at a moment, in certain cases, and in the form of the inverted Oedipus complex, does the object which is an object of libidinal attachment become the object of identification?

In some cases it is more important to sustain the problem which has been posed than to resolve it at all costs. We are absolutely not obliged to construct a representation of any sort of possible solution to this question. This question may after all be the central question, the question that we are always condemned to remain on this side of, the one constituting the pivotal point. There must be one somewhere, because wherever we place ourselves to consider that all the questions are resolved, there will always remain this question: Why are (6) we there? And how have we got to the point where everything is clear?

It is clear that there must be a point which ensures that precisely we remain plunged in the question. I am not saying that this point here, is the point in question, but however, it is clear that Freud himself, in any case, turns around it and does not claim anywhere to have resolved it.

What is important on the contrary, is to see how the coordinates as one might say of this point o vary. I repeat, this is the essential question, that of the relationship between the love for an object and the identification which is fundamentally given by experience as resulting from it.

Here Freud introduces in the clearest fashion the distinction and the opposition which is the one that at the end of one of our last seminars in which I alluded to the problem of the relationship to the phallus, to the opposition in sum of being and of having. This is how he articulates the difference that there is between erotic libidinal attachment to the loved object, and identification to this same object.

But Freud tells us clearly, in any case what his experience teaches him, which is that this identification is always regressive in nature. The coordinates, the correlates of this transformation of a libidinal attachment into identification, are coordinates which show that there is a regression.

(7) I think that all the same you know enough about it for me not to have to dot the i's. In any case I already articulated in the preceding sessions, what a regression bears witness to. You know of course, but it is a question of knowing how one articulates it here. We articulate it as follows: it is the choice of signifiers which always clearly indicates it. What we call regressing to the anal stage with all its nuances and varieties, even to the oral stage, is always the fact that we see in the present the opposition of regressive signifiers in the discourse of the subject.

There is no other regression in analysis. It sometimes happens that the subject starts crying on your couch like a child, or even imitates its behaviour. But we are not accustomed to see in this the true regression that you see in analysis. This sort of imitation on the part of the patient does happen, but it is generally not in cases which have a good prognosis, and that is not what you are usually accustomed to call regression.

At the point that we have got to with these two forms of identification, we are going to try to apply them on our schema and to see what they mean.

If the two lines which, when we place ourselves here, namely at the level of the need of the subject - the term is employed by (8) Freud. I point out to you in passing that Freud, and precisely in connection with the same reflection concerning the emergence of identification and its relationships with object cathexis, tells us in a certain sentence:

"We can only suppose that later on object-cathexes".

I would like to point out to you in passing that Jankelevitch's translation of these chapters, makes them quite unintelligible, and sometimes makes them say exactly the contrary of Freud's text. The term object-cathexis is translated there by concentration sur l'object, which is unbelievably obscure.

"..... object-cathexes proceed from the Id which feels erotic trends as needs."

You see that the Es is here something which is proposed as very ambiguous. It perceives erotic stimulations, pressures, erotic tensions as need.

Whatever may be the case from the perspective of need, these lines give therefore the two horizons of demand, namely of demand here qua articulated, a demand for the satisfaction of a need, in so far as every demand for the satisfaction of a need must pass through the defiles of articulation which are made necessary by language, and on the other hand, by the very fact of passing onto the plane of the signifier, as one might say in its existence and no longer in its articulation, what results (9) from it at the level of the one to whom the demand is addressed, namely of the other, from this unconditional demand for love in so far as it is linked to the fact that the one to whom one thus addresses oneself is herself symbolised, namely that she appears as a presence against a background of absence, that she may be rendered present qua absent, namely this other horizon.

Before an object can be loved in the erotic sense of the term, in the sense that the eros of the loved object can be perceived as need, the establishment, the position of the demand creates the horizon of the demand for love.

These two lines, are separated on this schema, the one of the demand as demand for the satisfaction of a need, and the one of the demand for love. They are separated for a reason of topological necessity, but the remarks made above apply. That does not mean that they are not one and the same line, namely what the child articulates in the mother.

In other words, the ambiguity, the simultaneity as one might say, of the unfolding of what happens on these two lines in so far as they are lines where what belongs to the need of the subject is articulated as signifier, this superposition, this simultaneity, this ambiguity is something which is always presented to us in a permanent state. You are going to see an immediate application of it: this ambiguity is very precisely (10) the ambiguity which the notion of transference as such, I mean the action of transference in analysis, maintains throughout the whole work of Freud, in a permanent fashion, with that of suggestion. Freud tells us the whole time that after all transference is a suggestion, that we use it as such, but he adds: except that we make something completely different of it, because we interpret this suggestion.

But what does that mean, if not that yes, we can interpret suggestion? The fact is that a background is provided to suggestion as such, that as I might say, transference is potentially there. We know very well that this exists and I am going to give you an example of it immediately.

The potential transference is already analysis of suggestion, it is itself the possibility of this analysis of suggestion, it is a second articulation of what, in suggestion, is purely and simply imposed on the subject. In other words, the line on the horizon on which suggestion is based, is there, it is very essentially at the level of demand, of the demand that the subject makes to the analyst, by the very fact that he is there.

What are these demands? How can we situate them? It is very important to make the point from the beginning, because it is extremely variable. There are really people for whom the (11) demand to be cured is there present at every moment. Others better informed, know that it has to be postponed until tomorrow. There are others who are there for something other than to demand a cure, they have come to have a look. There are those who are there to become analysts. What importance does this have for knowing the place of demand, because from the fashion in which the analyst even by not replying to it, established like that, replies to it, is constitutive of all the effects of suggestion, but do not tell me that it is enough to say that the transference is here something thanks to which suggestion can operate. This is usually the idea that people have of it, not alone is it the usual idea, but I would say that up to a certain moment of his text, Freud writes that if it is appropriate to allow the transference to become established, it is because it is legitimate to use the power of what? Of suggestion which transference gives, transference conceived here as the hold and the power of the analyst on the subject, as the affective link which makes the subject depend on him; that it is legitimate for us to use it so that an interpretation can get across.

What is this, if not to enunciate at this level in the clearest fashion, that we use suggestion? It is because the patient, to call things by their names, has come to love us, that our interpretations are accepted. We are on the plane of (12) suggestion. Now, of course Freud does not mean to limit himself to this. But when people say: yes, we are going to analyse the transference, pay careful attention to the bifurcation which appears at this level. It is a bifurcation which appears at this level, it is a bifurcation which causes the transference to vanish completely in so far as it is, let us say - I underline the terms, because they are not mine, but those which are implicit in every discussion of this subject of transference understood as an affective hold on the subject, because if we consider that at that moment we distinguish ourselves from the one who bases himself on his power over the patient in order to get across the interpretation that he suggests, by the fact that we are going to analyse this effect of its power, what else are we doing but deferring the question to infinity. Therefore namely that it is once again from transference that we will analyse what has happened from the fact that the subject has accepted the interpretation. For example there is no reason to get out in this way from the infernal circle of suggestion. Now, we suppose precisely that something different is possible. The fact is therefore that transference is something other than the use of a power, transference is already an open field, the possibility of another and a different signifying articulation from the one which locks the subject into demand.

This is why it is legitimate, whatever its content may be, to (13) place at the horizon the following which is called here, not the line of suggestion, but the line of transference, namely this articulated something which is potentially beyond what is articulated on the plane of demand.

Now, if what is there on the horizon, is what produces demand as such, namely the symbolisation of the other, namely the unconditional demand for love, it is here that the object comes to lodge itself subsequently, but qua erotic object. It is there that it is aimed at by the subject, and to say that the identification succeeding in him to this aiming at the object as loved, that the identification in replacing it is a regression, means precisely that what is in question, is the ambiguity between this line of transference, as I might say, and the line of suggestion, because we know - and I articulated this for a long time, right from the beginning, and Freud articulates it for us here - that on this line of suggestion identification is constructed in its primary form, this identification that we know well, this identification to the insignia which ensure that the other qua subject of demand, the one who has the power to satisfy it or not to satisfy it, and who marks this satisfaction at every instant by something which of course is in the foreground, her language, her word, the spoken relationships of the child with the mother - I underlined their importance, they (14) are essential - and which ensure that all the other signs, all the pantomime of the mother as was said last evening, is something which is articulated in terms of signifiers are crystallised in the conventional character of these so called emotional mimics which are the things with which the mother communicates with the child, and which give to every kind of expression of emotions in mankind, this conventional character which ensures that the so called expressive spontaneity of emotions is revealed to examination, and this without one necessarily having to be a Freudian for that, as not only altogether problematic, but completely uncertain; namely that which in a certain area of signifying articulation of emotions signifies a certain emotion, would have in another area - it is a reference - a quite different value from the point of view of the expression of emotions.

Therefore identification as such, if it is regressive, it is precisely in so far as the ambiguity remains permanent between the line of transference and the line of suggestion.

In other words, we should not be surprised that in what follows, in the development, in the detours of analysis, we see the regressions being punctuated by a series of identifications which are correlative to them, which mark their times, their (15) rhythms. Moreover they are different. You cannot have regression and identification at the same time. The latter are the arrests, the stoppages of the former. But it remains that if there is transference, it is very precisely in order that this should be maintained on a different plane to that of suggestion, namely that this should be aimed at, not as something to which no satisfaction of demand responds but as such, as a signifying articulation, and this is what distinguishes one from the other.

You will say to me: what is the operation which ensures that we keep them distinct? Precisely our operation is the abstinent or abstentionist one, which consists in never gratifying the demand as such. This we know, but this abstention, even though it is essential, is not sufficient in itself. Obviously, it is because it is in the nature of things that these two lines remain distinct, that they can remain so. In other words, it is because for the subject they are distinct, and that precisely between the two there is a whole field which, thank God, is not slight, namely which is never abolished, and which is called the field of desire, that they can remain distinct.

In other words everything that is asked of us, is through our presence there as other, not to favour this confusion, because of course it is enough that we should listen there as other,

(16) and especially in the way that we enter it, with what we call the permissive character of analysis, but permissive only on the verbal plane. But that is enough, it is enough that things should be permissive on the verbal plane. Why? Not at all of course for the patient to be satisfied, because he is all the same satisfied by that, but he is not satisfied in the elements of the real. But it is enough that he should be satisfied on the plane of demand in order that confusion should be irremediably established between these two planes: the one which I call the line of transference, and the one which I call the line of suggestion.

We are therefore, through our presence, and in so far as we listen to the patient, what tends to make the line of transference become confused with the line of demand, we are therefore harmful in principle, and that is what that means.

Regression is our way, but it is a descending way, it is a way which with respect to the end of our action, does not designate its goal, but the detour, and it is this that we must continually keep in mind. Thank God there is something which prevents this irremediable confusion from being established again, that there is a whole technique of analysis which has no other goal and no other end than to establish this confusion, and that is the reason that it ends up in a transference

(17) neurosis, and that you afterwards see it written in a journal called La Revue Française de Psychanalyse, that in order to resolve what is called the question of transference, there is only one thing to do: sit the patient down, show him the nice things, show him what is beautiful in the outside world, and to tell him to leave your office slowly, in order not to disturb the flies; and this by a great technician!

Fortunately there is between the two lines which oppose this confusion, between the line of transference and the line of suggestion, there is between the two precisely desire and all that, they are such obvious things, that the hypnotists, let us say simply those who are interested in hypnosis, know very well, that no suggestion, however successful, completely takes over the subject.

What resists? Very precisely this: I would not even say one or other desire of the subject, it is obvious, but very essentially the following: it is the desire to have one's desire. It is still more obvious, but that is not a reason for not saying it.

These are for the subject the forms for the necessary maintenance of desire, thanks to which he remains what belongs to the very nature of the human subject as such, a divided subject. If he is no longer a divided subject, he is mad; he remains a divided subject because there is here a desire whose (18) field after all must not be all that easy to maintain either, because what I am explaining to you, is that the reason why a neurosis is constructed the way it is constructed, a hysterical neurosis, an obsessional neurosis, is in order to maintain something articulated which is called desire.

And this is well defined. Neurosis, is not more or less strength or more or less weakness, or fixation understood in this kind of intuitive sense which also consists in imagining fixation as something which has come to a point where the subject has put his foot in a pot of glue; fixation, is obviously something different. If it resembles anything, it is rather these pegs for maintaining something which otherwise would escape.

What is called the quantitative element, the strength of desire in neurotics, is very variable and I would say that it is one of the more convincing things for ensuring the autonomy of what is called structural modification in the neurosis. The fact is that it is obvious from experience that neurotics who have the same form of neurosis are people who are differently gifted from the point of view of what one of the authors in question regarding obsessional neurosis, calls somewhere "the exuberant and precocious sexuality" of one of his patients.

(19) I must say that the exuberant and precocious sexuality of a patient who is the one of whom it is said somewhere that "he masturbated by lightly pinching the peripheral part of the foreskin, convinced, at the time that irreparable lesions would be produced He did not dare to wash away the secretionsbecause he dreaded wounding himself and losing something. The advice of his doctor gave him more precise ideas about sexual matters he had had to consult a doctor because of repeated failures in the attempts to have intercourse".

We know well that these are all symptoms. The subject will reveal himself in the milieu at least where the author takes his analysis, quite capable of satisfying his wife and of fulfilling his duties as a husband. But still...but still...We are not after all going to talk about an exuberant sexuality which is that which by whatever strength we may suppose the symptoms to be supported, allows itself all the same to languish, to be lured to the point that one can give such a description of a subject who has already reached an advanced age. Which does not mean that on the other hand, another obsessional neurotic might not show you a different picture, for example that of a sexuality which one could in fact qualify as exuberant, even as precocious.

It is precisely this quite tangible difference in clinical cases, which moreover does not prevent us from recognising that it is a question in all these cases of one and the same obsessional neurosis, which shows us that the reason why (20) it is an obsessional neurosis, is to be situated quite elsewhere than in this quantitative element of desire. If it intervenes, it is uniquely, and in as much as it will precisely have to pass into what I call the defiles of the structure. But what characterises the neurosis in this instance, is the structure, namely that something for example in the case of the obsessional, which ensures that his desire, whether his desire is weak, whether he is in the middle of puberty, or whether he comes to us when he is forty or fifty years old, and he wants to understand a little about what has happened, namely about what he has understood nothing of up to then in his existence, namely at a time when all the same his desire is declining. This is what in all these cases will present itself not at all as the weakness or the strength of desire, but in the fact that on the contrary, weak or strong, the obsessional throughout the whole duration of his existence is preoccupied with putting his desire in a strong position, with constituting a fortress for desire, and this on the plane of relations which are essentially signifying relationships. In this fortress, there dwells a weak desire or a strong desire.

That is not where the question lies. There is one thing certain, it is that in all these cases these fortresses are double edged; the fortresses which are constructed against the (21) outside are much more troublesome still for those who are inside, and that is where the problem is.

You see therefore that the first form of identification is defined for us by the first link to the object, namely at the level of that identification that takes place, if you wish, to schematise identification, to the mother.

The other form of identification, is identification to the loved object qua regressive, namely in so far as it must be produced completely elsewhere, at a point on the horizon which of course is not altogether easy to reach because precisely being unconditional, or more exactly submitted to the sole condition of the existence of signifier, because without the existence of the signifier, there is no openness possible to the dimension of love as such. It is entirely dependent, being the only condition for the existence of the signifier, but within this existence of any particular articulation, if it is not from the fact that there is the existence of the articulation, and this is the reason that it is not altogether easy to formulate because in fact nothing is able to complete it, to fulfil it, that not even the totality of my discourse in my whole existence, because it is in addition the horizon of my discourses.

Which precisely poses the question of what this capital i means, but at this level. In other words, what subject is in question?

(22) There is no need to be astonished that this never constitutes anything but a horizon, namely that the whole problem is to know what is going to be constructed, to be articulated, to be articulated in this direction, in this interval. This direction in which what is articulated, is articulated for the neurotic in sum, is the right one, the neurotic who lives out what? Who lives out the paradox of desire exactly like everybody else, because there is no human being inserted in the human condition who escapes from it. The only difference between what is called a normal relationship of desire and the neurotic, is not simply this paradox, because this paradox of desire is fundamental, it is that the neurotic is open to the existence of this paradox as such, which of course, does not simplify his existence for him, but all the same does not put him in too bad a position compared to a certain point of view, that we can in this instance squarely articulate [as] the point of view of the philosopher.

The point of view of the philosopher is not clear either. In other words, that it can very well be questioned in the same way as the point of view of the neurotic. One does not even know if he has occasion to do it.

Whether this is valid or not, it is sure that it is in the nature of things that it should be so, because it is all the same on something, on a path, on a line, on an opening that he (23) has some relationship with what the philosopher articulates, or at least what he should articulate, because in fact have you seen this problem of desire well and truly, and carefully, and correctly, and powerfully articulated in a philosophical way. Up to the present, one of the things that appears to me as most characteristic of philosophy, is that this is what is most carefully avoided in philosophy.

This would push me to open another parenthesis on the philosophy of action, and which would culminate in the same conclusions, namely that the action that is continually being spoken about, namely when one sees in it some intrusion or other of spontaneity, of the originality of man in so far as he succeeds here in transforming the data of the problem, in transforming the world as they say. It is very peculiar that what is never highlighted is what nevertheless for us is this truth of experience, namely this profoundly paradoxical character and quite related to the paradox, of desire to action, those traits and those features that I began to introduce you to the last time by alluding to the character of exploit, of performance, of demonstration, of action, even of a despairing outcome.

All these terms that I employ are not my own, because the term Verwerfell [?] is employed by Freud to designate the quite (24) paradoxical action, quite generalised action, human action. Human action is especially there when one pretends to designate it, in accordance with history, as the passage of the Rubicon. My friend Kojève [?] speaks of it as something which is the point of agreement, the harmonious solution between the present, the past and the future of these souls, even though the last time I passed that way, I always saw it dry. It was immense, and at the time when I was there, it was dry. It was not the same season as when Caesar crossed it; and even in the fact that Caesar crossed the Rubicon with Caesar's genius, in the fact of passing the Rubicon, there is always something which involves one taking the plunge since it is a river.

In other words, human action is not something all that harmonious, and for us analysts, it is indeed the most astonishing thing in the world that no one in analysis has proposed, or has tried to articulate the question of action.

precisely in this paradoxical perspective in which we continuously see it, which we never see otherwise. Which moreover gives us plenty of trouble in properly defining what is called strictly speaking acting out, acting out in a certain sense, in this respect, being an action like another, but precisely taking on its characteristics by being provoked by the fact that we use transference, namely that we do something (25) extremely dangerous, and all the more dangerous in that as you see according to what I suggest, we do not have a very precise idea of what it is.

Perhaps this is an indication in passing, which will clarify for you what I mean, if I say that resistance, and resistance in a quite tangible and natural manner, namely resistance in as much as the subject in some cases does not accept the interpretations as we present them to him precisely on the plane of regression, and something which seems to fit in so well at first sight, namely that for him it does not at all seem to fit in like that, and if the subject resists, he will end up by leaving us if we insist, since we are always ready to play on the chord of suggestion.

This resistance, in so far as it expresses the necessity of maintaining the point at which it is a question precisely of articulating desire differently, namely on the plane of desire, this resistance, what value does it have? Very precisely the value that Freud in certain texts gives it. If he calls it: Übertragungswiderstand, it is because it is the same thing as transference, transference in the sense that I am talking about for the moment, where no doubt what it is a question of maintaining, is the other line, the line of transference, the line where articulation has another exigency than the one which (26) we give it immediately, in response to demand.

I would like to tell you, after this reminder which only corresponds to the facts, but to facts which I believe all the same I believe need to be articulated, to tell you that the second identification means the point at which is judged what happens qua regressive, that it is this transference appeal which permits this confusion of signifiers which is called regression, and which should lead us to something beyond itself which is what we are trying to aim at for the moment, namely how to operate with transference, but which quite naturally tends to be degraded into something which we can always satisfy at its regressive level in a certain fashion, namely in constructing for ourselves a certain conception of analysis, the one precisely which allows itself to be fascinated by the notion of frustration, and by different articulations which in this instance are expressed in a thousand fashions in object-relations.

All the fashions, if I might say, of articulating analysis, always tend to become degraded, which does not prevent analysis from being something different, all the same.

The third form of identification, Freud articulates for us like this:

"... it may arise with any new perception of a common quality shared with some other person who is not an object of the sexual (27) instinct."

Where is this third identification situated?

Freud exemplifies it for us in a fashion which allows no kind of ambiguity in the way of responding to it on this schema. He gives as an example the identification of the hysteric. He articulates it for us exactly. As I have been telling you all this time, in Freud it is always said in the clearest fashion: for the hysteric the problem is to fix somewhere in the sense that an optical instrument allows a point to be fixed, to fix her desire, this desire which for her comes to present some special difficulties.

Let us try to articulate this more precisely. This desire, is all the same for her destined to reach some impasse or other, because she cannot realise this fixation of the point of her desire except on the condition of identifying herself to anything at all, to a small trait. Freud writes: when I say an insignium, a trait, a single trait, he says, it does not matter which, of someone else in whom she can sense that there is the same problem of desire, namely that her impasse, for the hysteric, opens wide for her the doors of the other, at least wide open from the point of view of all the others, namely of all possible hysterics, even of all the hysterical moments of everyone else, in so far as she senses in them for a moment the same problem which is that of this question about desire.

(28) Here therefore is how Freud situates it. I will show it to you: the question, even though it is articulated a little differently, is from the point of view of the relationship of topology, exactly the same for the obsessional, and for good reasons!

In other words, this identification that is in question is the one which is here, namely the locus where I designated the phantasy for you the last day in the obsessional. It is in so far as there is a point where the subject has to establish a certain imaginary relationship with the other, not in itself as I might say, and why? Namely in so far as it is this imaginary relationship which brings him satisfaction. It is made quite precise for us that it is a question here of a person or of an object who has no relationship with any something else, it is a support, if you wish it is a puppet of the phantasy. I gave to this word phantasy all the extension that you could wish. It is question of the phantasy as I articulated it the last time, and as I will return to it, in so far as the phantasy can be an unconscious phantasy. Here the other only serves, which is not a small thing, to allow the subject to hold a certain position which avoids this collapse of desire, which avoids the problem of the neurotic.

It is

Here is a third form of identification which is quite essential. (29) Since I do not know where it would lead us, because it always takes longer than one thinks, to get into a reading of the observation of the article which appeared in the Revue Française de Psychanalyse - which contains my report on aggressivity in psychoanalysis - (July/September 1948, observation 2 of the article called: "Importance de l'aspect homosexuel du transfert". I am asking you to read it. I will come back to it, but I want in this connection to articulate today the point where I designate the technical error of analysing the current homosexual transference in an obsessional neurosis.

What is produced, in so far as the phallic object appears in the phantasies, and notably the phallic object in so far as it is phantastically the phallus of the analyst, is something which appears there at the proliferating point already established, but which can always be stimulated, namely there where the subject qua obsessional, maintains by his phantasy the possibility of maintaining himself which is much more risky and much more dangerous for the hysteric faced with her desire.

It is here that there appears, the phantastical phallus in so far as in this technique that I am indicating, it is here that the analyst is going to make his present interpretations, insisting, that the subject should in some way consent to commune, to swallow, to incorporate phantastically this partial object.

(30) I am saying that this is an error of plane, that it is very strictly to put onto the plane of suggestive identification, onto the plane of demand, what is being put in question there at that moment; that it is to favour a certain imaginary identification of the subject by taking advantage, as I might say, of the hold given by the suggestive position opened to analysis on the basis of transference; that it is to give a false, deviant, inexact solution to what is in question, I am not saying in his phantasies, but in the material that the subject effectively brings to the analyst, and this can be read in the observations themselves where one sees being constructed on this a whole doctrine, a whole theory of partial objects, of the distance from the object, of the introjection of the object, and everything that results from it, and in order just to introduce what I will continue with the next time in detail, I am going to give you an example of it.

At every moment in this observation, there is the tangible, perceptible fact that the problem which is the solution of the analysis of the obsessional, is that the obsessional discovers castration for what it is, namely as the law of the other. It is the other who is castrated, and for reasons which are those of his faulty implication in this problem, the subject feels himself threatened by this castration, to such an intense degree, that he cannot approach his desire without feeling its effects.

(31) What I am in the process of saying, is that this horizon of the Other, of the big Other as such, and qua distinct from the small other and from the fact that the problem is there, is tangible at every instant in this observation. From the beginning in his anamnesis, this subject who the first time that he has an encounter with a little girl, flees, hurrying away in anxiety and going to confide it to his mother, and feeling himself completely reassured from the moment that he says to her: "I will tell you everything". You only have to take this material literally.

There is only one reference and one support which of course is a virtual support, a project, only a desperate reference to the Other as locus of the verbal articulation in which the subject is in future going to invest himself entirely. It is the only possible refuge for the panic that he experiences at the approach of his desire. It is already inscribed. It is a matter of seeing what is beneath.

When after all sorts of solicitations from the analyst, certain phantasies come to light, we come to a dream that the analyst interprets. He describes it immediately and strictly, as the fact that the passive homosexual tendency of the subject is becoming obvious. Here is the dream:

"I am accompanying you to your private residence. In your room there is a large bed. I lie down on it. I am extremely embarrassed. There is a bidet in the corner of the room.

(32) I am happy, though uneasy."

We are told that after a preparation of this subject by a previous period of the analysis, the subject does not experience much difficulty in admitting the passive homosexual signification of this dream.

To your eyes does that seem sufficient to articulate it? Undoubtedly in taking up this observation again, one can show all the indices which prove that it does not suffice, but there is one thing certain, it is that the text itself of the dream shows that the subject has put himself, it is the least that can be said, in the place of the other; he says it: "I am at your private residence. I am lying in your bed."

Why passive homosexual? From what we see, nothing appears there which in this instance makes of the other an object of desire. On the other hand I see here in a completely clear fashion, also designated in a third position, and in a corner, something which is fully articulated and to which nobody seems to pay attention, which is still not there for nothing. It is the bidet. Namely something which at once hints at the phallus and does not show it, because I do not foresee that in the dream that it is indicated that anybody is in the process of using it. The bidet is here indicating that what we are dealing with, what is problematic, it is in fact something which is present in the (33) question. It is not for nothing that this famous partial object comes. It is the phallus, but the phallus is posed there precisely as I might say, qua question: does the other have it or does he not have it? It is the opportunity to show it. Is the other it or is he not it? This is what is in the background. In short, it is the question of castration, the very question if you wish, for this obsessional beset by all sorts of obsessions about cleanliness which show well the degree to which on occasion, this instrument can be a source of danger.

And these obsessions about cleanliness, it is not for nothing that I evoke them here, because I read you this little piece about the bidet which shows that the bidet for him, for a long time, presentified the phallus, at least his own. It is the question about the phallus, and about the phallus in so far as it comes into play, and at the level of the other as being the object of this essentially symbolic operation which ensures that in the other, and at the level of the other, and at the level of the signifier, the phallus is the signifier of what is struck by the action of the signifier, of what is subject to castration.

It is in this essential articulation, namely in so far as the aim is not to know whether at the end the subject will feel himself strengthened by the assumption of a superior power, by the assimilation to one that is stronger than him, but to know (34) how he will have effectively resolved the question which is implicit at the horizon on the very line of what indicates the structure of the neurosis indicates, namely the acceptance or not of the castration complex, in so far as being realised, it is realised in its signifying function.

It is here that one technique is distinguished from the other, and I will show you why, independently of the legitimacy linked to the structure, linked to the very meaning of the existence of the desire of the obsessional, independently of that, the therapeutic solution itself, if you wish, the knot, the completion, the scar let us say, that is obtained, leaves absolutely no doubt that a certain technique is not favourable, does not correspond to what one can call a cure, nor even to an orthopedics, even a clumsy one, that the other alone can give, not only the correct solution, but the effective solution.

Seminar 25: Wednesday 11 June 1958

We are going to continue our account still with the help of our little schema.

Some of you are asking questions about the little diamond shaped sign as it is employed for example when I write: ^ in front of o, the small other. This does not seem to me to be very complicated. But after all because some of you are asking the question, I recall that the diamond in question, is the same thing as the square of a much older and much more fundamental schema:

in which there is inscribed the relationship of the subject to the other qua object of the word, and qua message of the other in this first approximation that we made of what comes from the (2) other and encounters the barrier of the relationship o - o', which is the imaginary relationship.

What does that mean?

That means that it expresses the relationship of the barred or unbarred subject as the case may be, namely qua marked by the effect of the signifier, simply that we consider as a subject still quite simply undetermined, still not split by the Spaltung which results from the action of the signifier, the relationship therefore of this subject to something which is determined by this quadratic relationship, and which, when I write it like that, is not otherwise determined as regards the vertices of the quadrangle in question in this frame, for example of the small other, that is of the counterpart, of the imaginary other.

If I write $ with regard to demand, or ^ ^ D, it is the same thing. One does not prejudge the point in the little square at which the demand as such will intervene, namely the articulation of a need in the form of the signifier.

Here we have therefore a line which is a signifying line, and undoubtedly as such, articulated. Because it is produced at the horizon of any signifying articulation, it is the fundamental backdrop for every articulation of a demand. Here (second line)

(3) it is articulated in general. However bad it may be, we have a precise articulation, a succession of signifiers, of phonemes.

Behind, that is in the beyond of every signifying articulation, this represents or corresponds to the effect of the signifying line, of the signifying articulation qua caught up in its totality, from the fact that by its simple presence it makes something symbolic appear in the real. It is in its totality, and in so far as it is articulated that it makes this horizon or this possibility of demand appear, this power of the demand which is that it is essentially and of its nature a demand for love, a demand for presence, this naturally with all its ambiguities.

I say love in order to fix something. Hate in this instance has the same place. It is uniquely on this horizon that the ambivalence of hate and of love can be conceived; it is also in this horizon that we can see coming to this same point this third term really homologous to love and to hate with respect to the subject, and precisely which I found in a text and elsewhere: ignorance.

It is here then that there is found the signifier of 0, qua marked by the action of the signifier, namely of 0 barred, namely that at this precise point which is the homologue of the point where on the line of demand there appears in this fundamental schema of every demand, this return of the passage of the (4) demand through the other which is called the message. If you like, in a homologous fashion, what has to be produced at the point of the message in the second line, is precisely this message of a signifier, signifying that the other is marked by the signifier.

That does not mean that this message is produced. It is there at a homologous point as the possibility of being produced. And on the other hand, a point homologous to this point at which the demand arrives at the other, namely where it is submitted to the existence of the code in the other, at the locus of the other, at the locus of the word.

You also have at this horizon, what can be produced which is called this reference, which is called this conscious awareness (prise de conscience). But it is not simply conscious awareness, this articulation by the subject qua speaker of something which is his demand as such, and with respect to which he situates himself.

That this should be capable of being produced, is the fundamental presupposition of analysis itself. It is what is produced in the forefront of analysis. It is not, not essentially and as a first step, the renewal by the subject of his demands. Of course in a certain fashion it is a renewal, but it is an articulated renewal; it is in his discourse that the subject in a certain fashion makes appear, either directly, or in filigree (5) running through his discourse, which is undoubtedly much more important for us when it is in filigree than when it is renewed directly by the form and the nature of his demand, namely by the signifiers in which this demand is formulated. And it is in so far as this demand is formulated in archaic signifiers than we talk about anal, or oral regression, for example.

I remind you that the last time, what I articulated, what I wished to introduce, is that everything that is produced which is properly speaking of the nature of transference, depends on the existence of this line behind, of this line which begins from a point whose start we can give by m , and which ends with a \wedge , whose meaning we will make more precise subsequently with respect to this line $w - \wedge$ of which it is the origin, the foundation.

The foundation of this effect of the signifier as such in the subjective economy, it is in so far as something is situated with respect to this line that one can talk about transference, namely that everything which is of the order of transference, according to the action or the inaction of the analyst, according to his abstention or his non-abstention, always tends to operate in this (6) intermediary zone, and can always in a certain fashion be brought back to the articulation of the demand.

In a certain fashion, of course at every instant it is I would say normal, it is in the nature of verbal articulation in analysis, that something should be articulated on the plane of demand. But if precisely the analytic law is that no demand of the subject shall be satisfied, it is precisely for no other reason than that we speculate on the fact that in analysis something will be produced which will tend to make this line of demand operate, not on the plane of a precise, formulated, satisfied or not satisfied, demand. Everybody agrees: it is not because we frustrate the subject of what he may demand of us on occasion, whether it is the extreme case of wanting to kiss our hands, or whether it is simply to answer him; it is not that which operates, it is a more profound frustration, belonging to the nature, to the essence of the word in so far as it itself causes to arise this horizon of demand, and it is always in sum at the level of this horizon which I called very simply, to fix your ideas, the demand for love, and which, as you see, may also be a demand for something else, maybe a certain demand concerning the recognition of his being, with all the conflicts that this (7) gives rise to, in as much as the analyst by his presence and qua counterpart, denies it.

The Hegelian negation of the relationship of consciences, is also glimpsed here on this occasion: the demand to know. This naturally exists at the horizon of the analytic relationship.

The reason why this interests us, the reason why this is involved in the symptoms, the reason why this serves for the resolution of neuroses, is to the extent that it is in this topological relationship with these two lines in so far as they are formed by every articulation of the word in analysis, that there are situated the four vertices of this other locus of reference of the subject to the other which is the imaginary locus of reference; in so far as here they are only false vertices. They are realised by the narcissistic or specular relationship of the ego to the image of the other, in so far as it is already on this side, anterior to, entirely implied in the first relationship of demand, and that beyond it is in the intermediary zone between the articulated demand and its essential horizon, also articulated of course, because it is the zone of all the articulations that are involved, also articulated as such because it is supported by what is articulated; but which does not of course mean articulatable, because here what is at the horizon, and strictly speaking this last term in so far as nothing suffices to formulate it in a completely satisfying fashion, (8) except by the indefinite continuation of the development of the

It is in this intermediary zone that there is situated this something which is called desire, desire in so far as it interests us, desire in so far as it is desire which is properly speaking put in question in the whole economy of the subject, and can be involved in what is revealed in analysis, namely in everything that in the word begins to move in this oscillating interplay between what I might call the down-to-earth signifiers of need, and all that results beyond the articulation of this signifier, from the constant presence of the signifier qua present in the unconscious of the subject, namely in so far as it has already moulded, formed, structured the subject, it is here in this intermediary zone, and I have told you why, that desire is situated, the desire of man in so far as it is the desire of the other, namely that it is beyond the passage of the articulation of man's need in this necessity to make it known to the other, this desire in the form of absolute condition, of something which is beyond every satisfaction of need, and which is produced in the margin which exists between the demand for the satisfaction of need and the demand for love, which is situated there. It is the problematic of this desire in so far as the desire of man is always to be sought by him in the locus of the other and which means that desire is a desire structured in this (9) locus of the other as such, and in so far as the locus of the Other is the locus of the word, which creates the whole problematic of desire, of human desire, and which makes it subject to the formations of the unconscious, to the dialectic of the unconscious, which means that we deal with it, that we can have an influence on it by the fact that it is or not articulated in the word in analysis. There would be no analysis if there were not this fundamental situation.

This having been said, we have what is, as one might say, its correspondent, its support, the point where it fixes its object which far from being some sort of natural object, is an object that is always constituted by a certain position taken up by the subject in relation to the other. It is with the help of this relationship which is phantastical in its essence, in its nature, that man finds himself and situates his desire, hence the importance of phantasies, hence the fact that in Freud you will see how rarely the term instinct is employed. It is always a question of drives, in other words of something which is a technical term given to this desire, in so far as the word isolates it, fragments it and puts it in this problematic and disjointed relationship with its proper goal, namely what is called the distinction (direction) between the tendency and its object.

On the other hand you know that it is essentially made up of substitution, of displacement, indeed all the forms of (10) transformation and equivalence essentially subjected to the word.

We had arrived the last time at the attempt to centre the problems more closely around something which must have a relationship with what is said there, because after all elements of it come through in the studies, especially of the nature of obsessional neurosis which I advised you on several occasions to get to know by your own efforts, and it is certain that certain elements: term, distance from the object, phallic object, relationship to the object, which are involved in it, cannot fail, at least in the report after these studies, to provoke us to see how we can judge them, assess them in the light of what this brings.

The last time therefore I took from the point of view of the treatment relationship, two cases of obsessional neurosis, in the article: "Importance de l'aspect homosexuel du transfert" (the case of Catherine, a false obsessional).

I pointed out to you how problematic in a certain way there appears the result of one or other of the suggestions, we could say directives, or even let us say strictly speaking interpretations, which are given in this phantasy. I pointed out to you in connection with a dream for example, how because of certain presuppositions one finds simplified in the system, one (11) comes to avoid certain outstanding elements, and therefore the dream itself. Mention was made of a homosexual transference dream, as if this itself could have a meaning when the dream itself gives the image of what is involved, namely a relationship which is far from being a dual one, in as much as I showed you in the quite piquant presence here in the form of an object, of an object which is in this instance the famous bidet mentioned in this dream, the subject then who in this dream was transported into the bed of the analyst, who is both at his ease there, in an attitude which one can describe, in accordance with the manifest content of the dream, as one of expectation, but with the quite articulated and essential presence of this bidet (lit).

One may be all the more astonished that the analyst does not pay attention to this, because another text of the same analyst shows that he is far from ignoring the strictly phallic signification of what certain analysts have called the hollowed out or cup-like penis, in so far as it is one of the forms under which the signifier phallus can present itself at the level of the assumption of the phallic image by the feminine subject. In fact this sort of grail which is presented here for us in the dream, is clearly something which is at the very least destined to stimulate the attention, indeed to give rise to some prudence in someone who interprets this dream in terms of a twofold relationship.

(12) I would go further: this observation No.2, I reread it once more, I also read the one which precedes it. It really seems to me that this is not the most important thing, for one to criticise, because it is really taken to this really obvious level. I would simply ask you to reread this, observation. Let us take all the same at random for example this sentence:

"I alluded then to a second phase of the analysis, when an intervention of this kind had previously taken place, but I come back to it because in a way the subject who had been really been drawn by the fact to a deepening of the transference the transference situation became more and more precise. It was necessary to insist in order to overcome certain silences. The transference became then frankly homosexual I alluded therefore to the fact that if it exists, it is a question of facilitating affectionate relationships between men which are designated by the name of friendship, and that everybody knows that these relationships always take on a certain passive character for one of the partners, when the one who finds himself in the necessity of having to receive directives At that difficult moment I had the idea of using an analogy which could be understood right away by this ex-officer. Why do men go to their death for a leader whom they love,.... because they accept orders and commands with an absolute sense of obedience; they (13) thus experience the feelings and the thoughts of their leader so strongly, that they identify with him and sacrifice their lives as he himself would do if he found himself in their place."

You see that an intervention of this kind should demand a fairly serious piece of silence.

"They can only act in this way because they love their leader passively."

"This remark did not cause all reservations to disappear immediately, but it allowed him to continue to be objective, even though he was going to re-live with me other homosexual situations, more precise than these."

And in effect this does not fail to occur.

In fact it is quite clear that the fact of orienting, of facilitating, of opening the door to a whole imaginary elaboration in what is called the twofold relationship between the analyst and the analysand, in a fashion which is shown by the observation itself to be not simply systematic, but really insistent, and in these two terms, on the two planes it chooses everything which, in the material, goes in the simplifying direction of elaborating the twofold relationship in so far as it is provided with an analytic signification.

Here it is not even a question of this element on which I will subsequently insist, namely the role of the stamp given to interpretation by the introduction of a signifier. Here (14) interpretation, namely what makes it necessary that interpretation should be something that of its nature should be brief, is precisely this: it is that it essentially is, and that it should be essentially centred on the handling of the signifier.

What do we have here? We have manifestly an intervention in the very paragraph we are considering. It shows the meaningful, comprehensive, persuasive character which consists in inducing the subject to live precisely this relationship which as such is articulated and considered at this level of the work of the author as a twofold relationship, exactly for him to articulate the notion of the analytic situation as such, as a simple relationship which he elsewhere calls a two-fold relationship.

Here we find ourselves in the clearest fashion - everyone can put his finger on it, you do not even need to be an analyst to perceive it - before something which of its nature is close to suggestion, which in any case by the very fact that it chooses a signification to which it returns on three occasions, even in this observation which is about six pages long, shows us the essential stages of this relationship of the analyst to the person in analysis, and presents itself in the form of a facilitation of the understanding of the twofold situation in (15) terms of homosexual relationships, as they are classically presented to us in the Freudian doctrine as being this something libidinal which underlies every relationship considered from a social angle, namely in this highly ambiguous form which does not allow to be distinguished what is strictly speaking the homosexual drive in so far as it is distinct in the choice of an erotic object, that of the sex opposite to the one which the norm j may wish for.

There is here something of a different nature to the use of the term homosexual in connection with this libidinal underpinning. This no doubt poses all sorts of problems, but their use in the form of an indoctrination within the therapy, I am not saying 1 that it is illegitimate in itself, I am saying that the fact that j it is systematic assuredly poses the problem of the whole j orientation, of the whole direction of the treatment. Because in j fact we see clearly the degree to which this can have an effect, I but do you not at the same time also see that there is here a j choice in the mode of intervention in connection with obsessional neurosis, and that everything that you otherwise know about
 , obsessional neurosis, clearly reminds you that this relationship ] of the subject to himself, to his existence in the world, which is called an obsessional neurosis, is something infinitely more complex in every way, than a relationship of libidinal attachment to a subject of his own sex, at whatever level he manages to (16) articulate it.

Everyone knows, since Freud's first observations, the role played by the destructive drive directed against the counterpart and redirected by this very fact against the subject himself. Everyone knows that many other elements are involved in it; these elements of regression, of fixation in libidinal evolution which are moreover far from being as simple, and I would say even embarrassing, as the famous link between the sadistic and the anal, is not something which of itself can be held to be simple, or even to have been simply elucidated at some moment or other.

In short, everything shows that if such an orientation or direction of the treatment pursued has an effect, it is precisely something with a much wider perspective on what is in question, something which comes to be articulated. I do not say that this is entirely sufficient, but already it permits us to organise better the different planes and registers on which things can effectively be organised.

At the level of this plane, we can see, we can in effect situate this something which is a detail in the economy of the obsessional, namely the role played at one point of this economy, by the identification to an other who is a small o, an imaginary other, and that it is one of the modes thanks to which he balances more or less well or badly his economy as an (17) obsessional.

To go too far as one might say in this direction, to give him this sort of satisfaction which is the ratification of this relationship, there appears in the history of the subject, the frequency, I would say the consistency in the history of the obsessional, of an other in so far as he is the one to whom he refers, whose approbation and criticism he demands, with whom he identifies as someone. The author in question articulates it as someone stronger than him, and on whom literally one can say that he bases himself, a sort of dream.

This is something that is well known: the fact of sanctioning as one might say this mechanism, which is undoubtedly strictly speaking a mechanism of defence in this instance, the way in which the subject balances the problematic of his relationship to the desire of the other, is something which can have some therapeutic effect, but far from having one all by itself, and moreover does not the subsequent development of the works of the author show that things pushed in this sense, which more and more put the accent on what he calls on this occasion the distance from the object, this is incarnated in something which is produced, which is very specially centred around the phantasy of fellatio; the fellatio of a phallus, not just any phallus but very precisely the phallus which is a part of the imagined body of the analyst. This culminates in the elaboration in a way of (18) a sort of phantasy in which this sort of imaginary support based on the counterpart and in the homosexual other, is incarnated, is materialised in this imaginary experience which is proposed to us as being as such comparable to Catholic communion, to the consumption of a host. We see here that always along the same line, along a certain line of the elaboration of the phantasy, this time still more exaggerated, that there is produced something where we then undoubtedly see, where we can materialise it on the schema that we are dealing with. It is a question of the production of what happens at the level of the original phantastical productions.

I am going to show you that it is exactly from the subject himself, of the passage from this, namely from the relationship $p \rightarrow o$, in so far as it is at the level of the phantasy, namely of the phantastical production which allowed the subject to situate himself, to reach an arrangement with his desire, of the passage from this to the level of the message strictly speaking, of the message which is that of the reply to the demand, of the message, in so far as it is situated - it is not for nothing that in the observation, you are going to see it - is articulated in this fashion, we see at that moment appearing the image of the good mother, of the benevolent mother, and that we are told about the allaying of the infantile feminine superego. In effect it is in so far as it is at the level of the signification of the signified of the Other (0).

(19) Ratifying this phantastical production of the subject, in a way it is this which we can literally only properly express except as a reduction of the complexity of the formations in the subject which desire is, as a reduction of this to the relationship of demand, of demand articulated in the direct relationship of the subject to the analyst.

You will say to me: but if it succeeds? In effect, why not? Do we not even have here a certain notion that one can have of analysis?

I reply: not only does it not suffice, but we have in these observations, moreover in the most perceptible fashion, in what we are given, we also have in addition documents which allow us to see by experience what the result of this is.

Undoubtedly this has certain effects, but on the other hand what is produced is something which is very far from representing the healing that we could expect, or the pretended genital maturation which is supposed to be realised. How can we fail to see the paradox that is represented by the fact of speaking about genital maturity when in fact it is frankly articulated here that genital maturity is represented on this occasion by the fact that the subject allows himself to be loved by his analyst?

There is all the same something extraordinary here; far from (20) genital maturity being realised by a process, we see here on the contrary very obviously the occurrence of a subjective reduction of symptoms by the mediation of a process which of its nature, has something regressive about it, not regressive only in the temporal sense but regressive from the topographical point of view, in as much as there is a reduction to the plane of demand of everything that is of the order of the production, of the organisation, of the maintenance of desire. And effectively, what is produced in these stages, far from being interpretable as it sometimes is in the direction of an amelioration, in the sense of a normalisation of relationships with the other, shows itself as brusque explosions, or acting out - I showed it to you last year in connection with an observation, the observation of relationships in a subject strongly marked by perverse tendencies, and where things ended up in a true acting out with the subject going to observe through toilet doors, women urinating, namely literally going to find the woman precisely qua phallus, namely by a sort of brusque explosion of something which, under the influence of the demand is excluded, and which here re-enters in the form of something which strictly speaking in this quite isolated act in the life of the subject, has all the compulsive forms of acting out, and the presentifying of a (21) signifier as such.

Many more testimonies still show us in other forms, sometimes for example in the form of a falling in love which itself has this paradoxical aspect in these subjects that there is no reason for considering them in themselves as being dissident homosexuals; the homosexuality they have, they have or do not have any more than what one can see of it in a sudden falling in love with one's counterpart, in a problematic falling in love, I would say in a really artificial production of these sorts of interventions, in a falling in love which in effect takes on the appearance of a homosexual falling in love, and which is only in fact the forced production as one might say of this relationship $ with respect to o, which in this sort of way of orienting, of directing an analysis, is properly speaking what was forced by the reduction to demand.

I would therefore say that at this level of this practice, this fashion really which at that moment one can say lacks all criticism, all subtlety, there is something which discourages any commentary, and that is also why I would like to take something which is still earlier, and which, as I told you once, in the work of the author in question, always seemed to me much more interesting and suitable for showing what development perhaps might have taken place, if his elaboration of these subjects had been differently oriented.

(22) It is the one which concerns the therapeutic incidences of conscious awareness (prise de conscience). It is the very title of "L'envie du penis dans la nevrose obsessionnelle feminine".

This observation is very interesting because we do not have many analyses of obsessional neuroses in women, and also for those who may approach the problem of the sexual specificity of neurosis, namely who think that it is for reasons connected with their sex, that subjects choose one or other angle of neurosis.

We will see all the same in this instance of feminine obsessional neurosis, how everything that is of the order of structure in neurosis, is something which allows very little place to the determination that the sexual position, in the sense of natural sexual position, in the sense of natural, biological sex, can have.

Here in fact this famous prevalence of the phallic object as such that we saw operating in the observations concerning masculine obsessional neuroses, is found again, and in a very interesting fashion.

Here is how the author on this occasion, conceives, discovers, develops the progress of the analysis. He articulates it himself in the following fashion:

"Like the masculine obsessional, the woman needs to identify (23) herself in a regressive way with the man in order to free herself from the anxieties of early childhood. But while the former depends on this identification in order to transform the infantile love object into a genital love object "

This corresponds strictly to what I remarked above about the paradox of the identification of the masculine subject to the analyst in this instance, because just by itself it constitutes this passage from the infantile love object to the object of genital love. There is certainly here something which at least poses a problem:

"She (the woman) bases herself at first on this same identification and tends to abandon this first object and to orientate herself towards a heterosexual fixation, as if she could proceed to a new feminine identification, this time onto the person of the analyst".

It is therefore said with an ambiguity that is undoubtedly striking, but necessary, that it is the identification to the analyst articulated here as such, which is defined as such. It is noted that he is of the masculine sex, that it is this identification which in the first case, of itself, is simply supposed as self-evident, this identification, assures the access to genitality, whence it results, if one has this presupposition, this hypothesis, that in the case of the woman, if we obtain what is given as being the case, however not without some prudence, because in this observation no extraordinary amelioration is (24) noted, but undoubtedly it is established that in the very measure of this identification to the analyst, it is established not without a certain embarrassment, not without a certain surprise even, that this identification will be successively carried out in fact in two modes: in a first mode which will be first of all conflictual, namely of complaints against men, of hostility even with respect to men, then in the very measure that this relationship, we are told, allays, a particular problematic.

It is always because of the necessity of conceiving in a certain fashion this progress of a feminine identification, which is admitted as possible, by reason, we are told, of the fundamental ambiguity of the person of the analyst. We are certainly not satisfied for all that with this explanation.

"....a new identification, this time feminine, this time onto the person of the analyst. It goes without saying that the interpretation of transference phenomena is particularly delicate here, if the personality of the masculine analyst is first apprehended as that of a man, with all the interdictions, the fears, the aggressivity that this involves, shortly after the desire for phallic possession "

And this is what we are going to have to talk about, and what we are going to have to estimate.

"... and correlatively for the castration of the analyst."

(25) And he adds:

"....and that because of this fact, the aforementioned effects of relaxation were obtained, the personality of the masculine analyst is assimilated to that of a benevolent mother".

And he adds again:

"Does this assimilation not show that the essential force of anti-masculine aggressivity is found in the initial destructive drive of which the mother was the object?".

Here a Kleinian horizon can always give some support.

"The conscious awareness of the one brings about the right to the free exercise of the other, and the liberating power of this conscious awareness of the desire for phallic possession becomes then obviously comprehensible, as well as the passage from one identification to the other in function of the fundamental ambiguity."

Here we find again the sentence pronounced above.

In fact it is all there. You are going to see, this is based first of all on the interpretation of what is involved, both on a requirement or on a desire for phallic possession, and correlatively for the castration of the analyst.

If we look at things more closely, this is far from representing what is effectively presented in the observation.

I will take up the observation in the order that it is presented (26) to us.

The patient is a fifty year old woman; healthy, mother of two children, exercising a paramedical profession. She has come because of series of obsessional phenomena which are altogether commonplace: the obsession of having contracted syphilis. This is important, in so far as she sees in this some prohibition or other directed against the marriage of her children, which however she was not able to oppose, in the case of her eldest son. Obsessions of infanticide, of poisoning, in short a whole series of obsessions which are I would say quite banal, especially in the type of obsessional manifestations in women.

Before even giving us the list, it is the author himself who speaks to us in a prevalent fashion about obsessions with a religious theme. There are of course all sorts, as in all obsessions with a religious theme, insulting scatological phrases which impose themselves on the subject, in formal contradiction to her convictions.

Let us begin to look at what presents itself as one of the elements which the author himself underlines right away, in the relationships of the subject to religious reality, especially to the reality which for her, because she is a Catholic, is the presence of the body of Christ in the host.

She also represents in her imagination male genital organs, (27) without there being any question of a hallucinatory phenomenon, we are told, in the place of the host. A few lines further on an important detail concerning this principal religious schématisation of these obsessionals is pointed out to us: it is that her mother alone was responsible for her Catholic education, and her conflict with her was able to be referred onto the spiritual plane, we are told, which moreover was always of an obligatory and constraining character. I do not dispute it. This is a very important fact.

Before reflecting on the mode of the interpretations which are subsequently given, I would like you to dwell for a moment on this symptom. This symptom in itself is altogether of a nature to encourage us to make some remarks.

The genital organs, we are told, appear in front of and in the place of the host.

What can that mean for us? For us, I mean for us analysts. Here all the same there is a case where this place, this superposition, should be given its value, if we are analysts.

What do we call repression, and especially the return of the repressed, if not something which appears as something which discolours from beneath, which arises to the surface as the scriptures describe it, or like a stain which rises or which (28) with time returns to the surface?

Here is a case, where if we wish to accord their textual importance to things, as our position as analysts requires us to do, we should try to articulate what it returns from.

We know that for this woman who has received a religious education, Christ should at least have a religious sense, as for all of those who are in the Christian religion, and it is not a matter of indifference. Christ, is the Word, the Logos, and this is drummed into us in Catholic education, and that he is the incarnate Word, is something which is not in the least doubted, it is the most abbreviated form of what one can call a creed. We see in sum that if we refer to this Logos, what he is, namely if we are told that he is the Word, he is the Word; he is the Word, namely the totality of the Word. We see appearing through him, substituting itself for him, in his place, something which is what we, in what in a converging fashion with respect to all our exploration, we try to formulate about the analytic experience. We have been led to call this privileged signifier unique, in so far as it is defined by the fact that it designates the effect, the mark, the imprint of the signifier as such on the signified.

(29) What is produced therefore in this symptom, is the substitution for a relationship which is given to us as that of the relationship of the subject to the word, to the word in its essence, to the total word, to the incarnate word even, the substitution for the totality of this word of a privileged signifier which is properly speaking that of the signifier which serves to designate the effect, the mark, the imprint, the wound of the totality of the signifier which bears on this human subject in so far as through the agency of the signifier there are in him things which come to signify.

We are going through the observation. What are we going to find further on?

To are going to find the following: that the subject is going in this instance to find herself saying that she has dreamed, that she crushed the head of Christ with her kicks, and this head, she adds, was like your own. She is speaking to the analyst. And in association, she makes the following remark: "Every morning in order to get to work, I pass in front of an undertaker's shop where four images of Christ on the cross are exposed. Looking at them I have the sensation that I am walking on their penises. I experience a sort of intense pleasure and anxiety."

Here once again, what do we find? We find manifestly the identification of this something which is the Other, the big Other, undoubtedly in this instance the Other qua locus of the (30) word. On this occasion what we are given, is that the subject crushes the face of Christ with her heel. Let us not forget that here Christ is materialised by an object, namely a crucifix. That this object itself in this instance should be in its totality as one might say, the phallus, is again something which cannot fail to strike us, especially if we continue to pursue the details that are given in the observation, namely the following: the fact is that something very peculiar is going to intervene in the relationships of the analysand with the analyst: the reproaches that she is going to address to the analyst, about the difficulties that he introduces into her existence by his treatment, are going to be materialised in the fact that she cannot buy shoes for herself.

The analyst of course could not be so unaware as not to recognise here the phallic value of the shoe, in other words that the shoe, and especially the heel of which great use is made, very precisely on this occasion in order to crush the head of Christ, is something which has here all its import.

Let us remark in this connection that this occurs within an analysis, that fetishism, especially shoe fetishism in a woman is practically never seen, the appearance of this something which is referred to the shoe with this phallic signification. On the other hand in the course of the elaboration of an observation as (31) it is carried out in analysis, is something which here takes on all its value. Let us try to understand it.

In order to understand it it is not necessary to go very far. While the analyst does everything at that moment to suggest to the subject that it is a question here of a need, of a desire to possess the phallus, which is perhaps not in itself the worst thing that he could say, if it were not for the fact that for him this represents, as he also says, the desire of the subject to be a man. Which the subject does not fail to object to, to contest with the greatest energy up to the end. She never had the desire to be a man, and in truth in fact it is perhaps not the same thing to desire to possess the phallus and to desire to be a man, because analytic theory itself supposes that matters can be resolved in a very natural fashion, and who would not take it into account?

But here is what the analysand replies in this instance. She replies:

"When I am well dressed, men desire me, and I say to myself with a very real joy: There's another one who's going to pay for it. I am happy to think that they are suffering because of it."

In short, she brings the analyst back to solid, economic earth, namely, if there is a relationship to the phallus in her relationships with men, what is it?

(32) Let us try now to articulate it ourselves.

Here more or less is how I propose to you to articulate it precisely: there are several elements here: there is the relationship to the mother, the relationship to the mother of course about which we are told that it is profoundly essential, a really coherent relationship between the real subject and this mother whose problematic relationships with the father we are shown, and we will subsequently come back to her relationships with the father, and to the relationships of the patient with her father, that this mother in any case showed herself in several ways, and in particular in the following way: that the father was not able to overcome the attachment of his wife to a first love, which was moreover a Platonic one. For something like this to be pointed out in the observation, means that it must have had a certain place.

We see here on the other hand that the relationships of the subject to the mother are these: she judges her favourably in every way, more intelligent than the father, etc..., fascinated by her energy, etc....:

"The rare moments when her mother relaxed filled her with an unspeakable joy..... she had always considered that her younger sister was preferred to her As well as that however anybody who interfered with this union with her mother was the object of a death wish, as is demonstrated by a large amount of material, (33) either from dreams, or from childhood, relating to the desire for the death of her sister".

Is this not enough to demonstrate that first and foremost everything that in this instance is in question in the relationships of the subject to her mother, is precisely what I underlined for you as being the relationship of the subject to the desire of the mother. The fashion in which the problem of desire is introduced into the life of the subject is precocious and particularly manifest, precisely in the history of the obsessional.

This desire which culminates in the fact that the subject sees being outlined as an end, the end not of having this or that, but first of all of being the object of the desire of the mother, with what this involves, namely of deducing what exists, but is unknown. The object of the desire of the mother, is precisely that on which there depends everything which from now on links for the subject the approach of her own desire to a destructive effect, and that which at the same time subordinates, defines as one might say, the approach of this desire as such to the signifier which is precisely by itself the signifier of the effect of desire in the life of the subject, namely the phallus.

I am articulating things afresh: the problem is not for the subject in question of knowing whether the mother, as in the case of the phobic for example, has or does not have the phallus. It is to know what is the effect in the other of this something which is X, which is desire. And in other words, what comes (34) to the forefront for the subject, is to know what she will be, whether she is or is not, that which the desire of the other is.

What we see here coming to the forefront, and very precisely in this connection, it is very nice to see it on this occasion is the substitution at this point and at this level of the signifier phallus as such for the incarnate Logos, namely for the other, for the other in so far precisely as the word marks him.

In other words, I will articulate my thought still further: Freud saw and designated the frontiers of analysis as stopping, as I might say, at this point which in certain cases, he says, proves to be irreducible, there descends on the subject a sort of wound which for the man is the castration complex, and which keeps all its predominant manifestations, which in short can be resumed as follows: that he cannot have the phallus except against the background of not having it, which is exactly the same thing as what appears in the woman, namely that she does not have the phallus except against the background of the following: that she has it, because otherwise how could she be so enraged by this irreducible Penisneid. Do not forget that Neid in German, does not simply mean a wish, Neid means that which literally enrages me. All the underlay of aggression and of anger are indeed in this original Neid, in modern German and much more (35) still in the old forms of German, and even of Anglo-Saxon.

If Freud in a certain fashion marked here what he called on a certain occasion the infinite character, projected to infinity, which is badly translated by interminable, of what can happen in analysis, it is because he does not see, because after all there were things in the face of which he did not have the opportunity of doing, even though many things indicate, especially in the last article on the Spaltung of the ego to which I will return, he does not see that the solution to the problem of castration in man as in woman, is not about this dilemma of having or of not having the phallus, because it is only starting from the moment when the subject perceives that there is one thing which in any case must be recognised and stated, that he is not the phallus, and it is starting from this realisation in analysis that the subject is not the phallus, that he can normalise what I would call this natural position, that either he has it, or that he does not have it.

This is therefore effectively the final term, the signifying relationship around which there can be resolved the imaginary impasse engendered by the function that the image of the phallus comes to take on at the level of the signifying plane, and this indeed is what happens in our subject when, under the effect of the first manifestations of being taken up into the mechanism of (36) transference, namely of a more elaborated articulation of symptomatic effects that there is produced in her something which is produced in an entirely recognisable fashion in what I have just quoted for you today, namely the following: I am saying that the phantasy qua presentified in the analysis, which is linked to the possession or the non-possession of shoes, of feminine shoes, of phallic shoes, of shoes which we will on this occasion call fetishistic, what function does it take for a masculine subject in so far as in his perversion, what he refuses, is that the woman should be castrated?

This is what the fetishistic perversion means for the masculine subject: the perversion, is to affirm that the woman has it against the background of what she does not have. Without this there would be no need for an object, to present her with an object over and above, manifestly independent of the woman's body.

If the woman begins to develop in the course of the transferential elaboration, something which is apparently the same thing, namely that she has it, because what she underlines is that she wishes to have it in the form of clothes, in the form of those clothes which are going to excite men's desire, and thanks to which she can disappoint them in their desire. She is the one who articulates it in that way. Undoubtedly she is apparently stating the same thing, but it is something quite (37) different when it is posed by the subject herself, namely by the woman, rather than by the man who confronts her, and also for her on this occasion, what she shows, is that by wishing to present herself as having what she herself knows perfectly well she does not have, it is a matter there of something which for her has a quite different value, namely what I called the value of a masquerade, and that through which, for all that, she makes of her femininity precisely a mask.

What is in question, is that starting from the fact that this phallus which is for her the signifier of desire, what is in question is that she should present its appearance, that she should appear to be it. What is in question, is that she should be the object of a desire, and of a desire that she herself knows very well she can only disappoint. She expresses it formally at the moment that the analyst interprets what is in question to her as a desire for the possession of the phallus. It is a question here of something which once more shows us the divergence which is established, and which is essential, between being this something which is the object of the desire of the other, and the fact of having or of not having the organ which bears its mark.

We come therefore to the following formula: the original desire, is: I want to be what she, the mother, desires. In order to be it I must destroy that which for the moment is the object of her desire. The subject wishes to be what this desire is. (38) What she must be led to see in the treatment, is that it is not in himself that the man is it, the object of this desire; it is to show her precisely that the man is no more the phallus than the woman. What causes her aggressivity - I will show it to you better the next time - with regard to her husband qua man, is in so far as she considers that he is, I do not say that he has, that he is the phallus, and it is under this heading that he is her rival, it is under this heading that his relationships with her are marked by the sign of obsessional destruction.

That this desire of destruction is turned against herself in accordance with the essential form of the obsessional economy, this indeed in effect is the goal of the treatment, it is namely to make her see that: you yourself are what you wish to destroy, in so far as you also wish to be the phallus; and what is done in a certain way of carrying on the treatment?

Notice the difference: you are what you wish to destroy; it is replaced by: you wish to destroy what in this instance is taken up into quite improbable and fleeting phantasies. The details of the observation will show you this destruction of the phallus of the analyst. You wish to destroy this, says the analyst, and I myself give it to you. In other words, the treatment is entirely conceived as being the fact that the analyst phantastically gives, consents as one might say, to a desire for (39) phallic possession. Now, that is not what is in question, and one proof among others that one can give that it is not that, is the fashion in which, at the quasi-terminal point to which the analysis seems to have been pursued then, we are told that the patient holds on to all her obsessions, apart from the fact that she no longer has but one of them. They have all been ratified, in block, by the analysis, of course, but the fact that they still exist has all the same some importance.

What does the patient do? This is said in the observation with a complete ignorance. She intervenes with all her energy with her eldest son of whom she has always been terrified, because in fact he is the only one whose masculine reactions she had never completely succeeded in mastering, telling him that he must as a matter of urgency go and have himself analysed in his turn, namely that this phallus that the analyst believes to be the solution of the situation, in so far as taking, as he says himself, the position of the benevolent mother, he gives the phallus to this patient; she gives it back to him, namely at the only point at which she effectively has the phallus, she gives it back to him. What is lent must be repaid.

The analyst has entirely oriented the analysis towards the term that the person in analysis wishes to be a man. Up to the end the person in analysis is not entirely convinced. Undoubtedly (40) however, something which is involved, namely that it is true that the possession or not of this phallus was calmed down in this case. But the basis, the essential, the signification of the phallus in so far as it is that of desire, remains unresolved.

Seminar 26 ; Wednesday 18 June 1958

The 18th of June is also the anniversary of the foundation of the Société Française de Psychanalyse. There was a moment when we too said no.

The last time I had begun to comment on the observation of a female obsessional who was being treated by one of our colleagues, and I had begun to outline some of the principles which can be deduced about the way in which we try to articulate things as regards the good or bad direction, the correct or incorrect character of the conduct of a treatment centred on something which obviously presents itself as existing in the content of what emerges in the analysis, namely the conscious awareness (prise de conscience) of penis envy.

I think that in general you can see the importance of the use that we make of it. There are of course always some little delays when you are upset because the schémas which you were concentrating on, the oppositions which seemed to you to be easy (2) to hold on to, find themselves somewhat shaken or put in question by what is revealed as we make further progress..

We only have to ask ourselves for example if there is not a contradiction between what I put forward the last time, and a principle on which some people wanted to concentrate. I said that in fact for the woman, her sexual development passed necessarily through something which could be described as: she must be the phallus against the background of not being it, I said. For the man it is the castration complex which can be formulated as follows: that he has the phallus against the background of the fact that he does not have it, or is threatened with not having it. Obviously these are schémas which from a certain angle, and when one speaks of, when one opposes sexual development at one or other phase, may well show a certain opposition. It is quite insufficient to stop at this because it is also the case that this dialectic of being and of having holds for both.

The man also must realise that he is not it. It is even in fact in this very direction that we can see situated one part of the problems brought into operation by the solution of the castration complex and of penis envy. We are going to examine it in greater detail, and I hope that little by little you will put in their place things which are not false in themselves, but which are partial views.

(3) To do this let us start again today from our schema.

It is extremely important to articulate correctly the different lines on which analysis is situated. There is an article which I would recommend you to read, it is the article by Glover which is called: "The therapeutic effect of inexact interpretation" (October 1931, Vol. 12, Art. 4 of the UP)

It is one of the most remarkable and most intelligent articles which could be written on such a subject. It is really in fact the starting base from which the question of interpretation can be approached.

In fact the basis of this article and of the problem that it poses, is something which can more or less be situated as follows: at the point in time that Glover wrote it, we are still at a time when Freud is alive, but at which the great change of analytic technique around the analysis of resistances and of aggressivity has happened. Glover articulates that this analysis of resistances and of the transference is something which with the experience and the development of notions acquired in analysis, is something which implies going over, covering as one might say, in the sense that ground must be covered by the analytic progress the totality of the systemes fantasmatiques - let us translate "phantasy systems" in this way: the systems of phantasies - which we have learned to recognise in analysis. It (4) is clear that at that time more had been learned, more was known than right at the beginning of analysis, and the question which is posed, is: what was our therapy when we did not know the whole extent, the whole range, of these phantasy systems?

Does it mean that what we did at that time, were incomplete therapeutic treatments, less worthwhile than those which we are carrying out now? It is obviously a very interesting question, in connection with which he is led in a way to draw up a kind of general report on all the positions articulated, taken up, by the one who finds himself in the position of being consulted about any difficulties whatsoever. In a certain way he generalises, he extends the notion of interpretation to every articulated position taken by the person who is consulted, and he draws up a table of the different positions of the doctor with regard to the patient.

There is here an anticipation of the doctor-patient relationship, as it is called today, but really articulated in a way which makes me regret that it was not developed in this direction which sets out a sort of general approach. The fact is very precisely that in so far as we overlook the truth included in the symptom, we find ourselves by this very fact collaborating with the symptomatic formation.

(5) He takes this first from the position of the general practitioner who says to the patient: "get a grip on yourself, take a holiday, change your job", in fact who puts himself in the position of miscognition. Right away he occupies a certain place, which is not an ineffective one because it is one which is situated, can be very precisely located at the very place that certain symptoms are formed. He immediately occupies a certain function with respect to the patient which can be situated in the very terms of analytic topography. I will not insist on this.

He remarks at one point that the whole trend of "modern psychoanalytic therapy" in his time, is the direction of interpreting both what he calls sadistic systems and guilt reactions. He remarks that up to recent times, all this was not stressed. The patient was no doubt relieved of his anxiety, but there were undoubtedly left unresolved in him, unsuppressed, and at the same time repressed, this famous sadistic system.

Here for example is an example of the direction in which, he does not conclude his remarks, but begins them, and it is this that in our own day it would be interesting to take up again.

In this precise connection I will make a remark. It would be in sum a question of situating what is meant by the advent of the analysis of aggressivity. For a certain time, analysts were so (6) impressed by the discovery that they had made of it, that it had become a sort of answer to everything. Our aggressivity was so well analysed that the words that analysts in formation encountered one another with tell the story.

It would be a question of knowing what in effect this discovery represented, and I think that we can situate it somewhere on our fundamental schema. This is what I tried to do above, because in fact we too can pose certain questions about it. I often remarked how much ambiguity remained at the time that I was teaching you, that I was talking to you about the narcissistic system as such, as fundamental in the formation of aggressive reactions, that aggressivity, the one that is provoked in the imaginary relationship to the small other, an is not something that can be confused with the totality of aggressive power, as a vital function, an imaginary relationship.

On the other hand, it is clear, to recall very obvious things, that violence is indeed what is essential in aggression, at least if we situate ourselves on the human plane. It is not the word, it is even exactly its contrary, it is violence or the word which can appear in an interhuman relationship, if violence is something in its essence which is distinguished from the word, (7) the question can be posed of knowing in what measure violence as such - I say violence in order to distinguish it from the use that we make of aggressivity - can be repressed because if we follow what we have here posed as a principle, that in principle there can only be repressed what is revealed as illuminated by the structure of the word, namely by a signifying articulation, this is a question that must be posed.

In effect, from the imaginary angle, it is from the angle of this murder of the counterpart which is latent in the imaginary relationship as such, that what is of the order of aggressivity comes to be symbolised, and as such taken up in the mechanism of repression, of what belongs to the unconscious, of what is analysable, of what is even, you can say in a general fashion, interprétable.

Let us take things up properly once again. If we follow and if we begin again, if we spell out again our little schema, our schema in its simplest form:

namely in the intersection of the tendency, the drive if you wish (8) in so far as it represents an individualised need, and this something which is the signifying chain in which it must come to articulate itself.

By itself what is it? This already gives us some elements and allows us to make some remarks.

Let us make a supposition: let us suppose that for the human being there is only reality; this famous reality that we make use of in all sorts of circumstances. Let us suppose that there is only that. It is not unthinkable that something signifying should articulate this reality. To fix your ideas, let us suppose that as they sometimes like to put it in some schools, the signifier is simply a conditioning, I would not say of reflexes, but of this something which is reducible to reflexes, as if language was not something of a different order to what we artificially create in the laboratory with animals, by teaching them to secrete gastric juices at the sound of a bell. The sound of the bell is a signifier, and one can suppose a human world that is entirely organised around a coalescence of each of the needs which have to harmonise with a certain number of predetermined signs. If the signs are valid for all, in principle this should give us a society which functions in a perfectly ideal fashion. Every instinctual discharge of the order of need will be associated with something which we will call, if you wish, the differently varied sounds of the bell, (9) which will function in a fashion appropriate to the one who hears it, so that immediately he may satisfy the aforesaid need. We thus arrive at the ideal society.

I would like to point out what I am outlining, is what has always been dreamed of by Utopians: a society functioning perfectly, and culminating in the satisfaction of each one according to his needs, with everyone, it is added, participating in it according to their merits. This is where the problem begins.

In fact if this schema remains at this level of the intersection of the signifier and the pressure or the tendency of the need, what does it culminate in? At the identification of the subject to the Other, in so far as this Other articulates the distribution of what can respond to need, the distribution of resources.

This is precisely what already shows you that it is not like that, namely that it is absolutely necessary that this background of demand should be taken into account, simply in order to take into account what happens in this articulation of the subject, in the subject's taking up a position in an order which exists beyond the order of the real, and which we call the symbolic order, which complicates it, which is superimposed on it, which does not belong to it.

Here and now however at this level, at this simple state of the (10) schema we can see that at this level already something is happening, something in the natural order, in the organic order, let us say at least in man, which complicates this schema simply at this stage that is here described on the blackboard, and which consists in the following: it is that here we have the subject, this mythical child, let us stress, whom we use as a sort of background for our psychoanalytic speculations, this child in the presence of his mother who begins to manifest his needs.

It is here that he encounters the mother as a speaking subject. It is here that his message culminates, namely at the point where the mother satisfies him. As I pointed out to you, it is not when the mother does not satisfy him, frustrates him, that the problems begin. This would be too simple, even though of course people constantly try to come back to it, precisely because it is simple. I told you the interesting problem, one which did not escape someone like Winnicott for example, whom we know to be someone whose thinking and whose practice covers the whole breadth of the present day development of psychoanalysis and its techniques, up to and including an extremely precise consideration of the phantasy systems which are at the limit, at the frontier with psychosis. Winnicott, in his article on transitional objects, which I brought to your attention, shows (11) with the greatest precision that the essential problem, is how the infant emerges from satisfaction, and not from frustration, to construct a world.

The fact is that in so far as a world is articulated for the human subject, which involves a beyond of demand, when the demand is satisfied, and not when it is frustrated, this is what he calls transitional objects, namely these small objects that we very early see taking on an extreme importance in the relationship with the mother, namely a piece of a blanket that he jealously pulls on, a piece of anything at all, a trinket. And the importance of this transitional object in the developmental system of the child, is something absolutely essential to see and to situate and to understand in its precociousness.

This having been said, let us focus on this frustration, namely on the fact that here the message does not arrive there after a date that we tried to fix when we were interested, three years ago, in the mirror stage. It has not evaporated since. I really like those of you who tell me: every year it is something different, the system changes. It does not change. I am simply trying to make you go over the whole field.

What we find, is that what happens in this relationship with the mother, in so far as here the mother imposes what I called more (12) than once her law, her omnipotence or her caprice, complicated by the fact that the child, the human child, and not every little animal, and we know it from experience, is open to a certain relationship of the imaginary order which is the relationship to the image of his own body, and to the image of the other, namely in so far as we see it on our schema, in the beyond of what happens on the return line of the satisfied or unsatisfied need. Namely that he experiences, reactions for example of disappointment, of malaise, of vertigo, in his own body, compared to an ideal image that he has of it and which takes on for him an altogether predominant value because of a feature of his organisation which we have linked more or less correctly to the prematurity of his birth.

In short, from the beginning you see, if you wish interfering, interacting between one another, two circuits, the first of which is the symbolic circuit, to fix your ideas, to hang things on a clothes-stand that you already know, the infantile feminine superego, and on the other the imaginary relationship to this ideal self-image which is found in him when he is frustrated or disappointed, more or less affected, even injured.

In other words, from the beginning the circuit is found to act on two planes: the symbolic plane and the imaginary plane; the relationship to the image of the primordial object, the mother, the Other in so far as she is the locus where there is situated (13) the possibility of articulating need in the signifier, and on the other hand the image of the other, small o in so far as it is the point where the subject has this sort of link with himself, with an image which represents what we can call the line of his completion - imaginary completion of course.

In what has all we have said since the beginning of the year consisted, since we began to take things at the level of the witticism?

In having the opportunity of putting forward this schema, of showing you its pertinence, its inevitable character in mental states, I told you that in fact no mental life could be organised, which corresponds to what we are given in experience, to what experience articulates in analysis, if there is not beyond this other primordially placed in the position of omnipotence through its power, not of frustration, because that is insufficient, but of Versagung, with the ambiguity of promise and of refusal that is contained in this term Versagung. That there is I might say, the other of this other, namely what permits this other locus of the word, which the subject perceives it as itself symbolised, namely that there is this other of the other. On the occasion when we take the system of the family oedipal triangle, if you wish, you see clearly that there is something more radical, more fundamental than anything that is (14) given by social experience, this term family, and this indeed is what constitutes the permanence, I mean the constancy of this oedipal triangle and of the Freudian discovery.

I told you that here the Father (with a capital F) in so far as he is never a father, but much more rather the dead father, the father qua bearer of a signifier as such, a second degree signifier, of a signifier which authorises and founds the whole system of the signifier, which ensures that in a way the first other, namely the first subject to which the speaking individual addresses itself, is herself symbolised.

It is uniquely at the level of this other, of the other of the law properly speaking, and of a law, I am going to insist on it, that is incarnated, that the articulated, human world, can take on its proper dimension as we see it operating in experience, and such that experience shows it to be absolutely indispensable this backdrop of an other with respect to the other without which the universe of language as it shows itself efficacious in the structuring, not only of needs, but of this new thing whose original dimension I am trying to make you understand to demonstrate to you this year, and which is called desire, to be articulated.

It is at this level that there is perceived, at the level of the other qua locus of the word, this other which could be purely and simply the locus of the sound of the bell that I talked to you about above, which would not therefore properly speaking be an (15) other, but simply the organised locus of this system of signifiers, introducing its order and its regularity into the vital exchanges within a certain species. It is hard to see who could have organised it, and after all one can envisage that in a particular society, men who are full of benevolence spend their time organising it and making it function. It can even be said that it is one of the ideals of modern politics.

Only the other is not that. It is precisely not purely and simply the locus which is this something perfectly organised, fixed, rigid. It is an other which is itself symbolised. This is what gives it its appearance of liberty. It is a fact that it is symbolised, and that what happens at this level of the other of the other, namely of the father in this instance, of the locus where the law is articulated from the point of the perspective of (ou) him, who depends on an other; this other is itself subjected to signifying articulation, more than subjected to signifying articulation, marked by something which is the denaturing effect - let us strongly underline it - of our thinking, of this presence of the signifier which is still far from having arrived at this state of perfect articulation that we take here as a sort of starting hypothesis, simply to illustrate our thought, of this effect of the signifier on the other as such, of this mark of it that it was subjected to at this level.

It is this mark that represents castration as such.

If we have formerly, in the castration-frustration-privation triad, clearly marked in castration that the action is symbolic, that the agent is real, that one needs a real father, that castration exists, that castration, is a symbolic action, and that it bears on something imaginary. We find here the necessity for this: it is in so far as something passes from the real to the level of the law, a more or less inadequate father, it does not matter, or something which replaces him, but something which holds his place, that this is produced: the fact is that there is reflected in the system of demand, in the system of demand where the subject establishes himself, this something which is its background, namely which marks in this system of demand, far from being articulated, far from being perfect, but far from being fully productive or fully used, which marks in its background, this something which is called the effect of the signifier on the subject, the marking of the subject by the signifier, the lack, the dimension of lack introduced into the subject by this signifier.

This lack which is introduced, is symbolised as such in the system of the signifier as being the effect of the signifier on the subject. The signified properly speaking, the signified which does not come as one might say so much from the depths, as if life abounded in significations, but which comes from (16) elsewhere, from language and from the signifier as such, in order to imprint on it this sort of effect which is called signified.

This is symbolised primitively as is indicated by what we have put forward about castration. The fact that what emerges as a support for the symbolic action properly speaking, which is called castration, is an image, an image chosen as one might say in the imaginary system to be its support, this something in which the symbolic action of castration chooses its sign. It is borrowed from the imaginary domain, something in the image of the other is chosen to carry the mark of a lack which is this very lack through which the living being perceives himself, because he is human, namely because he is in relationship with language, perceives himself as excluded from the totality of desires, as something limited, local, as a creature, in this instance as a link in the chain of life, as only being one of those through whom life passes, unlike the animal, who is only effectively one of those who realises the type who in this sense can be considered by us as in relationship to the type, each individual as already dead.

We ourselves are also already that for them. We are already dead with regard to the movement itself, this movement itself of life, which because of language we are capable of projecting in its totality, and even more, in its totality as having arrived at its end.

(18) It is exactly what Freud articulates in the notion of death instinct. He means that for man, life here and now is projected as having arrived at its term, namely at the point at which it returns to death.

This articulation by Freud of the death instinct, is the articulation of a position essential to an animal being who is caught up and articulated in a signifying system which permits him to dominate his immanence as a living being, and to perceive himself as already dead.

It is exactly what precisely he does only in an imaginary fashion; I mean here as virtual, as at the limit, as speculative. There is no experience of death, of course, which can correspond to it, and this is the very reason that it is symbolised in a different fashion. It is symbolised on this point and on this precise organ where there appears in the most obvious fashion the thrust of life. That is the reason that it is the phallus in so far as it represents simply the rise of vital power which takes its place in the order of signifiers, in order to represent for the human individual in his existence, that which is marked by the signifier, that which is struck by the signifier with this essential caducity in which there can be articulated the signifier itself, this lack of being whose dimension the signifier introduces into the life of the subject.

This is what allows us to understand the order in which things (19) were presented for analysis, once someone simply did not start from academic considerations in order to approach the phenomenon, but simply started with the phenomena as he saw them manifesting themselves in neurotics, a privileged terrain for manifesting this articulation in its essence, simply because of the fact that it shows it in its disorder. And experience has proved that it was always in disorder that we should learn to find rather easily the machinery and the articulations of order.

We can say that what is first given by Freud to an experience, an experience which immediately put in the foreground, promoted to the underpinning of the castration complex as such, this is something which everyone knows, started from the apprehension and the perception of the symptoms of the subject.

What does the symptom mean? Where it is situated in this schema?

It is situated somewhere in $s(0)$, which is produced at the level of signification. It is essentially the whole of what Freud put forward; it is a symptom, it is a signification. A symptom is a signified, it is a signified which is very far from involving only the subject. It is his history, his whole anamnesis that is implied. That is the reason that one can legitimately symbolise it at this place by a little $s(0)$. Which means: a signifier (sic) of the Other coming as such from the locus of the word.

(20) But what Freud taught us also, is that the symptom is never simple: the symptom is always over-determined. There is no symptom whose signifier is not brought from a previous experience, precisely from an experience situated at the level where it is a question of what is suppressed (reprime) and of what is the heart of all that is suppressed in the subject, namely the castration complex, of this signifier of fi which is something which without any doubt is articulated in the castration complex, but which is not necessarily nor always totally articulated there. The famous trauma from which we started, the famous primitive scene, what is it, if it is not precisely something which enters into the economy of the subject, and which operates at the heart, at the horizon of the discovery of the unconscious, always as a signifier, a signifier in so far as it is defined in its incidence as I began to articulate it above, namely that life, I mean the living being grasped as living, qua living, but with this separation, this distance which is precisely what constitutes this autonomy of the signifying dimension, the trauma or the primitive scene.

What is it therefore if not this life which grasps itself in a horrible perception of itself, in its total strangeness, in its opaque brutality as pure signifier of an existence intolerable (21) for life itself, once it separates itself from it to see the trauma and the primitive scene. This is what appears of life to itself as signifier in the pure state, namely as something which cannot yet in any fashion be resolved, be articulated. This necessity, this backdrop of the signifier with respect to signified, this is the something which from the beginning, once Freud began to articulate what a symptom is, is implicated by him in the formation of every symptom, and what have we recently seen in the hysteric, if it is not this which permits us to situate where the problem of the neurotic is found?

It is a problem of the relationship of the signifier with his position as subject depending on the demand. It is that in which the hysteric has to articulate something which we will provisionally call her desire, and the object of this desire, in so far precisely as it is not the object of need. That is the reason that I insisted somewhat on what I called the dream of the butcher's beautiful wife.

What is it that we are dealing with? It appears there in quite a clear fashion, and Freud says it in the beginning, from the very dawn of psychoanalysis, that it is a question for the hysteric of setting up, of making the object of desire subsist as distinct and independent from the object of any need.

This relationship to desire, to the constitution, to the (22) maintenance in its enigmatic form of desire as such as a backdrop to every demand, this is the problem of the hysteric, and everyone knows that this, namely if you like something which we have called X, the unsayable desire.

What is the desire of my hysteric? It is that I should open up for her, I will not say the universe, but a whole world which is already vast enough, namely the dimension that can be called the dimension of hysteria latent in every human being in the world, namely everything that can present itself as a question about his own desire.

Here is what the hysteric finds herself communicating with on an equal footing, first of all of course with everything of this order which can be happening among all her hysterical brothers and sisters, namely that it is on this, as Freud articulates for us, that hysterical identification reposes. To every hysteric there echoes everything which, in actuality, is posed in some others, whether it is as questions about her own desire, especially and in so far as this other is hysterical, but also in so far as it is only a hysterical mode of posing a question in someone who may only occasionally and even in a latent fashion be hysterical.

The world is opened up to the hysteric through this question about her desire; a world of identification which puts her, as one might say, properly speaking in a certain relationship with the mask, I mean with everything which can in any way, fix, (23) symbolise according to a certain type, this question about desire which relates it to the hysteric, let us say here to the appeal to hysterics as such, which makes her essentially identified to a sort of general mask under which stir all the possible modes of lack.

We have now come to the obsessional. The structure of the obsessional, as I am trying to advance in it, I told you, is also designated by a certain relationship with desire which is not this relationship v which is a different relationship which I already indicated to you as being essential for him, which we will call if you wish, today, d_0 .

The relationship of the obsessional to his desire is subject to something which we have long known, thanks to Freud, namely the precocious role played in him by what is called Triebentmischung, the defusion of the drives, the isolation of something which is called destruction. It is in so far as the first approach of the desire of the obsessional subject was as for every subject, the contribution of the desire of the other, and that this desire of the other was first of all and as such destroyed, cancelled, that the whole structure of the obsessional is entered into, and that it is as such and uniquely through this, I am not saying anything terribly new, in saying that, I am simply articulating it in a new fashion, that it is determined as such and from that starting point.

When you are dealing with obsessionals, and those who are already (24) dealing with them, may know that it is an essential trait of its condition, of its structure, that not only as I already announced and said, his own desire dims, flickers, vacillates and vanishes for him to the degree that he approaches it, carrying here the mark of this: that desire was first approached as something which is to be destroyed because first of all the reaction of the desire of the other was presented to him as something which was his rival, as something which immediately bore the mark to which he reacted with the style of destructive reaction which is the reaction underlying the relationship of the subject to the image of the other as such, to this image of the other in so far as it dispossesses and ruins him.

There is therefore this mark which remains in the approach by the obsessional to his desire which ensures that every approach makes it vanish.

This is what the author of whom I am speaking, and let us say whom I criticise on occasion in what I am in the process of unfolding before you for the past few lectures, this is what the author perceives in the form of what he calls distance from the object, and which he confuses with something that he calls the destruction of the object. I mean that the idea that he constructs of the psychology of the obsessional is that of someone who has perpetually to protect himself from madness; from madness defined as the destruction of the object.

(25) This is only - I will explain why - a projection by the aforesaid author, of something which is, given the perspective from which he himself operates and wants to get to, to the resolution of this problem of desire in the obsessional along the path where he passes, where he conceives it, not only in function of his inadequacies on the theoretical plane, inadequacies of his thought on the theoretical plane, but also because of personal factors, because this is only a phantasy, a phantasy that in a way is necessary. I will show you how through the imaginary perspective in which he tackles the solution of this problem of desire in the obsessional, but it is obvious, commonplace in experience that there is not in typical obsessionals, the least danger of psychosis, or that you will lead them to it, and I will tell you why when the time comes; I will be able to tell you why, in the measure that matters are articulated in a way which will show you the degree to which an obsessional differs in his structure from a psychotic.

On the contrary, what is perceived in it, precisely although badly expressed, is effectively the following: that the obsessional only maintains himself in a possible relationship with his desire at a distance. What must be maintained for the obsessional, is the distance from his desire, and not the distance from the object. The object, as we shall see, has in this instance a quite different function, and what experience (26) shows us in the clearest fashion, is that precisely he must keep himself at a certain distance from his desire for that desire to subsist. But there is another aspect to this which is the following: it is that in so far as the obsessional - observe this in the clinic and in the concrete - establishes with the other a relationship which, in a certain fashion, is fully articulated at the level of demand, that it is a question of the mother first of all, but in everything else subsequently, and in particular with respect to his spouse, because what does analysis mean for us, what can this term spouse mean, if not something which is fully articulated at the level of things where we try to situate them? It is namely the one with whom in some way or other one must willy-nilly come back to being the whole time in a certain relationship of demand, someone with whom one is all the time, even if one's keeps one's mouth shut on a whole series of things, it is never without pain. The demand demands to be pushed to the limit.

What happens on the plane of the relationships of the obsessional with his spouse? It is very exactly the following which is very subtle to see, as you will notice it, as you will observe it, when you take the trouble to do so. The fact is that the obsessional spends his time destroying the desire of the other. Every approach into the interior, as one might say, of the domain of the obsessional, culminates in the normal case, if one allows (27) oneself be taken in by it in a silent attack, a permanent wearing away which tends in the other, and by the doing of the obsessional, to culminate in the abolition, in the devaluation, in the depreciation of what is his own desire.

These are nuances, terms undoubtedly whose handling demands a certain practice. But outside these terms, nothing else will permit us even to perceive the true nature of what is happening. I already said, I already marked on the other hand in the obsessional's past, in the childhood of the obsessional, the very particular and accentuated character that the articulation of demand precociously takes on for him.

On this schema you are beginning to be able to understand and to situate it, because what I already stressed for you by portraying this little child who is always demanding something, and who, a surprising thing, has this characteristic among all children who in fact spend their time demanding something, of being the one from whom this demand is always felt, and by the best intentioned of those in his entourage, to be strictly speaking unbearable, the demanding (tanant) child, as we say. It is not that he demands more extraordinary things than the others, it is in his way of demanding, it is in the relationship of the subject to demand that there lies this specific or precocious character of the articulation of the demand of the one who already at the time (28) that this manifests itself at the period for example just of the dissolution of the Oedipus complex, in what is called the latency period. This is what is in question.

As regards our hysteric, we have seen that to sustain her enigmatic desire, something in her case is used as an artifice, which we can represent, if you wish, by the formation of two parallel and identical tensions at this level of the idealising, identifying formation with the small other. Think of the feeling of Mr. K. for Dora. Every hysteric moreover, in one of the phases of her history, has a similar support which comes to play here the same supportive role as 0.

The obsessional does not take the same route, the same path. He is even centred on the fact that to manage this problem of his desire he must start with different elements, he must start from elsewhere. What I am beginning to show you, is how - precociously and essentially - it is in a certain relationship to his demand that he can in his relationship to the other manifest the specificity and the place, maintain as one might say the necessary distance from that which is possible somewhere, but from a distance, the position of this desire cancelled out in its essence, of this sort of blind desire as one might say, which is the one whose position it is a question of maintaining.

We are going to go over, to circumscribe this relationship of the obsessional to his desire. A first trait of it is this specific (29) relationship of the subject to his demand. There are others.

Let us observe the following. What is obsession? You know the importance of the verbal formula in it, to the point that one can say that the obsession is always something verbalised. On this point Freud had no doubts, even when he is dealing with what one might call latent obsessional behaviour; he considers that it has only revealed its proper structure, in so far as it takes on the form of a verbal obsession. He goes so far as to say that in fact one has only properly articulated the first steps, even in the treatment of an obsessional neurosis, when one has made the subject give to his symptoms, what one calls their whole development, which can present itself clinically as a worsening, and what is involved, is a kind of destruction of all the obsessional forms in something well and truly articulated.

Besides is it necessary to insist on the character of verbal, verbal-style cancellation, which is going to start from the structure of the obsession itself? And everyone knows that what in fact constitutes the essence and its phenomenologically anxiety-provoking power for the subject is this: it is that it is a question of a verbal destruction by the word and by the signifier. The subject finds himself prey to this destruction that is called magical, I do not know why - why not say quite simply verbal? - of the other, which is given in the very (30) structure of the symptom.

This also introduces us to a phenomenology that it is essential to go over in order to understand its necessity.

I would say that just as you have seen here in fact the circuit of the hysteric which culminates on the two planes, namely at an idealisation or identification in the schema at this upper level, which is only the parallel and the symbolisation which occurs on the imaginary plane here. If I allowed myself to use this schema to the limit, I would say that for the obsessional the circuit is more or less something like this, just as we find it here.

I will explain myself: the schema of verbal obsession, this schema which is destructive of the relationship with the other, this fear of causing harm by thoughts, we may as well say by words, because they are spoken thoughts, to the other, this obsession of blasphemy also is something which introduces us to a whole phenomenology which it would be well to dwell on for a little longer.

Blasphemy itself, I do not know if you ever took an interest in it. In itself it is a very good introduction to verbal obsession, this theme of blasphemy.

What does it mean to blaspheme? I would really like some theologian to give me an answer on this point. Let us say undoubtedly that it is something which causes the collapse of an outstanding signifier regarding which it is a question of seeing at what level of signifying authorisation as one might say, where (31) there is undoubtedly situated its relationship with that supreme signifier which is called the unknown (meconnu) Father, it is absolutely not to be confused (with it) even if it plays a homologous role, that God has a relationship with signifying creation as such, is not to be doubted, and that blasphemy in its essence is something which is absolutely situated only in this dimension, namely in something which causes the collapse of the signifier to the rank of object, which identifies in a way the logos with its metonymical effect, which makes it go down a notch, is something which doubtless is not the right answer, the complete answer to the question of blasphemy, but it is undoubtedly an essential approach for what is involved in obsession, verbal sacrilege, I mean in the phenomenon which is established in the obsessional.

Remember the episode of the Ratman, this furious anger against his father which possessed him at the age of four, if I remember rightly, where he began to roll around on the ground crying out: "You towel, you plate, etc..." As always it is again in Freud that we find the most colossally exemplary things, a real collision and collusion between the essential thou of the other and this something inert, this collapsing effect as one might say of the introduction of the signifier into the human world which is called an object, and especially an inert object, an object in (32) so far as it is only of itself an object of exchange, of equivalence, also moreover the whole litany of the child's rage sufficiently indicates it: it is not a question of knowing whether he is a lamp, a plate or a towel, it is a question of the thou dropping, being destroyed to the rank of object.

You will tell me that what is in question in this destruction of the other in verbal obsession is something, and I hope you will permit me to end with this, because we will be obliged to remain there for today, I would say that this something which is happening here and whose whole structure we will see the next time, this something which brings it about that it is only in a certain signifying articulation that the obsessional subject manages to preserve the other, that the destructive effect towards which he aspires, to sustain him thanks to a signifying articulation, and think about this, you find here the very texture of this world that the obsessional lives in, the obsessional is a man who lives in the signifier, he is very solidly installed in it, there is absolutely nothing to fear, this signifier suffices for him to preserve the dimension of the other but it is a dimension which is in a way idolatrised, and its schema gives us this theme which I recall to you from the observation on the Ratman, I would say that French allows us to articulate it in a way which moreover I began here once, it will not be a surprise for you, at the level of the relationship to (33) the other, and of the thou which begins here; what the subject articulates to the other is a: "Thou art the one who 's me." (Tu es celui qui me)

And for the obsessional it stops there. The full word which is that in which there is articulated the engagement of the subject in a fundamental relationship with the other cannot be completed except by this sort of repetition which a humorist portrayed in the famous "to be or not", and the chap scratches his head in order to be able to continue: "to be or not", "to be or not " And it is in repeating that he finds the end of the sentence: "Thou art the one who 's me", "Thou art the one who 's me", "Thou art the one who kills me". (Tu es celui qui me tues)

The French tongue here gives us this fundamental schema of this relationship with the other. This relationship with the other is founded on an articulation which in a way is itself formed on the destruction of the other, but because of the fact that it is articulation, and signifying articulation, makes him subsist.

It is within this articulation that we are going to see what is this relationship, this place of the signifying phallus as regards being it and as regards having it, the thing we stopped at at the end of this last session, which will allow us to see the difference that there is between the solution which would allow the obsessional to be shown what- is truly involved in his relationship to the phallus qua signifier of the desire of the other, or of satisfying it in a sort of imaginary mirage of conceding to the demand for symbolisation by the analysis of the imaginary phantasy, this something in whose dimension as you know this whole observation unfolds, that which consists in fact in saying to the woman: "You have a penis envy? Well then... " as Mr. Casimir Perier said to a chap stuck up against a lamp post, a little bit disturbed,: "What to you want?" And the chap replies: "Liberty!" - "Well then you have it", said Casimir Perier to him, and he passes between his legs, and goes off leaving him completely stunned. It is perhaps not exactly what we can expect from an analytic solution. The very termination of this observation, this kind of euphoric, intoxicated identification of the subject, the description which completely includes a masculine ideal found in the analyst, is perhaps something which brings to the subject a change of equilibrium, but certainly not the one which is the genuine response to the question of the obsessional.

Seminar 27 : Wednesday 25 June 1958

We arrived the last time at the point at which we tried to begin to designate concentrically the constellation of the desire of the obsessional, and I announced to you for today that within what I began to approach in speaking to you about the position of demand in the obsessional, this demand so precociously felt by the other as having this special accent of insistence which makes it so difficult to tolerate; on the other hand this need for the destruction of the desire of the other in the obsessional; in the same way also something which already began our propositions for today, namely the function of certain phantasies.

It is obviously not in vain that in the work of the author whom I chose to take as a basis, less for a critique in the polemical sense of the word, than of a critique in the sense of a (2) systematic analysis, an examination of what emerges from it, of what the author himself articulates, it is not in vain that this phallic phantasy in the form, specifically in the 1950 article (Revue Française de Psychanalyse, No. 2, 1950, April-June), namely therefore in this article, this phallic phantasy appears in the form of the special examination of the importance that penis envy takes on in a woman during the analysis of an obsessional neurotic.

It is obviously not all the things that I am teaching you, among them naturally the importance of the signifier phallus, which can be used as proof that an exaggerated importance is given here to this element. It is a question of seeing how it is being used, and it is not a question either of course, of engaging in the facile little game of criticising the outcome of a treatment which moreover is presented as incomplete, and of judging from outside something into which one has not entered.

Simply in this observation, the important thing is that nothing that I put before you as an element marking, in some way let us say the hesitations of the direction, indeed a direction frankly opposed to the one that might appear logical to us. If we do it, it is never - I mean it is not beginning from the observation itself considered as a succession and account of facts - but beginning from the articulations of the author himself, I mean: either from the questions that he poses himself, which you can always find expressed at the proper place, because of course the

(3) property of the human spirit called common sense, in particular, is indeed as has been rightly said, and not without irony, the least common thing in the world, and there is no doubt that what creates an obstacle for us here has already been an obstacle in the minds of the authors, and what is more it is a fact that in this observation, these obstacles are fully articulated. There are interrogations; I would say even more: there are remarks concerning the paradoxical outcome, the non-emergence of what was being sought for. There are finally contradictions to which the author himself does not give all the importance that they should have, but which undoubtedly can be qualified as such because they are written in black and white in his text.

Therefore to come to what we are going to try to formulate today concerning what constitutes the general direction of this treatment, the fashion in which it is articulated, we are going first of all to try to go to the heart of the matter, namely to pose the difference that exists between something which presents itself as articulated and not as articulatable, and then what is aimed at and effectively done.

Let us take our schema as a starting point, and let us begin by making of it the locus of a certain number of positions that it fully constitutes, which will also allow us to situate ourselves on what we have the most familiar knowledge of, and which is (4) found represented there in a certain order and a certain topology.

What - asking the question once more - is this signifying line, the line at the top of our schema? It is a signifying line, we have said, in that it is structured like a language. On the other hand although it is structured like a language, it is precisely the sort of sentence that the subject cannot articulate, and that we should help him to articulate.

How is it situated in this schema? How can we understand it? What it structures is in fact, we are going to say, the totality of the neurosis, neurosis being here identical, not to an object, to a sort of parasite, to something which would be foreign to the personality of the subject, but which is precisely the whole analytic structure of his acts, of his behaviour.

In short, in the measure that the progress of our conception of neurosis advanced, we perceived that it is made up not only of decomposable elements in its signifying elements, in the signified effects of this signifier, because this is the way that I learned to retranslate what Freud articulates, but that the whole of his personality in a certain fashion bears the mark of these structural relationships, is something that goes well beyond what the word personality involves in a kind of first (5) acceptance, its static nature, namely in what is called character. It is not that, it is personality in the sense that it designates in its behaviour, in its relationships to the other and to others, a certain movement which is always found to be the same, a scansion, a certain mode of passage from the other to the other; and indeed to an other who is always and continually rediscovered which forms the basis, the modulation if you wish, of obsessional action.

This means that all obsessional behaviour, and moreover even hysterical, if we say that it is structured like a language, I would say that this does not mean that beyond the articulated language which is called discourse, it is something which, taking all the acts of the subject, would have this sort of equivalence to language which exists in what is called a gesture, because a gesture is not simply a well-defined movement, the gesture is signifying. This would not be sufficient for what it includes; one could almost employ the expression in French, which fits perfectly, of: une geste in the sense that it is employed in the chanson de geste, the geste de Roland, namely the sum of his history.

When all is said and done it is, if you wish, a word, and in a certain fashion the sum total of the neurotic's behaviour presents itself as a word, and even as a full word, I would say, in the sense that we have seen the primitive mode of this full (6) word which takes shape in the form of a discourse, of a full word also, but of a word in the entirely cryptographic sense, unknown to the subject as regards its meaning, even though in fact he pronounces it with all his being, by everything that he manifests, by everything that he evokes and has ineluctably realised along a certain path of achievement and non-achievement, if nothing intervenes in it which is of the order and oscillation of what is called analysis; therefore a word pronounced by this barred subject, this subject barred to himself which we call consciousness.

It is this that we represent in the form of a sign. Here it is indeed this that is in question. In sum what you see being discerned in this distinction that we are in the process of making, is that we have defined the Other with a capital O as the locus of the word, the Other establishes itself and takes shape by the sole fact that the subject speaks. Because he uses the word, this big Other comes to birth as the locus of the word. This does not mean that for all that it is realised as subject in its alterity. The Other is invoked every time there is a word.

I think that I do not need to go back on this. I already insisted enough on it, but then this beyond which you see here, which is precisely the one which is articulated in the top line of our schema, is in sum the other of the other. It is this word which is articulated at the horizon of the other as such, (7) it is this other of the other that is in question, and regarding which we will say that there is no reason why this other of the other, namely the locus where the word of the other is delineated as such, should be closed to us. It is even the principle of the intersubjective relationship as such, that this Other as locus of the word, is immediately and effectively given as subject, namely as a subject which thinks of us ourselves as his other. Here we have the principle of all strategy. When you play chess with someone, you attribute to him as many calculations as you make.

Why, because we therefore dare to say that this other of the Other, which should be the most transparent element for us, is given in a way along with the dimension of the Other, that it is in this very other of the Other that the discourse of the unconscious is articulated, this articulated thing which is not articulatable by us. Why must we do it? Why have we a right to do it?

It is extremely simple: this other to whom in experience and because of the conditions of human life, which ensure that human life precisely is pledged to the condition of the word, this other to whom we are submitted by the condition of demand, we do not know what our demand means to him, and why do we not know it? What gives him this opacity?

(8) Now the things I am saying here are obvious: but still obvious things whose data are precisely not the least useful things to articulate. We are always happy to obscure them in the guise of premature objectifications. Why is it therefore that we do not know how this other is going to receive our demand? In other words, why in our strategy is he going to become and realise this paradoxical position of his discourse?

That is what I mean when I tell you that the unconscious is the discourse of the Other. This is what happens virtually at this horizon of the other of the Other, in so far as it is there that the word of the Other is produced, and this word of the Other in so far as it becomes our unconscious, namely something which comes to be presentified in us necessarily by the simple fact that in this locus of the word we bring alive an other capable of responding to us. That is the very reason why he is opaque to us, it is because there is something in him that we do not know, and which separates us from his response to our demand, and it is nothing other than what is called his desire.

This is enough to make us perceive something immediately, it is that the essential point of this remark which is only apparently obvious, takes its value in function of the following: that this desire precisely is situated there between the Other as pure and (9) simple locus of the word, and the other qua being of flesh and blood at whose mercy we are for the satisfaction of our demand. But that this desire is situated there, is precisely what conditions its relationship with something which is precisely of the order of the word, which is this symbolisation of the action of the signifier on the subject as such, this thing which makes in fact what we call a subject, which we symbolise with this. It is something different from purely and simply a soi-même; I mean what is called in an elegant English word, the fact of saying it in English, of isolating it allows what it means to be well distinguished, it is the self, namely what is irreducible in this presence of the individual to the world, this something becomes subject properly speaking, and a barred subject in the sense that we symbolise it, in so far as it is marked by this condition which subordinates it, not just to the Other qua locus of the word, it is the subject defined as a moment, not of a certain relationship to the world, of a relationship of the eye to the world, of the subject-object relationship which is that of knowledge in the subject in so far as it comes to birth at the moment of the emergence of the human individual into the conditions of the word, and in so far therefore as he is marked, as I told you, by the other, not just simply qua locus of the word, but as itself. This other is conditioned and marked by (10) these conditions of the word.

What do we see therefore at this horizon rendered opaque in this way by the obstacle of the desire of the Other? This is the thing which refers the subject thus marked back to his own demand, which puts him in a certain relationship, the relationship designated here by the symbol of a little diamond which I explained for you the last day, to his demand, in so far very precisely as the Other, as one might say no longer answers as they say. Here the big O no longer answers, something which is very celebrated under other initials. At the level of the subject, what tends to be produced at the horizon, is this confrontation, this reference back of the subject to his own demand in the forms as one might say of signifiers that are englobing with respect to the subject, these signifiers of which the subject himself becomes the sign. It is at the horizon of this non-response of the Other that we see being taking shape in analysis, and in so far precisely as at first the analyst, in so far as he comes at first to be nothing other than the locus of the word, than an ear which listens and which does not reply, is going in fact to push the subject to detach himself, to oppose himself to something which experience will show you as showing up in filigree in his discourse, namely precisely these forms of demand which appear in the form of what we call the anal phase, the oral phase, whatever kind of phase you wish, but which is characterised in a way by what? What do we mean when we speak of (11) these phases? Let us not forget all the same that our subject does not progressively return before our eyes to the state of a suckling. We are not involved in some sort of fakir-like operation. I think you would have to see the subject going back through time and reducing himself in the end to the seed which engendered him. What is in question, are signifiers. What we call the oral phase, the anal phase, is the fashion in which the subject articulates his demand by the appearance in his discourse, here in the largest sense, in all the ways in which his neurosis makes itself present before us, of signifiers which have been formed at one or other stage of his development, which were the signifiers which were of service to him either in the more recent, or in the oldest phases for articulating his demand.

What is called in other words, fixation for example, is the prevalence kept by one or other form of oral, anal or other signifier, with all the nuances that you have learned to articulate. That is what this means, it is the special importance that certain signifying systems have kept, and which is called regression. This is what happens, in so far as the signifiers are rejoined by the opening therefore to the discourse of the subject, precisely of this, to be simply qua word, without there being anything special to demand, it takes shape in the dimension of the demand, and this is the reason why the whole (12) perspective on what the subject lived from his earliest and most tender childhood, namely precisely the condition of the demand, is retroactively covered.

It is a question of knowing what we make of this regression. That is the whole question. We are there to answer it, or to say what happens when we do not answer it, and what else we can do. This is the goal that is worth reaching.

Here I point out to you in passing that in sum the signifiers which are involved here in this regression of discourse, should therefore be considered as being in the structure of the discourse itself, since it is always there moreover that we discover them, in these two successive signifying lines:

$$\begin{array}{c} S_1 \dots S_2 \dots S_3 \dots S_4 \dots \\ \hline s_1 \dots s_2 \dots s_3 \dots s_4 \dots \end{array}$$ the significations being always produced according to the law of the signifying chain. If you wish, these two things are equivalent because of an anticipation of the signifying succession, every signifying chain opening out before it the horizon of its own completion, and at the same time by a retroaction, once there has come naturally the signifying term which, as one might say, overtakes the sentence, which means that what it produced at the level of the signified always has what (13) one might call this retroactive function. Here S_2 already takes shape once S_1 has started, and is only completed when S_4 retroacts on S_1 . The signifier and the signification are always out of phase to a certain degree, that is even what gives to every signification, in so far as it is not a natural signification, not linked to this completely momentary outline of the agency of need in the subject, which makes of it this something which is essentially metonymical, namely always linked to what links the signifying chain in itself to what constitutes it as such, to those links, to those knots which we can here precisely call momentary, and to distinguish them from a certain sigma if you wish, namely this beyond of the signifying chain to which we attempt to reduce it, these signifiers precisely that we find in this confrontation of the subject to demand, in this sort of reduction of his discourse to these elementary signifiers which we discern in filigree in everything that we evoke, and which is precisely what forms the basis of our experience, that through which we rediscover the same structural laws in all the behaviour of the subject, in the mode in which he expresses it to us sometimes, even down to its very scansion, to the motor fashion that he articulates it, in as much as a stuttering, a stammering, or any stumbling over words as I expressed it elsewhere, can be significant for us of something which, (14) fundamentally, is of the order of a signifier of demand as an oral or an anal lack.

What does this already permit us to conceive of in passing? That this is really what is in question, and is what ensures as a little study group, directed by the most friendly of my colleagues, namely Lagache, discovered with an astonishment which must have been motivated by a kind of permanent misunderstanding, namely that in all the places where in French we see the word instinct, the fact is that in referring to the German text, and this was one of the surprises for this group, nothing other is ever found than the term Trieb; Trieb, or pulsion, as we translate it, and in truth pulsion rather obscures things. The English term is "drive", and if we wished to find something in French, we have scarcely anything which allows us, given the true sense of Trieb, to translate it. I would say that it is a word that would have to be chosen among scientific words and which is tropism, which is specially constructed to designate the irresistible elements of certain attractions considered as irreducible to physico-chemical attraction as it is exercised in animal behaviour, and which would allow us precisely to exorcise the more or less finalistic aspect that there is in the term instinct. I would say that it is something which when all is (15) said and done is also of this order that we encounter here in our Freudian notion of Trieb. Let us translate it if you wish, by the French word attirance which I used just now to talk about those tropisms except for the fact that what would be in question here, is something which situates the human subject in a certain necessary dependence on something which of course - I cannot say that the human being is not the obscure subject in gregarious forms of organic attraction towards the element of climate for example, or something of a different nature; it is obviously not there that our own interest develops, in the field that we are called on to explore in analysis, it is something which makes us speak of these different oral, anal, genital, and other phases, and what do we see?

The fact is that in analytic theory, there is a certain necessity, a certain relationship which puts him in a relationship of subordination, of dependency, of organisation and attraction with respect to what? To signifiers borrowed from what? From the register, from the battery of a certain number of his own organs.

It means nothing else to say that an oral or an anal fixation survives in an adult subject, if it is not precisely to make it depend on what? On a certain imaginary relationship. But without any doubt what we in addition articulate here, is that this is raised to the function of signifier. If it were not (16) isolated as such, mortified as such, it could not have the economic action that it has in the subject, for a very simple reason, which is that images as such are never linked except precisely to the arousal or the satisfaction of need. This even does not fail to be expressed on occasions, when it is a question purely and simply of need; if the subject remains in a way attached to these images, outside their text, both oral ones, where there is no question of food, and anal ones where there is no question of excrement, it is all the same because these images have indeed taken on another function. It is the signifying function that is in question. The drive as such, is precisely the manageable expression of concepts which are valid for us, and which are precisely those which express to us this dependence of the subject with regard to a certain signifier.

What is important is this: it is that this desire of the subject encountered as the beyond of the demand, is what makes him opaque to our demand and what also installs his own discourse as something which is absolutely necessary for our structure, but which is in certain aspects impenetrable for us, which makes of it an unconscious discourse.

This desire therefore which is its condition, is itself submitted to the existence of a certain effect of the signifier, which I explained to you at the beginning of this year, I mean beginning in January, under the name of the paternal metaphor. This (17) signifies that it is in so far as the name of the father appears on the horizon, qua itself being the support of the signifying chain, of the order established by the signifying chain; it is uniquely in so far as this metaphor of the primitive desire, of the opaque desire, of the obscure desire which represents the desire of the mother is established, of this something which first of all is completely closed off for the subject, and which can only remain closed off except because of the formula of the metaphor, namely the one that I already symbolised by the relationship of two signifiers, one being in two different positions the name of the father over the desire of the mother, and the desire of the mother over its symbolisation.

Its determination as a signified is something which is produced by a metaphorical effect, and I told you, that where the name of the father is lacking, is precisely where this metaphorical effect is not produced. I cannot manage to bring to birth this thing which causes to be designated the X, namely the desire of the mother as being properly the signifier phallus:

$$S \quad \frac{(S)}{(phallus)}$$

This indeed is what happens in psychosis, in so far as the name of the father is rejected, I mean is the object of a primitive (18) Verwerfung which does not enter into the cycle of signifiers, and it is also why the desire of the other and in particular the desire of the mother, is not symbolised in it. It is very precisely that which on this schema, if we had to represent the position of psychosis, would make us say that this desire as such, I do not mean qua existing, everyone knows that even the mothers of psychotics have a desire, even though it is not always sure, but undoubtedly it is not symbolised in the system of the subject, and its not being symbolised, is what allows us to see what we see, namely that for the psychotic the word of the Other does not pass in any way into his unconscious; the Other speaks to him unceasingly, the Other qua the locus of the word. This does not necessarily mean you or I, it means more or less the sum of what is offered to him as a field of perception. This field naturally speaks to him about us, and also to take an example, the first one to come to mind, the well known one, the one repeated last night by Stein [?] in what he told us, that in delusions the red colour of a car can mean that he is immortal. Everything speaks to him because nothing of the symbolic organisation destined to dispatch the other to where he ought to be, namely to his unconscious, nothing of that order is realised, and that is why I could say, the Other speaks in a fashion that is entirely homogeneous to this first primitive word (19) which is that of the demand. That is why everything is sonorised, that the Id which is in the unconscious for the neurotic subject speaks, is outside for the psychotic subject. That the Id speaks, and that it speaks aloud in the most natural fashion, is not a cause for astonishment. If the Other is the locus of the word, it is there that the Id speaks (c;a parle), and resounds from every side.

Naturally we find the extreme case at the point of the outbreak of the psychosis, where as I have always formulated it for you, what is Verworft, or rejected from the symbolic, reappears in the real. This real which is in question, is precisely the hallucination in this case, that is to say the Other in so far as he speaks. It is always in the Other of course that the Id speaks, but here it takes on the form of the real. The psychotic subject does not doubt it: it is the other who is speaking to him, and speaks to him through every possible signifier, and it is enough to stoop down to collect them by the shovelfull in the human world. Advertisements, etc., everything that surrounds us has a character marked by the signifier. The character of loosening, of dissolution is more or less great according to the state of the psychosis. Everything that we see, and what Freud articulates for us as being the reason why the psychosis is organised, is articulated, being constructed precisely to supply for this absence in its organised point, I mean depending on the signifying structure of the desire of the Other, because what do the most benign forms of psychosis present (20) us with, if it is not of course fundamentally, and right at the extreme state of dissolution, a pure and simple discourse of the Other, namely that that comes to be stressed here in the form of signification, namely as I showed you two years ago, these very curious sorts of decompositions of the word which, by the very structure of what is presented to us here - I could not show it to you then - necessarily proved themselves to be a message-code (code de messages). On the code what is sent back from O is then all that the subject has at his disposition to vivify the discourse of the Other.

You remember Schreber, the fundamental tongue, every word which is given to him involves in itself this kind of definition whose advent comes about with the giving of the word itself. It is a message code on the code, and inversely these phrases: "How is it that..... " , "You only have to ".

Perhaps he will want, and again will want too much in the sentence. But that is all there is, namely a series of messages which only aim at what in the code refers to the messenger, that which in the code designates these particles, these personal pronouns, these auxiliary verbs, designates the place of the messenger.

This can be strictly referred back to this graph. I do not want to say too much, you will see it in my article on the psychoses which is going to appear, where I have made a sort of synthesis (21) of my course two years ago and the one I am giving you this year. I do not want to insist on it now, what I want to say to you in this connection, is that it is quite evident that something like the delusion of jealousy as Freud himself articulated it as the subject's negation of the "I love him", the "I love him" being less the homosexual subject than the fellow subject, who is of course homosexual as such; Freud says: "It is not me that he loves, it is her." What does that mean, if it is not precisely that the delusions (desire) of jealousy, in so far as they create an obstacle to this pure and simple unloosing of the word, of interpretation, is precisely the thing that he is trying to restore, to reestablish, the desire of the Other, the structure of the delusions (desire) of jealousy, is precisely to attribute to the Other a desire which is this sort of desire that is outlined, delineated in the imaginary, which is that of the subject. It is attributed to the Other: "It is not me that he loves, the subject, the rival, it is my spouse." As psychotic I try to establish in the Other this desire which is very precisely this function, this essential relationship which is not given because I am psychotic, because nowhere has there been produced this essential metaphor which gives to the desire of the Other this primordial signifier, this signifier which is called the signifier phallus, and whose use we are now going to see in connection with what is done for this patient.

(22) It remains however that there is something rather obscure in admitting this signifier phallus as being essential, and in a certain way preferential with respect to all sorts of other objects, which besides we see playing a homologous role on occasion, the equivalences which have been made between the signifier phallus and the excremental signifier for example, the signifier exactly the tip of the breast, the object of every suckling, certainly exist. Which means that what makes it privileged is that it is open to all sorts of equivalences. It can be very difficult for us to perceive what. It is very obviously this something which puts it in a certain place with respect to something which has the highest functions in the relationship of the individual to the species, namely what is called the genital phase.

Of course. But it is precisely for that reason that it is more especially dependent than any other on a function of significance, the fact is that the other objects, the maternal breast, or that part of the body which in the form of excrement, sometimes appear as being able to be the occasion for the subject of an essential loss. All that, is something which up to a certain degree is given on the outside, qua object. It is a currency, as one might say, in the loving exchange, which of course needs to pass to the state of signifier to act as means, but nevertheless just like pieces of lava or shells which serve in certain tribes who precisely are far away from objects of (23) exchange, it is nevertheless something which already exists in the natural order.

Note carefully that for the phallus, however, things are not quite the same, because in the end for the phallus in its real organic form, the penis, or the something which corresponds to it in the woman, after all much more is required than for the predetermined objects, for the subject to make an object of it, and whether in phantasy or otherwise, a detachable object. We can never insist enough on the enigmatic articulation that is involved in the castration complex or penis envy, namely that this something which is after all well and truly something which belongs to the body, and which after all nothing threatens any more than any other member, or arm, or leg, even the nose or the ear, this element which after all is only a pleasure-point on one's body.

This is how the subject first discovers it. Masturbatory auto-eroticism which in effect plays such a major role in the history of the subject, is not at all of a nature, as you know, in itself to unloose such catastrophes, as we know from experience, in so far, and to the degree that the organ as such is not taken up precisely into the signifying interplay, into the paternal metaphor, into the maternal or paternal interdiction. In other words, it is precisely because this organ which at the beginning (24) is nothing other for the subject, and in so far as it only has as a relationship to himself, than a pleasure-point in his own body, certainly much less subject to caducity than all the other elements which took on the role of signifier in his previous demand, that this element, this point of his body, of his organic relationship to himself, is more than any other, only the hold of a metaphorical chain in the paternal metaphor, specifically as such, which must play its role in order to make of it a signifier which at the same time becomes an altogether privileged signifier of this relationship to the other of the other, which makes of it an altogether central signifier of the unconscious.

So that we grasp that the whole dimension that the analysis of this subject has opened up for us, was precisely this something new, this something completely unexpected compared to everything that had been formulated up to then, which shows us, if I can really articulate what I mean to say here, that it is in so far as this thing is only an organ with which the subject entertains relationships which after all are innocent; let us not forget that in our brother species, the monkeys, it is enough for you to have gone to one of the little moats which surround a certain platform of the zoo at Vincennes, to see with what tranquillity into which we would be wrong to project our own anxieties onto this honest and courageous tribe of baboons and others who spend (25) their day playing with their reddened sexual organs without worrying in the least what their neighbours are going to think, except to help them on occasion in their collective enjoyment.

You can see all the same the world of difference there is between this relationship of a certain animal species more or less upright in stature to what is hanging from the bottom of his belly, and that which in man all the same makes, essentially and primitively of the phallus, and historically of the phallus the object of a cult, which means that it is linked for us from the earliest times to something which makes of erection as such, a signifier, and which makes us all realise that it is not for nothing that in our very ancient cultures, the raised stone has all its import, all its incidence as a signifier in the groupings of the human collectivity.

Therefore this role of the phallus here is fundamental, essential, it is its passage, its emergence which is certainly not primordial, but dependent on something else, its metaphorical emergence to the rank of signifier, which is that on which there is going to depend any possible situating of the desire of the Other as such, in so far as the subject must find in it the place of his own desire. It is within the accidents of the encounter of the desire of the subject with this desire of the Other in so far as it is at the level of the desire of the Other that he must manage to signify his desire, it is there and it is very naturally there of course, that we are going to see the (26) signifier phallus functioning, and that we are going to see that the subject, the subject placed in atypical, abnormal, deficient, pathological conditions, the neurotic, but nevertheless in a complete and not an uncompleted constellation, that would make him a psychotic, namely before the four cardinal points that are posed of the definition of desire, is going to have to develop himself.

The obsessional, we have said, is the one in whom in this relationship to the desire of the Other there is found primordially, primitively, the defusion of instincts. It is by finding himself in a position such that the first outcome, the initial outcome, the one which is going to condition all his subsequent difficulties, is going to be that this desire of the Other is cancelled out.

What does that mean, if we give its full meaning to what we have just said?

To cancel out the desire of the Other, is not the same thing as having through the lack, the deficiency of the metaphorical signifying act of the father, of the name of the father, been incapable of grasping the desire of the Other. On the other hand, in a more or less delusional real, the desire of the Other is established, it is symbolised, it is even symbolised by the phallus, but it is denied as such. The primitive relationship of the obsessional subject to his own desire is something which is founded on the denegation of the desire of the Other. The term Verneinung as such applies here in the sense in which (27) precisely Freud shows us its two aspects, that it is articulated, symbolised, but secondly it is provided with a "no" sign.

Here is something before which the obsessional finds himself confronted as the very basis of his position, and the one to which he must respond by formulas of substitution, of compensation. I am not saying anything new here, I am simply applying the triad put forward by all the authors about the formation of the obsessional: cancellation, isolation, defensive reaction. It is this that I am in the process of re-articulating for you. Simply notice the following: that to be able to speak about cancellation of anything at all at the level of the subject, it must be a question of the signifier, because one cannot cancel anything which is not a signifier. There is not the least trace of cancellation, that is even conceivable, at the animal level, and if we find something which resembles it, we will say that there are the beginnings of symbolic formation, but the term cancellation which is not simply there what I spoke to you about when it was a question of the effacing of a track, but on the contrary the taking up of something elementary and signifying within the parenthesis of something which says that it is not, but which saying that it is not, puts it forward all the same as signifying. It is indeed always essentially the signifier that is in question.

In fact it is indeed this that is in question, if the obsessional is led to cancel so many things, it is because they are things (28) which are formulated.

Things that are formulated, means what? We know very well: it is a demand, only it is a demand for death, and every one knows that a demand for death, especially when it is precocious, having for result precisely the destruction of the Other, and in the first place the desire of the Other, naturally destroying with the Other at the same time everything within which the subject may himself be able to articulate himself, it is all the more necessary to isolate the parts of the discourse which can be conserved compared to those parts of the discourse which must absolutely be effaced and cancelled, in order that the subject should not be at the same time be himself destroyed. And it is at this perpetual game of yes and no, of separation, of sorting out, of what in the word, in his demand itself destroys him compared to what can conserve him, which is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Other as such, because the Other only exists as such at the level of signifying articulation.

It is in this contradiction that the obsessional subject is constantly caught, and this indeed as you know is what constantly preoccupies him precisely to maintain the Other, to maintain the subsistence of the Other with respect to all these language formulations with which he more than anyone else is preoccupied, and which are precisely established here to sustain the Other who is perpetually in danger of collapsing, of succumbing under the (29) demand for death; this Other who is nevertheless the essential condition for his maintenance of himself as subject. He could not even subsist as a subject if this Other as such were effectively cancelled out.

While if anything presents itself at the signifying level as being very especially cancelled out, namely that which marks the place of the desire of the Other as such, namely the phallus, if here the d_e which I spoke to you about the last time, which situates the desire of the obsessional, is something which is equivalent to the cancellation of the phallus, we really sense that in effect it is around something which has the closest relationship with this signifier that everything is going to be played out.

What I am in the process of explaining to you, the division which is presented between a coherent method, one which would take into account this function of the phallus as signifier, and the one which for lack of having elucidated it, is reduced to groping around something which in effect operates around this signifier phallus in the subject, here is what this difference consists in, here is what will be for you the golden rule, if you take the trouble to read this article which I have referred you to, at the risk of an excessive demand for it, but perhaps this risk is not too great, the demand for the aforesaid number in the Presses Universitaires.

This rule which will allow you to discern what is done in a certain fashion by this conduct of the treatment from something (30) different, resides in the following: what does a full, complete relationship of a subject to his own desire involve on this basis and on these premises? The subject, I have told you, the human subject, in so far as he must assume as human subject, and not just as animal, his genital desire, must realise as essential signifier of his desire, the function of the signifier phallus. It is because the signifier phallus is there in the circuit, in the circuit of the unconscious articulation of the subject, that the human subject can be human even when he copulates.

This does not mean that on occasion the human subject cannot copulate like an animal, it is even a sort of ideal which trembles somewhere in the depths of the hopes of every human subject. I do not know if it happens very frequently; some people have boasted of having arrived at it. I do not see why one would not believe them, but it is of little importance.

For us, what we know, experience has simply shown us, that it is subject to much greater difficulties, and these difficulties are signifying difficulties. This also explains to you for example the perpetual ambiguities which occur in connection with: has one reached the genital or the phallic stage? At a given moment has the child arrived at the genital stage before the latency period, or is it simply a phallic stage?

(31) That is what it revolves around. Perhaps things would be less obscure if it were perceived that the phallic stage in this instance simply means the following: access to the level of the signification of genital desire. The two things are different when, in a first approach it was said that the child only managed to accede to the phallic stage, this was probably true, although of course one can argue about auto-erotic activity, whether or not it is properly speaking genital. It is also true after all, but what is important in any case for us, what has an essential incidence, is not the characteristic that is more or less physiologically characterised as genital, it seems to appear in effect as the representative of a first surge of physiological evolution, the question is about its structuring on the phallic plane, and this is what is decisive for the subsequent course of the neurosis.

After all, what is in question? What is in question is that if it is true as I have told you that something must be realised at the level of the unconscious, which is equivalent as one might say to a full word, namely there where discourse is articulated at the locus of the Other, and returns as a signified to the subject, by involving the ego of the subject as such, which the subject of himself had concretely located in relation to the image of the other. Here any kind of completion of unconscious (32) articulation means nothing other than this: that this circuit which begins from the confrontation of the subject to his completed demand, is formulated in a desire articulated as such, satisfying for the subject, to which the subject is identical, and which comes to culminate at a certain place in this circuit, at the place which is precisely the place of the other qua human being marked by language, qua human being marked by the proper drama of the castration complex, qua really an other myself, and comes here, I would not say to formulate himself in an "I am identical to the phallus", but precisely the contrary, not: "I am the phallus" but "I am at the very place it occupies in the chain, in the signifying articulation." The meaning of Wo Es war, soli Ich werden is that it is in so far as the subject caught up in the movement of the signifier must come to conceive that that to which he had been precociously confronted, this signifier of desire which withdrew from him the total object of the mother, this phallus, he is not it, but that he is subjected to the necessity which brings it about that this phallus occupies a certain place that the subject has come to realise, that he is not it, and that starting from there and only starting from there, he can accept what had been everywhere the process profoundly put in question, namely to know if he has it or if he does not have it, and accepts to have it when he has it, and not to have it when he does not have it.

It is here at this place, and in the articulation of the basic (33) signifying chain, in the elucidation of this relationship of the subject to the phallus, in so far as he is not it, but that he must come to its place, that an ideal completion such as the one that Freud articulates in the Wo Es war, soli Ich werden is conceivable.

This is the necessary condition for us to orient our interventions and our technique, this will be the object of my seminar next year, which I will call properly speaking: "Desire and its interpretation", how one can do it. Such are the directions and the directives which allow us to see the modes of access to this last message the one in which the Freudian formula, with its lapidary presocratic turn, is articulated, that the object of what we will try to articulate next year, will be what happens, everything that happens that is different to that, it is very precisely what neurosis or any other anomalous form of evolution, realises spontaneously, what neurosis in the case of obsessional neurosis, realises, just as the place of desire situated in a profound uncertainty in the hysteric and fixed by the hysteric through a certain detour which he or she describes on the model of what permits him or her to situate their ego.

The hysteric, like every subject, well knows that it is by a certain detour, and in so far as she fixes herself with respect (34) to the image of the other, that she finds that she has fixed the place of her ego, the place of desire. She obtains it in exactly the same way at the upper level as one might say, as if the hysteric separates herself, turns herself away from the other and from the signified of the other, manages to situate herself in a certain ideal type, in a certain image to which she identifies herself. It is likewise by an analogous detour, as I explained to you already, that Dora identified herself to Mr. K. She finds the place of this desire whose point she is trying to situate, namely how can one, if it is a woman, desire a woman when one is impotent. This is the case for Dora.

For the obsessional, the procedure is the same, except that just as it is at the level of the ideal of the mask of identification that the hysteric tries to locate the difficulties of her position, it is on the contrary on what can be called the stronghold of his ego that the obsessional situates himself to try to find the place of his desire. That is why I say that he will also as we know by all our experience, [construct] somewhere these famous Vauban fortifications that I spoke about elsewhere, the sorts of fortresses in which a desire that is always threatened with destruction barricades itself, it is something which does so on the model of his ego, and of course with respect to the image of the other.

(35) This relationship to the image of the other consists very precisely in the signifying phallus, this signifying phallus always threatened with destruction because it is caught up in a negation by being discovered in the relationship with the other, namely this something which for example you see signalled in all the observations of the author about whom I am speaking in this instance, namely that always in every obsessional, man or woman, you see playing an essential, fundamental role, the appearance at a given moment of their history, in this identification to the other (with a small o) a counterpart, a friend, a brother who is barely their elder, a friend who is a contemporary, but who all have, and in every case, the prestige for them of being the one who is more virile than themselves, the one who has the power.

Here the phallus appears not in its signifying, not in its symbolic form, but in its imaginary form, imaginary as a complement to an image stronger than themselves, to an image of power. It is not I who articulate this, you will find it properly speaking articulated in the article that I am quoting.

This person affirms at the proper place the very terms that I am citing. It is recognised by the very people who are influenced by their experience of these subjects that there is here something which is functionally essential. The accent is put, if you wish, on the image of the other in so far as imaginarily (36) the form, this time in the imaginary sense, the phallic form is here accentuated, underlined, that it is it which here takes on the value and the function, no longer of the symbolisation of the desire of the other, but of this imaginary relationship of prestige, of bearing, of impressiveness whose function we have already stressed at the level of the narcissistic relationship.

This is what is produced as such in the obsessional symptom, in the history of the obsessional, and it is this which marks the special function taken on in phantasies by the relationship of the subject as such to this imaginary other who is his counterpart. This distinction between the presence of the Other (with a capital O) and the presence of the other (with a small o), is tangible in the very evolution of the observation. If you read this observation with attention, namely the observation of the woman in question, you will see for example a very curious evolution between the beginning of the treatment when she is not able to speak, and subsequently when she does not wish to speak, because first of all it is at the level of the word that the relationship of the analysand with the analyst is established, and at that level she refuses and the analyst perceives very well that she refuses because, it is not the way he expresses it, it is as if all the same this that her demand can only be a demand for death.

Of course afterwards something else happens, and it is very funny to see that the analyst perceived very well that there (37) was a difference: relationships improved. Nevertheless she still does not speak: now she does not wish to speak. The difference between the two, is that when she does not wish to speak, it is because of the presence of the Other (with a capital O). Only what is precisely disturbing in this, is that if she cannot speak, it is because what has come in place of this Other (with a capital O), is precisely the other (with a small o) that the analyst has done everything to presentify. He has done everything to presentify the other (with a small o), for what reason? He has done everything to presentify it because following all the same the scent, the trace of things, he sees clearly from the content of what the subject brings him, the place that the phallic phantasy plays here. Of course it is with this the subject defends herself, he spends his time drumming into her, that she wants to be a man.

That depends on how one understands it. It is true that the subject, at the imaginary level, in effect makes a breast of this phallus, that the condition of man qua provided with a phallus, and uniquely qua provided with a phallus, is something which represents a certain element of power.

What it is a question of knowing, is precisely why she has such a need for this reference and for this element which is found to be an element of power, which is the phallus. From another angle (38) she quite authentically absolutely denies that she has the slightest desire to be a man. Only she is not let go with that, I mean that there are interpreted in the summary terms of aggressivity, even of the desire to castrate men, things which are articulated in a much more complex fashion, which should be articulated quite differently, if we follow here what we are in the process of trying to delineate.

The whole evolution of the treatment, the way in which it is directed, and it is here that there is posed the whole ambiguity that there exists between interpretation and suggestion, tends on the contrary to indicate this term, not to use others with reference to this something which is quite different, and no one doubts it, I may say that the author himself underlines it sufficiently in the fashion that he articulates his own action, and in other ways, that it is a benevolent mother, that it is an other who is much nicer than the other with whom the subject had to deal, who intervenes to tell her, according to the very formula that the author employs elsewhere in the terms which are more or less those which I am going to tell you: "This is my body, this is my blood, this phallus, you can trust me as a man, consume it, I allow you to do so, this phallus is what should give you strength and vigour, it is the thing which should resolve for you all your obsessional difficulties."

In fact, what is given at the end of the treatment as being its result, is literally the following, that not a single one of the (39) obsessions really gave way, that she simply is subjected to them, but experiences them without guilt. This is strictly modelled on what I am in the process of telling you, which should normally be the result of such a mode of intervention.

Inversely, as I have told you, it is equally striking to see the treatment terminating with the fact that at the point at which it has been left, the patient sends the analyst her own son. It is certain that this action is rather astonishing, because the fact that the subject, we are told, experienced right through her life a holy terror before this son which one feels, in the context, the perspective, the images which the analyst constructs about it, which one feels comes from the fact that there has always been a problem with this son. It is the least that can be said.

Is it not precisely the fact that in this instance this son is offered to the analyst at the end, which marks, like acting out, which marks what precisely had been missed? Namely that it is at this point, at this mediating point where the phallus is something quite different to an appurtenance of power, where it is truly this means, this mediation through which at the signifying level, what happens between man and woman is symbolised. Is this child, of whom moreover analytic experience, and I mean what Freud articulated concerning the (40) relationships of the woman to the father, showed us the equivalence between this desire for the symbolic gift of the phallus and this child which comes to be substituted for it afterwards? It is very precisely in so far as the child occupies the same place, this place which has not been worked over, which has not been elucidated in the treatment, namely a symbolic place, it is in so far as the subject despite herself, and certainly in an unconscious fashion, but in quite the same fashion as an acting out appears when something has been missed in the analysis, that the subject shows that something else should have been realised, that that which culminates in the treatment with this kind of intoxication of power, of goodness, a quasi-maniac intoxication which is the usual case and the sign of those treatments which end with an imaginary identification, which is what when all is said and done? Nothing other than a certain fashion of posing in their final consequence, to facilitate as one might say by way of suggestive approval what is already found in the mechanisms of the obsession, namely this consumption or this incorporation of the phallus at the imaginary level. It is already that which is one of the mechanisms of obsession, it goes along the same path, if you wish to choose among the defence mechanisms of obsession, that the solution one might say is given by something which is the additional approval of what is now a good mother, a mother who permits the consumption of the phallus.

Should we content ourselves, for the solution of a neurosis, (41) with something which is only put there after from among the constitutive components of the neurosis as such, a more successful symptom, separated out as I might say from the others?

I do not think that we can hold ourselves to be entirely satisfied with this. I do not think either than I have said everything that could be said about this treatment in this connection, and today once more the clock has caught up with us. Between now and the next time, at least, I will pick out the three or four points in the observation which will again better highlight what I have tried to articulate for you today. Then we will say some concluding words about the formations of the unconscious to resume the circuit that we have gone through this year, after which we will only have to wait to engage ourselves in a new stage next year.

Seminar 28: Wednesday 2 July 1958

We are coming to the end of this year's seminar to which I gave the title of Formations of the Unconscious. Perhaps you are now able at least to see the appropriateness of this title: formations, forms, relations, perhaps topology. I had my own reasons for avoiding frightening you right away with those words.

I think that if something should remain as a step, as a step forward, more exactly as something on which one can put one's foot in order to climb to the level above next year, it is something which shows you that there is no way of articulating anything at all that belongs properly speaking to the mechanisms of the unconscious which are the foundation of Freud's experience and discovery, solely by taking into account tensions considered as being in themselves only the object of a sort of progress in maturity in the register which develops within the range of the pregenital and the genital, this is one side of the matter, nor can one simply talk about relationships of identification as they (2) are apparently - I say apparently - presented to us in the course of Freud's work.

If one wished to reduce [them] to this relationship, to a sort of collection of characters, if you wish in the style of Italian comedy, in which there would come into the foreground for example terms like the mother and the father, even if some others are added on.

What I wanted to show, is that it is impossible to articulate anything, either in the progress of the fixation of desire, or on the other hand in this intersubjectivity which in effect is in the forefront of our experience and our preoccupations in analysis, if we do not situate them in relation to something called the conditions, the necessary relationships that are imposed not only on human desire, but on the subject as such, by the relationships of the signifier.

That is why throughout the whole of this year, I tried to make you familiar with this little graph which it seemed, in my opinion, appropriate to put to use for a time to support my experiments, to distinguish things which for example, to take this signifier which is encountered everywhere, and for good reason because it cannot fail to be involved in a direct or indirect fashion, every time that there is question not of any signification whatsoever, but of signification in so far as it is expressly engendered by the conditions imposed on the organism, this living organism which has become the support, the prey,

(3) indeed the victim of the word, which is called man.

I will take this up again today, simply to put you on the brink of this multipresence, I would say, of the signifier phallus in a particular case, still the same one, the one which has occupied us for some sessions, and in order simply to indicate that it is extremely important to distinguish the places where the signifier phallus makes its appearance in the subject.

To say of course that becoming conscious of penis envy is of prime importance in an analysis of a feminine obsessional neurotic, is to say something self-evident, because if one had never encountered the phallus in an analysis of an obsessional neurotic, whether a female or not, and indeed in any neurosis whatsoever, it would really be very strange.

It is possible that by pushing the analysis in a certain direction, the one that is articulated in the so-called Psychanalyse d'aujourd'hui, namely the reduction of phantastical productions of transference to what is called this so simple reality, namely the analytic situation, namely that there are here two people who of course have nothing to do with these phantasies, when one has managed to reduce things totally to this schema, one will perhaps be able completely to neglect the phallus in the interpretation of an analysis. But up to now we (4) still have not got there, because all of these things are incomplete formulations, and in fact no analysis takes place up to now as it is schematised in this book.

Obviously we have to do something with this signifier phallus, and to say that becoming conscious of it is the key in this instance to the solution of obsessional neurosis, is naturally not saying very much, because everything of course depends on the way that one will interpret it, situate it, understand it, at the different points that it appears, and at the points that it appears it does not play a homologous function either, nor is all of this reducible to a penis envy in the sense that it is is a question of rivalry with the male, as really it is finally formulated when all is said and done in this observation, namely: to assimilate the relationships of the patient with her husband, with her analyst, with others in general, which is contradicted by the observation itself.

It is obviously not from this angle that the phallus appears. It appears at several points. We are going to try simply, without claiming of course to give an exhaustive analysis of an observation which moreover is presented as an unfinished analysis, and on the other hand after all as we only have partial documents, but undoubtedly all the same well enough established to allow us to get a correct idea of it.

(5) I would like first of all to begin by making certain remarks which will introduce you to certain other properties of the graph that we are using.

There is something which appears in this observation which is signaled to us as being the very lively guilt feeling which accompanies the patient's obsessions, for example her religious obsessions, and what one might call the paradox that is represented by the so clearly marked appearance of guilt feelings in obsessional neurosis, when it would undoubtedly seem that the subject could consider these thoughts as parasitic ones which are imposed on her, which moreover she does in a correlative fashion, as things which are foreign to her, of which she is more victim than responsible.

This will perhaps allow us to try to articulate something about this guilt feeling.

In short, for some time people scarcely speak about anything except the term superego which seems here to have covered everything. One cannot really say that it has clarified things very much, because in fact if you wish to look at things more closely, and very precisely to consider what has been contributed by the notion that the superego is something much older, more archaic as a formation, than was thought at first, in fact it was (6) thought at first that the superego could be considered as the creation corresponding to the two Oedipus complexes, and to be explicit as people have written, to the introjection of the person considered as eminently the prohibitor (interdicteur) in the Oedipus complex, namely the paternal personnage. You know that all our experience has forced us to show that there was a scarcely older superego, or that this something which from some aspects imposed on us this older origin, was not unrelated, either on the one hand to the effects of introjection, nor on the other hand to the effects of prohibition (interdiction).

But let us try all the same to look at things more closely.

Here is the obsessional neurosis, and as in every neurosis, what we have to bring to light first of all precisely in so far as we are not hypnotists, that we do not treat people by suggestion, but that it is at a point beyond that we in a way invite the subject to meet us, and at this point which is portrayed here by the second line, the upper line, the horizon if you wish of signifying articulation, and from there the subject, as I explained to you at length the last time, is confronted with his demand.

It cannot mean anything else when we speak about this alternating process of successive regression and identification, the two alternating because in the measure that while regressing he (7) encounters one of them, he stops on the path of a regression which is entirely inscribed in short in this retroactive covering which opens out to the subject once he simply articulates his word, namely in so far as the word gives rise to all the background and all the history back as far as its origin, of this demand in which the whole life of speaking man is inserted.

If we look closely at it, and without moreover doing anything else here than rediscovering what has always been articulated about obsessional neurosis, there is a fundamental form for obsessional neurosis that we find in this demand, at the horizon of every demand of the subject, and precisely what creates for her the greatest obstacle to the articulation of this demand, it is this something which experience teaches us to qualify as aggressivity, which carries us more and more towards the consideration of and the entry into what one can call a death wish.

The inaugural difficulty, the major difficulty before which one might say the demand of the obsessional is broken, is fragmented, is disjointed, which motivates the cancellation of all defences, and very primordially in very serious obsessionals, this silence often so prolonged that you have the greatest trouble in the world sometimes in conquering it in the course of an analysis, and I evoke it here because it is precisely what is evoked for us (8) in the case that I am basing myself on, is indeed that this demand is a demand for death.

In fact it is very striking to see absolutely exposed to view, repeated throughout the whole observation, but without ever being properly speaking articulated, as if the thing formed part of some natural expression or other of a tension which is very basic, the relationship of this demand for death with the very difficulty of articulation itself which nevertheless is connoted here in the same pages, within a few lines, and which is absolutely never highlighted. And nevertheless is this not something which demands that we should dwell on it?

If this demand is a demand for death, if this demand is what outlines the horizon of the obsessional's demand, namely that his first relationships with the Other, as Freud's theory teaches us, were essentially made up of this contradiction that the demand which is addressed to the Other on whom everything depends, culminates, has as horizon, for a reason which moreover at this moment is attached to the hook of the question mark, because we must not rush things, we will see later why and how this can be conceived. It is not all that simple to talk as Mrs. Melanie Klein does about the primordial aggressive drive, if we start from there. Let us leave there what sort of army, a sort of primordial badness of this suckling regarding whom the Marquis de Sade underlines for us that his first impulse was after all, if (9) he had been able to do so, to bite and to tear his mother's breast.

Of course in fact this articulation of the problem of desire in its fundamental perversity, is indeed something which has not led us back in vain to this horizon of the divine Marquis, who as you know was not the only one in his time to have posed in a very intense and very sharp fashion, this question about the relationships of desire and of nature, about this fundamental harmony or disharmony which constitutes in fact the basis of this passionate interrogation which is absolutely inseparable from all the philosophy of the so-called Erklärung, and which marked all the literature of the time on which in my old seminars, I think of my first seminars, I based myself to show an analogy to which I will come back next year in connection with desire, to this link between the first interrogation and the interrogation about the limit to its philosophical clarity, but also to everything that accompanies it, to its whole theme of literary eroticism which in fact is its absolutely indispensable correlate.

Therefore we do not know where this demand for death comes from. Before telling ourselves that it arises from the most primordial instincts, from a nature turned against itself, let us begin simply by situating it where it is, namely at the level at which it is - I would not say articulated - but where it prevents every (10) articulation of the subject's demand, where it is an obstacle to the discourse of the obsessional, just as much when he is alone by himself as when he begins his analysis, when he finds himself in this disarray that our analyst on occasion describes, namely this sort of impossibility of speaking that his patient has at the beginning of the analysis, which is only expressed in reproaches, indeed in insults, even in the setting forth, the articulation of everything that creates an obstacle for a patient to speak to a doctor:

"I know enough about doctors to know that among themselves they make fun of their patients."

"You are better educated than me.....It is impossible for a woman to talk to a man."

It is a flood which simply shows here the emergence correlative to the activity of the word, to this difficulty of simple articulation, of something which cannot in any fashion evoke at the horizon the basis of the demand that is already there in the fact of entering into the field of analytic therapy, which is here in fact what appears right away.

This demand for death, if it is situated where we have put it, namely at this horizon of the word, in this implication which forms the basis of every possible articulation of the word, and if it is what creates the obstacle, I think that this schema will show you perhaps a little better that this logical articulation (11) can also be made, but not without some suspensions or stoppages of thought, that if the demand for death is something which represents for the obsessional subject this sort of impasse from which there results what is inaccurately called ambivalence, which is rather this movement of seesawing or swinging in which the obsessional is sent back as it were to the two end points of an impasse from which he cannot escape. If effectively this demand for death is this something which, as the schema articulates it, requires to be formulated in the locus of the other, in the discourse of the other, it is not simply because of a history of something or other involving for example the mother as having been the object of this death wish in connection with some frustration, it is essentially and in an internal fashion, the demand for death in so far as it concerns this other, because this other is the locus of demand, implies the death of demand.

The demand for death cannot be sustained in the obsessional, namely in so far as he is organised according to the laws of signifying articulation, without in itself implying this sort of destruction which we call here the death of demand. It is condemned to this endless seesawing which ensures that once it begins its articulation, this articulation dies out, and this indeed is what constitutes the basis of the difficulty of articulating the position of the obsessional.

(12) This indeed is also what makes us say that between the relationship of the obsessional, of the obsessional subject to his demand, and this maintenance of the other which is so panic-strickenly necessary for him, but which maintains him, because without that he would be something other than an obsessional, we find this desire cancelled out in itself, but with its place maintained, this desire which we have characterised by a Verneinung, because it is expressed, but in the negative form, that in which we see it effectively appear in analysis, when the person in analysis says to us: "I am not thinking of something or other", that he is articulating for us what is an aggressive, disapproving, depreciating desire with respect to ourselves. He manifests here in effect something which is indeed his desire, but he cannot manifest it. This is the fact which the experience concerning the Verneinung gives us. He manifests it against the background of denial.

How does it happen that this denied form must nonetheless be correlative to a guilt feeling, since in sum it is denied? It is here I believe that our schema is going to allow us to make some distinctions which will subsequently be of use to us again.

I think that the obscurities concerning the incidences of the superego which have corresponded to the extension of our experience concerning this distance, come very essentially from (13) this: that it is important to distinguish concerning guilt which after all preserves the following, that there is a relationship of the subject to the law, that guilt is without any kind of reference to this law. This on the other hand is the fact that analytic experience has contributed.

In other words, what one might call the naive step from the dialectic of the relationship of sin to the law, ever since it has been articulated for us in the words of St. Paul, namely that it is the law which makes sin, from which there follows - I already insisted on it formerly in evoking the phrase of old Karamazov: "If God does not exist, then everything is permitted."

It is quite clear that analysis was necessary for us to see what comes to us in experience. It is quite naturally one of the strangest things of all, that what experience shows us, is that there is no need for any reference at all, either to God, or to his law for man to be literally bathed in guilt. It seems even that one could formulate the contrary expression, namely that if God is dead, the world said: "Nothing is permitted any longer." I already talked about all that at one stage.

How then are we going to be able to try to understand and to articulate this relationship which is called the appearance of guilt feelings as they arise in the life of the neurotic subject?

(14) Let us refer back to the first steps of analysis in this direction. In what connection did Freud first show it as fundamental, as concerning an essential subjective manifestation of the subject?

It is in connection with the Oedipus complex, it is very exactly in so far as the contents of analysis gave rise to what? The relationship of a desire which was not an indifferent one, which was a desire profoundly hidden up to then, which was the desire for the mother, and with it the intervention of a destructive person who is this father as he emerged from the first apprehensions of the Oedipus complex, and this father who namely intervenes in the form of complexes first given by phantasies of castration, also discovered by analysis, a discovery of which there had not been the slightest suspicion before analysis, a discovery whose link I believe I articulated for you this year with the necessary unthinkability, outside the fact that the phallus has very precisely this role of being raised to the signification of signifying an image, a privileged, vital image, namely the image of the phallus, but which here takes on the function of this something which in fact is going to mark this sort of incidence, of impact, in which desire is struck by prohibition.

In fact if we want to distinguish the three stages which correspond strictly to those which are schematised here,

(15) 1, 2, 3, in which everything which is related in our experience to the superego, must be articulated, we will say at the level of this line on the horizon which precisely is the one which is not formulated in the neurotic. It is precisely for that reason that he is neurotic. Here the commandment reigns, call it what you will, call it the ten commandments in this instance, why not? Because I told you that the ten commandments were very probably the commandments which are the laws of the word, namely that all the disorders begin to enter into the functioning of the word from the moment that the ten commandments are not respected. Let us take them here in any form whatsoever. It is a question of the demand for death, and it is obviously the "Thou shalt not kill" which is there at the horizon to make a drama of it. But you see that it is not either because of what begins as a reply in this place to punish the person who kills, that the commandment effectively has its impact, it is very precisely because the demand for death, for reasons which belong to the structure of the other for man, that the demand for death is equivalent to the death of the demand.

This is the level of the commandment. This level of commandment exists, it exists so well that in fact it emerges, it emerges all by itself. Do not forget that if you read the notes that Freud took on his case of an obsessional, the Ratman, he will tell you - I am talking about the supplement published in the Standard

(16) Edition - in this very interesting complement where we see in the notes certain chronological elements appearing here, which are very valuable to know, he will tell us that first of all what the subject talks to him about in terms of obsessional content, are the commandments that he receives, and you know the importance of these commandments, these commandments which the subject receives: "You must pass your examinations before such a date", or "What would happen", he says, "if I received the command: you must cut your throat", and you know the state of panic that he gets into when there comes into his mind the command: "You must cut the throat of the old woman" who at that moment was keeping his beloved far away from him.

We also see these commandments appearing in another context, and in the clearest fashion, in psychotics, who as you know receive commands, and it is one of the terminal points in the classification of the psychotic, to know the degree to which he obeys them.

In short, the autonomy of this function at the horizon of the relationship of the subject to the word of command is something which we can only take as fundamental.

This commandment can therefore remain veiled. It is veiled, it is fragmented, it only appears in fragments in our obsessional. Where are we going to situate guilt?

(17) Guilt, as Monsieur de La Pallice would say, is a demand experienced as prohibited, and in fact one habitually experiences it there, and I would say that everything is drowned in this term prohibition, the notion of demand being avoided although it seems that the two should go together. It is not certain however, as we are going to see, but there is something whose essential dimension I would ask you to hold on to phenomenologically, and with regard to which one is really stupefied by the fact that no analyst, nor any phenomenologist, has paid attention to it. Why is it experienced as prohibited? If it were purely and simply experienced as prohibited because as is said, it is forbidden (défendu), there would be no problem of any kind. How do we see it appearing in clinical work at the level of the point where we usually say that guilt intervenes? The distinctions we have made, we have made them in order to articulate what is in question, and they will help us perhaps to articulate what is called neurotic guilt, which consists in what?

In what does neurotic guilt consist? It is a fact all the same that it is not articulated as such, and that it is not made a criterion. Now, it is essential to make a criterion of it. The demand is experienced as prohibited, a demand, or more exactly a guilt feeling, in so far as it is in connection with such an approach, the approach of a demand, and it is precisely (18) what distinguishes it from the diffuse anxiety which you know is very different to a demand, and experienced as a prohibition which is called the arousal of the guilt feeling, in so far as it is experienced as prohibited because it kills desire. It is in the relationship of desire to demand, in the fact that everything which goes in the direction of a certain formulation of the demand is accompanied by an agency, by a mechanism whose features we see here, the wires drawn on this little graph on the blackboard, but which precisely because it is in this little graph, precisely for this reason, cannot be experienced, determined in its living source, in its source by the subject, because the subject is himself condemned to be always at one or other of these places, but he cannot be at any of these places all at the same time. This is what guilt is. It is this something where the prohibition appears, not this time in so far as it formulates, but in so far as it strikes the desire, that it makes it disappear, that it kills it.

Here then is something clear. It is in so far as the obsessional is condemned to wage his battle for the salvation of his subjective autonomy, as they say, at the level of desire, that everything that appears at this level of desire, even in a denied form, is linked to this guilt, and what beneath this, (19) namely at the third level, at the level of what we will call on this occasion, no one will contest this location, that of the superego; what is called, I do not know why, in the observation that we have been following in the Revue de Psychanalyse, the feminine superego. Why the feminine? Let us say the maternal. Indeed it is usually considered as the maternal superego in all the other texts of the same register. There is here an anomaly inherent to the observation itself, and to a certain sort of obsession engendered by the fact that it is a question here of penis envy, and of something which interests the woman as such.

This maternal super-ego then, this archaic superego, this superego to which are attached the effects of the primordial superego that Melanie Klein talks about, is something of course which we now understand has been put as one might say in the same perspective, in the same setting as what is produced at the level of the commandment of guilt, linked in fact as you see, to the other of the other. It is to the first other in so far as it is the pure and simple support of the first demands, what I might call the emerging demands, I would say the almost innocent demands of the subject at the level of these first wailing articulations of his need, at the level on which people insist so much today, of the first frustrations.

What do we have here? We have what has been called dependency. And in fact it is indeed around this something which is called dependency, that everything belonging to the maternal superego is (20) articulated.

Here why is it that we can put it on the same register? Put it on the same register, and not fundamentally distinguish it. It means that already this two-level structure which we see here, must be involved. If at the beginning there were only the suckling and the mother, if the relationship were a dual one, it would be something quite different to what we have articulated in the commandment relationship, in the relationship of guilt.

It is very precisely because it has to be admitted from the beginning that from the very fact that it is a question of the signifier, there are these two horizons of demand, which I explained by telling you that even behind the most primitive demand, that for the breast, and the object which represents the maternal breast, there is behind this reduplication created in the demand by the fact that the demand is a demand for love and a demand which symbolises the other as such, which distinguishes therefore the other as real object, capable of giving such and such a satisfaction, from the other qua symbolic object who gives or who refuses what is called presence or absence, and who is the matrix within which there are going to crystallise these fundamental relationships which are at the horizon of every demand, and which are called on the one hand, love, on the other hand hate, and of course ignorance.

(21) It is because the first relationship of dependency is linked to this threat which is called the loss of love, and not simply to the threat which is called hunger, or privation of maternal care, that it is something which already in itself is homogeneous to what will be subsequently organised, articulated in the perspective of commandment, namely in the perspective of the laws of the word. They are here and now already pressing, virtual, preformed, from the time of the first demand. They are not completed, they are not articulated, and that is why a suckling does not begin to be an obsessional from the moment that he is first suckled; but from the time he is first suckled he can already very well begin to create this gap which will bring it about that it will be precisely in the refusal to feed himself that he will find the evidence he requires of the love of his maternal partner.

In other words, we can see appearing very precociously manifestations of anorexia nervosa.

What is it that specifies the case of the obsessional? The case of the obsessional which therefore hangs precisely on the precocious formation at this horizon of the relationship to demand, of what we have here first of all articulated as a demand for death; a demand for death is not purely and simply, and in itself, a death bearing tendency. It is an articulated demand, it is an articulated demand, and from the very fact that it is articulated, it is precisely for that reason that it is not produced at this level of the relationship to the other, that it (22) is not a dual relationship, that it aims beyond the other to his being, his symbolised being, and this is always why moreover it is felt, experienced by the subject in its return. The fact is that the subject cannot injure the Other, because he is a speaking subject, and solely because of this, without injuring himself, and that the demand for death is the death of demand.

It is within this that there is going to be situated everything that I would call the avatars of the signifier phallus, because in fact I see no way of not collapsing into amazed astonishment, when one sees it in effect - once one knows how to read - re-emerging at every point in the phenomenology of the obsessional, nothing else allows there to be conceived this type of omnipresence of the signifier phallus, at the level of different symptoms, if one does not essentially make of it, if one does not find there the confirmation of the function of the phallus as signifier of the incidence of the signifier on the living being, in so far as by his relationship to the word, he is destined to be fragmented into all sorts of effects of the signifier.

What do we find? We are told that this woman is possessed by penis envy. I quite agree, but then why does the first thing that we encounter in the observation itself concern her obsessions, and the first that is cited for us is the obsessional (23) fear of having contracted syphilis, which leads her, we are told, vainly to oppose the marriage of her eldest son, this son whose signification throughout the whole course of this observation I have made so much of.

Here then when all is said and done we have the following. It is simple enough, the miracles and the conjuring tricks which we would always do well to pay attention to as such, to tell you that it would be well from time to time to polish up a little, to give a shine to our capacity for astonishment. What do we see in male obsessional subjects? The fear of being contaminated and of contaminating. It is something which is shown by everyday experience to be extremely important. The male obsessional has in general been initiated rather precociously into the dangers of so-called venereal diseases, and everyone knows the place that this can have in his psychology in a large number of cases. I am not saying that it is constant, but we are used to interpreting it as something which goes well beyond the relational aspect of the matter. This as always is in Hegel, and matters are going so well for some time past thanks to some medical interventions, the fact remains nevertheless that the obsessional remains very obsessed about anything which could engender his impulsive acts in the libidinal order, and that we ourselves are used to considering it as something which is what? Namely that beneath (24) this libidinal impulse, the aggressive impulse appears, that in some way the phallus is something dangerous.

If we hold on to the notion of it that, if the subject is in a relationship of what one might call narcissistic exigency with regard to the phallus, it appears to me very difficult to motivate it. Why? Precisely because at this level she makes this use of it which is strictly equivalent to the one a man would make of it, namely that through the intermediary of her son, this woman considers herself to be dangerous. She presents him on this occasion as being in a way an extension of herself, namely that as a result she is not brought to a halt by any Penisneid. She has it in the form of this son, she well and truly has this phallus because it is on him that she will crystallize the same obsession that a male patient would construct for himself in this instance.

The obsessions of infanticide which follow, even the obsessions about poisoning and the others, I will not go on about it here indefinitely, what can be said, is that something will arise very quickly in the observation and in all its implications, to confirm what I am putting forward on this subject, and this I read out because it is worth while:

"The very violence of her complaints against her mother bore witness to the immense affection that she had for her", we are (25) told, after making a few curtsies to the possibility or not of a true oedipal relationship, by bringing forward arguments which are completely irrelevant to the question.

"She found her to be from a higher social milieu than her father, judged her to be more intelligent, was especially fascinated by her energy, her character, her decisive spirit, her authority".

This is the first part of a paragraph where it is a question of making us see something which undeniably exists, namely the disequilibrium of the parental relationship, what I would call the oppressed, indeed the depressed aspect of the father who may have been virile before, in the presence of the mother. This is how the fact that the subject requires in a way that the phallic attribute should be attributed to her is interpreted.

"The rare moments when the mother relaxed filled her with an unspeakable joy. But up to this there had never been a question of an openly sexualised desire to possess the mother."

There is no trace of anything at all that even resembles it.

Here is how it is expressed:

"Renee was bound to her on an exclusively sado-masochistic plane. And now there came to light the mother-daughter alliance which operated here with great rigour, and every transgression of the pact provoked an impulse of extreme violence, which up to (26) recently had never been objectified. Anyone involving himself in this union was the object of a death wish".

This point is really important, and you will find it not just in obsessional neurotics, but these powerful bonds of daughter to mother, from whatever angle we see their incidence in our analytic experience, this sort of knot where we find ourselves once more before something which goes beyond a kind of distinction; I would say beyond the carnal distinction between people, which means that what is expressed there, is exactly this ambiguity, this ambivalence as I called it above, which renders equivalent the demand for death and the demand for the demand, but which shows us in addition that the demand for death is there.

I am not saying anything new, because Freud saw it very clearly on occasion; the demand for death which Mrs. Melanie Klein will try to refer to the primordial aggressive drives of the subject. But the observation shows us that the demand for death is not simply the bond which unites the subject to the mother, it is the demand of the mother herself, it is in so far as the mother carries in herself this demand for death, and the whole observation shows it to us, that she exercises on this unfortunate paternal person, a sergeant in the gendarmerie, who despite the goodness and the kindness that the patient speaks about at first, shows himself all through his life as sad, depressed, taciturn, not managing to overcome the rigidity of the (27) mother, or to triumph over the attachment of his wife for a first love, which moreover was platonic, a jealous man who only broke out of his autism to make a demand from which he always emerged defeated. Nobody doubts of course that the mother had some part in this.

We are told that this is expressed from the angle and in the form of what is called the castrating mother. On this occasion perhaps there is reason to look at things more closely and to see in fact here the term of the demand for death, namely much more than castration, privation, for this man, from the loved object who seems to have been the mother, and the establishment in him of this depressive position which indeed is the one Freud taught us to recognise as being determined by a death wish against oneself, but against oneself in so far as it aimed at what? An object loved and lost, in short this dialectic of the demand for death in so far as it is already here present in the previous generation, is it the mother who embodies it? It is this demand for death in so far precisely as it is not mediated here by nothing, not at the level of the subject, because if it were not mediated by nothing at the level of the subject, if there were not this oedipal horizon in fact which allows this demand to appear at the horizon of the word, and not in its immediacy, we would not have an obsessional, but a psychotic.

On the contrary, in the relationship between the father and the (28) mother, this demand for death for the subject is in no way mediated by nothing which bears witness here to a respect for the father, to a putting into a position of authority and of support for the law by the mother with respect to the father. The demand for death that is in question at the level that the subject experiences it, sees it being exercised between the father and the mother, is a demand for death directly exercised, directly manifested in this something by means of which the father turns against himself aggression, sadness, quasi-deafness and depression, it is quite different from that demand for death that can be in question, that is always in question in every intersubjective dialectic, and which is expressed before a court when the prosecutor says "I demand the death sentence", and he does not demand it from the subject in question, he demands it from a third person who is the judge, and this is the normal oedipal position.

Here then is the context in the midst of which the Penisneid, or what is called such, of the subject, is led to play its role. We see it there in the form of this dangerous weapon. What does that mean? It is there only as the signifier of the danger manifested by every arousal of desire in the context of this demand, and similarly we see this character of signifier, even in the details of some of the subject's obsessions, in one of her first obsessions which was a very interesting one: it was that she was afraid of putting pins in her parents bed, and why? (29) In order to prick her mother, not her father.

Here is the first level of the appearance of the phallic signifier. Here what is it? It is the signifier of this desire qua dangerous, of this desire qua guilty. It seems to me that this is not the same function as the one in which it appears for example at another moment. Moreover it does not appear in the same form, but it appears in quite a clear fashion, namely here properly speaking under the form of an image. After all, everywhere I showed it to you there, it is veiled, it is in the symptom, it comes from elsewhere, it is a phantastical interference, namely that it is to us as analysts that it suggests the place where it exists as phantasy, but it seems to me that it is something different when this phallus appears in a quite different function which is namely when it is projected as one might say for the subject before the image of the host. I already alluded to these sorts of profanatory obsessions, that, where the subject is possessed and that there it seems to us in effect if for all that religious life in this profoundly restructured form, infiltrated by symptoms when it is present in the obsessional, and to which moreover, by a sort of curious conformity, this religious life, and especially this sacramental life, shows itself to be so suitable for giving to the symptoms of the obsessional the path, the furrow in which they flow so easily, it is all the same in as much as especially in the (30) Christian religion - I have not much experience of obsessions among Muslims for example, but it would be worth while to see how they deal with things, I mean what office in this instance at the horizon of their beliefs as it is structured in Islam, manages to implicate itself in obsessional phenomenology. Certainly in Christianity one cannot fail to see, and every time that Freud had an obsessional, whether it was the Ratman or the Wolfman, who had a Christian formation, he showed clearly its importance in their evolution and in their economy, one cannot all the same fail to see that by its articles of faith, the Christian religion places us before this really astonishing, daring, solution, which is daring to say the least, of effectively causing to be supported by something which is man-God, an incarnate person, to be precisely supported by him this function, because he is the word, this function of the signifier in which we say that there is precisely marked the action of the signifier on life as such.

The Christian logos in so far as he is the incarnate logos, gives a precise solution to this mystery of the relationships between man and the word, and it is not for nothing precisely that the incarnate God is called the Word.

That it should be at the level of the ever renewed symbol of this incarnation that the subject makes appear the signifier phallus (31) which for her is substituted for it, and which of course does not form part as such of the religious context; we should not be surprised, if what we say is true, to see it appearing at this place. But when the subject sees it appearing at this place, it is certain that it plays there a quite different role than at the place where we have first seen it interpreted, and I think that it is quite wrong afterwards at a subsequent point of the observation, to interpret the function of the signifier phallus as homogeneous to the angle under which it intervened here for example at the level of the symptom, when at a much more advanced period of the observation, the subject communicates to her analyst this phantasy:

"I dreamt that I was crushing the head of Christ with my kicks, and this head resembled your own."

It is certain that at this moment the function of the phallus is identified here, not in the way it is said, to the analyst, in so far as the analyst is supposed to be the bearer of the phallus, but in so far as it is obviously at this level of transference, at this point of the history of transference, that the analyst is identified with the phallus. He is identified with the one who, at this moment, incarnates for the subject precisely this effect of the signifier, this relationship to the word which she is beginning at that moment to project a little more through the effect of a certain number of manifestations of relaxation, and (32) to interpret it in a homogeneous fashion in terms of Penisneid, at this time is precisely to miss the opportunity of relating the patient to what is most profound in her situation, namely of grasping the relationship perhaps which in a far-off time, was made by her between this X which fundamentally provoked with respect to the other, to this demand of the other, the death of the demand, and the first perception, the form in which for her the intolerable rivalry first appeared, namely in this instance the desire of the mother for this distant love which distracted her both from her husband and from her child for example.

In any case no doubt the fact that the phallus, and in a repeated fashion, because there is a second example which is given afterwards, appears here in this position, namely somewhere which, may, must be situated at the level of the signifier of the Other as such, qua struck, qua barred, qua identical to the most profound signification with which the Other may be struck for the subject should not be neglected as such. And on the other hand when the phallus appears at another moment of the analysis, at a moment of the analysis which is slightly later, because at that time many interpretations have to be taken into account which made it come to light from this angle, namely in these dreams where the patient - it is one of the most common dreams observed (33) in I would say in the majority of neuroses - where the patient realises herself as a phallic being, namely sees one of her breasts replaced by a phallus, indeed a phallus situated between her two breasts. It is one of the most frequent dream phantasies that one can meet up with in every analysis.

The question, I must say, seems to me to be linked to something quite different in this instance, than to a desire, as they say, "for masculine identification and possession of the phallus". In effect there is some speculation here about whether she sees her own breasts transformed into a penis. "Does she not refer onto the man's penis the oral aggressivity primitively directed against the maternal breast?"

It is one way of reasoning. But on the other hand if one observes the extreme extension given under its form, from the fact that on the other hand its forms themselves can be, as is well known, essentially polyphallic, I mean that once there is more than one phallus, I would almost say that we find ourselves before an altogether fundamental image which the Diana of Ephesus sufficiently provides for us in this sort of streaming of breasts of which her whole body is in a way composed.

Here then, because the analyst had already at that moment pointed out the equivalence of the shoe and the phallus, what this patient sees, what immediately follows - I mean that this (34) immediately follows the first two attempts, and is moreover considered as confirming them.

"I am having my shoe repaired by a shoemaker. Then I get up on a stage decorated with blue, white, red stage lights, where there are only men. My mother is in the crowd and admires me".

Can we content ourselves by talking about Penisneid? Is it not obvious here that the relationship to the phallus is here of a different order, that the dream itself that is in question, both indicates that it is linked to a relationship of exhibition; of exhibition not before those who have it, the other men who are there with her on the stage, and regarding whom it is almost too clever to say it, the blue, white, red lights evoke here for us all sorts of different obscene backgrounds, and that it is before her mother, and as such, that she exhibits herself; in other words, that here we find ourselves before this phantastical, compensatory relationship, of which I spoke the last time, this power relationship no doubt, but power in relation to the third person who is the mother, and this is something which is produced at this level in the relationship that the subject has with the image of her own counterpart, of the small other, of the image of the body, and that what is to be studied, precisely the function of this phantastical relationship in the equilibrium of the subject, that to interpret it and to assimilate it purely and simply to the function and to the appearance of the phallus, at (35) the other points, is also something which bears witness, I would say to a lack of criteria in the orientation of interpretations, because when all is said and done, what will all the interventions of the analyst in this observation tend towards? Towards facilitating in her what he calls the conscious awareness of some lack, some nostalgia or other for the penis as such, and in facilitating for her the outcome of her phantasies, by centering on this phantasy as such, as being a phantasy of lesser power, even though most of the facts go against this interpretation.

What does the analyst do in restoring to the patient or to the subject, what I might call, the legitimate phallus? Its meaning is changed for her. I mean by that that one does something which amounts more or less to teaching her to love her obsessions, because in fact this is what is presented to us as the sum total of this therapy: the obsessions have not diminished, simply that the patient no longer feels guilty about them, which is brought about by a certain intervention essentially centred on the texture of phantasies, and on the valorisation of this phantasy, as a phantasy of rivalry with men, supposedly, by a simple supposition, transferred from some aggressivity or other against the mother whose root is in no way reached.

It is something which culminates in the following: in fact the texture of the obsessions is, through the authorisation given by the analyst, separated from this fundamental demand for death.

(36) But I would say that by operating in this way, namely by legitimating when all is said and done, because one can only legitimate in a block to the degree that the phantasy is authorised by interpretation, the obsession of the genital relationship is consumed as such, I mean that from the moment that the subject learns to love her obsessions as such, in so far as they are invested with the whole signification of what happens to her, we see developing here at the end of the observation all sorts of intuitions which are no doubt extremely elating.

I would ask you to refer to it, because it is too late for me to read it for you today. But undoubtedly this has altogether the appearance of this style of narcissistic effusion that some people have highlighted as a phenomenon coming at the end of analyses, and regarding which moreover the author does not have many illusions.

"The positive feature", he writes, "is precisely with these characteristics of a strongly genitalised Oedipus complex"

And it is on this note of profound incompleteness, and I must say of few illusions concerning a really genital solution, as it is expressed concerning the outcome of this analysis, that he himself concludes.

What does not seem to have been seen at all in this is precisely that this is closely correlated with the very mode of interpretation, the centring of interpretation on something (37) which when all is said and done aims at the reduction of demand, rather than at its fundamental elucidation, and this is all the more paradoxical in our day, when one is used to showing for example, the importance of the interpretation of aggressivity as such. Perhaps this term precisely is too vague for practitioners still to find their way about in it, and that the term of demand for death which might be substituted for it, which might be advantageously substituted in German, is what is required to be reached as a level of subjective articulation of demand.

I would like in concluding, because I alluded above to something which is called the commandments, to draw your attention to something, because I also spoke about Christianity, which is precisely not one of the least mysterious commandments of what one could call, not a morality, because in reality it is not a moral commandment, it is a commandment precisely founded on identification, it is the one which at the horizon of all the commandments, is put forward by the Christian articulation in the words: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself".

I do not know if you have ever dwelt on what that involves. It involves all sorts of rather surprising objections. First of all the beautiful souls will cry: "As thyself 1 Surely more! Why as (38) thyself? That is not very much!" On the other hand people with more experience will say: "But after all, is it so sure that one loves one's self? Experience proves that we have the most contradictory sentiments as regards ourselves, the most unusual ones, and after all this reference to a thyself which seems all of a sudden in fact to place in a certain perspective, if one takes it from a certain perspective, is fundamentally egoism, and how can you make it the measure, the module, the paragon of love". This all the same is one of the most surprising things.

I think that in fact these objections which are in a way quite valid, and that one could in fact very easily incarnate by the impossibility of responding to this sort of challenge in the first person, no one ever supposed that to this "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself", an: "I love my neighbour as myself" could answer, because obviously the weakness of this formulation is clear to everyone.

In fact, I believe that if something allows us to dwell on this formulation as something which interests us, which profoundly interests us and which in a way illustrates what I called here the horizon of the commandment, the horizon of the word, it is indeed this something which ensures that if we articulate it from (39) where this must start, namely from the locus of the other, if symmetrically and parallel to the point: "Thou art the one who kills me" (Tu es celui qui me tues) which I showed you here underlying the position of the other at the simple level of the first demand, the "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself", is a circle, and thou has led us in this "thyself" not to recognise anything else than the thou at the level of which the commandment itself articulates by ending on an "as thyself", as thyself you are at the level of the word, the one whom you hate in the demand for death, whom you hate because you do not know him. It is at this level that the Christian commandment rejoins the one which gives us the point at the horizon where Freud's instruction is articulated: Wo Es war, soll Ich werden. It is the same thing again that another wisdom expresses in the "Thou art" (Tu es) which must when all is said and done end an authentic and full assumption of the subject in his own word, that he should recognise where he is, at this horizon of the word which is that without which nothing in analysis can be articulated, except to produce false routes and misconceptions.

Desire and its Interpretation

1958 - 1959

Translated by Cormac Gallagher from unedited French typescripts

Seminar It 12 November 1958

We are going to speak this year about desire and its interpretation.

An analysis is, it is said, a therapy; let us say a treatment, a psychical treatment which relates at different levels of the psyche, at first this was the primary scientific object of its experience, to what we call marginal or residual phenomena, dreams, parapraxes, witticisms, I stressed that last year, to symptoms.

On the other hand, if we get into this curative aspect of the treatment with regard to symptoms in the broadest sense, in so far as they manifest themselves in the subject by inhibitions, are constituted in symptoms and sustained by these symptoms, on the other hand this treatment which modifies structures, these structures which are called neuroses or neuro-psychoses which Freud in reality first structured and qualified as neuropsychoses (2) of defence.

The psychoanalyst intervenes in order to deal at different levels with these diverse phenomenal realities in so far as they bring desire into play. It is specifically under this rubric of desire, as signifying desire that the .phenomena..which I called above residual, marginal, were first of all apprehended in Freud, in the symptoms which we see described from one end to the other of Freud's thought, it is the intervention of anxiety, if we make of it the key point of the determination of symptoms, but in so far as such and such an activity which is going to enter into the operation of symptoms is eroticised, or to put it better: is namely caught up in the mechanism of desire.

Indeed, what does the very term defence signify in connection with the neuropsychoses, if it is not a defence against what? Against something which is not yet anything other than desire.

And nevertheless this analytic theory at the centre of which it is sufficient to indicate that the notion of libido is situated, which is nothing other than the psychical energy of desire, is something, if we are dealing with energy, in which, as I already indicated in passing, remember earlier the metaphor of the factory, certain conjunctions of the symbolic and the real are necessary for the notion of energy even to subsist. But I do not wish here, either to stop or to dwell too long on this.

(3) This analytic theory therefore rests entirely on this notion of libido, on the energy of desire. But notice that for some time we see it more and more oriented towards something which those very people who sustain this new orientation, themselves articulate very consciously, at least the more aware of them who have borrowed it from Fairbairn, he writes frequently, because he continuously articulates and writes, particularly in the collection which is called Psychoanalytic Studies of the Personality that the modern theory of analysis has changed somewhat from the axis which Freud first gave it by bringing it about or by considering that for us the libido is no longer "pleasure-seeking", as Fairbairn expresses it, that it is "object-seeking".

This is to say that Mr. Fairbairn is the most typical representative of this modern tendency.

What this tendency orienting the function of the libido in function of an object which is supposed to be in some way predestined for it signifies, is something to which we have alluded a hundred times and whose incidences on analytic theory and technique I have shown you in a thousand forms, together with what I believed could often be pointed out in them in terms of practical deviations, some of which have dangerous consequences.

(4) The importance of what I want to point out to you in order to allow you to approach the problem today, is in short this veiling of the very word desire which appears in the whole manipulation of analytic experience, and in a way the impression I would not say of renewal, I would say of bewilderment, that we produce by reintroducing it; I mean that instead of talking about libido or about the genital object, we talk about genital desire. It will immediately perhaps appear much more difficult for us to consider as obvious that genital desire and its maturation imply just by themselves this sort of possibility or of openness, or of the plenitude of realisation of love which seems to have become so doctrinal, from a certain perspective of the maturation of the libido; tendency and realisation, and the implication as regards the maturation of the libido, which appear all the same all the more surprising since they make their appearance at the heart of a doctrine which was precisely the first not alone to highlight, but even to explain, what Freud has classified under the title of debasement in the sphere of love, which means that if in effect desire seems to bring with it a certain quantum in effect of love, it is indeed very precisely, and very often of a love which presents itself to the personality as conflictual, of a love which is not avowed, of a love which even refuses to avow itself.

(5) On the other hand, what if we also reintroduce this word desire there where we see being currently employed as affectivity, as a positive or negative sentiment, in what one can call a sort of disgraceful way of proceeding, forces which are still efficacious, and particularly by means of the analytic relationship, by means of the transference. It seems to me that by the simple fact of using this word, a cleavage will be produced which will of itself have something clarifying about it.

It is a question of knowing whether transference is constituted, no longer by an affectivity or by positive or negative sentiments which this term involves in a vague and veiled way, but it is a question, and here the desire that is experienced is named by a single one, sexual desire, aggressive desire with respect to the analyst, which will show itself to us right away and at first glance. These desires are by no means everything in the transference, and because of this very fact the transference must be defined by something other than by more or less confused references to the notion of positive or negative affectivity; and so that indeed if we pronounce the word desire, the final benefit of this full usage is that we will ask ourselves what desire is.

It is not a question that we will have to or be able to respond to. It is only that, if I were not caught up here by what I could call the urgent rendezvous that I have with my practical experiential requirements, I would have allowed myself some (6) questions on the subject of the meaning of this word desire, in the company of those who have been the most qualified to valorise its usage, namely the poets and the philosophers.

I will not do this, first of all because the usage of the word desire, the transmission of the term and of the function of desire in poetry, is something which I would say, we will discover retrospectively if we pursue our investigation far enough. If it is true, because this will be the whole progress of my development this year, that the situation of desire is profoundly marked by, tied up to, riveted to a certain function of language, to a certain relationship of the subject to the signifier, analytic experience will carry us, at least I hope so, far enough in this exploration for us to find enough time to be helped perhaps by the properly poetic evocation that can be made of it, and indeed also to understand more profoundly at the end the nature of poetic creation in its relationships with desire.

Only I would point out that the fundamental difficulties of the game of hide-and-seek that you will see to be at the basis of what our experience will show us, appear already in the fact for example that precisely one sees clearly in poetry how the poetic relationship to desire is poorly accommodated, as one might say, to the depiction of its object. I would say that in this regard figurative poetry - I am almost evoking the roses and lillies of beauty - always has something which only expresses desire in a (7) particularly cold register; that on the contrary the law properly speaking of this problem of the evocation of desire, is in a poetry which curiously presents itself as that poetry which is called metaphysical and for those who read English, I will only refer here to the most eminent of the metaphysical poets in English literature, John Donne, so that you can refer to him in order to confirm the degree to which it is very precisely the problem of the structure of the relationships of desire which is evoked there in a celebrated poem, for example "The Ecstasy", and whose title sufficiently indicates the first steps, the direction in which there is poetically elaborated at least on the lyrical plane, the poetic approach to desire when it itself is properly speaking sought and aimed at.

I am leaving to one side something which certainly goes much further in presenting desire, the work of the poet when it is supported by dramatic action. It is very precisely the dimension to which we will have to come back this year. I am announcing it to you already because we approached it last year, it is the direction of comedy.

But let us leave the poets there. I only mentioned them there as a sort of preliminary indication, and to tell you that we will rediscover them later more or less diffusely. I want to dwell more or less on what has been in this regard the position of the philosophers, because I think that it has been very instructive (8) in terms of the point where the problem is situated for us.

I was careful to write for you up there these three terms: "pleasure-seeking", "object-seeking", in so far as they are seeking pleasure, in so far as they are seeking the object. This indeed is the way that it has been posed from the beginning for reflection and for morality - I mean theoretical morality, the morality which is announced in precepts and in rules, in the operations of philosophers, very especially it is said of moral philosophers (ethiciens). I pointed out to you already - notice in passing when all is said and done the foundation of every morality which could be called physical, as one could see the way in which the term has the same meaning, the way in which medieval philosophy speaks about the physical theory of love, precisely in the sense that it is the opposite of the ecstatic theory of love. The basis of every morality which has been expressed up to the present, up to a certain point in the philosophical tradition, comes back in fact to what could be called the hedonistic tradition which consists in establishing a sort of equivalence between these two terms of pleasure and object, in the sense that the object is the natural object of libido, in the sense that it is a benefit, when all is said and done, to admit pleasure to the rank of the goods sought by the subject, even indeed to refuse it once one has the same criterion of it, to the rank of sovereign good.

This hedonistic tradition of morality is something which is (9) certainly not capable of ceasing, except by remembering that from the moment that one is in a way engaged in academic dialogue, that one no longer perceives its paradoxes, because when all is said and done, what is more contrary to what we will call the experience of practical reason, than this supposed convergence of pleasure and the good?

When all is said and done, if one looks closely at it, if one looks for example at what these things involve in Aristotle, what do we see being elaborated? And it is very clear, things are very pure in Aristotle. It is undoubtedly something which only succeeds in realising this identification of pleasure and of the good within what I may call an ethic of mastery, or something whose flattering ideal, the terms of temperance or of intemperance, namely something which is associated with the subject's mastery with respect to his own habits. But the inconsistency of this theorisation is quite striking. If you re-read these celebrated passages which concern precisely the use of pleasures, you will see there that nothing comes into this moralising point of view which does not belong to the register of this mastery of a morality of the master, from the fact that the master can discipline, can discipline many things, principally involving, relative to, his habits, namely to the management and to the usage of his ego. But as regards desire, you see the degree to which Aristotle himself must admit, he is very lucid and very (10) aware that what results from this practical and theoretical moral theorisation, is that the epitheumiai, the desires, appear very quickly beyond a certain limit which is precisely the limit of mastery and of the ego in the domain of what he calls precisely bestiality.

Desires are exiled from the proper field of man, if it is a fact that man is identified with the reality of the master; on occasion it is even something like perversions, and moreover he has in this regard a particularly modern conception of the fact that something in our vocabulary could express well enough by the fact that the master is not to be judged on this, which almost amounts to saying that in our vocabulary, he cannot be recognised as responsible.

These texts are worthwhile recalling. You will clarify things for yourselves by referring to them.

Opposed to this philosophical tradition, there is someone whom I would wish all the same to name here, to name as being in my eyes the precursor of this something which I believe to be new, which we must consider as new, in let us say the progress, the direction of certain relationships of man to himself, which is that of the analysis that Freud establishes.

It is Spinoza, because after all I think that it is in him, (11) in any case with a very exceptional accent, that one can read a formula like the following: "That desire is the very essence of man". In order not to isolate the beginning of the formula from what follows, we will add: "in so far as it is conceived from one of his affections, conceived as determined and dominated by any one of his affections to do something".

One could already do a lot starting from there to articulate that which in this formula still remains, what I might call, unrevealed; I say unrevealed because of course you cannot translate Spinoza into Freud. He is all the same very singular, and I offer him to you as a very singular testimony, no doubt personally I have perhaps a greater propensity than someone else, and many years ago I spent a lot of time working on Spinoza. I do not think for all that that this is the reason why in rereading him from the point of view of my experience, it seems to me that someone who participates in the Freudian experience can find himself also at ease in the texts of the man who wrote "De Servitute Humana", and for whom the whole human reality and its structures are organised in function of the attributes of the divine substance.

But let us also leave to one side for the moment this indication, provided we return to it. I want to give you a much more accessible example, one on which I will close this philosophical reference concerning our problem. I took it here at the most (12) accessible level, indeed at the most popular way into it that you could have. Open the dictionary of the late charming Lalande, his Vocabulaire de la philosophie, which is always, I must say, in every kind of exercise of this nature, that of making a dictionary, always one of the most dangerous and at the same time one of the most fruitful things, to such an extent does language dominate all these problems. One is sure that in organising a dictionary one will always do something suggestive. Here we find the following: "Desir (Begehren, Verlangen)" - it is not irrelevant to recall what desire articulates on the plane of German philosophy - "a spontaneous and conscious tendency towards an end that you imagine".

"Desire is therefore based upon tendency of which it is a particular and more complex case. On the other hand it is opposed to will or to volition in so far as it superimposes: 1. the coordination of the tendencies, at least momentarily; 2. the opposition of the subject and the object; 3. the consciousness of one's own efficacy; 4. the thought of the means through which the willed-for end will be realised".

These reminders are very useful, only it should be remarked that in an article which is trying to define desire, there are two lines to situate it with respect to tendency and that this whole development is referred to the will. It is effectively to this that the discourse on desire in the dictionary is reduced, except (13) that there is added on again:

"Finally, according to certain philosophers, there is also in the will a fiat of a special nature which is irreducible to the tendencies, and which constitutes liberty".

It is striking to see coming over this philosophical author some air of irony or other in these last lines. As a note: "Desire is the tendency to procure an emotion that has been already experienced or imagined, it is the natural will for a pleasure" (quotation from Roque). This term of natural will being very interesting as a reference.

To which Lalande personally adds: "This definition appears too narrow in that it does not take into account sufficiently the anteriority of certain tendencies with respect to their corresponding emotions. Desire seems to be essentially the desire of an act or of a state without there being necessary in every case a representation of the affective character of this end".

I think that this means of the pleasure, or of something else. In any case, it certainly poses the problem of knowing what is in question, whether it is the representation of the pleasure, or if it is the pleasure.

Certainly I do not think that the task which is done by means of a dictionary, to try to circumscribe the signification of desire, is a simple task, all the more because you will not be able for the task either by means of the tradition to which it (14) reveals itself as absolutely prepared. After all is desire the psychological reality, resistant to every organisation, and when all is said and done is it by the subtraction of the characteristics that are indicated as being those of the will that we can manage to approach what the reality of desire is?

We will then have the contrary of what has left us with the non-coordination of tendencies, even momentarily, the opposition of the subject and the object, would really be withdrawn. Likewise we would be here in a presence, a tendency unaware of its own efficacy, without thinking of the words by which it will realise the desired end. In short, we are certainly here in a field in which in any case analysis has introduced certain more precise articulations, because within these negative determinants, analysis outlines very precisely the drive at the level, at its different levels, in so far as it is precisely the following: the non-coordination, even momentarily, of the tendencies, the phantasy in so far as it introduces an essential articulation, or more exactly an altogether characteristic species within this vague determination of the non-opposition of the subject to the object.

This year our aim here will be to try precisely to define what phantasy is, perhaps even a little more precisely than the analytic tradition up to now has managed to define it.

(15) For the rest, the final terms of idealism, of pragmatism, which are implied here, we will only retain for the moment one thing: very precisely how difficult it seems to situate desire and to analyse it in function of purely objectal references.

We are going to stop here to enter properly speaking into the terms within which I hope to articulate for you this year the problem of our experience, in so far as they are specifically those of desire, of desire and its interpretation. Already the internal link, the link of the coherence in analytic experience between desire and its interpretation, presents in itself something which only habit prevents us from seeing how suggestive the interpretation of desire already is by itself, and something which seems to be linked in an internal fashion, it seems, to the manifestation of desire.

You know the point of view from which, I will not say we are beginning, we are continuing, because we did not come together yesterday, I mean that we have already spent five years trying to designate the features of the comprehension of our experience by certain articulations. You know that these features have come to converge this year on this problem which is perhaps the problem at which there converge underneath, these points, some distant from one another, whose approach I wish first of all to (16) prepare for you.

Psychoanalysis - and we have gone along together for the last five years - psychoanalysis essentially shows us what we will call man's capture in the components of the signifying chain.

That this capture is no doubt linked to the reality (fait) of man, but that this capture is not coextensive with this reality in the sense that no doubt man speaks, but that in order to speak he must enter into language and into its pre-existing discourse. I would say that this law of subjectivity which analysis especially highlights, its fundamental dependence on language is something which is so essential that it brings all the psychologies together.

We are saying that there is a psychology which is served, in so far as we may define it as the totality of studies concerning what we could call in a broad sense a sensibility in so far as it is a function of the maintenance of a totality or of a homeostasis, in short, the functions of sensibility in relation to an organism. You see that here everything is implicated, not alone all the experimental data of psychophysiology, but also everything that can contribute in the most general order, the putting into operation of notions of form as regards the apprehension of the means for the maintenance of the constancy of the organism. A whole field of psychology is inscribed here, (17) and personal experience sustains this field in which the research is carried on.

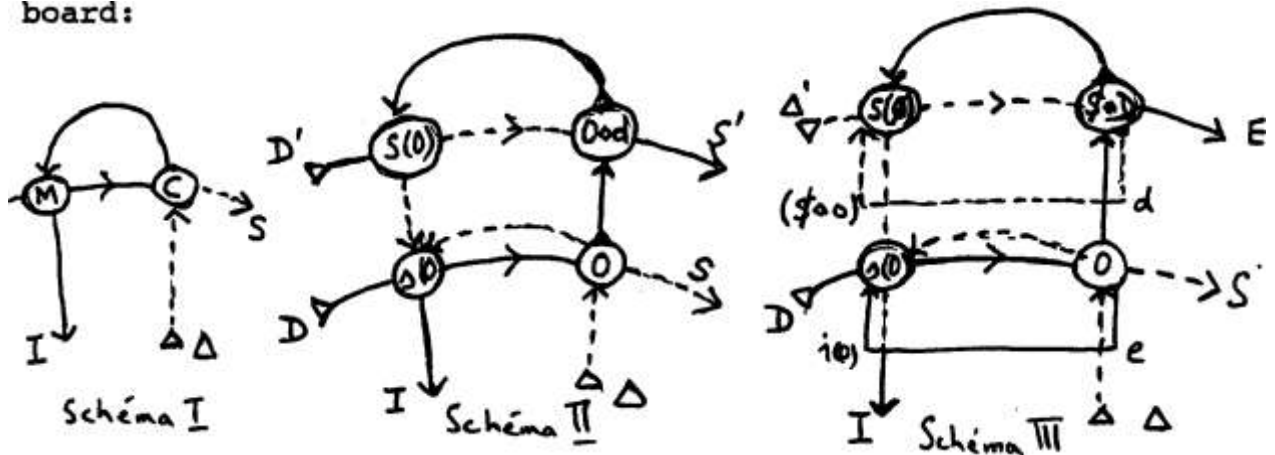

But the subjectivity that is in question, in so far as man is captured by language, in so far as he is captured, whether he wishes it or not, and in so far as he is captured away beyond the knowledge that he has of it, is a subjectivity which is not immanent to a sensibility in so far as here the term sensibility means the couple stimulus-response, for the following reason: It is because the stimulus here is given in function of a code which imposes its order, if needs be must be translated into it.

I am articulating here the emission, and not of a sign as one could say at a pinch, at least in the experimental perspective, in the experimental testing of what I call the stimulus-response cycle. One could say that that it is a sign which from the external milieu forces the organism to respond, to defend itself. If you tickle the sole of a frog's foot, it notices a sign, it responds to it by a certain muscular relaxation.

But in so far as subjectivity is captured in language, there is the emission, not of a sign, but of a signifier, namely be sure to remember the following which appears simple: that something, the signifier which takes on value not as is said when one speaks in communications theory of something, which takes on its value in relation to a third thing, that this sign still represents quite recently, this can be read with three terms: they are the (18) minimal terms, there must be a, the one who hears, after that a signifier is enough, there is no need even to speak about an emitter, it is enough to have a sign and to say that this sign signifies a third thing, that it simply represents. This is a false construction, because the sign does not take its value with respect to a third thing that it represents, but it takes on its value with respect to another signifier which it is not.

As regards these three schemas which I have just put on the board:

I wish to show you, I would not say their genesis because you should not imagine that it is a question of a stage, even though something could be discovered here of a stage effectively realised by the subject, the subject must after all take his place here, but you should not see here a stage in the sense that it would be a question of a typical stage, of a stage of development, it is rather a question of a generating, and to be more explicit, of a logical anteriority of each one of these schemas with respect to the one which follows.

(19) What is represented by this thing which we shall call D, because it begins from a capital D? It represents the signifying chain. What does that mean? This basic fundamental structure, subjects every manifestation of language to the condition of being ruled by a succession, in other words by a diachrony, by something which unfolds over time. We will leave to one side the temporal properties that are involved. We will have to come back to them perhaps at the appropriate time. Let us say that undoubtedly the whole fullness of temporal material, so to speak, is not at all applied here. Here things can be summarised in terms of the notion of succession, with what this can already involve and imply in terms of the notions of scansion. But we have not even got that far yet. The single discrete, that is to say differential element, is the base on which there is going to be established our problem of the implication of the subject in the signifier.

This implies, given what I have just pointed out to you, namely that the signifier is defined by its relationship, its meaning, and takes on its value in relation to another signifier, from a system of signifying opposition, this develops in a dimension which also and at the same time implies a certain synchrony of signifiers.

It is this synchrony of signifiers, namely the existence of a certain signifying battery concerning which one can pose the

(20) problem of knowing what is the minimal battery. I tried to work at this little problem. It will not be taking you too far from your experience to know whether after all one can make a language with a battery which seems to be the minimal battery, a battery of four. I do not think that it is unthinkable. But let us leave this to one side.

It is clear that in the present state of affairs, we are far from being reduced to this minimum. The important thing is the following which is indicated by the dotted line which has come to intersect from the front to the back the line representing the signifying chain, by cutting it at two points, namely the way in which the subject has to enter into the operation of the signifying chain. The thing that is represented by the dotted line represents the first encounter at the synchronic level, at the level of the simultaneity of signifiers. Here we have what I call the point of encounter with the code. In other words, it is in so far as the child addresses himself to a subject whom he knows to be a speaking subject, whom he has seen speaking, who has penetrated him with relationships ever since the beginning of his awakening to the light of day; it is in so far as there is something which operates as the operation of the signifier, as the word-mill, that the subject has to learn very early on that there is here a path, a defile through which essentially the manifestations of his needs must stoop in order to be satisfied.

(21) Here the second point of intersection is the point at which the message is produced, and it is constituted by the following: the fact is that it is always by a retroactive operation of the succession of signifiers that the signification is affirmed and made precise, namely that it is retroactively that the message takes shape from the signifier which is there ahead of it, from the code which is ahead of it, and which inversely it, the message, while it is being formulated at every instant, anticipates, draws on.

I indicated to you already what results from this process. In any case what results from it and what can be marked on the schema, is the following: it is that what is at the origin in the form of the birth of need, of the tendency, as the psychologists call it, which is represented here on the schema, here at the level of this Id which does not know what it is, which being captured in language, does not reflect itself by (de) this innocent contribution of language in which the subject at first becomes discourse. There results from this that even reduced to the most primitive forms of apprehension by the subject of the fact that he is in relationship with other speaking subjects, there is produced this something at the end of the intentional chain which I here called for you the first primary identification, the first realisation of an idea regarding which one can not even say at this moment of the schema that it is a question of an ego ideal, but that undoubtedly the subject has here received the first sign, signum, of its (22) relationship with the other.

The second stage of the schema can overlap in a certain fashion a particular evolutionary stage, on the simple condition that you do not consider them as clearly distinguished. There are things clearly distinguished in evolution, it is not at the level of the stages of the schema that these caesuras are found here. These caesuras, as Freud remarked somewhere, are marked at the level of the judgement of attribution compared to simple nomination. This is not what I am talking to you about now, I will come back to it later.

In the first part of the schema and in the second, it is a question of the difference within an infans level of discourse, because it is perhaps not even necessary yet for the child to speak in order that already this mark, this imprint put on need by demand, already operates at the level of alternating wails. That may be enough.

The second part of the schema implies that even if the child cannot yet sustain a discourse, he knows all the same how to speak, and this comes very early. When I say knows how to speak, I mean that it is a question, at the level of the second stage of the schema, of something that goes beyond the capture in language. There is properly speaking a relationship in so far as there is an appeal to the other as presence, this appeal to the other as presence, as presence against a background of meaning; at this moment signalled by the fort-da which impressed (23) Freud so vividly at a date that we can fix as 1915, having been called to one of his grandsons, who himself became a psychoanalyst, I mean the child who was the object of Freud's observation.

This is what makes us pass to the level of the second stage of the realisation of the schema, in this sense that here, beyond what the chain of discourse as existent articulates, beyond the subject and imposing on him, whether he wishes it or not, its form, beyond this apprehension, which one might call an innocent one of the form of language by the subject, something else is going to appear which is linked to the fact that it is in the experience of language that there is founded his apprehension of the other as such, of this other who can give him the answer, the answer to his appeal, this other to whom fundamentally he poses the question which we see in Cazotte's Le diable amoureux, as being the roar of the terrifying form which represents the apparition of the super-ego, in response to the one who has evoked him in a Neapolitan tavern: "Che vuoi? What do you want?" The question posed to the other of what he wants, in other words, from the place where the subject meets desire the first time, desire being first of all the desire of the other, the desire thanks to which he perceives, he realises, as being this beyond around which turns the the fact that that the other will bring it about that one signifier or another will be or not be in the presence of the word, that the other gives him the experience of (24) his desire at the same time as an essential experience because up to the present it was in itself that the battery of signifiers was there, in which a choice could always be made, but now in experience this choice appears as commutative, that it is within the power of the other to bring it about that one or other of the signifiers should be there, that there should be introduced into experience, and at this level of experience, the two new principles which have just been added to what was at first the pure and simple principle of succession implying this principle of choice. We now have a principle of substitution, because - and this is essential - it is this commutativity from which there is established for the subject what I call, between the signifier and the signified, the bar, namely that there is between the signifier and the signified this co-existence, this simultaneity which is at the same time marked by a certain impenetrability, I mean the maintenance of the difference, of the distance between the signifier and the signified.

$$\begin{array}{c} S \\ - - - \\ S \end{array}$$

It is a curious thing, that the theory of groups as it is learned in the abstract study of sets, shows us the absolutely essential link between any commutativity and the very possibility of using what I call here the bar sign which is used for the representation of fractions.

(25) Let us leave this to one side for the moment. It is an indication that is marginal to what we are dealing with.

The structure of the signifying chain from the moment that it has realised the appeal of the other, namely when the enunciating, the process of enunciating is superimposed, is distinguished from the formula of the enunciated, by demanding as such something which is precisely the capture of the subject, the capture of the subject which at first was innocent, but which here - the nuance is nevertheless there, it is what is essential - is unconscious in the articulation of the word.

From the moment that the commutativity of the signifier here becomes an essential dimension for the production of the signified, namely that it is in an effective and striking fashion in the consciousness of the subject, of the substitution of a signifier for another signifier, will be as such the origin of the multiplication of these significations which characterise the enrichment of the human world.

Another term also emerges, or another principle which is the principle of similarity, in other words which brings it about that within the chain, it is in relation to the fact that in the sequence of the signifying chain, one of the signifying terms will be or not similar to another, that there also operates a certain dimension of things which is properly speaking the metonymical dimension.

(26) I will show you later that it is essentially in this dimension, in this dimension that there are produced the effects which are characteristic and fundamental of what can be called the poetic discourse, the effects of poetry.

It is therefore at the level of the second stage of the schema that there is produced something which allows us to place at the same level as the message, namely on the left hand side of the schema, that which the message in the first schema, the apparition of what is signified about the Other in opposition to the signifier given by the Other which it produces on the chain, the dotted one because it is a chain which is only articulated in part, which is only implicit, which here only represents the subject in so far as he is the support of the word.

I told you, that it is in the experience of the other qua other having a desire, that this second stage of experience is produced. Desire, starting with its apparition, its origin, is manifested in this interval, this gap which separates the pure and simple linguistic articulation of the word, from the thing which marks that the subject realises in it something of himself which only has import, meaning in relation to this production of the word and which is properly speaking what language calls his being.

It is between the avatars of his demand and what these avatars have made him become, and on the other hand this exigency for (27) recognition by the other which can be called exigency for love on this occasion, that there is situated a horizon of being for the subject of whom there is question, namely of knowing whether the subject can reach it or not. It is in this interval, in this gap that there is situated an experience which is that of desire, which is first of all apprehended as being that of the desire of the other, and within which the subject has to situate his own desire. His own desire as such cannot be situated elsewhere than in this space.

This represents the third stage, the third form, the third phase of the schema. It is constituted by the following: the fact is that in the primitive presence of the desire of the other as opaque, as obscure, the subject is without recourse. He is hilfloss, Hilflosigkeit. I use Freud's term, in French this is called the détresse of the subject. What we have here is the foundation of that which in analysis, was explored, experienced, situated as the traumatic experience.

What Freud has taught us by taking the path which allowed him to finally situate the experience of anxiety in its true place, is something which has nothing of this character which I consider to be diffuse in certain ways, of what is called the existential experience of anxiety. That if it has been possible to say by referring to philosophy that anxiety is something which confronts us with nothingness, these formulas are undoubtedly justifiable (28) in a certain perspective of reflection, you should know that on this subject Freud has an articulated, positive teaching; he makes of anxiety something which is clearly situated in a theory of communication. Anxiety is a signal. It is not at the level of desire, even though desire must be produced at the same place where at first helplessness (détresse) originates, is experienced; it is not at the level of desire that anxiety is produced. We will take up this year attentively, line by line, the study of Freud's Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety. Today in this first lecture the only thing I can do is to initiate for you some major points in order to be able to rediscover them subsequently, and namely the following. Freud tells us that anxiety is produced as a signal in the ego, on the foundation of which it as a signal is called on to remedy.

I know that I am going too quickly, that to talk to you about this would deserve a whole seminar, but I cannot talk to you about anything if I do not begin by showing you the outline of the journey that we have to take.

It is in so far therefore as there intervenes at this third stage the specular experience, the experience of the relationship to the image of the other in so far as it is fundamental to the Urbuild of the ego that we are in other words going to rediscover a way of using in a context which will give it a completely different resonance, what we articulated at the end of our first (29) year about the relationships between the ideal ego and the ego ideal, it is in so far as we are going to be led to rethink all that in the context of the symbolic action which I show you here to be essential.

You will see the use it can finally have. I am not alluding here only to what I said and articulated about the specular relationship, namely the confrontation in the mirror of the subject with his own image; I am alluding to the schema called 00', namely to the use of the concave mirror which allows us to think about the function of a real image itself reflected, and which can only be seen as reflected from a certain position, from a symbolic position which is that of the ego ideal.

What is in question is the following: in the third stage of the schema we have the intervention as such of the imaginary element of the relationship of the ego to the other as being what is going to permit the subject to guard against this helplessness in relation to the desire of the other, by what? By something which is borrowed from the game of mastery which the child at a particular age has learned to handle in a certain reference to his counterpart as such.

The experience of the counterpart, in the sense that he is gaze, that he is the other who looks at you, that he brings into play a certain number of imaginary relationships among which (30) in the forefront relationships of prestige, and also the relationships of submission and of defeat. It is by means of this in other words as Aristotle says, that man thinks. You must say that man thinks, you must not say that the soul thinks, but man thinks with his soul. You must say that the subject defends himself. This is what our experience shows us. With his ego he defends himself against this helplessness, and with this means that the imaginary experience of the relationship to the other gives him, he constructs something which is the difference between the flexible specular experience with the other, because what the subject reflects, are not simply games of prestige, it is not his opposition to the other in prestige and in pretence, it is himself as speaking subject, and this is why what I designate for you here as being this way out, this locus of reference by means of which desire is going to learn to situate itself, is the phantasy. This is why I symbolise the phantasy for you, I formulate it for you by means of these symbols, the S here. I will tell you in a little while why the S is barred, namely the subject as a speaker, in so far as he refers himself to the other as gaze, to the imaginary other.

Every time that you have to deal with something which is properly speaking a phantasy, you will see that it can be articulated in these terms of reference of the subject as speaking to the imaginary other. This is what defines the phantasy, every (31) phantasy is articulated in terms of the subject speaking to the imaginary other.

This is why human desire is adjusted (coapte) not to an object, but to a phantasy. It is a fact of experience that analysis has articulated in the course of its experience.

Perversion, deviation, even delusion are articulated in an objectification which ties the imaginary and the symbolic together.

Let us illustrate our remarks, because it is a question of the relationships of the the subject to the signifier, let us see the use that can be made of the schema in terms of communicating matters which are rather obscure.

(32) This then was why I began with that. I am not saying that for all that I have made your experience any easier, that is the reason why now, in order to relax this experience, I would like to give you right away little illustrations. These illustrations, I will take one of them first of all and really at the simplest level because it is a question of the relationships of the subject to the signifier, the least and the first thing that can be required of a schema, is to see the way in which it can help in connection with the fact of commutation.

I remembered something that I had read once in Darwin's book on expression in men and in animals and which I must say, amused me a good deal. Darwin tells how a man called Sydney Smith who, I suppose must have been someone in the English society of his time, and about whom he says the following: Darwin poses a question, he says: I heard Sydney Smith at a soiree, saying quite calmly the following sentence "I hear that dear old Lady Cock has been overlooked". In reality overlook means that the supervisor did not spot her, the etymological meaning. Overlook is commonly used in the English language. There is nothing that corresponds to it in our current usage. That is why the knowledge of languages is at once so useful and so harmful, because it allows us to avoid making an effort, to make this (33) substitution of signifiers in our own tongue, thanks to which we can manage to aim at a certain signified, because it is a question of changing the whole context in order to obtain the same effect in an analogous society. This could mean : l'oeil lui est passe au-dessus and Darwin marvels at the fact that it was absolutely perfectly clear to everyone, without the slightest doubt that that meant that the devil had forgotten her, I mean that he had forgotten to carry her into the tomb, which seems to have been at that moment in the mind of the listener her natural, even wished-for place. And Darwin really leaves the question open: How did he achieve this effect, says Darwin? You know, I am really unable to say.

However, we can be grateful to him for having marked the experience that he has there in a fashion that is particularly significant and exemplary of his own limitations in approaching this problem. That he took on the problem of emotions in a certain way, by saying that the expression of emotions is all the same involved, precisely because of the fact that the subject shows none, that he says this placidly, is perhaps taking things too far. In any case Darwin does not do it, he is really very astonished at this something that must be taken literally, because as always when we study a case, we must not reduce it by (34) making it vague. Darwin says: everyone understood that the man was talking about the devil, even though the devil is nowhere mentioned, and what is interesting is that Darwin tells us that the shadow of the devil passed through the gathering.

Let us try now to understand it a little.

We are not going to delay on Darwin's own mental limitations, we will necessarily come to them all the same, but not immediately. What is certain, is that there is from the first approach something which is part of a striking knowledge, because after all there is no need to have posed the principles of the metaphorical effect, namely of the substitution of a signifier for a signifier, in other words there is no need to demand of Darwin to have had a premonition of them for him to have understood right away that the effect in any case comes first of all from the fact that he does not even articulate, from the fact that a sentence which begins when one says Lady Cock, normally terminates with "ill": "I heard it being said all the same that things are not going too well", therefore that the substitution of something which appears that what is expected is news about the health of the old woman, because when one is talking about old ladies it is always with their health that one is concerned, is replaced by something different, indeed by something which from a certain point of view is irreverent.

He does not say, that she is either at death's door, nor that she (35) is quite well. He says that she has been forgotten.

Here then what intervenes in order that this metaphorical effect, namely in any case something other than that would mean if overlook were expected? It is in so far as it is not expected, that it is substituted for another signifier, that a signified effect is produced which is new, which is neither along the line that one has tried, nor along the line of what is unexpected. If this unexpected had not precisely been characterised as unexpected, it is something original which in a certain way had to be realised in the mind of each person according to his own angles of refraction. In any case there is the fact that there is an opening up of a new signified by this something which ensures for example that Sydney Smith is on the whole thought to be a wit, namely does not express himself in clichés.

But why the devil?

If we refer to our little schema, it will all the same help us a good deal. The reason why one makes schemas is in order to make use of them. One can however arrive at the same result without them, but the schema in a way guides us, shows us very obviously what is happening there in the real, the thing that presents itself, is properly speaking a phantasy, and by what mechanisms? It is here also that the schema can go further than what is permitted, I would say, by a kind of naive notion that things are (36) made to express something which in short would communicate an emotion as they say, as if the emotions in themselves did not pose so many other problems, namely what they are, namely if they themselves do not already have a need for communication.

Our subject, we are told, is perfectly placid, namely that he presents himself in a way in the pure state, the presence of his word being its pure metonymical effect; I mean his word qua word in its continuity as word, and in this continuity of word precisely he makes the following intervene: the presence of death in so far as the subject may or may not escape it, namely to the degree that he evokes this presence of something which has the closest relationship with the birth of the signifier itself, I mean that if there is here a dimension in which death, or the fact that there is no more, can be both directly evoked, and at the same time veiled, but in any case incarnated, become immanent in an act, it is indeed that of signifying articulation. It is therefore to the degree that this subject who speaks so easily about death, it is quite clear that he does not wish this lady particularly well, but that on the other hand the perfect placidity with which he speaks of it implies precisely that in this regard he has dominated his desire, in so far as this desire as in Volpone, can be expressed by the lovable formula: "May you (37) stink and die!"

He does not say that, he simply articulates serenely the level that this is worth to us each one in his turn which is here forgotten for a moment. But that, if I may put it this way, is not the devil, and the will come one day or other, and at the same time this personage, poses himself as someone who does not fear to meet on equal terms the one he is talking about, to put himself at the same level, under the influence of the same fault, of the same terminal legislation by the absolute master who is here made present.

In other words, the subject here reveals himself at the place of what is veiled by language as having this sort of familiarity, of fullness, of plenitude in the handling of language which suggests what? Precisely something on which I wish to terminate, because this is what was lacking in everything that I said in my development in three stages, for what is the mainspring, the highlight of what I wished to articulate for you to be complete.

At the level of the first schema we have the innocent image. It is of course unconscious, but it is an unconsciousness which is only asking to become knowledge. Let us not forget that in the unconscious this dimension of being conscious, even in French, implies this notion.

At the level of the second and of the third stage of the schema, I told you that we had a much more conscious use of knowledge, I (38) mean that the subject knows how to speak and that he speaks. This is what he does when he calls the other, and nevertheless it is here properly speaking that the originality of the field discovered by Freud and which he called the unconscious is to be found, namely this something which always puts the subject at a certain distance from his being, and which means precisely that this being never rejoins him, and it is for this reason that it is necessary, that he can not do otherwise than reach his being in this metonymy of being in the subject which is desire.

And why? Because at the level at which the subject is himself engaged, himself inserted into the word and because of that into the relationship to the other as such, as locus of the word, there is a signifier which is always lacking. Why? Because it is a signifier, and the signifier is specially assigned to the relationship of the subject with the signifier. This signifier has a name, it is the phallus.

Desire is the metonymy of being in the subject; the phallus is the metonymy of the subject in being. We will come back to this. The phallus, in so far as it is the signifying element subtracted from the chain of the word, in so far as it involves every relationship with the other, this is the final principle which means that the subject in everything, and in so far as he is implicated in the word, falls under the sway of something that develops with all its clinical consequences, under the name of (39) the castration complex.

What is suggested by I would not say every pure, but perhaps more every impure usage of the words of the tribe, every kind of metaphorical unveiling, provided it is audacious and challenges what is always veiled by language, and what it always veils at the final term, is death. This always tends to give rise to, to make emerge this enigmatic figure of the missing signifier, of the phallus which appears here, and as always of course under the form that is called diabolical, the ear, the skin even the phallus itself, and if in this usage of the wager, the tradition of English wit, of this something contained which none the less does not dissimulate the most violent desire, but this usage is enough in itself to make appear in the imaginary, in the other who is there as a spectator in the small o, this image of the subject in so far as he is marked by this relationship to the special signifier which is called prohibition, here on this occasion in so far as it violates a prohibition, in so far as it shows that beyond the prohibitions which make up the law of languages, this is not the way to talk about old ladies.

Here all the same is a gentleman who intends to speak quite placidly and who makes the devil appear, and this is the point that our dear Darwin asks himself: how, in the name of the devil, did he do that?

I will leave you with that today. The next time we will take up (40) a dream in Freud, and we will try to apply our methods of analysis, and this will at the same time allow us to situate the different modes of interpretation.

Seminar 2: 19 November 1958

I would like first of all to set out the limits of what I want to do today, I mean in this particular lecture, to state what I will show you today, and first of all by tackling the example of the interpretation of a dream, as well as the use of what we have called conventionally for some time the graph.

Since I am not carrying on this discourse, if I can express myself in this way, simply above your heads, I would like there to be established through it a certain communication, as they say. I had some echo of the difficulties which you yourselves experienced the last time, namely at a moment which was far from being a novelty, and that the setting out again of this graph still constituted for some of you. For many however it remains, let us not yet say manageable because in truth this graph is not extraordinary, we constructed it together last year, namely put it together progressively, in a way you saw it being built up from the needs of a certain formulation centred around what I (2) called the formations of the unconscious. There is no need to be surprised that you are not able, as some of you have remarked, to perceive that its usage is not yet univocal for you, because precisely a part of what we will have to articulate this year about desire will show us its usefulness, and at the same time will teach us to handle it.

First of all then it is a question of comprehension. It is even this which seems to create for a certain number in different degrees, perhaps even less than they themselves say, which seems to create difficulties.

In connection with this term comprehension, I would like to point out - I assure you that there is no irony intended - that it is a problematical term. If there are those among you who always understand in every circumstance and at every moment what they are doing, I congratulate them and I envy them. This does not correspond, even after twenty five years of practice, to my experience, and in fact it shows us well enough the dangers that it involves in itself, the danger of illusion in all comprehension, so that I do not think there is any doubt that what I am trying to show you, is not so much to comprehend what I am doing, as to know it (le savoir). It is not always the same thing, they may not even go together, and you will see precisely that there are internal reasons why they should not go together, namely that you can in certain cases know what you are doing, know where you are at, without always being able to understand, (3) at least immediately, what is in question.

The graph is made precisely in order to be of use in finding your bearings, it is destined to announce something right away. I think today, if I have the time, that I will be able to begin to see for example how this graph, and I think only by this graph or of course by something analogous - it is not to the uniform in which it may be presented that you must attach yourselves - will appear to you very useful to distinguish - I am saying this to arouse your interest - to distinguish for example three things, in order to distinguish by their positions, their different situations, three things which I should say, one very frequently finds confused to the point that one slips without warning between one and the other: the repressed for example. We will have things to say, or simply to take the fashion in which Freud himself defines it. The repressed, desire and the unconscious.

Let us go over it again in baby steps before applying it, so that there will be no doubt that what is represented at least by what we will call the two stages, even though of course, it is not even that which is the difficulty for many of you, these two stages do not correspond in any way to what habitually is presented to you at the level of what I could call the architectonics of the superior and inferior functions, automatism (4) and the function of synthesis. It is precisely because you do not find it there that these two stages confuse you, and that is why I will try to re-articulate them for you, because it seems that the second stage of the construction, a stage which obviously is defined abstractly, because since this graph is a discourse, one cannot say everything at the same time, this second stage is not necessarily a second phase, creates difficulties for some.

I therefore take things up again. What is the aim of this graph? It is to show the relationships which are essential for us, even though we are analysts, of the speaking subject with the signifier.

When all is said and done, the question around which these two stages are divided, is the same for the speaking subject - it is a good sign - is the same for him and for us. I was saying just now: do we know what we are doing? Well in his case too does he know or not what he is doing when he speaks? Which means: can he effectively signify for himself his action of signification?

If is precisely around this question that these two stages are apportioned and regarding which I tell you right away, because this seems to have escaped some of you the last time, I tell you right away, in this connection you must realise that both function at the same time in the smallest act of speech, and you (5) will see what I mean, and how far I extend the term act of speech (acte de parole).

In other words, if you think of the process of what happens in the subject, in the subject in so far as the signifier intervenes in his activity, you must think the following, which I had the opportunity of articulating for one of you, to whom I was giving a little extra explanation after my seminar, and if I underline it for you it is because my interlocutor pointed out to me what he had not perceived; what I am going to tell you, is namely for example the following: what you must consider, is that the processes in question start at the same time from the four points, delta, 0, d and D, namely - you are going to see that this is the contribution of my lecture today - in this relationship respectively the intention of the subject, the subject qua speaking, the act of demanding and this which we will call by a certain name a little later on and which I leave here for the moment in reserve.

The processes therefore are simultaneous along these four paths: d-delta-I-S(, #) . I think that this is well enough supported.

There are therefore two stages in the fact that the subject does something which is in relation to the dominant action, the dominant structure of the signifier. At the lower stage he receives, he undergoes this structure. This is particularly obvious. Pay careful attention to everything that I am saying, because there is nothing improvised in it, and that is why those (6) who are taking notes are doing the right thing.

This takes on its value by being especially - not uniquely but especially - illustrated. I mean that it is there that it is especially comprehensible, but at the same time it is also this which at first may mean that you do not see all its generality, namely that this engenders a certain lack of understanding. You can say to yourselves right away: every time that you understand, that is where the danger begins. It is especially the case that this takes on its value in the context, I say the context of the demand, it is in this context that the subject in so far as he is here at this level, at this stage, the line of the intentionality of the subject, of what we supposed to be the subject, a subject in so far as he has not become the speaking subject, in so far as he is the subject of whom one always speaks, of whom I would say, he is still spoken about, because I do not know that anyone has ever really properly made the distinction as I am trying here to introduce it to you, the subject of knowledge, to speak plainly the subject correlative to the object, the subject around whom turns the eternal question of idealism, and who is himself an ideal subject, has always something problematical namely that after all as has been pointed out, and as his name indicates, he is only supposed.

It is not the same thing, as you will see, for the subject who speaks, who imposes himself with complete necessity.

(7) The subject therefore in the context of the demand, is the first and I might say unformed state of the subject we are dealing with, the one whose conditions of existence we are trying to articulate by this graph. This subject is nothing other than the subject of need, because this is what he expresses in the demand, and I do not need to go back over this again. My whole point of departure consists in showing how this demand of the subject is at the same time profoundly modified by the fact that need must pass through the defiles of the signifier.

I will insist no further on this because I am supposing it known, but in this connection I would simply point out the following to you: that it is precisely in this exchange which is produced between the primitive unconstituted position of the subject of need and the structural conditions imposed by the signifier, that there resides what is produced and what is represented here on this schema by the fact that the line D - S is unbroken up to 0, while further on it remains fragmented; that inversely it is in so far as it is anterior to $s(0)$ that the so-called line of intentionality, on this occasion of the subject, is fragmented and that it is only unbroken afterwards, let us say especially in this segment, and even provisionally because it is secondarily that I will have to insist on that in this case, in so far as you do not have to take into account the line $O - O^d - S(O) - s(0)$.

(8) Why are things this way? All the same I had better not delay forever on this graph, especially since we will have to come back to it.

In other words what is represented by this continuity of the line up to this point 0 which you know is the locus of the code, the locus where there lies the treasury of the tongue in its synchrony, I mean the sum of the thematic or taxematic elements, without which there is no means of communication between beings who are submitted to the conditions of language.

What is represented by the continuity of the line D - S up to the point 0 is the following: it is that it is this synchrony of the systematic organisation of the tongue, I mean that synchronically, and it is given here as a system, as a set within which each of these elements has its value qua distinct from the others, from the other signifiers, from the other elements of the system. Here we have, I repeat it for you, the starting point of everything that we articulate about communication. This is what is always forgotten in theories of communication, it is that what is communicated is not the sign of something else, and it is simply the sign of what is in the place where another signifier is not.

It is from the solidarity of this synchronic system qua established at the locus of the code, that the discourse of (9) demand qua anterior to the code takes on its solidity, in other words, that in the diachrony, namely in the development of this discourse there appears something which is called the minimal duration necessary for satisfaction, even for what is called a magical satisfaction, at least of refusal, namely the time to speak.

It is because of this relationship that the line of signifying discourse, of the signifying discourse of the demand which of itself, because it is composed of signifiers, must appear here and be represented in the fragmented form that we see subsisting here, namely in the form of a succession of discrete elements, separated therefore by spaces; it is in function of the synchronic solidity of the code from which these successive elements are borrowed that there is conceived this solidity of diachronic affirmation and the constitution of what is called in the articulation of the demand, the time of the formulation.

It is therefore before the code, or on this side of the code, that this line is presented as continuous. On the contrary what is it that this graph represents here by the fragmented line which is that of the intentionality of the subject? Let us observe that already the fact of affirming the context of the demand simplifies the supposed diversity of the subject, namely the thing that presents itself as essentially moving from moments, from variations of this point. You know that the problem of the continuity of the subject has been posed to the (10) psychologists for a long time, namely why a being essentially given over to what one can call intermittency, not just of the heart as has been said, but of many other things, can pose itself and affirm itself as ego. This is the problem that is in question, and undoubtedly already the putting into play of a need in the demand is already something which simplifies this subject with respect to the more or less chaotic, more or less random interferences between the different needs.

What the apparition on this schema of the fragmented form which represents the first part of the line delta - I here up to this 0, is something different, it is the retroactivity on this changableness (mouvance) which is at once continuous and discontinuous, confused no doubt, we must suppose it to be that of the primitive form, of the primitive manifestation of the tendency. It is the retroaction on it precisely of the form of discrete elements which discourse imposes on it; it is what it will undergo too actively from discursivity, it is why in this line, it is on this side not of the code, but of the message itself that the line appears in its fragmented form. What is produced beyond, is something that I have already sufficiently underlined at other moments to pass quickly over it now, it is the following: it is the identification which results from it of the subject to the other of the demand in so far as she is (11) all-powerful.

I do not think that I need to go back over the theme of the omnipotence now of thought, now of the word, in analytic experience, except to say that I pointed out how wrong it was to put it in the depreciated position that the psychologist usually takes in so far as he is always more or less, in the original sense of the term, a pedant, to attribute it to the subject when the omnipotence that is in question, is that of the other in so far as she disposes quite simply of the totality of signifiers.

In other words, to give the sense that we are not getting away from the concrete in articulating things in this way, I shall very expressly designate what I mean by that in the evolution, in the development, in the acquisition of language, in the child-mother relationships, to finally come to it, it is very precisely this: that this something that is in question and on which there reposes this primary identification that I designate by the segment $s(0)$, the signified of 0, and which culminates in the first nucleus, as this is currently expressed in analysis in the writings of Mr. Glover, you will see this articulated: the first nucleus of the formation of the ego, the kernel of the identification in which this process here culminates, is a question of what is produced in so far as the mother is not simply the one who gives the breast (sein) - as I told you - she (12) is also the one who gives the sign (seing) of signifying articulation, and not only in so far as she speaks to the child as she obviously does, and well before she can presume that he understands anything of it, just as he understands things well before she imagines he does, but in so far as all sorts of the mother's games, the games of hide-and-seek for example which so quickly give rise in the infant to a smile, even to a laugh, are properly speaking already a symbolic action in the course of which what she reveals to him, is precisely the function of the symbol qua revelatory. In these hiding games she reveals to him how to make something disappear and to make it reappear, to make his own face disappear, or to make it reappear, or to hide the face of the child, and to rediscover it; she reveals to him the revelatory function. It is already a second degree function that we are dealing with.

It is in the midst of this that there are made these first identifications to what is called on this occasion the mother, the mother as all-powerful, and as you see, this has an import other than the pure and simple satisfaction of need.

Let us pass on to the second stage of this graph, the one therefore whose presentation the last day seems to have given rise for some of you to some difficulties. This second stage of the graph is something other than the subject in so far as he passes through the defiles of signifying articulation. It is (13) the subject who assumes the act of speaking; it is the subject qua I, although here I must articulate some essential reservations.

After all, this I, is not something I will delay on, I am going to point out to you at the beginning, this I, although I alluded to it in some development, is not our business, it is nevertheless the I of the "I think therefore I am". Just realise that this is a parenthesis. All the difficulties that were submitted to me, were made in connection with the "I think therefore I am", namely that this had no conclusive value because the I had already been put in the "I think" and that after all there is only a cogitatum, it thinks, and why therefore would it be in that?

I think that all the difficulties here have arisen precisely from this non-distinction between two subjects, as I articulated it for you at the beginning, namely that more or less at the beginning I think that more or less wrongly one refers back in this experience which the philosopher confides to us, to the confrontation of a subject with an object, consequently with an imaginary object among which it is not surprising that the I does not prove to be an object among others. If on the contrary we push the question to the level of the subject defined as speaking, the question is going to take on a quite different import, as the phenomenology which I will simply indicate to you (14) now is going to demonstrate.

For those who want references concerning this whole discussion about the I, the cogito, I remind you that there is an article I already mentioned by M. Sartre in Les Recherches Philosophiques.

The I that is in question is not simply the I articulated in the discourse, the I in so far as it is pronounced in the discourse, and which linguists call at least for some time, a shifter. It is a semanteme which has no use that can be articulated in function of the code, I mean in function purely and simply of the code as lexically articulatable. Namely that as the simplest experience shows, the I can never be referred to something which can be defined in function of other elements of the code therefore as a semanteme, but simply in function of the act of the message. The I designates the one who is the support of the message, namely someone who varies from instant to instant.

It is no more complicated than that, but I would point out that what results from it, is that this I is essentially distinct therefore from this moment, as I will make you see very quickly, from what one can call the true subject of the act of speaking as such, and this is even what gives to the simplest I-discourse, I would say always a presumption of indirect discourse, I mean that this I could very easily be followed in the very discourse by (15) parenthesis: "I who am speaking", or "I say that", which moreover is made very obvious as other people have remarked before me, that a discourse which formulates "I say that", and which adds on afterwards: "and I repeat it", does not say in this "I repeat it" something useless because it is precisely to distinguish the two I's which are in question, the one who had said that and the one who adheres to what the one who has said something has said. In other words again, I want simply, if other examples are necessary to make you grasp it, to suggest to you the difference that there is between the I of "I love you", and the I of "I am here".

The I in question is particularly tangible, precisely, because of the structure that I am evoking, where it is fully hidden and where it is fully hidden is in these forms of discourse which realise what I shall call the vocative function, namely those which only cause the addressee to appear in their signifying structure and absolutely not the I. It is the I of "Take up thy bed and walk", it is the same fundamental I which is rediscovered in any form of imperative vocative and a certain number of others. I put them all provisionally under the title of vocative, it is if you wish the evocative I, it is the I that I spoke to you about already during the seminar on President Schreber, because it was essential to show, I do not know if at (16) that time I really achieved it, I did not even take it up again in what I wrote in my resume of my seminar on President Schreber; it is the I underlying the "You are the one who will follow me" (tu es celui qui me suivra), on which I insisted to such an extent, and which you see moreover to be part of the whole problem of a certain future within the vocative properly speaking, the vocatives of vocation.

I recall for those who were not there, the difference that there is in French, it is a refinement which not every tongue allows to demonstrate, between "You are the one who shall follow me" (tu es celui qui me suivras) and "you are the one who will follow me" (tu es celui qui me suivra). This difference of the performative power of the tu in this case is effectively a real difference of the I in so far as it operates in this act of speaking which it represents and which is a question of showing once again and at this level that the subject always receives his own message, namely what is here to be avowed, namely the I in an inverted form, namely through the mediation of the form that it gives to the tu.

This discourse, the discourse therefore which is formulated at the level of the second stage, and which is the same discourse as always - we only arbitrarily distinguish the two stages - this discourse which as always is the discourse of the other, even when it is the subject who pronounces it, is fundamentally at this second stage an appeal to be that is more or less forceful, (17) it always contains, and here again we have one of the marvellous homophonique equivocations that French contains, it always contains more or less a soit, in other words a fiat, a fiat which is the source and the root of what beginning from the tendency, becomes and is inscribed for the speaking being in the register of willing, or again of the I, in so far as it is divided into the two terms that have been studied of the one and the other, of the imperative, of the "take up thy bed and walk" which I spoke about above, or in relation to the subject, of the setting up of his own ego.

You see now the level at which there must be placed the question, as I might put it, the one which the last time I articulated here in the form of the Che vuoi? This Che vuoi?, which is, as one might say, the response of the other to this act of speech of the subject, this question responds, I would say that as always this response responds before the question to the following, to the redoubtable question in which my schema articulates this very act of speech. Does the subject, when he is speaking, know what he is doing? This is precisely what we are in the process of asking here, and it is as a reply to this question that Freud said no.

The subject, in the act of speaking, and in so far as this act of speaking of course goes well beyond just his word, because his whole life is captured in acts of speech, because his life as (18) such, namely all his actions, are symbolic actions if only because they are recorded, they are subject to being recorded, they are often actions to register something, and after all, everything that he does as they say, is contrary to what happens, or more exactly just like everything that happens before the examining magistrate, everything that he does can be held against him, all his actions will be imposed on a context of language and that his very gestures are gestures which are never anything but gestures chosen in a pre-established ritual, namely in an articulation of language.

And Freud, to this; "Does he know what he is doing"? replies no.

It is nothing else that is expressed by the second stage of my graph, namely that this second stage only takes on its importance from the question of the other, namely Che vuoi?, what do you want, that up to the time of that question we remain of course in a state of innocence and foolishness.

I am trying here to prove that didactics do not necessarily pass by way of foolishness. Obviously I cannot base myself on you to demonstrate this I

It is therefore where the second stage of the schema, with respect to this question and in the responses, articulates where there are placed the points of intersection between the true discourse which is maintained by the subject and what manifests itself as willing (vouloir) in the articulation of the word (19) where these points of intersection are placed, this is the whole mystery of this symbol which seems to be so opaque for some of you.

If this discourse which presents itself at this level as an appeal for being, is not what it seems to be, as we know from Freud, and this is what the second stage of the graph tries to show us. At first sight one can only be surprised that you do not recognise it, because what did Freud say, what are we doing every day, if not the following: showing that at this level, at the level of the act of the word, the code is given by something which is not the primitive demand, which is a certain relationship of the subject to this demand in so far as the subject has remained marked by its avatars. That is what we call the oral, anal and other forms of unconscious articulation, and this is why it does not seem to me to give rise to much discussion. I am speaking quite simply about the admission of the premises that we situate here at the level of the code. The formula: the subject qua marked by the signifier in the presence of his demand as giving the material, the code of this true discourse which is the true discourse of being at this level.

As regards the message that he receives, this message - I already alluded to it several times - I gave it many forms, all of them, not without good reason, more or less slippery, since this is the (20) whole problem of the analytic perspective, namely what is this message. I can leave it for today, and at this moment at least of my discourse, at the problematical stage, and symbolise it by a presumed signifier as such. It is a purely hypothetical form, it is an X, a signifier, a signifier of the Other because it is at the level of the Other that the question is posed of a different mark, of a part which is precisely the problematical element in the question concerning this message.

Let us sum up. The situation of the subject at the level of the unconscious, as Freud articulates it, it is not I, it is Freud who articulates it, is that he does not know what he speaks with, one has to reveal to him the properly signifying elements of his discourse, and that he does not know either the message which really comes to him at the level of the discourse of being, let us say truly if you like, but I in no way object to really.

In other words, he does not know the message that comes to him from the response to his demand in the field of what he wants. You already know the response, the true response: it can be only one, namely the signifier of nothing other, which is specially deputed precisely to designate the relationships of the subject to the signifier.

I have told you, I want to express it all the same, why this signifier was the phallus. I would ask even those who are (21) hearing it for the first time, to accept this provisionally. This is not the important thing, the important thing is that this is the reason why he cannot have the response because since the only possible response is the signifier which designates the relationships with the signifier, namely if it were already in question in the very measure that he articulates this response, he, the subject is abolished and disappears. It is precisely this which ensures that the only thing about it that he can be aware of, is this threat directly aimed at the phallus, namely castration or this notion of the lack of the phallus which, in both sexes, is this something at which analysis terminates, as Freud - as I pointed out to you - has articulated it.

But we are not here to repeat these basic truths. I know that it gets on some people's nerves that for some time we have been juggling a bit too much with being and having, but they will get over that because this does not mean that on the way we have not harvested something precious, something clinical, something which even allows there to be produced within my teaching something with all the characteristics of what I would call the medical stamp.

It is now a question in the midst of all of this of situating what desire means.

We have said that there is therefore at this second stage also (22) a synchronic treasury, there is a battery of unconscious signifiers for each subject, there is a message which announces the response to the Che vuoi? and it announces itself, as you can see, dangerously.

Even, I point this out in passing, as a way of evoking in you some vivid memories, what makes of the story of Abe lard and Heloise the most beautiful of love stories.

What does desire mean? Where is it situated? You can see that in the completed form of the schema, you have here a dotted line which goes from the code of the second stage to its message through the intermediary of two elements, d signifies the place from which the subject descends and $ in front of o signifies - I said it already, therefore I repeat it - the phantasy.

This has a form, a disposition homologous to the line which, from 0, includes in the discourse of the ego, the e in the discourse, let us say the person filled out with the image of the other, namely this specular relationship which I posed for you as being fundamental for the establishment of the ego.

There is here in the relationship between the two stages, something which deserves to be more fully articulated. I am not doing it today, not just because I do not have the time, because I am prepared to take all the time necessary to communicate what I have to say to you, but because I prefer to do things in an (23) indirect fashion, because it appears to me to be a likely way of making you experience its import. Even at this point you are not incapable of guessing how fruitful is the fact that it should be a certain reproduction of an imaginary relationship at the level of the field of the gap determined between the two discourses, in so far as this imaginary relationship reproduces homologously the game of prestige which is established in the relationship with the other. You are not incapable of sensing even now, but of course it is altogether insufficient to sense it. I mean simply before fully articulating it, to make you dwell for a moment on what is involved in the term desire, situated, planted within this economy.

You know that Freud introduced this term from the beginning of analysis. He introduced it in connection with dreams and in the form of the Wunsch, namely by right, something which is articulated on this line. The Wunsch is not in itself, all by itself desire, it is a formulated desire, it is an articulated desire.

What I would like to make you dwell on for a moment is the distinction which deserves to be drawn between what I am establishing and introducing this year, and which is called desire, and this Wunsch. You have of course read The interpretation of dreams, and this moment that I am talking to you about it marks the moment that we ourselves are going to begin speaking about it this year. Just as last year we began (24) with the witticism, we are beginning this year with the dream. You have not failed to notice from the first pages, and to the very end, that if you think of desire in the form as I might say that you have to deal with it all the time in analytic experience, namely one that gives you a lot of work to do because of its excesses, its deviations, because, after all let us say it, most often because of its deficiencies, I mean sexual desire, that which by turns, even though in the whole analytic field there has always been brought to play on it a quite remarkable pressure to put it in the shade, a pressure that is increasing in analysis; you must therefore notice the difference, on condition of course that you really read, namely that you do not continue thinking about your own little affairs while your eyes are glancing through the Traumdeutung. You will see that it is very difficult to grasp this famous desire, which is supposed to be found everywhere in each dream.

If I take the inaugural dream, the dream of Irma's injection which we have already spoken about on several occasions, about which I wrote something, and which I will write something about again, and about which we could spend an excessively long time talking; remember what the dream of Irma's injection is; what does it mean exactly? It remains very uncertain, even in what happens. Freud himself, in the desire of the dream,

[p. 25 missing in Master Copy]

(26) in a way laterally, in a derivative way. It is a question precisely of knowing why, but in order to know why I wish simply for a moment to dwell here at those obvious things which the use and usage of language gives us, namely what does it mean when one says to someone, whether it is a man, or a woman, and which we must choose to be a man and this is going to involve a certain number of contextual references, what does it mean when one says to a woman: "I desire you"? Does that mean, in accordance with the moralising optimism within analysis against which you see me waging war from time to time, does that mean: "I am ready to grant to your being as much if not more rights than to my own, to anticipate all your needs, to think of your satisfaction: Lord, let your will be done in preference to my own?" Is that what it means?

I think it is enough to evoke this reference to provoke in you the smiles which happily I see spreading among the audience. Moreover no one, when one is using words appropriately, can make any mistake about what the aim of a term like this is, however genital that person may be.

The other response is the following: "I desire", we can say to use words that are completely unsubtle, "to go to bed with you".

.... It is much more true, you must admit, but is it all that (27) true? It is true in what I would call a certain social context, and after all given the extreme difficulty of giving its exact outcome to this formulation: "I desire you", one cannot find after all any better way to prove it.

Believe me: it is perhaps enough that this word is not bound to the unmeasurable embarrassment and upset that statements which have a meaning involve, it is enough perhaps for this word to be only spoken within for you to grasp immediately that if this term has a meaning, it is a meaning that is much more difficult to formulate. "I desire you", articulated within, as I might say, concerning an object, is more or less the following: "You are beautiful", around which there is fixed, there is condensed all these enigmatic images whose profusion is called by me my desire, namely: "I desire you because you are the object of my desire", in other words: "you are the common denominator of my desires", and God knows, if I can put God into the affair, and why not, God knows what desire brings in its wake, is something which in reality mobilises, orientates in the personality, something quite different than that towards which by convention its precise goal appears to be ordered.

In other words, to refer to a much less poetically indefinite experience, it also seems that I do not need to be an analyst to evoke how quickly and immediately at this level, in connection (28) with the slightest distortion as it is said of the personality or of images, how quickly and how prominently there emerges in connection with this implication in desire what can, what can most often, what by right appears to be prevalent there, namely the structure of phantasy.

To say to someone: "I desire you", is very precisely to say to her - but this is not always obvious in experience, except for the courageous and instructive little perverts, big and little ones - is to say: "I am implicating you in my fundamental phantasy".

This is where, because I decided that this year I would not go beyond a certain time - I hope I will always stick to this - the trial of asking you to listen to me, it is here, namely well before the point where I thought I would conclude today, that I will stop. I will stop in designating this point of the phantasy which is an essential point, which is the key point around which I will show you the next day therefore how to situate the decisive point at which there must appear, if this term of desire has a meaning different to that of wish in the dream, where there must appear the interpretation of desire.

This point then is here, and you can see that it forms part of the dotted circuit the one with this sort of little tail which is found at the second stage of the graph.

I would simply like to tell you, as a way of whetting your (29) appetite a little, that this little dotted line, is nothing other than the circuit within which we can consider that there turn - this is why it is constructed like that - it is because it turns, once it is fed at the beginning it turns within indefinitely - that there turn the elements of the repressed. In other words, it is the locus on the graph of the unconscious as such, it is about this, and about this alone that Freud spoke until 1915 when he concluded with the two articles which are called respectively: "The Unconscious" and "Repression".

This is where I will take things up again in order to tell you to what degree there is articulated in Freud in a fashion which supports, which is the very substance of what I am trying to make you understand about the signifier, namely that Freud himself well and truly articulates in the least ambiguous way something which means: nothing is ever, nothing can ever be repressed except signifying elements. It is in Freud, the word signifier is all that is missing. I will show you unambiguously that what Freud is talking about in his article on the unconscious, concerning what can be repressed, is designated by Freud. It can only be signifiers.

We will see that the next time and therefore you see here two opposed systems: the system here in dots, we have said that it is this that is in question, it is the locus of the unconscious and the locus where the repressed turns round and round up to the (30) point that it makes itself felt, namely when something of the message at the level of the discourse of being, comes to upset the message at the level of demand, which is the whole problem of the analytic symptom.

There is another system, it is the one which prepares what I call here the little platform, namely the discovery of the avatar, a discovery that because there had already been so much trouble getting used to the first system Freud gave us the fatal benefit of making the following step himself before his death, namely that Freud in his second topology had discovered the register of the other system in dots: a little platform this is precisely what the second topology corresponds to. In other words, it is concerning what happens, it is in the measure that he is interested in what happens, at the level of the pre-discourse subject, but in function of this very fact that the subject who speaks did not know what he was doing when he spoke, namely from the moment that the unconscious is discovered as such, that Freud had, if you wish, to schematise things, sought out here at what level of this original place from where it speaks, at what level and in function of what, precisely in relation to an aim which is that of the culmination of the process in I, at what moment the ego is constituted, namely the ego in so far as it has to locate itself with reference to the first formulation, the first capturing of the Id in demand. It is also there that Freud (31) discovered this primitive discourse qua purely imposed, and at the same time qua marked by its fundamental arbitrariness, that it continues to speak, namely the super-ego. It is there also of course that he left something open, it is there, namely in this fundamentally metaphorical function of language, that he left us something to discover, to articulate, which completes his second topology, and which permits to restore it, to re-establish it, to re-situate it in the totality of his discovery.

Seminar 3 ; 26 November 1958

I begin by keeping my promises. The last time I mentioned to you the article by Sartre called: "La Transcendance de l'ego", an outline of a phenomenological description. This article is found in the sixth volume of Recherches Philosophiques, an excellent review which stopped publication with the outbreak of war and with the death of its editor, Boivin. Pages 85 to 103.

The remark made by Freud that the assertion that "all dreams have a sexual signification", more exactly "require a sexual interpretation, against which critics rage so incessantly, occurs nowhere in my Traumdeutung. In the seven editions of this book" - this is naturally written in the seventh - "it contradicts in a particularly striking way the rest of the content of what is found in it." (Gesammelte Werke II/III, which contain the (2) Traumdeutung, on page 402, cf SE V 397).

(3) Many of you heard last evening the clinical report by one of our friends who is an excellent psychoanalyst, on the subject of the obsessional. You heard him speaking about desire and demand.

We are trying to highlight here, because it is not just a theoretical question, but is linked to the essentials of our practice, this question which is the one around which there is played out the problem of the structure of desire and demand, and which is something immediately applicable no doubt to clinical work, brings it to life, I would say makes it comprehensible. I would almost say that it is a sign, that when you see it handled too much at the level of understanding, you experience some feeling of its insufficiency, and it is true moreover, because the level of understanding is far from exhausting the principles of the structure that we are trying to penetrate, because it is on it that we are trying to work and the key around which we should make this distinction between demand and desire pivot, in (4) so far as it immediately clarifies demand, but that on the contrary it situates in its correct place namely at its strictly enigmatic point, the position of man's desire. The key to all of this is the relationship of the subject to the signifier. What characterises the demand, is not just that it is a relationship of a subject to another subject, it is that this relationship is made through the mediation of language, namely through the mediation of a system of signifiers.

Because we are now tackling - as I announced to you - the question of what desire is, in so far as it is the foundation of the dream, and you know that it is not easy to know right away what this desire is, if it is the motor of the dream; you know at least that it is twofold, that this desire is first of all directed towards the maintenance of sleep, Freud articulated it in the most explicit manner, namely of this state in which reality is suspended for the subject. Desire is the desire for death, it is this also and at the same time, and in a perfectly compatible way, I would say in so far as it is often through the mediation of the second desire that the first is satisfied. The desire being that in which the subject of the Wunsch is satisfied, and this subject, I would like to put in a sort of parenthesis: we do not know what the subject is, and it is a question of knowing who is the subject of the Wunsch, of the dream.

(5) When some people say the ego, they are mistaken. Freud certainly affirmed the contrary. And when one says the unconscious, that means nothing. Therefore when I say: the subject of the Wunsch is satisfied, I put this subject in parenthesis, and all that Freud tells us, is that it is a Wunsch which is satisfied.

With what is it satisfied? I would say that it is satisfied with being, meaning with being that is satisfied. That is all we can say, because in fact it is quite clear that the dream does not bring with it any other satisfaction than satisfaction at the level of the Wunsch, namely what one might call a verbal satisfaction. The Wunsch is here content with appearances, and it is quite clear if we are dealing with a dream and moreover also the character of this satisfaction is here reflected in the language by which it has expressed it to us, by this "satisfied with being" (satisfait de l'être) as I expressed myself just now, and in which there is betrayed this ambiguity of the word being (être) in so far as it is there, that it slides around everywhere, and that also by formulating itself in this way in the grammatical form of a reference to being, being satisfied, I mean: can it be taken for this substantial aspect? There is nothing substantial in being except the word itself, it is satisfied with being, we can take it for what being is, if not literally (au pied de la lettre).

When all is said and done it is indeed in effect something of the (6) order of being which satisfies the Wunsch. In short it is only in the dream, at least on the plane of being, that the Wunsch can be satisfied.

I would almost like to do here something that I often do, give a little preamble if you wish, a backward glance, a remark which would allow you to wake up from something or other which involves nothing less than the whole history of psychological speculation, in so far as it is linked, in so far as modern psychology began by formulating, as you know, in terms of psychological atomism, here all the Everyone knows that we are no longer at that stage, at associationism at it is called, and that we have made considerable progress since we have begun to consider the demand for totality, the unity of the field, intentionality and other forces. But I would say that the matter is not at all settled, and it is not at all settled precisely because of Freud's psychoanalysis, but it is not at all seen how the mainspring of this settling of accounts, which is not really one, has operated in reality, I mean that its essence has been allowed to escape completely, and at the same time also the persistence of what has been supposedly reduced in it.

At the beginning it is true, the associationism of the tradition of the English school of psychology, where we have an articulated game and a vast misunderstanding, if I can express myself thus, (7) where I would say the field of the real is noted, in the sense that what is in question is the psychological apprehension of the real, and where it is a question of explaining in short, not just simply that there are men who think, but that there are men who move around the world apprehending in it in a more or less appropriate fashion the field of objects.

Where therefore is this field of objects, its fragmented structured character? Where does it come from? Quite simply from the signifying chain, and I will really try to choose an example to try to make you grasp that there is nothing else in question, and that everything that is brought forward in the so-called structured theory of associationism to conceptualise the progressiveness of psychological apprehension from the emergence up to the organised constitution of the real is in fact nothing other than the fact of endowing from the outset these fields of the real with the fragmented and structured character of the signifying chain.

From then on of course it is perceived that there is going to be a mistake and that there must be what one might call more original relationships with the real and for that one starts from the notion of proportionality, and one makes one's way towards all the cases in which this apprehension of the world is in some way more elementary, precisely less structured by the signifying chain, without knowing that this is what is in question, one goes towards animal psychology, one evokes all the stigmatic features (8) thanks to which the animal can manage to structure his world and try to find in it the reference point.

One imagines when one has done that one has resolved in a type of theory of animated field, of vector of primordial desire, that one has reabsorbed these famous elements which were a first false apprehension of the grasp of the field of the real by the psychology of the human subject. One has simply done exactly nothing, one has described something else, one has introduced another psychology, but the elements of associationism quite completely survive the establishment of the more primitive psychology, I mean the one which seeks to grasp the level of the cohabitation of the subject with his Umwelt, with his entourage, in the sensori-motor field. It nevertheless remains that everything that is related, that all the problems given rise to in connection with associationism survive this perfectly well, that there has been no reduction at all, but a kind of displacement of the field of perspective, and the proof of this is precisely the analytic field in which all the principles of associationism continue to reign, because up to this nothing has stifled the fact that when we began to explore the field of the unconscious, we did it, we re-do it every day following on something which is called in principle free association, and up to the present in principle, even though of course it is an approximate, inexact term for designating analytic discourse, (9) the perspective of free association remains valid and that the original experiments conceal word associations (des mots induits), and still have, even though of course they do not have any therapeutic or practical value, but they still keep their value in orienting the exploration of the field of the unconscious, and this of itself would be enough to show us we are in a field where the word reigns, where the signifier reigns.

But if this is still not enough for you, I will complete this parenthesis because I want to do it to recall to you on what the associationist theory is founded, and on the basis of this experience, what happens afterwards, what is coordinated in the mind of a subject at such a level, where to take up again the exploration as it is carried on in this first experimental relationship, the elements, the atoms, the ideas as they say, no doubt approximately, inadequately, this first relationship, presents itself, not without reason, in this form.

How, we are told, do these ideas make their entry at the origin? It is a question of relationships of continuity. Go and see, follow the texts, see what is spoken about, the examples on which it is based, and you will recognise perfectly that the continuity is nothing other than this discursive Combination on which there is based the effect that we call here metonymy. Continuity no doubt between two things which have arisen in so far as they are (10) evoked in memory on the plane of laws of association.

What does that mean? This signifies how an event has been lived in a context which we could broadly speaking call a random context. A part of the event having been evoked, the other will come to mind constituting an association of continuity, which is nothing other than an encounter. What does that mean? That means in sum that it is broken up, that its elements are caught up in the same narrative text. It is in so far as the event evoked in memory is a narrated event, that the narration forms its text, that we can speak at this level about continuity.

A continuity moreover which we distinguish for example in a word-association experiment. One word will come with another: If in connection with the word "cherry" I evoke obviously the word "table", this will be a relationship of continuity because on such a day there were cherries on the table. But a relationship of continuity if we speak of something which is nothing other than a relationship of similarity. Even a relationship of similarity, is also always a relationship of signifiers in so far as the similarity is the passage from one to the other by a similarity which is a similarity of being, which is a similarity of one to the other, between one and the other in so far as one being different to the other, there is some subject (11) of being which makes them alike.

I am not going to go into the whole dialectic of the same and the other, with all its difficulties and the infinitely greater richness than there appears there at first glance. I refer those who are interested in this to Parmenides, and they will see that they will spend some time there before exhausting the question.

What I am simply saying here and what I want you to experience, is, because I spoke above about cherries, that in connection with this word there are other usages besides the metonymical usage, I would say precisely to serve a metaphorical usage, I can use it to speak about lips saying that these lips are like cherries, and give the word "cherry" as a word-association in connection with the word "lip". Why are they linked here? Because they are both red, alike in some of their attributes. It is not just this, or because they both have the same form analogically, but what is quite clear, is that whatever is happening, we are immediately, and this can be sensed, in the quite substantial effect which is called the metaphorical effect. There is no kind of ambiguity whatsoever when I speak in a word-association experiment of cherries in connection with lips. We are on the plane of the metaphor in the most substantial sense that is included in this effect, this term, and on the most formal plane, (12) this always presents itself as I have reduced it for you to a metaphorical effect, to an effect of substitution in the signifying chain.

It is in so far as the cherry can be put into a structural context or not in connection with the lip, that the cherry is there. At which point, you could say to me: the cherry can come into connection with the lips in a function of continuity; the cherry has disappeared between the lips, or she has given me a cherry to take on my lips. Yes, of course it can also present itself like that, but what is in question? It is a question here of a continuity which precisely is that of the narrative that I spoke about above, because the event in which this continuity is integrated, and which brings it about that the cherry is in fact for a short time in contact with the lips, is something which of course from the real point of view, should not deceive us. It is not that the cherry has touched the lips which is important, it is that it is swallowed; in the same way it is not the fact that it is held between the lips in the erotic gesture I evoked, it is that it is offered to us in this erotic movement itself which counts. If for an instant we stop this cherry in contact with the lips it is in function of a flash which is precisely a short exposure of the narrative, in which it is the sentence, or it is the words which for an instant suspend this cherry between the lips, and it is moreover precisely because this dimension of (13) narrative exists in so far as it establishes this flash, that inversely this image in so far as it is created by the suspension of the narrative, effectively becomes on this occasion one of the stimulants of desire to the degree that in imposing a tone which is only here the implication of the language of the act, language introduces retrospectively into the act this stimulation, this stimulating element properly speaking which is arrested as such and which comes on this occasion to nourish the act itself through this suspension which takes on the value of the phantasy, which has an erotic signification in the detour of the act.

I think that this is sufficient to show you this agency of the signifier, in so far as it is at the basis of the very structuring of a certain psychological field which is not the totality of the psychological field, which is precisely this part of the psychological field which to a certain degree is by convention within what we can call psychology, to the degree that psychology is constituted on the basis of what I would call a sort of unitary intentional or appetitive theory of the field.

This presence of the signifier, is articulated, is articulated in an infinitely more insistent, infinitely more powerful, infinitely more efficacious way in the Freudian experience, and this is what Freud reminds us of at every instant, it is also (14) what tends to be forgotten in the most exceptional way, in so far as you want to make of analysis something which would go in the same direction, in the same sense as the one in which psychology has come to situate its interest, I mean in the sense of the clinical field, of an intentional field where the unconscious is supposed to be something like a kind of well, a borehole as one might say, parallel to the general evolution of psychology and which is also supposed to go by another way to the level of these most elementary tensions, to the level of the depths, in so far as there occurs something more reduced to the vital, to the elementary aspect of what we see at the surface which is supposed to be the so-called field of the preconscious or the conscious.

This, I repeat, is an error. It is very precisely in this sense that everything that we are saying takes on its value and its importance, and if some of you were able the last time to follow my advice and refer to the two articles which appeared in 1915, what were you able to read there? You were able to read and to see the following: that if you refer for example to the article "Das Unbewusste", the point which is most tangible in it, to the point I would say against which in a superficial description in which it would be a question of something other than signifying elements, of things which those who understand absolutely nothing about what I am saying here, articulate and call every day an (15) intellectualist theory. We will therefore go and put ourselves at the level of unconscious emotions, since Freud speaks about them, because of course it is naturally objected to all of this that instead of speaking about the signifier, this is not emotional life, this is not dynamic. I am of course far from wanting to contest this because it is to explain it in a clear fashion that I take this route to the level of the Unbewusste.

What do you see Freud articulating for us? He articulates for us very exactly the following: it is the third part of "Das Unbewusste"; Freud explains the following very clearly, that the only thing that can be repressed, he tells us, is what is called Vorstellungsrepräsentanz. It is only this, he tells us which can properly speaking be repressed. This therefore means a representative, in the representation of what? Of the instinctual movement which is called here Triebregung. There is no ambiguity possible in the text at this point. He tells us explicitly that the Triebregung, itself in any case, is a concept and as such aims at what can even be called more precisely the unity of instinctual motion, and in this case there is no question of considering this Triebregung, as either unconscious or as conscious.

This is what is said in the text. What does that mean? That simply means that we should take what we call Triebregung as an (16) objective concept. It is an objective unity in so far as we look at it, and it is neither conscious nor unconscious, it is simply what it is, an isolated fragment of reality which we will conceive of as having an incidence from its own action.

It is only all the more remarkable in my opinion that it should be its representative in the representation. This is the exact value of the German term, and only this representative of the drive that is in question, Trieb, can be said to belong to the unconscious in so far as it precisely implies what I set out above with a question mark, namely an unconscious subject. I do not have to go much further here, I mean that you should begin to sense, it is precisely to specify what is this representative in the representation, and of course you see already, not where I want to get to, but where we necessarily get to, namely that the Vorstellungsrepräsentanz, even though Freud in his time and at the point that things could be said in scientific discourse this Vorstellungsrepräsentanz is strictly equivalent to the notion and to the term of signifier. It is nothing else, even though it is only being introduced, and of course the demonstration has, it seems to me, already been introduced, because otherwise what is the use of everything that I said above. This of course will always be further demonstrated, this is precisely what is in question.

That Freud on the contrary is opposed to this, is also articulated in the most precise fashion by himself. What does Freud say about everything that can be connoted under the terms of feelings, emotion, affect, which he himself reunites? He says that it is by a carelessness of expression which has, or which cannot, or which is not according to the context, some difficulties, like every carelessness, but there is a certain looseness when one says that it is unconscious. In principle, he says, it never can be, he formally denies it any possibility of an unconscious incidence.

This is expressed and repeated in a way which involves no doubt, no kind of ambiguity. Affect, as in talking about an unconscious affect, this means that it is perceived, but known; but known in what way? In its attachments, but not that it is unconscious, because it is always perceived, he tells us, simply it has gone and attached itself to another representation, which is not repressed. In other words, it had to accommodate itself to the context existing in the preconsciousness, which allows it to be considered by consciousness, which on occasion is not difficult, as a manifestation of its last context.

This is articulated in Freud. It is not enough for him to articulate it once, he articulates it a hundred times, and in every connection he comes back to it. It is precisely here that there enters in the enigma of what is called the transformation (18) of this affect, of what proves in this connection to be particularly plastic, and that by which all the authors moreover once they approach this question of affect, namely every time they see it, have been struck, I mean to the extent that no one dares to touch the question, because what is altogether striking is that I who practice an intellectualist psychoanalysis, am going to spend the year talking about it, but that on the contrary you can count on the fingers of one hand the articles in analysis devoted to the question of affect, even though psychoanalysts are always full of it when they are talking about a clinical observation, because of course they always have recourse to affect. There is to my knowledge a single worthwhile article on this question of affect, it is an article by Glover which is spoken about a good deal in the writings of Marjorie Brierley. There is in this article an attempt to take a step forward in the exploration of this notion of affect which leaves something to be desired in what Freud said on the subject. This article is moreover detestable, like the whole of this book which, devoting itself to what are called the tendencies of psychoanalysis, gives a rather nice illustration of all the really impossible places that psychoanalysis is trying to lodge itself, in passing by morality, personalism, and other such eminently practical perspectives around which the blah of our epoch likes to spend itself.

On the contrary if we come back here to the things which concern us, namely to serious things, what do we read in Freud? We read the following: the affect; the problem is to know what becomes of it, in so far as it is disconnected from the repressed representation, and it thenceforth depends only on the substitutive representation which it is able to become attached to.

To what is disconnected there corresponds this possibility of annexation which is its property, and which is the way the affect presents itself in analytic experience as something problematic, which ensures for example that in the living experience of a hysteric, it is from this that analysis starts, it is from this that Freud starts when he begins to articulate analytic truths; it is that an affect arises in the ordinary, comprehensible, communicable text of the everyday experience of a hysteric and the fact that this affect is there, which moreover seems to fit in with the totality of the text, except to a more exigent eye, this affect which is there is the transformation of something else, and it is something which deserves that we should dwell on it; of something which is not another affect, which might be supposed to be in the unconscious. This Freud denies absolutely. There is absolutely nothing like that, it is the transformation of the purely quantitative factor; there is absolutely nothing which at that moment is really in the (20) unconscious this quantitative factor in a transformed form, and the whole question is to know how these transformations in the affect are possible, namely for example how an affect which is in the depths is conceivable in the restored unconscious text as being such and such, presents itself in a different form when it appears in the preconscious context.

What does Freud tell us?

First text: "The whole difference arises from the fact that ideas (Vorstellungen) are cathexes - basically of memory traces - whilst affects and emotions correspond to processes of discharge, the final manifestations of which are perceived as feeling." (SE 14 178; GW 10 277) Such is the rule for the formation of affects.

It is also indeed the fact that as I told you, the affect refers to the quantitative factor of the drive, the one in which he understands that it is not just movable, mobile, but subject to the variable which constitutes this factor, and he again articulates it precisely in saying that its fate can be threefold: "Either the affect remains, wholly or in part, as it is; or it is transformed into a qualitatively different quota of affect, above all into anxiety;" - this is what he writes in 1915, and one sees there the beginnings of a position which the article Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety will articulate in the topology - "or it is suppressed, i.e. it is prevented from (21) developing at all."

"But in comparison with unconscious ideas (Vorstellungs-repräsentanz)," he tells us, "there is the important difference that unconscious ideas continue to exist after repression as actual structures in the system Ucs, whereas all that corresponds in that system to unconscious affects is a potential beginning which is prevented from developing", writes Freud.

This is an altogether inevitable preamble before entering into the mode in which I intend here to pose the question connected with the interpretation of desire in the dream. I told you that for that I would take a dream from Freud's text, because after all it is still the best guide to be sure about what he intends to say when he speaks about the desire of the dream. We are going to take a dream which I will borrow from this article which is called "Formulierungen", "Formulations on the two principles of mental functioning", from 1911, which appeared just before the Schreber case.

I take this dream and the fashion in which Freud speaks of it and treats it, from this article, because it is articulated there in a simple, exemplary, significant, unambiguous fashion and to show how Freud understand the manipulation of these Vorstellungs-repräsentanz, in so far as it is a question of the formulation of unconscious desire.

What can be extracted from the totality of Freud's work concerning the relationships of this Vorstellungsrepräsentanz (22) with the primary process, is not open to any kind of doubt. If the primary process is entitled in so far as it is subject to the first principle, which is called the pleasure principle, there is no other way of conceiving the opposition which is marked in Freud between the pleasure principle and the reality principle, except by perceiving that what is given to us as the hallucinatory arousal in which the primary process, namely desire at the level of the primary process, finds its satisfaction, does not simply concern an image, but something which is a signifier, it is moreover a surprising thing that this was not noticed in other ways, I mean starting from clinical observation. One It was never noticed in other ways, it seems, precisely to the degree that the notion of signifier was something which was not elaborated at the time of the great expansion of classical psychiatry, because after all in the massiveness of clinical experience, under what forms are there presented to us the major, problematic, most insistent forms in which there are posed for us the question of hallucination, if not in verbal hallucinations or in verbal structures, namely in the intrusion, the immixtion in the field of the real not of something indifferent, not of an image, not of a phantasy, not of what is often simply supposed to support hallucinatory processes?

But if an hallucination poses us problems which are proper to (23) itself, it is because it is a question of signifiers and not of images, not of causes, not of perceptions, indeed of false perceptions of the real as people say it is. But at Freud's level there is no doubt about this and precisely at the end of this article, - to illustrate what he calls der neurotischen Wahrung (SE 12 225; GW Q238), namely - it is a term to retain, the word Wahrung means to last; it is not very common in German, it is linked to the verb wahren which is a durative form of the verb wahren, and this idea of duration, of valorisation, because it is its most common usage: if the word Wahrung refers to duration, the most common usage which is made up of it, is value, valorisation - to talk to us about a properly neurotic valorisation, namely in so far as the primary process erupts into it, Freud takes as an example a dream, and here is this dream.

It is the dream of a subject who is mourning for his father, who had, he tells us, nursed him thorough a long and painful mortal illness.

This dream is presented as follows: "His father was alive once more and he was talking to him in his usual way. But he felt it exceedingly painful that his father had really died, only without knowing it." (SE 12 225) It is a short dream, it is a dream which as always, Freud tackles at the level of its transcription, because the essential of Freudian analysis is always based on the (24) narrative of the dream, first of all in so far as it is articulated. This dream then was repeated insistently in the months which followed the death of his father, and how is Freud going to tackle it?

There is no doubt of course that Freud never thought at any time that a dream, if only because of this distinction that he always made between the manifest content and the latent content, in referring himself immediately to what can be called and which one does not fail to call at every instant in analysis by this term which has not, I think, an equivalent, of wishful thinking. It is this that I would almost like to give back some sound of equivalence with alarm. This just by itself should make an analyst suspicious, even defensive, and persuade him that he is taking the wrong road.

There is no doubt that for a moment Freud teases this "wishful", and tells us that it is simply because he needs to see his father and that that makes him happy, because it is not at all enough, for the simple reason that it does not seem at all to be a satisfaction, and that this happens with the elements and in a context whose painful character is sufficiently marked, to make us avoid this sort of precipitous step which I mention here to show that at the limit it is possible. When all is said and done I do not think that a single analyst could go that far when it is a question of a dream. But it is precisely because one (25) cannot go so far when it is a question of a dream, that psychoanalysts are no longer interested in dreams.

How does Freud tackle things? We will stay with his text: "The only way," he writes in this article, right at the end, "the only way of understanding this apparently nonsensical dream is by adding 'as the dreamer wished' or 'in consequence of his wish' after the words that his father had really died', and by further adding that he (the dreamer) wished it' to the last words. The dream-thought then runs: it was a painful memory for him that he had been obliged to wish for his father's death and how terrible it would have been if his father had had any suspicion of it I"

This leads you to give its weight to the fashion that Freud treats the problem. It is a signifier. These are things which are clausulae (?) and we are going to try to articulate on the linguistic plane what they are, the exact value of what is given here as permitting access to the understanding of the dream. They are given as such, and as the fact that putting them in place, their adaptation in the text, gives the meaning of this text.

Please understand what I am saying. I am not saying that this is interpretation, and in effect it is perhaps interpretation, but I (26) am not saying it yet, I am suspending you at this moment where a certain signifier is designated as being produced by its lack. What is the phenomenon of the dream that is in question? It is by replacing it in the context of the dream that we accede right away to something which is given as being the understanding of the dream, namely that the subject finds himself in the familiar case, this reproach by which one reproaches oneself about someone who is loved, and this reproach leads us back in this example to the infantile signification of the death wish.

We are here therefore before a typical case where the term transference, Übertragung, is employed in the primitive sense that it is first used in the Interpretation of dreams. It is a question of carrying forward something which is an original situation, the original death-wish on this occasion, into some different, current thing, which is an analogous, homologous, parallel wish which is similar in some fashion or other, and introduces itself to revive this archaic wish that is in question.

It is naturally worthwhile dwelling on this, because it is starting from there simply that we can first try to elaborate what interpretation means, because we have left to one side the interpretation of "wishful".

To complete this interpretation there is only one remark to be made. If we are unable to translate wishful thinking by "pensée désireuse, pensée désirante" it is for a very simple reason: (27) It is that if "wishful thinking" has a meaning, of course it has a meaning, but it is employed in a context in which this meaning is not valid. If you wish to test every time that this term is employed, the suitability, the pertinence of the term "wishful thinking", you only have to make the distinction that "wishful thinking" does not mean taking one's desire for reality, as it is put, it is the meaning that thinking in so far as it slides, as it bends, therefore one should not attribute to this term the signification: taking one's desires for reality, as it is usually expressed, but taking one's dream for reality, on this one condition precisely that it is quite inapplicable to the interpretation of the dream, because this simply means on this occasion if my dream, is to this type of understanding of the dream, this simply means in this case that one has dreamed, in other words that one dreams because one dreams, and this indeed is the reason why this interpretation at this level is in no way applicable at any time to a dream.

We must then come to the procedure described as the adding on of signifiers, which presupposes the previous subtraction of the signifier; I am speaking about what is presupposed in Freud's text, subtraction being at that moment exactly the meaning of the term that he makes use of to designate the operation of repression in its pure form, I would say in its Unterdrangung (28) effect.

It is then that we find ourselves brought to a halt by something which as such, presented for us an objection and an obstacle, which if we had not decided in advance to find everything good, namely if we had not decided in advance to believe, to believe as Monsieur Prevert says, one should all the same dwell on the following: that the pure and simple restoration of these two terms: "nach seinem Wunsch" and "dass er es wunschte", namely that the son wished for this death of his father, the simple restoration of two clausulae from the point of view of what Freud himself designates to us as the final goal of interpretation, namely the re-establishment of unconscious desire, gives us strictly nothing because in that case what is restored? It is something that the subject knows perfectly well. During the extremely painful illness, the subject had effectively wished for his father's death as being the solution and the end of his torment and his pain, and effectively of course he did not show him, he did everything to hide from him, the desire, the wish which was in its context, in its recent experienced context, perfectly accessible to him. There is no need even in this connection to speak about preconsciousness but of conscious memory, perfectly accessible to the continued text of awareness.

Therefore if the dream subtracts from the text something which is (29) in no way removed from the consciousness of the subject, if it subtracts it, it is, as I might say, this phenomenon of subtraction which takes on a positive value, I mean that this is the problem, it is the relationship of repression, in so far as without any doubt it is a question here of Vorstellungs - repräsentanz, and even a quite typical one, because if anything merits this term, it is precisely something which is, I would say in itself, a form empty of meaning "as he wished", isolated in itself. This means nothing, this means "as he wished", that we have previously spoken about, that he wished what? This also depends on the sentence which comes before, and this is the direction in which I want to lead you to show you the irreducible character of what we are dealing with compared to any conception which arises out of the sort of imaginary elaboration, even the abstraction of the objectal data of a field, when it is a question of the signifier and what is supposed to be the originality of the field which, in the psyche, in experience, in the human subject, is established by it and by the action of the signifier. This is what we have, these signifying forms which in themselves cannot be conceived of, cannot be sustained excepted in so far as they are articulated with other signifiers, and this in fact is what is in question. I know that I am here getting into something which would suppose a much longer articulation than anything we are dealing with. This is linked to all sorts of experiments which have been carried on with great (30) perseverance by a school called the Wurzburg school, called the school of imageless thought, and a kind of intuition that in the work of this school which was carried out in a completely closed little circle of psychologists, they were led to think without images these kinds of forms which are different to just signifying forms without a context and at the nascent state, to the notion of Vorstellung, and very specially in connection with the problems which we are facing here make it worth while remembering that for two years Freud, and we have unambiguous proof of this, attended Brentano's classes, and that Brentano's psychology, in so far as it gives a certain conception of the Vorstellungen is indeed there to indicate the exact weight that the term Vorstellung could have taken on in Freud's mind, and not simply in my interpretation.

The problem is precisely of the relationship that there is between repression, if repression is said to apply exactly and as such to something that is of the order of the Vorstellung, and on the other hand this fact of something which is nothing other than the appearance of a new meaning which is different for us at the point that we are progressing to, which is different from the fact of repression, which is what we can call in the context, in the context of the preconscious, the elision of two clausulae. Is (31) this elision the same thing as repression? Is it exactly its counterpart, its contrary? What is the effect of this elision? It is clear that it is an effect of meaning, I mean that in order for us to explain ourselves on the most formal plane, we should consider this elision, and I say elision and not allusion, it is not, to use everyday language, a representation (une figuration), this dream does not make allusions, far from it, to what has gone before it, namely to the relationships of the son to the father, it introduces something which sounds absurd, which has its import as signification on the manifest, quite original plane. It is indeed a question of a figura verborum, of a figure of speech, of terms, to use the same term which is the counterpart of the first, it is a question of an elision, and this elision produces a signified effect; this elision is equivalent to a substitution for the missing terms of a plane, of a zero, but a zero is not nothing and the effect in question could be qualified as a metaphorical effect. The dream is a metaphor. In this metaphor something new arises which is a meaning, a signified, a signified which is no doubt enigmatic, but which is all the same something that we have to take into account as being I would say one of the most essential forms of human experience, because it is this very image which for centuries put human beings, at one or other turn in their grief at their existence, on the more or less hidden paths which led (32) them to the necromancer and what he gave rise to in the circle of incantation was this something called a shade, before which there happened nothing other than what happened in this dream, namely this being which exists there without one knowing how he exists, and before whom literally one can say nothing, because he of course speaks. But it does not matter, I would say that up to a certain point what he says is also what he does not say. We are not even told it in the dream, this word only takes on its value from the fact that the one who has called the beloved being from the kingdom of shades can tell him literally nothing of what is truly in his heart.

This confrontation, this structured scene, this scenario, does it not suggest to us in itself that we should try to situate its import? What is it? Has it this fundamental structured and structuring value that I am trying to define for you this year under the name of phantasy? Is it a phantasy? Are there a certain number of characteristics required in order that in such a presentation, in such a scenario, that in this scenario we should recognise the characteristics of phantasy?

This is a first question which unfortunately we can only begin to articulate the next time. You should understand that we will give it quite precise replies, which will allow us to approach (33) the way in which effectively it is a phantasy, and the way it is a dream-phantasy, namely, I articulate it for you right away, a phantasy which has very particular forms, I mean that a dream-phantasy, in the sense that we can give a precise sense to this word phantasy, has not the same import as a waking phantasy, whether it is unconscious or not.

Here is a first point on which I will give a reply the next time, to the question that is posed here.

The second point, is in connection with and beginning from this, namely from this articulation of the function of phantasy, how we should conceive where there lies the incidence of what one can call, of what Freud called the mechanisms of the dream-work, namely its relationships on the one hand with the supposedly antecedent repression, and the relationship of this repression with the signifiers regarding which I have shown you the degree to which Freud isolated them and articulated the incidence of their absence in terms of pure signifying relationship.

These signifiers, I mean the relationships there exist between the signifiers of the narrative: "He had died", on the one hand; "he did not know it" on the other hand; "in consequence of his wish" in the third place. We will try to position them to place them, to make them function on the lines, the paths of the chains which are called respectively the chain of the subject and signifying chain, as they are here posed, repeated, insisting (34) before us in the form of our graph, and you will see both the use that can be made of this which is nothing other than the topological position of elements and of relationships without which there is no possible functioning of discourse, and how only the notion of structures which allow this functioning of discourse can also allow us to give a meaning to the fact that the two clausulae in question can be said up to a certain point, to be really the content, as Freud says, the reality, the "real verdrangten" , what is really repressed.

But this is not enough, we must also distinguish how and why the dream here makes use of these elements which without any doubt are repressed, but precisely there at a level at which they are not, namely where the immediately antecedent experience brought them into play as such, as clausulae, and where far from being repressed, the dream elides them; why? To produce a certain effect of what? I would say of something which is not so simple either because in short it is to produce a signification, there is no doubt, and we see that the same elision of the same wish may have according to different structures, quite different effects. In order simply to awaken a little, to stimulate your curiosity, I would like simply to remark to you that there is perhaps a relationship between the same elision and the same (35) clausula, "in consequence of his wish" and the fact that in other contexts which are not those of the dream, but of psychosis for example, this can culminate at the méconnaissance of death. The "he did not know", or "he did not want to know anything about it" being articulated simply differently with the "he had died", or even in a still different context, have perhaps the interest of being distinguished at first sight, as the Verwerfung is distinguished from the Verneinung. In this instance this can culminate at so - called feelings of invasion, of eruption, or at these fruitful moments of psychosis where the subject thinks that he has before him effectively something much closer again to the dream image than we can even expect, namely that he has before him someone who is dead, that he is living with a dead person, and simply that he is living with a dead person who does not know that he is dead, and we could even say perhaps up to a certain point, that in quite normal life, the one that we live every day, it can happen perhaps more often than we believe, that we have in our presence someone who while having all the appearances of a socially satisfying behaviour, is someone who at the same time desires for example from the point of view of interest, from the point of view of what permits us to be in accord with a human being, is well and truly, we know more than one of them, from the moment that I point it out to you seek it out in your relationships, someone who is well and truly dead, and a long (36) time dead, dead and mummified, who is only waiting for a little tip of something or other like it, to be reduced to that sort of woodenness which will bring about his end.

Is it not also true that in the presence of this something which after all is perhaps much more diffusely present than one thinks in subject-to-subject relationships, namely that there is also this aspect of half-death, and that what is half-dead in all sorts of living beings, is also something which leaves our conscience quite tranquil, and that a large part of our behaviour with our neighbours is something perhaps which we must take into account when we take on the charge of listening to the discourses, the confidences, the free discourse of a subject in the analytic experience, it produces perhaps in us a reaction much more important to measure, always much more present, effective, essential which in ourselves corresponds to this sort of precaution that we must take in order not to remark to the half-dead person that where he is, where he is in the process of speaking to us, he is half the prey of death, and this also because in our case intervening on this subject or taking such an audacious approach would also have some consequences for us, which are very precisely those against which we are defending ourselves the most, namely what is most fictitious, most repeated in us, namely also half death.

(37) In short, you see, that rather than being answered the questions are multiplying, to the point that we arrive at the end of this discourse today, and without any doubt if this dream should bring you something about the question of the relationships of the subject to desire, it is because it has a value which should not surprise us, given that its protagonists, namely a father, a son, the presence of death, and as you will see, the relationship to desire. It is not by chance then that we have chosen this example and that we will have to exploit it again next time.

Seminar 4: 3 December 1958

The article by Glover in Brierley's book, I.J.P., XX, July-October 1939 (namely No. 3 of Volume XX) - pp.299-308.

I left you the last day with a dream, this extremely simple dream, at least in appearance. I told you that we would work on it or in connection with it, in order to articulate the proper meaning that we give to this term of dream-desire, and the meaning of what an interpretation is.

We are going to take this up again. I think that on the theoretical plane it also has its value.

These days I have become immersed in re-reading, after having done it so many times, this Interpretation of dreams which I told you was the first thing we were going to query this year in connection with desire and its interpretation, and I must say that up to a certain point I found myself making this reproach that it is a book, and this is well known, whose ins-and-outs are (2) very badly known in the analytic community. I would say that this reproach, indeed like any reproach, has a kind of other aspect which is an aspect of excuse, because to tell the truth it is still not enough to have gone over it hundreds and hundreds of times in order to retain it, and I think that there is here a phenomenon - this has struck me more especially these days - that we are very familiar with. In fact every one knows the way in which everything which concerns the unconscious is forgotten, I mean for example that it is very tangible, in a very significant way, and really inexplicable, without the Freudian perspective, how one forgets funny stories, good jokes, what are called witticisms. You are meeting some friends and someone makes a witty remark, or even tells a funny story, makes a pun at the beginning of the meeting or at the end of lunch, and then when you are having your coffee you say to yourself: what did that person on my right say just now that was so funny? And you cannot get hold of it. It is almost a stamp that what is precisely a witticism escapes to the unconscious.

When one reads or re-reads The interpretation of dreams, one has the impression I would say of a magical book, if the word magical did not unfortunately lend itself in our vocabulary to so much ambiguity, or even error. One really goes through The interpretation of dreams like a book of the unconscious, and that is why one has so much trouble, in holding together something (3) which is so articulated. I think that there is here a phenomenon which deserves to be pointed out at this point, and especially the fact is that there is added to this the really almost senseless deformation of the French translation, and the more I go on the more I find that all the same one cannot really excuse its blatant inexactitudes. Some of you are asking me for explanations, and I refer immediately to the texts. There is in the fourth part of the chapter on dream-work, a section entitled "Considerations of representability" whose French translation from the first page is more than a tissue of inexactitudes, and has no relationship with the German text. That is confusing and upsetting. I will not go on about it.

Obviously all of this does not make the access of French readers to The interpretation of dreams especially easy.

To return to our dream of the last day which we began to decipher in a fashion which did not perhaps appear very easy to you, but was all the same intelligible, at least I hope so. To see clearly what is in question, to articulate it in function of our graph, we are going to begin with a few remarks.

It is a question therefore of knowing if a dream interests us in the sense that it interested Freud, in the sense of the fulfilment of desire. Here desire and its interpretation is first of all desire in its function in the dream, in so far as the dream is its fulfilment. How are we going to be able to (4) articulate it?

I am going first of all to put forward another dream, a first dream which I gave you and whose exemplary value you will see. It is really not well known, you have to go looking for it in a corner. There is there a dream whose existence is known to everybody: it is at the beginning of Chapter III which is entitled "A dream is the fulfilment of a wish", and it deals with the dreams of children in so far as they are put forward as what I would call a first state of desire in the dream.

The dream that is in question is here, from the first edition of the Traumdeutung, and it is given to us at the beginning of his appellation before his then readers, Freud tells us, as the question of the dream. One must also see this aspect of exposition, of development in the Traumdeutung, which explains a lot of things for us, in particular that things may be put forward first of all in a sort of massive way, which involves a certain approximation. When one does not examine this passage very attentively, one remains at what he says about the direct, undeformed, non-Einstellung'd character of the dream; this simply designating the general form which ensures that the dream appears in an aspect which is profoundly modified with respect to its deeper content, its thought content, while in the case of the child it is supposed to be simple: here desire is supposed to go (5) directly in the most direct fashion to what it desires, and Freud gives us several examples of it, and the first one of course naturally is worth retaining because it really gives us its formula.

"My youngest daughter" - this is Anna Freud - "then nineteen months old, had an attack of vomiting one morning and had consequently been kept without food all day. During the night after this day of starvation she was heard calling out excitedly in her sleep: "Anna F-eud Erdbeer" - (which is the childish way of pronouncing strawberries) - "Hochbeer" - (which also means strawberries) - "Eir(s)peis" - which corresponds more or less to the word omelette - and finally "Papp" - (pudding). And Freud tell us: "At that time she was in the habit of using her own name to express the idea of taking possession of something. The menu included pretty well everything that must have seemed to her to make up a desirable meal. The fact that strawberries appeared in it in two varieties" - Erdbeer and Hochbeer - I have not succeeded in placing Hochbeer, but Freud's commentary indicates two varieties - "was a demonstration against the domestic health regulations. It was based upon the circumstance, which she had no doubt observed, that her nurse had attributed her indisposition to a surfeit of strawberries. She was thus retaliating in her dream against this unwelcome verdict." (SE j[130;GW 2/3 135). I leave to one side the dream of his nephew, (6) Hermann, which poses different problems. But on the contrary I am happy to draw attention to a little note which is not in the first edition because it was elaborated in the course of discussions, namely feedback from his pupils, to which Ferenczi contributed by bringing to the rescue the proverb which says the following: "Pigs dream of acorns and geese dream of maize", and in the text also Freud had then at that time also drawn attention to a proverb which, I believe, is not so much taken from the German context given the way maize is written: "What do geese dream of? - Of maize."; and finally the Jewish proverb: "What do hens dream of? - Of millet".

We are going to dwell on this, we are even going to begin by making a little parenthesis, because when all is said and done it is at this level that there must be taken the problem which I evoked last night in connection with Granoff's communication on the essential problem, namely the difference between the directive of pleasure and the directive of desire.

Let us go back a little on the directive of pleasure, and once and for all, as rapidly as possible let us dot the i's.

Obviously, this has also the closest relationship with the questions which are posed to me or which are posed in connection with the function which I give, in what Freud called the primary processes, to the Vorstellung. To state it quickly, this is only a detour, you must have a clear idea of this: the fact is that (7) in a way by entering into this problem of the function of the Vorstellung, into the pleasure principle, Freud cuts things short, in short we could say that he is lacking an element to reconstruct what he perceived in his intuition. Indeed it must be said that what is proper to intuitions of genius is to introduce into thought something which up to then had absolutely not been perceived; we do not perceive at all what is original in this distinction of the primary process as being something' separate from the secondary process. We can always go on thinking like that that it is something which is in a way comparable through the idea that it is in the internal agency in so far as in their synthesis, in their composition this has absolutely no role to play. The primary process signifies the presence of desire, but not just any desire, of desire where it presents itself as most fragmented, and the perceptual element that is in question, this is how Freud is going to explain things, is going to make us understand what is in question.

In sum remember the first schemas that Freud gives us about what happens when the primary process alone is in operation. The primary process, when it alone is in operation, culminates in hallucination, and this hallucination is something which is produced by a process of regression, of regression which he calls very precisely topical regression. Freud constructed several (8) schemas of what motivates, of what structures the primary process. But they all have the following in common that they presuppose as their foundation, something which is for him the circuit of the reflex arc, a way of receiving and discharging something which is called sensation; a way of receiving and discharging something which is called motor activity.

On this path, in what I would call a terribly questionable way, perception is placed as something which accumulates, which accumulates somewhere on the side of the sensorial part, of the influx of excitation, of the stimulus from the external milieu, and being placed at this origin of what happens in the act, all sorts of other things are supposed to come afterwards, and namely it is there that he would insert the whole series of super-imposed layers which go from the unconscious passing through the preconscious and the rest, to end up here at something which passes or which does not pass towards motor activity. Let us see clearly what is in question every time he speaks to us about what is happening in the primary process. A regressive movement occurs. It is always when the door towards the motor activity of the excitation is for some reason or other barred, that there is produced something which is of the regressive order and that there there appears a Vorstellung, something which is found to give to the excitation in question a properly speaking hallucinatory satisfaction.

Here is the novelty that is introduced by Freud.

(9) This is worthwhile literally above all if one thinks of the order, of the quality of articulation of the schemas that are in question, they are schemas which are put forward because of their functional value, I mean to establish - Freud states it expressly - a sequence, a succession which he underlines is still more important moreover to consider as a temporal sequence than as a spatial sequence. This takes on its value, I would say, through its insertion into a circuit, and if I say that in short what Freud describes to us as being the result of the primary process, is in a way that on this circuit something lights up. I will not make a metaphor of this, I will only say in substance what Freud draws from the explanation on this occasion, from the translation of what is in question, namely to show you on this circuit which always implicitly has homeostasis as its goal, the notion of reflexometry and to distinguish this series of relays and the fact that something is happening at the level of these relays, something which in itself takes on a certain value as a terminal effect in certain conditions, is something which is quite identical to what we see being produced in any machine whatsoever in the form of a series of bulbs, as I might put it, and the fact that one of these becomes active indicates precisely, not so much what appears, namely a luminous phenomenon, but a certain voltage, something which is produced moreover in function of a (10) resistance and indicates at a given point the state of the whole circuit.

And therefore, let us say the word, this in no way corresponds to the principle of need, because of course no need is satisfied by a hallucinatory satisfaction. To be satisfied, need requires the intervention of the secondary process, and even of secondary processes because there is a great variety of them, which processes, can of course only be satisfied, as the name indicates with reality; they are submitted to the reality principle.

If secondary processes are produced, they are only produced because there have been primary processes. Only it is no less evident that this fencing off, that this separation makes instinct impossible no matter how one conceives it. It vanishes into thin air in this instance because look at the direction in which all the researches on instinct are going, and especially the most elaborate the most intelligent modern researches. What are they aimed at? To give an account of how a structure which is not just purely preformed - we are no longer at that point, let us not look at instinct like Monsieur Fabre, it is a structure which engenders, which sustains its own chain - how these structures outline, in the real, paths towards objects which have not yet been experienced.

(11) This is the problem of the instincts, and it is explained to you that there is an appetitive stage of behaviour, of seeking. The animal at one of these phases, puts himself into a certain state where motor activity is expressed by an activity going in all sorts of directions. And at the second stage, at the second phase, there is a stage of a specialised release, but even if this specialised release finally culminates in a behaviour which disappoints them, namely if you wish to the realisation of the fact that they have got hold of some coloured cloths, it nevertheless remains true that they had detected these cloths in the real.

What I want to indicate here, is that hallucinatory behaviour is distinguished in the most radical fashion from a homing behaviour that the regressive investment, as one might say, of something which is going to be expressed by the illumination of a lamp on the conducting circuits. This can at the limit illuminate an object that has already been experienced; if this object is perchance already there, it in no way shows its path, and still less of course if it shows it even when it is not there, which is what in effect is produced in the hallucinatory phenomenon, because at the very most the seeking-mechanism can begin from this, and this indeed is what happens. Freud also articulates it for us starting from the secondary process, which in sum fulfils the role of instinctive behaviour, but from another point of view is absolutely distinguished from it because due to the (12) existence of the primary process this secondary process is going to be, Freud articulates it - I do not subscribe to all of this, I am repeating to you the sense of what Freud articulates - a behaviour that tests the reality of this Wahrnehmung first ordered as the effect of a bulb in the circuit. This is going to be a judgement behaviour; the word is put forward when Freud explains things at this level.

When all is said and done according to Freud, human reality is constructed on a previous foundation of hallucination, which is the universe of pleasure in its illusions, in its essence, and this whole process is openly avowed, I am not even saying betrayed, is openly articulated in the terms that Freud continually makes use of every time he has to explain the series of borrowings into which the term is decomposed, and in the Traumdeutung at the level that he is speaking about the processes of the psychic apparatus, he shows this series of layers where there is imprinted, and it is not even imprinted, there is inscribed every time he speaks in this text and in all the others, it is terms like niederschreiben, and which recorded on the sequence of layers, are organised there. He articulates them differently according to the different moments of his thought. On the first layer for example it is by relationships of simultaneity; on others, piled up one on the other; on other levels they they will be ordered.

(13) These impressions, through other relationships, separate the schema into a series of inscriptions, of Niederschriften which are superimposed on one another in a word which cannot be translated by a sort of typographical space, which is how there ought to be conceived all the things which happen originally before arriving at another form of articulation which is that of the preconscious, namely very precisely in the unconscious.

This veritable topology of signifiers, because you cannot escape from it once you follow closely Freud's articulation, is what is in question, and in Letter 52 (6.12.96) to Fliess, one sees that he is necessarily led to presuppose at the origin a type of ideal Wahrnehmungen which cannot be taken as simple freshly taken Wahrnehmung. If we translate it literally, this topology does not reach a Begriffen, it is a term that he continually uses, a grasp of reality, it does not reach it at all by an eliminatory sorting out, by a selective sorting out, of anything that resembles what was put forward in the whole theory of instinct as being the first approximate behaviour which directs the organism along the paths of successful instinctual behaviour.

This is not what we are dealing with, but with a sort of real recurrent critique, with a critique of these signifiers evoked in (14) the primary process, which critique of course, like every critique, does not eliminate the previous thing on which it is brought to bear, but complicates it, complicates it by connoting it with what? With indices of reality which themselves belong to the signifying order. There is absolutely no way of escaping from this accentuation of what I articulate as being what Freud conceives and presents to us as the primary process. You will see, provided you refer to any of the texts that Freud wrote, that at the different stages of his doctrine he articulated, repeated, every time he had to approach this problem, whether he is dealing with the Traumdeutung or with what is, in the introduction of the Interpretation of dreams, and subsequently with what he took up later when he brought forward the second mode of presenting his topography, namely starting with the articles grouped around the psychology of the ego and the beyond of the pleasure principle.

You will allow me for a moment to image, by playing with etymologies, what is meant by this fresh way of looking at things which would lead a sort of ideal subject to the real; but the alternatives by which the subject brings the real into his propositions, Vorstellungen, here I decompose it by articulating it as follows: these Vorstellungen have a signifying organisation. If we wish to talk about them in terms other than the Freudian ones, in Pavlovian terms, we would say that they form part from the beginning, not of a first system of (15) significations, not of something connected to the tendency of need, but of a second system of significations. They are like the lighting up of a bulb in a slot machine when the ball has fallen into the proper hole, and the sign that the ball has fallen into the proper hole Freud also articulates: the proper hole means the same hole into which the ball has previously fallen. The primary process is not directed towards the search for a new object, but for an object which is to be rediscovered, and this by means of a Vorstellung which is re-evoked, because it was the Vorstellung corresponding to a first pathway so that the illumination of this bulb entitles you to a prize, and there is no doubt about this, and that is what the pleasure principle is. But in order that this prize should be honoured, there must be a certain reserve of money in the machine, and the reserve of money in the machine on this occasion is pledged to this system of processes which are called the secondary processes. In other words, the lighting up of the bulb is only a satisfaction within the total convention of the machine in so far as this machine is that of the gambler, from the moment that he begins to gamble.

Starting with this, let us again take up Anna's dream. This dream of Anna is presented to us as a dream of desire in its naked form. It seems to me that it is quite impossible to evade, to elide in the revelation of this nakedness, the mechanism itself (16) by which this nakedness is revealed, in other words the mode of this revelation cannot be separated from this nakedness itself.

I have the idea that we only know about this so-called naked dream by hearsay, and when I say by hearsay, that does not at all mean what some people quoted me as saying that in sum it was a question here of a remark about the fact that we never know that someone dreams except through what he tells us, and that in sum that everything which refers to the dream should be included in the fact, in the parenthesis of the fact that he reports it.

It is certainly not indifferent that Freud accords so much importance to the Niederschrift which constitutes this residue of the dream, but it is quite clear that this Niederschrift refers to an experience that the subject is telling us about. It is important to see that Freud is a long long way from retaining even for a single instant the nevertheless obvious objections which arise from the fact that a spoken narrative is one thing, and a lived experience is something else, and it is starting from there that we can connect the remark that the fact that he sets aside with such vigour, and even that he agrees with, that he explicitly makes the starting point of all his analysis even to the point of advising that it should be a technique of the Niederschrift, of what is there lying in the writings of the dream, shows us precisely what he thinks fundamentally about this lived experience, namely that there is everything to be said for approaching it in this way because he did not try of course, to (17) articulate it; it is itself already structured in a series of Niederschriften, in a kind of palimpsest-writing as one might say.

If one could imagine a palimpsest where the different superimposed texts have a certain relationship, it would still be a question of knowing which, with one another; but if you search for it, you would see that it is a relationship that is to be sought much more in the form of the letters than in the meaning of the text.

Therefore this is not what I am talking about, I am saying that on this occasion what we know about the dream, is properly speaking what we actually know about it at the moment that it is happening as an articulated dream, in other words that the degree of certainty that we have concerning this dream is something linked to the fact that we would also be much more sure what pigs and geese dream about if they themselves told us about it.

But in this original example we have more, namely that the dream discovered by Freud has this exemplary value that it is articulated aloud during sleep, which is something that allows no kind of ambiguity about the presence of the signifier in its actual text.

In this case it is not possible to throw any doubt on a phenomenon concerning the added-on character of what one might call information on the dream which might be taken by the word. (18) We know that Anna Freud is dreaming because she articulates: "Anna F-eud, Er(d)beer, Hochbeer, Eier(s)peis, Papp". The dream images of which we know nothing on this occasion, find here an affix, if I may express myself in this way with the help of a term borrowed from the theory of complex numbers, a symbolic affix in these words where we see the signifier presenting itself in a way in a flocculent state, namely in a series of nominations, and this nomination constitutes a sequence whose choice is not indifferent because, as Freud tells us, the choice is precisely of everything which has been prohibited to her.

inter-dit; of the things which when she demanded them she was told no, that she could not have them, and this common denominator introduces a unity into their diversity, without preventing us also from noticing that inversely this diversity reinforces this unity, and even designates it. It is in sum the unity that this series completely opposes to the special satisfaction of need, such for example of the desire imputed to the pig and the goose, the desire moreover, you only have to reflect on the effect that this would have if instead, in the proverb, of saying that the pig dreams of Kukuruz (of maize) we were to set about enumerating everything that the pig is supposed to dream about, you would see that this has a quite different effect, and even if one wished to claim that it was only an insufficient education of the glottis that prevented the pig and (19) the goose from letting us know as much, and even if one could say that we could manage to make up for it by perceiving in both cases and by finding the equivalent if you wish of this articulation by detecting some quivering of their mandibles, it still remains that it would be very unlikely that the following would happen, namely that these animals would name themselves as Anna Freud does in the series. And even if we admit the pig is called Toto and the goose Bel Azor, even if something of that order occurred, it would turn out that they are naming themselves in a language which would evidently moreover, neither more or less evidently than in the case of man, but in the case of man that is seen less clearly, that this language has precisely nothing to do with the satisfaction of their needs because this is the name they would have in the farmyard, namely in a context of human needs and not their own.

In other words, I would like you to focus on the fact, and we said it above, that

1. Anna Freud articulates that there is the mechanism of motor activity, and we would say in effect that it is not absent from this dream, because this is the way that we get to know it. But this dream reveals by the signifying structuring of its sequence that, 2., we would like to dwell in this sequence on the fact that at the beginning of this sequence literally there is a message, which you can see being illustrated if you know how (20) communication takes place inside one of these complicated machines of our modern era, for example between the front and the back of a plane. When one telephones from one cabin to another one begins by announcing what? One announces oneself, one announces who is speaking. Anna Freud at nineteen months, during her dream, announces, she says: "Anna F-eud", and she goes on with her series. I would almost say that there is only one thing missing, after having heard her articulating her dream, it is that at the end she should say: "over and out".

Here we are introduced then to what I call the topology of repression, in its clearest, also its most formal and most articulated way, regarding which Freud underlines for us that this topology can in no way be considered, since it is that of another locus which had so struck him when reading Fechner, to the extent that one senses that this was for him a type of lightening bolt, of illumination, of revelation, but at the same time at the very moment that he talks to us at least twice, in the Traumdeutung about the anderer Schauplatz, he always underlines that it has nothing to do with another neurological locus. We are saying that this other locus is to be sought in the structure of the signifier itself. Now what I am trying to show you here, is that the structure of the signifier itself once the subject is engaged in it, I mean with the minimal hypotheses (21) that are required by the fact that a subject enters into its game. I mean once the signifier is given and the subject is defined as that which is going to enter into the signifier and nothing else. Things are necessarily organised starting from this necessity, and all sorts of consequences are going to flow from this, that there is a topology which it is necessary and sufficient for us to conceive of as constituted by two superimposed chains, for us to account for it, but it is absolutely required in order that we should account for it, that there are these two superimposed chains, and it is towards this that we are advancing.

Here at the level of Anna Freud's dream, how do things appear? It is true that they appear in a problematic, ambiguous fashion, which permits, which makes it legitimate up to a certain point for Freud to distinguish a difference between children's dreams and adults dreams.

Where is the chain of nominations which makes up the dream of Anna Freud situated? On the upper chain or on the lower chain? It is a question regarding which you have been able to notice that the upper part of the graph represents this chain in a dotted form, putting the accent on the element of discontinuity of the signifier, while we represent the lower chain of the graph as continuous, and on the other hand I told you that of course in every process the two chains are involved.

(22) What does the lower chain mean at the level that we are posing the question? The lower chain at the level of demand, and in so far as I told you that the subject qua speaking took on this solidity borrowed from the synchronic solidarity of the signifier, it is quite obvious that it is something that participates in the unity of the sentence, of this something which has made people talk and which gave rise to so much discussion, about the function of the sentence as holophrase in so far that is as the holophrase exists. There is no doubt about it, the holophrase has a name: it is the interjection.

If you like, to illustrate at the level of the demand what the function of the lower chain represents, it is: "Food!", or "Help!"; I am speaking about universal discourse, I am not talking about the child's discourse for the moment. This form of sentence exists, I would even say that in certain cases it takes on a quite pressing and demanding value. This is what is in question, it is the articulation of the sentence, it is the subject in so far as this need which of course must pass by way of the defiles of the signifier qua need, is expressed in a fashion which is deformed, but at least which is monolithic.

except that the monolith that is in question, is the subject himself at this level which constitutes him.

What happens on the other line, is quite different. What can be (23) said about it is not easy to say, but for a good reason, which is that it is precisely what is at the basis of what happens on the first line, the lower one; but undoubtedly what we see, is that even in something which is given to us as being as primitive as this child's dream, Anna Freud's dream, something marks for us that here the subject is not simply constituted in the sentence and by the sentence, in the sense that when the individual, or the crowd, or the mob cries: "Food!", one knows very well that in this case the whole weight of the message is on the emitter, I mean that it is the dominant element and one even knows that this cry just by itself is sufficient precisely in the forms that I have just evoked, to constitute this emitter, as being well and truly a unique subject, even if it has a hundred mouths, a thousand mouths. It does not need to introduce itself, the sentence introduces it sufficiently. Now all the same we find ourselves confronted with the following, that the human subject when he operates with language, takes himself into account, and to such a degree is it his primitive position that I do not know if you remember a certain text by Monsieur Binet, namely the difficulties that the subject has in going beyond this stage which I for my part find much more suggestive than any of the stages indicated by Monsieur Piaget, and this stage, I am not going to tell you about it because I do not want to get into details, appears as distinctive and consists in the fact that the (24) subject perceives that there is something wrong with the sentence: "I have three brothers, Paul, Ernest and me". Up to a fairly advanced stage this seems to him quite natural, and for a very good reason, because to tell the truth everything about the implication of the human subject in the act of speech is there: the fact is that he takes himself into account in it, that he names himself in it, and that consequently this is what I might call the most natural the most coordinated expression. The child simply has not found the proper formula which would obviously be the following: "We are three brothers, Paul, Ernest and me", except that we would be very far from reproaching him for giving it the ambiguities of the function of being and having. It is clear that a step must be taken in order that in sum what is in question, namely the distinction between the I qua subject of the enunciation and the I qua subject of the enunciating, can be made, because this is what is in question.

What is articulated at the level of the first line when we take the following step is the process of enunciation: in our dream of the other day: "he had died". But when you announce something like that, in which I would point out to you in passing, the whole novelty of the dimension that the word introduces into the world, is already implied, because to be able to say: "He had died", this cannot be said otherwise than in a completely different perspective to that of the statement (du dire) "He had died", means absolutely nothing (ne veut absolument rien dire); (25) "He had died", means: he no longer exists, therefore there is no need to say it, he is no longer there in order to say he is dead, he must already be a being supported by the word. But no one is being asked to perceive this, of course, but simply on the contrary the following, that the act of enunciating: "He had died", usually requires in the discourse itself all sorts of reference points which are distinct from the reference points that are taken from the enunciation of the process.

If what I am saying there were not obvious, the whole of grammar would vanish. I am simply in the process of pointing out to you for the moment the necessity of using the future perfect, in so far as there are two reference points to time: a reference point to time concerning the act that is going to be in question: "by that date I will have become her husband" for example, and it is a question of locating what is going to be transformed by marriage into the enunciation; but on the other hand, because you express it in terms of the future perfect, it is the present point from which you speak from the act of enunciating which locates you. There are therefore two subjects, two I's, and the stage that the child must go beyond at the level of this test of Binet's, namely the distinction between these two I's, seems to me to be something which has literally nothing to do with this famous reduction to reciprocity which Piaget considers to be the essential pivot as regards grasping how to use personal pronouns.

But let us leave this then to one side for the moment. What have (26) we arrived at? To a grasp of these two lines as representing one which is referred to the process of enunciating, the other the process of the enunciation.

The fact that they are two, does not mean that each represents one function, but that every time we are dealing with the functions of language we should always discover this duplicity. Let us say again that not only are they two, but that they will always have opposing discontinuous structures, here for example for one when the other is continuous, and inversely.

Where is Anna Freud's articulation situated?

I am not going to tell you how this topology can be used, I mean I am not going to say just like that all at once because it might suit me, or even because I may be able to see a little bit further, given the fact that I was the one who constructed this contraption, and because I know where I am going, so that I should tell you: it is here or it is there. The fact is that the question arises: the question arises of what this articulation represents on this occasion which is the aspect under which the reality of Anna Freud's dream is presented to us, and that in the case of this child who was quite capable of perceiving the meaning of the sentence of her nurse - true or false - Freud implies it, and Freud supposes it, and quite correctly because of course, a child of nineteen months understands very well that her nurse has messed her about - there (27) is articulated in what I called this flocculated form, this series of signifiers in a certain order, this something which takes its form from being stacked up, by being superimposed as I might say, in a column, from the fact of substituting for one another these things in so far as each one is a metaphor for the other, which it is then a question of making emerge, namely the reality of satisfaction qua prohibited (inter-dite) and we shall go no further with Anna Freud's dream.

We will nevertheless take the next step. So that once we have sufficiently begun to clarify this matter by asking ourselves now, because it is a question of the topology of repression, the way in which what we are beginning to articulate is going to help us when it is a question of an adult dream, namely how, what is the real difference between what we can clearly see to be a certain form which the child's desire takes on on this occasion in the dream, and a form which is undoubtedly much more complicated because it is going to give much more trouble, in any case as regards interpretation, namely what happens in a adult's dream.

In this matter there is no ambiguity in Freud. He has no difficulty with it, it is enough to read the usage and the function of what intervenes, it is in the order of censorship. Censorship operates very exactly in a way that I was able to illustrate during my previous seminars. I do not know if you remember the famous story which we enjoyed so much, the one (28) about: "The king of England is an idiot, therefore everything is permitted," says the typist who is caught up in the Irish revolution. But this was not what was in question. I gave you another application of it, namely what Freud says to explain punishment dreams. We had very specially put forward the law: whoever says that the king of England is an idiot will have his head cut off, and as I told you: the following night I dreamt that I had my head cut off.

Freud also articulates even more simple forms. Because I have been persuaded to read Tintin for some time past, I will borrow an example from him. I have a way of breaking through the censorship by using my Tintinesque qualities, I can say aloud: anyone who says in my presence that General Tapiocca is not a better man than General Alcazar, will have to deal with me. Now, it is quite clear that if I articulate something like this, neither partisans of General Tapiocca, nor those of General Alcazar would be satisfied, and I would say that what is much more surprising, is that the least satisfied will be those who are the partisans of both.

Here then is what Freud explains to us in the most precise fashion: it is in the nature of what is said to confront us with a very very particular difficulty which at the same time also opens up very special possibilities. What is in question is (29) simply the following:

What the child had to deal with, was the prohibition (inter-dit), a saying, no. The whole process of education, some principles of censorship, go therefore to form this saying no, because it is a question of operations with the signifier in an inexpressible way (en indieible), and this also supposes that the subject perceives that the saying no, if it is said, is said, and even if it is not executed, remains said. Whence the fact that not saying it is distinct from obeying not to do it, in other words that the truth of desire is all by itself an offence against the authority of law.

So that the way out proposed to this new drama is to censure this truth of desire. But this censorship is not something which, however it is exercised, can be sustained with the stroke of a pen, because here it is the process of enunciating which is aimed at, and because to prevent it some foreknowledge of the process of the enunciation is necessary, and that every discourse destined to banish this enunciation from the process of enunciating is going to find itself offending more or less openly with its end. It is the matrix of this possibility which at this level, is given on our graph, and it will give you a lot of other matrices. The subject, because of the fact that he articulates his demand, is captured in a discourse in which he cannot but be himself constructed qua agent of enunciating, which is why he cannot renounce it without this enunciation, because that is to efface himself completely as a subject knowing what is in question.

(30) The relationship to one another of these two lines of the process of enunciating and the process of the enunciation is quite simple, it is the whole of grammar, a rational grammar which is articulated in these terms; if you find it interesting I will tell you where and how, in what terms and in what context this has been articulated, but for the moment what we have to deal with is the following: it is the fact that we see when repression is introduced, it is essentially linked to the absolute necessity of the subject being effaced and disappearing at the level of the process of enunciating.

How, by what empirical paths does the subject accede to this possibility? It is quite impossible, even to articulate it if we do not see what the nature of the process of enunciating is. As I told you: every word begins from these points of intersection which we have designated by the point 0, namely that every word in so far as the subject is implicated in it, is the discourse of the Other. That is the precise reason why at first the child is quite convinced that all his thoughts are known, it is because the definition of thought is not as the psychologists say, something like the beginning of an act. Thought is above all something which participates in this dimension of the unsaid which I have just introduced by the distinction between the process of enunciating and the process of enunciation, but for this unsaid to subsist, naturally in so far as in order that it (31) should be an unsaid it must be said, it must be said at the level of the process of enunciating, namely qua discourse of the Other, and that is why the child does not doubt for an instant that what represents for him this locus where this discourse is carried on, namely his parents, know all his thoughts. In any case this is his first movement, it is a movement which will subsist as long as he is not introduced to something new which we have again articulated here concerning this relationship of the upper line with the lower line, namely what keeps them outside grammar at a certain distance.

I do not need to tell you how grammar keeps a distance between sentences like "I do not know whether he is dead", "He is not dead, as far as I know", "I did not know that he was dead", "I was afraid that he was dead". All these subtle taxemes which go from the subjunctive here to a ne that Monsieur Lebidoy calls in a fashion that is really incredible for a philologist who writes in Le Monde, the expletive ne. All of this is done to show us that a whole part of grammar, the essential part, the taxemes, are there to maintain the necessary gap between these two lines.

The next time I will project for you onto these two lines the articulations in question, but for the subject who has not yet learned these subtle forms, and it is quite clear that the (32) distinction between the two lines is made well before. There are required conditions, and these form the basis of the interrogation that I am bringing before you today. This distinction is very essentially linked, like every time of course that you see that it is a question of something which is not a temporal reference point, but a tensional point, namely of a difference in tenses between these two lines, you can clearly see the relationship that there can be between this and the situation, and the topology of desire.

This is where we are. For a time the child is in sum entirely caught up in the interplay between these two lines. What is necessary here in order that repression may be produced? I would say that I am hesitating before committing myself to a path which after all I would like not to appear for what it nevertheless is, a path of concession, namely that I appeal to notions of development properly speaking, I mean that everything is implicated in the empirical process at the level at which this is produced, of an intervention, of an empirical and certainly necessary incidence, but the necessity to which this empirical incidence, this empirical accident, the necessity in which it comes to reverberate, which it precipitates in its form, is of a different nature.

In any case, the child perceives at a given moment that these adults who are supposed to know all his thoughts, and here precisely he is not going to go beyond this stage, in a certain (33) fashion he will be able to reproduce later on the possibility which is the fundamental possibility of what we call in brief and rapidly the so-called elementary form of hallucination, that there appears this primitive structure of what we call this background of the process of enunciating, parallel to the current enunciation of the existence of what is called the echo of acts, the echo of expressed thoughts.

That the knowledge of a Verwerfung, namely of what, of what I am going to talk to you about now, has not been realised and which is what? Which is the following: it is that the child at a moment perceives that this adult who knows all his thoughts, does not know them at all. The adult does not know, whether it is a question in the dream of he knows or he does not know that he is dead. We will see the next time the exemplary signification on this occasion of this relationship, but for the moment we do not need to link up these two terms for the reason that we are not yet advanced enough in the articulation of what is going to be affected in repression, but the fundamental possibility of what cannot but be the end of this repression if it is successful, namely not just simply that it gives to the unsaid the sign "no", which says that it is not said, while at the same time letting it be said, but effectively the unsaid is such a thing, there is no doubt this negation is such a primitive form that there is (34) absolutely no shadow of doubt that Freud puts the Verneinung which seems nevertheless to be one of the most elaborated forms of repression for the subject, because we see it in subjects who are highly developed psychologically, that all the same Freud puts it immediately after the primitive Bejahung, therefore it is indeed as I am in process of telling you, through a possibility, through a genesis, and even through a logical deduction that he proceeds, as I am proceeding for the moment before you, and not a genetic one. This primitive Verneinung is what I am telling you about in connection with the unsaid, but the "He does not know" is the following stage, and it is precisely through the intermediary of this "He does not know" that the other who is the locus of my word, is the lodging place of my thoughts, and that there can be introduced the Unbewusste into which there is going to enter for the subject the contents of repression.

Do not make me go further or faster than I am going. If I tell you that it is following the example of this other that the subject proceeds in order that the process of repression should be inaugurated in him, I did not tell you that it was an easy example to follow. Initially already I indicated to you that there is more than one mode because in this connection I mentioned the Verwerfung and that I made reappear there - I will articulate it again the next time - the Verneinung.

The Verdrängung, repression, cannot be something which is so easy to apply, because if fundamentally what is in question is that (35) the subject should be effaced, it is quite clear that what is quite easy to show in this order, namely that the others, the adults, know nothing, naturally the subject who is entering into existence does not know that they know nothing, the adults, as everyone knows, it is because they have gone through all sorts of adventures, precisely the adventures of repression. The subject knows nothing about it, and it must be said that it is not easy to imitate them because for a subject to do away with himself as a subject, is a conjuring trick which is a little bit harder than many of the others that I present before you here, but let us say that essentially and in a fashion which is absolutely sure, if we have to rearticulate the three modes in which the subject wants to do it in Verwerfung, Verneinung and Verdrängung, the Verdrängung is going to consist in the following that to affect in a way which is at least possible, if not durable, the part of this unsaid which must be made disappear, the subject is going to operate in the way which I have called for you the way of the signifier. It is on the signifier, and on the signifier as such that he is going to operate, and this is why the dream that I put forward the last time, around which we continue to turn here even though I did not completely re-evoke it in the seminar today, the dream of the dead father, and that is why Freud articulates in this connection that repression bears (36) essentially on the manipulation, the elision of two clausulae, namely "nach seinem Wunsch", and "he did not know that it was as he had wished", that it happened this way "in consequence of his wish".

Repression is represented in its origin, at its root as something which in Freud is articulated by: it cannot be articulated otherwise than as something which bears on the signifier.

I did not take you very far today, but it is a further step, because it is the step which is going to allow us to see what sort of signifier this operation of repression is brought to bear on. All signifiers are not equally breakable, repressible, fragile; that it was already on what I called two closulae that it came to bear, already has an essential importance, all the more essential in that it is going to allow us to delineate what is properly speaking in question when one talks first of all about dream-desire, and then about desire in itself.

Seminar 5: 10 December 1958

Anderer Schauplatz: GW 2/3 50-51; (SE 4 48);
GW 2/3 541 (SE 5 535)

I left you the last day on something which tends to approach to our problem, the problem of desire and its interpretation, a certain organisation of the signifying structure, of what is stated in the signifier as involving this internal duplicity of the enunciation; the process of the enunciation and the process of the act of enunciating.

I stressed for you the difference that exists between the I qua implicated in some enunciation or other, the I in so far as in the same way as some other, it is the subject of an enunciated process for example, which is not moreover the only word of enunciation either of the I in so far as it is implicated in all enunciating, but all the more in so far as it announces (2) itself as the enunciating I.

This mode under which it introduces itself as the I of the enunciating, this mode under which it introduces itself is not indifferent, if it introduces itself by naming itself as little Anna Freud did at the beginning of the message of her dream.

I pointed out to you that there remains here something ambiguous, namely whether this I as the I that is enunciating is authenticated or not at this moment. I gave you to understand that it is not yet and this is what constitutes the difference that Freud proposes to us as being the one which distinguishes the dream-desire in the child from the dream-desire in the adult, the fact is that something is not yet completed, precipitated out by the structure, is not yet distinguished in the structure, namely this something whose reflection and trace I proposed to you elsewhere; a delayed trace because it appears at the level of a test which of course already presupposes conditions very defined by experience, which does not allow us to prejudge fundamentally how much of it is in the subject, but the difficulty which still remains for a long time for the subject of distinguishing this enunciating I from the I of the enunciation, and which is expressed by the belated failure in a test which chance and his flair as a psychologist made Binet choose in the form of: "I have three brothers, Paul, Ernest and me."^M

The difficulty that there is in the fact that the child does not (3) see this enunciation as coming from elsewhere as he should, namely that the subject does not yet know how to deduct himself (se decompter). But this trace which I marked out for you is something, an index, and there are others, this essential element which constitutes the distinction, the difference for the subject between the I of the enunciating and the I of the enunciation. Now I told you, that we take things, not by way of deduction, but by a way which I cannot say to be empirical because it was already traced out, it was already constructed by Freud when he told us that the dream-desire in the adult is a desire which is loaned to him, and which is the mark of a repression, of a repression which at this level he brings forward as being a censorship.

When he enters into the mechanism of this censorship, when he shows us what a censorship is, namely the impossibilities of a censorship, because this is what he stresses, this is what I tried to get you to focus your reflection on for an instant by telling you of a type of internal contradiction which is that of everything that is unsaid at the level of the enunciating, I mean this internal contradiction which structures the "I am not saying that

I told you about it the last day in different humorous forms: anyone who says such and such a thing about such and such a person whose words must be respected, who must not be offended, will, I said, have to deal with. me. What does this mean, if not (4) that in putting forward this taking of sides which is obviously ironic, I am pronouncing, I find myself pronouncing precisely what should not be said, and Freud himself underlined sufficiently when he shows us the mechanism, the articulation, the meaning of the dream, how frequently the dream takes this path, namely that what it articulates as not to be said is precisely what it has to say, and that through which there passes what is effectively said in the dream.

This takes us to something which is linked to the deepest structure of the signifier. I would like again to dwell on it for a moment, because this element, this principle of "I am not saying" as such, it is not for nothing that Freud in his article on the Verneinung places it at the very root of the most primitive phase in which the subject constitutes himself as such and constitutes himself especially as unconscious. The relationship of this Verneinung with the most primitive Bejahung, with the access of a signifier into the question, because this is what a Bejahung is, is something which begins to pose a question. It is always a question of knowing what is posited at the most primitive level: is it for example the couple good and bad according to whether we choose or we do not choose one or other of these primitive terms? Already we are opting for a whole theorisation, for a whole orientation of our analytic thinking, and you know the role that has been played by the terms of good (5) and bad in a certain specification of the analytic path; they are certainly a very primitive couple.

I will pause for a moment on this unsaid and on the function of the not (ne) of the not in the "I am not saying", before taking a further step because I think that this is the essential articulation. This sort of "not" in the "I am not saying" which ensures that precisely in saying that one is not saying it one says it, something which almost appears as a sort of proof by absurdity, is something at which we must pause by recalling what I have already indicated to you as being what one must call the most radical property of the signifier, and if you remember, I already directed your attention to an image, to an example by showing both the relationship that there is between the signifier and a certain type of index or of sign which I called the trace which already itself bears the mark of some kind of reverse side of a borrowing from the real.

I spoke to you about Robinson Crusoe and about the footstep, the trace of Friday's footprint, and we dwelt a little while on the following: is this already the signifier, and I told you that the signifier begins, not with the trace, but with whatever effaces the trace, and it is not the effaced trace which constitutes the signifier, it is something which poses itself as being able to be effaced, which inaugurates the signifier. In (6) other words, Robinson Crusoe effaces the trace of Friday's footprint, but what does he put in its place? If he wants to preserve the place of Friday's footprint, he needs at least a cross, namely a bar and another bar across it. This is the specific signifier. The specific signifier is something which presents itself as being itself able to be effaced and which subsists precisely in this operation of effacing as such. I mean that the effaced signifier already presents itself as such with the properties proper to the unsaid. In so far as I cancel the signifier with the bar, I perpetuate it as such indefinitely, I inaugurate the dimension of the signifier as such. Making a cross is properly speaking something that does not exist in any form of locating that is permitted in any way. You must not think that non-speaking beings, the animals, do not locate things, but they do not do it intentionally with something said, but with traces of traces. We will come back when we have time to the practice of the hippopotamus, we will see what he leaves behind him for his fellows. What man leaves behind him is a signifier, it is a cross, it is a bar, qua barred, qua overlaid by another bar which indicates on the one hand that as such it has been effaced.

This function of the not of the not in so far as it is the signifier which cancels itself, is undoubtedly something (7) which just of itself would deserve a long development. It is very striking to see the extent to which the logicians, because they are as always too psychological, in their classification, in their articulation of negation, have left strangely to one side the most original one.

You know, or you do not know, and after all I have no intention of introducing you into the different modes of negation, I simply want to tell you that more originally than anything which can be articulated in the order of the concept, in the order of what distinguishes the meaning of negation, of privation, etc., more originally it is in the phenomenon of the spoken, in experience, in linguistic empiricism that we should find originally what is most important for us, and it is for that reason that I will dwell only on this, and here I cannot at least for a moment not take into consideration some researches which have the value of being experiential, and in particular the one made by Edouard Pichon who was as you know, one of our predecessors in psychoanalysis, who died at the beginning of the war from a serious heart illness, Edouard Pichon in connection with negation made the following distinction which you should at least have seen, have some notion about, have some idea about. He noticed something, he would have liked as a logician, obviously he wanted to be a psychologist, he tells us that what he is doing is a sort of exploration from words to thought.

(8) Like a lot of people, he is open to illusions about himself, because luckily this is precisely the weakest part of his work: his pretension of going back from words to thought. But on the contrary he happened to be a wonderful observer, I mean that he had a sense of the stuff of language which means that he taught us far more about words than about thought. And as regards words, and as regard this usage of negation, it is especially in French that he dwelt on this usage of negation, and there he could not avoid making this discovery which is made by this distinction, which is articulated in this distinction that he makes between the forclusive and the discordant.

I am going to give you examples right away of the distinction that he makes between them. Let us take a sentence like: "There is nobody here" (il n'y a personne ici). This is foreclosure, that anybody should be there is excluded for the moment. Pichon dwells on the remarkable fact that every time we have to deal with a pure and simple foreclosure in French, we must always use two terms: A ne and then something which here is represented by the personne, and which could be by the pas: Je n'ai pas ou loger (I have nowhere to stay), Je n'ai rien a vous dire (I have nothing to say to you) for example.

On the other hand I notice that a great number of the usages of ne and precisely the most indicative here as always, those which (9) pose the most paradoxical problems, always manifest themselves, namely that first of all a pure and simple ne is never, or almost never, used to indicate pure and simple negation, what for example in German or in English would be embodied in the "nicht" or the "not". The ne by itself, left to itself, expresses what he calls a discordance, and this discordance is very precisely something which is situated between the process of enunciating and the process of the enunciation.

To be clear and to illustrate right away what is in question, I am going precisely to give you the example which Pichon in fact focused most on, because it is specially illustrative, it is the use of those ne's that people who understand nothing, namely people who want to understand, call the expletive ne. I am saying this to you because I already began it the last time, I alluded to it in connection with an article on the so-called expletive ne which appeared in Le Monde and which appeared to me to be quite scandalous. This expletive ne which is not an expletive ne, which is a ne that is quite essential to the usage of the French tongue, is the one which is found in the sentence: Je crains qu'il ne vienne (I am afraid that he will come). Everyone knows that the Je crains qu'il ne vienne means: I am afraid that he will come and not I am afraid that he will not come, but in French one says: Je crains qu'il ne vienne.

In other words, French at this point of its linguistic usage lays (10) hold, as I might say of the ne somewhere at the level as one might say of its straying, of its descent from the process of enunciating where the ne refers to the articulation of the enunciating, refers to what is called the pure and simple signifier in act. "I am not saying that..." (je ne dis pas que ...), "I am not saying that I am your wife" for example, of the ne of the enunciation where it is, "I am not your wife". No doubt we are not here to work out the genesis of language, but something is implied even in our experience.

This is what I want to show you which in any case indicates for us the articulation that Freud gives of the fact of negation, implies that negation descends from the enunciating to the enunciation, and how could we be surprised at this because after all every negation in the enunciation involves a certain paradox, because it asserts something in order to assert it at the same time, let us say in a certain number of cases as not existing somewhere between the two, somewhere between the enunciating and the enunciation, and on this plane where the discordances are established, where something in my fear anticipates the fact that he may come, and hoping that he will not come, what can it do other than articulate this "I am afraid that he will come" as a "je crains qu'il ne vienne", hooking on in passing as I might say, this ne of discordance which is distinguished as such in negation from the forclusive ne.

You will say to me: this is a phenomenon that is peculiar to the (11) French tongue, you evoked it yourself just above in talking about the German "nicht" and the English "not". Of course, only the important thing is not that, the important thing is that in the English tongue for example where we articulate analogous things, namely that we perceive, and I am not able to demonstrate this to you because I am not here to give you a course on linguistics, that it is something analogous which is manifested in the fact that in English for example negation cannot be applied in a pure and simple fashion to the verb in so far as it is the verb of the enunciation, the verb designating the process in the enunciation; one does not say: "I eat not...", but "I don't eat..."

In other words, it appears that we have traces in the articulation in the English linguistic system of the following: it is that for anything that is of the order of negation, the enunciation is led to borrow a form which is modelled on the use of an auxiliary, the auxiliary being typically what introduces the dimension of the subject into the enunciation. "I don't eat", "I won't eat", or "I won't go" which is properly speaking je n'irai pas, which does not simply imply the fact, but my resolution as a subject not to go, the fact that for every negation in so far as it is a pure and simple negation, something like an auxiliary dimension appears, and here in the English tongue models it on this something that essentially links (12) negation to a sort of original position of the enunciating as such.

The second moment or phase of what I tried to articulate for you the last time, is constituted by the following: that to show you by what path, by what way the subject is introduced to this dialectic of the other, in so far as it is imposed on him by the very structure of this difference between the enunciating and the enunciation, I brought you along a path which as I told you I made deliberately empirical. It is not the only one, I mean that I introduce into it the real history of the subject. I told you that the following step of the way in which at the origin the subject is constituted in the process of the distinction between this I of the enunciating and the I of the enunciation, is the dimension of knowing nothing about it (n'en rien savoir), in so far as he experiences, that he experiences in the fact that it is against the background of the fact that the other knows all his thoughts, because at the origin his thoughts are by nature and structurally this discourse of the other, that it is in the discovery that it is a fact that the other knows nothing about his thoughts, that there is inaugurated for him this way which is the one that we seek, the way by which the subject is going to develop this contradictory exigency of the unsaid and find the difficult path by which he has to bring about this unsaid in his being and become this sort of being with whom we have to deal, namely a subject which has the dimension of the unconscious, because this is the essential step that psychoanalysis makes for (13) us in man's experience; it is the following: it is that after long centuries in which I would say in a way philosophy persisted more and more in taking always further this discourse in which the subject is only the correlate of the object in the relationship of knowledge, namely that the subject is that which is supposed by the knowledge of objects, this sort of strange subject about which I said somewhere or other that it might do as a Sunday philosophy because the rest of the week, namely during work of course everyone can completely neglect it, this subject which is only the shadow in a way and the understudy of objects, this something which is forgotten in this subject, namely that the subject is the subject who speaks. It is only from a certain moment that we can no longer forget it, namely the moment when his domain as a subject who speaks stands on its own, whether he is there or whether he is not there.

What completely changes the nature of his relationships to the object, is this crucial point of the nature of his relationships to the object which is precisely called desire. It is in this field that we are trying to articulate the relationships of the subject to the object in the sense that they are relationships of desire, because it is in this field that analytic experience teaches us that there is something to be articulated. The relationship of the subject to the object is not a relationship of need, the relationship of the subject to the object is a (14) complex relationship which I am precisely trying to articulate before you. For the moment let us begin to indicate the following: it is because this relationship of the articulation of the subject to the object is situated there, that the object is found to be this something which is not the correlate and the correspondent of a need of the subject, but this something which supports the subject precisely at the moment at which he has to confront as one might say his own existence, which supports the subject in his existence, in his existence in the most radical sense, namely precisely in this that he exists in language, namely that he consists in something that is outside himself, in something that he can only grasp in its proper nature as language at the precise moment when he, as subject, must efface himself, vanish, disappear behind a signifier, which is precisely what one might call the panic point around which he must attach himself to something, it is precisely to the object qua object of desire that he attaches himself.

Somewhere, someone whom I will not immediately name today, in order not to confuse matters, someone quite contemporary, who is dead, has written:

"If one managed to learn what the Miser came to know, what the Miser lost when his money-box was stolen from him, one would learn a great deal."

It is exactly what we have to learn, I mean learn it for ourselves and teach it to others.

(15) Analysis is the first place, the first dimension in which one can respond to this statement, and of course because the miser is ridiculous, namely much too close to the unconscious for you to be able to support it, I will have to find another more noble example to help you to grasp what I mean.

I could begin to articulate it for you in the same terms as above as regards what concerns existence, and in two minutes you would take me for an existentialist, which is not what I desire. I am going to take an example in La Regie du Jeu, a film by Jean Renoir. Somewhere the character who is played by Dalio, who is the old character as he is seen in real life in a certain social milieu, and you must not think that it is even limited to this social milieu; he is a collector of objects, and more especially of music boxes. Remind yourselves, if you still remember this film, of the moment when Dalio, in front of a large audience, makes his latest discovery, a particularly beautiful music box. At that moment the character is literally in this position which we could call and which we should call exactly that of shame: he blushes, he effaces himself, he disappears, he is very embarrassed. He has shown what he has shown, but how could those present understand that we find ourselves here at this level, at (16) this point of oscillation that we grasp, which shows itself in its extreme form in this passion of the collector for the object. It is one of the forms of the object of desire. What the subject shows is nothing other than the most important, most intimate point of himself. What is supported by this object, is precisely what he cannot unveil, even to himself, it is this something which is at the very edge of the greatest secret.

That is it, it is along this path that we should seek to know what his money box is for the miser. We must certainly take a step further to get quite to the level of the miser and that is the reason why the miser can only be treated by comedy.

But what is therefore in question, that by which we are introduced is the following: it is that what the subject finds himself committed to from a particular moment, is the following, it is to articulate his wish qua secret. How is the wish, how is what is in the wish expressed? In these forms of the tongue to which I alluded the last time, for which according to the tongue, different modes, different registers, different chords, have been invented. In this matter you must not always trust what the grammarians say. The subjunctive is not as subjunctive as it looks, and the type of wish - I am searching in my memory something which will be able in some way to give you an image of it, and I do not know why there has come back from the depths of (17) my memory this little poem which I had some trouble in recomposing, indeed in re-situating:

"Etre une belle fille
Blonde et populaire.
Qui mette de la joie dans l'air
Lorsqu'elle sourit,
Donne de l'appetit
Aux ouvriers de Saint-Denis."

This was written by someone who is a contemporary of ours, a discreet female poet, one of whose characteristics is that she is small and dark, and who no doubt expresses in her nostalgia to sharpen the appetite of the workers of Saint-Denis, something which can be strongly enough attached to one or other moment of her ideological reveries. But one cannot say either that this is her ordinary occupation.

What I would like you to dwell on for a moment in terms of this phenomenon which is a poetic phenomenon, is first of all the fact that we find in it something fairly important as regards the temporal structure. This perhaps is the pure form, I am not saying of the wish (yoeu), but of what is wished (souhaite), namely of that which in the wish is stated as wished. Let us say that the primitive subject is elided, but this means nothing, she is not elided because what is articulated here, is the wished for, it is something which is presented in the infinitive as you see, and which if you tried to introduce yourselves into the interior of the structure, you will see that this is situated in a position, a position of being in front of the subject and (18) determining her retroactively. It is not a question here either of a pure and simple aspiration, or of a regret; it is a question of something which poses itself in front of the subject as determining it retroactively in a certain type of being.

This is situated completely up in the air. It nevertheless remains that this is how what is wished for is articulated, giving us already something that it would be well to retain when we try to give a meaning to the sentence with which the Interpretation of dreams concludes, namely that the indestructible desire models the present on the image of the past. This thing whose drone we hear as something which we attribute right away to the effects of repetition or of deferred action, is perhaps not certain if we look very closely at it, namely that if the indestructible desire is now modelled on the image of the past, it is perhaps like the donkey's carrot, it is always ahead of the subject, always producing retroactively the same effects.

This introduces us at the same time to the ambiguity of this enunciation through its structural characteristics, because after all what one might call the gratuitous character of enunciating this has some consequences which nothing prevents us from getting involved in, I mean that nothing prevents us from getting involved in the following remark, that this poetically expressed wish, entitled as it happens, since I referred to the text, Voeu secret, this then is what I discovered in my memory after some (19) twenty five or thirty years, in looking for something which would take us to the secret of the wish, this secret wish of course which is communicated, because this is the whole problem: how to communicate to others something which is constituted as secret? In reply: through some lie, because when all is said and done for those of us who are a little bit more clever than the others, this can be translated: "As true as I am a beautiful blond popular girl, I want to make everybody happy and sharpen the appetite of the workers of Saint-Denis", and it is not said that every being, even one who is generous or poetic or even a female poet, is all that eager to make everybody happy. After all, why? Why, if not in phantasy, if not in phantasy and to demonstrate the extent to which the object of phantasy is metonymical, namely that it is happiness which is going to circulate like that? As regards the workers of Saint-Denis, they can put up with it. Let them divide things up among themselves, in any case there are already too many of them for one to know to whom one should address oneself.

With this digression I introduce you to the structure of the wish by way of poetry; we can now enter into it by way of serious things, namely by the effective role that desire plays, and this desire which we have seen, as might have been expected, that it should in fact have to find its place somewhere between this (20) point from which we started by saying that the subject alienates himself essentially in the alienation of the appeal, of the appeal of need, in that he has to enter into the defiles of the signifier, and this beyond in which there is going to be introduced as essential the dimension of the unsaid, it must be articulated somewhere. We see it in the dream that I chose, this dream which is undoubtedly one of the most problematic of dreams in so far as it is a dream of the apparition of a dead person, this dream of the apparition of a dead person which Freud on page 433 of the Traumdeutung in the German edition, page 381 and on page 382 of the La Science des Reves concerning the apparition of the dead, is very far from having yet given us their whole secret (SE V 430-1) . Even though already he articulates a lot of things in it, that this is essential, and it is in this connection that Freud marked with the greatest accent right through this analysis of dreams in the Traumdeutung, the depths there are in what was the first approach to the psychology of the unconscious, namely the ambivalence of feelings with respect to those who are loved and respected. It is something moreover by which the dream which I chose to begin to try to articulate before you the function of desire in the dream, is again approached.

You can see that recently I have been re-reading the Traumdeutung in its first edition with certain goals in view, and that at the same time the last time I made an allusion to the fact that in (21) the Traumdeutung one always forgets what is in it. I had forgotten that in 1930 this dream was added to it. It was first of all added on in a note a short time after its publication in the "Formulierungen", and then in the 1930 edition it was added to the text. Therefore it is in the text of the Traumdeutung.

I repeat then, that this dream is made up as follows: the subject sees his father appearing before him, this father whom he had just lost after an illness which had been a long and painful one for him. He sees him appearing before him and he is pierced, the text tell us, with a profound sadness at the thought that his father is dead and that he does not know it; a formulation on whose character of absurd reasoning Freud insists, and of which he says: it is completed, it is understood if one adds that he had died "in consequence of the dreamer's wish", that he did not know that it was in consequence of his wish of course that he had died.

This is what I inscribe on the graph, according to the following levels:

(22) "He did not know", refers essentially to the dimension of the constitution of the subject, in so far as it is over against a useless "he did not know" that the subject has to situate himself, and that here we have what precisely it is that we are going to try to see in detail from experience, that he has to constitute himself as not knowing, the only way out that is given to him in order that what is unsaid effectively takes on the import of the unsaid.

It is at the level of the enunciation that this is done, but there is no doubt that no statement of this kind can be made unless it is supported by the underpinning of an enunciating, because for any being who does not speak, we have the proof, that "he had died" means nothing; I would say more: we have the test in the immediate indifference that most animals show towards remainders, towards the corpses of their fellows once they have become corpses. In order that an animal should be attached to a dead person, the example of dogs is cited, it is necessary precisely that the dog should be in this exceptional position of showing that if he does not have an unconscious, he has a super-ego, namely that something has come into play which allows there to be something of the order of a certain delineation of signifying articulation. But let us leave that to one side.

That this "he had died" already supposes the subject introduced to something which is of the order of existence, existence being nothing other than the fact that the subject from the moment that (23) he establishes himself in the signifier can no longer be destroyed, that he enters into this intolerable concatenation which for him unfolds immediately in the imaginary, which means that he can no longer conceive himself, except as constantly re-emerging in existence.

This is not the construction of a philosopher, I have been able to observe among those who are called patients, and I remember one for whom one of the turning points of her internal experience, was a particular dream precisely where she touched without any doubt, and not at an indifferent moment of her analysis, something that was apprehended, grasped in a dream state, which was nothing other than a sort of pure feeling of existence, of existing as one might say in an indefinite fashion, and from the heart of this existence a new existence always re-emerged for her, and this extended for her inner intuition, as one might say, as far as she could see, existence being apprehended and felt as something which of its nature could not be extinguished except in order to emerge further on, and this was accompanied for her precisely by an intolerable pain.

This is something which is quite close to what the content of the dream gives us, because what indeed do we have? We have here a dream which is the dream of a son. It is always good to point out in connection with a dream, that the one who constructs it, is the dreamer. One must always remember that when one begins to (24) speak about the person in the dream.

What do we have here? The problem of what one calls identification is posed here in a particularly apt way, because in the dream there is no need for dialectic to think that there is some relationship of identification between the subject and his own dream fantasies.

What do we have? We have the subject who is there confronting his father, pierced by the deepest pain and before him we have the father who does not know that he is dead, or more exactly, because we must put it in the tense in which the subject apprehends it and communicates it to us, he did not know. I insist on this without being quite able to insist on it to the limit for the moment, but I always intend not to offer you approximate things which sometimes lead to obscurity, because this rule of behaviour also prevents me from putting things before you in any but an approximate way, and because I cannot immediately specify them, that naturally leaves some doors open. Nevertheless it is important, as regards the dream, for you to remember that the fashion in which it is communicated to us is always an enunciation: the subject gives us an account of what? Of another enunciation, but it is not at all sufficient to say that, of another enunciation that he presents to us as enunciating, because it is a fact that the subject tells us about the dream precisely in order that we should look for the key, the meaning, namely what he means, namely for something quite (25) different to the enunciation that he reports to us, the fact therefore that this: "he did not know", is said in the imperfect is quite important in this perspective. "He did not know", in what I am enunciating to you, this for those whom the question of the relationships of the dream to the word by which we get to know about it, can approach in the drawing the first level of splitting.

But let us continue. Here then is how things are divided up: from one aspect, from the aspect of what appears in the dream as subject, what? An affect, pain, pain about what? That he had died. And from the other aspect corresponding to this pain: "He did not know", what? The same thing, that he had died.

Freud tell us that it is here there is found its meaning and implicitly its interpretation, and this seems to be quite simple. I have already pointed out to you often enough that it is not.

As a complement: "in consequence of his wish":

pain (douleur)	■	he did not know that he had died	•	that he had died

(In consequence of his wish)

But what does this mean? If we are, as Freud formally indicates (26) that we should be, not simply in this passage, but in the one about repression that I asked you to refer to, we are at the level of the signifier, you should immediately see that we can make more than one usage of this "in consequence of his wish". He had died in consequence of his wish. Where does this take us? I think that some of you at least may remember the point that I formerly brought you to, that of the subject who having exhausted the way of desire in all its forms, in so far as it is not known to the subject, is the punishment of what crime? Of no other crime than that of having precisely existed in this desire, he finds himself brought to the point where he can make no other exclamation than this final but, this "not to have been born", at which existence culminates when it has arrived very precisely at the extinction of his desire, and this pain which the subject feels in the dream, let us not forget that he is a subject of whom we know nothing more than this immediate antecedent that he has seen his father die in the torment of a long and agonising illness.

This pain is close by in the experience of this pain of existence when there is nothing else in him than this existence itself, and when everything in this excessive suffering tends of abolish this ineradicable term which is the desire to live.

This pain of existing, of existing when desire is no longer (27) there, if it has been lived by any one, has been lived by the one who is far from being a stranger to the subject. But in any case what is clear, is that in the dream the subject knew this pain.

We will never know if the one who experienced it in the real knew or did not know the meaning of this pain, but on the contrary what is tangible, is that neither in the dream of course, nor certainly outside the dream before interpretation leads us to it, does the subject know that what he is assuming is this very pain as such, and the proof is that he can only articulate it in the dream in a faithful, cynical fashion, which corresponds absurdly to what? Freud replies to this, if we refer to the little chapter in the Traumdeutung where he talks about absurd dreams, especially in connection with this dream, and it is a confirmation of what I was trying to articulate for you here before rereading it, we will see that he specifies that if the feeling of absurdity is often linked in dreams to this sort of contradiction, linked to the structure of the unconscious itself, and which ends up in something laughable, in particular cases this absurd, and he says it in connection with this dream, is introduced into the dream as an element of what? As an element expressing a particularly violent repudiation of the meaning that is designated here, and in fact undoubtedly the subject can see that his father did not know the wish, he, the subject had that his father should die in order to be done with his suffering. (28) Namely that at this level the subject himself knows what his wish is. He may see or not see, everything depends on the point of analysis that he has got to, that this wish which was his in the past, that his father should die, and not for his father's sake, but for his, the subject who was his rival. But what he cannot see at all, at the point that he has got to, is that by assuming the pain of his father without knowing it, what is being aimed at, is to keep before him in the object this ignorance which is absolutely necessary for him, that which consists in not knowing that it is better not to have been born. There is nothing at the final term of existence, than the pain of existing; it is better to assume it as that of the other who is there and who continues to speak, as I the dreamer continue to speak, than to see being laid bare this final mystery which is nothing other, when all is said and done, than the most secret content of this wish, the one of which we have no element in the dream itself, except what we know by knowledge. What the content of this wish is is, namely, the wish for the father to be castrated, namely the wish par excellence which at the moment of the father's death is turned back onto the son, because it is his turn to be castrated, namely something that must not be seen at any price, and I am not in the process of posing for the moment the terms of the point or the moment or the times when an interpretation should therefore be made, it would be easy already (29) to show you on this schema that there is a first interpretation which is made right away. Your father is not at all concerned, he did not know, in consequence of your wish of enunciating the wish.

We are here at the level of what is already in the direct line of the subject's word, and it is a good thing that it is so, but it is necessary that a certain introduction by the analyst should be such that already something problematic is introduced into this remark which is of a nature to make emerge what up to then is repressed and in dots, namely that he had already died a long time ago in consequence of his wish, in consequence of the oedipal wish, and to make this as such emerge from the unconscious.

But it is a question of knowing, of giving its full import to this something which as above goes well above the question of what this wish is, because this wish to castrate the father with its reversal onto the subject, is something which goes well beyond any justifiable desire. If it is, as we say it is, a structuring necessity, a signifying necessity, and here the wish is only the mask of what is most profound in the structure of desire as such as the dream reveals it, it is nothing other, not than a wish, but than the essence of the "in consequence of", of the relationship, of the necessary enchainment which prevents the subject from escaping from this concatenation of existence in so (30) far as it is determined by the nature of the signifier.

This "in consequence of", this is the point of what I want to point out to you, it is when all is said and done in this problematic of the effacement of the subject which on this occasion is his salvation in this final point where the subject should be destined to a final ignorance, the mainspring, the Verdrangung, this is the meaning into which I tried to introduce you right at the end the last time, reposes entirely, this sort of Verdrangung on, not the repression of something full, of something which is discovered, of something which is seen and which is understood, but in the pure and simple signifying elision, of the "nach", of the "in consequence of", of that which indicates agreement or disagreement, accord or disaccord between the enunciating and the signifier, between what is in the relationship in the enunciation and what is in the necessities of the enunciating. It is in terms of the elision of a clausula, of a pure and simple signifier, that everything subsists, and that in the last analysis what is manifested in the desire of the dream, is the fact that he did not know.

What does the fact mean in the absence of any other signification that we have at our disposition? We will see only when we take a dream of someone whom we know better, because next time we will take one of Freud's dreams, the one which is quite close to this one, the dream that Freud had also about his father, the one he (31) has when he sees him in the form of Garibaldi; there we will go further and we will really see what Freud's desire is, and those who reproach me here for not paying enough attention to anal erotism will get their money's worth. But for the moment let us stop here with this schematic dream at this dream of the subject's confrontation with death.

What does that mean? In summoning this shade, blood is going to flow, because it means that this dream means nothing other than that he is not dead. He may suffer in the place of the other. But behind this suffering, is the only lure onto which at this crucial moment he can still hold on to, precisely that of the rival, of the murder of the father, of imaginary fixation, and it is also here that we will take things up the next time, around the explanation of what I think I have sufficiently prepared by today's articulations: the elucidation of the following formula as being the constant formula of the phantasy in the unconscious:

This relationship of the subject in so far as he is barred, cancelled, abolished by the action of the signifier, and who finds his support in the other, in that which defines for the subject who speaks, the object as such, namely that it is with the other that we try to identify, that we will very quickly identify, because those who attended the first year of this Séminaire heard it spoken about for a trimester, this other (32) this predominant object of human erotism, is the image of one's own body in the broad sense that we will give to it. It is here on this occasion in this human phantasy which is the phantasy of himself, which is no longer numbered, it is here that the subject maintains his existence, maintains the veil which ensures that he can continue to be a subject who speaks.

I mentioned the last time the French grammar written by Jacques Damourette and Edouard Pichon (Editeur D'Artrey). What I said about negation, foreclosure and discordance is dealt with in two places in this grammar, in the second volume where there is assembled a whole article on negation, which fixes the data of foreclosure and discordance. This foreclosure which is so particularly embodied in the French language by its pas, point or personne, rien, route, ni, which bear in themselves this sign of their origin in the trace as you see, because all of these, are words which designate the trace. This is where the action of foreclosure, the symbolic axis of foreclosure is rejected to in French, the ne being reserved for what it is more originally, discordance.

Negation in its origin, in its linguistic root, is something which spreads from the enunciating to the enunciation, as I tried (2) to show you the last time. I tried to show you how it could be represented on this little graph that we are using.

We remained the last time at this putting into place of the terms, of the elements of the dream, that "he did not know that he had died", and it was around this "in consequence of", of the "in consequence of his wish" that we designated the real point of incidence, in so far as the dream both marks the desire and carries it.

It now remains for us to continue to advance in order to ask ourselves how and why such an action is possible, and I had, in finishing, showed the way in which I intended to interrogate this function of desire as it is articulated in Freud, namely specifically at the level of unconscious desire. I intended to question it around this formula which is the one to which everything that we have shown about the structure of this dream, about what it consists in, namely about this confrontation, the subject is an other, a small o on this occasion, the father reappears alive in connection with the dream and in the dream, and is found to be in relationship to the subject, in this relationship whose ambiguities we had begun to question, namely that the one who ensures that the subject charges himself with what we have called the pain of existing, the one whose soul he has seen in its last agony, for whom he had wished death; wished (3) death in so far as nothing is more intolerable than existence reduced to itself; this existence beyond everything which can sustain it, this existence sustained precisely in the abolition of desire.

And we have indicated that by sensing here that in this division, of what I would call intrasubjective functions, which ensures that the subject takes upon himself the pain of the other, rejecting onto the other what he does not know, which is nothing other on this occasion than the subject's own ignorance, the ignorance that it is precisely in the dream-desire that he desires to sustain himself, that he desires to maintain himself, and that here the desire for death takes on its full meaning which is the desire not to wake up, not to wake up to the message, which is precisely the one which is most secret, which is carried by the dream itself, and which is the following: that the subject through the death of his father is from now on wrongly confronted, with what the presence of the father protected him from up to then, namely with this something which is linked to the function of the father, namely this something which is there present in this pain of existing, this something which is the pivotal point around which there turns everything that Freud discovered in the Oedipus complex, namely the X, the signification of castration. Such is the function of castration.

What does it mean to assume castration? Is castration ever really assumed? This sort of point against which have broken the last waves of what Freud called finite or indefinite analysis (4) is what? And up to what point in this dream and in connection with this dream is the analyst not only right, but also in a position, potentially, to be able to interpret it?

It is at this point that at the end of what we were saying the last time about this dream, I had left posed the question: the three ways open to the analyst of reintroducing the "in consequence of his wish", the way that accords with the word of the subject, is in accord with what the subject had wished, and which he remembered perfectly well, which is not at all forgotten, namely that "in consequence of his wish" re-establishes there at the level of the upper line of "in consequence of his wish", re-establishes there at the level of the hidden enunciation of unconscious memory, the traces of the Oedipus complex, of the infantile desire for the death of the father, which is the thing Freud tells us is the capitalist in every formation of the dream, this infantile desire finds its entrepreneur on this occasion in a current desire which has to express itself in the dream, and which is far from being always an unconscious desire.

Is not this "in consequence of his wish" re-established at the level of the infantile desire, something which is found there in short in the position of going in the direction of the dream-desire, because it is a question of interposing at this crucial moment of the subject's life which is realised by the death of the father, because it is a question in the dream of interposing this image of the object and incontestably presents (5) it as the support of a veil, of a perpetual ignorance, of a prop to what was in short up to then the alibi of the desire, because indeed the very function of the prohibition conveyed by the father, is indeed something which gives to desire its enigmatic, even unfathomable form, this something from which the subject finds himself separated, this protection, this defence when all is said and done, which is as Jones very well glimpsed, and we will see today that Jones had some very extraordinary perceptions from certain points of view about this psychic dynamism, this moral pretext never to be affronted in his desire.

Could we not say that the pure and simple interpretation of this oedipal desire is here something which in short attaches itself to some intermediary stage of the interpretation of the dream?

By permitting the subject to do what? Properly speaking this something whose nature you are going to recognise when it is designated as identifying with the aggressor. Is it anything other than the interpretation of oedipal desire, at this level and in these terms: that you had wished for the death of your father at such a date and for such a reason. In your childhood, somewhere in your childhood there is identification to the aggressor. Have you not typically recognised that this is essential, because it is one of the forms of defence? Is it not (6) something which is put forward at the very place where the "in consequence of his wish" is elided? Are the "in consequence" and its meaning not essential for a full interpretation of the dream? There is no doubt about this, apart from the opportunities and the conditions which allow the analyst to get to this point, they will depend on the moments of the treatment, on the context of the response of the subject in dreams, because we know that in analysis the subject responds to the analyst, or at least to what the analyst has become in the transference, by his dreams.

But essentially, I mean in the logical position of the terms, is a question not posed to the "in consequence of his wish", to which we always run the risk of giving some over-hasty form, some over-hasty response, some premature response, some avoidance offered to the subject about what is in question, namely the impasse that he is put in by this fundamental structure which makes of the object of every desire the support of an essential metonymy, and something in which the object of human desire as such is presented in a vanishing form, and of which we can perhaps glimpse that castration is what we could call the final tempering.

Here then we are led to take up at the other end, namely at the one which is not given in dreams, to question more closely what is meant by, what is signified by human desire, and whether this (7) formula, I mean this algorithm, this S confronted, put in the presence of, put face to face with the o, with the object, and in this connection we have introduced into these dream-images, and of the meaning which is revealed to us in them. Is it not something that we cannot attempt to test in the phenomenology of desire, as it is presented to us, curiously enough, of desire which is there, which is there since, which is at the heart of analysts.

This algorithm is not going to be able to lead us together along the path of a questioning which is that of our common experience, of our experience as analysts, of the way in which in the case of the subject, in the subject who is not necessarily or always the neurotic subject regarding whom we have no reason to presume that on this point his structure is not included, because it reveals a more general structure. In any case there is no doubt that the neurotic finds himself situated somewhere along what represents the prolongations, the processes of an experience which for us has a universal value. This indeed in the point around which the whole construction of Freudian doctrine unfolds.

Before entering into a questioning about some of the ways in which this dialectic of the relationships of the subject to his (8) desire have already been tackled, and in particular what I announced above about Jones' thinking, a thinking which remained unfinished and which, as you will see undoubtedly glimpsed something. I would like to refer to something taken from the most ordinary clinical experience, to an example which came to me fairly recently in my experience, and which seems to me to be rather appropriate to introduce what we are trying to illustrate.

It was the case of somebody who was impotent. It is not a bad thing to start from impotence in order to begin to question oneself about what desire is. We are sure in any case that we are at the human level. This was a young person who of course, like many people who are impotent, was not impotent at all. In the course of his existence he had made love very normally and he had had some liaisons. He was married and it was with his wife that it did not work. This is not to be described as impotence because it was precisely localised with respect to the object with whom the subject most wished to have sexual relationships, because he loved his wife. The term does not seem to be appropriate. So here more or less is what emerged at the end of a certain time of analytic work from the remarks of the subject.

It was not that he lacked absolutely all elan, but if he let himself be led on by it one evening, and however unrelated it was to the period of analysis he was currently living through, would he be able to sustain this elan? The conflict brought about by (9) this lack (carence) which he had just gone through had taken matters to extremes. Had he any right to impose again on his wife some new trial, some new mishap in his attempts and in his failures? In short, was this desire which could certainly be felt to be not at all absent, in terms of its presence and in the possibility of its being accomplished, was this desire legitimate? And without being able here to take the reference to this precise case any further, I cannot of course give you the history here for all sorts of reasons, including the fact that it is an analysis that is still in progress, and for many other reasons also, and this is always the problem about alluding to current analyses, I will borrow from other analyses this term which is quite decisive in certain evolutions sometimes leading to deviations, even to what are called perversions which have a greater structural importance, than what operates here openly, as one might say, in the case of impotence.

I will evoke therefore this relationship which from experience appears in certain cases, in the life of subjects, and which comes to light in analysis, an experience which can have a decisive function, but which, as in other places, reveals a structure, the point at which the subject poses himself the question, the problem: Does he have a big enough phallus?

From a certain angle, from a certain point of view, this question (10) just by itself may entail in the subject a whole series of solutions, which by becoming superimposed on one another, by succeeding one another and by adding to one another, may draw him a long way from the field of the normal execution of that for which he has all the elements.

This big enough phallus, or more exactly this phallus which is essential for the subject, is foreclosed at a moment of his experience, and it is something that we rediscover in a thousand forms, not always of course obvious or manifest, latent, but it is precisely in the case in which as Monsieur de La Palice would say, this moment of this phase is open to view, that we can grasp it and touch it, and also understand its import.

We see the subject, I might say, more than once confronting, referring to this something which we must grasp there at the moment of his life, often at the turning point at the awakening of puberty, when he encounters its sign, the subject is then confronted with something which, as such, is of the same order as what we have evoked above: does desire find itself legitimated, sanctioned by something else, and in a certain fashion already what appears here in a flash itself in the phenomenology in which the subject expresses it, the phenomenology in which he expresses it, can be assumed under the following formula: does the subject have or not have the absolute weapon? Because if he (11) does not have the absolute weapon, he is going to find himself drawn into a series of identifications, of alibis, of games of hide-and-seek which I repeat - we cannot develop its dichotomies here any further - can go very far.

The essential is the following: it is that I want to point out to you how desire finds the origin of its ups and downs from the moment that there is a question that the subject has it qua alienated in something which is a sign, in a promise, in an anticipation involving moreover as such a possible loss; how desire is linked to the dialectic of a lack subsumed into a moment which as such is a moment which is not there, any more than the sign on this occasion is a desire.

What desire has to confront, is this fear that it will not maintain itself under its present form, that as an artefact (artifex), if I may thus express myself, it will perish. But of course this artefact which is the desire that man feels, experiences as such, this artefact can only perish with regard to the artifice of his own speech. It is in the dimension of speech that this fear is elaborated, and is stabilised.

It is here that we encounter this term, so surprisingly and so curiously abandoned in analysis, which is the one that Jones put forward as a support for his reflections, and which is called (12) aphanisis. When Jones dwells on, meditates on the phenomenology of castration; a phenomenology which remains as you can see in experience, and in publications, more and more veiled in modern psychoanalytic experience, Jones, at the stage of analysis at which he finds himself confronted with all sorts of tasks which are different from those given by modern experience, a certain relationship to the patient in analysis, which is not the one which has been since reoriented according to other norms to a certain necessity in the interpretation, the exegesis, the apologetics, the explanation of Freud's thought. Jones one might say, tries to find the method, the means of making it understood in connection with the castration complex, that what the subject fears he will be deprived of, is his own desire.

You must not be surprised that this term aphanisis which means that, a disappearance and specifically of desire, in Jones' text you will see that this is what is in question, that this is what he articulates, this term which serves him as an introduction because of a problem which worried the poor man a lot; it is the one about the relationships of the woman to the phallus, a question in which he never managed to find his bearings. Right away he uses this aphanisis to put under the same common denominator the relationships of man and of woman to their (13) desire, which involved him in an impasse, because this is to overlook precisely that these relationships are fundamentally different and simply because this is what Freud discovered, by reason of their asymetry with respect to the signifier phallus.

I think that I have already made you sense this well enough, for us to consider, at least provisionally today, that this is something that has been learned. So that the use of aphanisis, whether it is at the origin of the invention, or whether it is merely its consequence, marks in a way a sort of inflection which is short directs its author away from what is the real question, namely what is signified in the structure of the subject by this possibility of aphanisis? Namely does it not force us precisely towards a structuring of the human subject precisely as such, in so far as it is a subject for whom existence can be supposed and is supposed beyond desire, a subject who ex-sists, which sub-sists outside what is his desire.

The question is not of knowing whether we have to take into account objectively desire in its most radical form, the desire to live, the life instincts as we say. The question is quite different, it is what analysis shows us, shows us as being brought into play in the life of the subject; it is this very thing, I mean that it is not only that human life is sustained, (14) which of course we are not doubting, by desire, but that the human subject takes it into account, as I might say, that he counts on this desire as such,^ that he is afraid if I may express myself in this way, that the elan vital, this beloved elan vital, this charming incarnation - we would be right here to talk about the anthropomorphism of human desire in nature - that precisely this famous élan with which we try to sustain this nature about which we do not understand very much, the fact is that when it is a question of himself, the human subject sees this élan vital in front of him, he is afraid that he will lack it.

Just by itself this clearly suggests all the same the idea that we would do well to have some structural exigencies, because after all it is a question here of something other than reflections of the unconscious (sic); I mean of this subject-object relationship which is imminent in the pure dimension of knowledge, and that once we are dealing with desire, as moreover is proved to us by experience, I mean Freudian experience, this is all the same going to pose us slightly more complicated problems.

In effect we can, because we started with impotence, go to the other extreme. If impotence fears neither potency nor impotence, the human subject in the presence of his desire also (15) manages to satisfy it, he comes to anticipate it as satisfied. It is also very remarkable to see these cases where, when he is able to satisfy it, namely when he is not affected by impotence, the subject dreads the satisfaction of his desire, and it is most often that in his turn he dreads the satisfaction of his desire as making it depend in future precisely on the man or woman who is going to satisfy it, namely on the other.

The phenomenological fact is a common one, it is even the habitual text of human experience. There is no need to go to the great dramas which have been taken as the example and illustration of this problematic, to see how a biography throughout its whole duration spends its time unfolding in a successive avoidance of what has always been punctuated in it as the most pregnant desire.

Where is this dependence on the other, this dependence on the other which in fact is the form and the phantasy in which there is presented what the subject dreads, and which makes him deviate from the satisfaction of his desire? It is perhaps not simply what one could call the fear of the caprice of the other, this caprice which, I do not know if you are aware of it, is not very much related with the popular etymology, that of the Larousse dictionary which refers it to the goat (chèvre) and to the chameleon. Caprice, capriccio, means shudder in Italian, from (16) which we have borrowed it; is nothing other than the same word so beloved by Freud, which is called sichsträuben, to bristle up. And you know that throughout his whole work, it is one of the metaphorical forms in which for Freud there is incarnated at every turn, I am talking about the most concrete remarks, when he speaks about his wife, when he speaks about Irma, when he talks in general about the subject who is resisting, it is one of the forms in which he incarnates in the most tangible fashion his appreciation of resistance. It is not so much the way that the subject is essentially dependent.

because he represents the other as such in terms of his caprice; it is precisely, and this is what is veiled, that the other does not mark this caprice with signs and there is not a sufficient sign of the goodwill of the subject, except the totality of signs in which he subsists, that in fact there is no other sign of the subject except the sign of his abolition as subject.

It is this that is written as follows: $S(0)$; this shows you that in short as regards his desire man is not in the truth, because however little or however much courage he demonstrates, the situation escapes radically from him; that in any case this vanishing, this something which someone who after may last seminar called, when he was speaking with me afterwards, this umbilication of the subject at the level of his willing, and I (17) accept very willingly this image of what I wanted to make you see in terms of the I in the presence of the object o , all the more so because it is strictly in conformity with what Freud designates when he speaks about the dream, the point of convergence of all the signifiers, in which the dream finally is implicated so much in what he calls himself the unknown, has not recognised that this Unbekannte, a very strange term for Freud to use, is precisely only this point by which I tried to indicate to you what constituted the radical difference of the Freudian unconscious, which it is not that it is constituted, that it is established as unconscious, simply in the dimension of the innocence of the subject with respect to the signifier which organises it, which is articulated in his place. It is that there is in this relationship of the subject to the signifier this essential impasse, this one, and I have just reformulated that there is no other sign of the subject than the sign of his abolition as subject.

You can well imagine that matters do not stop there, because after all if it were only a question of an impasse as it is said, that would not take us very far. The fact is that it is precisely the property of impasses to be fruitful, and this impasse is only of interest in that it shows us what it develops in terms of ramifications which are precisely those in which effectively desire is going to become engaged. Let us try to see this.

(18) This aphanisis, there is a moment to which it is necessary that in your experience, I mean this experience in so far as it is not simply the experience of your analysis, but also the experience of the mental modes in which you are led to think about this experience at the point of the Oedipus complex where it appears in a flash, which is when you are told that in the inverted Oedipus complex, namely at the moment when the subject glimpses the solution to the oedipal conflict in the fact of purely and simply drawing to himself the love of the more powerful one, namely of the father, the subject escapes, we are told, in so far as his narcissism is here threatened, in so far as he receives this love of the father which for him involves castration.

This is self-evident, because of course when one cannot resolve a problem, one considers it to be comprehensible, this is what ensures that usually it is not all the same as clear as it appears, that the subject links this moment of a possible solution, a solution all the more possible since in part it will be the way that is taken because the introjection of the father under the form of the ego ideal, is indeed something which resembles it. There is a participation of the so-called inverted function of the Oedipus complex in the normal solution, that there is all the same a moment that is highlighted in a series of experiences, of perceptions, especially in the (19) problematic of homosexuality where the subject feels this love of the father as essentially threatening, as involving this threat which we will qualify, for want of being able to give it a more appropriate term, and after all this term is not all that inappropriate, in analysis terms have happily kept enough of their meaning and fullness in terms of their dense, weighty, and concrete character, for this to be when all is said and done what directs us. One can sense, one can pick up that narcissism is involved somewhere, and that this narcissism is involved at this moment of the Oedipus complex.

Above all this will be confirmed for us by the subsequent pathways of the dialectic, when the subject has been drawn along the paths of homosexuality. These are, as you know, much more complex of course than being a pure and simple summary exigency for the presence of the phallus in the object, but fundamentally it is concealed here.

It is not this that I want to get involved in. Only this introduces us to this proposition that to face up to this suspension of desire, at the very origin of the problem of the signifier, the subject is going to have before him more than one trick, if I can put things that way. These tricks are of course essentially concerned first of all with the manipulation of the object, of the o in the formula. This capture of the object in the dialectic of the relationships of the subject and the signifier should not be put at the origin of all the (20) articulations of the relationship that I tried to perform with you these last years, because one sees it everywhere all the time. Is there any need to remind you of this moment in the life of little Hans where he asks himself about every object: does it or does it not have a phallus? It is enough first of all to have a child perceive this essential function in all its forms which can be clearly seen there. In the case of little Hans it is a question of the widdler, of the Wiwimacher. You know at what period and in what connection and at what moment, at the age of two, this question is posed for him in connection with every object, defining a sort of analysis which Freud incidentally indicates as a mode of interpretation of this form.

This of course is not a position which in any way only expresses the presence of the phallus in the dialectic. This gives us no information whatsoever, either about the usage, the end which at one time I tried to make you see, or the stability of the procedure. What I want simply to point out to you, is that all the time we have evidence, that we are not going astray namely that the terms in question are indeed the following: the subject, and this because of his disappearance, his confrontation with an object, something which from time to time reveals itself as being the essential signifier around which is played out the fate of (21) this whole relationship of subject to object, and now rapidly to evoke in what sense, in the most general sense, there is directed this incidence concerning the object, I mean the small o of our algorithm, from the point of view of what could be called instinctual specificity from the point of view of need.

We already know what happens in an impossible relationship, rendered impossible as one might say to the object by the presence, by the intervention of the signifier, in so far as the subject has to maintain himself there in the presence of the object. It is quite clear that the human object undergoes this sort of volatilisation which is what we call in our concrete practice the possibility of displacement, which does not simply mean the human subject, like all animal subjects, sees his desire being displaced from object to object, but that this very displacement is the point at which there can be maintained the fragile equilibrium of his desire.

After all, what is in question? It is a question I would say of envisaging from a certain point of view the prevention of satisfaction while still continuing to hold onto an object of desire. In a way it is again a mode as one might say of metonymically symbolising satisfaction, and here we are led straight away to the dialectic of the money box and the miser. It is far from being the most complicated one, even though one can scarcely see what is in question. The fact is that it is (22) necessary that desire should subsist on this occasion, by a certain retention of the object as we say, bringing into play the anal metaphor. But it is in so far as this retained object is not itself the object of any other jouissance, that we can see that juridical phenomenology carries the traces of this retention of the support of desire: it is said that one has the enjoyment (jouissance) of a good; what does that mean, if it is not precisely that it is humanly quite conceivable to have a good which one does not enjoy, and that it is someone else who enjoys it? Here the object reveals its function of what one might call a pledge or even indeed a hostage of desire, and if you would like me here to bridge the gap with animal psychology, I will evoke what has been said in terms of ethology, by one of our more exemplary, one of our more graphic brothers. For my part I am very inclined to believe it. I recognised myself, I met myself, in someone who has just published a small book. I was not going to say it to you because this is going to distract you. This booklet has just come out, it is called L'ordre des choses. Luckily it is a small book, written by Jacques Brosset, someone who up to this has been completely unknown, and it is published by Plon.

It is a kind of little natural history. That is how I interpret (23) it for you. A little natural history geared to our time. I mean that:

1. It restores for us what is so subtle and so charming in the writings of Buffon, and which we no longer find in any scientific publication, even though all the same we could try this exercise now that we know much more about the behaviour, about the ethology of animals, than Buffon knew. In specialist journals it is unreadable.
2. What is said in this little book, you will see expressed in what I would call a very very remarkable style. You will read especially something in the middle which is called: "parallel lives", the life of the cicada, the life of the ant.

I thought about this little book, because the author has this in common with me that for him the question of mammals has been resolved. Apart from man, who is an essentially problematical mammal, you have only to see the role that the mammmae play in our imagination, among mammals there is apart from man only one really serious mammal, and this is the hippopotamus. Every one agrees on this, if they are sensitive at all. The poet T.S. Eliot who has really bad metaphysical ideas, but who is all the same a great poet, at a first attempt symbolised the Church militant by the hippopotamus. We will come back to this later.

(24) Let us return to the hippopotamus. What does this hippopotamus do? The difficulties of his existence are underlined for us. They are great, it seems, and one of the essential things, is that he protects the domain of his pasturage, because it is necessary all the same that in the long run he should have some resources in reserve. This is an essential point: therefore he maps out what one can call his territory delimiting it by a series of relays, of points which should sufficiently mark for those who ought to recognise it, namely his fellows, that this is his. This is to show you that I know very well that there are the beginnings of symbolic activity in animals. As you see, in the mammal it is a very specially excremental symbolism.

If in short the hippopotamus is found to protect his pasturage with his excrement, we find that the progress realised by man, and in fact this would really not have arisen, if we did not have this particular mediation of language, which comes from we know not where, but it is what causes to intervene here the essential complication, namely that it has led us to this problematic relationship with the object, that for man on his part it is not his pasturage that he protects with shit; therefore it is his shit that he protects as a pledge of the essential pasturage, (25) of the pasturage which is essentially to be determined, and this is the dialectic of what is called anal symbolism, of this new revelation of the chymical wedding, if I can express myself thus, of man with his object which is one of the dimensions revealed to us by Freudian experience which was absolutely unsuspected up to then.

After all I simply wanted to indicate to you here the direction in which, and why there appears something in short which is the same question that in his polemic with Proudhon, Marx, without resolving it, and of which we are able all the same to give a little account (époque) by way of explanation, how it happens that human objects pass from having a use value to an exchange value. You should read this piece of Marx, because it is a good mental education. It is called Philosophie de la misère, misère de la philosophie. It addressed to Proudhon, and the several pages during which he mocks poor Proudhon, for having decreed that this passage from one to the other is brought about by a sort of pure decree of cooperators and it is a question of knowing why they have become cooperators and with what purpose in view. The way in which Marx savages him for a good twenty or thirty pages, without taking the rest of the book into account, is something that is healthy and educative for the mind.

(26) Here therefore everything which happens to the object, of course, and the meaning of this volatilisation, of this valorisation which is also a dévalorisation of the object, I mean the extraction of the object from the field of pure and simple need, this is something which after all is only a reminder of the essential phenomenology, of the phenomenology of the good properly speaking, and picture this in every sense of the word good.

But let us leave this for the moment today simply in its initial stages. Let us simply say that from the moment that what is involved as object is the other, is others, is especially the sexual partner, this of course brings in its train a certain number of consequences. They are all the more tangible when we were dealing above with the social plane. It is quite certain here that what is in question is at the very basis of the social contract, in so far as it has to take into account the elementary structures of thinking, in so far as the feminine partner in a form which is not all that obvious and which involves an exchange, is here, as Lévi-Strauss has shown us, an object of exchange. This exchange is not self-evident. In fact we could say that as an object of exchange, the woman is as one might say, a very bad bargain for those who carry out the operation, because all of this also engages us in what one might call this real (27) mobilisation, of what is called the loan, the hiring of the services of the phallus. We are naturally putting ourselves here in the perspective of social utilitarianism, and this as you know, is not without its difficulties. And it is even from these that I started above.

That in this the woman undergoes a very disturbing transformation from the moment that she is included in this dialectic, namely as a socialised object, this is something about which it is very amusing to see how Freud can talk in the innocence of his youth, on page 192-193 of Vol. I of Jones. The way in which, in connection with the talk about the emancipation of women in Mill, whom as you know Freud translated at one time, as the request of Gomperz in which Mill discusses the theme of emancipation and concerning which in a letter to his fiancée herself he puts forward to her what a woman, a good woman, is for. This letter is highly entertaining, when one thinks that he was at the height of his passion, and it ends up with the fact that a woman should stay in her place and perform all the services which are no different from the famous: "Kinder, Kirche, Kuche".

I think of this time when he eventually seemed to be willing to make himself the of his wife. And the text ends on a passage which I should read for you in English, because this text has never been published in any other language:

"Law and custom have much to give women that has been withheld from them, but the position of women will surely be what it is: In youth an adored darling" - an adorable little ornament, a heavenly piece of porcelain - "and in mature years a loved wife" (Jones 1st 193)

Here is something which is not at all without interest for us and which shows us the experience from which Freud began, and also helps us to see how far he had to go.

The other possible aspect, it is not for nothing that we have entered here into the social dialectic, the fact is that in face of this problematical position, there is another solution for the subject. The other solution for the subject, we have it also from Freud: it is identification, identification with what? Identification with the father, identification with the father why? I already pointed it out to you: in so far as he is the one who in some way is perceived as being the one who has succeeded in really overcoming this impossible bind, namely the one who is thought to have really castrated the mother, I would say who is thought, because of course he is thought, and because moreover there is here something which essentially presents itself. This is where the problematic of the father lies, (29) and perhaps if I come back to insist so much on it today, it is because it is along the lines of something that was discussed last night at our scientific meeting, namely precisely the function of the father, the lordship of the father, the imaginary function of the father in certain spheres of culture.

It is certain that there is here a problematic which allows every sort of slippage as a possibility, because what must be seen, is that the solution prepared here is, as one might say, a direct solution: the father is already a type, in the proper sense of the term, a type present no doubt with temporal variations. We would not be so interested in the fact that such variations may not exist, except for the fact that we cannot conceive the thing in this case otherwise than in its relationships with an imaginary function, by denying the relationship of the subject to the father, this identification to the ideal of the father, thanks to which perhaps when all is said and done, we can say that, on average, wedding nights succeed and turn out rather well, even though the statistics have never been done in a strictly rigorous fashion.

This is obviously linked to what is de facto given, but also to the imaginary data, and does nothing to resolve the problematic for us nor indeed of course for our patients and perhaps on this

(30) point we are indistinguishable, it does nothing to resolve for us the problematic of desire. We are going to see in fact that this identification to the image of the father is only a particular case of what we must now tackle as being the most general solution, I mean in the relationships, in this confrontation of /with the o of the object; the introduction in the most general form in the imaginary function; the support, the solution, the way to a solution which the dimension of narcissism offers to the subject, which means that human eros is engaged in a particular relationship with a particular image, which is nothing other than a particular relationship to his own body, and in which there is going to be produced this exchange, this inversion in which I am going to try to articulate for you the way in which the problem of the confrontation of $ with the o appears. N

It is on this point that we will take things up again, because it is already a quarter to two, after the holidays. I will take things up again on the 7th January, because today I was not able to advance things any further. You will see how in connection with this little o that we are going finally to have the opportunity of specifying in its essence, in its function, namely the essential nature of the human object in so far as I already introduced it for you at length in the previous seminars, every human object is fundamentally marked by a narcissistic structure, (31) by this profound relationship with narcissistic eros♦

How this human object qua marked by this, is found in the more general structure of the phantasy, to receive normally the most essential of the Ansätzen of the subject, namely neither more nor less than his affect in the presence of desire, this fear, this immanence in which I designated for you above the thing which of its essence maintains the subject at the edge of his desire? The whole nature of phantasy is to transfer it onto the object.

This we will see in studying, in taking up again a certain number of phantasies whose dialectic we have developed up to now, and even if it is only starting from a fundamental one, because it was one of the first to be discovered, from this phantasy: "A child is being beaten", in which you will see the most essential traits of this transference of the affect of the subject, in the presence of his desire, onto his object qua narcissistic. Inversely what becomes the subject, the point at which he structures himself; why he structures himself as ego and ego ideal. This cannot after all be revealed to you, namely be seen by you in its absolutely rigorous structural necessity, except as being the return, the sending back of this delegation that the subject made of his affect, to this object, to that o, which we (32) have never yet really spoken about, as being what is returned: I mean how he must himself necessarily pose himself, not as o, but as the image of o, the image of the other, which is one and the same thing as the ego, this image of the other being marked by this index, by a capital I, by an ego ideal in so far as it is itself heir to a first relationship of the subject, not with his desire, but with the desire of his mother, the ideal taking the place of that which, in the subject, was experienced as belonging to a desired child.

This necessity, this development, is that by which he comes to be inscribed in a certain tracing, formation of the algorithm which I can already write on the board to introduce it to you for the next time: $I(o) \quad (I) \quad O \quad o \quad (S)$. In a certain relationship with the other, in so far as he is affected by an other, namely of the subject himself, in so far as he is affected by his desire. This we will see the next time.

Seminar 7: 7 January 1959

...This experience confronts us between that which in the subject we must call desire, and the function in the constitution of this desire, in the manifestation of this desire, in the contradictions which during treatments break out between the discourse of the subject and his behaviour. A distinction, which I say is essential, between desire and demand.

If there is something which not just the original data, the Freudian discourse, but precisely all the development of the Freudian discourse holds subsequently, namely the contradictions which are going to appear, it is above all about the problematic character that demand plays in it, because after all everything by which the development of analysis has been directed since Freud has granted more and more importance to what has been given different names and which in the final analysis converges towards a general notion of neurosis, of dependency, namely what has been hidden, what has been veiled behind this formula. It is indeed the accent put by a sort of convergence of the theory and its slippages, and its failures, and also of the practice, namely a certain conception concerning the reduction which is to be obtained by therapy. This indeed is what is hidden behind the notion of neurosis, of dependency.

The fundamental fact of the demand with its imprinting, restraining, oppressing effects on the subject who is there and of whom it is precisely a question of seeing whether with regard to this function which we reveal as being formative, according to the formation of the genesis of the subject, whether we are adopting the correct attitude, I mean the one which in the final analysis is going to be justified. Namely the elucidation on the one hand and the removal at the same time of the symptom. It is in fact clear that if the symptom is not simply something which we should consider as being the legacy of a sort of (2) subtraction, of suspension which is called frustration, if it is not simply a sort of deformation of the subject, however he is envisaged, under the influence of something which is measured out in function of a certain relationship to the real - as I have said it is always to something real that an imaginary frustration is referred - if it is not that, if between what we discover effectively in analysis as its results, its consequences, its effects, indeed its lasting effects, its impressions of frustrations and the symptom there is something else, involving an infinitely more complex dialectic, and which is called desire; if desire is something which can only be grasped and understood at the most tightly knotted point, not from some impressions left by the real, but at the most subtle point where there is knotted together, for the real man, the imaginary and its symbolic meaning. Which is precisely what I tried to show. And this is why the relationship of desire to phantasy is expressed here in the intermediary field between the two structural lines of every signifying enunciation.

(3) If desire is really here, if it is from here what we can call metaphorical phenomena begin, namely the interference of a repressed signifier on a patent signifier which constitutes the symptom, it is clear that one misses the whole point by not trying to structure, to organise, to situate the place of desire. This we began to do this year by taking a dream which I dwelt on for a long time, a singular dream, a dream which Freud highlighted on two occasions, I mean included secondarily in the Traumdeutung after having given it a particular and very useful place in the article: "The two principles of mental functioning", desire and the reality principle, an article published in 1911. This dream is the one about the apparition of the dead father. We have tried to situate its elements on the double chain whose structural distinction I showed and articulated at length in what can be called the graph of the inscription of the elementary biological subject, of the subject of need, in the defiles of the demand. I set out for you how we should consider this fundamentally twofold articulation in so far as it is never a demand for some thing, in so far as in the background of every specific demand, of every demand for satisfaction, the very fact of language, by symbolising the other - the other as presence and as absence - as being able to be the subject of the gift of love that he gives by his presence, and by his presence alone, I mean in so far as he gives nothing else, namely in so far as precisely what he gives is beyond everything that he can give, that what he gives is precisely this nothing which is everything in the determination of this presence-absence.

We have articulated this dream by referring it in a didactic

(4) fashion to this duplicity of signs, to something which allows us to grasp in the structure of the dream the relationship which is established by this phantasy-production whose structure Freud tried to elucidate throughout the majestic life of the Traumdeutung, and we are trying to see its function, for this son who is mourning for a father who was certainly loved, watched over until the end of his final agony, whom he resurrects in conditions which the dream articulates with an exemplary simplicity: namely that this father appears as he was when he was alive, that he speaks, and that before him the son is mute, dumbstruck, constrained, in the grip of pain - the pain, he says, of thinking that his father had died and that he does not know it. Freud tells us, it must be completed. He had died, in accordance with his wish. What was it that he did not know? That it was in accordance with his wish.

Everything therefore is here, and if we try to enter more closely into the construction, the structure of this dream, we notice the following: that the subject confronts himself with a certain image and under certain conditions. I would say that between what is assumed in the dream by the subject, and this image to which he confronts himself, a distribution, a division is established which is going to show us the essence of the phenomenon.

We have already tried to articulate it, to circumscribe it as I might say, by dividing up on the signifying scale the signifying, characteristic themes. On the upper line, the "he did not know", which is in its essence an essentially subjective reference which goes to the foundation of the structure of the subject. "He did not know", as such, does not concern anything factual. It is something which involves the depths, the dimension of the subject; and we know that here it is ambiguous. Namely that what he did not know, we are going to see, is not solely and purely attributable to the one to whom it is implied, paradoxically, absurdly, in a way which involves contradictory reasoning, and even in a way which is nonsensical for the one who (5) is dead, just as much as it in the subject. And he participates in this ignorance. This something precisely is essential.

Moreover, see how the subject situates himself in what I might call the suspension of the articulation of the dream. The subject himself, as he situates himself, as he assumes himself, knows as one might say, because the other does not know, the subjective position of the other. And here of being in default as one might say. That he is dead, of course, is a statement that after all cannot touch him. Every symbolic expression like this one, of the being dead, makes him subsist, preserves him when all is said and done. It is precisely indeed the paradox of this symbolic position: the fact is that there is no being to being, no affirmation of the being dead which in a certain fashion does not immortalise him. And this indeed is what is in question in the dream. But this subjective position of the being who is in default, this subjective lesser value, is not directed at the fact that he is dead, it is essentially directed at the fact that he is the one who does not know. This is how the subject situates himself before the other. In addition this sort of protection exercised with respect to the other which means that not only does he not know, but that at the limit I would say that he must not be told that, is something which is always found more or less at the root of every communication between people, what one can and what one cannot let him know. Here is something whose incidence you should always weigh every time you are dealing with an analytic discourse. There was some talk last night about those who could not speak, express themselves, about the obstacles, about the resistances that are (6) properly speaking involved in discourse. This dimension is essential to relate this dream to another dream which is borrowed from the last page of Trotsky's Journal at the end of his stay in France at the beginning of the last war I think. It is a particularly moving dream. It is at the moment when, perhaps for the first time, Trotsky begins to experience in himself the first intimations of some diminution of the vital energy which was so inexhaustible in this man. And he sees appearing in a dream his companion Lenin, who congratulates him on his good health, and on his indomitable character. And the other, in a fashion which takes its value from this ambiguity that there always exists in dialogue, gives him to understand that perhaps this time there is something in him which is not now at the same level that his old companion had always known. But what he thinks about, is how to spare this old companion who emerges in this way in such a significant fashion at a critical, decisive moment of his vital evolution. And wanting to recall something which precisely referred to the moment when even he, Lenin, had slackened in his efforts, he says, to indicate to him the moment when he died: the time when you were very very ill. As if a precise formulation of what was in question would by its very breath, dissipate the shade before whom Trotsky, in his dream at this decisive moment of his existence, maintains himself.

Now then, if on the one hand, in this division between the two forms that are confronted, ignorance is imposed on the other to whom it is imputed, how can we not see that inversely there is something there which is nothing other than the ignorance of the subject himself who does not know. Not just what the signification of his dream is, namely everything that underpins (7) it, in terms of what Freud evokes, namely his unconscious history, the old deadly wishes against his father, but much more that it is the nature of the very pain in which at this moment the subject participates, namely this pain - which in searching for its paths and its origin we have recognised as the pain that was experienced, glimpsed in the sharing of the father's last moments - of existence as such, in so far as it subsists at the limit in this state where nothing more of it can be apprehended, the fact of the inextinguishable character of this very existence, of the fundamental pain which accompanies it when all desire has been effaced from it, when all desire has vanished from it.

It is precisely this pain which the subject assumes, but as being a pain which he also gives an absurd motive to, because he motivates it uniquely by the ignorance of the other, by something which when all is said and done if one looks very closely at it is no more a motive of what it accompanies as motivation than the emergence, the affect, in a hysterical crisis which is organised apparently from a context into which it is extrapolated, but which in fact is not motivated by it.

This pain, it is precisely by taking it on himself that the subject blinds himself to its proximity, to the fact that in the agony and in the death of his father it is something which threatens himself that he has lived through and from which he now separates himself by this image which is re-evoked, this image which attaches him to this something which separates and which calms man, in this sort of abyss or vertigo which opens up before him every time he is confronted with the final term of his (8) existence. That is to say precisely what he needs to interpose between himself and this existence, namely on this occasion a desire. He does not cite just any support for his desire, just any desire, but the closest and the most urgent, the best one, the one which has dominated him for a long time, the one which has now struck him down. It has to be brought to life imaginarily for a certain time, because in this rivalry with the father, in what is there in terms of a foundation of power in the fact that after all he triumphs, because of the fact that the other does not know, while he does know, here is the slender footbridge thanks to which the subject does not experience himself as being directly invaded, directly overwhelmed, because the gap, the pure and simple confrontation with the anxiety of death which opens up before him, such that we know in fact that the death of the father, every time it occurs, is experienced by the subject as the disappearance - in a cruder language - of this sort of shield, of interposition, of substitution that the father is for the absolute master, namely for death.

One begins to see being outlined here a sort ofwhich is constituted by what? The formula which I am trying to present to you as being the fundamental formula for what constitutes the support, the essential intrasubjective relationship in which every desire must as such be inscribed, is in this simplest form, the one which is inscribed here, this relationship separated out in the quadrilateral relationship, that of Schema L, that of the subject to the big Other in so far as this partially unconscious discourse which comes from the big Other comes to interpose itself in him. The tension $o o'$, that one can still in certain relationships call the tension of the image of o with respect to o' ; according to whether it is a question of the relationship jUo , of the subject to the object, of the relationship of the image of o with respect to the Other', (9) in so far as it structures this relationship. It is precisely the absent (?) which, as being characteristic of the relationship of desire to the relationship of the subject with the imaginary functions, which is expressed in the formula $$ \diamond o$, in this sense that desire as such, and with respect to every possible object for man, poses for him the question of his subjective elision. I mean that in so far as the subject, in the register, in the dimension of the word, in so far as he inscribes himself there qua demander, to approach this something which is the more elaborated, the more evolved object, that which more or less appropriately the analytic conception presents us as being the object of oblativity - this notion the difficulties of which I have often stressed, it is with this too that we are trying to confront ourselves, that we are trying to formulate in a more rigorous fashion - the subject, to the degree that as desire, namely in the fullness of a human destiny which is the destiny of a speaking subject, in approaching this object finds himself caught up in this sort of impasse which means that he himself can not reach this object, as object, except in some way by finding himself as subject, subject of the word, either in this lesion which leaves him in the darkness of trauma, in what is properly speaking beyond anxiety itself, or by finding himself having to take the place, to substitute himself, to subsume himself under a certain signifier which is found - I am purely and simply articulating it for the moment, I am not justifying it because it is our whole development which must justify it, and the whole of psychoanalytic experience is there to justify it - to be the phallus.

It is from this that by the fact that in every assumption of the mature position, of the position that we call genital, something is produced at the level of the imaginary which is called (10) castration, and has its incidence at the level of the imaginary. Why? Because the phallus, among other things - it is only in this perspective that we can understand the whole almost infinite problematic that the fact gave rise to, and it is impossible to get out of otherwise - the question of the phallic phase for analysts, the contradiction, the Freud-Jones dialogue on this ^subject which is particularly pathetic, this whole sort of impasse into which Jones enters when, rebelling against the oversimple conception which Freud constructed of the phallic function as being the univocal term around which there pivots the whole concrete, historical development of sexuality in man and in woman, he highlights what he calls the defensive functions that are linked to this image of the phallus. When all is said and done both one and the other are saying the same thing, they approach it from different points of view. They cannot meet one another undoubtedly because of the lack of this central, fundamental notion, which requires that we should conceive the phallus as being, on this occasion, taken away, withdrawn as one might say, from the imaginary community, from the diversity, from the multiplicity of images that corporal functions come to assume, and isolated in the face of all the others in this privileged function which makes of it the signifier of the subject.

Here let us clarify still more our position and let us say the following: that in short on the two planes, which are the first immediate, apparent, spontaneous plane which is the appeal, which is the "Help!", which is "Food!", which is a cry when all is said and done, which is in any case something where, in the most complete fashion, the subject is for a moment identical with this need, all the same must articulate himself at the soliciting (11) level of the demand, which it is found in the first relationship, in the experience between the child and the mother, a function of what is articulated and which will be of course more and more articulated in the relationship of the child to the mother, with everything which will be substituted for it from the totality of the society which speaks his own tongue. Between this level and the votive level, namely where the subject, throughout the course of his life, has to rediscover himself, namely has to discover what has escaped him because being beyond, outside everything, that the form of language more and more, and in the measure that it develops, allows to pass, allows to be filtered, rejects, represses that which at first tended to be expressed, namely from his need. This articulation at the second degree is that which as a being precisely shaped, transformed by his word, namely this attempt, this effort to pass beyond this transformation itself, this is what we are doing in analysis, and that is why one can say that just as everything that resides, of what must be articulated, at the soliciting level is there at 0, as a predetermined account, pre-existing the experience of the subject, as being that which in the other is open to the operations of language, to the first signifying homeland that the subject experiences in so far as he learns to speak.

What are we doing in analysis? What do we encounter, what do we recognise when we say that the subject is at the oral stage, the anal stage, etc.,... nothing other than what is expressed in this mature form whose complete element must not be forgotten: namely that it is the subject qua marked by the word and in a certain relationship with his demand; it is literally this that in one or other interpretation in which we make him sense the oral, anal or other structuring of his demand we do not simply make him (12) recognise the anal character of the demand, we confront the subject with this anal or oral character, we are not interested simply in something which is immanent in what we articulate as being the demand of the subject, we confront the subject with this structure of his demand. And it is here precisely that the accentuation of our interpretation should balance, oscillate, vacillate. Because accentuated in a certain way we teach him to recognise something which as one might say, is at this superior, votive level, the level of what he wants, of what he wishes, in so far as they are unconscious. We teach him as one might say to speak, to recognise himself in what corresponds to at this level. But for all that we do not give him the answers. By maintaining interpretation entirely in this register of the recognition of the hidden unconscious signifying supports in his demand, we are doing nothing other if we forget what is in question, namely to confront the subject with his demand, we do not perceive that what we produce is precisely the collapse, the effacing of the function of the subject as such in the revelation of this unconscious vocabulary. We solicit the subject to efface himself and to disappear. And this is well and truly what happens in many cases. That is to say that in a certain apprenticeship that one can undergo in the analysis of the unconscious, in a certain fashion what disappears, what flees, what is more and more reduced is nothing other than this exigency which is that of the subject to manifest himself in his being beyond all of this; by bringing him back incessantly to the level of the demand one ends up indeed in some way - and this is what is called in a certain technique of the analysis of resistances - (13) by purely and simply reducing what is his desire.

Now if it is simple and easy to see that in the relationship of the subject to the other, the response is made retroactively and somewhere other than here: something turns back on the subject to confirm him in the sense of the demand, to identify it on occasion to his own demand, it is also clear at the level at which the subject tries to situate himself, to recognise himself precisely in what he is beyond this demand that there is a place for the response; that this place for the response schematised there by S signifier of 0 barred, namely the reminder that the other is himself also marked by the signifier, that the other is himself also abolished in a certain fashion in the discourse, this is only to indicate a theoretical point and we will see later the form it must take. This form is essentially, precisely the recognition of what is castrated in everything which, because it is a living being, attempts to approach the living being as it is evoked by language. And of course it is not at all this level that we can at first reply.

But on the contrary, to respect, to aim at, to explore, to use what is already expressed beyond this locus of the response in the subject, and which is represented by the situation of the imaginary in which he himself establishes himself, maintains himself, suspends himself as if in a sort of position which undoubtedly participates from certain points of view in the artifices of defence, this indeed is what constitutes the ambiguity of so many manifestations of desire, of perverse desire for example.

It is the degree that something is expressed here that is the most essential point in which the being of the subject attempts to affirm itself. And this is all the more important to consider because it is precisely there, at this very locus that there should be produced what we so easily call the completed (14) object, genital maturation; in other words everything that will constitute, as Mr. Jones biblically expresses it somewhere, the relationships of man and woman, will find itself, because man is a speaking subject, marked by the structural difficulties which are those expressed in the relationship of the $ with the o.

Why? Because precisely if one can say that up to a certain moment, a certain state, a certain time in development, the vocabulary, the code of demand can pass through a certain number of relationships, which involve an interchangeable object, namely food for the oral relationship, excrement for the anal relationship - to limit ourselves for the moment to these two when it is a question of the genital relationship it is quite evident that it is only by a kind of imprint, of prolongation, of this signifying fragmentation of the subject in the relationship in the demand that something can appear to us, and appears to us in effect, but in a morbid guise, in the guise of all these symptomatic incidences; namely the phallus. For a very good and simple reason, that the phallus is well and truly not this interchangeable object, that it only becomes it by its passage to the rank of signifier, and that everything that is involved in a complete genital maturation reposes on the fact that everything that, in the subject, should present itself as being here the completion of his desire is indeed to put matters clearly, something which cannot be demanded.

And the essence of neurosis, and what we have to deal with, consists precisely in the fact that what cannot be demanded on this level is precisely what the neurotic demands. Or the (15) neurotic phenomenon, namely what appears in a more or less sporadic fashion in the evolution of all the subjects who participate in the structure of neurosis, consists precisely - one always discovers this structure - in the fact that what is of the order of desire is inscribed, is formulated, in the register of demand.

In the course of a re-reading of Mr. Jones that I was carrying out recently, I took up again everything that he wrote about; what he brings forward at every moment from his very subtle, very direct experience is very striking.

"I could relate cases of a number of male patients whose failure to achieve manhood - in relation to either men or women - was strictly to be correlated with their attitude of needing first to acquire something from women, something which of course they never actually could acquire." "Why?", asks Mr. Jones. And when he says why in his article and in its context it is a real why, he does not know why, but he notes it, he punctuates it as a point on the horizon, an opening, a perspective, a point at which guide-rails are lacking. "Why should imperfect access to the nipple give a boy the sense of imperfect possession of his own penis? I am quite convinced that the two things are intimately related, although the logical connection between them is certainly not obvious." (The phallic phase, 580) In any case not obvious to him.

At every moment we find these details in the most graphic phenomenology. I mean the necessary sequences through which a (16) subject slips, in order to arrive at the full activity of his desire, the preliminaries which are necessary for him. We can reconstitute it, rediscover what I will call the labyrinthic pathways on which are marked the essential fact of the position that the subject has taken in this reference, in this relationship which is structural for him, between desire and demand. And if the maintaining of the incestuous position in the unconscious is something which has a meaning, and which effectively has consequences, which are destructive in different ways of the manifestations of desire, of the accomplishment of the desire of the subject, it is precisely for no other reason than the following: it is that what the so-called incestuous position preserves somewhere in the unconscious, is precisely this position of demand.

The subject at a moment, it is said, and this is how Mr. Jones expresses it, has to choose between his incestuous object and his sex. If he wants to preserve one he must renounce the other. I would say that what he has to choose between and what he has to choose at this initial moment, is between his demand and his desire.

Let us now take up, after these general indications, the path into which I want to introduce you to show you the common measure there is in this structuring of desire, and how effectively it finds itself implicated. The imaginary elements, in so far as they they must be inflected, they must be taken up in the necessary interplay of the signifying game, in so far as this interplay is determined by the double structure of the votive and the volitional.

Let us take the most banal, the most common phantasy, the one which Freud himself studied, to which he accorded a particular attention, the phantasy: "A child is being beaten". Let us take it up again now from the perspective that we are approaching in (17) order to try to grasp how there can be formulated the necessity of the phantasy qua support for desire.

Freud, speaking about these phantasies as he had observed them in a certain number of subjects at the time, a majority of them being women, tells us that the first phase of the Schlagfantasie is restored, in so far as it comes to be re-evoked either in phantasies, or in the memories of the subject, by the following phrase: Per Vater schlaegt das Kind, and that the child who is beaten on this occasion is, with regard to the subject the following: "The father is beating the child whom I hate".

Here then we are taken by Freud to the initial point that is at the very heart of something which is situated in the most quality of love and of hate, the one which is directed at the other in his being. And in so far as this being on this occasion is subjected to the greatest fall from grace, in his symbolic valorisation by violence, by the paternal whim. The injury here, if it is called narcissistic is something which, in short, is total. It is directed in the hated subject, at what is demanded, beyond every demand. It is directed at the fact that he should be absolutely frustrated, deprived of love. The character of a subjective fall from grace which is linked for the child to his encounter with the first corporal punishment leaves different traces according to the diverse ways it is repeated. And anyone can observe in our own day, when great care is shown to children, that if it happens that a child who has never been beaten, becomes the object of some punishment, even if it is justified, at least relatively late in his life, one can hardly (18) imagine the really shattering consequences that this experience has for the child at least at that moment.

In any case, we can consider as given that the primitive experience is indeed what is in question, as Freud expresses it: "Profound transformations have taken place between this first phase and the next." In fact Freud expresses this second phase for us as follows: "The person beating remains the same (that is, the father); but the child who is beaten has been changed into another one and is now invariably the child producing the phantasy. The phantasy is accompanied by a high degree of pleasure, and has now acquired a significant content, with the origin of which we shall be concerned later", and with good reason.

"Now, therefore the wording runs: I am being beaten by my father." But Freud adds in connection with this phase, that it is "the most important and the most momentous of all. But we may say of it in a certain sense that it never had a real existence. It is never remembered, it has never succeeded in becoming conscious. It is a construction of analysis, but it is no less a necessity on that account."

I believe that we do not sufficiently weigh the consequences of such an affirmation by Freud. When all is said and done, because we do not encounter this most significant phase, it is all the same very important to see that the phase in question, because it culminates in a third phase, it is necessary that we should conceive of this second phase as and sought for by the subject. And of course this something which is sought, is of the greatest interest to us because it is nothing other than the formula for primordial masochism, namely precisely (19) this moment that the subject is going to seek most closely her own realisation as a subject in the signifying dialectic.

Something essential, as Freud quite correctly says, has happened between the first and the second phase, namely other than this something in which she saw the other being cast down from his dignity as a subject set up as a little rival. Something has opened up in her which makes her perceive that it is in this very possibility of subjective cancellation that there resides her whole being qua existing being; and it is there, in having the closest brush with this abolition, that she measures the very dimension in which she subsists as a being subject to willing, a being who can express a wish.

What does the whole phenomenology of masochism show us, the material that we must all the same go looking for in masochistic literature whether we like it or not, whether it is pornographic or not? Let us take a famous novel, or a recent novel put out by a semi-clandestine publisher. What after all is the essence of the masochistic phantasy? It is the representation by the subject of something, of a slope, of a series of imagined experiences, whose bank, whose edge essentially consists in the fact that at the limit she is purely and simply treated as a thing, as something which at the limit is haggled over, is sold, is mistreated, is cancelled out as regards every kind of properly speaking votive possibility of grasping herself autonomously. She is treated like a phantasy, like a dog we could say, and not just any dog: a dog who is mistreated, precisely like an already mistreated dog.

(20) This is the point, the pivotal point, the foundation of the supposed transformation in the subject who seeks to find where this point of oscillation, this point of equilibrium, this product of this barred S is, which is what he has to enter into if he enters, if once having entered into the dialectic of the word he must somewhere formulate himself as subject. But when all is said and done the neurotic subject is like Picasso, he does not search, he finds. Because this is how Picasso once expressed himself. A really splendid formula. And in fact there is a type of person who searches, and there is a type who finds. Believe me, neurotics, namely everything that is spontaneously produced from this embrace between man and his word, find. And I would point out that trouver comes from the Latin tropus, very precisely from what I speak about incessantly, the difficulties of rhetoric. It is very curious that the word which in the Romance languages designates trouver, contrary to what occurs in the Germanic languages where another root is used, is borrowed from the language of rhetoric.

Let us pause for an instant at this third moment of the point where the subject has "found". This we have immediately. It is perhaps worthwhile dwelling on it. In the - phantasy: "A child is being beaten", what do we have? It is "One" who beats. It is quite clear, and Freud insists on it. There is nothing to be done about it, she is asked: But who is beating? It is somebody or other. The subject is really evasive. It is only after a certain interpretative elaboration, when one has rediscovered the first phase that one can rediscover a certain paternal figure or image beneath this form, the form in which the subject has found her phantasy, in so far as the phantasy serves as a support for (21) her desire, for her masturbatory performance. At that very moment the subject is perfectly neutralised. It is One. And what is beaten so much, it is no less difficult to grasp, is multiple. [German quotation] Several children, boys when it is a question of the girl, but not necessarily with an obligatory relationship between the sex of the child who is phantasised and the sex of the phantasised image.

The greatest variations, the greatest uncertainties also reign around this theme in which we know well that, from whatever angle it may be, o or o', whether it is i(o) or o, the child participates up to a certain point, because it is she who constructs the phantasy. But in fact the child never situates herself in a precise fashion, in an univocal fashion, in a fashion which is not precisely oscillating indefinitely.

But what we would like to put the accent on here, is something very close to what I called above the distribution between the intrasubjective elements of the dream. On the one hand in the sadistic phantasy, this one here, and in the phantasy that one can observe in their almost complete development.

I will ask where the accentuated affect is? The accentuated affect, just as in the dream it was referred to the dreaming subject, this form of pain is undoubtedly a sadistic phantasy, refers to the phantasised image, but of the partner. What is in suspense in the sadistic phantasy - and the sadistic phantasy, provided it is a little conscious and refined, is often very well able to dwell on it - is the expectation of the partner. It is the partner, not so much in so far as he is beaten, in so far as he is going to be, or that he does not even know how he is going to be. This extraordinary element to which I will return in (22) connection with the phenomenology of anxiety, and in connection with which I will already indicate to you this distinction which is in Freud's text, but to which naturally no one has ever paid the least attention in connection with anxiety, between the nuances which separate the pure and simple loss of the subject in the night of subjective indétermination, and this something which is quite different and which is already the warning, the arousal as one might say of the subject before the danger, and which as such is articulated by Freud in Inhibitions symptoms and anxiety, where Freud introduces a still more astonishing distinction, because it is so phenomenologically subtle, that it is not easy to translate it into French, between abgewarten (?) which I will try to translate by undergo (subir) to be able to do nothing except to accept it, and vorhergesehen (?) which is to expect it. (tr: GW xiv 199; SE 2J) 166)

It is in this register, in this range that there is situated the accentuated affect in the sadistic phantasy, and in so far as it is attached to the other, to the partner, to the one who is face to face with us, little o on this occasion.

After all where is this subject who, on this occasion, is the prey to something which he lacks precisely to know where he is? It would be easy to say that he is between the two. I will go further, I will say that in the final analysis the subject is to such a degree, really between the two, that if there is one thing here to which he is identical, or that he illustrates in an exemplary fashion, it is the role of that with which one strikes, it is the role of the instrument. It is to the instrument that he is here, in the last analysis, identical, because here the instrument reveals to us, and always to our stupefaction - and (23) always with more reason to our great astonishment, except that we do not wish to see it - that it intervenes very frequently as the essential character in what we are trying to articulate as the imaginary structure of desire.

And this indeed is what is the most paradoxical, the most full of warning for us. It is the fact that in short it is under this signifier, here completely unveiled in its nature as signifier, that the subject manages to abolish himself in so far as he grasps himself on this occasion in his essential being. If it is true that with Spinoza we may say that this essential being is his desire.

And in effect it is to this same crossroads that we are led every time that the problematic of sexuality is posed for us. If the pivotal point from which we began two years ago, which was precisely that of the phallic phase in the woman, is constituted by this relay station to which Jones always comes back in the course of his discussion, in order to begin again from it to elaborate it, to really it.

Jones' text on this subject has the value of being an analytical elaboration. The central point is the relationship between the hatred for the mother and the desire for the phallus. It is from this that Freud began. It is around this that he sees beginning the really fundamental, genetic character of the exigency for the phallus at the emergence from the Oedipus complex for the boy, at the entry into the Oedipus complex for the woman. This is the connecting point. Hatred for the mother, desire for the phallus. Which is the proper meaning of this Penisneid.

Now Jones, quite correctly, underlines the ambiguities which are met every time we make use of it. Whether it is a desire to have (24) a penis with respect to an other, namely a rivalry, it is all the same necessary that it should present itself in an ambiguous way which shows us that it is beyond that its meaning must be sought. The desire for the phallus, means desire mediated by the mediating phallus. An essential role that the phallus plays in the materialisation of desire.

This leads us to pose, to introduce what we are going to have to develop subsequently in our analysis of the construction of phantasy, at a crossroads which is the following: namely that the problem when all is said and done is to know how there is going to be sustained this relationship of the signifier phallus in the imaginary experience which is her's, in so far as it is profoundly structured by the narcissistic forms which organise her relationships with her counterpart as such. It is between S as speaking subject, little o, namely this other which the subject has in herself. Little o, it is to this then that we have identified her today. It is the imaginary other, it is what the subject has in herself as "drive", in the sense that the word drive is put in inverted commas, where it is not yet the developed drive, caught up in the signifying dialectic, where it is the drive in its primitive character where the drive presents one or other manifestation of need in the subject.

An image of the other, namely that in which, through the mediation of the specular reflection of the subject in situating her needs, is at the horizon something different, namely what I called at the beginningg the first identification to the other, in the radical sense, the identification to the insignia of the other, namely the signifier of capital I over o. (?)

(25) I am going to give a schema which those who followed the first year of my seminar will recognise. We have spoken about narcissism. I gave the schema of the parabolical mirror thanks to which one can make appear on a platform, in a vase, the image of a hidden flower, lit up either from underneath, or from the plate, and which thanks to the property of spherical rays comes to be projected, to be outlined here as a real image. I mean to produce for an instant the illusion that there is in the vase precisely this flower.

It may appear mysterious to see that one can imagine that it is necessary here to have a small screen to receive this image in space. This is not necessary at all. I pointed out that this illusion, namely the sight of the setting up in the air of this real image, can only be perceived from a certain spatial field which is precisely determined by the diameter of the spherical mirror,, mapped out with respect to the centre of the spherical mirror. Namely that if the mirror is narrow, it is necessary of course to place oneself in the field where the rays which are reflected from the mirror have recrossed its centre, and consequently in a certain expansion of a zone in space, to see the image.

The trick of my little explanation at the time was the following: it was to say, if anyone wants to see this image being produced, phantastically, inside the pot, or a bit to one side, it does not matter, to see it being produced somewhere in the space where (26) there is already a real object, and if this observer is there, he can make use of the mirror. If he is in a symmetrical position with respect to the mirror, the virtual position of the one who is in front of the mirror will be, in this tilting of the mirror, to come to situate himself within the cone of visibility of the image which is to be produced here.

That means that he will see the image of the flower precisely in this mirror at the symmetrical point. In other words what is produced, if the luminous ray which is reflected towards the observer is strictly symmetrical with the visual reflection, of what is happening on the other side, it is because the subject virtually will have taken the place of what is on the other side of the mirror that he will see in this mirror the vase - which is to be expected because it is there - and on the other hand the real image, as it is produced at the place where he cannot see it.

The relationship, the interplay between the different imaginary elements and the elements of symbolic identification of the subject can be illustrated in a certain fashion in this optical apparatus, in a fashion that I do not think is untraditional because Freud formulated it somewhere in the Traumdeutung. He gives somewhere the schema of successive lenses in which there is refracted the progressive passage of the unconscious, of the preconscious. He was looking at analogous reference points, optical ones he says precisely.

It effectively represents this something which, in the phantasy.

tries to rejoin its place in the symbolic. This consequently makes of S something other than an eye. It is only a metaphor. (27) If it designates that it wishes to rejoin its place in the symbolic, it is in a specular fashion, namely with respect to the other who, here, is the capital O. This mirror is only a symbolic mirror, it is not a question of the mirror in front of which the little child busies himself.

This means that in a certain reflection which is constructed with the help of words in the first learning of language the subject learns to regulate somewhere, at the right distance, the insignia with which he identifies himself, namely something which is inclined towards the other side, which corresponds to him in these first identifications of the ego. And that it is within this, in so far as there is already something at once preformed, open to fragmentation, but which only enters into this game of fragmentation, and in so far as the symbolism exists which opens up its field for him, it is within this that there is going to be produced this imaginary relationship in which the subject will find himself caught, and which, I pointed out, means that in the erotic relationship to the other, however complete, however advanced one supposes it to be, there will always be a point of reduction which you can grasp as extrapolations of the early erotic outline between the subjects. The fact is that there is a transformation of this first relationship of o to o' the image of o, of this fundamentally specular relationship which regulates the relationships of the subject to the other. There is a transformation of that, and a distribution between on the one hand the group of the fragmented elements of the body, those that we have to deal with in so far as we are a marionette and in so far as our partner is a marionette. But the marionette is only missing one thing, the phallus. The phallus is occupied elsewhere, in the signifying function.

(28) This is why there is always, I am not saying at the heart of which are always opposed, but which can be rediscovered at any moment of the interpretative of the situation. The subject, in so far as he identifies himself with the phallus in face of the other, fragments as himself in the presence of something which is the phallus. And to dot the i's I would say that between man and woman, I would ask you to dwell on the fact that in the most loving relationship between a man and a woman, to the very degree that desire takes desire finds itself on the part of the man beyond the loving relationship. I mean that in so far as the woman symbolises the phallus, that man finds in her the complement of his being. It is what I might call the ideal form.

It is precisely in the measure that man, in love, is really alienated, that this phallus, the object of his desire, which nevertheless reduces the woman in the erotic act to being an imaginary object, that this form of desire will be realised.

And this indeed is why there is maintained, at the very heart of the most profound, the most intimate loving relationship, this duplicity of the object on which I have so often insisted in connection with the famous genital relationship. I come back to the idea that precisely if the loving relationship is complete here, it is to the degree that the other will give what he does not have, which is the very definition of love.

On the other hand the relationship of the woman to the man, which everyone is happy to believe to be much more monogamous, is (29) something which presents no less ambiguity, except that what the woman finds in the man, is the real phallus, and therefore as always her desire finds its satisfaction there. Effectively she finds herself in the right position and sees a relationship of satisfying jouissance.

But precisely it is in the measure that the satisfaction of desire appears in the real order that what the woman effectively loves, and not desires, is this being who is beyond the encounter with desire and who is precisely the other, namely the man in so far as he is deprived of the phallus, in so far precisely because of his nature as a completed being, a speaking being, he is castrated.

Seminar 8: 14 January 1959

Because we have spoken a lot on the last occasions about desire, we are going to begin to tackle the question of interpretation. The graph should be of some use to us.

I want to introduce what I am going to say today about an example, namely about the interpretation of a dream, by some remarks on what results from the indications that Freud gives us precisely about the interpretation of dreams.

Here in fact is more or less the meaning of the remark of Freud that I am now concerned with. It is in chapter VI where he is interested in intellectual feelings about the dream. For example while the subject is reporting a dream, he has the feeling that there is something missing in it that he has forgotten, or that something is ambiguous, doubtful, uncertain. In all these cases, Freud tells us, what is affirmed by the subject in connection with the dream, in terms of its uncertainty, its doubtfulness, its ambiguity: namely it is either this or that, I no longer remember, I can no longer say, even its degree of reality, namely the degree of reality with which it was seen, whether it was something which is affirmed in the dream with such a degree of reality that the subject notices it, or on the contrary that it was a dream, all of this Freud tells us, in all these cases, should be taken as enunciating what Freud calls one of the latent thoughts of the dream.

What in short is said by the subject in a marginal note about the text of the dream, namely all the accents about tonality, that which in music is accompanied by annotations like allegro, crescendo, decrescendo, all of this forms part of the text of the dream.

I do not think that for the greater number of you whom I suppose to have already got to know the Traumdeutung, and the technique, (2) that this is new. This is something really fundamental as regards the interpretation of a dream. Therefore I am only reminding you of it because I do not have the time to give the examples which are in Freud, and I refer you to the text of the Traumdeutung♦ You will see the use that Freud makes of this essential reminder.

He interprets the dream by integrating the feeling of doubt for example that there is in this dream at the moment that the subject recounts it, as one of the elements of the dream without which the dream could not be interpreted.

We begin then from the Freudian interpretation, and we ask the question of what this involves by way of implications. It is not sufficient to accept this fact, or this rule of conduct, as having to be religiously accepted as many of Freud's disciples did, without trying to see any further, putting their trust in the unconscious in some way. What does it imply that Freud should tell us: it is not only the tension of your unconscious (sic) that is there at the moment that your memory of the dream disappears, or on the contrary is placed under a certain rubric given a certain accent?

He says: this forms part of the latent thoughts of the dream itself. It is here therefore that what we have agreed to call the graph allows us to specify, to articulate in a more evident, a more certain fashion what is in question when Freud gives us a rule of conduct like this for the interpretation of dreams.

Here in effect is what we can say. What do we do when we (3) communicate a dream, whether this is done inside or outside analysis? (We did not have to wait for analysis in order to be able to give to the enunciating of a dream a formula which specifies it among the totality of possible enunciations as having a certain structure with regard to the subject). Within what we can put forward in a discourse as an enunciation of events we can legitimately distinguish the following that among the enunciations concerning events, there are some which have a value that is altogether worthy of being distinguished with regard to the signifying register. They are enunciations that we can put under the general rubric of belonging to indirect discourse; they are the enunciations that concern the enunciations of other subjects; they involve the reporting of the signifying articulations of someone else. And many things are introduced because of this, including other enunciations, namely hearsay, I was told, someone or other testified that this or that has happened, which is the form, one of the most fundamental forms of the universal discourse, most of the things that we ourselves can talk about being part of what we have gathered from the tradition of others. Let us say therefore a pure and simple, factual, report of an enunciation for which we assume responsibility; and on the other hand this involving in a latent fashion the dimension of enunciating which is not necessarily highlighted, but which is highlighted once it is a question of reporting the enunciation of someone else. It could also be something of our own that we are dealing with. We can say that we have said such a thing, that we have given evidence before someone else, and we ourselves can even enunciate that we have produced an enunciation which is completely false. We can testify that we have lied.

(4) One of the possibilities is the one which retains our attention for the moment. What are we doing in enunciating a dream? We are doing something which is not unique in its class, at least in the way that we are now going to have to define it. Because in a way it is interesting to underline what is the spontaneous attitude one has vis-a-vis a dream, before we get into disputes between experts - namely the dream has no meaning, it is a product of the decomposition of psychical activity, which is the so-called scientific position which was held during a fairly short period of history. (Freud himself pointed out that he was only rejoining tradition) . What we have put forward just now is already something considerable, namely that tradition never failed at least to pose concerning the dream, a question mark as regards its signification.

In other words, what we are enunciating in producing the enunciation of the dream, is something to which is given, in the very form in which we produce it from the moment that we recount our dream to someone else, this question mark which is not just any question mark, which presupposes that there is something beneath this dream, of which the dream is the signifier. I mean, we can write this in our formalisation, that it is a matter of enunciating awhich itself has an index of enunciating, which is itself supposed to take on a value, which is not of course factual, an event.

(5) We must add a supplementary accent to it in order to recount it in a fashion and in a dimension which is purely descriptive. The attitude which remains spontaneous, the traditional and how ambiguous attitude of the little child who begins to tell you his dreams, who tells you, last night I dreamt. If one observes things, it is as if, at a certain moment, the child discovered the possibility of expressing these things, and to such a degree that very frequently one cannot really know, at the age that there begins this confiding activity of the child concerning his dreams, whether after all everything that he tells you is really something that he dreamt, or whether it is something that he brings to you because he knows that one dreams and that one can talk about dreams.

These dreams of the child have the character of bordering on confabulation, as you can see from your contact with a child. But precisely, if the child produces it like this, and tells it is this way, it is with this character of this little index e of enunciating, E(e), something beyond. With this precisely he plays with you a game of questioning, of fascination. And in fact, the formula for every kind of reporting of a dream, whether it is within or outside analysis being the following, E(e[^]), which we will say is the general form of something which, therefore, is not particular to the dream, is that of the riddle.

Starting from there, what is signified by what Freud means? Let us look at it on our little graph which is proposed on this occasion as following, namely that if we suppose that the (6) production of the dream..... To see how we are going to make use of this graph to project onto it the different elements of this formalisation. There can be several ways. The interest of the graph from the structural point of view, is that it is a structure which allows us to map out the relationship of the subject with the signifier, to the degree that necessarily, once the subject is caught up in the signifier - and it is essential that he should be caught up in it - this is what defines him, the relationship of the individual with the signifier. A structure and a network are imposed at that moment which always remain in some way fundamental.

Let us try here to see how we can distribute the different functions involved in the enunciating of the dream on the aforesaid graph in this case. What is in question, the pivotal point, what I would call the total enunciation, the dream in this fact that as a spontaneous creation it presents itself as something which in its first appearance has a character of relative totality, it is made up of a certain block. One says: "I had a dream", and one distinguishes it from the other dream which followed and which is not the same. It has the character of this discourse, it is reflected in so far as nothing causes there to appear in it, at the moment we are having it, this fragmentation, this decomposition of the signifier about which we have all sorts of retroactive indices; that this fragmentation has its incidence in the function of every discourse.

But discourse, in so far as the subject maintains himself in it, suspends our choice at every instant, when we are delivering a discourse. If this were not the case, our way of communicating would be altogether more arduous.

(7) This dream is presented to us as a whole. It is this enunciation which is produced, as I might say, at the lower level of the graph. It is a signifying chain which presents itself in a form which is all the more global because it is closed, because it presents itself precisely in the usual form of language, because it is something about which the subject has to make a report, an enunciating, has to situate himself with respect to, has to transmit to you precisely with all these accents that he has to add to it of a greater or lesser adherence to what he is telling you. Namely that it is in short at the level of the discourse for the other, which is also the discourse where the subject assumes this dream, that there is going to be produced this something which accompanies the dream, and comments on it in a way from the position that has been more or less assumed by the subject. Namely that here, during the narrative of what has happened, he presents himself already within it as the enunciation of the dream. It is here, in the discourse which this subject assumes for you to whom he is telling it, that we are going to see appearing these different elements, these different accentuations which are always accentuations of greater or lesser assumption by the subject. "It seems to me". "It appeared to me that at this moment that happened".

At that moment it is just as if the subject were at the same time someone else, or was being transformed into someone else. This is what I called above accents; these different modes of assumption of the experience of the dream by the subject are situated here on the line which is that of the I of the enunciating, in so far as precisely vis-a-vis this psychical event he assumes it more or less in his enunciating.

(8) What does that mean, except that what we have here is precisely that which on our graph is presented in the form of the fragmented, discontinuous line, that it shows you as being the characteristic of what is articulated at the level of the enunciating in so far as this involves the signifier. Because note this. If it is true that what justifies the lower line, the one on which at one time we placed this retroactivity of the code onto the message which at every moment gives the sentence its meaning - this phrasal unity is of different sizes; at the end of a long discourse, at the end of my seminar or at the end of all my seminars, there is something which retroactively closes the meaning of what I stated for you before but to a certain degree in each one of the parts of my discourse, in each one of the paragraphs there is something which is changed in shape.

It is a question of knowing what is the smallest degree that we must stop at in order that this effect which we call an effect of signification, in so far as it is something essentially new, which goes beyond what are called the usages of the signifier, constitutes a sentence, constitutes precisely this creation of signification brought about in language. Where does it stop? It stops obviously at the smallest possible unit, which is the sentence, precisely at this unit which on this occasion is presented here in quite a clear fashion in the report of the dream, in the form of the fact that the subject assumes it or does not assume it, either believes it or does not believe it, either reports something, or is doubtful about what he is telling us.

What I mean on this occasion, is that this line or loop of enunciating, is made up of sentence-fragments which can be shorter than the totality of what is being told. The dream, in connection with one or other part of the dream, brings an 9) assumption by the subject, an enunciatory position (une prise nonciative) of a shorter range than the totality of the dream. In other words, it introduces a possibility of a fragmentation which is much shorter at the upper level of the graph than at the lower level.

This puts us on the track of what Freud implies in saying that this accent of assumption by the subject forms part of the latent thoughts of the dream. This is to tell us that it is at the level of enunciating and in so far as it implies this type of highlighting of the signifier which is implied in free association; namely that if the signifying chain has two aspects, one which is the unity of its meaning, the phrasal signification, the monolithism of the holophrastic sentence, or more exactly namely that a sentence may be taken as having a single meaning, as being something which forms a signifier, let us say a transitory one, but which, while it exists, stands as such all by itself; and the other phase of the signifier which is called free association involves that each one of the elements of this sentence goes as far as is possible in terms of decomposition, stopping strictly at the phonetic element. Something can intervene which by getting rid of one of the signifiers implants there in its place another signifier which supplants it and it is in this that there lies the property of the signifier; it is something which refers to this aspect of the willing of the subject. Something, an incident, intersects with it at each moment which implies, without the subject knowing it, and in a way that is unconscious for him, that even in his deliberate discourse, beyond his intention, something intervenes in the choice of these elements whose effects we see emerging at the (10) surface, in the most elementary form for example of a phonematic lapse, whether it is a question of a syllable that is changed in a word, which shows there the presence of another signifying chain, which can intersect with the first, and grafts onto, implants in it another meaning.

Freud indicates to us that that which, at the level of enunciating, at the apparently most developed level therefore of the assumption of the subject, at the point at which the I poses itself as conscious with respect to, we will not say its own production because precisely the riddle remains entire - from whom does this enunciation that we are talking about come? - the subject does not decide, if he says "I dreamt" it is with its own connotation and accent which means that the one who dreamt is all the same something which with respect to him presents itself as problematic. The subject of this enunciating contained in the enunciation that we are dealing with, and with a question mark, was for a long time considered to be God before becoming the self of the subject. It is more or less with Aristotle...

To return to this beyond of the subject which is the Freudian unconscious, a whole oscillation, a whole vacillation is produced which still leaves a permanent question about its otherness. And what the subject takes up from this afterwards, has the same fragmentary nature, has the same value of signifying element as what is produced in the spontaneous phenomenon of substitution, of the deranging of the signifier, which is what Freud on the other hand show us to be the normal way to decipher the meaning of the dream.

In other words, the fragmentation which is produced at the level of enunciating, in so far as enunciating is the assumption of the dream by the subject, is something which Freud tells us is on the (11) same plane and of the same nature as the following, which the rest of his doctrine shows us to be the way of interpreting a dream, namely the maximum signifying decomposition, the spelling out of signifying elements in so far as it is in this spelling out that there will reside the highlighting of the possibilities of the dream, namely of these intersections, of these intervals that it leaves and which only appear to the degree that the signifying chain is related to, is recut, is intersected by all the other chains which in connection with each of the elements of the dream may be interlaced, intermingled with the first.

In other words it is to the extent, and in a more exemplary fashion in connection with the dream than in connection with any other discourse, it is to the degree that in the discourse of the subject, in the actual discourse, we allow to vacillate, we allow to be detached from the actual signification the signifier that is involved in this enunciating, it is in this way that we approach that which in the subject is called in the Freudian doctrine unconscious.

It is in the measure that the signifier is involved, it is in the possibilities of rupture, in the points of rupture of this unconscious that there lies the thing we are tracking down, what we are there to look for, namely the essential thing that has happened in the subject which keeps (maintenant) certain signifiers in repression. And this something is going to allow us to follow precisely the path of his desire, namely this something in the subject which is maintained in this capture by the signifying network, must so to speak in order to be revealed pass through this mesh, be subject to this filtering, to this (12) sifting of the signifier and which is what we have as our aim to replace and to restore in the discourse of the subject.

How are we able to do it? What does the fact that we are able to do it signify? I told you, desire is essentially linked, by the doctrine, by the practice, by the Freudian experience, in this position, it is excluded, enigmatic, or it is posed with respect to the subject as being essentially linked to the existence of the signifier, which is repressed as such, and its reinstatement, its restoration is linked to the return of these signifiers. But this does not mean that the reinstatement of these signifiers purely and simply enuntiates the desire. What is articulated in these repressed signifiers, and what is always a demand, is one thing, the desire is something else, in so far as desire is something through which the subject situates himself, because of the existence of discourse, with respect to this demand.

It is not what he demands that is in question, it is what he is in function of this demand, and what he is in the measure that this demand is repressed, is masked. And this is what is expressed in an obscure fashion in the phantasy of his desire. It is his relationship to a being of which there would be no question if there did not exist demand, discourse, which is fundamentally language, but of which there begins to be question from the moment that language introduces this dimension of being, and at the same time conceals it from him. The reinstatement of the meaning of the phantasy, namely of something imaginary, comes between the two lines, between the enunciation of the intention of the subject, and this something in which in a decomposed (13) fashion he reads that this intention is profoundly fragmented, cut up, refracted by language; between the two is this phantasy where he habitually suspends his relationship to being.

But this phantasy, more than anything else, is always enigmatic. And what does it want? The following: that we should interpret it. To interpret desire, is to reinstate something to which the subject can not accede all by himself: namely the affect which designates at the level of this desire which is his - I am speaking about the precise desire that intervenes in one or other incident of the life of the subject, of the masochistic desire, of the suicidal desire, of the oblativ desire, on different occasions. What is at stake is that this thing which is produced in this closed off form for the subject, should by-regaining its place, its meaning with respect to this masked discourse which is involved in this desire, regain its meaning with respect to being, confront the subject with respect to being, regain its true meaning, that which is for example defined by what I would call the positional affects with respect to being. This is what we call essentially love, hate, or ignorance, and many other terms still whose description and catalogue we should go through. In the measure that what is called affect is not this something which is purely and simply opaque and closed off which is supposed to be a sort of beyond of discourse, a kind of totality, of living kernel which comes straight down to us from some unknown heaven, but to the extent that affect is very precisely and always something which is connoted in a certain position of the subject with respect to being. I mean with respect to being in so far as that which is proposed to it in its fundamental dimension is symbolic, or (14) rather that on the contrary that it represents an extremely deranging eruption of the real within this symbolic.

And it is very difficult not to perceive that a fundamental affect like that of anger, is nothing other than that: the real which arrives at the moment that we have constructed a very nice symbolic framework, where everything is going well, order, law, our merit and our goodwill. One notices all of a sudden that things do not hang together. This is the normal operation of the affect of anger: everything appears fine on the bridge of the boats on the Bosphorus, but then there is storm which makes the sea rise.....Anger is always a matter of making the sea rise.

And then again it is also something which refers to the intrusion of desire itself, and this is also something which determines a form of affect to which we will return. But affect is essentially, and as such, at least for a whole fundamental category of affects, a connotation characteristic of a position of the subject, of a position which is situated, if we essentially see the possible positions in this putting into operation, putting to work, activation of himself, with respect to the necessary lines that are imposed on him, as such, by his envelopment in the signifier.

Here now is an example. I took this example from one of Freud's descendants, it allows us to articulate properly what analysis is. And to proceed in a fashion which does not give rise to a particularly arbitrary choice, I took Chapter V of Ella (15) Sharpe's Dream analysis, in which the author takes as an example the analysis of a simple dream. I mean a dream that she takes as such, by pushing as far as possible its analysis to the limit. You know of course that in the preceding chapters she showed a certain number of perspectives, of laws, of mechanisms, for example the incidence of the dream in analytic practice, or even further the problems posed by the analysis of the dream, or of what happens in the dreams of people being analysed. The pivotal point of this book, is precisely the chapter in which she gives us a singular example of an exemplary dream in which she brings into play, into operation, she illustrates, everything which on the other hand she wants to tell us about the way analytic practice shows us how we should be effectively guided in the analysis of a dream and particularly this essential thing, which is the new thing that this practitioner contributes after the Traumdeutung, that a dream is not simply something which is revealed to have a significance (that is the Traumdeutung), but something which in the analytic communication, in the analytic dialogue, comes to play its current role, and not in the same way at one moment of analysis as at another, and that precisely the dream comes in an active, determined fashion to accompany the analytic discourse in order to clarify it, to prolong its pathways, that the dream is a dream when all is said and done which is meant not just for analysis, but often for the analyst.

Within analysis, the dream is found in short to be the bearer of a message. The author in question does not draw back. Any more than the authors who since then have had occasion to speak (16) about the analysis of dreams.

It is a matter only of knowing what weight, what accent we will give to it. And as you know, I drew attention to it in my Royaumont report, it is not the least important question that is posed by the question of thinking with respect to dreams, that certain authors think that they can avoid it in so far as they see in it something like an activity; at least undoubtedly it is something...

I mean that the fact in effect that the dream presents itself as a material for discourse, as a material for discursive development, is something which, if we do not perceive that the unconscious is nowhere other than in the latencies, not of some psychic gap or other where it is supposed to be in an unconstituted state, but well and truly qua unconscious on this side of or - this is another question - immanent to the formulation of the subject, to a discourse about himself, to his enunciating. We will see how legitimate it is to take the dream, as it has always been considered to be, as the royal road to the unconscious.

Here therefore is how things present themselves in this dream which the author presents us with. I will begin by reading the dream itself, I will show the way that problems are posed with regard to it. She gives us first of all a brief note on the subject about which we will have a lot to say. The whole chapter moreover should be re-read, criticised in order to allow us to grasp how what she enunciates is both more applicable to our reference points than to any other register, and at the same time how these reference points may perhaps allow us to orientate ourselves better.

(17) That day the patient arrived at his session in certain conditions which I will remind you of later. It is only after some associations, which you will see are very important, that he remembers: "That reminds me" - I will come back to these natural associations. "I do not know why I should now think of my dream last night" he says. "It was a tremendous dream. It went on for ages and ages. I shall not bore you with it all for the simple reason that I cannot recall it but it was an exciting dream, full of incident, full of interest. I woke hot and perspiring." (132)

He says that he does not remember this infinitely long, vast dream, but what emerges, is the following: a fairly short scene that he is going to recount to us. "I dreamt I was taking a journey with my wife". There is here a very nice nuance which is perhaps not sufficiently accentuated as regards the normal order of complements in the English tongue. I do not think however that I am making a mistake in saying that: "I was taking a journey with my wife around the world", is something which deserves to be noted. There is a difference between "a journey around the world with my wife", which would seem to be the normal French order of circumstantial complements and "I was taking a journey with my wife around the world". I think that in this the sensitivity of the ear in English must be the same.

"We arrived in Czechoslovakia where all kinds of things were happening. I met a woman on a road, a road that now reminds me of the road that I described to you in the two other dreams lately in which I was having sexual play with a woman in front (18) of another woman."

At this point the author quite rightly changes the typeface, because it is an additional reflection: "So it happened in this dream." "This time," he takes up the narration of the dream, "my wife was there while the sexual event occurred. The woman I met was very passionate looking". And here quite rightly we have a change of typeface, because it is a commentary, it is already an association. "I am reminded of a woman I saw in a restaurant yesterday. She was dark and had very full lips, very red and passionate looking." The same expression, the same passionate aspect. "And it was obvious that had I given her any encouragement she would have responded. She must have stimulated the dream, I expect. In the dream the woman wanted intercourse with me and she took the initiative which as you know is a course which helps me a great deal." And he comments: "If the woman will do this I am greatly helped. In the dream the woman actually lay on top of me; that has only just come to my mind. She was evidently intending to put my penis in her body. I could tell that by the manoeuvres that she was making. I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her." And here we have a further commentary: "It sounds quite wrong to use that verb transitively. One can say 'I masturbated' and that is correct, but it is all wrong to use the word transitively." The peculiarity of the English verb is that it does not have the reflexive form that it has in the French tongue. When I say '*I masturbate', in English that means Je me masturbe. This is quite correct, but it is quite incorrect, (19) he remarks, to use the word transitively.

The analyst does not fail to react to this remark of the subject.

And the subject in connection with it makes in fact some confirmatory remarks. He begins to give associations about his own masturbation. However he does not remain there.

Here is the enunciation of the dream. It should give rise to some interest for what we are going to say. I must say that it is a mode of presentation that in a certain way is quite arbitrary; I could by-pass it. Do not think either that this is the systematic way that I would advise you to rely on for the interpretation of a dream. It is only a matter of taking a step to show you what we are going to try to see, and to demonstrate.

Just as in Freud's dream, taken from Freud, the dream of the dead person that we spoke about, we were able to designate in a fashion which you could at the same time see was not without artifice, what the signifiers are of "in consequence of the dreamer's wish", that his son wished it, in the same way in a certain fashion one will see here, the point at which the dream-phantasy effectively culminates, "I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought I would masturbate her", together with the remark that the subject immediately makes that it is quite odd to use the verb transitively... . The whole analysis of the dream is going to show us that it is effectively in re-establishing this intransitivity of the verb that we find the true sense of what is in question.

What is she disappointed about? It seems that the whole text (20) of the dream sufficiently indicates it: the fact that our subject does not really want to get involved even though he indicates that everything in the dream is there to stimulate him. Namely that he would normally be greatly helped in such a position. No doubt this is what is in question, and we will say that the second part of the sentence falls into what Freud articulated for us as being one of the characteristics of the formation of the dream, namely secondary elaboration, that is presents itself as having an understandable content.

Nevertheless the subject himself points out to us that this is not self-evident, because the very verb that he employs is one which he indicates to us does not sound proper when it is used in this way. In accordance with the very application of the formula that Freud gives us we should retain this remark of the subject as one which puts us on the path, on the track of what is in question. Namely the dream-thoughts. And that is where the desire is. In telling us that "I thought" should involve as a consequence that the sentence should be reinstated in the following form: "I thought she could masturbate" which is the normal form in which the wish would present itself: "Let her masturbate if she is not satisfied". The subject points out to us here with sufficient energy that masturbation concerns an activity which is not transitive in the sense of going from the subject to another person, but as he expresses it, intransitive. Which means in this case an activity of the subject on himself. He well and truly underlines it: when one says "I masturbated" that means Je me suis masturbe.

(21) It is a method of presentation, because the important thing is not of course to settle the subject, even though, I repeat, it is important to notice that here, already immediately, the first indication that the subject gives us is an indication in the sense of the rectification of the signifying articulation.

What does this rectification allow us to do? It is more or less the following: everything that we are now going to have to consider, is first of all the coming into play of this scene, of this session. The author presents it to us by means of a description which is not necessarily a general description of the behaviour of her subject. She has even gone so far as to give us a little preamble about his psychical constellation. In short we will have to come back to this because what she has said in these preliminary remarks will be discovered in her results, and because we will have to criticise these results.

To go immediately to the essential, I mean to what will allow us to advance, we will say that she points out to us that this subject is an extremely gifted subject, and that his behaviour - we will see it better and better in the measure that we focus things. He is a subject of a certain age, already married, and practising at the Bar. And she tells us, it is worthwhile taking this in the very terms that the subject uses, that when the subject began his professional practice he developed severe phobias.

Briefly, what we are told about the mechanism of the phobia is limited to this.

(22) " This meant," she says, - and we have great confidence in her because she is one of the best analysts, one of the most intuitive and penetrating who ever existed - "not that he dare not work successfully, but that he must stop working in reality because he would only be too successful." (127)

The note that the analyst puts in here, that it is not a matter of a love of failure that is in question, but that the subject stops, as one might say, before the immediate possibility of the highlighting of his abilities, is something which deserves to be remembered. You will see the use that we will subsequently make of it.

Let us leave to one side what, from the beginning, the analyst indicates as being something which can here be related to the father. We will come back to it. We need only know that the father died when the subject was three years old. And that for a very long time the subject did not refer to the father except precisely to say that he was dead. Something which, quite rightly, retains the attention of the analyst, in the sense that she understands by that, something quite obvious, that he did not want to remember at all that his father had lived. It seems to me that this can hardly be contested - and that when he remembers his father's life, she tells us that it was undoubtedly "a startling moment" (126). It produces in him a sort of fright.

Very quickly the position of the subject in analysis will imply that the death-wishes that the subject might have had towards his father is the mainspring of his forgetting, and of the whole articulation of his desire, in the measure that the dream reveals (23) it to him. We should understand however that nothing, as you are going to see, indicates to us in any way an aggressive intention in so far as it would be the origin of a fear of retortion. It is precisely what an attentive study of the dream is going to allow us to specify.

In fact what does the analyst tell us about this subject? She tells us the following: That day, like every other day, I did not hear him coming upstairs. Here, there is a very brilliant little paragraph about the extra-verbal production of the subject, and which corresponds to a certain observation. Namely all the little incidents in his behaviour that someone who has an eye knows how to spot. I never hear this man coming, she tells us. We understand in the context that one gets to her office by climbing a stairs. "One patient comes up two stairs at a time and I hear just the extra thud" The English word "thud" has no equivalent in French and means a dull muffled sound, the sound of a foot on the step of a stairs which is covered by carpet, and which becomes a little bit louder because he takes two steps at a time. "Another hurries and I detect the hustle". The whole chapter is like that and from a literary point of view it is something to savour. However it is nothing but a detour, because the important thing is what the patient does.

The patient's attitude is one of perfect correctness which is a little stilted and never changes. "He always ggets on the couch one way. He always gives a conventional greeting with the same (24) smile, a pleasant smile, not forced or manifestly covering hostile impulses". (130) Here the analyst's tact knows very well, there is nothing that reveals that such a thing exists. Nothing is left to chance, "no clothes awry;.... no hair out of place." He lies down, he puts one hand over the other across his chest and makes himself easy. And there is no sign of any immediate or upsetting event as for example that his maid did something just before he left to keep him late. One does not hear about this for a long time, right at the end of the session, or even at the next session. "He talks the whole hour, clearly, fluently, in good diction, without hesitation and with many pauses. He speaks in a distinct and even voice for it expresses thinking and never feeling." (130)

What must be thought about this distinction between thinking and feeling - of course all of us would be of the same opinion before a presentation like that, the important thing is obviously to know what this particular mode of communication signifies. Every analyst will think that there is in this subject something that he dreads, a sort of sterilisation of the text of the session, something must make the analyst desire to have something more alive in the sessions. But naturally the fact of expressing oneself like that must also have a meaning. And the absence of feeling, as she expresses it, is all the same not something which has nothing to do with the chapter, with the heading of feelings.

I spoke above about affect as concerning the relationship of the (25) subject to being and revealing it. We should ask ourselves in this case how being can communicate along this path. It is more appropriate to ask this because indeed it is at this point, that the session opens. And the discordance there is between the way in which the analyst tackles this problem of this sort of before her, and the way in which, she notes it herself, surprises it, what sort of supplementary basis is to be given to the usual position of the analyst, precisely to appreciate what is special in this case. Because what begins to open up here we will see being opened up more and more up to the final intervention of the analyst and its stupefying result. Because it is stupefying not only that it should be produced, but that it should be reported as an exemplary interpretation from the point of view of its fruitfulness and satisfaction for the analyst.

That day the analyst is struck by the fact that in the middle of this picture which is distinguished by a severe rectitude, the subject's cautious bearing, something happens which she had never heard up to then. He arrives at her door, and just before entering he goes, hm, hm. It is still not a lot, it is the discreetest of coughs. She was a very impetuous woman, everything in her style indicates it; she was something like a primary school teacher before being an analyst and it is a very good starting point for the penetration of psychological facts: and she is certainly a woman of very great talent. She hears this little cough as if it were the arrival of the dove into Noah's ark.

This cough is a harbinger. Somewhere behind there is the place where feelings are alive. "I would never talk to him about it, because if I said a word he would just smother everything."

(26) It is the classical position in such a case, never to make a remark to the patient, at a certain stage of his analysis, when you think you know what he is at, about their physical behaviour, their way of lying down, of buttoning or of unbuttoning their coat, everything that involves the attitude of reflex motor activity on their own behaviour in so far as it can have the value of a signal, because this profoundly touches something belonging to the narcissistic register.

This is what distinguishes the power, the dimension of analysis in so far as it extends, as it spreads over everything belonging to the vocal register; the fact is that the same rule does not apply at all to something like a little cough, because even though it is only a cough, and independently of the fact that this does not give the impression of being a purely somatic event, it belongs to the same register as those "hm, hms", those grunts, which certain analysts sometimes use decisively, and which can have the effect of restarting somebody. The proof, is that to her great surprise this is the first thing that the subject talks to her about. He says to her very exactly, in his customary even and deliberate voice: "I have been considering that little cough that I give just before I enter the room. The last few days I have coughed I have become aware of it, I don't know whether you have. Today when the maid called me to come upstairs I made up my mind I would not cough. To my annoyance, however, I realised I had coughed just as I had finished. It is most annoying to do a thing like that, most annoying that (27) something goes on in you or by you that you cannot control, or do not control. One would think some purpose is served by it, but what possible purpose can be served by a little cough of that description is hard to think." (131)

The analyst advances with all the prudence of the serpent and says back to him: "What purpose could be served?" "Well, it is the kind of thing that one would do if one were going into a room where two lovers were together." He tells how he did something similar in his childhood before going into the room where his brother was with his girlfriend. He coughed before going in because he thought that they might be embracing, and that it would be better if they stopped beforehand, and that way they would feel less embarrassed than if they had been surprised.

So she replies: "And why cough before coming in here?" "That is absurd" he says "because naturally I should not be asked to come up if someone were here. There is no need for a cough at all that I can see. It has, however, reminded me of a phantasy I had of being in a room where I ought not to be, and thinking someone might think I was there, and then I thought to prevent anyone from coming in and finding me there I would bark like a dog. That would disguise my presence. The "someone" would then say (28) 'Oh, it's only a dog in there'." "A dog?" the analyst replies prudently.

"That reminds me", continues the patient easily enough, "of a dog rubbing himself against my leg, really masturbating himself. I'm ashamed to tell you because I did not stop him. I let him go on and someone might have come in. (The patient then coughed)." And it is at this point that he begins his dream.

We will take this up the next time, but already there is something we do not see namely that here the very memory of the dream came immediately after a message which in all probability - and moreover the author of course is quite sure of it, and will bring it into the analysis of the dream and give it a role of first importance - This little cough was a message, but it is a question of knowing of what. But it was on the other hand, in so far as the subject had spoken about it, namely in so far as it introduced the dream, a second degree message. Namely in the most formal and not unconscious fashion: a message that it was a message, because the subject did not simply say that he coughed.

Had he even said: "I coughed" this already would have been a message. But in addition he says: "I coughed, and that means something", and immediately afterwards he begins to tell us stories which are particularly suggestive. This obviously means: I am here. If you are doing something that amuses you, and if it would not amuse you that this should be seen, it is time to put an end to it.

(29) But we would not see precisely what is in question if we were not also to take into account what is brought along at the same time. Namely something which is presented as having all the appearances of a phantasy. First of all because the subject presents it as such, and as a phantasy developed in his childhood, and also because perhaps if the phantasy is with respect to another object, it is quite clear that nothing realises it better than this phantasy, the one he speaks to us about when he says: I thought of concealing my presence - I would say as such, as the presence of my being seen, me the subject, in a room - very precisely by doing something which it is quite obvious is designed to draw attention to him, namely to bark.

This indeed has all the characteristics of the phantasy which best fulfils the forms of the subject in so far as he finds himself adorned by the effect of the signifier. Namely by the use that the child makes of what presents itself as being already natural signifiers because they serve as attributes for something which it is a question of signifying. The child calls a dog "bow-wow". In this case we are involved in a phantasy-activity. It is the subject himself who attributes the "bow-wow" to himself. If in fact he signals his presence here, in fact he signals it precisely in so far as in the phantasy - this phantasy being quite inapplicable - it is by its very manifestation, by his very word that he is supposed to make himself other than he is, to remove himself even from the domain of the word, to make an animal of himself, to absent himself, to literally naturalise himself. No attempt will be made to verify that he is there (30) because he will have made himself, presented himself, articulated himself well and truly in the most elementary of signifiers as not being there: there is nothing there, but literally: there is no person. It is really, literally, what the subject announces in his phantasy: in so far as I am in the presence of the other I am nobody. It is the "where is he" of Ulysses and the Cyclops.

These are only elements. But what we are going to see in pushing the analysis further, is what the subject by associating to his dream which is going to allow us to see how things appear, namely in what sense, and how he is not a person. There are some correlates on the side precisely of the other whom it is a question of warning here; namely who happen to be in this case, as in the dream, a woman. This relationship with the woman as such, is certainly not a matter of indifference in the situation. What it is going to allow us to articulate concerning the something that the subject is not, does not wish to be, cannot be, as you will see, is something which will direct us as we have said towards the most fundamental of the symbols that concern the identification of the subject. If the subject absolutely wishes that, as everything indicates, his feminine partner should masturbate herself, should look after herself, it is undoubtedly so that she will not pay attention to him. Why he does not want her to pay attention to him, and how he does not wish it, is also what the normal end of the time which is assigned for this session today will not allow us to articulate, and what we will put off till the next time.

Seminar 9: 21 January 1959

We stopped the last day right in the middle of the analysis of what Ella Sharpe calls the singular, unique dream to which she devotes a chapter on which the ascending part of her book converges, then afterwards the complements that she adds. Her book has the originality of being an important book on dreams, written after thirty years of general analytic experience.

Let us consider that these seminars of Ella Sharpe represent experiences which refer to the preceding thirty years.

This dream, which was the subject of one of her patient's sessions, is an extremely interesting dream. And the developments that she gives, the connection that she establishes not only between what are properly speaking the associations of the dream, even the interpretation, but the whole message of the session in its totality - she is to be commended for this because it indicates her great sensitivity to the direction, to the sense of analysis.

It is all the more striking to see that this dream - whose terms I will recall - she interprets it as you will see line by line as she ought - is interpreted by her in the sense of a desire linked to a wish for omnipotence in her patient. This we will see in detail. It may be justified or not, but already you must be thinking that if this dream interests us it is from this angle here where I tried to show you the ambiguity, and the lure of this unilateral notion; what is involved in this wish for omnipotence, in terms of the possibilities, the perspectives of power, what can be called the neurotic wish.

(2) Is it always a question of the omnipotence of the subject? I introduced here this notion. It is quite obvious that the fact that the omnipotence in question is the omnipotence of discourse in no way implies that the subject feels himself to be its support and its depository. That if he is dealing with the omnipotence of discourse, it is through the mediation of the other that he profers it. This is forgotten, particularly in the orientation that Ella Sharpe gives to her interpretation of the dream. And to begin with the end - you are going to see how we will probably not manage to complete it in this lesson because there is a whole world beneath a work as elaborated as this; all the more of a world when one perceives that when all is said and done almost nothing has been said, even though every day this is the very terrain on which we operate.

I will begin therefore by indicating what is going to appear at the end. We will see in detail how she remonstrates with her patient on the subject of his omnipotent wish. And his aggressive omnipotent wish, Ella Sharpe underlines. It is this patient, all of whose coordinates she certainly does not give us, but who is found to have in the foreground major difficulties in his profession - he is at the Bar; difficulties whose neurotic character is so evident; which she defines in so nuanced a fashion because she specifies that it is not so much a question of failure as of a fear of being too successful.

She had underlined, in the very modulation of the definition of the symptom, something which deserved to retain us by the distinction, the obvious subtlety of the nuance that is introduced here into the analysis. The patient therefore, who has other difficulties besides those appearing in his work, who has, she herself indicates them, difficulties in the totality of his relationships with other subjects - relationships which go beyond his professional activities, which may specially express themselves in games, and particularly in the game of tennis as we will see in the indications that she subsequently gives us about some other sessions - she points out the difficulty he has in doing what would be necessary for him when he is winning a set or a game, to corner his opponent, to drive him back into a corner of the court so as to put the ball in the other corner where he is not going to reach it. (cf 146)

It is the type of example of the difficulties which this patient undoubtedly has. And the fact that symptoms like that can be highlighted by the analyst lend no little support to confirming that in the patient it is a question of a difficulty of manifesting his potency, or more exactly his power. She will intervene therefore in a certain fashion, will find herself in fact overjoyed at a certain number of reactions which are going to follow, which is really going to be the high point where she is going to point up, where she desires - really in the sense that we define it - one could almost point out that what she is aiming at is precisely what we would localise in a certain reference with respect to demand. As you will see this is precisely it. Only she interprets this desire in a certain fashion, in the sense of an aggressive conflict. She puts it on the plane of an essentially and profoundly dual reference of imaginary conflict.

(4) I will also show how she justifies tackling things from this angle. Only here I pose the question: can we consider as a sanction for the suitability of this type of intervention two things which she herself is going to declare exist. The first, following the first outline of her interpretation of the dual type, of the type of interpretation of the aggressivity of the subject founded on a return, on a transference of the omnipotent wish. She notes something striking, bewildering in an adult subject, that the subject brings her this result that for the first time since he was a tiny boy he had wet the bed. (147) We will come back to this in detail, to point out where the difficulties are posed. And in the few days which followed this session that she chose because the subject reported a very fine dream, but also a dream which occurred at a crucial moment of the analysis, on the tennis court, where precisely he happens to have the problems which are well known to all tennis players who have the opportunity to observe the way that they put their capacities to work, and from whom also there escapes sometimes the final recompense of a superiority they know they have, but that they are not able to demonstrate, his usual partners, with that sensitivity to difficulties, the unconscious impasses which when all is said and done are the stuff of this character game, the ways in which there occurs between the subjects the fencing of dialogue, of mocking, of joking, of gaining the upper hand, tease him as usual about the lost game, and he gets angry enough to get hold of his opponent around the neck and cornered him in a corner (5) of the court and warned him never to tease him again.

I am not saying that there is no basis for the direction, the order in which Ella Sharpe pushes her interpretation. You will see that, on the basis of the finest dissection of the material, the elements that she uses are situated, are established for her. We will also attempt to see what a priori ideas, what preconceived ideas, often based - after all an error never emerges except from a certain lack of truth - based on something else that she does not know how to articulate, even though she gives us - and this is what is precious in this observation - the elements of it, of the other register - but she does not dream of handling the other register.

The centre, the point at which she is going to bring her interpretation to bear, at a lower degree of complexity - you will see here what I mean, even though I think I am saying enough about it, for you to understand - by putting it on the plane of the imaginary rivalry of a power struggle she leaves to one side something that is now in question, by properly speaking making a selection in her own text.... It is her text which is going to show us, I think in a striking fashion, what she allows to be lost and what manifests itself with such coherence to be in this case what is in question in this analysed session - and the dream which is its centre - so that we should obviously try to see whether the categories which I have been proposing for a long time and whose map, whose topological schema, I have tried to (6) give in this graph that we use, whether we will not manage all the same to centre things better.

I remind you that we are dealing with a dream in which the patient is taking a journey with his wife around the world. He arrives in Czechoslovakia where all sorts of things are going to happen to him. He stresses that there was a whole world of things before this little moment that he is going to recount fairly rapidly - because this dream only occupies one session. It is only the associations that he gives It is a very short dream to recount. And among the things which happen, he meets a woman on a road which reminds him of the one which he had already described twice to his analyst, when something happened, "sexual play" with a woman in front of another woman. This happens again, he adds, in this dream. And he continues "This time my wife was there while the sexual event occurred. The woman I met was very passionate looking and I am reminded of a woman I saw in a restaurant yesterday. She was dark and had very full lips, very red and passionate looking, and it was obvious that had I given her any encouragement she would have responded. She must have stimulated the dream, I expect. In the dream the woman wanted intercourse with me and she took the initiative which as you know is a course which helps me a great deal." He repeats by way of commentary: "If the woman will do this I am greatly helped. In the dream the woman actually lay (7) on top of me, that has only just come to my mind. She was evidently intending to put my penis in her body. I could tell that by the manoeuvres she was making. I disagreed with this, but she was so disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her." (132-133)

Immediately after this remark which can only really be understood in English: "It sounds wrong to use that verb transitively. One can say *I masturbated' and that is correct". We will subsequently see in the text another example which shows that when one employs "to masturbate" it is a question of masturbating oneself. This primitive reflexive character of the verb is sufficiently striking for him to make this remark which is properly speaking a philological one. And it is obviously not for nothing that he makes it at this moment.

I have said, that in a certain fashion we could complete if we wished to proceed as we have done for the preceding dream, complete this sentence in the following fashion by reinstating the signifiers that have been avoided - we will see that what follows will confirm it -: She was very disappointed not to have my penis (or a penis) that I thought "She should masturbate" and not "I should". Let her masturbate.

You will see in what follows what it is that allows us to complete things in this way.

After this we have a series of associations. It is not very long, but it amply suffices for our meditation. There are almost three pages, and in order not to weary you, I will only (8) take them up again after having given the dialogue of the patient which follows the dream.

Ella Sharpe wrote this chapter for a pedagogical purpose, she draws up the catalogue of what the patient in fact brought to her. She is able to show those whom she is teaching, the material in which she is going to make her choice, firstly for the interpretation of what she has before her, secondly what she is going to transmit to the patient of this interpretation, indicating, insisting herself on the fact that the two things are far from coinciding because what there is to be said to the patient is probably not at all everything that is to be said on the subject. From what the patient provides her with there are things that are good to say and things which are not.

Since she finds herself in a didactic position, she is going first of all to draw up an account of what is to be seen, of what is to be read in this session.

"1. The cough." (136)

The last time I told you what was in question. It is a question of this little cough which the patient gave that day before coming into the room; this little cough in which Ella Sharpe, given the way in which the patient behaves himself, so contained, so controlled, so manifestly defensive, which she is far from accepting in the first place as a defence of the order: a defence against his own feelings, sees something which comes from a presence which is more immediate than this attitude in which everything is reflected on, where nothing reflects.

(9) And indeed it is to this that this little cough refers us. It is something on which others would perhaps not have dwelt. However little it is it is something which makes her hear in it the introduction, literally like an olive branch after some earthquake or other. And she says to herself, let us respect it.

Now, precisely it is just the contrary that happens. It is the patient himself who says it to her. He gives a long discourse on the subject of this little cough. I pointed out the last time, and we are going to come back both to the way in which Ella Sharpe understands it, and how to my way of thinking it should be understood.

Here in effect is how she herself analyses what she learns from the patient, following on this little cough. Because the subject is far from immediately bringing forward the dream. It is after a series of associations which have come to him after the remark which he himself made about this little cough: that it had escaped from him and that no doubt it meant something. That he had even said to himself that he would not do it again because it is not the first time that this had happened to him. After having climbed the stairs which she does not hear him climbing because he is so discreet, he gives this little cough. He uses the word himself, and he questions himself about it. We are now going to take up what he said in the perspective of the way that Ella Sharpe herself records it. She draws up a catalogue of what she calls: "Ideas concerning the purpose of a cough" (136)

(10) Here is how she records it.

First of all this little cough "brings thoughts of lovers being together."

What had the patient said? The patient, having spoken about his cough, and asked the question: "What purpose can it serve?" says "Well, it is the kind of thing that one would do if one were going into a room where two lovers were together. If one were approaching such a place one might cough a little discreetly and so let them know they were going to be disturbed. I have done that myself when, for example, my brother was with his girl in the drawing room. I would cough before I went in so that if they were embracing they could stop before I got in. They would not then feel as embarrassed as if I had caught them doing it" (131)

It is not a matter of indifference to underline in this connection, that first of all the cough, as the patient shows, and we do not doubt it because everything that follows has developed it for us, the cough is a message. But let us immediately note something which already appears in the fashion in which Ella Sharpe analyses things, the fact is that she does not grasp, that she does not highlight - this may appear to you a little finical, a little scrupulous as a remark, but nevertheless you are going to see that it is from this order of remark that I am going to introduce that everything else is going to follow, namely what I called the lowering of level which will mark Ella Sharpe's interpretation - that if the cough is a message, it is evident - it emerges from Ella Sharpe's very text - that what is (11) important to note is that the subject did not simply cough, but precisely - it is she who underlines it to her great surprise - the fact that the subject should say, it is a message.

This she elides, because she indicates in her catalogue of what she has bagged - we have not yet got to what she is going to choose and this will depend on what she has recognised. Now it is clear that she elides something which she herself has explained to us, the fact that in the first place there is of course the cough, but that the subject - this is the important point about this cough-message, if it is a message - speaks about it by saying "what is its purpose? What does it introduce?". The subject, exactly, begins by saying about this cough - he says it literally - that it is a message. He signals it as a message. And still more, in this dimension where he announces that it is a message he poses a question: What is the purpose of this message?

This articulation, this definition that we are trying to give of what happens in analysis, by not forgetting the structural texture of what rests on the fact that what happens in analysis is above all a discourse, which is here without going into any particular refinement of it, being properly speaking disarticulated, analysed. And we are going to see what its importance is. I would even say that up to a certain point we are able from now on to begin to locate ourselves on our graph. When he poses this question: what is this cough?, it is a second degree question about the event. It is a question that he poses (12) starting from the other, because also it is in the measure that he is in analysis that he begins to pose it; that he is into it I would say in this case - it can be seen in Ella Sharpe's surprise - much further than she herself imagines, a little like the way in which parents are always behind on the subject of what children understand or do not understand. Here the analyst is behind as regards the fact that the patient has for a long time understood the game, namely that it is a matter of questioning oneself about the symptoms of what happens in analysis, about the smallest snag which gives rise to a question. In short, this question in connection with "it is a message", is indeed here with its interrogative form in the upper part of the graph. I am putting in the lower part in order to allow you to locate where we are. It is precisely this part which I defined in another connection by saying that it was the level of the discourse of the Other.

Here in the measure that it is indeed the analytic discourse into which the subject enters. And it is literally a question about the other who is in him, about his unconscious. It is at this level of articulation which is always pressing in each subject, in so far as the subject asks himself: "But what does it want?", but which here is in no doubt about the distinction between the first verbal plane of the innocent enunciation, in so (13) far as an enunciation that is made within analysis is not innocent. And that here the locus to which this interrogation points is indeed the one where we place what should finally be the shibboleth of analysis, namely the signifier of the Other in so far as he himself is marked by the signifier, but which is precisely what is veiled to the neurotic, and veiled to the precise extent that he is not aware of this incidence of the signifier on the other, and that in this case not only does he recognise it, but that what he is questioning himself about is far from being the response, it is the questioning. It is effectively: "What is this signifier of the Other in me?"

In a word let us say at the outset of our presentation that he is far, and with reason, from having recognised the power, of being able to recognise that the other is castrated anymore than himself. For the moment simply he is questioning himself about this innocence or learned ignorance which is constituted by the fact of being in analysis, about the following: what is this signifier, in so far as it is signifier of something in my unconscious, as it is signifier of the Other?

In Ella Sharpe's progress this is elided. What she is going to enumerate are ideas concerning the cough. This is how she takes things. Of course they are ideas concerning the cough, but they are ideas which already say a lot more than a simple mere chain of ideas which, as we know, is specifically located here on our graph. Namely that already something is being delineated.

(14) She says to us, what does this little cough contribute? It brings first of all thoughts of lovers being together. I have read for you what the patient said. What did he say? He said something which cannot it seems to me be in any way summarised in this fashion, namely that this brings the idea of lovers being together. It seems to me that in listening to him the idea that he brings is that of the person who arrives as a third among these lovers who are together. He arrives as a third in not just any way because he arranges things so that he will not arrive as a third in too embarrassing a fashion.

In other words it is very important, from the first, to point out that there are three persons, putting them together involves variations in time, and coherent variations, namely that they are together while the third is outside. When the third has entered, they no longer are. This is obvious.

You can be certain that if it requires, as it is going to require two seminars to cover the material that this dream and its interpretation brings, a week of meditation to get to the bottom of what the patient brings us, the analysis may appear to be something insurmountable, especially as things will not fail to expand and we will be quickly swamped. But in reality this is not a valid objection at all for the good reason that to a certain degree in this schema which is already taking shape, namely that when the third is outside the two are together, and that when the third is inside the two are no longer together, I (15) am not saying that all of what we are going to see in this connection is already there, because it would be a little simple, but we are going to see this being developed, being enriched, and in a word becoming involuted on itself as a leit-motif that is indefinitely reproduced and by enriching itself at every point of the plot, constitutes the whole texture of the totality. And you are going to see which.

What does Ella Sharpe next point to as being the consequence of the cough?

- a) He tackled ideas concerning lovers who are together;
- b) Rejects a sexual phantasy concerning the analyst.

Is that something which accounts for what the patient has brought? The analyst had posed him the question "And why cough before coming in here?" (131), just after he had explained what its purpose was if it was lovers who were inside. He says, it is absurd because naturally I have no reason to ask myself that question, "I should not be asked to come up if someone were here, and I do not think of you in that way at all. There is no need for a cough at all that I can see. It has, however, reminded me of a phantasy I had of being in a room where I ought not to be."

It is there that what Ella Sharpe is aiming at stops. Can we say that there was here rejection of a sexual phantasy concerning the analyst? It seems that there was absolutely no rejection, but that there was rather an admission. Certainly a roundabout admission, an admission by the associations which are going to follow. One cannot say that in the proposition of the analyst concerning this subject, that the subject purely and simply rejects, that he is in a position of pure and simple negation.

(16) This seems on the contrary very typically the type of the appropriate interpretation, because this is going to involve everything that is going to follow and what we are going to see.

Now precisely this question of the sexual phantasy which is being pursued on the occasion of this entrance into the analyst's office where the analyst is supposed to be alone, is something which is indeed in effect what is in question, and regarding which I think it is going to appear rather quickly that there is no need to be a great scholar to clarify it.

The third element that these associations bring is, Ella Sharpe tells us, the phantasy. The phantasy of being where he ought not to be and barking like a dog to put people off the scent. It is a metaphorical expression which is found in the English text: "To put people off the scent" (136).

It is never a matter of indifference that one metaphor should be used rather than an other one, but here there is no trace of a scent in what the patient tells us. We have no reason to settle the question of whether or not it is repressed. I am saying that because the scent is the icing on the cake in some forms of analysis. Let us be satisfied here with what the patient tells us.

In connection with the questioning that the analyst has addressed to him, he says to her: this reminds me of the phantasy I had of being in a room where in fact - this conforms to the analyst's summary - I had no reason to be. Or more exactly where I ought not to be. And thinking someone might think I was there.

(17) There is a double structure; the reference to the subjectivity of the other is absolutely constant. It is on this that I am going to put the accent because this is incessantly what is in question and it is here and here alone that we can centre where the desire it.

This is what is evaded all the time in the account given by Ella Sharpe, and in the way in which she is going to take into account the different incidence of tendencies.

He says then: I thought someone might think. "I had this phantasy that someone might think that I was there, and then I thought to prevent anyone from coming in and finding me there I would bark like a dog. That would disguise my presence. The * someone' would then say, 'Oh it's only a dog in there'" (132). The paradoxical character of this phantasy of the subject very probably calls up - he says himself that the memories are those of late childhood, of adolescence. The incoherent, even absurd character of certain phantasies is nonetheless perceived with all its value, namely as being worth something, and as such retained by the analyst.

She tells us then, in the sequence of associative ideas that come to her, that it is a phantasy of being where he should not be, and barking like a dog to put people off the scent. This is correct, except that if he imagines that he is where he ought not to be, the purpose of the phantasy, the meaning of the phantasy, the obvious content of the phantasy is to show that he is not where he is. It is the other phase. A very important phase (18) because as we are going to see, this is going to be the characteristic, the very structure of every subjective affirmation on the part of this patient, and that to cut in under such conditions by telling him that at such a point he is in a situation where he had wished to kill his counterpart, and that this is the reversal and the revenge is certainly to take sides, and to take sides in conditions where the chances of both error and success, namely of effectively making the patient adopt in a subjective fashion what you have settled on, are particularly obvious. And this is what gives this text its interest.

If on the other hand we can see that this is to highlight what is announced here in its structure, namely the meaning of what has already appeared in the phantasy, namely that he is not where he is, and we are going to see the meaning that this has perhaps, perhaps this can also lead us, as we shall see, to a quite different interpretation.

In any case, he does not assume just any ego in order to make himself not be where he is. It is of course more than clear that from the point of view of reality this phantasy is not sustainable, and that to start barking like a dog in a room where one ought not to be, is not the best way to escape attention. Let us of course leave to one side this sentence whose only value is to make us notice that we are not here in the comprehensible, but in the imaginary structure, that after all one hears things like that during a session, and one is content after all to (19) believe that one understands because the patient appears to understand. I have told you that what is proper to every affect, to this whole margin, this accompaniment, these fringes of internal discourse, at least especially as we can reconstitute it when we have the feeling that this discourse is precisely not a discourse that is as continuous as one believes, the fact is that the continuity is in effect and principally by means of the affect. Namely that the less motivated the affects are, the more - it is a law - they appear comprehensible to the subject.

This is not for us a reason to follow him, and that is why the remark that I made there, however evident it may appear, has all the same its importance. What we have to analyse, is the phantasy, without understanding it, namely by rediscovering in it the structure that it reveals. Now, what does it mean this phantasy. Just as above the important thing was to see that the subject was saying in connection with his cough, it is a message, it is important to perceive that this phantasy has really no meaning, the totally unreal character of its eventual efficacy. It is that the subject by barking says quite simply, "It's a dog". Here too he makes himself other, but this is not the question. He does not ask himself what is this signifier of the other in him. He constructs a phantasy there - and that is all the same precious enough when it comes to us for us to perceive what we are being given. He makes himself other with the help of what: of a signifier precisely. The barking here, is the signifier of what is not. He is not a dog, but thanks to this (20) signifier the result for the phantasy is perfectly well obtained, he is other than he is.

I am going to ask you here, because we have not exhausted what is brought forward in simple association to the cough, there is a fourth element that we will see later, and in connection with this, namely on this occasion with the function of the signifier in the phantasy - because it is clear that the subject considers himself as being sufficiently covered by this phantastical barking - to make a parenthesis.

I am no longer talking to you about the dream, but about a certain elementary little clinical remark. At the end of a recent scientific communication I alluded to the fact that I wanted to bring this to your attention here.

It must be said that in such an abundance of material, what is there to be taught is so immeasurable compared to what is taught, namely what is so tiresomely repeated, that really some days I feel myself crushed to a ridiculous degree by the task that I have undertaken.

Let us take up this "It's a dog". I want to draw your attention to something about child psychology, to what is called genetic psychology. One tries to construct, with this child that one wishes to understand, this psychology which is called genetic, and which consists in asking oneself how this little darling who is so stupid begins to acquire his ideas. And then one asks oneself how the child proceeds. Primitively his world is supposed to be autoerotic, objects are supposed to come later. (21) I hope, please God, that you all have, if not directly the experience of children, at least enough patients who are able to tell you the story of their little child to see that there is nothing that is more interested in objects, in the reflection of objects than a tiny little child. Let us leave this to one side.

For the moment it is a matter of your perceiving how there comes into play in him the operation of the signifier. I mean that we can see in the child, at the source, at the origin of his grasp on the world which is offered to him and which is above all the world of the voice, a world where people speak to him, which is obviously a rather stupefying confrontation, how he is going to enter into this world.

I already alluded to something which people can notice provided they simply have an attentive ear, and do not necessarily find confirmed the preconceived ideas with which they may begin to approach the child. A friend remarked to me recently that having himself taken on the task of looking after his child to whom he devotes a lot of time, he had never spoken about a dog except as a dog. And he did not fail to be a little bit surprised at the fact that the child, who had perfectly well noted what had been named by the primitive nomination of the adult, began to call it a "bow-wow". Other people who may on occasion talk to me in a way that I would not say is directly illuminated by the projects for investigation that I give them, but solely because of my teaching, have pointed out to me something else that not only does the child limit to the designation of the dog this "bow-wow" which is something which is primitively chosen in the dog among all his characteristics - and how could we be surprised at it, because the child is obviously (22) going to begin already by qualifying his dog, but indeed before being able to handle any kind of attribute, he begins by bringing into play what he can say about him, namely that by which the animal presents itself as itself producing a sign which is not a signifier. But notice that here it is by the approach, by the chance that is presented to him by what there is in what is manifested, precisely the presence of an animal, something which is isolated enough to furnish its material, something which is an emission of the larynx, that the child lays hold of this element. As what? As something which, because it replaces the "dog" which he has already perfectly understood and heard to the point of being able both to direct his regard towards the dog when one names the dog, and towards an image of this dog when one says dog, and replaces it by a "bow-wow", which is to construct the first metaphor. So that it is here that we see beginning, and in a fashion which is in the closest conformity to the true genesis of language, the operation of predication.

It has been remarked that in the primitive form of language what plays the function of adjective are metaphors. This is confirmed here in the subject, except that we do not find ourselves here before some mysterious primitive operation of the spirit, but before a structural necessity of language which requires that in order that something should be engendered in the order of the signified, there must be the substitution of a signifier for another signifier.

You will say to me: what do you know about it? I mean why do you affirm that the essential is the substitution of "bow-wow" (23) for dog. First of all I would say to you that it is a common observation - and it was brought to me not too long ago - that from the moment that the child has been able to call a dog "bow-wow", he will call "bow-wow" a whole lot of things which have absolutely nothing to do with a dog, therefore immediately showing by this that what is in question is indeed effectively the transformation of the sign into a signifier which one puts to the test of all sorts of substitutions with respect to that which at that moment has no further importance whether it is other signifiers or units of the real. Because what it in question is to put the power of the signifier to the test.

The high point of this is marked in this decisive moment at which the child - it was about this that I made the remark at the end of the scientific communication that I was speaking about - declares with the greatest authority and the greatest insistence: the dog goes "miaow", or the cat goes "bow-wow". An absolutely decisive point because it is at this moment that the primitive metaphor, which is constituted purely and simply by signifying substitution, by the exercise of signifying substitution, engenders the category of qualification.

You should understand what I am saying, we can in this case formalize that if you wish, and say that the step, the progress that is accomplished consists in the fact that first of all a monolinear chain is established which says: "Dog" = "bow-wow", that what is in question and what is demonstrated in the clearest fashion by the fact that the child superimposes, combines one chain with another, is that he has managed to make cross over with respect to the chain, the dog goes "bow-wow", the chain, the cat goes "miaow"; that in substituting the "miaow" for the "bow-wow" he is going to bring into play the possibility of the crossing over of one chain with another, namely of a redivision of each one of the chains in two parts, what will provisionally be fixed and what no less provisionally will be mobile, namely of something of the chain which will remain, around which will turn what can change in it.

$$\begin{array}{ccc} S' & . & S \\ \hline S & . & S' \end{array}$$

In other words it is only from the moment at which there is associated the S' of the cat, in so far as it is signified by this sign with the S, the "bow-wow" signifier of the dog. And that this supposes that underneath - and to begin with there is no underneath - the child links the two lines, namely that the signified of "bow-wow", the dog, produces S' the "miaow" signifier of the cat. Only from the moment that this exercise has been accomplished, and the importance that the child gives to this exercise is quite evident and demonstrated by the fact that if the parents are tactless enough to intervene, to correct him, to reprimand him, or to chide him for saying such stupid things, the child has very lively emotional reactions, in a word he cries because he knows well what he is in the process of doing, as against the adults who think that he is being stupid.

Because it is only from that moment on, and in accordance with the formula which I already gave of the metaphor which consists very essentially in the following: it is that something at the level of the upper line is displaced, is elided, with respect to (25) something which in the lower line of the signified is also displaced. In other words, it is to the degree that from the point of view of the graph (scaf) from the moment that this game has been introduced, the "bow-wow" can be elided, that there comes in the underpinnings of the enunciating about the dog - that this enunciating becomes properly a signifying enunciating, and not a simple imitative connection with respect to reality. Whether the dog is indicated or named amounts to the same thing. But literally the fact that when the qualification, the attribution of a quality to the dog is given to him, that is not on the same line, it is on the one of quality as such: there are those who go "bow-wow", there are those who go "miaow", and all those who make other noises are implicated here in the verticality, in height, in order that there should begin to be born from the metaphor the dimension of adjective.

You know that it is not just yesterday that these things have been seen. Darwin had already dealt with them, except that for lack of the linguistic apparatus things remained very problematic for him. But it is a phenomenon that is so general, so essential, so functionally dominant in the development of the child that even Darwin who was inclined rather towards naturalist explanations did not fail all the same to be struck by the following: it was quite funny all the same that a child whose intelligence was already so remarkable that he could isolate the quack from the duck - this is how it is in Darwin's text, the cry of the duck that the child takes up is put in phonetic form - (26) that this quack is referred by him to a whole series of objects whose generic homogeneity is sufficiently noted by the fact that if I remember properly there were among these objects wine and a sous. I am not too sure what this sous designates, whether it designates a penny or something else. I have not verified what that meant in Darwin's day, but it was a coin because Darwin in his embarrassment does not fail to remark that this coin had the stamp of an eagle in the corner.

It may appear that the explanation which would unify the relationship of the quack to a general species of flying creatures on the pretext that an image as ambiguous as that of an eagle with open wings on a coin is something which we could consider as having to be homogenised by the child to his perception of the duck. Obviously that of wine, of liquid, would still create a problem. Perhaps we could simply think to ourselves there is some relationship between wine, something which would be let us say the liquid element in so far as the duck paddles in it.

We see in any case that what is once again in question is much more designated as marked by the passage of the signifying element as such; here let us admit it in the contiguity of perception if we want to admit in effect that the liquid quality is what is in question when the child applies to it the quack of the duck. You can see that it is in any case in the register of the signifying chain that we are able to grasp the fundamental thing that is established in the child in his grasp of the world as a world structured by the word.

(27) He is not one either to look for the meaning or the essence of birds, of fluid or of sous. The fact is that he finds them literally by the use of nonsense. Because when all is said and done if we have the time we will pose ourselves questions about what nonsense is technically. I mean non-sense. In the English tongue it is a specific genre. The English tongue has two outstanding example of nonsense, specifically Edward Lear a writer of nonsense which he defined as such, and Lewis Carroll among whose works you at least know I think The Adventures of Alice in Wonderland.

I must say if I had to recommend a book as an introduction to someone who was going to be a child psychiatrist or a child analyst, rather than any one of the books of Mr. Piaget, I would advise him to begin by reading Alice in Wonderland, because he would grasp effectively something which I have the best of reasons for thinking, given everything that we know about Lewis Carroll, to be something which is based on a profound experience of children's jokes, and which effectively shows us the value, the incidence, the dimension of the operation of nonsense as such.

Here I can only begin this indication. I began it in parenthesis, and in connection with the: "It is a dog" of our subject. I mean, from the formulated, signifying fashion in which one should interpret the phantasy that is outlined here and whose title you will easily note here I think in the term phantasy; I mean that in this phantasy: It is a dog, only a dog.

You will rediscover what I gave you as being the formula of the phantasy, namely that what the subject appears to elide is not (28) himself in so far as there is another one there. An imaginary other, o. A first indication of the suitability of this schema for helping you locate the validity of the phantasy as such.

I come to the fourth associative element which Ella Sharpe gives us in this case. Dog again brought the memory of a dog masturbating - the intransitive use naturally (cf 136). It is a question of a dog who is masturbating, as the patient told it, namely that as immediately after the schema a dog "That reminds me of a dog rubbing himself against my leg, really masturbating himself. I'm ashamed to tell you because I did not stop him. I let him go on and someone might have come in." (132)

Is the connotation of this as an element to be put in the sequence of the chain by the analyst, namely: the memory of a dog who is masturbating, something which should completely satisfy us here? I do not believe so. Because this element allows us to advance again a little further into what is in question in this message bringing the dream. And to show you the first loop which was gone through by the associations of the patient, and to show you the place that it is, I would say that nothing is more obvious on this occasion than the associative line. It is precisely what I am drawing here for you in dots.

(29) in so far as it is in the enunciating of the subject; these broken signifying elements are going to pass into ordinary and normal speech by these two points that have been mapped out of the message and the code, and the message and the code being here something of a quite different nature than the partner who speaks the same tongue who is in question in the term of the other 0.

And what we see here in this associative line that has been travelled, is precisely first of all the fact that we have got there in the form: it is a question of the signifier of the other who is in me. That is the question. And what the subject in this connection begins to unwind here is nothing less than to pass by this point here to which we will come back subsequently, then here at d, at the level where there is the question of his desire.

What is he doing by giving this little cough, namely at the moment he enters a place where there is something that he does not know anything about; a sexual fantasy (fantaisie) involving the analyst... What shows itself by pushing his own phantasy, namely he himself there, if he were at the place of the other he would first of all think of not being there. Or more exactly of being taken for someone other than himself. And now we arrive at what? Very exactly at what happens. The scene here is all of a sudden exposed, developed by the patient. What happens is what: this dog in so far as it is himself he is not there. Here this dog is no longer phantastical, but well and truly this time in reality it is an other, no longer a signifier in any way, but an image, a companion in this room, and a companion all the more obviously close to him, assimilated to him, that it is against his own leg, to the patient that the dog comes to masturbate.

(30) What is the schema of what happens at this moment? It is essentially founded on the fact that the other, here the animal qua real, and which we know to have a relationship to the subject because the subject took care previously to inform us of it, he could imaginarily be this animal on condition that he takes on the signifier barking. This other who was present is masturbating. He shows him something, very precisely by masturbating. Is the situation determined here? No, as the patient himself tells us, there is the possibility that someone might enter, and then what shame, the situation would no longer be sustainable. The subject would literally disappear with shame before this other witness of what is happening.

In other words, what is articulated here: show me what I must do, on condition that the other in so far as he is the big Other, the third, is not there. I look at the other who I am, this dog, on condition that the other does not come in, otherwise I would disappear with shame. But on the contrary this other that I am, namely this dog, I look on him as an ego-ideal, as doing what I am not doing, as an ideal of potency as Ella Sharpe will later say, but undoubtedly not in the sense that she intends because precisely that has nothing to do with the words. Here it is to the degree precisely that the dog is not himself a speaking animal that he can here be the model and the image, and that the subject can see in him what he desires to see, namely that he is shown what he should do, what he can do, and this in so far as he is out of sight of the other, the someone who might come in, and of the one who speaks.

(31) And in other words, it is in so far as I have not yet gone to my analyst that I can imagine her, namely Ella Sharpe the poor woman, showing me by masturbating, and I cough in order to warn her that she has to take up a normal position.

It is in this game between the two others, the one who does not speak that one imagines, and the one to whom one is going to speak, that he is asked to be careful lest the confrontation should happen too quickly, lest the subject should begin to disappear. This is the point, the level. Where all of a sudden the memory of the dream is going to emerge. Well we will take up the dream the next time so that we can see that the interest of what the dream and the phantasy is going to show us is very precisely that it is the contrary of this phantasy that is forged in the waking state whose features we have today been circumscribing.

Seminar 10; Wednesday 28 January 1959

This research, this exercise which we are carrying out is to show you how in the use that we already make in our experience, practically, of the notion of desire, we presuppose without knowing it a certain number of relationships, of coordinates which are the ones that I am trying to situate by showing you that they are always the same, that it is therefore important to recognise them, because by failing to recognise them thinking always slips a little more to the right, a little more to the left, gets attached to coordinates that are badly defined, and that this is not without giving rise to problems in the way interpretation is practised.

Today I am going to continue the analysis of the dream that I chose in Ella Sharpe precisely for its exceptionally well elucidated character. And we are going to see things from these two aspects: the degree to which what she says, and the sharp, subtle, remarkable things that she says in this observation of the session in which the dream is analysed and the two sessions which follow - what is most remarkable in it is that it is something which is so well inscribed in the categories whose usage I am trying to teach you, that it is thanks to this that one can give to these elements all their value - and the degree to which by failing precisely to distinguish the originality of these elements, she manages to reduce in some way their importance, allows their colour and their features to fade a little, by mixing them, by reducing them to more impoverished, more summary notions which prevent her from getting everything that she could from what she has in her hands.

(2) But here and now, to fix if you wish in your minds something which is destined to take shape always more precisely and a little better, I think that you are beginning to glimpse what the two stories of the graph mean. In sum this route of analytic enuntiating which returns on itself in so far as it is I would say liberated by the principle, the rule of free association, tends towards what? To highlight as far as possible what is included in every discourse, a signifying chain of everything that each one knows qua fragmented, namely of interpretable elements.

And these interpretable elements, qua fragmented, appear precisely in the measure that the subject tries to reconquer himself in his originality, to be beyond what demand has fixed.

has imprisoned in him in terms of his needs. And in so far as the subject, in the expression of his needs, primitively finds himself caught up, moulded in the necessities which are proper to the demand, and which are essentially founded on the fact that already the form of the demand is altered, alienated by the fact that we must think in this form of language, it is already in the register of the other as such, in the code of the other that it must be inscribed.

It is at that level that there is produced the primitive separation, the primitive distance of the subject with respect to something which in its roots is his need, but which cannot, when it arrives, be the same thing, because it is going to be reconquered at the arrival, but only conquered beyond the demand, only in something realised by language, in the form of the subject who speaks, and that this something which is called what (3) the subject wants is something which is referred to the fact that the subject is going to constitute himself as being in a relationship that is no longer in a way immanent, completely included in his living participation, but on the contrary as declaring, as being, and therefore in a certain relationship to being.

In this interval - it is between language which is purely and simply questioning (guesitif), and language which is articulated, in which the subject responds to the question of what he wants, in which the subject constitutes himself with respect to what he is - it is in this interval that there is going to be produced this something which is going to be called specifically desire. And this desire, in this double inscription of the graph, is something which has some homology with this desire in so far as it is situated somewhere in the upper part of its coordinates, and the function that the ego has in so far as this discourse of the other corrects itself, and that the appeal to the other for the satisfaction of a need is constituted with respect to the other in what I sometimes called the full word, the committed word, in a relationship such as the following in which the subject constitutes himself with respect to the other, when he says to the other, "You are my master, you are my wife", this relationship which takes the ego and which establishes it with respect to an object in order to return here in the form of a message.

There is some homology between this relationship in which the ego is captured in the discourse of the other and the simple fact that someone speaks about me as me, about himself as himself; there is something articulated in a fragmentary way, which requires a (4) deciphering of a special order of desire. Just as the ego is constituted in a certain imaginary relationship to the other, so also desire is established, is fixed somewhere in the discourse of the other, halfway to this discourse, in which the subject by his whole life tends to complete himself in something in which his being halfway declares itself.

Desire is a reflection, a return in this effort by which the subject situates himself somewhere before what I designate for you as phantasy - namely the relationship of the subject qua evanescent, in so far as he vanishes in a certain relationship to an elective object, the phantasy always has this structure; it is never simply an object relation. The phantasy is something which cuts, a certain vanishing, a certain signifying fainting of the subject in the presence of an object. The phantasy satisfies a certain accommodation, a certain fixation of the subject, something which has an elective value. The electivity of this value, is what I am trying to show you this year with the help of a certain number of examples.

In this opposition of the subject to a certain object there is something which is implicit in the phantasy, in as much as it is the preface, the prelude to the dream enunciated by the subject. I think I already gave you a sense of it the last time.

The subject arrives and begins to speak about his cough, a message about a message, about this cough which is given as a mysterious warning before going into a room where two others might be, two others who might be making love, to warn them that it is time (5) to separate. On the other hand, in the associations, we see that this cough is something which is very close to a phantasy which he gives right away. Namely that he imagined in an old phantasy that if he were somewhere, and did not want to be found there because he ought not to be in this somewhere, he could bark like a dog, and everyone would say, oh, it's a dog.

The barking reveals itself, as being the signal by which the subject profoundly absents himself from the place where he is, signals himself as being other. And the correlation of the cough with the fact that a couple of others among whom a third association shows us that the subject is also included - because this dog whom he has been in order to bark, namely to make himself other than he is, we see now that in a third memory, this time of a real event, he tells us that this dog is a dog which came to masturbate against his leg: and what would have happened if the two of them had been surprised? In short we see being outlined something which, from the structural order, is essential.

When the two who are within a certain enclosure are confronted there face to face with one another in a properly imaginary relationship which means that what is in question is fairly well marked by the fact that this dog masturbates against his leg, this dog on this occasion, by the very phantasy in connection with which he is introduced, is himself also imaginary, the one who shows himself masturbating, so that he is not absent from the couple of lovers.

(6) But what is essential is not simply to describe that the subject's identification, as one might expect, is everywhere. It is just as much with the subject who is outside, and who announces himself, as with the subject who is inside and who is caught up in the relationships of the couple with what it involves in terms of common imaginary fascination. Either the two elements of the imaginary, dual couple remain joined in the common fascination here of the act, between embracing, intercourse and the specular fascination; either they remain joined and the other should not be there, or the other shows himself and then the others separate and break up.

It is the structure which it is important to highlight. It is what alters the problem, because when all is said and done what does the subject tell us: that he gave a little cough before going into his analyst even though it is clear that if he has been asked to come up it is because there was nobody else there, because she is all alone; that besides these are not the things, he says, which I would allow myself to think about in connection with you. However this indeed is the problem.

The subject by coughing, namely on the one hand by carrying out this act whose signification he himself does not know because he poses the question of its signification, in making himself by this cough like the dog with its bark other than he is he does not himself know what is this message, and nevertheless he announces himself by this cough. And in announcing himself what does he imagine? What does he imagine there is inside the room (7) for this cough that he signals for us as being in this case an impulse, a compulsion, something which annoys him because it overcame him - it is he himself who signals it, and I highlighted in this connection how striking it is that Ella Sharpe thought that in this connection she should not speak about it, that the subject was not conscious of it and that he should not be made conscious of it, even though it is he himself who introduces these questions, who says that it is a message, about what I do not know, but it is very clear - what does he imagine there is inside, what is the object that is there while he is outside, and announces himself in this fashion which alienates him, by this message which he does not understand? By this message whose association with the dog's bark is there to show that it is to announce himself as another, as someone other than himself that this condition manifests itself.

And notice that after making this loop, a first circuit in which he speaks to us first of all about his cough as a message, then of this phantasy in which he imagined himself to be a dog, we have pointed out in reality the linking of himself with a dog in a room, having in a way traced this passage in an indefinite, ambiguous fashion because he passes consecutively through something which reflects his desire, then embodies his phantasy, he comes back after having completed the loop somewhere. Because from that moment he is going to change register.

(8) At the very moment that my last lecture ended, the subject, the analyst tells us, coughs again, he gives a little cough, as if he were punctuating. (132) After this little cough he tells the dream which I already read.

What I want to tell you is what, starting from this, and in this dream, in connection with this dream, our aim is going to be. I told you that what is manifested in the dream about the relationship of desire to phantasy is manifested with an accentuation which is exactly the opposite of the one which was given in the phantasy which came in the associations. There what was accentuated was that the subject himself barks. He barks, it is a message, an announcement. He announces himself as essentially other. It is on the plane of a relationship which disguises him in so far as he barks like a dog that he does not understand why he proceeds in this way, that he should put himself in the position either of not being there, or if he is there of announcing himself as an other, and in such a way that the others at that moment, namely what is there to be seen, separate, disappear, no longer show what is there to be shown.

The enigma, is obviously what he imagines. The enigmatic character being well underlined by the fact that in effect what can he have to announce, desire to announce for him to give this cough at the moment that he enters his analyst's office? What is veiled is that aspect of the relationship with this object x who is on this occasion I would not say his analyst, but what is in the room.

(9) In the dream what we are going to see being put completely in the foreground, is something which is here. It is an imaginary element as we are going to see, which is not an indifferent one. And as you might expect, being in a dream it is marked by a certain function. What I have taught you about dreams would have no meaning if this function were not a signifier-function. We know well that what belongs to this aspect of the relationship in the phantasy of the subject, is also something which must have a complex function, not be just an image, but something signifying. But this remains veiled, enigmatic for us. We cannot articulate it as such.

All that we know, is that from the other side of the relationship, the subject has announced himself as other. Namely as a subject marked by the signifier, as a barred subject. In the dream, it is the image that we have, and what we do not know, is what is on the other side, namely: what is he, in this dream, namely what Ella Sharpe, in her interpretation of the dream, is going to try to articulate for him.

We now take the associations connected with the dream. Immediately after the subject has made this remark which concludes the dream, about the usage of the verb "to masturbate" which he had used in a transitive sense, and regarding which he points out that he should have used it intransitively in order to use it in a correct fashion, that having said: "She was so (10) disappointed I thought that I would masturbate her."

It is obviously something else that is in question, either it is a question of the subject masturbating himself - this indeed is what the analyst thinks, and this is what she is going to suggest to him immediately by underlining what the subject himself has remarked, namely that the verb should have been used intransitively. In this connection the subject remarks that in effect that it was very rare for him to masturbate anybody. He only did it once with another boy. "That is the only time I can remember." And he continues: "The dream is in my mind vividly. There was no orgasm. I see the front of her genitals, the end of the vulva." And he describes something large and projecting hanging downwards like a fold on a hood. "Hoodlike it was, and it was this that the woman made use of in manoeuvring" (it is the term that he had used in the dream). "The vagina seemed to close around my finger. The hood seemed strange." (133)

The analyst replies: "What else do you think of - let the look of it be in your mind." The patient replies: "I think of a cave. There is a cave on the hillside where I lived as a child. I often went there with my mother. It is visible from the road along which one walks. It's most remarkable feature is that it has an (11) overhanging top to it which looks very much like a huge lip." (134) Something like the grotto of the cyclops at Capri where the coast is littered with things like that. A cave with a part of it projecting forward.

In this connection he makes a very remarkable association. "There is some joke about the labia running crosswise and not longitudinally, but I don't remember how the joke was arranged, some comparison between Chinese writing and our own, starting from different sides, or from bottom to top. Of course the labia are side by side, and the vagina walls are back and front, that is one longitudinal and the other crosswise. I'm still thinking of the hood", he says.

These jokes, which in English are a sort of part of the cultural heritage, are well known, they are generally in the form of limericks. The limerick is something which is very important and revealing. I am only mentioning that. I searched in a fairly large collection of some three thousand limericks. This limerick certainly exists, I saw others which were close to it. I do not even know why the theme of China seems precisely to be considered - there was this sort of inversion of the written line - evoked, every time something comes close to a certain assimilation, and at the same time an opposition between the line (12) of the genital slit and that of the mouth, which is transversal, with also what is supposed to be behind the line of the genital slit in terms of the transversality of the vagina.

This goes to show that all of this is very very ambiguous. The closest thing to it, and something which is amusing because of the fact that one cannot see why especially China should come into this association, is the following, limerick 1381 of a work on limericks (English quotation):

"There was a young woman from China who thought her mouth was her vagina
She covered her enormous clitoris with rouge
And put lipstick on her labia minora" (?)

This loses its its spice in translation, but it is pretty remarkable that it is in any case something which is extremely close to what we are dealing with, and its author underlines for us that the superpositioning of two images, one which is here an image of the mouth, the other which is a genital image, is very-essential .

What am I going to call attention to here? It is in connection with something with regard to which analytic thought slips right away towards imaginary elements, namely the assimilation of the mouth to the vagina, the mother's womb considered as the primitive element of engulfing or of devouring - and we have all sorts of different testimonies from ethnology, folklore, psychology which show this primitive relationship, as being that of container to contained, that the child may have with respect to what one can call the maternal image.

(13) Does it not seem to you that at this level something deserves to be retained of which I would say that it has quite the same accent as the point that I stopped you at the other time when it was a question of the big and the small giraffe. It was not simply the element between the small and the big, between the mother and the phallus; these elements were what little Hans made of them; one could sit on them, crumple them up; they were symbols, they were already in phantasy things transformed into paper.

One could say in a fashion that is more nuanced, more interrogative, more subject to confirmation, but let us say to punctuate what we are dealing with that this is not nothing, that it is not invalid to introduce there something concerning this very remarkable represented imaginary element which is in the dream and which was depicted for us as something very precisely described, "the fold on a hood". This is not nothing. It is something which already has a certain structure, which covers, which caps, which is also dreaded; and the finger introduced - "to close round" - into this element, this sudden fright is also something which gives us something quite precise as an image, something which should not be lost in a simple general structure of envelopment or of devouring or of swallowing up. It is already put into a certain relationship, precisely with the subject's finger. And I would even say that this is the whole question. Does he or does he not put his finger there? It is (14) certain that he puts his finger there and that he does not put anything else, in particular that he does not put there his penis, which is there present; that this relationship with what has enveloped, gloved the hand is something which is here quite prevalent, put forward, pushed forward at the outcome of the representativity as Freud says to designate the third element active in the dream-work (Traumarbeit).

It is a question of knowing what we should make of this. Whether we should immediately resolve it into a series of readymade, preformed significations, namely everything that one is going to be able to put under that heading, ourselves introduce into this kind of conjurer's hat everything that we are used to finding in it, or whether we should dwell on this, respect it as something which has here a specific value.

You must see, when I say specific value, provided you have a little bit more than book-knowledge about what a phantasy-life like this can be, that after all that it is quite appropriate that we should not lose this in the very general notion for example of the interior of the mother's stomach of which there is so much talk in phantasies.

Something which is so well developed in the dream deserves to be dwelt on. What we have here before us, is certainly not the interior of a uterus, it is overhanging, this edge which is projecting. And moreover, because she is extremely subtle, Ella Sharpe underlines further on, in a passage which we may (15) subsequently have to encounter, that we are before something remarkable. It is a projection, she says, and immediately afterwards in the passage she announces it is equivalent to a penis. (144)

This is possible, but why hurry one's self. All the more because she also underlines at this moment that it is difficult to make of this projection something linked to the presence of the vagina. It is sufficiently accentuated in the dream, and by the very manoeuvre to which the subject lends himself, I would say substitutes for himself by putting his finger there and not his penis. How could one not see that very precisely this something is localised as one might say in this phantasy which is in effect, as the subject articulates it, something which has the closest relationship with the front and back walls of the vagina; that in a word for a doctor whose profession it is to practice medicine - which was not the case of Ella Sharpe who was a teacher of literature, and this gave her great openings into psychology - it is a prolapse, something which happens in the wall of the vagina in which there occurs this projection of the front wall more or less followed by projections of the back wall and which at a still further stage makes the tip of the cervix appear at the genital orifice. It is something extremely frequent which poses all sorts of problems for a surgeon.

This is not what is in question. Naturally there is here something which brings into play immediately the question and the phantasy of the phallic woman, it is so true that I remembered (16) for your benefit - I was not able to verify the passage (it is a fact that is well enough known for it not to be new for some of you) that Queen Christina of Sweden, the friend of Descartes, who was a tough woman like all the women of that epoch - one could not insist too much on the influence on history of the women of that marvellous half of the eighteenth century. Queen Christina herself one day saw appearing at the orifice of the vulva the tip of a uterus which, without us knowing the reasons for it, happened at that moment of her existence to gape open in a quite characteristic case of uterine collapse (or prolapse). It was then that giving way to a gross flattery her doctor fell at her feet saying: "It is a miracle, Jupiter has finally rendered to you your true sex". Which proves that the phantasy of the phallic woman does not date from yesterday even in the history of medicine or of philosophy.

This is not what is in the dream, nor should it be understood - the analyst remarks on it later in the observation - that the subject's mother for example had a prolapse. Although why not because in the articulation of her understanding of what is happening the analyst remarks that the subject very probably saw all sorts of things from underneath, that some of his imaginings make us think that there could have been, that there even must have been, in order that her interpretation should be coherent, something analogous, namely a certain apprehension from underneath (17) the skirt of the genital organ (and of that of his mother). But why not go in this direction?

But that is not it. We will be much more entitled to do it in this sense than the analyst herself, in so far as in a little while she is going to pass necessarily by way of this supposition. For our part we have not yet got there. I point out simply that once there is question of references to images of the body - they are going to be brought into play in the interpretation - one would not be precise, why would one not distinguish the haunting memory, or the desire, or the fear of returning into the maternal womb, and the relationship very especially with the vagina which after all is not something of which, as can be seen clearly in this simple explanation, the subject could not have some direct or indirect apprehension.

What I simply wish to underline here, after having marked the special accent of this image of the dream, is that in any case something retains us. It is the fact that the subject associates it right away with something of a quite different order, with this poetic or verbal game which I gave you an example of and not simply to amuse myself - it is to give an idea of the extremely rigorous literary style; it is a genre which has the strictest of laws - and it does not matter whether it is a joke or a limerick, bearing on a story defined literally, and itself bearing on a game concerning writing. Because what we (18) have not found in the limerick that we dug up, is something that the subject affirms that he has heard: it was in referring to the different direction of lines of writing in our way of writing and the Chinese that he evokes at that moment something which is not all that obvious in this association: namely precisely something which puts him on the track of a link between the orifice of the genital lips and the lips of the mouth.

Let us take it that this link as such belongs to this symbolic order. What are more symbolic are the lines of Chinese characters, because it is something which is there, which designates to us that in any case this element here in the dream is an element which has a signifying value, that in this sort of adaptation, of assimilation, of accommodation of desire in so far as it constructs itself somewhere in relation to a phantasy which is between the signifier of the other and the signified of the other - because that is the definition of phantasy - in so far as desire has to accommodate itself to it.

And what am I saying there if not expressing in a more articulated fashion what our experience is when we are seeking to focus what the desire of the subject is. It is that, something which is a certain position of the subject face to face with a certain object in so far as he puts it in an intermediary position between a pure and simple signification, a thing assumed, clear, transparent for him, and something else which is not a phantasy at all, which is not a need, which is not a (19) pressure, a rope (filin), but something which is always of the order of the signifier qua signifier, something closed, enigmatic. Between the two there is a thing which appears here in the form of a representation which is tangible, extremely precise, imaged. And the subject, warns us by his very associations: this is what is significant.

What am I going to do now? Am I going to go into the way in which the analyst interprets? I must therefore let you know all the material that we have.

What does this analyst say at that moment as she continues: "What else do you think of ... " She replies to the fact that the subject takes up after having coughed, comes back to the hood.

"I'm still thinking of the hood." "Yes, how now?", says the analyst. "A funny man" he says, "at one of the earliest golf courses I remember. He said he could get me a golf bag cheaply and the material would be motor hood cloth'." At this point he gives an imitation after having said: "It was the accent I remember. Imitating him like that reminds me of a friend who broadcasts impersonations which are very clever," ("broadcast" is the important word), "but it sounds swank, to tell you as swanky as telling you what a marvellous wireless set I have. It picks up all stations with no difficulty." "My friend has a splendid memory," he says. "She remembers her childhood too, but mine is (20) so bad below eleven years. I do remember, however, one of the earliest songs we heard at the theatre and she imitated the man afterwards." It is a typical English music hall song which goes as follows: "Where did you get that hat, where did you get that tile?" The tile designates more particularly what is called in this case a topper, a top hat. It can also signify simply lid, or galurin.

"My mind," he continues, "has gone to the hood again and I am remembering the first car I was ever in," but at that time of course it was not called a car but a motor, because the subject is fairly old.

"Well! The hood of this motor was one of its most obvious features. It was strapped back when not in use. The inside of it was lined with scarlet." And he continues: "The peak of speed for that car was about sixty," he speaks about this car as if he were speaking about the life of a car, as if it were human. "I remember I was sick in that car, and that reminds me of the time I had to urinate into a paper bag when I was in a railway train as a child. Still I think of the hood." (134-135)

We are going to stop here in the associations. They do not go very far yet, but I want all the same to counterpoint what I am bringing you here with the way in which the analyst begins to interpret this. "The first thing of importance" she says, "is to find the cardinal clue to the significance of the dream."

(21) She says quite rightly: "We can do that by noting just the moment when it came to the patient's mind." (138) And then she begins to speak about the dog which masturbated against his leg, about the moment when just before he spoke about the dog to say that he himself imitated this dog, then the cough, then the dream from which he awoke perspiring.

"The deduction," she says, "concerning the significance of the whole dream is that it is a masturbation phantasy." (138) I am in complete agreement with this.

That is of first importance, we agree with her completely. "The next thing to notice," she says, "in connection with this masturbation phantasy is the theme of potency." She does not understand it in the sense of sexual potency, but in the sense of potency in the most universal meaning of the term, as she would say further on, of omnipotence.

"He is travelling round the world. It is the longest dream he has ever had." (This is what the subject says). "It would take a whole hour to relate. Correlate with that his deprecation of 'swank' regarding his friend's impersonations which are broadcast for the whole world", the analyst adds, "and his own wireless which picks up every station. Note his own imitation of the man whose accent had attracted him, a strong colloquial accent, and incidentally he said with regard to this man he had once been a butcher'."

"Impersonation here, whether via friend or himself, has the (22) significance of imitating a stronger or better known person." Is she wrong here? "This is again a further clue to the meaning of the masturbation phantasy, that is, a phantasy in which he is impersonating another person, one of immense power and potency." (139) Here therefore is what is held by the analyst to be self-evident. Namely that the simple fact of these mimed incarnations intervening more or less in connection with - the masturbation phantasy being supposed to be at the root of what happens - the very fact that the subject excused himself for swanking, for boasting, for pushing himself too much, signifies that we have a phantasy of omnipotence which should be put in the foreground.

And is this something that we can subscribe to right away? Once again I would simply ask you here to notice that the least that can be said is that there is perhaps some confusion in saying that it is a matter of an omnipotence that is wished for, or more or less secretly assumed by the subject, even though it seems that this subject, if we keep to the first approach of the dream, its manifest content in this case is rather on the contrary to reduce, to minimise. And the analyst herself underlines it on another occasion about the hood. The analyst is in fact so much further on than her own interpretation under the influence of a certain apprehension of that, of this reduced aspect of the subject in his whole presence in this phantasy, that she always says that he saw or perceived that when he was a tiny child.

(23) In fact what do we see? We see rather the subject making himself small. In the presence of this kind of vaguely testicular appendix which at the very most he dares approach with a finger which he should perhaps cap, cover, protect, in any case distancing from himself and from the proper exercise of his potency, in any case sexual potency, this signifying object, it is perhaps going a little far, and it is always the same confusion, to confuse the omnipotence imputed to the subject as even more or less denied, with what is on the contrary quite clear on this occasion, the omnipotence of the word.

But the fact is that there is a world between the two because it is precisely in contact with the word that the subject is in difficulty. He is a lawyer, he is very talented, he is seized by the most severe phobias every time he has to appear, to speak. We are told at the beginning that his father died when he was three years old, that the subject had the greatest trouble in bringing him to life a little bit in his memories; but what is the only memory which remains absolutely clear for him: there has been transmitted to him in the family that the last word of his father had been: "Robert must take my place" (127) In what sense is the death of the father dreaded? Is it in so far as the father is dead or in so far as the dying father spoke, said, "He must take my place. Namely be where I am, where I am dying?"

The difficulty of the subject with respect to the word, this distance which means that he uses the word precisely to be (24) elsewhere, and that inversely there is nothing harder for him than not just speaking, but making his father speak - that was only recently reached and it was a startling moment for him the analyst tell us to think that his father spoke - it is not something which at least ought to encourage us to accentuate for him more than for someone else this division between the other qua speaking and the other qua imaginary. Because to be honest, is there not a certain prudence required at this level.

The analyst finds a confirmation of the omnipotence of the subject in the immense character of the dream. The immense character of the dream we can only know about it from the subject. It is he who tells us that he has had a tremendous dream, that there was a huge story beforehand, that there was a whole tour around the world, a hundred thousand adventures which would take an enormous time to tell, that he not going to bore the analyst with. But when all is said and done the mountain gives birth to a little story, to a mouse. If there is here also a notion of something which is indicated as a horizon of omnipotence, it is a narrative but a narrative which is not told. The omnipotence is always on the side of the other, on the side of the world of the word as such. Should we right away see the subject in this case as in terms of what is supposed, and what will immediately be implied in the thinking of the analyst, as being the structure of the subject, not alone this phantasy as omnipotent, but with the aggressivity that this involves?

(25) It is at this that we should first of all stop to situate precisely what I am in the process of trying to get you to notice, namely the partiality that sometimes appears to occur in the interpretations in the measure that there is ignored a difference of plane which, when it is sufficiently accentuated in the structure itself, must be respected. It is on this condition alone that we know that this difference of plane exists.

What is the question that is posed immediately afterwards, says the analyst : it is "why this phantasy of extreme power?" The answer is given in the dream. He is going around the world. I would put as commensurate with this idea the actual memory that came to him when he was describing the hood in the dream which was so strange, for it brought out not only the fact that he was describing a projection, a fold of a hood, but that the hood was also overhanging like the lip of a cave. So that we get directly the hood and lips of the vulva compared with the great cave on the hillside to which he went with his mother. Hence the masturbation phantasy is one associated with immense potency because he is dreaming of compassing mother earth, of being adequate to the huge cave beneath the protruding lips. That is the second thing of importance" (139)

You see how the analyst's thinking proceeds on this occasion.

(26) Incontestably you cannot avoid sensing a leap here. That there is a relationship because of the association, this is demonstrated, between this memory of the child where he himself was covered, as they say, and the one that is in question, mainly the signifying value of the phantasy that I would call the prolapse phantasy, this of course is not to be excluded. That the subject should be considered by this very fact as being the classical subject as I might say, of the oedipal relationship, namely the subject who raises himself to the level of this embracing of the mother which here becomes the very embracing of mother earth of the whole world, there is here something which seems to me to be a step that is taken too quickly, especially when we know the way, beside this classic, grandiose, schema of the oedipal hero, in so far as he shows himself to be able for the mother, the degree to which opposed to this schema we can see the fact that separated out so well from a phase of the evolution of the child, namely the moment when very precisely the integration of his organ as such is linked to a feeling of inadequacy - contrary to what the analyst says - as regards what would be in question in an enterprise such as the conquest or the embracing of the mother. Effectively this element can play a role, plays an incontestable role, manifested in an altogether immediate way in a great number of observations concerning precisely this narcissistic relationship of the subject to his penis in so far as it is considered by him to be more or less insufficient, too small.

There is not only the relationship with his counterparts, the

(27) masculine rivals, coming into play. Clinical experience shows us on the contrary that the inadequacy of the penis with respect to the feminine organ which is supposed to be quite enormous with respect to the masculine organ, is something too important for us to go so quickly here.

The analyst continues: "Next I would draw your attention to the associations concerning lips and labia. The woman who was a stimulus for the dream had full red passionate lips. In the dream he had a vivid picture of the labia and the hood. The cave had an overhanging lip. He thinks of things longitudinal like labia and then of crosswise things - where I would now suggest the mouth as compared with vulva." This without commentary. "He thinks, moreover, of the first motor he was in and of its hood and of the scarlet lining in that motor. He then thinks immediately of the speed of the car, and says the peak of its speed was so many miles an hour, and then speaks of the life of the car and notices that he talks of a car as if it were human." From that, "I should deduce that the memory of the actual cave which he visited with his mother also acts as a cover memory. I would deduce that there is projected onto the motor with its scarlet lined hood this same forgotten memory and that the peak of speed has the same significance as the projection in the genitals in the dream - it is the peak of the hood. I infer there is an actual repressed memory of seeing the genitals of someone much older than himself; of seeing them when he was tiny

(28) and I infer this from both the car and the cave and going around the world in conjunction with the immense potency required. The peak, the hood, I interpret as the clitoris."

Here all the same, a little like the way I said above that the mountain announced by the dream gave birth to a mouse, there is something analogous to be seen in what I would almost call the mumblings of the analyst.

I am willing to accept that this peak of speed is identifiable with the hood, but if it is really something so pointed, so enormous, how can it be associated with a real memory, experienced in childhood. There is all the same some exaggeration in concluding so daringly that it is a question here for the subject of a screen memory concerning an effective experience of the feminine genital organ in so far as it is a question of the clitoris. This indeed in effect is what nevertheless the analyst resorts to in mentioning at that moment as a key element the fact that his sister is eight years older than him, and the references he made to the woman's voice and to the voice of the impersonated man, which are alike by imitation. "Considering that the reference to her is in connection with male impersonation, I deduce that at least when he was very tiny he saw her genitals, noticed the clitoris and heard her urinate." She has to however immediately afterwards further evoke, considering all the work in analysis so far done, that "in addition there was some babyhood situation in which he had a quite definite opportunity of seeing his mother's genitals."
(29) All the details suppose that in his memories, in these images, that he would have been at that moment lying on the floor, when he saw something or other.

I am going all the same to punctuate for you here something which will indicate to you at least where I want to get to in these criticisms in which I am teaching you to look for, to spell out as one might say the sense in which a certain number of inflections in the understanding of what is presented to us are going, which are not destined I believe to increase its likelihood, nor indeed above all, you will see this when we get to it, give it its proper interpretation.

I must all the same make my position clear. I mean tell you where I am trying to get to, what I intend to say in opposition to this tunnel within which the thinking of the analyst is engaged. And you will see that these interpretations are in this regard extremely active, even brutal, suggesting that the root of the question is the aggressive character of his own penis. You will see that it is his penis qua aggressive organ, qua an organ which brings into play the dangerous and deleterious character of the water that it emits, namely the urination which you have seen evoked in this case, and to which we will have occasion to come back, since the analyst obtains an effect which we need not be surprised at in that an adult subject, and one who is rather old, wet his bed the following night. But let us leave this to one side.

What I mean is the following: I believe that this dream, if I may anticipate a little what I believe I am going to be able to (30) demonstrate for you by continuing this painful and slow work of line by line analysis of what is presented to us Where is the question posed in what can be called the fundamental phantasy of the subject in so far as it is presentified? The subject imagines something, we do not know what, concerning his analyst - I will tell you what the analyst herself thinks about the point reached in the transference. This transference is at that moment a transference of a clearly imaginary type. The analyst is focussed, centred as something which is essentially, with respect to the subject, in the relationship of an other ego. The whole rigid, measured, attitude of defence, as the analyst very well senses it, in the presence of Ella Sharpe, is something which indicates a very tight specular relationship with the analyst. And contrary to what Ella Sharpe says, it is very far from being an indication that there is no transference. It is a certain type of transference from a dual imaginary source.

This analyst, in so far as she is the image of him, is in the process of doing what? This imposes itself already. It is quite clear that what the subject warns her against by his little cough, is that she is dreaming of masturbating. This is what she is thought to be in the process of doing. But how do we know it? We do not know it immediately, and this is very important. How could we know it: it is to the degree that in the dream the matter is then quite clear because it is precisely what the subject is saying: namely that there is someone masturbating.

The analyst recognises quite correctly that it is a question of (31) the subject masturbating, that it is he who is dreaming. But that the dream is the manifested intention in the subject of masturbating her - adding that this is an intransitive verb - is enough to put us on the track of the following: that the signifying phantasy that is in question is that of the close link between a male and female element taken along the theme of a sort of enveloping. I mean that the subject is not simply captured, contained in the other. In so far as he masturbates her, he masturbates himself, but also he does not masturbate.

I mean that the fundamental image that is in question, which is presentified there by the dream, is of a sort of sheath, a glove. They are moreover in fact the same words. Sheath (gaine) is the same word as vagina (vagin)

Here are two linguistic encounters which are not without signification. There would be a lot to say from the linguistic point of view about the sheath, the glove, the scabbard (fourreau), because I think there is here a whole chain of images which it is extremely important to locate, because they are much more constant you will see, and present, not just in this particular case but in many other cases.

What is in question is that the imaginary, signifying person is something in which the subject sees in a way, enveloped, captured, every sort of possibility of his sexual manifestation. It is with respect to this central image that he signifies his desire and that his desire is in a way stuck.

I am going to try to show it to you because I must do a little (32) more to justify the following notion: in the sequence of associations there is going to appear an idea which crossed the subject's mind, the analyst tells us, during the recent associations. The subject in the course of his duties must go to a place where the king and queen are to be present. He is haunted by the idea of having a breakdown in the middle of the road, and by this of blocking the passage of the royal motor car. The analyst sees here once more the manifestations of the omnipotence dreaded by the subject for himself, and even goes so far as to see in it - we will see this in detail the next time - the fact that the subject had the opportunity, during some primitive scenes of intervening in this fashion, of stopping something, the parents, during this primitive scene.

What on the contrary seems to me to be very striking, is precisely the function of the car to which we will return. The subject is in a car, and far from separating anything by this stopping - he no doubt stops the others; we know well that he stops everything because this is what is in question; that is why he is in analysis; everything stops, he stops the others, the royal, parental couple on this occasion in a car and well and truly in a single car which envelops them like the hood of his car, which he evoked by his associations, reproducing the character of the covering cave.

We are at the time when Melanie Klein is beginning to show (33) the relationship between it and sexual consumption (consomption) . There was some of it in his childhood. But where was he? He was in bed, and you will see him severely restricted by pins put in the sheets. There are other elements which also show us the subject in his pram with a harness and straps.

The question for the subject, as it is presented to us here, is the following: in the very measure that he is bound, that he himself is stopped, he can enjoy his phantasy precisely, and participate in it by this supplementary activity, this derived, displaced activity, which is compulsive urination. In the very measure that he was bound at this moment even this sort of supplement, of false jouissance which this urination gives him that we note so frequently precisely in subjects in relationship to the proximity of parental intercourse. At that moment he becomes what? Precisely this partner whom he tells us needs so much for him to show her everything, and that it is necessary that he must do everything, that he must feminise himself. In so far as he is impotent, as one might say, he is male. And that this has compensations on the level of ambitious potency, is something we will come back to it the next time, but in so far as he is liberated he feminises himself.

It is in this sort of game of hide-and-seek, this double game, of the non-separation of the two aspects in him of femininity and masculinity, in this type of unique, fundamentally masturbatory phantastical apprehension, that the apprehension of sexual desire remains for him that the problem lies; and I hope to show the next time the degree to which we are justified in orienting our interpretations in this sense to allow the subject to take a step forward.

Seminar 11; Wednesday 4 February 1959

We have come then to the moment of trying to interpret this dream of Ella Sharpe's subject. An undertaking naturally which we can only attempt, moreover in a purely theoretical way, as a research exercise, because of the exceptionally well-developed character of this dream which occupies, according to Ella Sharpe whom we trust on this point, a crucial point in the analysis.

The subject, who had a tremendous dream which would take hours to recount, which he says he has forgotten, that there only remains this event which happens on a road in Czechoslovakia on which he find himself because he had undertaken a journey around the world with his wife. I even underlined that he said: "A journey with my wife around the world." He found himself on a road and what happens there is that he is in short involved in sexual events with a woman who, I point out, appears in a certain fashion which is not said in the first text of the dream. The subject says: I see at the same time that she is above me, she was doing everything she could to get my penis, (cf 133) This is an expression which we will have to come back to later on.

Of course says the subject, I did not agree with this at all, to the point that I thought that she was so disappointed that I should masturbate her. He makes a remark here on the fundamentally intransitive nature of the verb "to masturbate" in English, which we as well as the author have already taken an interest in - even though the author did not accentuate less (2) directly its basis on what was a sort of grammatical remark by the subject - by remarking that it was a question of course of a masturbation of the subject.

We highlighted the last time the value of what appears even less in the associations than in the development of the image of the dream: namely that is formed by this fold, this pinned hood like the fold of a hood of which the subject speaks. And we have shown that undoubtedly the recourse to the stock of images taken into consideration by the classical doctrine, and which are obviously derived from experience, when they are brought into play in a way as so many separate objects, without locating their function very well in relation to the subject, tends perhaps towards something which can be forced, regarding which we underlined the last time the paradoxes that there can be in the too hasty interpretation of this singular appendix, of this protrusion of the feminine genital organ as being already the sign that what is in question is the mother's phallus. (144)

And also moreover something like this does not fail to encourage another leap in the analyst's thinking, so true is it that an imprudent step can only be rectified, contrary to what is said, by another imprudent step, that error is much less erudite than is believed because the only chance of saving oneself from an error is to commit another one which compensates for it.

We are not saying that Ella Sharpe erred completely. We are trying to articulate better modes of direction which would have (3) been able to permit a more complete accommodation. This is subject to every reservation of course because we will never have the crucial experience.

But the next leap that I spoke about is that what is in question is again much less the phallus of the partner, of the partner in this case imagined in the dream, than the phallus of the subject. This we know; we admit the masturbatory nature of the dream, matched by many other things in all that appears afterwards in the statements of the subject. But this phallus of the subject, we are already led to consider it as being this instrument of destruction, of aggression, of an extremely primitive type, as it emerges from what could be called imagery. And it is in this sense that the thinking of the analyst, Ella Sharpe in this case, is already oriented. And even though she is far from communicating all her interpretation to the subject, the point on which she is immediately going to intervene is in this sense that she tells him, it is after having pointed out to him the elements that she calls omnipotent - according to her interpretation what appears according to her in the dream is: secondly masturbation, thirdly this masturbation is omnipotent in the sense that it is dealing with this boring and biting organ which is the subject's own phallus. (146)

It must be said that there is here a real intrusion, a real theoretical extrapolation on the part of the analyst, because in fact nothing, either in the dream or in the associations, gives any kind of basis for bringing immediately into the (4) interpretation this notion the subject has that the phallus here intervenes as an organ of aggression, and that what might be dreaded would be in a way the return, the retortion of the aggression that is implied on the part of the subject.

One cannot help underlining here that it is hard to see at what moment the subject passes from these intrusions to the analysis of what she had effectively before her eyes and which she senses with such detail and finesse. It is clear that it is a question of theory. It is enough to read this formula to perceive that after all nothing justifies it except something that the analyst does not tell us. But again she has sufficiently informed us, and with enough care, about the antecedents of the dream, about the patient's case in its broad details, for us to say that there is undoubtedly here something which constitutes a leap.

That this might have appeared necessary is indeed after all something that we will willingly concede to her, but it also appears necessary to us, it is on this point that we pose the question and that we are going to try to take up this analysis again, not in a way to substitute for the imaginary equivalents, for the interpretations in the sense that it is understood properly speaking, something which is a given and should be understood like that

It is not a question of knowing at one or other moment what each element of the dream means on the whole. On the whole one can only say that these elements are more than correctly judged. (5) They are based on a tradition of analytic experience at the time Ella Sharpe is working. And on the other hand they are certainly perceived with great discernment and with great finesse. That is not the question. It is to see whether the problem cannot be clarified by being formulated, articulated in a fashion which better links the interpretation with this thing on which I am trying to put the accent for you here, namely the intersubjective topology, which in different forms is always the one which I am trying here to construct before you, to reinstate in so far as it is the very one of our experience: that of the subject, of the small other, of the big Other, in so far as their places should always, at the moment of every phenomenon in analysis, be marked by us if we wish to avoid this sort of tangle, this knot which has been really entwined like a thread which no one can unknot and which forms, as one might say, the daily stuff of our analytic explanations.

We have already gone through this dream under many forms and we can all the same begin to articulate something simple, direct, something which is even not at all absent from the observation or which can be extracted from this reading that we have carried out. I would say at the stage of what precedes, what the subject brings, and of the dream itself, there is a word which with everything that we have here in terms of a vocabulary in common seems to be the one which comes first, and it cannot be ruled out that at that time it may have come to Ella Sharpe's mind. It is not at all a question of bringing into play a notion which was not within her range? we are in the English milieu which is (6) dominated at that time by discussions such as those being developed for example between people like Jones and Joan Riviere whom we already brought up here in connection with her article: "On womanliness as a masquerade". I spoke to you about it in connection with the discussion concerning the phallic woman (or phase) and the phallic function in feminine sexuality.

There is a word that he gives importance to at a particular moment, which is the moment which is really necessary for Jones to enter into the understanding of what is indeed the most difficult point to understand, not simply to bring into play, in analysis, namely the castration complex. The word that Jones uses is the word aphanisis, which he introduced in an interesting fashion into the analytic vocabulary, and which we must not at all consider as being absent from the English milieu, because it makes a great deal of it.

Aphanisis means disappearance, in so far as he understands it in that way. And what he means by that we will see further on. But for the moment I am going to make a quite different use of it; what is really an impressionistic use for what is really there all the time throughout the material of the dream, its surrounds, the behaviour of the subject, everything that we have already tried to articulate in connection with what is presented, with what is proposed to Ella Sharpe.

This very subject who, before presenting himself to her in a fashion which she so finely describes, with this sort of profound absence which of itself gives her the feeling that there is no remark of the subject, nor any of his gestures (7) which is not entirely thought out, and that nothing corresponds to anything connected with feeling. This subject who is so cautious, who moreover does not announce himself, who appears, but who once he appears is more elusive than if he were not there; this subject who himself has put to us in the preliminaries of what he brought forward about his dream, this question which he posed in connection with his little cough. And this little cough is given in order to do what? To make something which must be there at the other side of the door disappear. We do not know what. He says it himself: in the case of the analyst, what is there to make disappear? He evokes in this connection the warning given in other circumstances, in another context, that it is a question of them separating, of disuniting, because the situation might be embarrassing if he entered. And so on.

In the dream we are in the presence of three characters, because it must not be forgotten that his wife is there. Once the subject has said it he does not speak about it any more. But what exactly happens with the sexual partner, the one in fact whom he evades. Is it all that sure that he is evading her? What follows in what he says proves that he is far from being completely absent; and he put his finger, he tells us in this sort of protruding, inside-out vagina, this sort of prolapsed vagina on which I laid stress. Here again questions are posed and we are going to pose them. Where is what is at stake, where is the important thing in this scene? That which in so (8) far as one can pose this question in connection with a dream - and we can only pose it in so far as the whole Freudian theory obliges us to pose it - what will be produced immediately afterwards in the associations of the dream, is something which involves this friend, mediated by a memory which came to him concerning the hood that constitutes the feminine sexual organ of someone who on a golf course offered him something in which his clubs could be put, and whom he found to be a really funny person. He speaks about him with a kind of amused pleasure. And one can clearly see what is happening around this real character. He is really the sort of person who makes you ask where he came out of.

This is the way he speaks about him. With that face, and that glibness what could he have been. Maybe a butcher, he says. God knows why he says a butcher. But the style and the general atmosphere, the ambiance of impersonation in connection with this character - immediately afterwards he is going to start imitating him - shows that here it is a question of

This moreover is the way that the notion of imitation is introduced, and the association with his friend who impersonates men so well, who is so talented, and who exploits that talent by broadcasting. And in this connection the first idea that comes to the subject is that he is talking too much about her, that he seems to be boasting by speaking about a relationship with somebody so remarkable, to be "swanking". I checked the (9) English word that he uses: it is quite a new word, that can almost be considered to be slang, and that I have tried to translate here by la ramener. He uses it to say: I feel guilty to be swanking like that. In a word he disappears, he makes himself very small, he does not want to take too much space on this occasion.

In short, what forces itself on us the whole time, what recurs as a theme, as a leitmotif in all the discourse, the remarks of the subject, is something for which the term aphanisis appears to be here much closer to "to make disappear" than "to disappear". It is something that is a perpetual game in which we sense that in different forms something - let us call this if you wish the object of interest - is never there.

The last time I insisted on this. It is never where it is expected, it slips from one point to another in a sort of conjuring trick. I am going to insist on it again, and you are going to see where this will take us, what is the essential, the characteristic at every level of the confrontation before which the analyst finds herself.

The subject cannot put anything forward without immediately, in some way, subtilising what is essential in it as one might say. And I would point out that in Jones also this term aphanisis is a term which is open to a critique which would end up with a denunciation of some inversion of perspective.

Jones remarked in his subjects that with the approach of the castration complex what he senses, what he understands, what he sees in them, is the fear of aphanisis, of the disappearance of desire. And in a way what he tells us, is that castration - he (10) does not formulate it this way because he does not have the apparatus - is the symbolisation of this loss.

We have underlined what an enormous problem it is to see in some genetic perspective, how a subject, let us presuppose in his development at some moment or other, at a sort of animal level of his subjectivity, begins to see the tendency being detached from itself in order to become the fear of its own loss. And Jones makes of aphanisis the substance of the fear of castration.

Here I would point out that it is exactly in the opposite sense that things should be taken. It is because there can be castration, it is because there is the interplay of signifiers implied in castration, that in the subject there can be elaborated this dimension in which he can be afraid, alarmed, about the future possible disappearance of his desire.

Let us note carefully that if we give to something like desire a full meaning, the meaning of tendency, at the level of animal psychology, it is difficult for us to conceive of it as something altogether accessible in human experience. The fear of the lack of desire is all the same a step which has to be explained. To explain it he tells you: the human subject in so far as he has to inscribe himself in the signifier finds there a position from which effectively he puts in question his need in so far as his need is caught up, modified, identified in (11) demand. And in that way everything can be very satisfactorily conceptualised, and the function of the castration complex in this case, namely the way in which this taking up of a position by the subject in the signifier implies the loss, the sacrifice of one of his signifiers among others, is what we are leaving to one side for the moment.

What I want simply to say, is that the fear of aphanisis in neurotic subjects corresponds, contrary to what Jones believes, to something which should be understood in the perspective of an insufficient formation, articulation, of a partial foreclosure of the castration complex. It is in so far as the castration complex does not protect the subject from this sort of confusion, distraction, anxiety which manifests itself in the fear of aphanisis which we see effectively in neurotics. And this is something we are going to be able to check in connection with this case.

Let us continue, and let us come back to the text itself, to the text of the dream, and to these images that we spoke about the last time, namely the presentation of the feminine sexual organ in the form of this prolapsed vagina.

In the images of the subject, this sort of scabbard, this sort of bag, or sheath, which creates such a strange image here that one cannot all the same - even though it is not at all a unique and exceptional case, but not one which is frequently met with, which has not been described in a very well-defined way in the (12) analytic tradition. Here one can say that in the very image which is employed in the signifying articulation of the dream - namely what does this mean between the characters who are present - the image even takes on its value from what happens, from what it is used for.

In fact what we see, is that the subject, as he says, is going to put his finger in it. He will not put his penis in it. Certainly not. He will put his finger in it. He turns outside-in, he re-ensheaths, he re-invaginates what is devaginated here, and it is just as if what happens here is a conjuring trick. Because when all is said and done he puts something instead of what he should put there. But also he shows that something can be put there. And although something can effectively be suggested by the form of what is presented, namely the feminine phallus, everything happens as if - this phallus which is in effect in question in the clearest fashion ("to get my penis") - we were entitled to ask what the subject is in the process of showing us because much more than an act of copulation it is a question here of an act of exhibitionism. This happens let us not forget in front of a third person. The gesture is there, the gesture is already evoked of the conjurer performing what is called in French, le sac a l'oeuf. Namely this woollen sack in which the conjurer alternately makes the egg appear and disappear, makes it appear when it is not expected, and shows that it has disappeared when one expected to see it. One also says "the bag of the eggs" (sic) in English.

(13) The gesture, what one might call the showing that is in question is all the more striking because in the subject's associations, what we have seen is very precisely always to give a warning at the moment that he appears, so that nothing is going to be seen of what was there before, or again to have himself taken, as he says in his phantasy, for a dog by barking, so that people would say there is nothing there except a dog. Yes, always the same conjuring away without our knowing what it is that is conjured away. And undoubtedly it is above all the subject himself who is conjured away. But the dream points out to us, and allows us to specify that in any case if we seek to specify what is localised in the dream as being what is at stake in this conjuring away, it is certainly the phallus, the phallus that is in question: "To get my penis" (133).

And we are I would say so habituated, so hardened to this by analytic routine, that we scarcely stop at this datum of the dream. Nevertheless the choice by the subject of "to get" to designate what the woman is trying to do here - it is a verb that is used in a very polyvalent way. It is always in the sense of obtaining, of gaining, of capturing, of seizing, of joining to one's self. It is a question of something that is broadly speaking obtained in the general sense. Naturally we understand this with the note and the echo of femina curem et benim (ou penim) devorem, but it is not so simple.

Because after all what is being questioned in this case is something which when all is said and done is far from belonging (14) to this register. And also the question, whether in effect it is a matter in any form at all, real or imaginary, of obtaining the penis, the first question to be asked is namely: this penis where is it? Because it seems to be self-evident that it is there. Namely that on the pretext that what has been said, that the subject in the account of the dream said that she was manoeuvring "to get my penis", it seems to be believed that because of this it is there somewhere in the dream. But literally, if one looks at the text carefully, there is absolutely nothing to indicate it.

It is not enough that the partner's imputation is given there for us to deduce that the subject's penis is there, is sufficient in a way to satisfy us on the subject of this question: where is it? It is perhaps completely elsewhere than at the place where this need that we have to complete things in a scene where the subject is supposed to evade It is not so simple. And from the moment that we pose this question we clearly see in effect that it is here that the whole question is posed, and that it is also from there that we can grasp what is the singular discordance, the strangeness that is presented by the enigmatic sign that is proposed to us in the dream. Because it is certain that there is a relationship between what is happening and a masturbation.

What does that mean, what does that underline for us in this case? It is worthwhile picking it up in passing. Because even though it is not elucidated, it is very instructive. I (15) mean even though it is not articulated by the analyst in her remarks. Namely that the masturbation of the other, and the masturbation of the subject are the same thing, that one can even go pretty far, and say that everything that is in the grasp of the other by the subject himself which resembles a masturbation, effectively supposes a secret narcissistic identification which is less that of body to body than of the body of the other to the penis. That a whole part of the activities of caressing - and this becomes all the more evident because it takes on a character of a more detached, a more autonomous, a more insistent pleasure, bordering even on something which is called more or less correctly on this occasion a certain sadism - is something which brings into play the phallus to the degree that as I have already shown you it is already profiled imaginarily in the beyond of the natural partner. That the phallus is involved as signifier in the relationship of the subject to the other, means that it appears there as something which can be sought in this beyond of the embrace of the other with which there begins, there takes hold every kind of typical form more or less accentuated in the sense of perversion.

In fact, what we see here, is that precisely this masturbation of the other subject is completely different from this taking of the phallus in the embrace of the other which would allow us to make strictly equivalent the masturbation of the other and the masturbation of the subject himself, that this gesture whose meaning I showed you, which is almost a gesture of verifying (16) that what is there is undoubtedly something that is very important for the subject, it is something that has the closest relationship with the phallus, but it is something also which demonstrates that the phallus is not there, that the "to get my penis" that is in question for the partner is something which slips away, which escapes, not simply through the subject's will, but because some structural accident which really is what is in question, what gives its style to everything that comes back in the sequence of the association, namely also that this woman whom he tells us about who behaves herself so remarkably in the fact that she impersonates men perfectly, that this sort of unbelievable trickster whom he remembers years afterwards, and who offers him with an incredible glibness something which remarkably is again one thing for another, to make a covering for something with a covering which is made for something else, namely the cloth that is meant to make a hood for a car, and to make what? To allow him to put his golf clubs in it. This sort of tricky gentleman, this is what will come back again.

Everything has always this character, whatever element is in question, that it is never quite what presents itself that is in question. It is never with the real thing that we are dealing. Things present themselves always in a problematic form.

Let us take what comes immediately afterwards, and what is going to play its role. The problematic character of what insists in front of the subject immediately continues, and by means of a (17) question which emerges in connection with, which is going to arise from childhood memories. Why the devil did he have at another moment another compulsion than the one he had at the beginning of the session, namely the cough. Namely cutting his sister's straps. "I dislike thinking it was a compulsion; that's why the cough annoys me. I suppose I cut up my sister's sandals in the same way. I have only the dimmest memory of doing it. I don't know why nor what I wanted the leather for when I had done it. I thought I wanted the strips to make something useful but I expect something quite unnecessary." (135) To my way of thinking it was very useful, but there was no serious reason for it.

Here again we find ourselves before a sort of flight within which still another flight is going to follow, namely the remark that he suddenly thinks of the straps that tied back the hood of the motor car. Or "rather" that makes him think of the straps that one sees a child fastened in by in a pram.

And at that moment in a curious fashion, in a negative fashion, he introduces the notion of pram. He thinks that there was no pram in his family. But of course nothing could be more silly, he says himself, to say there was no pram in our house. There must have been one because there were two children.

Always the same style of something which appears under the form of something that is missing, and which dominates the whole style of the subject's associations. The following step, directly linked to this one is what? "I suddenly remembered I meant to send off letters admitting two members to the Club. I (18) boasted of being a better secretary than the last and yet here I am forgetting to give people admission to enter the Club." (135-136) In other words, I did not write to them. And linked on immediately, and indicated in inverted commas in Ella Sharpe's text even though she does not make much of it, because for an English reader these lines do not even need to be put in inverted commas, the citing of a sentence which is found in what is called the General Confession, namely one of the prayers from The Book of Common Prayer, from the book of prayers for everybody which form the foundation of the religious duties of people in the Church of England.

I should say that my relations with The Book of Common Prayer do not date from yesterday and I will only evoke here the very beautiful object which was created twenty or twenty five years ago in the surrealist community by my friend Roland Penrose who made use of The Book of Common Prayer for the initiates of the circle. When one opened it, on each side of the inner cover there was a mirror.

This is very instructive, because this is the only fault that one can find with Ella Sharpe for whom undoubtedly this text was much more familiar than for us, because the text of The Book of Common Prayer is not exactly the same as the quotation that the subject gives from it. "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done" instead of "We have undone those things (19) we ought to have done" (as the subject says). It is a small thing, but afterwards there is missing a whole sentence which is in a way the counterpart in the text of the prayer of the General Confession "and we have done those things which we ought not to have done". (136,142)

The subject does not feel any need at all to confess this. For the good reason that when all is said and done it is really always a question for him of not doing things. But doing things is not his business. This indeed is what in fact is in question, because he adds that he is quite incapable of doing anything at all, for fear of being too successful, as the analyst has underlined for us.

And then, because it is not the least important thing, this is what I want to get to, the subject continues the sentence: "There~is" no good thxngT:n^us"". This is a "pure invention by the subject, because in The Book of Common Prayer there is nothing like this. There is: "And there is no health in us". I think that the "good thing" that he put in instead is indeed what is in question. I would say that this good object is not there, this indeed is what is in question, and it confirms for us once again that it is a question of the phallus.

It is very important for the subject to say that this good object is not there. Again we find the term: it is not there. It is never where one expects it. And it is undoubtedly a good thing which is for him something of extreme importance, but it is no less clear that what he tends to show, to demonstrate is (20) always one and the same thing, namely that it is never there. There where what? There where one could get it, make off with it, take it. And it is indeed this which dominates the totality of the material that is in question.

That in the light of what we are going to advance here, the bringing together of the two compulsions, that of the cough and that of having cut strips of leather from his sister's sandals, seems less surprising - because it is really the most common type of analytic interpretation; the fact of cutting the strips of leather which hold together his sister's sandals has a relationship that we will be satisfied here, like everybody else, to approximate in general to the theme of castration.

If you take up Mr. Fenichel, you will see that braid cutters are people who do this in function of their castration complex (Fenichel 349). But how can we say, except by weighing each case precisely, whether it is the retortion of castration, the application of castration to a subject other than themselves, or on the contrary the taming of castration, the carrying out on an other of a castration which is not a real castration, and which therefore shows itself to be not so dangerous as that; the domestication as one might say, or the lessening in value, the devaluation of castration, in the course of this exercise; all the more because when braids are cut it is always possible, conceivable, that the aforesaid braids will grow again, namely give reassurance against castration.

This is naturally all that the sum of analytic experience allows (21) to be developed from this subject, but which in this case only appears to us as hiding But there is no doubt that there is a link here with castration.

But now what is in question, if we force ourselves not to go more quickly, and to sustain things at the level where we have sufficiently indicated them, namely that here castration is something which forms part as one might say, of the context of the report, but that nothing allows us up to the present to bring into play in as precise a fashion as the analyst has done the indication of the subject postulated on this occasion in order to articulate something as being a primitive aggressive intention turned back against himself. But after all what do we know about it. Is it not much more interesting to pose, to ceaselessly renew the question: where is this phallus? Where is it in effect, where must it be conceived of?

What we can say, is that the analyst is going very far, is pushing things a good deal in saying to the subject it is somewhere very far back in you, it forms part of an old rivalry with your father, it is there at the principle of all your primordial omnipotent wishes, it is there at the source of an aggression whose retortion you are undergoing in this case. Since there is nothing properly speaking which allows there to be taken from the text something which is articulated in this way.

Let us try for our part, after all, to ask ourselves the question a bit more daringly than we would naturally tend to. (22) We cannot it seems, propose in connection with a printed, written observation like this, something which we would demand of one of our pupils. If it was one of my pupils I would speak about it much more severely. I would say what possessed you to say something like that. In such a case I would ask the question: where is the countertransference element?

Here it would seem to be rash to pose such a question about the text of an author who after all is someone to whom we have every reason to accord the greatest trust at that date, namely Ella Sharpe. I smiled at myself when I asked myself that question because it really seemed to me a little bit exorbitant. But one is never wrong when all is said and done to be a little bit too daring in this way. It may happen that this is the way that one will find what one is looking for. And in this case I searched before I found. I mean that I had read in an almost distracted way the first pages of this book. I mean that as always one never reads well, and nevertheless there was there something extremely fine.

Immediately after having spoken about the dead father, about this father whom she cannot manage to bring to life in the subject's memory, but which she has managed to move a little bit recently: you remember how startled the subject was that his father must at one time have spoken - immediately afterwards she remarks that it is the same difficulty as regards herself, namely "He has no thoughts about me" (126). There was already there something which should have held our attention. "He feels (23) nothing about me". He cannot believe in that. It must be said that it is disturbing. That the subject is not aware of it as such, does not mean that there is no manifestation of it, because there is "a dim stirring of anxiety of some kind" on one or other occasion. This is where I had badly remembered something that is expressed here. But when one reads that one thinks that it is a general dissertation of the kind that he sometimes addresses to the analyst.

"I think" she says, this indeed is what is in question, "that the analysis might be compared to a long-drawn-out game of chess and that it will continue to be so until I cease to be the unconscious avenging father who is bent on cornering him, checkmating him, after which there is no alternative to death" (127).

This curious reference to chess on this occasion, which really is not implied by anything, is all the same what deserves on this occasion to hold our attention. I would say that at the time I read this page I effectively found it to be very nice, because I did not immediately dwell on its value in the transferential order. I mean that during the reading what that gave rise to in me was: that's very fine.

One should compare the whole development of an analysis to a game of chess. And why? Because what is most beautiful and what stands out most in the game of chess is that it is a game which can be described as follows: there are a certain number of elements which we will characterise as signifying elements. (24) Each one of the pieces is a signifying element. And in short in this game which is played by means of a series of answering moves founded on the nature of the signifiers, each one having its own move characterised by its position as signifier, what happens is the progressive reduction of the number of signifiers which are involved. And one could after all describe an analysis in that way: that it is a question of eliminating a sufficient number of signifiers so that there only remain in play a reduced number of signifiers so that one can sense properly where the position of the subject is within them.

Because I subsequently came back to it I believe in effect that this can take us a good way. But what is important is the following: it is that Ella Sharpe - effectively everything that I know or came to know from other sources about her work indicates it - effectively has this conception of analysis, that there is in her interpretation of analytic theory this kind of profound highlighting of the signifying character of things. She put a stress on metaphor in a way which is absolutely not out of harmony with the things that I am explaining to you. And all the time she knows how to highlight what is properly speaking this element of linguistic substitution in symptoms, which means that she brought it to bear in her analysis of literary themes which constitute an important part of her work. And all the technical rules that she gives share also in something which is quite profoundly marked by a kind of experience, of apprehension of the interplay of signifiers as such.

(25) So that the thing which, in this case, one can say that she overlooks, I would say are her own intentions which are expressed in this register, on the plane of the word of which there is question in the forefront of this observation, of cornering. She brings "cornering" in here for the first time. It is only in the sessions following the interpretation that she gave of this dream that we will see the same word appearing in the discourse of the patient, and I will tell you later in what connection.

This is why, as you already know, I pointed out to you what also happened two sessions later. Namely how impossible he finds it to corner his partner also in a game, the game of tennis, to corner him in order to put in the final shot, one that the chap would not be able to reach. What is in effect in question is the following that it is on this plane that the analyst manifests herself. And I am not at all in the process of saying that the subject perceives this.

It is of course understood that she is a good analyst. She says it in all sorts of ways: it is a case in which you will have noticed, she says to the students, that I said very little, or that I was silent. Why, she says? Because there is absolutely nothing in this subject which does not indicate to me in all sorts of ways that his claim to want to be helped means exactly the contrary, namely that above all he wants to remain sheltered, and with his little covering, the hood of the car over him.

(26) The hood, is really a quite fundamental position. She senses that. Everything that happens in connection with the memory of the pram which is effaced, is all the same the fact that he was pinned into his bed, namely pinned down. Moreover it seems that he has very specific notions about what the fact of being tied down can provoke in a child, even though there is nothing particular in his memory which permits him to evoke it, but undoubtedly this bound position is very important for him.

Therefore she is far from allowing this countertransference element to appear, namely something which would be too interventionist in the game. An aggressive move in this game of chess. But what I am saying, is that because she senses so well the import of this notion, this aggressive exercise of the analytic game, she does not see its exact import, namely that what is in question is something which has the closest relationship to the signifiers.

Namely that if we ask where the phallus is, it is in this direction that we should search for it. In other words, if you wish, in the quadrangle of the schema of the subject, of the other, of the ego qua image of the other, and of the big Other this is what is in question: the place from where the signifier as such can appear. Namely that this phallus which is never where we expect it, is there all the same. It is there like the purloined letter, where one least expects it, and there where nevertheless everything designates it.

To express it as the metaphor of chess really allows us to articulate it, I would say that the subject does not want to (27) lose his queen, and I will explain. In the dream it is not the subject who is there looking at the phallus. This is not where the phallus is. Because in effect for this subject - as the analyst dimly perceives it through a veil in her interpretation the subject has a certain relationship with omnipotence, or simply with potency, with power. His power, in this case the phallus, what he must preserve at all costs to keep out of the game because in the game he could lose this phallus, is here represented in the dream quite simply by the person that one would least think represents it, namely his wife who is there and who has, far from being the apparent witness that she is - because in fact it is nowhere indicated that this function of seeing is something which is essential

In this subject as in many other subjects, and I would ask you to retain this because it is such an obvious clinical fact that one is absolutely stupefied that it is not a commonplace in psychoanalysis, the feminine partner qua other is precisely what represents for the subject what is in a way most taboo in his potency, and also who is at the same time found to dominate the whole economy of his desire. It is because his wife is his phallus that I would say that he makes this kind of tiny lapse that I noted for you in passing, namely "taking a journey with my wife around the world" and not "around the world with my wife" (132).

The accent of omnipotence is put on "around the world", by our analyst. I think that the secret of omnipotence in this (28) subject is in the "with my wife", and that what is in question is that he should not lose that, namely that he does not perceive precisely that this is what is to be put in question, namely to perceive that his wife on this occasion is the analyst.

Because when all is said and done this is what is in question.

The subject we would say does not want to lose his queen, like those bad chess players who imagine that to lose the queen is to lose the game, even though to win at chess means when all is said and done to arrive at what one calls an end game, namely with the subject the simplest and most reduced facility for displacement and the minimum of rights - I mean that he has not the right to occupy a space which is put in check by another - and with that to find the advantage of the position.

On the contrary it is greatly to one's advantage on occasion to sacrifice one's queen. This is what the subject does not want to do under any circumstances because the signifier phallus is for him identical with everything that happened in the relationship with his mother.

And it is here that there appears, as the observation clearly allows to transude the inefficient and defective character of what the father was able to contribute in this case. And of course we come back to something, back to an already known aspect of the relationship of the subject to the parental couple. The important thing is not that. The important thing is effectively to accentuate this very hidden, very secret relationship of the subject to his partner, because it is the most important thing to highlight at the moment that he appears (29) in analysis. In the analysis where in short the subject, by his discreet coughing, warns his analyst about what is happening inside if perchance she had, as it happens in the dream, turned her bag or her game inside out, that she should put it away before he arrives because to see that, to see that there is nothing but a bag he stands to lose everything.

This is the prudence that the subject demonstrates and which in a way maintains, in a tight bond with all the pram-pinned position of his childhood, the subject in a relationship with his desire which can only be phantastical, namely that it is necessary for him to be himself tied into a pram or something else and well and truly held and tightly wrapped so that there can be elsewhere the signifier, the image of an omnipotence that is dreamt of.

And this is also the way that we must understand the capital role of omnipotence for him, this whole story and this observation about the automobile. The automobile, this problematic instrument of our civilisation, whose relationship everyone can clearly see on the one hand with power (the horsepower, the speed, the peak of speed), and everyone obviously talks about phallic equivalence, the equivalence of a power to help the impotent. But on the other hand everyone well knows its extremely coupling, feminine character also. Because it is not for nothing that an automobile is spoken of as feminine, that we give this car on occasions all sorts of little nicknames which also have the character of a partner of the opposite sex. Well this automobile on this occasion, (30) about which he makes such problematic remarks: namely, "strange how one speaks of the life of a car as if it were human" (135).

These of course are banalities, but it is very curious that this automobile, is so obviously this thing in which there is reproduced this sort of signifying ambiguity which ensures that it is both what protects him, what binds him, and envelops him, that which in relation to him has exactly the same position as the projecting hood in the dream - it is moreover the same word which is used in the two cases - as in the dream this bizzare sexual protuberance on which he finds himself putting his finger, as on the other hand - I well underlined something that I translated badly. I should not have said "streaked with scarlet", but "lined with scarlet". But what does the analyst tell us? The analyst has made no mistake here. The moment, she tells us, that she made her decisive intervention is not the moment that she began to put him on the path of his aggression, with as a result for the subject moreover a very curious manifestation that one could call psychosomatic, whose character she does not quite pick up, that namely instead of the cough, the following day he had a little colicky pain before entering.

God knows whether he tightened his for that, but as I said above he has everything to lose at the moment of entering the psychoanalyst's office for the following session. But Ella Sharpe's own interpretation appears to be very illuminating. It is at the second session after this interpretation when the subject tells her that he again had had a colicky pain on leaving (31) the session the last time. He then talks to her about what? He says, I was unable to use my car because the garage man had not finished with it. I was not able to be angry with him because he is so kind that it is impossible to blame him, he is very very good. And then the car is not a necessity. And he adds with an accent of imitation, but all the same I really want it, I like it, I love it. (cf 146)

And she makes no mistake. For the first time, she says, I was able to deal with the libidinal wishes. Here it is a question of libido. We are therefore in complete accord with her. If I am doing a critique of Ella Sharpe, it is because I find her at every point, in this observation, to be admirably sensitive. She understands the importance of that, namely what is present in the life of a subject as desire properly speaking, desire being characterised by its non-motivated character - he has no need of this car; the fact that he declares his desire to her, that it is the first time that she hears such a discourse, is something which presents itself as unreasonable in the discourse of the subject.

She tells us that she hops on it, namely that she underlines it for him. It is a curious thing, here we have something like a kind of wobble of the projector. While she was always so good at telling us what she said to the subject, even the most daring things, the most risky things, here we do not know exactly what she said to him. It is very annoying. What she tells us, is that she was really overjoyed to have the opportunity of telling him: there you are admitting that you desire something. But what (32) it is she might have told him, we will never know.

We know simply that she might all the same have told him something rather oriented in the sense of what she had told him before, to explain why it is precisely after what she told him that the following day the subject came to tell her, not quite content, a bit dissatisfied that that night he had wet the bed.

We cannot consider that this is, as I told you already, in itself a symptom, which, however transitory it may be, and however significant it may be of the fact that a blow had been delivered which certainly had its effect, is all the same something which absolutely confirms us in what I could call the sense of the proper direction of the statement if there is a statement (dire) Namely that if we have the notion about this thing that enuresis represents, it is certainly what I would call the personal implementation of the penis.

But again it is not when all is said and done a genital implementation. It is precisely the penis as real which very frequently intervenes as an echo - this is what clinical work shows us in the case of children - of the sexual activity of the parents; it is to the degree that the subjects, whether masculine or feminine children are in a period when they are very profoundly interested by the sexual relations of the parents that there occur enuretic manifestations which on occasion are the bringing into play on the plane of the real of the organ as such. But the organ as such, as real, no longer as signifier, which is indeed something which shows us that on this occasion Ella Sharpe's intervention had in effect a certain import.

(33) Is this import appropriate? This is of course what remains to be looked at more closely. It is quite clear that what follows, namely the arrival, the emergence, certain reactions which the subject seems to regard with a certain feeling of satisfaction, and which is the fact that when he is playing he no longer allows his companions to tease him, namely that he caught one of them around the neck and held him in a strangle hold in a corner with sufficient force for him not to want to start again, can in no way be considered as something which is really along the line of what is to be obtained.

Let us not forget all the same that if there is something the subject is to be allowed, namely to corner the other in a game, this is absolutely not the same thing as "cornering him" by the throat about this game. This is precisely an inadequate reaction, one which does not render him for a moment any more capable of cornering him in the game, namely where relationships with others occur, the other as the locus of the word, as locus of the law, as locus of the conventions of the game. It is precisely this which is found to have failed because of this slight lowering of the act of analytic intervention.

I think that today we have pushed things fairly far. The next time I will give the last seminar of what is grouped here around the literary analysis of desire and its interpretation, and I will try to gather for you in some formulae how we should conceive of this function of the phallic signifier in its most (34) general form in connection with the relationship and the fashion in which the subject situates himself in desire. I will try to collect around these notions that I am trying to articulate here with the help of the graph the function which we should very precisely give to the phallic signifier.

I will also try to show you where exactly there is situated, how in terms of mapping things out in our exercise of analysis you can try to situate the phallic signifier in this schema. In a word, and to give you something which is borrowed from the work of a writer to whom I already alluded here, Lewis Carroll, I will show you what Lewis Carroll says somewhere more or less in the following terms: he thought that he had seen a garden gate - this famous gate of paradise of the interior of the maternal womb around which there are currently centred, or even engulfed all the analytic theories - which could be opened with a key. He looked more closely and perceived that it was a double rule of three. The next time I will show you what this rule of three is.

Seminar 12: Wednesday 11 February 1959

I announced the last time that I would finish this time the study of this dream that we have particularly well gone into from the point of view of its interpretation, but I will be obliged to devote one more session to it.

I recall rapidly that it is this dream of a patient, a lawyer who has great difficulties in his job. And Ella Sharpe approaches him prudently, the patient having every appearance of being cautious, without it however being a question of rigidity, in his behaviour. Ella Sharpe did not fail to underline that everything that he recounts comes from thinking, never from feeling. And at the point that we are at in the analysis, he has a remarkable dream which was a turning point in the analysis and which is briefly reported to us. It is a dream that the patient concentrates in a few words even though it was, he says, a tremendous dream, so tremendous that if he remembered it it would take hours to relate it.

There emerges from this something which to a certain degree presents the characteristics of a repeated dream, namely a dream that he already had. Namely that somewhere in this journey that he had taken as he says, with his wife around the world - and I underlined that - at a point that is in Czechoslovakia - it is the only point on which Ella Sharpe will tell us she did not obtain enough light because she did not question the patient about what the word Czechoslovakia signifies; and after all she regrets it because after all we may have some ideas about this Czechoslovakia - sexual play takes place with a woman, in front (2) of his wife. The woman with whom this sexual play takes place is someone who is presented as being in a superior position in relation to him. On the other hand it does not immediately appear in his account, but we discover in his associations, that it is a question for her of manoeuvring, "to get my penis".

I pointed out the very special character of the verb "to get" in English. "To get", is to obtain, in all the possible fashions of the verb obtenir ♦ It is a much less limited verb than obtenir. It is to obtain, to catch, to grasp, to finish off. And "got" if the woman got my penis, that would mean that she has it.

But this penis comes so little into play that the subject tells us that the dream ends with this wish that before the disappointment of the woman he thought that she should masturbate herself.

And I explained to you that what was in question here obviously is the key meaning, the secret meaning of the dream. In the dream this manifests itself by the fact that the subject says: "I thought I would masturbate her." In fact there is a real exploration of something which is interpreted in the observation with a great deal of insistence and of care by Ella Sharpe as being the equivalent of the hood.

When one looks at it closely this something deserves to hold our attention. It is something which shows that the feminine organ is here a sort of inside-out, or prolapsed vagina. It is a (3) question of a vagina, and not of a hood. And everything continues as if this pseudo masturbation of the subject was nothing other than a sort of verification of the absence of the phallus.

This is the sense in which I said that the imaginary structure, the manifest articulation of the should at least oblige us to delimit the character of the signifier. And I pose in short the question of whether by a more prudent method, one that could be considered as being more strict, we might not arrive at greater precision in the interpretation, on condition that the structural elements which we have committed ourselves to getting to know are sufficiently brought into the picture in order precisely to differentiate what the meaning of this case is.

And we are going to see that in doing this - we are going to see that as always the most particular cases are the cases which have the most universal value, and what this observation shows us is something which should not be neglected, because it is a question of nothing less than of specifying, on this occasion, this character of signifier without which one cannot give its real position to the function of the phallus (which remains at once always so important, so immediate, so central in analytic interpretation) instead of finding ourselves at every moment of its management in impasses whose most striking point is expressed, betrayed by the theory of Mrs. Melanie Klein who as we know has made the object phallus the most important of objects.

(4) The object phallus is introduced into Kleinian theory, and into its interpretation of experience, as something she says, which is the substitute, the first substitute which enters the experience of the child - whether it is a question of a little girl or of a boy - as being a more convenient, more manageable, more satisfying sign. This is something to provoke questions about the role, the mechanism How are we to conceive this outcome of an altogether primordial phantasy as being that around which there is already going to be organised this profoundly aggressive conflict which puts the subject in a certain relationship with the body of the mother as container. In so far as from this container he covets, he desires - all the terms are unfortunately always used with difficulty, namely they are juxtaposed - he wishes to extract these good and bad objects which are there in a sort of primitive mixture within the body of the mother. And why the privilege accorded to this object phallus within the body? Undoubtedly if all of this is put to us with the great authority, the style of description so clear-cut, in a sort of dazzlement caused by the determined character of the style, I would almost say not open to any discussion, of Kleinian statements, one cannot fail also to pull oneself up after having heard it affirmed, and ask oneself at each moment: what is she aiming at?

Is it effectively the child who testifies to this prevalence of (5) the object phallus, or on the contrary is it she herself who gives us the signal of the character as having the meaning of phallus? And I must say that in many cases we are not illuminated about the choice that must be made as regards the interpretation.

In fact I know that some of you are asking yourselves where this sign of the phallus must be placed in the different elements of the graph around which we are trying to orientate the experience of desire and its interpretation. And I have some echoes of the form taken by the question for some of you: what is the relationship between this phallus and the Other, the big Other that we speak about as being the locus of the word.

There is a relationship between the phallus and the big Other, but it is certainly not a relationship beyond, in the sense that the phallus would be the being of the big Other even though someone posed the question in those terms. If the phallus has a relationship to anything, it is much more with the being of the subject. Because, I believe that this is the new, important point that I am trying to get you to grasp in the introduction of the subject into this dialectic which is the one that is pursued in the unconscious development of different stages of identification, through the primitive relationship with the mother, then with the coming into play of the Oedipus complex and of the operation of the law.

What I highlighted here is something which is at once very tangible in the observations - especially in connection with the (6) genesis of perversions - and which is often veiled in what one links with the signifier phallus. The fact is that there are two very different things according to whether it is a question for the subject of being this phallus with respect to the other, or indeed by some ways, principles or mechanisms which are precisely those that we are going to take up in the subsequent evolution of the subject, but which are already, these relationships, installed in the other, in the mother. Precisely the mother has a certain relationship with the phallus, and it is in this relationship with the phallus that the subject has to valorise himself, has to enter into competition with the phallus.

It is from there that we began two years ago when I began to revise this relationship.

What is in question about the function of the signifier phallus with respect to the subject, the opposition of these two possibilities for the subject with respect to the signifier phallus to be it or to have it, is here something which is an essential distinction. Essential in so far as these incidences are not the same, that it is not from the same moment of the relation of identification (identificatory) that being and having come, that there is between the two a real line of demarcation a line of discernment, that one cannot be it and have it, and in order that the subject should in certain conditions manage to have it it is in the same way necessary that there should be a renunciation of being.

Things in fact are much less simple to formulate if we try to (7) stick as closely as possible to the dialectic that is in question. If the phallus has a relationship to the being of the subject it is not to the pure and simple being of the subject, it is not with respect to this subject who is supposed to be the subject of knowledge, the noetic support of all objects, it is to the speaking subject, to a subject in so far as he assumes his identity and as such, I would say - this is why the phallus plays its essentially signifying function - that the subject at once is it and is not it.

I apologise for the algebraic character that matters are going to take, but we have to learn to fix ideas because for some people there are questions which arise.

If in our notation something presents itself - and we are going to come back to it later - as being the barred subject in front of the object (Soo), namely the subject of desire, the subject in so far as in his relationship to the object he is himself profoundly put in question - and that it is what constitutes the specificity of the relationship of desire in the subject himself; it is in so far as the subject is in our notation the barred subject that one can say that it is possible in certain conditions to give him the phallus as signifier. This in so far as he is the speaking subject.

He is and he is not the phallus. He is it because it is the signifier in which language designates him, and he is not it in so far as language - it is precisely the law of language on another plane - takes it away from him. In fact things do not (8) happen on the same plane.

If the law takes it away from him, it is precisely to arrange things, it is because a certain choice is made at that moment. The law when all is said and done introduces into the situation a definition, a redistribution, a change of plane. The law reminds him that he has it or that he does not have it. But in fact what happens is something which is played out entirely in the interval between this signifying identification and this redistribution of roles. The subject is the phallus, but the subject, of course, is not the phallus.

I am going to put the accent on something which the very form of the operation of negation in our tongue will allow us to grasp in a formula in which there occurs the slippage that concerns the use of the verb to be. One can say that the decisive moment, the one around which there turns the assumption of castration is the following: yes one can say that he is and that he is not the phallus, but he is not without having it (il n'est pas sans l'avoir).

It is in this inflection of, it is not that he does not (de n'être pas sans) it is around this subjective assumption which is inflected between being and having that the reality of castration operates. Namely that it is in so far as the phallus, as the penis of the subject, in a certain experience, is something which has been put in the balance, which has taken on a certain function of equivalence or of standard in the relationship to the object, that it takes on its central value and that up to a certain point one can say that it is in proportion to a certain reunciation of his relationship to the phallus that the subject enters into possession of this sort of infinity, of plurality, or allness of the world of objects which characterises the world of man.

(9) You should carefully note that this formula, whose modulation, accent, I would ask you to hold onto is found in other forms in every tongue. Il n'est pas sans l'avoir has a clear correspondent. We will come back to it in what follows.

The relationship of the woman to the phallus and the essential function of the phallic phase in the development of feminine sexuality is articulated literally in the different, opposing form which suffices to distinguish clearly this difference of starting points of the masculine subject and the feminine subject with respect to sexuality.

The only exact formula, the one which allows us to get out of the impasses, the contradictions, the ambiguities around which we turn concerning feminine sexuality, is that she is without having it (c'est qu'elle est sans l'avoir). The relationship of the feminine subject to the phallus, is to be without having it. And it is to this that she owes the transcendence of her position; and this is what we will come to. We will manage to articulate concerning feminine sexuality and this relationship which is so particular, so permanent, on whose irreducible character Freud insisted, and which is expressed psychologically in the form of Penisneid.

In sum we would say, to push things to the limit and to make them clearly understood, that for man his penis is restored to him by a certain act which at the limit one could say deprives him of it. It is not exact, this is to make you open your ears wide. Namely that those who have already heard the preceding formula should not degrade it into the second accent that I give it.

(10) But this second accent has its importance because it is here that there is made the junction first of all with the developmental element from which one usually starts, and which is the one that I am going to try to revise now with you by asking ourselves how we can formulate with the algebraic elements that we make use of, what is in question in these famous first relationships of the child with the object - particularly with the maternal object, and how starting from there we are able to conceive how there comes about the junction with this privileged signifier that is in question and whose function I am trying to situate here.

The child, in what is articulated by the psychiatrists, specifically Mrs. Melanie Klein, has a whole series of first relationships which are established with the body of the mother conceived, represented here in a primitive experience which we grasp badly from the Kleinian description: the relationship of symbol and of image... And every one knows that this is what is in question in the Kleinian text: the relationship to the symbol form. Even though it is always an imaginary content which is put forward here.

In any case we can say that up to a certain point something which is symbol or image, but which undoubtedly is a sort of one - we find here almost an opposition which tallies with philosophical oppositions, because what always constitutes the operation of the famous Parmenides between the one and being - we can say that the experience of the relationship to the mother is an experience (11) entirely centred around an apprehension of unity and of totality.

All the primitive progress that Melanie Klein articulates for us as being essential to the development of the child is that of a relationship of a fragmentation to something which represents outside himself, both the totality of all those fragmented, broken-up objects which seem to be there in a sort not of chaos, but of primitive disorder, and on the other hand which will progressively teach him to grasp from these relationships of these different objects, of this plurality in unity of the privileged object which is the paternal object, to grasp the aspiration, the progress, the path towards his own unity.

The child, I repeat, grasps the primordial objects as being contained in the body of his mother, this universal container which is presented to him and which is supposed to be the ideal locus as one might say of his first imaginary relationships.

How can we try to articulate this? There are obviously here not two terms, but four terms. The relationship of the child to the body of the mother, which is so primordial, is the framework in which there come to be inscribed these relationships of the child to his own body which are those which for a long time I tried to articulate for you in terms of the notion of the specular affect - to the degree that this is the term which gives the structure of what one can call the narcissistic affect. It is in so far as from a certain moment the subject recognises himself in an original experience as separated from his proper image, as having a certain elective relationship with the image of his own body, a specular relationship which is given to him either in specular experience as such, or in a certain relationship of transitivist (12) captivation (castration transtif) in games with the other close to him in age, very close and which oscillates within a certain limit, which cannot be superseded, of motor maturation - it is not with just any type of little other (here the word little meaning the fact that it is a question of little friends) that the subject can have this experience, these games of prestige with the other his companion; age here plays a role on which I insisted at one time.

The relationship of this with an eros, the libido, plays a special role; here there is articulated the whole measure in which the couple of the child to the other who represents for him his own image come to be juxtaposed, to interfere, to be made dependent on a larger and more obscure relationship between the child in his primitive endeavours - the tendencies coming from his needs - and the body of the mother in so far as it is effectively in effect the object of primitive identification. And what happens, what is established, lies entirely in the fact that what happens namely the unconstituted form in which there appears the first wails of the child, the cry, the appeal of his needs, the fashion in which there are established the relationships of this still unconstituted primitive state of the subject with respect to something which is presented then as a one at the level of the other, namely the maternal body, the universal container, is what is going to regulate in an altogether primitive fashion the relationship of the subject in so far as he is constituted in a specular fashion, namely as ego - and the ego is the image of the other - with a certain other (13) which must be different from the mother (in the specular relationship it is the little ousus?).

But as you are going to see, it is a question of something completely different, given that it is in this first quadripartite relationship that there are going to be made the first accommodations of the subject to his own identity. Do not forget that it is at that moment, in this most radical relationship that all the authors, of one accord, place, situate the locus of psychotic or parapsychotic anomalies of what one can call the integration of such and such a term of autoerotic relationships of the subject to himself on the frontiers of the body image.

The little schema that I formerly made use of and which I recently recalled, the one of the famous concave mirror, in so far as it allows it to be conceived that there can be produced, on condition that one places one's self at a predetermined favourable point - I mean within something which prolongs the limits of the concave mirror from the moment that one makes them pass through the centre of the spherical mirror - something which is imaged by the experience that I brought to your attention at that time, the one which provokes the appearance - which is not a phantasy, but a real image - which can be produced in certain conditions which are not very difficult to produce; the one which is produced when one gives rise to a real image of a flower within a perfectly existing vase thanks to the presence of this spherical mirror, provided one looks at the totality of the apparatus from a certain point.

It is an apparatus which allows us to imagine what is in (14) question, namely that it is in so far as the child identifies himself with a certain position of his being in the powers of his mother that he realises himself. It is indeed on this that the accent of everything that we have said about the importance of the first relationships concerning the mother is brought to bear. It is in so far as he integrates himself in a satisfying manner into this world of insignia which all the behaviours of the mother represent. It is from there, to the degree that he will situate himself here in a favourable fashion that there can be placed, either within himself, or outside himself, or lacking to him as one might say, this something which it is hidden from himself: namely his own tendencies, his own desires; that he will be able to be from the first relationship in a more or less faulty, deviated relationship with his own drives.

It is not too complicated to imagine this. Remember what it was I made the explanation of narcissism turn around: a manifest, crucial experience described a long time ago, the famous example put forward in the Confessions of St. Augustine, that of the child who sees his milk-brother in possession of the maternal breast: Vidi ego et expertus sum zelantem parvulum; nondum loquebatur et intuebatur pallidus amaro aspectu conlactaneum suum", which I translated as: "I have seen jealousy in a baby and know what it means. He was not old enough to talk, but whenever he saw his milk brother at the breast, he would grow pale with envy." Amaro has a different accent to the French amer; one could translate it by poisonous, but that does not satisfy me either.

Once this experience is formalised you are going to see it (15) appearing with all its absolutely general import. This experience is the relationship to his own image which, to the extent that the subject sees his counterpart in a certain relationship with the mother as ideal primitive identification, as the first form of the one, of this totality of which following on explorations concerning this primitive experience analysts take so much into account that they only speak about totality, about the notion of the conscious awareness of totality, as if by focusing on this aspect we should begin to forget in the most persistent way that precisely that which experience shows us is pursued to the most extreme limits of everything that we see in the phenomena: the fact is that in the human being there is no possibility of acceding to this experience of totality; that the human being is divided, torn, and that no analysis restores this totality to him because precisely something else is introduced into its dialectic which is precisely what we are trying to articulate because it is literally imposed on us by experience, and in the first place by the fact that the human being, in any case, cannot consider himself as any more in the final analysis than as a being in whom there is something missing, a being - whether it is male or female - who is castrated. That is the reason why it is to the dialectic of being, within this experience of the one that the phallus is essentially referred.

But here we have then this image of the small other, this image of the counterpart, in a relationship with this totality that the (16) subject has ended up by assuming, and not without delays. But it is indeed on this, around this that Melanie Klein makes pivot the evolution of the child. It is the moment called the depressive phase which is the crucial moment, when the mother as totality was realised at a moment. It is with this first ideal identification that we are dealing.

And face to face with this what do we have? We have the conscious awareness of the desired object as such, namely that the other is in the process of possessing the maternal breast. And it takes on this elective value which makes of this experience a crucial experience on which I would ask you to dwell as being essential for our formalisation.

To the extent that in this relationship with this object which on this occasion is called the maternal breast, the subject becomes aware of himself as deprived, contrary to what is articulated in Jones - every privation he says somewhere (and it is always in terms of the discussion of the phallic phase that this is formulated) engenders the sentiment of frustration - (it is exactly the contrary), it is in the measure that the subject is imaginarily frustrated, that he has here the first experience of something which is in front of him in his place, who usurps his place, who is in this relationship with the mother which should be his own, and in which he senses this imaginary gap as frustration - I say imaginary because after all there is nothing to prove that he is himself deprived; an other can be deprived, (17) or he can be looked after in his turn - that there comes to birth the first apprehension of the object; in so far as the subject is deprived of it.

It is there that there begins, that there opens out something which is going to allow this object to enter into a certain relationship with a subject regarding which we do not know effectively whether it is an s to which we should add the index i, a sort of passionate self-destruction adhering absolutely to this pallor, to this decomposition which is shown to us here by the literary paintbrush of the one who tells us about it, namely St. Augustine, or whether it is something which already we can conceive of as being properly speaking an apprehension of the symbolic order, namely what does this mean; namely that already in this experience the object should be symbolised in a certain fashion, take on a full, signifying value, that already the object in question, namely the mother's breast, not only can be conceived of as being or not being there but can be related to something else which can be substituted for it. It is starting from there that it becomes a signifying element.

In any case Melanie Klein, without realising the import of what she is saying at that moment, takes this option by saying that there can be something better there, namely the phallus. But she does not explain to us why. This is the point which remains mysterious.

Now, everything depends on this moment at which there is born the activity of a metaphor which I pointed out to you as being so essential to uncover in the development of the child. Remember what I told you the other day about these particular forms of the (18) activity of the child before which adults are at once so disconcerted and awkward; the one in which the child not satisfied to have begun to call "bow-wow", namely by a signifier that he has invoked as such, what you have persisted in telling him is a dog, begins to decree that the dog goes "miaow" and the cat goes "bow-wow". It is in this activity of substitution that there lies the whole role, the mainspring of symbolic progress. And this is much more primitive of course than when the child articulates it.

What is in question, is in any case something which goes beyond this emotional (passionnelle) experience of the child who feels himself frustrated, namely precisely the one we can formalise by saying that this image of the other is going to be substituted for the subject in his destructive passion, in this case in his jealous passion, and to find itself in a certain relationship to the object in so far as he is also in a certain relationship with the totality which may or may not concern him.

But it is to the extent that the object can be substituted for this totality, to the extent that the image of the other can be substituted for the subject, that we enter properly speaking into symbolic activity, into what makes of the human being a speaking being, into what is going to define all his subsequent relationship to our object.

$$\frac{i(o)}{$} \diamond \frac{o}{I}$$

(19) This having been said, in the case that we are dealing with, how can distinctions that are so fundamental, which remain of such a primitive character, help us to orientate ourselves? I mean to create the discriminations which allow us precisely to extract the maximum profit from these facts which are given in the experience of the dream and of the particular subject whose case we are analysing.

Let us see whether we ought at every instant propose to ourselves to closely grasp this relationship to desire, this relationship called desire, this relationship to the object in so far as it is relationship of human desire, and whether it is always required that we should find there this relationship to an object in so far as the subject proves to be at the limit abolished there. If S in relation to o is the formula of desire, and if all of this is inscribed in this fourfold relationship which ensures that the subject, in the image of the other, namely in the successive identifications which are going to be called ego, finds to substitute for himself a form for this fundamentally pallid, fundamentally anguished thing which is the relationship of the subject in desire.

What do we find in the different symptomatic elements which are brought to us here in this observation? We can take from many angles this material which is brought to us by the patient. Let us take it as far as possible from the angles which are most distinct, from the symptomatic angle.

There is a moment when he tells us that he used to cut the thongs, the straps of his sister's sandals. This comes during the analysis of the dream, that is to say after a certain number (20) of interventions, which are no doubt minimal but nevertheless not nothing, by Ella Sharpe his analyst; simple responses made him come little by little, one thing following on another, after the hood - the fact that the hood is the form of the feminine genital organ in the report of the dream - after the hood of the car, the straps that were used to fix, to tie back this hood, then the straps that he used to cut at a certain time from his sister's sandals, without still being able to account for the objective which he was no doubt pursuing, which seemed quite useful to him even though he cannot really show in any way the necessity for this.

These are very exactly the same terms that he uses about his own car which, in a session following on this session of dream interpretation, he tells the analyst the garage had not given back to him - and which he does not dream of making an issue of and which is something which he does not need, is something he would like, even though it was not a necessity. He says that he likes it.

Here it seems are two forms of the object with which the subject has of course a relationship whose singular character he himself articulates; namely that in the two cases it does not answer any need. And it is now we who are saying it. We are not saying, modern man does not need his car - even though everyone who looks at it carefully perceives that it is only too obvious. Here it is the subject who says it: I do not need my car, but I like it, I desire it. And as you know it is here that Ella Sharpe seized (21) with the action of a hunter before her prey, the object of the search, tells us that she intervened with great energy, without telling us, which is a curious thing, the terms in which she did so.

Let us begin to describe a little the things that are in question. And because I wanted to start from what was the most simple, the most easily locatable thing in an old equation; the thongs, or the straps is the o. There was a time where he made a collection of these straps.

Let us oblige ourselves to follow a little our own formulae, because if we set them up it is in order that they should be of some use to us. The image of o, it is quite clear that here it is his sister about whom not much has been said, because nobody doubts how complex it is to bring up the slightest thing when it is a question of explaining what we are dealing with.

His sister is the elder, she is eight years older than him.

This we know, it is in the observation. She does not make great use of the fact that she is eight years older than him, but what is certain is that if she is eight years older than him, she was eleven years old when he the subject was three years old at the time that he lost his father. A certain taste for the signifier has the advantage of making us do some arithmetic from time to time. It is not something that is unwarranted because there is absolutely no doubt that in their earliest years children are (22) continually doing it concerning their age and their relative age. The rest of us, thank God, forget that we have passed fifty, we have reasons for that, but children are very attached to knowing their age. And when one makes this little calculation one perceives something that is very striking: it is that the subject tells us that he only begins to have memories after the age of eight or eleven. (134)

This is in the observation. Not a lot is made of it, but it is not simply a kind of random discovery that I am giving you here, because if you now read the observation, you will see that it goes much further than this: namely that it is at the very moment that this is brought to our notice by the subject - I mean that he had a bad memory for anything below eleven years - that he talks immediately afterwards about his girlfriend who is very gifted, a girl who is very clever at impersonating, namely at imitating anybody and particularly men, in a brilliant fashion because she is used by the BBC.

It is striking that he talks about that just at the moment that he is speaking about something that seems to be of another register, namely that below eleven years there is just a black hole. We have to believe that this is not unrelated to a certain relationship of imaginary alienation of himself in this sisterly personage. i(o), is indeed his sister and this can explain a lot of things for us, including the fact that he will afterwards elide the existence in his family of a pram, of a baby carriage. On that level it is the past, it is his sister's (23)business.

Again, there is a moment that he caught up as one might say once again with this sister, namely that he has come to meet her at the same point that he left her concerning an event that is crucial. Ella Sharpe is right to say that the death of the father is crucial. The death of the father left him confronted with all sorts of elements except one which would probably have been very precious for him in order to surmount the different captivations.

Here in any case it is the point which of course is going to be a little bit mysterious for us, because the subject himself underlines it: why these straps? He does not know. Thank God we are analysts and we can easily guess what is there at the level of the / ... I mean that it can be required that we should have a little idea about what is there, because we know other observations. It is something which obviously has a relationship not with castration - if castration were well assimilated, well recorded, assumed by the subject, there would not have been this little transitory symptom; but at that moment it is all the same indeed around castration that this revolves - but that we have no right, for the present, to extrapolate, and which is is I here. Namely that which is related to something regarding which for the present we can allow ourselves to suspend a little our conclusions. If we are in analysis (24) it is precisely to attempt to understand a little and to understand what it is about, namely what is the I of the subject, his ideal, this extremely particular identification on which I already indicated the last time it would be well to dwell.

His sister	◇	the straps

We are going to see how we can specify it in a relationship that he has with respect to something more evolutionary. This must be something referring to the actual situation in the analysis, and concerning the relationship with the analyst.

So let us begin again to pose ourselves the questions concerning what the situation is at present. There would be many ways to pose this problem because in this case one can say that all roads lead to Rome. One can start with the dream, and from this mass of things that the subject contributes as material in reaction to the interpretations that the analyst makes of it. We agree with the subject that the essential thing is the car. The car and the straps, they are obviously not the same thing. There was something which meanwhile had evolved. The subject had taken up positions; he himself had made reflections about this car, and reflections which are not without their trace of irony: it is funny the way one speaks of a car as if it were something human. I do not have to insist on it. One senses, I already pointed it out the last time that the obviously symbolic character of the car has its importance.

(25) It is certain that in the course of his existence the subject found in this car an object more satisfying it seems than the straps. For the simple reason that he still understands nothing about the straps while he is all the same capable of saying that obviously the car does not serve to satisfy a need, but that he is very attached to it. And then he operates it, he is the master of it. He feels fine inside his car.

What are we going to find here at the level of the image? At the level of the image of o we find things which are evidently different according to whether we take things at the level of the phantasy and of the dream, or at the level of what one could call the phantasies of the dream and of the daydream. In the daydream, which has its own value, we know what the image of the other is. It is something vis-a-vis which he has taken up particular attitudes. The image of the other, is the couple of lovers, which on the pretext on not disturbing, note, he never fails to disturb in the most effective fashion, namely calling on them to separate.

The image of the other, is this other of which everyone will say - remember this curious phantasy which he says he had again not long ago - 'oh, there is no need to check who is in the room, it is only a dog'. In short, the image of the other, is something which leaves in any case very little room for sexual union, which requires either separation, or on the contrary (26) something which is really quite out of place, an animal phallus, a phallus which is completely outside the limits of the game. If there is a phallus, it is a dog's phallus.

This situation, at you see, seems to have progressed in the direction of disintegration. That is to say that if for a long time the subject was someone who took his support from a feminine identification, we observe that his relationship with the possibilities of union, the fact of embracing, of genital satisfaction, presents itself in a way which in any case leaves wide open, the problem of what the phallus is doing there. It is very certain in any case that the subject is not at ease. The question of double or single is there. If it is double it is separated, if it is single it is not human. In any case it does not work out so well.

And as regards the subject in this case there is one thing quite clear: we do not have to ask ourselves like in the other case what he is or where he is. It is quite clear, there is no longer anybody. It really is the Outis which we noted in other circumstances. Whether it is the dream, where the woman does everything "to get my penis", where literally there is nothing in fact - one can do everything one wishes by hand, even indeed show that there is nothing up one's sleeve, but as regards him nobody, and as regards his phantasy, that is namely what is there in this place where he should not be: in effect there is no one. There (27) is no one, because if there is a phallus, it is the phallus of a dog who masturbated in a place where he would have been very embarrassed if anyone had entered. In any case not him.

And here what is there at the level of I. One could say, it is certain that there is Ella Sharpe, and that Ella Sharpe is not unrelated to all of this. Ella Sharpe is warned in advance by a little cough to reverse the formula, not to put her finger either between the tree and the bark. That is to say that if she is in the process of doing something more or less suspect to herself, she has to cover herself before the subject arrives. It is necessary, in a word, that Ella Sharpe should be completely protected from the subject's blows. This is what I described the last time, referring myself to Ella Sharpe's own comparison of analysis considered as a game of chess, as the subject not wanting to lose his queen.

He does not want to lose his queen because no doubt his queen is the key to all of this; and all of this can only hold together because it is on the side of the woman that nothing should be changed. Because it is on the side of the woman that omnipotence lies. The strange thing, is that Ella Sharpe senses this idea of omnipotence and recognises it everywhere to the point of telling the subject that he believes himself to be omnipotent. On the pretext that he had had a tremendous dream, even though he is not capable of saying any more than this little bit of adventure which happens on a road in Czechoslovakia.

But it is not the subject who is all powerful. What is all- (28) powerful is the other. And this indeed is why the situation is to be specially dreaded. Let us not forget all the same that we are dealing with a subject who is unable to plead. He is unable, and it is all the same something very striking.

The key to the question is the following: is it or is it not true that the subject cannot manage to plead because the other, in the position and place of whom we place ourselves every time we have to plead, for him is someone who must not be touched. In other words the other him, and in this case it is the woman, the other must not in any case be castrated. I mean that the other o carries in herself this signifier which contains all the values. And this indeed is where the phallus must be considered - I am not the only one; read page 272 of Melanie Klein about the evolution of the little girl; she says very well that the signifier phallus primitively concentrates on itself all the tendencies that the subject was able to have in all the orders, oral, anal, urethral, and that even before one can speak about the genital already the signifier phallus concentrates in itself all the values, and specially the instinctual values, the aggressive tendencies that the subject may have developed.

It is entirely in the measure that the subject cannot bring the signifier phallus into play, where the signifier phallus remains inherent in the other as such, that the subject finds himself in a state which is the state of breakdown which we see. But what is altogether striking is that here, as in every case where we find ourselves in the presence of a resistance of the subject, (25) this resistance is that of the analyst.

Because effectively if there is something which Ella Sharpe prohibits herself severely in this case - she does not know why, but it is certain that she admits as such that she prohibits it to herself - it is to plead. In this case where precisely there is presented a barrier to be overcome which she could overcome, she forbids herself to overcome it; she refuses to allow herself this because she is not aware that what the subject is taking so many precautions against, is not - as she thinks - something which could concern a supposed paternal aggression - the father is dead, well and truly dead for a long time, and it was extremely difficult to reanimate him a little bit within the analysis; it is not to encourage the subject to use the phallus as a weapon that in question, it is not a question of his homosexual conflict; it is not that he proves himself to be more or less courageous, aggressive in the presence of people who tease him while he is playing tennis because he is not able to play the final shot; this is not at all what is in question. It is on this side of that moment where he must consent to perceive that the woman is castrated.

I am not saying that the woman is not the phallus, which she shows quite ironically in the dream phantasy, but that the other as such, because of the very fact that he is in the other of language, is subjected to this: as regards the woman, she is without having it (est sans l'avoir). Now this is precisely (30) what cannot be admitted by him in any case.

For him she should not be without having it, and this is why he does not want her at any price to put it at risk. His wife is outside the interplay of the dream, do not forget. She is the one who in appearance does not play any role there. It is not even underlined that she is looking. It is there, as I might say, that the phallus is protected. The subject himself does not even have to put the phallus at risk because it is entirely in play in a corner where nobody would dream of looking for it. The subject does not go so far as to say that it is in the woman, and nevertheless it is indeed in the woman that it is.

I mean that it is to the extent that Ella Sharpe is there. It is not particularly inappropriate that she is a woman. It could even be quite appropriate if she perceived what should be said to the subject, namely that she is there as woman, and this poses questions, for the subject to dare to plead his case before her. It is precisely what he does not do. It is precisely what she perceives that he does not do, and it is around this that turns the critical moment of the analysis.

At that moment she encourages him to use his phallus as a weapon; she says, this phallus is something which has always been extremely dangerous, do not be afraid, this indeed is what is in question, it is "a biting and a boring thing" (146).

There is nothing in the material which gives us an indication of the aggressive character of the phallus. And it is nevertheless in this sense that she intervenes by her word. I do not think (31) that this is the best thing to do. Why? Because the position the subject has, and which according to all appearances he has kept, which he will keep in any case all the more after the intervention of Ella Sharpe, is precisely the one he had at a moment of his childhood which indeed is the one which we are trying to specify in the phantasy of the cut straps, and everything which is attached to it in terms of identifications to his sister and of the absence of prams. It is something which appears, you will see it if you re-read the associations very attentively. It is something that he is sure he has experienced: it is himself tied down, pinned in bed. (141) It is himself in so far as he has certainly been contained, maintained in positions which are not unrelated to what we can presume, to some repression of masturbation, in any case to some experience which was linked for him to the first approaches of erogenous emotion, and which we have every reason to think was traumatic.

This is the sense in which Ella Sharpe interprets it. Everything that the subject produces, is something which must have played a role, she says, in some primal scene, with his parents coupling. There is no doubt that he interrupted this coupling, either by his cries, or by some intestinal trouble. It is here that she even rediscovers the proof that this little colicky pain which replaces the cough when he is going to knock is a confirmation of her interpretation.

This is not certain. The subject, whether he is small, or to (32) the extent that something occurs as an echo as a transitory symptom in the course of analysis, releases what he has within his body. That is what a colicky pain is. This does not for all that settle the question of the function of this incontinence. This incontinence, as you know, will be reproduced at the urethral level, no doubt with a different function. And I already said how important it was to notice the echo character of the presence of the parents in the process of consummating the sexual act in every kind of enuretic manifestation.

Let us be careful here, it is important not to give always a univocal finality to what can in effect have certain effects, to be subsequently used secondarily by the subject as constituting in effect a whole intervention on interparental relationships.

But here the subject, quite recently, namely at a time quite close to this dream in analysis, had a quite special phantasy, which in this case Ella Sharpe makes a great deal of to confirm the notion of this relationship with parental union. It was that he was afraid one day that he would have a breakdown in his famous car, really more and more identified with his own person, and to have it blocking, neither more nor less, the way that the royal couple had to pass - as if it were there as an echo for us of the chess game. But every time you find the king think less of the father than of the subject.

(33) In any case this phantasy, this little anxiety that the subject manifests: provided he himself must also go to this little inaugural function where the royal couple - we are in 1934, the English crown is not a queen with a little consort, it is indeed a king and a queen who are going to find themselves blocked there by the subject's car.

What we should be satisfied purely and simply with saying in this case, is: here is something which renews imaginarily, phantastically, purely and simply, an aggressive attitude of the subject, an attitude of rivalry comparable indeed to what one can give to the fact of wetting his bed. It is not certain. If this should awake some echo in us, it is all the same that the royal couple are not just in any condition: he is going to find himself in his car, stopped, exposed to view. It seems that what is in question in this case is all the same something which is much closer to this desperate search for the ferret of the phallus which is nowhere, and which it is a question of finding, and which one can be very sure that one can never find. Namely that if the subject is here in this hood, in this protection constructed for a long time around his ego by the hood of the car - it is also the possibility of escaping with a peak of speed, a burst of speed - the subject is going to find himself in the same position in which we have formerly heard reverberating the laughter of the Olympians: it is Vulcan who captures Mars and (34) Venus in one net. And everyone knows that the laughter of the assembled gods on this occasion still resonates in our ears and in the verses of Homer.

Where is the phallus? It is still indeed the major source of the comic; and after all let us not forget that this phantasy is above all a phantasy about a notion of incongruity much more than anything else. It accords in the closest fashion with the same fundamental situation which is going to give its unity to the dream and everything that is around it, namely an aphanisis not in the sense of the disappearance of desire, but in the proper sense that the word deserves if we make of it the substantive aphanisos and which is not so much to disappear, as to make disappear.

Quite recently a talented man, Raymond Queneau, put as an epigraph to a very fine book, Zazi dans le metro, ho plasas efanisen: the person who has done this has carefully dissimulated his sources.

This indeed is what is in question when all is said and done. The aphanisis that is in question here, is the concealment of the object in question, namely the phallus. It is in so far as the phallus is not put in , that the phallus is reserved, that it is preserved, that the subject cannot gain access to the world of the other. And as you will see, there is nothing more neurotogenic not than the fear of losing the phallus, or the fear of castration - this is the altogether fundamental mainspring - but than not wanting that the other should be castrated.

Seminar 13: Wednesday 4 March 1959

I think that we have taken the structural analysis of the model dream which is found in Ella Sharpe's book far enough for you to see at least the contribution this work makes to the goal we are trying to reach, namely what we should consider desire and its interpretation to be.

Even though some people have said that they were not able to find the reference to Lewis Carroll that I gave the last time I am surprised that you did not remember the double rule of three, because that was where I finished in connection with the two stages of the more or less fetishistic relationship of the subject to the object, what was finally expressed as $\left(\frac{i(0)}{$} \diamond \frac{0}{I} \right) \text{capita}$ the ideal identification which I intentionally left open for the first of the two equations, the one of the straps of his sister's sandals. The one where instead of the I we have an x.

I do not think that anyone of you failed to see that this x, as might be expected, is the thing called the phallus. But the important thing is the place where this phallus was. Precisely at the place of I, of the primitive identification, of the identification to the mother, precisely at that place where the subject does not want to deny the phallus to the mother. The subject wants, as the doctrine has always taught us, wants to maintain the mother's phallus. The subject refuses the castration of the other.

The subject, as I told you, does not want to lose his queen, since there was question of a game of chess. He does not want, (2) on this occasion, to put Ella Sharpe in any other position than that of the idealised phallus which is the one he warns her about by a little cough before coming into the room in order to make the disappear so that he does not, in any way, have to bring them into play.

We will perhaps have occasion this year to come back to Lewis Carroll; you will see that it is a question literally of nothing else in the two great Alice books: Alice in Wonderland and Journey through the Looking Glass. These two Alices are almost a poem of phallic avatars. You can start reading them now, to prepare yourselves for something that I may be led to say about them.

One thing may have struck you in what I told you about the position of this subject with respect to the phallus, which is what I underlined for you: the opposition between being and having. When I told you that it was because for him it was a question of being that was posed, that he would have had to be it without having it - which is the way that I defined the feminine position - you could not have heard this being and not being the phallus, without it giving rise in you to an echo which really even imposes itself right through this case of the "to be or not to be" which is still so enigmatic, which has become almost a joke, which gives us the style of Hamlet's position and which, if we go through this door will only bring us back to one of the (3) most primitive themes of Freud's thought, of this something in which there is organised the position of desire, where there is demonstrated the fact that from the first edition of the Traumdeutung the theme of Hamlet was promoted by Freud to an equivalent rank to that of the oedipal theme which appeared then for the first time in the Traumdeutung. We know of course that Freud had been thinking about it for some time, but only from letters that were not destined for publication. The Oedipus complex makes its first appearance in the Traumdeutung in 1900. Hamlet at that time is also published in 1900 in the form that Freud left it afterwards, but in a note, and it was in 1914 that it passed into the body of the text.

I think that the theme of Hamlet can help us to reinforce this sort of elaboration of the castration complex. How is the complex articulated in the concrete, in the development of the analysis?

The theme of Hamlet, after Freud, was taken up on several occasions. I probably will not make the rounds of all the authors who took it up. You know that the first one was Jones. Ella Sharpe also put forward a certain number of things about Hamlet which are not uninteresting, Shakespeare's thought and Shakespeare's work being right at the centre of her formation. We may have an opportunity to come back to it.

It is a question today of beginning to decipher this field. By asking ourselves what Freud himself meant by introducing Hamlet, and what has been demonstrated by what is subsequently said in the work of other authors.

Here is Freud's text which it is worthwhile reading at the (4) beginning of this research. I am giving the French translation.

After having spoken about the Oedipus complex for the first time, and it is not superfluous to point out here that he introduced the Oedipus complex into the Interpretation of dreams in connection with dreams of the death of persons of whom we are fond, namely in connection with what this year served us as a point of departure and a first guide for highlighting something which presented itself first of all quite naturally in this dream which I chose because it was one of the simplest referring to a dead person; this dream which served to show us how here was established on two lines of intersubjectivity which are superimposed, reduplicated with respect to one another, the famous "He did not know", that we placed on one line, the line of the position of the subject - the paternal subject in this case being what is evoked by the dreaming subject - namely the somewhere where there is situated, in a form that is in a way incarnated by the father himself, and at the place of the father in the form of "He did not know", precisely the fact that the father is unconscious and incarnates here the image, the very unconsciousness of the subject, and of what? His own wish, of his death-wish against his father.

Of course he is aware of another wish, a sort of benevolent wish, calling for the consolation of death. But precisely this unconsciousness which the subject has about his oedipal death-wish is in a way incarnated in the image of the dream in this form that the father should not even know that the son had a benevolent death-wish for him.

(5) "He did not know," says the dream absurdly "that he had died." This is where the text of the dream stops. And what is repressed for the subject, which is not unknown to the phantastical father, is the "according to his wish" which Freud tells us is the signifier which we should consider as repressed.

"Another of the great creations of tragic poetry", Freud tells us, "Shakespeare's Hamlet, has its roots in the same soil as Oedipus Rex. But the changed treatment of the same material reveals the whole difference in the mental life of these two widely separated epochs of civilisation: the secular advance of repression in the emotional life of mankind. In the Oedipus the child's wishful phantasy that underlies it is brought into the open and realised as it would be in a dream."

He had in effect insisted a good deal on the fact that oedipal dreams are here in a way like the offspring, the fundamental source of the unconscious desires that always reappear, and the Oedipus (I am speaking about the Oedipus of Sophocles or the Greek tragedy) as the construction, the elaboration of what always emerges from these unconscious desires. This is how, literally, things are articulated in the Interpretation of dreams.

"In Hamlet it remains repressed; and - just as in the case of neurosis - we only learn of its existence from its inhibiting consequences." (German quotation). "Strangely enough, the overwhelming effect produced by the more modern tragedy has turned out to be compatible with the fact that people have remained completely in the dark as to the hero's character. The play is built up on Hamlet's hesitations over fulfilling the task (6) of revenge that is assigned to him; but its text offers no reasons or motives for these hesitations and an immense variety of attempts at interpreting them have failed to produce a result. According to the view that was originated by Goethe and is still the prevailing one today, Hamlet represents the type of man whose power of direct action is paralysed by an excessive development of his intellect. (He is "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"). According to another view, the dramatist has tried to portray a pathologically irresolute character which might be classed as neurasthenic. The plot of the drama shows us, however, that Hamlet is far from being represented as a person incapable of taking any action. We see him doing so on two occasions: first in a sudden outburst of temper, when he runs his sword through the eavesdropper behind the arras"

You know that this was Polonius, and that it was at the time that Hamlet is having with his mother a conversation which is far from being crucial because nothing in this play ever is, except its fatal ending where in a few moments there is piled up in the form of corpses everything which was delayed up to then by the complications of the action.

"And secondly in a premeditated and even crafty fashion, when, with all the callousness of a renaissance prince, he sends the two courtiers," (these are Rosencrantz and Guildenstern who represent the kinds of false friends), "to the death that had been planned for himself. What is it, then, that inhibits him in fulfilling the task set him by his father's ghost?"

You know that the play opens on a platform before the castle in Elsinore with the apparition of this ghost to two guards who soon let Hamlet know about it.

(7) "The answer, once again, is that it is the peculiar nature of the task. Hamlet is able to do anything - except to take vengeance on the man who did away with his father and took that father's place with his mother, the man who shows him the repressed wishes of his own childhood realised. Thus the loathing which should drive him on to revenge is replaced in him by self-reproaches, by scruples of conscience, which remind him that he himself is literally no better than the sinner whom he is to punish. Here I have translated into conscious terms what was bound to remain unconscious in Hamlet's mind" (SE 4_265) .

This first contribution by Freud is presented with this type of balanced precision which, I may say, keeps us on the right path in order to situate, to maintain Hamlet in the place where he has put him. That is quite clear here. But it is also with respect to this first outline of Freud's perception that there should be subsequently situated all the digressions and the embroiderings that have been imposed on it - sometimes as you will see in a rather distant way.

The authors according precisely to the advance of analytic exploration centring their interest on points which moreover are sometimes quite validly found in Hamlet, but to the detriment of this sort of rigour with which Freud situates it from the beginning. And I would say that at the same time, and this is the characteristic which is the least exploited, the least questioned, everything here is something which is found to be situated on the plane of scruples of conscience. Something which in any case cannot be considered as being only an elaboration.

If it is presented to us as being what takes place, the way in which one can express on the conscious plane what remains (8) unconscious in the soul of the hero, it seems that we are quite right to ask how it can be articulated in the unconscious. Because one thing that is certain, is that a symptomatic elaboration like a scruple of conscience is not all the same in the unconscious. If it is in consciousness, if it is constructed in some way by defensive methods, we must all the same ask ourselves what corresponds in the unconscious to the conscious structure.

This therefore is what we are in the process of trying to do. I will finish the little that remains of Freud's paragraph. He does not take long in any case to throw what will be a bridge across the abyss of Hamlet. It is in fact quite striking in effect that Hamlet remained a complete literary enigma up to Freud. This does not mean that it is not still one, but there is this bridge. This is true for other works. The Misanthrope is the same kind of enigma.

"The distaste for sexuality ... fits in very well with this" (symptom) "the same distaste that was destined to take possession of the poet's mind more and more ... and which reached its extreme expression in Timon of Athens." I am reading this passage to the end, because it is important, and in two lines opens the way for those who subsequently tried to organise the whole of Shakespeare's work around the problem of personal repression. This effectively is what Ella Sharpe tried to do; which is indicated in what was published after her death in the form of "An unfinished paper", in her Hamlet which first appeared (9) in the International journal of psychoanalysis and which is something like an attempt to take the whole evolution of the work of Shakespeare as signifying something which I believe that by wanting to give it a certain schematic form Ella Sharp certainly did something imprudent, and in any case something which can be criticised from the point of view of method, which does not exclude that effectively she discovered some valuable things.

"For it can of course only be the poet's own mind which confronts us in Hamlet. I observe in a book on Shakespeare by Georg Brandes (1896) a statement that Hamlet was written immediately after the death of Shakespeare's father (in 1601), that is under the immediate impact of his bereavement, and, as we may well assume, while his childhood feelings about his father had been freshly revived. It is known, too, that Shakespeare's own son who died at an early age bore the name of Hamnet, which is identical with Hamlet" (SE 4 264-266).

I think we will finish here with this passage which shows to what point Freud already by his simple indications takes very far the things that the authors have since been engaged in.

Here I would like to tackle the problem in the way that we are able to do it beginning from the data which I put forward before you from the beginning of this year. Because I think that these data allow us to reassemble in a more synthetic, in a more striking form the different principles of what is happening in Hamlet, to simplify in a way this multiplicity of agencies with which we often find ourselves confronted in the present situation. I mean which gives some character or other of (10) reduplication to analytic commentaries on whatever observation we are dealing with when we see taken up simultaneously for example in the register of the opposition between the unconscious and defence, then afterwards of the opposition between the ego and the id, and I think of everything that can be produced when the agency of the superego is added to it, without these different points of view ever being unified, which sometimes give to these works a sort of vagueness, a sort of overloading which is not something which is designed to be of use to us in our experience.

What we are trying to grasp here are guides-lines which, by allowing us to resituate these different organs, these different stages of the mental apparatus that Freud has given us, allow us to resituate them in a way that takes into account the fact that they are semantically superimposed on one another, in a partial way. It is not by adding them to one another, by making of them a sort of unity and totality that one can make them function normally.

It is if you wish by bringing to them the more fundamental skeleton map that we are trying to construct in such a way that we will know what we are doing with each one of these orders of reference when we bring them into play.

Let us begin to spell out this great drama of Hamlet. However evocative the text of Freud may have been, I must all the same recall what we are dealing with. We are dealing with a play which opens a short time after the death of the king who was, his (11) son Hamlet tells us, a very admirable king, the ideal king and father, and who has died mysteriously. The version of his death that has been put about is that he was stung by a serpent in an orchard (the orchard which is again interpreted by analysts). Then very quickly, a few months after this death, Hamlet's mother marries her brother-in-law, Claudius, this Claudius who is the object of the execration of the central hero, Hamlet, and the one who bears not alone the motives of rivalry that Hamlet may have had in his regard, Hamlet who in short was barred from the throne by this uncle, but also everything that he glimpses, everything that he suspects about the scandalous character of this substitution. What is more, the father who appears as a ghost to tell him in what conditions of dramatic betrayal there took place what the ghost tells him, was well and truly an assassination. Namely - it is in the text and it has not failed either to exercise the curiosity of analysts - that there was poured into his ear while he was asleep, a poison mysteriously named hebenon. Hebenon which is sort of made-up, constructed word - I do not know whether it is found in any other text. People have tried to give it an equivalent, a word which is close to it and which designates it in the fashion that it is ordinarily translated, that is by jusquiane.

It is quite certain that this assassination through the ear would not in any way satisfy a toxicologist, but gives lots of material for interpretation to the analyst.

Let us look right away at something which appears to us as something striking, I mean if we start from the criteria, the articulations that we have highlighted. Let us use these keys, (12) however specific their emergence may have seemed to you. They were constructed for a very particular, very specific purpose, but this does not exclude, and this is one of the clearest aspects of analytic experience, that the particular is what has the most universal value.

It is quite clear that what we highlighted by writing the "he did not know that he had died" is undoubtedly something quite fundamental. In the relationship to the Other as such, the ignorance in which this other is kept about a particular situation is something absolutely original as you well know because you have learned even that one of the revolutions that occurs in the soul of the child is the moment that the child, after having believed that all his thoughts - "all his thoughts" is something that should always urge us to be very cautious, I mean we are the ones who call them thoughts. As regards the experience of the subject, the thoughts are everything that exists - everything that is known by his parents, his slightest internal movements are known - he perceives that it is possible for the other not to know. It is indispensable to take into account this correlation of: not knowing in the other, with precisely the establishment of the unconscious. The one is in a way the opposite of the other. And it is perhaps its foundation. Because in effect this formulation is not enough to establish them but indeed there is something which is quite clear, and which serves us as a guide, which is that in the drama of Hamlet we are going to try to give some body to this (13) historical notion, which is all the same a little bit superficial, in the atmosphere, in the style of the times, that we are dealing with some modern construction or other; compared to the status of the ancients these are poor degenerates; we are in the style of the 19th century.

It is not for nothing that Georg Brandes is quoted here. And we will never know whether Freud at this epoch, even though it is probable, knew Nietzsche. But this, this reference to the moderns, may not satisfy us. Why should the moderns be more neurotic than the ancients? In any case it is begging the question.

What we are trying to see, is something which will take us further than this begging of the question, or this explanation by the explanation: things are going badly because things are going badly. What we have before us is a work whose fibres, whose first fibres, we are going to begin to separate.

The first fibre, the father here knows very well that he has died, died in consequence of the wish of the one who wanted to take his place, namely Claudius who is his brother-in-law (or his brother?). The crime is undoubtedly hidden from the centre stage, for those who are on the stage. This is an absolutely essential point, without which of course the drama of Hamlet would have nowhere to situate itself or to exist. And this is what is highlighted in Jones' accessible article "The death of Hamlet's father", namely the essential difference that Shakespeare has introduced compared to the primitive saga in which the massacre of the one who in the saga bears a different name, but who is the king, takes place before everybody in (14) virtue of a pretext which concerns in effect his relations to his wife. This king too is butchered by his brother, but everybody knows it. Here, in Hamlet, the thing is hidden, but, this is the important point, the father knows it, and he is the one who comes to tell it to us "There needs no ghost, my lord," - Freud quotes it on several occasions because it has become a proverb - "there needs no ghost, my lord come from the grave to tell us this" (I v 125). And in effect if it is a question of the oedipal theme we ourselves already know a good deal about it. But it is clear that in the construction of the theme of Hamlet we have not yet got to the stage of knowing it. And there is something significant in the fact that in the construction of the fable, it should be the father who comes to say it, that he the father knows it.

I think that there is here something quite essential. And it is a first difference in the fibre between the situation, the construction, the first fundamental elaboration of the drama of Oedipus. Because Oedipus does not know. Once he knows the whole drama is unleashed which leads to his self-punishment, namely his liquidation of the situation. But the oedipal crime is committed by Oedipus in the unconscious. Here the oedipal crime is known, and it is known by whom? By the other, by the one who is in effect its victim, and who has risen in order to make it known to the subject.

In short you see the path along which we are advancing, in a method which might be called one of comparison, of correlation between the different fibres of the structure, which is a classical method, one which consists in an articulated whole - and nowhere is there more articulation than in the domain of the (15) signifier. The very notion of articulation, as I ceaselessly underline, is consubstantial with it. After all one only speaks about articulation in the world because the signifier gives a meaning to this term. Otherwise there is nothing but continuity or discontinuity, but never articulation.

We are trying to see, to grasp by a sort of comparison homogenous fibres in one or other phase, of Oedipus and of Hamlet, in so far as Freud brought them together, which is going to allow us to conceptualise the coherence of things. Namely, how, in what measure, why, it is conceivable that in the very measure that one of the keys of the keyboard is found in a sign opposed to the one where it is in the other of these two dramas, a strictly correlative modification is produced. And this correlation is what should put us before the articulation of the sort of causality that is in question in these dramas. It is to begin with the very idea that it is these correlative modifications which are the most instructive for us, which allow us to gather together the resources of the signifier in a manner which is more or less usable by us. There must be a relationship which is graspable and finally notable in a quasi-algebraic fashion between these first modifications of the sign of what is happening.

If you wish, on this top line, of "he did not know", here it is "he knew that he had died". He had died in accordance with the murderous wish, that of his brother, which had pushed him into the grave. We are going to see what the relationships are with the hero's drama.

(16) But before launching ourselves in a fashion that is always overhasty along the line of the superimposition of identifications, which is in the tradition: there are some concepts, and the most useful are the least elaborated, and God knows what has been done with identifications. And Claudius when all is said and done, what he has done, is a form of Hamlet, is Hamlet's desire. This is easy to say because to situate Hamlet's position vis-a-vis this desire we find ourselves in the position of having to bring into play here all of a sudden scruples of conscience. Namely something which introduces into the relationships of Hamlet to this Claudius a double, profoundly ambivalent position which is that of a rival but a rivalry which one really senses is a singular one, a second degree rivalry, the one who in reality has done what he did not dare to do. And in these conditions he finds himself surrounded by some mysterious protection which has to be defined.

In the name of scruples of conscience it is said? With reference to what is imposed on Hamlet, and which is all the more imposed on him after the first encounter with the ghost, namely literally the command to avenge the ghost, in acting against the murderer of his father Hamlet is full of all sorts of feelings. He has been dispossessed, a feeling of usurpation; a feeling of rivalry; a feeling of vengeance; and more than all these the express order of his father whom he admired more than anybody. Surely everything in Hamlet is in agreement for him to act, and (16) he does not act.

Obviously it is here that the problem begins, and that the way to advance must be accompanied by the greatest simplicity. I mean that always what causes our downfall, what makes us go astray, is to substitute ready-made keys for the solution of the question. Freud tell us: it is a question here of the conscious representation of something which must be articulated in the unconscious; what we are trying to articulate, is to situate somewhere and as such in the unconscious what is meant by a desire.

In any case, let us say with Freud that there is something wrong from the moment that things are engaged on in such a way. There is something wrong with Hamlet's desire. Here is the path that we are going to choose. This is not easy because we are not much further along the road than the point that people have always got to.

Here we must take Hamlet, his behaviour in the tragedy, as a whole. And because we have spoken about Hamlet's desire, we must notice something which has not escaped analysts naturally, but is not perhaps of the same register, of the same order: it is a question of situating what there is in Hamlet in terms of which for us is the soul, the centre, the touchstone of desire. It is not exactly that. Namely Hamlet's relations to what is the conscious object of his desire.

Here, the author refuses us nothing. We have something in the play which acts like a barometer for Hamlet's position with (18) respect to desire. We have it in the most obvious and clearest fashion in the form of the Ophelia character.

Ophelia is very obviously one of the most fascinating creations which has been proposed to human imagination. Something which we can call the drama of the feminine object, the drama of desire, of the world which makes its appearance at the dawn of civilisation in the form of Helen. It is remarkable to see it at a point which is perhaps also a high point, incarnated in the drama and the misfortune of Ophelia. You know that it was taken up in many forms of aesthetic, artistic creation, either by poets, or by painters, at least in the Preraphaelite period, to the extent of giving us these finical paintings in which the very terms of the descriptions that Shakespeare gives of this Ophelia in her dress floating in the river into which she had allowed herself to slip in her madnessbecause the suicide of Ophelia is ambiguous.

What happens in the play is, immediately, correlatively in short to the drama - it is Freud who points this out to us - we see this horror of femininity as such. Its terms are articulated in the most proper sense of the term. Namely, what he uncovers, what he highlights, what he brings into play before the very eyes of Ophelia as being all the possibilities of degradation, of variation, of corruption, which are linked to the evolution of a woman's very life in so far as she allows herself to be drawn into all the actions which little by little make a mother of her. It is in the name of this that Hamlet rejects Ophelia in the fashion which appears in the play extremely sarcastic and extremely cruel.

(19) We have here a first correlation of something which marks well the evolution and the an evolution and a correlation as essential for something which carries the case of Hamlet into its position with respect to desire. Notice that here immediately we find ourselves confronted in passing with a wild analyst, Polonius, Ophelia's father who immediately puts his finger on it: Hamlet's melancholy comes from the fact that he wrote love letters to his daughter and that he, Polonius, not failing in his duty as a father, made his daughter give a sharp reply. In other words our Hamlet is love-sick.

This caricatural character is put here to represent for us the ironic accompaniment of the easy option that is always provided by the external interpretation of events. Things are structured altogether differently as everyone knows. It is of course a question of something which concerns the relations of Hamlet to what? Essentially to his act. But of course the profound change of his sexual position is altogether capital, but it has to be articulated, to be organised just a little differently. It is a question of an act which must be performed, and he depends on it in his position as a whole. And very precisely in this something which is manifested right through this play, which this play makes of this fundamental position with respect to the act which in English is a much more commonly used word than in French, it is what in French is called ajournement, retardement, and which is expressed in English by procrastinating, putting off until tomorrow.

This in effect is what is in question. Our Hamlet, right (20) through the play procrastinates; it is a question of knowing what is meant by each of the different procrastinations of the act every time he has an opportunity for it, and what is going to be determining at the end in the fact that he is going to actually accomplish this act. I believe that in any case there is something to highlight here. It is precisely the question of what is signified by this act which is proposed to him.

The act which is proposed to him has nothing to do, when all is said and done, and this is sufficiently indicated in what I pointed out to you, with the oedipal act of a revolt against the father. The conflict with the father, in the sense that it is creative in the psyche. It is not the act of Oedipus, in so far as the act of Oedipus sustains the life of Oedipus, and makes of him the hero he is before his downfall, as long as he knows nothing, which makes Oedipus conclude in a dramatic way. For Hamlet, it is that he is guilty of being. He cannot tolerate being. Before the drama of Hamlet even begins Hamlet is aware of the crime of existing. And it is starting from this beginning that he must choose. And for him the problem of existing starting from this beginning is posed in terms which are his own: namely the "to be or not to be" which is something which engages him irredeemably in being as he very clearly articulates it.

It is precisely because for him the oedipal drama is open at the beginning, and not at the end, that the choice between being and not being is proposed. And it is precisely because there is established this either/or, that he is in any case taken up into (21) the chain of the signifier, into something which means that he is in any case the victim of this choice.

I will give Letourneur's translation which I think is the best one.

"To be, or not to be - that is the question.
 Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
 The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
 Or to take arms against a sea of troubles
 And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep -
 No more, and by a sleep to say we end
 The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
 That flesh is heir to." (Ill, i)

I do not think these words are meant to leave us unmoved.

"To die, to sleep -
 To sleep - perchance to dream. Aye, there's the rub,
 For in that sleep of death, what dreams may come when we have shuffled off this mortal coil"

This "mortal coil" does not quite mean envelope. It is this kind of tortion of something rolled around us.

"must give us pause. There's the respect
 That makes calamity of so long life.
 For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
 The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
 The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
 The insolence of office and the spurns
 That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
 When he himself might his quietus make
 With a bare bodkin?" (Ill i 56ff)

What Hamlet finds himself confronted with in this "to be or not to be", is the encountering of the place taken by what his father (22) has said to him. And what his father has said to him qua ghost, is that he had been surprised by death "in the blossoms of my sin" (I v 76). It is a matter of encountering the place taken by the sin of the other, the unpaid sin. The one who knows is on the contrary, contrary to Oedipus, someone who has not paid for this crime of existing. Moreover the consequences for the following generations are not negligible. The two sons of Oedipus thought only of butchering one another with all the vigour and the conviction that could be wished for, while for Hamlet it is completely different. Hamlet can neither pay in his own place, nor leave the debt unpaid. In the last analysis he must have it paid, but in the conditions in which he is placed the blow passes through himself. And it is by the very weapon after a grim drama which we will have to greatly expand on, that Hamlet is wounded by, only after he Hamlet has received a deathly wound, that he can strike the criminal who is within his reach, namely Claudius.

It is this community of knowing, of the fact that the father and the son both know, which is here the mainspring which creates the whole difficulty of the problem of the assumption of this act by Hamlet. And the paths by which he can rejoin it, which will make possible this act which in itself is impossible, in the very measure that the other knows, it is by roundabout ways which will finally make it possible for him to accomplish what must be accomplished, it is these paths which should be the object of our interest because these are what will be instructive for us. Because this is the real problem, which it was a question of introducing today. It is necessary that I should take you in a (23) way to the end of things, I mean to how finally, and by what ways, Hamlet manages to accomplish his act. Let us not all the same forget that if he manages to do it, if Claudius is finally struck down, it is nevertheless a botched piece of work. It is nothing less than after having run through the body of someone who has certainly, as you will see, plunged into the abyss, namely the friend, the companion, Laertes, after his mother has poisoned herself by mistake with the very cup which should have served her as a backup murder weapon if the tip of the poisoned foil did not wound Hamlet, it is after a certain number of other victims, and not before he himself has been mortally wounded that he can deliver his blow. There is all the same something here which should pose a problem for us.

If effectively something is accomplished, if there was in the last resort a sort of rectification of desire which made the act possible, how was it accomplished? This is precisely what holds the key, which ensures that this play of genius has never been replaced by a better one. Because in short what are these great mythical themes which the creations of poets tackle throughout the ages if not a kind of long approximation which ensures that the myth by circumscribing its possibilities in the closest possible way ends up by entering properly speaking into subjectivity and psychology. I maintain, and I would maintain unambiguously - and I think I am in accord with Freud in saying it - that poetic creations engender rather than reflect psychological creations. This diffuse map of something which is vaguely outlined in this primordial relationship of rivalry (24) between father and son is something which here gives all its prominence and is the true heart of this play Hamlet. It is in the measure that something is equivalent to what has been lacking - to what has been lacking precisely because this original, initial, situation is distinct from Oedipus - namely castration, precisely because of the fact that in the play things are presented as a kind of slow zig-zag progress, this slow coming to birth by roundabout ways of the necessary castration, in the very measure, and in the very measure that this is finally realised, that Hamlet makes emerge the final action in which he dies and in which things were taken to such an extent of not being able to the others, the Fortinbras, always ready to collect the inheritance, would come to succeed him.

Seminar 14; Wednesday 11 March 1959

Since the last time then we have been dealing with Hamlet. Hamlet does not come in here by chance, even though I told you that it was introduced at this point by the formula of being and not being which came to me in connection with Ella Sharpe's dream.

I was lead to re-read a part of what has been written about Hamlet on the analytic plane, and also of what was written before. The authors, at least the better ones, have obviously not neglected what was written before. And I must say that we have gone a good distance, despite the fact that I got a little lost from time to time, although not without some enjoyment, and the problem is to gather together what is in question in view of your particular goals.

Our precise goal being to give, or to give again its meaning to the function of desire in analysis and analytic interpretation. It is clear that this should not give us too much trouble because I hope to make you see, and I am making my statement here right away, I believe that what distinguishes the tragedy of Hamlet Prince of Denmark, is essentially that it is the tragedy of desire. Hamlet which - we cannot be absolutely sure, but according to the most rigorous studies - was first presented at London during the Winter season of 1601; Hamlet of which the first quarto edition, this famous edition which was almost what could be called a pirate edition at the time, namely that it was not done under the control of the author, but borrowed from what were called [actors' copies], booklets used by the prompter. This edition - it is interesting all the same to know these little bits of literary history - was unknown until 1823, (2) when a few filthy copies were found - ones which had been handled a good deal, probably taken to the performances. And the Folio edition, the great edition of Shakespeare, only began to appear after his death in 1623, preceding the great edition in which the plays are divided into acts. Which explains why the division into acts is much less decisive and clear in Shakespeare than elsewhere.

In fact it is not believed that Shakespeare intended to divide his plays into five acts. This is important because we are going to see how this play is divided.

Winter 1601, is two years before the death of Queen Elizabeth. And in effect one may think approximately that Hamlet, which is of capital importance in the life of Shakespeare, reduplicates as one might say the drama of this joining up of two epochs, two aspects of the poet's life, because the tone changes completely when James I comes to the throne, and already something is hinted at as one author says, which breaks the crystalline charm of Elizabeth's reign, of the virgin queen, she who makes a success of those long years of miraculous peace after what constituted in the history of England, as in many countries, a period of chaos into which it will promptly return with all the drama of the puritan revolution.

In short, 1601 already announces the queen's death, which one could not fail to foresee, with the execution of her lover, the Earl of Essex which takes place in the same year as the play Hamlet.

There is a point in evoking these reference points, since we are (3) not the only ones to have tried to resituate Hamlet in its context. What I am telling you here is something that I have not seen stressed by any analytic author. These are nevertheless the kind of basic facts which are important.

To tell the truth what has been written by analytic authors can not be said to have been enlightening. And today I will not put forward my criticism of what a certain line-by-line interpretation of Hamlet has directed itself towards. I mean, I am trying to rediscover one or other element, without in fact one being able to say otherwise than that the more the authors insist the further we get from the comprehension of the totality, from the coherence of the text.

I must also say that Ella Sharpe, whom I esteem greatly, in this respect, in her essay which it is true is unfinished, which was discovered after her death, greatly disappointed me. I will mention it all the same because it is significant. It is so much along the line that we are trying to explain regarding the tendency which we see being taken by analytic theory, that it is worth highlighting it. But we will not begin with it.

We will begin with Jones' article, which appeared in 1910 in the American Journal of Psychology which gives us a date and a monument, and it is essential to have read it, it is not easy to get hold of it nowadays. And in the little reedition that he made of it Jones has I think added on something else, some complements to his theory of Hamlet in this article: The Oedipus complex as an explanation of the Hamlet mystery.

(4) He adds as a subtitle: "A study on motive". In 1910 Jones tackles the problem which was masterfully indicated by Freud as I showed you the last time in this half-page in which one could say that when all is said and done everything is already there, because even the points on the horizon are marked namely the relationships of Shakespeare with the meaning of the problem which is posed for him: the signification of the feminine object.

I believe that we have here something that is absolutely central. And if Freud points us to Timon of Athens on the horizon this undoubtedly is the path that Ella Sharpe tried to take. She made the whole of Shakespeare's work into a sort of vast cyclothymic oscillation by showing in it the ascending plays, namely the ones that could be seen as optimistic, the plays in which aggression is directed outwards, and those in which aggression turns back onto the hero or the poet, those of the descending phase. Here is how we can classify Shakespeare's plays, and sometimes even date them.

I do not believe that we have here something entirely valid, and we are going to remain for the moment at the point that we are at, namely first of all at Hamlet in order to try - I will perhaps give some indications about what follows it or what precedes it, Twelfth Night, and Troilus and Cressida because I think it is almost impossible not to take them into account, they greatly clarify the problems that we are first going to introduce with the text of Hamlet alone.

(5) With the grand style of documentation which characterises his writings - there is in Jones a solidity, a certain sweep of style in the documentation which distinguishes his contributions to a high degree - Jones gives a sort of summary of what he very correctly calls, the mystery of Hamlet. There are two possibilities, you are either aware of the dimensions that this question has taken, or you are not aware of it. For those who are not aware of it, I am not going to repeat here what is in Jones' article. Inform yourselves about it one way or another. I have to tell you that the mass of writings on Hamlet has no equivalent. The abundance of the literature is something unbelievable. But what is still more unbelievable, is the extraordinary diversity of interpretations which have been given to it. I mean that the most contradictory interpretations have followed on one another, have unfolded throughout history, setting up the problem of the problem: namely why is everybody trying so hard to understand something; and they give the most extravagant, the most incoherent, the most diverse results. One cannot say that this goes very far. We will have to come back to it in what I am going to rapidly recall about the aspects of this explanation that Jones summarises in his article.

Almost everything has been said, and to go to one extreme, there is a Popular science monthly, which must be some sort of popular magazine dealing with medical matters, which published something (6) in 1860 called "The impediment of adipose". At the end of Hamlet we are told that Hamlet is "fat and scant of breath", and in this journal there is a whole development about Hamlet's adipose.

There is a certain Vining who in 1881 discovered that Hamlet was a woman disguised as a man, whose aim throughout the whole play was to seduce Horatio; and it was to touch Horatio's heart that Hamlet manufactured his whole story. All the same it is a good enough story. And at the same time we cannot say that it has absolutely no echo for us. It is certain that Hamlet's relationships with people of his own sex are all the same intimately interwoven with the problem of the play.

Let us come back to serious things, and recall with Jones that these efforts of criticism are grouped around two aspects. When there are two aspects in logic, there is always a third aspect, contrary to what is believed, the third is not all that much excluded. And it is obviously the third which in this case is interesting.

The supporters of the two aspects were not lightweights. For the first aspect there are those who have in short questioned Hamlet's psychology. These are obviously the ones who have the primacy, who must be given pride of place in our esteem. Here we encounter Goethe, Coleridge who in his Lectures on Shakespeare took up a very characteristic position which I think Jones could have taken a little more into account. Because it is a curious (7) thing that Jones, above all launched into an extraordinarily full commentary of what had been done in German, material that had proliferated and was even prolix.

The positions of Goethe and Coleridge are not identical. They have however a very close relationship which consists in putting the accent on the spiritual form of Hamlet's character. In general, let us say, that for Goethe it is action paralysed by thought. This as you know has a long line of descendants. It has been recalled, and not of course in vain, that Hamlet had lived rather a long time in Wittenberg. And this term, referring the intellectual and his problems to an excessive attendance at Wittenberg presented with good reason as one of the centres of a certain style of formation of young German students, is something which has had a long posterity. Hamlet is in short the man who sees all the elements, all the complexities, the motives in the game of life, and who is in short suspended, paralysed in his action by this knowledge. It is properly speaking a Goethean problem, and it has had profound repercussions, especially if you add to it the charm and seduction of Goethe's style and person.

As regards Coleridge, in a long passage that I have not time to read for you, he takes the same line, with a much less sociological, a much more psychological character. There is something in my opinion which dominates here in the whole passage from Coleridge which I would like to recall. "I must admit that I experience in myself some taste for the same thing". This is what for him described the psychasthenic character, the (8) impossibility of committing oneself to a path, and once having entered on it, engaged on it, remaining on it to the end.

The intervention of hesitation, of multiple motives, is a brilliant piece of psychology which gives us the essential, the mainspring, the sap of its essence, in this remark made in passing by Coleridge: after all I have a taste for that myself. This means, I can see myself in it. He admits this in passing, and he is not the only one. One finds an analogous remark in someone who is more or less Coleridge's contemporary, and who wrote some remarkable things about Shakespeare in his Essays on Shakespeare, namely Hazlitt, whom Jones is wrong not to mention at all because he is someone who wrote the most remarkable things on the subject at that time.

He goes still further, he says that in the last analysis to talk about this tragedy..... We have heard so much about this tragedy, that we scarcely know how to criticise it, any more than we would know how to describe our own face. There is another note which makes the same point. And here we have lines that I am going to take very much into account.

I will pass very quickly over the other aspect, the one about an external difficulty, which was established by a group of German critics the two principal ones being Klein and Werder who wrote at the end of the 19th century in Berlin. This is more or less how Jones groups them. He is right. It is a question of highlighting the external causes of the difficulty of the task that Hamlet has set himself, and the forms that Hamlet's task are supposed to have. This is supposed to be to make his people (9) recognise the guilt of Claudius, the man who after having killed his father, and married his mother, is reigning over Denmark. There is something here which does not support the criticism, because the difficulties that Hamlet would have had in accomplishing his task, namely in having the guilt of the king recognised, well there are two possibilities, to intervene already in the way that he intervened when he did intervene, by murdering him, and then to be in a position to justify this murder, are evidently very easily removed by a simple reading of the text.

Hamlet never poses himself such a problem. The principle of his action, namely that the vengeance he must take on the one who is the murderer of his father, and who at the same time took his throne and his place with the wife whom he loved above everything else, must be purged by the most violent action, and by murder, is not only never put in question by Hamlet, but I think that on this point I will read you passages that will show you that he treats himself as a weakling, as a coward. He foams with despair on the stage because he cannot decide to take this action.

But the principle of the thing is never in doubt. He does not pose himself the slightest problem about the validity of this act, of this task. And on this point there is a man called Loening, whom Jones makes a lot of, who made a remark at the same period discussing the theories of Klein and Werder in a very decisive fashion. I point out in passing that Jones warmly commends these remarks. In effect he quotes some which appear to (10) be very penetrating.

But all this does not have an extraordinary importance because the question is really superseded once we take the third position, the one by which Jones introduces the analytic position.

These delays in my presentation are necessary, because they have to be followed if we are to have the background against which the problem of Hamlet is posed.

The third position is the following: it is that even though the subject does not doubt for a moment that he has a task to accomplish, for some reason unknown to him this task is repugnant to him. In other words, it is the task itself and not what is happening either in the subject or outside him. There is no need to say that there can be much more subtle versions of what is happening outside than the ones that I gave you at first to clear the ground.

There is therefore an essentially conflictual position with regard to the task itself. And it is in short in this very solid fashion, which gives us a lesson in method, that Jones introduces the analytic theory. He shows that the notion of conflict is not at all new, namely: the internal contradiction in the task had already been brought forward by a certain number of authors who saw very clearly, like Loening, if we are to believe the quotations that Jones gives from him, that one can grasp the problematic, conflictual character of the task, by certain signs which did not have to await analysis for their indicative character to be seen: namely the diversity, the multiplicity, the contradiction, the false consistency of the reasons that the (11) subject gives in order to postpone this task, not to carry it out at the moment when it is offered to him. The notion in short of the superstructural, rationalised, rationalising character of the motives that the subject gives, had already been perceived by psychologists well before analysis. And Jones knows very well how to highlight it, to give it its relief.

Only it is a question of knowing where the conflict lies and the authors who are on this path do not allow it to be glimpsed that there is something which appears in the forefront, and a sort of underlying difficulty which without being properly speaking articulated as unconscious is considered as being more profound, and in part unmastered, neither completely elucidated nor perceived by the subject.

And the discussion by Jones presents this character which is quite characteristic of what in his case is one of the traits that he knew well how to make use of in his articles which played a great role in making the very notion of the unconscious a valid one for a large intellectual public. He powerfully articulates that what these authors, some of them very subtle, had highlighted is that the underlying, contrary motive for the action of Hamlet, is for example a motive of right. Namely, has he the right to do this.

And God knows the German authors have not failed, especially since this was happening in the full Hegelian period, to notice all sorts of registers which Jones has a fine time ironising about, showing that if something must come into unconscious principles, they are not motives of an elevated order, of a lofty character of abstraction, bringing into play a morality, a

(12) State, absolute knowledge, but that there must be something much more radical, more concrete, and that what is in question is precisely what Jones is going then to produce, because it is more or less about that year that there begins to be introduced into America Freudian points of view - this is the same year that he publishes a review of Freud's theory of dreams, that Freud publishes his article on the origins and development of psychoanalysis, directly written in English if I remember rightly because what is in question are the famous lectures at Clark University.

I believe that one cannot put one's finger on, in an analysis which really goes as far as it is possible to go at that epoch, which highlights in the text of the play, in the unfolding of the drama, to show its oedipal signification, which highlights what we can call the mythical structure of the Oedipus myth

I must say that we are not so mentally clean and tidy as to be all able to smile so easily at seeing brought forward in connection with HamletTelephos, Amphion, Moses, Pharaoh, Zoroaster, Jesus, Herod - everyone gets into the act - and finally what is essential, two authors writing more or less around 1900 published "Hamlet in Iran" in a very well known journal, a reference of the Hamlet myth to the Iranian myths which are about the legend of Cyrus, which another author also made great play of in an unknown and unfindable journal.

The important thing is that in Jones' introduction, in 1910, of a new criticism of Hamlet, and of a criticism which is going to consist entirely in leading us to this conclusion: " So we reach (13) the apparent paradox that the hero, the poet, and the audience are all profoundly moved by feelings due to a conflict of the source of which they are unaware" - they have not woken up, they do not know what is going on.

I think it is essential to notice the step that has been taken at this level. I am not saying that it is the only step possible, but that the first analytic step consists in transforming a psychological reference not into a reference to a more profound psychology, but into a reference to a mythical arrangement which is thought to have the same meaning for all human beings. And there must all the same be something more, because Hamlet is not all the same Syrrhos Sage, a story about Cyrus and Cambyses, nor about Perseus and his father Acrisios, it is all the same something different.

If we are speaking about it it is not only because there have been a myriad of critics, but also because it is interesting to see what that makes of Hamlet. When all is said and done you have not the slightest idea because through some kind of effect which is quite curious I think I can say from my own experience that it cannot be done in French. I have never seen a good Hamlet in French. Nor anyone who plays Hamlet well. Nor a text one could really listen to.

For those who read the text, it is something that knocks you over backwards, makes you bite the carpet and roll on the ground.

it is something unimaginable. There is not a verse of Hamlet, nor one of his replies which does not have in English a percussive power, a violence of language which makes of it something at which one is at every moment absolutely stupefied. You could believe that it was written yesterday, that one could not write things like that three centuries ago.

In England, that is to say where the play is played in its own tongue, a production of Hamlet is always an event. I would even go further - because after all one cannot really measure the psychological pressure of the public except at the booking office - and I would say what it is for the actors, which proves it to us again, first of all because it is quite clear that to play Hamlet is for an English actor the crowning of his career, and that when it is not the crowning of his career it is really what he wants in order to retire happily by giving his farewell performance, even if his role consists in playing the first Gravedigger.

There is here something which is important, and we will have to see what it means, because I am not making this remark at random.

There is a curious fact, which is that when after all an English actor comes to play Hamlet he plays it well. They all play it well. A still stranger thing is that people speak of this or that person, as many Hamlets as there are great actors. The Hamlet of Garrick, the Hamlet of Kean, etc. are still evoked. This too is something extraordinarily indicative.

If there are as many Hamlets as there are great actors, I think (15) that it is for analogous reasons - it is not the same because it is a different thing to play Hamlet and to be involved as a spectator and critic But the point of convergence of all that, what is particularly striking and what I would ask you to keep in mind, is that it can be thought that in the final analysis it is because of the structure of the problem that Hamlet as such poses about desire, namely the thesis that I am putting forward here that Hamlet brings into play the different planes, the very framework that I am trying to introduce you to here, in which desire comes to situate itself.

It is because this place is exceptionally well articulated here, so well I would say and in such a fashion that each and every person finds his own place in it, can recognise himself in it, that the machinery, the net of the play Hamlet is this kind of network, of birdcatcher's net in which the desire of man is essentially articulated here, in terms precisely of the coordinates that Freud uncovers for us, namely its relationship to the Oedipus complex and to castration.

But this presupposes that it is not simply another edition, another version of the eternal type, drama, conflict, of the hero's struggle against the father, against the tyrant, against the good or the bad father. Here I am introducing things that we are going to see being developed subsequently. It is that things are pushed by Shakespeare to such a point that what is important here is to show the atypical characteristics of the conflict, the modified fashion in which there is presented the fundamental structure of the eternal Saga that one rediscovers (16) from the beginning of time, consequently in the function in which in a certain fashion the coordinates of this conflict are modified by Shakespeare in such a way as to show how in these atypical conditions there comes to operate, in all its most essentially problematic character, the problem of desire in so far as man is not simply possessed, invested, by it but that he has to situate, has to find this desire. Has to find it at all costs, and in great suffering, to the point of not being able to find it except at the limit, namely in an action which cannot be completed, be produced by him, except by being fatal.

This encourages us to look more closely at the unfolding of the play. I do not want to make you wait too long, but I must all the same give its most salient aspects.

Act I, concerns something that could be called the introduction to the problem, is here all the same a point of overlapping, of accumulation, of confusion around which the play turns. It is necessary all the same for us to come back to something simple which is in the text. We are going to see that this composition deserves to be retained, that it is not something vague, or something which deviates to the right or to the left.

As you know things begins with a guard, a changing of the guard on a platform of Elsinore. And I must say that it is one of the most magisterial beginnings of all Shakespeare's plays, because not all of them begin so magisterially. It is at midnight that the change takes place, a change in which there are some very fine, very striking things. For example it is the ones who are (17) coming on guard who ask: "Who's there?", when it should be the other way round. The fact is that in effect everything happens in an unusual way. They are all anxiety-ridden because of something they are waiting for. And the thing arrives in fewer than forty verses. Even though it is midnight when the change takes place, one o'clock sounds when the ghost appears.

And from the moment the ghost appears we have entered into a very rapid movement with rather curious stagnations.

Immediately afterwards there is the scene where the king and the queen appear, the king saying it is time to get over our mourning, we may weep with one eye, but let us laugh with the other (I ii 12), and in which Hamlet who is there manifests his feelings of revolt against the rapidity of the remarriage of his mother and the fact that she has married somebody who, compared to his father, is an absolutely inferior character. At every instant in Hamlet's remarks we see highlighted the exaltation of his father as a being on whom he would say later: "...every god did seem to set his seal to give the world assurance of a man" (III iv 61). It is much later in the text that this phrase will be pronounced by Hamlet. But from the first scene there are analogous words. It is essentially in terms of this sort of betrayal, and also this falling off - sentiments which his mother's conduct inspired in him, this hasty marriage, two months we are told, after the death of his father - that Hamlet presents himself. There is the famous dialogue with Horatio: "Thrift, thrift, Horatio! The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables" (I ii 180). I do not need to remind (18) you of the celebrated themes.

Then, immediately, we have the introduction of two characters: Ophelia, and Polonius, and this in connection with a sort of little dressing down that Laertes, who is a very important character in our story of Hamlet, who has been seen as - we will come back to it - someone who plays a certain role with respect to Hamlet in the mythical unfolding of the story, and quite correctly of course, addresses to Ophelia who is the girl with whom Hamlet, as he tells us himself, was in love, and whom now in the state that he is in he rejects with all sorts of sarcasms. Polonius and Laertes come one after another to the unfortunate Ophelia to give her all sorts of sermons on prudence, to urge her not to trust this Hamlet.

There then comes the fourth scene. The encounter on the platform of Elsinore between Hamlet, who has been rejoined by Horatio, and the ghost of his father. In this encounter he shows himself passionate, courageous, because he does not hesitate to follow the ghost wherever the ghost leads him, in order to hold with him a rather horrifying dialogue. And I underline that the character of horror is articulated by the ghost himself (I v 80). He cannot reveal to Hamlet the horror and the abomination of the place in which he lives, and what he suffering, because his mortal organs would not be able to tolerate it. And he gives him an order, a command. It is interesting to note right away that the command consists in the fact, that however he manages it, he has to stop the scandal of the queen's "luxury"; and that in all of this moreover he should (19) restrain his thoughts and his movements; that he should not let himself be carried towards some excess or other concerning his thoughts with respect to his mother.

Naturally the authors have made a lot of this kind of disturbed background to the orders given by the ghost to Hamlet, of having in short to restrain himself in his relationships with his mother. But there is one respect in which it seems that what is in question has not been articulated, that in short already, and immediately it is about a question that must be resolved: what is to be done about something, which appears here to be the essential, despite the horror of what is articulated, the accusations formally pronounced by the ghost against the character of Claudius, namely the assassin. It is here that he reveals to his son that he has been killed by him.

The order that the ghost gives is not an order in itself; it is something which already puts in the foreground, and as such, the mother's desire. This is absolutely essential, moreover we will come back to it.

The second act is constituted by what one can call the organisation of the surveillance around Hamlet. In short, we have a sort of preamble to it in the form - it is rather amusing, and this shows the character of reduplication of the group Polonius, Laertes, Ophelia, over against the group Hamlet, Claudius and the queen - of instructions that Polonius, the prime minister, gives to someone for spying on his son who has gone to Paris. He tells him how to proceed in order to get information about his son. Here we have a purple passage in the style of (20) the eternal truths about the police which I do not need to insist on. Then there intervene, it has already been prepared in the first act, Guildenstern and Rosencrantz, who are not simply the lightweight characters that people think. They are people who are old friends of Hamlet. And Hamlet distrusts them, mocks them, derides them, routs them, and plays with them an extremely subtle game under the cover of madness - we will also see what is meant by this problem of the madness or the pseudo-madness of Hamlet - really appeals at one moment to their old and ancient friendship, with a tone and an accent which also deserves to be highlighted if we have the time, and which also deserves to be retained, which proves that he does it without any confidence. And he does not for a single moment give up his position of rusing, of playing, with them. Nevertheless there is a moment when he speaks to them with a certain tone.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are the vehicles, they come to sound him out for the king and this indeed is what Hamlet senses and what he urges them truly to admit to him. Were you sent to me? What are you doing around me? And the others are sufficiently shaken for one of them to ask the other: what are we to say to him (II ii 300). But that passes because everything always passes in a certain fashion. Namely that one never breaks through a certain wall which would relax a situation which appears essentially, from beginning to end, essentially knotted up.

At this moment Rosencrantz and Guildenstern introduce the players they have met on the way, and whom Hamlet knows. Hamlet has always been interested in the theatre and he is going to welcome (21) these actors in a really remarkable fashion. Here again you should read the first samples that they give of their talent.

The important thing is that a tragedy concerning the end of Troy, the murder of Priam - and concerning this murder we have a very beautiful scene in English, where we see Pyrrhus raising a sword above the person playing Priam, and remaining thus:

"So as a painted tyrant Pyrrhus stood.
And like a neutral to his will and matter.
Did nothing." (II ii 502)

Since it is one of the fundamental themes of the affair, this deserves to be highlighted as a first image, that of an actor, in connection with whom there is going to come to Hamlet the idea of using them in what is going to constitute the body of the third act - this is absolutely essential - what the English call in a stereotyped way, the play scene: theatre within theatre. Hamlet then concludes:

"The play's the thing
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king." (II ii 635)

This kind of crash of cymbals which ends here a long tirade of Hamlet's which is entirely written in blank verse - I point this out - and in which we find this rhyming couplet, is something which has all its value as an introduction. I mean that it is on this that the second act ends and that the third, in which the (22) play scene is going to be put on, is introduced.

This monologue is essential. In it we see, both the violence of Hamlet's sentiments, and the violence of the accusations that he makes against himself on one hand:

"Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain? Breaks my pate across?
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? Gives me the lie i' the throat
As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?
Hah!" (II ii 598ff)

This gives the general style of this play which is enough to convulse you with laughter. And immediately afterwards he talks about his present step-father:

"Swounds, I should take it. For it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered and lack gall
To make oppression bitter, or ere this
I should have fatted all the region kites
With this slave's offal."

We spoke about these kites, in connection with Leonardo da Vinci and a memory of his childhood. I think that it is a kind of milan. It is a question of his step-father and this victim, of (23) this slave who is made precisely to be offered up as a victim to the muses. And there begins here a series of insults

"Bloody, bawdy villain!
Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless villain!"

But these cries, these insults, are addressed as much to himself as to the one meant in the context. This point is absolutely important, it is the culmination of the second act. And what constitutes the essential of his fury is the fact that he saw the actors weeping as they described the sorry lot of Hecuba before whom Priam her husband is being cut into little pieces. Because after having for a long time stayed in a fixed position, his sword suspended, Pyrrhus takes malicious pleasure - this is what the text tells us:

"When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport

In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs," (II ii 536)

In cutting up - mincing is I think the same word as emincer in French - in front of this woman who is described for us as rolled up with some sort of blanket around her lank loins, Priam's body. The theme is all of this for Hecuba. But what does Hecuba mean to these people? Here are people who can rise to the heights of emotion for something which does not concern them at all. This is what unleashes in Hamlet this despair at not feeling something equivalent. This is important to introduce what is in question, namely the play scene for which he gives the reason. As if (24) caught by the atmosphere, he seems to see all of a sudden the use he can make of it.

What is the reason that pushes him? There is undoubtedly here a rational motivation: to catch the conscience of the king. Namely: by putting on this play together with some modifications introduced by himself, to see what is going to move the king; make him betray himself. And this indeed is how things happen. At a certain moment, with a great noise, the king can no longer hold out. The crime that he committed is represented to him in such an exact fashion, together with Hamlet's commentaries that he brusquely cries out: "Give me some light" and he goes off with great noise. And Hamlet says to Horatio there is no longer any doubt.

This is essential. And I am not the first to have posed, in the analytic register which is our own, what the function is of this play scene. Rank did it before me in a book which is called Das Schauspiel in Hamlet, Psychoanalytik, which appeared in the International Psychanalytik in 1919 in Vienna-Leipzig (p.72-85).

The function of this Schauspiel was articulated by Rank in a certain fashion to which we will have to return. It is clear in any case that it poses a problem which goes beyond its functional role in the articulation of the play. Many details show that it is a question all the same of knowing up to what point and how we can interpret these details. Namely whether it is enough to do what Rank contented himself with doing, namely picking out from (25) it all the traits which show that in the very structure of the fact of watching a play there is something which evokes the first observations made by the child of parental copulation. This is the position that Rank takes up; I am not saying that it does not have a value, or even that it is wrong; I believe that it is incomplete, and that in any case it deserves to be articulated within the whole movement, namely in that by which Hamlet tries to organise, to give a structure, to give precisely what I call somewhere this dimension of disguised truth its structure as fiction with reference to which alone he managed to reorient himself, beyond the more or less efficacious character of the action for making Claudius unveil himself, betray himself. There is something here, and Rank has touched on something important in what concerns his own orientation with respect to himself. I am only indicating it here to show the interest of the problems that this gives rise to.

Things do not just simply happen, and the third act does not finish without the consequences of this articulation appearing in the following form: the fact is that he - Hamlet - is summoned very urgently to his mother who of course cannot stand any more. These are literally the words that are used: "Oh Hamlet, speak no more" (III iv 90). And that in the course of this scene he sees Claudius, when he is going towards his mother's apartment, in the process of coming, if not to resipiscence, at least to repentance, and that we assist at a whole scene which is called that of the repentant prayer of this man who finds himself here in a way caught up in the very nets that he is holding onto, the fruits of his crime, and who lifts up to God some prayer or other to have the energy to free himself from it.

(26) And catching him literally on his knees and at his mercy, without being seen by the king, Hamlet has vengeance within his reach. This is where he stops and makes this reflection: by killing him now is he not going to send him straight to heaven, while his father had insisted a great deal on the fact that he suffered all the torments of some hell or purgatory or other, is he not going to be sending him straight to eternal happiness? This is precisely what I must not do.

Here he had an opportunity to settle things. And I would even say that everything here is about this "to be or not to be" which, I introduced it for you the last time, it is not for nothing that it is essential to me. The essential is in fact here in its entirety. I mean that because of the fact that what has happened to the father is precisely the fact of having come back to tell us that he is fixed forever in this moment, this bar drawn at the bottom of the account of life which ensures that he remains in short identical to the sum of his crimes; this is also what Hamlet comes to a stop before with his "to be or not to be". Suicide is not so simple. We are not so much dreaming with him of what happens on the other side, but simply this, that to put in the final full stop in something does not prevent the being remaining identical to everything that he has articulated by the discourse of his life, and that here there is no "to be or not to be", that the "to be" whatever it is, remains eternal.

And it is precisely for him also, for Hamlet, to be confronted with this, namely not to be purely and simply the vehicle of the drama, the one through whom pass the passions, the one who like Eteocles and Polyneices continue in the crime that the father has (27) completed with castration; it is precisely because he worries about the eternal "to be" of this Claudius, that in a quite consistent fashion in effect he does not at that moment even draw his sword from the scabbard.

This in effect is a key point, an essential point. What he wants, is to wait, to surprise the other in "incestuous pleasure", in other words in the situation always defined with respect to this mother, who is the keypoint, namely this desire of the mother, and that he is in effect going to have with the mother this pathetic scene, one of the most extraordinary things ever performed, this scene in which there is shown to her the mirror of what she is, and in which between this son who undoubtedly loves his mother as his mother loves him - this we are told - more than he can express, there is produced this dialogue in which he urges her properly speaking to break the bonds of what he calls this damned monster of habit.

"That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat.
Of habits devil, is angel yet in this.
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise gives a frock or livery
That aptly is put on. Refrain tonight,"

All of this is told to us in a marvellously crude way -

"And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence, the next more easy." (III iv 161)

This is the point that I wanted to introduce you to, there are two replies which appear quite essential to me. I have not yet spoken much about poor Ophelia. It is all around this that it is going to revolve; there is a moment when Ophelia says to him: "You are as good as a chorus, my lord." Namely, you are giving a very good commentary on the play. He replies: "I could (28) interpret between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying" (III ii 255). Namely as regards what is happening on the stage. It is in any case a question of something which is happening "between you and your love".

Likewise, in the scene with the mother, when the ghost appears, because the ghost appears at a moment when precisely the objurgations are beginning to weaken, he says:

"Oh, step between her and her fighting soul.
Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works.
Speak to her, Hamlet." (III iv 114)

Here the ghost, who appears just to him in this case - because usually when the ghost appears everybody sees it - says to him: "Step between her and her fighting soul".

"Conceit" is univocal. Conceit is used all the time in this play, and precisely in connection with what belongs to the soul. Conceit is precisely the concetti, the point of the style, and it is the word which is used to speak about a precious style. "Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works. Speak to her, Hamlet".

This place where Hamlet is always being asked to enter, to operate, to intervene, is here something which gives us the real situation of the drama. And despite the intervention, the (29) signifying summons. It is signifying to us because this is what is in question for us, what intervening means for us: "Between her and her"; that is our work. "Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works", it is to the analyst that this appeal is addressed.

Here once more Hamlet weakens and leaves his mother saying: after all let yourself be caressed, he will come, he will give you a greasy kiss on the cheek and caress your neck. He abandons his mother, he literally allows her to slip, to return as one might say to the abandonment of her desire. And here is how this act finishes, except that meanwhile the unfortunate Polonius had the misfortune to make a movement behind the arras, and Hamlet has run his sword through his body.

We come to the fourth act. There is something here that begins very nicely, namely the hunt for the body. Because Hamlet has hidden the body somewhere, and really there is question at the beginning only of a hunt for the body that Hamlet seems to find very amusing. He cries: They are playing catch the fox and everybody is running after him. Finally he says to them, do not worry, in a fortnight you will begin to smell him. He is there under the stairs, we will say no more about it.

Here he makes a reply which is important and to which we will return:

"The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body. The king is a thing - " (IV ii 29)

This is one of Hamlet's schizophrenic remarks. It also (30) contributes something to the interpretation for us. We will see it in what follows.

This act is an act in which a lot of things happen, rapidly: the sending of Hamlet to England; his return before anyone has had time to turn around - we know why, he had uncovered the secret plot, that he was being sent to his death - his return is accompanied by some drama, namely that Ophelia in the meantime has become mad, let us say because of the death of her father, and probably something else as well; that Laertes has revolted and has mounted a little coup; that the king has prevented a revolt by saying that Hamlet is the guilty one, that no one can be told this because Hamlet is too popular, but that matters can be quietly settled by arranging a contrived duel in which Hamlet will perish.

This indeed is what is going to happen. The scene of the final act is established by the churchyard scene. I referred a little while ago to the first Gravedigger; you will all more or less remember the extraordinary remarks that are exchanged between these characters who are in the process of digging Ophelia's grave and who at every word uncover a skull, one of which is picked up by Hamlet who makes a speech about it.

Because I was talking about actors, in the memory of a theatre dresser, there has never been a Hamlet and a first Gravedigger who were not at daggers drawn. The first Gravedigger has never been able to tolerate the tone in which Hamlet speaks to him, which is a little trait that is worthwhile noting in passing, and which shows us the point to which the power of the relationships brought into play in this drama can go.

(31) Let us come to something to which I will draw your attention the next time: this is that it is after this long and powerful preparation that there is effectively found in the fifth act the thing that is in question; this desire which always collapses, this something exhausted, incompletable, uncompletable that there is in Hamlet's position, why are we going to see it all of a sudden made possible? Namely why are we going all of a sudden to see Hamlet accepting, in the most unlikely conditions, the challenge of Laertes. In conditions which are all the more curious in that he is the champion of Claudius. And we see him defeating Laertes in every round - he touches him four or five times even though the bet made was that he would touch him at most five times against twelve - and becoming impaled as was intended on the poisoned tip, not without there being a sort of confusion in which this tip comes into his hand and he also wounds Laertes; and it is in the measure that both are mortally wounded that there comes the final blow which is delivered against the one who from the beginning it was a question of killing, Claudius.

It is not for nothing that I evoked the last time a sort of picture by with Ophelia floating on the river. I would like to propose another one to you to finish our remarks today. I wish someone would paint a picture in which one would see a cemetery on the horizon, and here the hole of the grave, people going away like people at the end of the oedipal tragedy dispersing and covering their eyes in order not to see what is happening, namely something which with respect to Oedipus is more (32) or less the liquefaction of Mr. Valdemar.

Here it is something else. Something has happened to which not enough importance is attached. Hamlet who has disembarked in a hurry thanks to the pirates who have allowed him to escape from assassination, happens on Ophelia's burial. This is the first news he has had of it, he did not know what had happened during his brief absence. We see Laertes tearing his breast, and leaping into the grave to embrace for a final time the body of his sister crying aloud his despair. Hamlet, literally, not only cannot tolerate this manifestation towards a girl whom as you know he had very badly mistreated up to then, but he precipitates himself after Laertes after having given a great roar, a warcry in which he says the most unexpected thing. He concludes by saying: who is giving these cries of despair in connection with the death of this young girl. And he says: the one who is crying "is I Hamlet the Dane" (V i 280).

We have never heard him saying that he is a Dane; he hates the Danes. All of a sudden we see him absolutely converted by something which I can say is absolutely significant with regard to our schema. It is in the measure that something S is here in a certain relationship with o that all of a sudden he makes this identification which makes him discover for the first time his desire in its totality.

They pass some time struggling in the grave. We see them disappearing into the hole and finally they are pulled out in order to be separated. This is what would be seen in the picture: this hole from which one would see things escaping. We shall see how we can conceive of what that would mean.

Seminar 15: Wednesday 18 March 1959

The principle of analysis is all the same that in order to reach your goal you must not be in a hurry. Perhaps some of you think - I do not believe that there are many of that kind - that we are a long way from clinical practice. That is not at all the case. We are right in the middle of it because since what is in question is how to situate the meaning of desire - of human desire - this method of finding our bearings in what is moreover from the beginning one of the great themes of analytic thinking is something which should in no way distract us from what is most urgently required of us.

Many things have been said about Hamlet, and I alluded to them the last time. I tried to show the magnitude of the accumulation of commentaries on Hamlet. In the meantime I got hold of a document for which I was pining in my desire for perfection, namely the Hamlet and Oedipus of Ernest Jones.

I read it and saw that in short Jones had kept his book up to date with what had happened since 1909. And it was no longer Loenig that he alluded to as a reference to be recommended, but to Dover Wilson who wrote a good deal about Hamlet and who wrote very well. Meanwhile since I had myself read part of Dover Wilson's work, I think I have more or less given you the essentials of it.

It is now rather a question of standing back a little from all of that, from Jones' speculation which, I must say, is very penetrating, and one could say, on the whole, of a different (2) style to anything which, in the analytic family, has been written, added to the subject.

He makes very correct remarks which I find myself simply repeating on occasion. In particular he makes this simple common-sense remark that Hamlet is not a real person, and that all the same to pose ourselves the most profound questions about the character of Hamlet is perhaps something which deserves a more serious reflection than we usually accord to it.

As usual when we are in a domain which concerns on the one hand our exploration, and also on the other hand an object, there is a twofold path to be followed. Our right to engage ourselves in a certain speculation founded on the idea that we form of an object. It is quite obvious that there are things, which are I would say to be cleared away from the beginning, in particular for example that what we are dealing with in works of art, and especially in dramatic works, are characters, in the sense that this is understood in French.

Characters, namely something that we suppose the author possesses in all their depth; that he has made up someone, a character, and he is supposed to move us by transmitting characteristics of this character. And by this simple description we are supposed already to be introduced to a kind of supposed reality which would be beyond what we are given in the work of art.

I would say that Hamlet already has this really very important property of making us sense the degree to which this point of (3) view, which is very common, and which we apply the whole time, spontaneously, when we are dealing with a work of art, is all the same to be if not refuted, at least suspended, because in fact in any art there are two points which we can solidly hold onto as being absolutely certain reference points, which are that it is not enough to say as I said, that Hamlet is a kind of mirror where everyone reader and spectator has seen himself in his own way. But let us leave to one side the spectators whose depths cannot be sounded.

In any case the diversity of critical interpretations of it which have been given, suggest that there is here some mystery, because the totality of what has been put forward, affirmed, in connection with Hamlet is properly speaking irreconcilable, contradictory. I hope I have already sufficiently demonstrated this the last time. I articulated that the diversity of interpretations was strictly of the order of contrary to contrary. I also indicated a little what Hamlet is for actors. It is a domain to which we will perhaps have to return a little later, which is very significant. I said it was the role par excellence, and that at the same time one spoke about the Hamlet of such and such a person. Namely that there are as many Hamlets as there are actors who have a certain personal power.

But this goes further. Some people have gone to the point of sustaining - and in particular Robertson - at the time of the third centenary, supported a little no doubt by the sort of "rush" at that time about Shakesperian themes, the passionate (4) exaltation with which the whole English literary world revived this theme, some people brought forward an opposing point of view by saying that strictly speaking Hamlet was a vacuum, that it did not hold up; that there was no key for Hamlet, that Shakespeare did what he could to patch together a theme the philological exploration of which - which has been taken fairly far - shows - it was known that there was already a Hamlet which was attributed to Kyd, which had been played twelve years before this autumn of 1601 when we can be more or less certain that this Hamlet appeared for the first time - it was even said - and I would say that it is on this that the first chapter of Jones' book ends - it was properly speaking articulated, up to the time of Grillparzer, an Austrian playwright to whom Freud on occasion makes a very important reference, and who says that the impenetrability of Hamlet is its raison d'etre, which is all the same a rather curious opinion.

The fact that it was possible to put this forward - one could not say that this is not strictly speaking an anti-Aristotelian opinion, in so far as the homoios character of the hero compared to us is what is put in the foreground to explain, on the very basis of the Aristotelian explanation of the effect of comedy and of tragedy - the fact that all of this could be put forward about Hamlet has its importance.

It must be said that there is here a whole range of opinions which are not equivalent, which present a whole series of nuances (5) concerning what can be said about it, and that it is not the same thing to say that Hamlet is a failed play - you should remember that no less a person than T. S. Eliot who in a certain milieu is looked on as more or less the greatest modern English poet, also thinks, and he has said it, that Shakespeare was not equal to his hero. I mean that if Hamlet is someone who is unequal to his task, Shakespeare too was unequal to the articulation of the role of Hamlet.

These are opinions which one can all the same say are problematical. I am enumerating them for you to lead you towards what? Towards what is in question - it is the most nuanced and I believe the most correct opinion - it is that there is in the relationship of Hamlet to the person who grasps it, either as a reader or as a spectator, something which is of the order of an illusion.

This is not the same thing as saying that Hamlet is simply a vacuum. An illusion is not a vacuum. In order to produce on the stage a ghostly effect of the order of what if you wish my little concave mirror would represent, with the real image which arises and which can only be seen from a certain angle and from a certain point, a whole machinery is necessary.

That Hamlet is an illusion, the organisation of the illusion, here is something which is not of the same order of illusion as if everyone was dreaming about a vacuum. It is all the same important to make this distinction.

What is sure, in any case, is that everything confirms that there is something of this order. This gives - this is the first (6) point - the handle that we can solidly hold on to. For example Trench who is quoted by Jones, we will see in what terms, writes something like the following: "We find it hard, with Shakespeare's help, to understand Hamlet: even Shakespeare, perhaps, found it hard to understand him: Hamlet himself" - you see that this passage is amusing, the pen or the thought finds itself slipping into the following - "Hamlet himself finds it impossible to understand himself. Better able than other men to read the hearts and the motives of others" (The end of this sentence refers not to myself nor to Shakespeare but to Hamlet.

You know that Hamlet all the time plays this deconstructing game with his interlocutors, with those who come to question him, he sets traps for them.) "... he is yet quite unable to read his own" (Jones 50).

I point out to you immediately afterwards, Jones who has precisely begun by being full of reservations saying that we must not allow ourselves to be drawn into talking about Hamlet as if he were a real person - we must look elsewhere for the articulation - and that beyond him we should find Shakespeare - this is the traditional position for analytic interpreters but which I believe contain some error, some fallacy, to which I will first of all draw your attention; Jones makes this remark and after this quotation does not fail himself to slip into something which can be expressed more or less as follows: "I know of no more authentic statement than this in the whole literature on the (7) Hamlet problem

In another place the same Jones will tell us that in short "the hero, the poet, and the audience are all profoundly moved by feelings due to a conflict of the source of which they are unaware" (Jones 51).

There is here then something which allows us to put our finger on the strict equivalence of certain terms of the question, namely the poet and the hero, with something which it is enough to dwell on for a moment in order to see it, the fact is that they are only really there through their discourse.

If it is a question of something which is the communication of what is in the unconscious of those who are put forward here as being the first terms, namely the poet and the hero, one cannot say that this communication of the unconscious can in any case be conceived of, nor presentified here by anything other than the articulation of the dramatic discourse.

We will not speak about the hero who, to tell the truth, if you follow me along the path that I am trying to lead you, is not strictly identical to these words. Especially if we begin to have the feeling that what gives its highest dramatic value, on this occasion, to this hero is a style (?). This indeed is the second handle that I would ask you to hold on to. It is of the same order as this aspect which escapes from everything that we can say about its consistency. In other words, here Hamlet becomes the exemplary work.

That the mode in which a work touches us, touches us precisely in the most profound fashion, namely on the unconscious plane, is (8) something which has to do with an arrangement, a composition of the work which no doubt ensures that we are interested very precisely at the level of the unconscious; but that this is not because of the presence of something which really supports before us an unconscious.

I mean that we are not dealing, either, contrary to what is thought, with the poet's unconsciousness, even if it bears witness to its presence through some unintentional aspects of his work, by parapraxes, by symbolic elements not perceived by him. This does not interest us in a major way. One can find some traces of it in Hamlet. In the final analysis, this was what Ella Sharpe worked on as I told you the last time, namely she is going to try to polish up here and there what in Hamlet's character can allow there to be glimpsed some hang-up, some fixation of the metaphor around feminine themes, or oral themes. I assure you that with respect to the problem that Hamlet poses, this is really something which appears as secondary, almost puerile, without being completely uninteresting naturally.

In many works, by searching also from this angle some traces, something which can give you information about an author, you are carrying out a biographical investigation of the author, you are not analysing the import of the work as such. And in the foreground the import that Hamlet takes on for us is what gives it the structural value equivalent to that of Oedipus.

Something which may allow us to interest ourselves at the deepest (9) level of the texture of what for us allows us to structure certain problems, is obviously something other than one or other fleeting admission. It is quite obviously the totality, the articulation of the tragedy in itself which is what interests us. It is what I am in the process of accentuating. Its value comes from its organisation, through the fact that it establishes superimposed planes within which the proper dimension of human subjectivity can find its place. And what ensures that, if you wish, in this machinery, or again in these armatures to metaphorise what I want to say to you, in the necessity for a certain number of superimposed planes the depth of a play, of a room, of a scene, the depth is given within which there can be posed in the fullest fashion the problem of the articulation of desire for us.

You clearly understand me then. I am saying then that if Hamlet, this is the essential point, has a privileged import for us, I mean if Hamlet is really the greatest drama, or one of the greatest dramas of modern tragedy putting Faust on the other side, it is not simply because there is a Shakespeare who is as much of a genius as we suppose him to be, and a particular turning point in his life - because obviously we can also say that Hamlet is a point at which something happened in Shakespeare's life. This can be summed up perhaps in the fact that all that we can say about it, because we know the thing that has happened, it is the death of his father, and to be satisfied with that means that we are satisfied with very little. And we also suppose that around this event there must also have been (10) other things in his life, because the veering, the orientation, the turnabout of his production is really obvious. Before there was nothing except this succession of comedies, or these historical dramas which are really two genres that in both cases he pushed to their highest degree of beauty, of perfection, of ease. Up to then he is almost an author with two great specialities on which he plays with a mastery, a brio, a happiness which puts him among the authors enjoying popular success. From Hamlet on the whole skyscape has altered, and we touch things which are beyond all limits, which no longer have anything to do with any kind of canon, which are no longer of the same order. After Hamlet, we have King Lear, and still more things before we end with The Tempest.

We sense here something completely different, a human drama which develops on a completely different register. It is when all is said and done the Shakespeare who is the jewel of human history and of the human drama, who opens up a new dimension on man. Therefore something has certainly happened at that moment. But is it enough for us to be certain of that to think that that is what it is? Of course in some way. But let us observe all the same that if Hamlet is the play which most presents itself as an enigma, it is only too obvious after all that not every play which poses a problem is for all that a good play. A really bad play can be one also. And in a bad play there is probably, on occasion, an unconscious just as present, and even more present, than there is in a good play. If we are moved by a piece of theatre, it is not because of the difficulty of effort that is represented by it, or because of what the author allows to pass into it unknown to himself. It is because, I repeat, of the (11) dimensions of development that it offers to the place to be taken up by us in what properly speaking the problematic of our own relationship with our own desire conceals in us.

And this is only offered to us in such an outstanding fashion in a play which from certain points of view realises to the maximum these necessities of dimension, this order and this superimposition of planes which gives its place to what should here, in us, begin to reverberate.

It is not because Shakespeare is at that moment caught up in a personal drama - if we push things to their final limit, we think we have grasped this personal drama and it slips away; people have gone so far as to say that it was the drama which was in his Sonnets, the relationships with his protector and his mistress. You know that he was deceived twice over by his friend and by his mistress. People have gone so far as to say, even though the drama at that moment very probably happened at a more temperate period of Shakespeare's life (there is no certainty about his history, and we only have the testimony of the Sonnets which itself is particularly elaborated).

I think that it involves some cause other than that. What is at stake is not the presence, the point behind Hamlet of everything that we can on occasion dream about, it is the composition of Hamlet.

No doubt the author has succeeded in pushing this composition to a high degree of maturity, of perfection, which makes of Hamlet something which is distinguished from all the pre-Hamlets that we have been able to discover with our philology by means of an articulation which is so singular, so exceptional that it is (12) precisely what ought to be the object of our reflection.

If Shakespeare was capable of bringing it to this point, it is probably because of a deepening which is just as much the deepening of the author's craft, as the deepening of the lived experience of a man who undoubtedly lived, and whose life was happy, since everything indicates that his life was not untouched by every sort of demand and every sort of passion. That the drama of Shakespeare exists behind Hamlet is secondary with regard to what makes up the structure of Hamlet. It is this structure which corresponds to the effect Hamlet has, and this all the more that Hamlet himself, as the authors put it metaphorically, all the more that Hamlet himself is a character whose depths we do not know and not simply because of our ignorance. He is effectively a character who is composed of something which is the vacuum for situating - because this is the important thing - our ignorance.

A situated ignorance is different to something purely negative. This situated ignorance, after all is precisely nothing other than this presentification of the unconscious. It gives to Hamlet its import and its force.

I think that I have succeeded in communicating to you with all the nuances, without omitting anything, without denying the properly psychological dimension involved in a playwright, which is a question of what is called applied psychoanalysis, even (13) though it is completely the contrary at the level that we are at, it is theoretical psychoanalysis that is really in question, and with regard to the theoretical question which is posed by the adaptation of our analysis to a work of art, any kind of clinical question is a question of applied psychoanalysis ...

There are people here who are listening to me and who will no doubt need me to say a little bit more along a certain direction about which they will pose me questions.

If Hamlet is really what I am telling you, namely a composition, a structure of a kind in which desire can find its place, sufficiently correctly, sufficiently rigorously posed, for every desire or more exactly for all the problems of the relationship of the subject to desire to be projected into it, it should be enough in a way to read it.

I am alluding therefore to the people who may here pose me the question of the function of the actor. Where is the function of the theatre, of the production? It is clear that it is not at all the same thing to read Hamlet and to see it produced. I do not think either that this should be a problem for you for too long, and that in the perspective that I am trying to develop before you concerning in short the function of the unconscious - the function of the unconscious that I defined as discourse of the Other - one could not better illustrate it than in the perspective which we are given by an experience like that of the relationship of the audience to Hamlet. It is clear that here the unconscious is presentified in the form of the discourse of the Other which is a perfectly composed discourse. The hero is (14) present here only through this discourse, just as the poet.

who is long dead, when all is said and done bequeaths his discourse to us.

But naturally this dimension that is added by the production, namely the actors who are going to play this Hamlet, is strictly analogous to that by which we ourselves are involved in our own unconscious. And if I tell you that what constitutes our relationship to the unconscious, is the thing by which our imaginary, I mean our relationship with our own bodies - it seems that I ignore the existence of the body, I have an incorporeal theory of analysis; this is what is being discovered at least if one hears about the effect of what I am articulating here at a certain distance.

To say the word, it is we who provide the signifier with its material - this is the very thing that I teach and that I spend my time telling you; it is with our own members - this is what the imaginary is - that we compose the alphabet of this discourse which is unconscious, and of course each one of us in different relationships because we do not make use of the same elements in order to be caught up in the unconscious. And this is the analogy, the actor lends his members, his presence, not simply as a puppet, but with his unconscious which is well and truly real, namely the relationship of his members to a certain history which is his own.

Everyone knows that there are good and bad actors, it is in the measure I believe that the unconscious of an actor is more or less compatible with this loan of his puppet, whether he lends himself to it or does not lend himself to it. This is what makes an actor have more or less talent, genius, indeed that he is more or less compatible with certain roles - why not. Even (15) those who have the most extensive range can after all play certain roles better than others.

In other words, the actor of course is there; it is in the measure of the appropriateness of something which in effect may well have the closest relationship to his unconscious, to what he has to represent to us that he gives to this a point which undoubtedly adds something, but is far from constituting the essential of what is communicated to us, the representation of the drama.

This I believe would open to us pretty far the door towards the psychology of the actor. Of course there are laws of general compatibility. The relationship of the actor to the possibility of the show is something which poses a problem of psychology peculiar to the actor, the problem which has been tackled of the relationship between certain psychological textures and the theatre. Someone, a number of years ago, wrote a rather promising article about what he called hysteria and the theatre. I read it again recently. We will perhaps have the opportunity to speak about it with interest, indeed with a certain amount of agreement.

Having closed this parenthesis, let us take up the thread of our own remarks. What then is this structure around which there is composed the essential putting into place in which I am trying to make you understand the effect of Hamlet. This setting up of the interior, within which desire can and must take its place.

From the first point of view, we are going to see that what is said about it commonly in the analytic register, in terms of articulation, comprehension, of what Hamlet is, is something (16) which seems to go in following direction.

Am I making you all these introductory remarks in order to rejoin themes which are quite classical, even banal? You will see that this is not at all the case. Nevertheless let us begin by approaching things by what is usually presented; I do not think that it is all that simple, nor so univocal. And a certain rectitude is what is most difficult for the authors themselves to maintain in the development of their thought, because all the time there is a sort of flight, of oscillation, some examples of which you are going to see in what I am going to enounce to you.

In a first approximation which is one that everyone agrees with, Hamlet is the person who does not know what he wants, the one who pauses bitterly when he sees marching off the troops of the young Fortinbras who pass for a moment on the horizon of the stage, and who is suddenly struck by the fact that here are people who are going to perform a great action for nothing, for a little piece of Poland, and who are going to sacrifice everything, their lives - while he has "cause, and will, and strength, and means to do 't", as he himself says: "Why yet I live to say 'this thing's to do'" (IV iv 44).

Here is the problem that is posed for everyone. Why does Hamlet not act? Why is this will, this desire, this wish, something which remains suspended in him, which if you like rejoins what Racamier writes about the hysteric.

Some say he does not want to; he says he is not able. What is (17) in question is that he is not able to will. What does the analytic tradition say to us about this? The analytic tradition says that everything reposes on this occasion on the desire for the mother. That this desire is repressed, that this is the cause which means that the hero cannot advance towards that action which is commanded him, namely to take revenge on a man who is the current possessor, illegitimately because criminally, of the maternal object, and that he cannot strike one whom he is designated to prosecute, in the measure that he himself in short has already committed the crime that it is a question of avenging.

It is to the extent, we are told, that in the background there is the memory of the infantile desire for the mother, of the oedipal desire for the murder of the father, it is in this measure that Hamlet finds himself in a way the accomplice of the present possessor, that this possessor is in his eyes a lucky possessor, that he is his accomplice, that he cannot therefore attack this possessor without attacking himself. But is this what is meant, or is it that he cannot attack this possessor without awakening in himself this ancient desire, namely a desire experienced as guilty, a mechanism which all the same is more tangible.

But after all does all this not allow us, fascinated by something unfathomable linked to a schema which for us is surrounded by a sort of untouchable, non-dialectical character so that could we not say that all this in short is reversed. I mean one might just as well say, that if Hamlet immediately hurled himself on his step-father, that he would find here after all the opportunity for allaying his own guilt by finding outside of (18) himself the really guilty party. That all the same, to call things by their name, everything pushes him to act in the opposite direction, and goes in the same direction, because the father comes back from the beyond in the form of a ghost to command him to prosecute this act. There is no doubt about this. The commandment of the super-ego is here materialised in a way, and provided with all the sacred character of the very person who comes from beyond the grave, together with what is added to it by the authority of his greatness, his seductiveness, the fact of being a victim, the fact of really having been dispossessed in an atrocious way not only of the object of his love, but of his power, of his throne, of his very life, of his salvation, of his eternal happiness.

There is this, and also there comes to operate in the same sense something which could be called on this occasion Hamlet's natural desire. If it is something which he has not been able to experience while he is still separated from this mother, that undoubtedly the least that can be said to count for him is that he is fixed on his mother - it is the most certain and the most obvious thing in Hamlet's role. Therefore this desire which on this occasion I call natural, and not unintentionally, because when Jones was writing his article on Hamlet he is still at the stage of having to plead before the public for this dimension of repression and of censorship, and every page he writes on this occasion tends to give to this censorship a social origin.

It is all the same curious - curiously enough - he says, that the things that are obviously the most censored by social organisation, are the most natural desires. In truth this does (19) in effect pose a question. Why after all is society not organised to satisfy these most natural desires, if it is really from society that there emerges the dimension of repression and of censorship? This might take us perhaps a little further, namely that it is something quite tangible that this never seem to be perceived, that the necessities of life, of the life of the group, the sociological necessities are not at all exhaustive in order to explain this sort of prohibition from which there emerges in human beings the dimension of the unconscious.

This suffices so little that Freud had to invent an original, pre-social myth which we should not forget because it is what founds society, namely Totem and taboo can explain the very principles of repression. And Jones' commentary at the date he wrote it, and in which curiously he unfortunately preserves this sociological genesis of prohibitions at the level of the unconscious, more exactly of censorship, very exactly of the source of the Oedipus complex, is an error on Jones' part.

It is perhaps a rather deliberate, apologetic error, the error of someone who wants to convince, who wants to conquer a certain public of psycho-sociologists; it is not at all something which does not pose problems for us.

But let us come back to our Hamlet. We see him when all is said and done with two tendencies; the over-riding tendency which is doubly commanded him by the authority of his father and the love which he bears him; and the second of wanting to defend his mother, and of wanting to keep her for himself, which ought to make him go in the same direction and kill Claudius. Therefore (20) two positive things, this is a curious thing, will give a zero result.

I know well that this happens. I found a very fine example of it at a time when I had broken my leg: a shortening, then another shortening - that of the other leg - and there is no longer any shortening. It is a very good exercise for us, because we have to deal with things of this order.

Is this what is in question? No, I do not think so. I believe rather that we are engaging ourselves in an illusory dialectic, that we are satisfying ourselves with something which after all cannot be justified at all, namely that Hamlet is there, that he has to be explained. That we touch all the same on something essential, namely that there is a relationship which makes this action difficult, which makes this task repugnant to Hamlet, which puts him effectively in a problematic character vis-a-vis his own action, and that this is his desire; that in a way it is the impure character of this desire which plays here the essential role, but without Hamlet knowing it; that in a way it is because his action is not disinterested, that is it not motivated in a Kantian way, that Hamlet cannot accomplish his act, I think that in general there is here something in effect which we can say, but which in truth then is almost accessible before analytic investigation, and we have traces of this - the interest of Jones's bibliography is that it shows this.

Some people, well before Freud, even began to articulate it in the writings of 1880 or 1890, some authors had glimpsed it.

Nevertheless I believe that we can formulate analytically something more correct, and go further than that to which I believe what has been formulated analytically on this plane has (21) been reduced. And I believe that to do it we only have to really follow the text of the play and see what will follow from it.

What will follow from it consists in remarking to you that what

Hamlet has to deal with, all the time, what Hamlet is grappling with, is a desire which should be regarded, considered where it is in the play, namely very different, very far from his own, that it is not the desire for his mother, but the desire of his mother.

This is really all that is in question. The pivotal point, the whole scene which I should read with you, is that of the encounter with his mother after the play scene, the scene of the play that he has had acted, and with which he has surprised the conscience of the king, and at which everyone, more and more disturbed about Hamlet's intentions, decided to have him called, to have a conversation with his mother.

Hamlet himself desires nothing more. On this occasion he is going he tells us to turn the knife in the wound. He speaks about daggers, in his mother's heart. And there takes place this long scene which is a kind of highpoint of the theatre, this something about which the last time I told you that to read it brings you to the limit of what you can tolerate, where he is going to adjure his mother pathetically to become aware of the point that she is at - I regret not being able to read the whole of this scene, but do it yourselves, and as one does it at school, pen in hand. He explains to her: what sort of a life are you living; and then, you are not in the first flush of youth all the same. Your blood should be a little tamer (cf III iv 69).

It is things of this order that he tells her in this admirable language. These are things which one does not believe could be (22) heard in a more penetrating fashion, or one which responds better to the fact that Hamlet has gone like a dart to tell it to his mother, namely things which are destined to open her heart, and which she experiences as such. Namely that she herself tells him: "...thou hast cleft my heart in twain" (III iv 156). And she literally groans under the pressure.

We are more or less certain that Hamlet is thirty years old. This may be argued, but one can say that in the graveyard scene there is an indication, something from which one can deduce that Hamlet is thirty years old. His mother is at least forty-five, even if Hamlet is a little bit younger. It is quite clear that as he remembers poor Yorick who died about thirty years earlier, and whose lips he has kissed, one can say that he is thirty years old. It is important to know that Hamlet is not a little young man.

Afterwards he compares his father to Hyperion the one on whom the gods have all set their seals. And alongside him we have this rubbish, a kind of shreds and patches, a filth, a peasant, a tout, this other, and it is with him that you roll about in the filth. This is all he talks about, and it is well to articulate it. You will see further on what is in question. But in any case it is a question of the desire of the mother, of an adjuration by Hamlet which is a demand of the style: take a certain path, dominate yourself, take, as I told you the last time, the proper moral path, begin by no longer sleeping with my uncle - this is the way things are said. And then everyone knows, he says, that the more you get the more you want, that this monster custom who binds us to the worst of things also acts (23) in the opposite way; namely: by learning to behave better, it will become more and more easy for you. (cf III iv 157ff)

What do we see? The articulation of a demand which is made by Hamlet manifestly in the name of something which is the order not simply of the law, but of dignity, and which is delivered with a force, a vigour, even a cruelty, of which the least one can say is that it causes some embarrassment. Then having arrived at that, while the other is literally gasping, to the point that one can ask whether the apparition of the ghost who then appears - because you know that the ghost reappears in the bedchamber scene - is not something which consists in saying to Hamlet no doubt: Tally ho! Tally ho! on you go, more of it, but also to a certain degree to call him to order, to protect the mother against some kind of aggressive excess before which the mother herself at a certain moment begins to tremble: "What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?" (III iv 21). Then his father comes to remind him of the following: "Step between her and her fighting soul" (III iv 112).

And having got to this summit that is in question, there is in Hamlet a sudden collapse which makes him say: And then after all, now that I have said all that to you, do whatever you want, and go and tell all of this to Uncle Claudius. Namely you are going to let him give you a little kiss on the cheek, tickle your neck a little, scratch your tummy a little, and the pair of you are going to end up in bed as usual. This is exactly what is said by Hamlet.

(24) Namely that we see here the oscillation between this which, at the moment of the collapse of Hamlet's discourse is something which is in the words themselves, namely the disappearance, the dying away of his appeal into something which is a consenting to the desire of his mother, laying down his arms before something which seems ineluctable to him; namely that the mother's desire here takes on again for him the value of something which in no case, and by no method can be raised up.

I have been going much more slowly than I thought possible. I will be forced to stop at a point which you see is going to leave us confronted with the programme of the decipherment of Hamlet for perhaps two more of our meetings.

To conclude today I will try to show you the relationship between what I am in the process of articulating and the graph. What I am trying to lead you to, is the following, that beyond the elementary discourse of the demand, in so far as it submits the need of the subject to the consent, to the caprice, to the arbitrariness of the other as such, and thus structures human tension and intention in terms of the fragmentation of the signifier, if what is happening beyond the other, if the discourse of the subject which is the one that is carried on, in so far as beyond this first stage, of this first relationship to the other, what he has to find in this discourse which models him, which structures him in this already structured discourse, is to rediscover within this what he really wants ... because this is the first stage and the fundamental stage of any mapping out of the subject with respect to what is called his will; his own volonte.

(25) His own will, is first of all that most problematic thing as we analysts know, namely what he really desires. Because it is quite clear that beyond the necessities of demand, in so far as it fragments and fractures this subject, the rediscovery of desire in its ingenuous form is the problem that we are constantly dealing with. Analysis tells us that beyond this relationship to the other, this questioning of the subject about what he wants is not simply that of the question mark which is here drawn on this second level of the graph, but that there is above it something in order to rediscover oneself.

Namely that as in the first stage there is installed somewhere a signifying chain which is called properly speaking the unconscious, and which already gives to that its signifying support; that one can rediscover oneself there somewhere.

There is here inscribed a code which is the relationship of the subject to his own demand. There is already a register which is established, thanks to which the subject can perceive what? Not as it is said that his demand is oral, or anal, or this or that, because this is not at all what is in question. That he is in a certain privileged relationship, qua subject. And this is why I inscribed in this way, with a certain form of demand, this line beyond the other in which there is posed the subject's question. It is a conscious line. Before there was analysis or analysts, human beings asked the question, and ceaselessly posed it, you can believe, just as in our time, just as since Freud, of where their true will was.

(26) This is why we make this line a continuous one. It belongs to the system of personality, whether you call it the conscious or the preconscious, for the moment I am not going to get into any further detail.

But what does the graph indicate to us here? It is that it is obviously on this line that there is going to be situated somewhere the x which is desire; that this desire has a relationship with something which must be situated on the return line, opposite this intentional line. It is in this respect that it is homologous to the relationship of the ego to the image. The graph teaches us that this desire which, floating here somewhere, but always in this beyond of the other, this desire is submitted to a certain regulation, to a certain height as one might say of fixation which is determined. Determined by what? By something which is here delineated thus: namely by a return path of the code of the unconscious, ^ 0 D, towards the message of the unconscious on the imaginary plane. That this dotted circuit, in other words the unconscious, which begins here and which passing to the level of the unconscious message, S($), goes to the level of the unconscious $ over against demand, returns to the desire, and from that towards the phantasy; that in other words it is essentially with respect to what regulates on this line the height, the situation of desire, and on a path which is a return path with respect to the unconscious - because if you notice how the graph is made, you will see here that there is no return arrow; it is in this direction that there is produced the circuit of the formation of desire at the level of the unconscious.

(27) What can be articulated in this very connection, and by keeping ourselves to this scene of Hamlet face to face with his mother? It is essentially the fact that there is never a moment when, in a more complete way, and precisely in a way to further cancel out the subject, this formula that the desire of man is the desire of the other, is not here tangible, manifest, complete.

In other words what is in question is that in the measure that it is to the other that the subject addresses himself, not with his own will, but with the one of which he is at that moment the support, and the representative, namely that of the father, and also that of order, and also that of modesty, of decency - I will come back on these terms, they are not just there for effect; I already brought into play the demon of modesty, and you will see the place it will hold in what follows - and that it is in so far as he holds before his mother this discourse beyond herself, and that he falls back from it, namely that he falls back to the strict level of this other before whom he cannot bow, can only trace out as one might say the movement of this scene is more or less as follows, that beyond the other, the adjuration of the subject tries to rejoin, at the level of the code of the law, and that he falls back not towards a point where something stops, where he meets himself with his own desire - he has no further desire. Ophelia has been rejected, and we will see the next time the function of Ophelia in all of this - but everything that happens if you wish, to schematise, as if this return path (28) returned purely and simply onto the articulation of the other, as if he could no longer receive any other message than the signified of the other here, namely the reply of the mother: I am what I am, there is nothing to be done with me, I am a real genital character - in the sense of the first volume of Psychanalyse d'Aujourd'hui - mourning means nothing to me.

The funeral meats served the following day for the wedding banquet, thrift, thrift - the remark is Hamlet's. As regards her, she is simply a gaping cunt. When one goes, another arrives. This is what is in question. The drama of Hamlet, the articulation of Hamlet if it is the drama of desire, is - we have seen it right throughout this scene - the drama - why not say it; it is very curious that one all the time uses words like object, but that the first time one encounters it one does not recognise it - from the beginning to the end this is all that is spoken about: there is a worthy object, and an unworthy object.

"A little propriety, please; there is all the same a difference between this god and that filth." This is what is in question, and no one has ever spoken about object-relations in connection with Hamlet. People are still baffled by it.

This however is all that is in question. The discourse to which I alluded a little while ago concerning the veritable female, or the veritable male genital character, is a coherent discourse, because you can read in it that the characteristic of the genital character is that he does not mourn very much. This is written in the same first volume of Psychanalyse d'Aujourd'hui. It is a (29) marvellous commentary for the dialectic of Hamlet.

However one cannot but be struck by this - I am going a little quickly because I must give you a glimpse of the horizons towards which I am tending - that if it is indeed a problem of mourning that is in question, here we see coming in through the mediation, and linked to the problem of mourning, the problem of the object. Which will perhaps allow us to give a further articulation to what has been contributed in Trauer und Melancolie namely that if mourning takes place - and we are told that it is. because of an introjection of a lost object - in order for it to be introjected perhaps there is a preliminary condition, namely that it is constituted qua object; and that thenceforward the question of the constitution qua object is not perhaps purely and simply linked to the conception, to the co-instinctual stages as they are given to us.

But there is something which already indicates that we are here at the heart of the problem. It is this something on which I ended the last session, and on which the whole of the the next of our meetings will centre, it is the following: it is that the key point, the decisive point at which Hamlet as one might say took the bit between his teeth - because in effect it has been very appositely remarked that after having hung around for a long time, all of a sudden Hamlet cuts loose, he launches himself into a business which is presented under most unlikely conditions; he has to kill his step-father, it has been proposed to him to support a sort of a wager by this step-father which is going to consist in fighting a fencing match with the gentleman about whom (30) he knows that the least that can be said is that at the time that this is happening this gentleman does not wish him particularly well, it is neither more nor less than the brother of Ophelia who has ended her life because of a disturbance that clearly he is partly responsible for; he knows in any case that this gentleman blames him for it, Hamlet is very fond of this gentleman, he says it to him, and we will return to this, and nevertheless it is with him that he is going to cross swords for the sake of someone who in principle he has to butcher. And at this moment he reveals himself as a real killer, with absolutely no precedent, he does not allow the other person to even touch him - it is a real headlong flight forward which is here altogether manifest, the point at which Hamlet takes the bit between his teeth, is the one on which I ended with my little plan of the graveyard and these people grappling with one another at the bottom of a grave, which is all the same a strange scene, which is entirely due to Shakespeare because in the early Hamlets there is no trace of it.

What is happening, and what was Hamlet doing there? Because he could not tolerate seeing someone other than himself demonstrate or manifest precisely an overwhelming grief. These words which I am speaking each one of you is going to have to support them by reading Hamlet, because it is too long for me to do it. There is not one of my words which is not supported by something which is in substance in the text. He says it: "But, sure, the bravery of his grief did put me into a towering passion." (V ii 78) He explains it afterwards in order to excuse himself for (31) having been so violent. Namely confronted with what Laertes had done, jumping into the grave into the grave of his sister, he must also leap after him to embrace It must be said that one has a curious idea of what is happening inside. I suggested it to you the last time with my little imaginary painting.

It is by way of mourning in other words, and of a mourning assumed in the same narcissistic relationship as there is between the ego and the image of the other, it is in function of what there is represented all of a sudden for him in this passionate relationship of a subject to an object which is at the bottom of the painting, the presence of $ which it puts before him all of a sudden as support in which this object which for him is rejected because of a confusion of objects, of an inmixing of objects, it is in the measure that something here all of a sudden grabs him that this level can all of a sudden be reestablished which for a short instant is going to make a man of him. Namely something which is going to make of him someone capable, for a short moment no doubt, but a moment which is enough to end the play, capable of fighting, and capable of killing.

What I want to tell you is not that Shakespeare, of course, said all these fine things to himself, it is that if he has put somewhere in the articulation of his play something as singular as the character of Laertes in order to have him play at the high point, the crucial point of the play, this role of example and of support towards which Hamlet precipitates himself in a passionate (32) embrace, and from which he emerges literally other, this cry accompanied by commentaries which are so much along the line that I am giving you that you have to read them, that it is here in Hamlet that there is produced the moment at which he can lay hold again of his desire.

Which proves to you that we are here at the heart of the economy of what is in question. Naturally this has almost only a marginal interest, after all, and to show us to what point are drawn all the avenues of the articulation of the play and it is along these avenues that at every moment for us our interest is suspended. This is what ensures our participation in the drama of Hamlet. Naturally it is only interesting that things have come to this because beforehand there were four acts which preceded the graveyard scene. In these four acts there were other things which we are now going to see by going back over them.

In the forefront, there is the role of the play scene. What is this production; what does it mean? Why did Shakespeare conceive of it as indispensable? It has more than one motive, more than one pretext, but what we will try to see is its most profound pretext.

In short I think that I have today sufficiently indicated to you in what sense of the experience, of the articulation of structure there is posed for us the problem of the study of Hamlet, namely what we, when we have finished, will keep of it as being usable, as begin manageable, as schematic for our own mapping out of desire - I will tell you what. The desire of the neurotic at (33) every moment of its incidence. I will show you this desire of Hamlet. It has been said that it is the desire of a hysteric. This is perhaps quite true. One could say it is the desire of an obsessional. It is a fact that he is full of even quite severe psychasthenic symptoms. But that is not the question.

In fact he is both. He is purely and simply the place of this desire. Hamlet is not a clinical case. Hamlet of course, it is too obvious to recall it, is not a real person. It is a drama which permits to situate if you wish, like a turning plate where a desire is situated, where we can find all the traits of desire, namely orientated, interpreted in the sense of what happens at the outcome of a for the desire of the hysteric, namely this desire that the hysteric is forced to construct for himself. It is for this reason that I would say that the problem for Hamlet is closer to the desire of the hysteric, because in a way the problem of Hamlet is to rediscover the place of his desire.

This resembles a good deal what a hysteric is capable of doing, namely of creating for himself an unsatisfied desire.

But it is just as true that it is the desire of the obsessional in so far as the problem of the obsessional, is to support himself on an impossible desire. It is not quite the same thing.

Both are true. You will see that we will make the interpretation of Hamlet's remarks and acts also veer from one side to the other.

What you must come to grasp, is something more radical than the desire of one or other, than the desire with which you pick out (34) an hysteric, or an obsessional.

.....when he addresses the character of the hysteric says that everyone knows that an hysteric is incapable of loving. When I read things like that, I am always tempted to say to the author, and you, are you capable of loving. He says that an hysteric lives in the unreal, and himself? The doctor always talks as if he were well settled at home, at home with regard to love, to desire, to willing, and all the rest. It is all the same a curious position, and for some time now we ought to know that it is a dangerous position. It is thanks to this that one takes up counter-transference positions thanks to which one understands nothing about the patient one is dealingg with. This is exactly the order of things, and that is why it is essential to articulate, to situate the place of desire.

Seminar 16: Wednesday 8 April 1959

"Let me be given my desire". This is the meaning that I told you Hamlet had for all those, critics, actors or spectators, who lay their hands on it. I told you that it was this way because of the exceptional, the inspired structural rigour at which the theme of Hamlet arrives after an obscure elaboration which begins in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries with Saxo Grammaticus, then subsequently in the romantic version of Belieforest, and no doubt in an outline by Kyd, and also in a first draft, it appears, by Shakespeare, to end up with the form of it that we have.

This form is characterised in our eyes, with the method that we use here, by something which I call the structure which is that precisely to which I am trying to give you a key which will allow you to find your bearings with certainty in this topological form which I have called the graph, which one perhaps could also call the gramme.

Let us take up again our Hamlet. I am sure that since I have spoken to you about it three times, you have at least read it once. Let us try to regasp, in this movement which is at once simple and profoundly marked by all the detours which have allowed so much human thinking to lodge there, this movement of Hamlet. If it can be both simple and never ending, it is not very difficult to know why. The drama of Hamlet, is the encounter with death.

Others have insisted - I moreover alluded to them in my earlier approaches - on the prodigiously gripping, striking character of the first scene on the platform of Elsinore, of this scene about (2) the return of something that the sentries have seen once already. It is the encounter with the ghost, with this form from below: one does not yet know what it is, what it is bringing, what it wants to say. Coleridge says in his notes on Hamlet which are so well done and which are easily found in his Lectures on Shakespeare - I am coming back to it because I may have given you the impression that I thought badly of it. I mean that in telling you that after all Coleridge only found himself there, I seemed to minimise what he said about it. He is the first person who sounded, as in many other domains, the depths of what there is in Hamlet - in connection with this first scene that Hume himself, who was so much against ghosts, believed in this one, in whom the art of Shakespeare managed to make him believe despite his resistance. The energy that he deployed against ghosts, he says, is like that of a Samson. And here Samson is defeated.

It is clear that it is because Shakespeare came very close to something which was not the ghost, but which was effectively this encounter not with a dead person, but with death, which in short is the pivotal point of this play. Hamlet's going in front of death, this is where we should begin from to conceive of what is promised to us from this first scene when the ghost appears at the very moment when he is said to have appeared, "the bell then beating one" (I i 39).

We find this "one" at the end of the play when, after a (3) complicated journeying, Hamlet finds himself very close to performing the act which ought at the same time complete his destiny, and where in a way he advances with closed eyes towards the one whom he must strike, saying to Horatio - and it is not at an indifferent moment that he ends by saying to him: What is it to kill a man, "And a man's life's no more than to say One" (V ii 74).

Obviously in order to get here he takes strange paths, you could say that he plays truant. Which allows me to borrow a word which is in the text. It is a question of Horatio who, all modesty and all kindness, when he comes to bring him his help, says I am a "truant" scholar; I am being idle (I ii 169). No one believes him, but it is in effect what has always struck the critics: that Hamlet idles. That he does not go straight at things.

In short what we are trying to do here, to investigate, is why things are so. On this point what we are doing is not something like taking a wrong road. It is a road which is different to the one followed by those who have come before us, but it is different in so far as it perhaps takes the question a bit further. What they have said does not for all that lose its importance. What they sensed is what Freud immediately put into the foreground; it is that in this action which is in cause, the action of bringing death, and regarding which one does not know why an action which is so urgent, and in the last analysis so quick to carry out, demands so much time from Hamlet.

What we are told first of all about it, is that this action of (4) killing encounters in Hamlet the obstacle of desire. This is the discovery, the reason and the paradox, because what I showed you and what remains the unsolved riddle of Hamlet, the riddle that we are trying to resolve, is precisely this thing on which it seems the spirit should dwell, it is that the desire in question, because it is the desire discovered by Freud, the desire for the mother, desire in so far as it stirs up rivalry with the one who possesses her, this desire God knows should go in the same direction as the action.

In order to begin to decipher what this means, therefore in the last analysis the mythical function of Hamlet which makes of it a theme equal to that of Oedipus, what appears to us first of all is that what we read in the myth, the intimate link that there is in short between this murder which is to be done, this just murder, this murder that he wants to carry out - there is no conflict in him about law and order, involving as some authors have suggested, as I reminded you, the basis of the execution of justice. There is no ambiguity in him between public order, the hands of the law, and his private tasks; there is no doubt for him that this murder is the whole law; there is no question about this murder - and his own death. This murder will only be executed when Hamlet has already received a fatal wound, in this short interval that remains to him between the death blow he has received and the moment that he dies.

It is from this then that we must begin. From this rendezvous to which we can give its name, to which we can give all its meaning. Hamlet's act projects itself, situates itself at its (5) term at the final rendezvous of all rendezvous, at this point with respect to the subject as we are here trying to articulate it, to define it, to the subject in so far as it has not yet come to birth, - its advent is delayed in the properly philosophical articulation - to the subject as Freud tells us it is constructed. A subject which is distinguished from the subject about which occidental philosophy has been speaking ever since theories of knowledge exist, a subject which is not at all the universal support of objects, and in a way its negative, its omnipresent support, to the subject in so far as it speaks and in so far as it is structured in a complex relationship with the signifier which is very precisely the one that we are trying to articulate here.

And to represent it once again, if it is true that the point of intersection of the intention of the demand and the signifying chain occurs the first time at the point 0 which we have defined as the big Other qua locus of the truth, I mean qua locus where the word is situated by taking place, establishes this other order evoked, invoked every time the subject articulates something, every time he speaks and does this something which is distinguished from all the other immanent forms of captivation or of the one with respect to the other, there is nothing equivalent to the fact that the word always establishes this third element, namely this locus of the Other in which the word, even when it is lying, is inscribed as desire.

This discourse for the other, this reference to the other, is further prolonged, in the fact that it is taken up again, starting from the other in order to constitute the question of: "what do I want?" or more exactly the question which is proposed (6) to the subject in a form which is already negative: "what do you want?"; the question of what beyond this alienated demand in the system of discourse in so far as it is there, reposing in the locus of the other, the subject prolonging his elan asks himself here what he is as subject, and where he has in short to encounter what? Beyond the locus of the truth that which the genius itself - not of the tongue but of the extreme metaphor which tends to be formulated before certain significant spectacles, which is called by a name which we will recognise here in passing: the moment of truth.

Because let us not forget, at a time when the whole of philosophy is engaged in articulating what it is that links time to being, that it is quite simple to see that time, in its very constitution, past-present-future (those of grammar) refers itself to the act of the word - and to nothing else. The present, is the moment at which I speak and nothing else.

It is strictly impossible for us to conceive of a temporality in an animal dimension. Namely in a dimension of appetite. The abc of temporality requires even the structure of language. And in this beyond of the other, in this discourse which is no longer discourse for the other, but discourse of the other properly speaking, in which there is going to be established this broken line of signifiers of the unconscious; in this Other into whom the subject advances with his question as such, what he is aiming at in the final term, is the moment of this encounter with himself, of this encounter with his willing, of this encounter with something which we are going in the final term to try to (7) formulate, and of which we cannot even give all the elements immediately, even though all the same certain signs represent them for us here and are in a way for you the reference point, the prefiguring of what awaits us in what can be called the necessary steps, the necessary stages of the question.

Let us note all the same that if Hamlet, who I told you is not this or that, is not an obsessional for the good reason first of all that he is a poetic creation - Hamlet does not have a neurosis; Hamlet demonstrates some neurosis to us, and this is a completely different thing than being one - if Hamlet by certain sentences when we look into Hamlet from a certain mirror-like light, appears to us to be closer to the structure of the obsessional, it is already because of the fact that the function of desire - because this is the question that we are posing about Hamlet - appears to us precisely in the fact, which is revelatory of the essential element of the structure which is the one precisely highlighted to the maximum by obsessional neurosis - it is that one of the functions of desire, the major function in the obsessional, is to keep at a distance, to wait for, this desired moment of encounter.

And if I employ the term offered by Freud in Inhibitions symptoms and anxiety, namely Erwartung, which he expressly distinguishes from [vorhergesehen], to offer one's back; Erwartung, waiting in the active sense is also to make it wait This game with the moment of encounter essentially dominates the relationship of the obsessional. Hamlet no doubt shows us this whole dialectic, all this unfolding which plays with the object, in many other aspects (8) also, but this is the most obvious one, the one which appears on the surface, which strikes us, and which gives its style to this play, and which has always constituted its enigma with respect in short to a fundamental texture? What is it that makes of it this variant of the Oedipus complex which is so striking in its character of variation? Because in the case of Oedipus, he did not go into all these complications as Freud very clearly remarked in the little explanatory note to which one has recourse when one does not know the answer. God knows things are getting worse, we moderns are in a period of decadence, we get into all sorts of knots before doing what the others, the good, courageous ancients, did right away. This is not an explanation; this reference to the idea of decadence should make us suspicious; we can take things from a different angle.

I think that it is appropriate to take the question further. If it is true that we moderns are at that point, there must be a reason for it, at least if we are psychoanalysts, other than the reason: our nerves are not as good as those of our fore-fathers. No, already something that I drew your attention to is essential. Oedipus in his case, did not have to spend all this time talking before acting, he had done it without even thinking about it, and without knowing it. The structure of the oedipal myth is essentially constituted by this.

(9) Now it is quite clear and obvious that there is something here; something which is precisely that by which I introduced you this year - and it is not by chance - into this initiation to the gramme as a key to the problem of desire. Remember the very simple dream from "the desire principle and the reality principle", the dream in which the dead father appears. And I marked for you on the upper line, the line of enunciating in the dream: "He did not know"; the blessed ignorance of those who are plunged in the necessary drama which follows from the fact that the subject who speaks is subject to the signifier, this ignorance is here.

I point out to you in passing that no one explains why to you. Because indeed if the father sleeping in the garden was murdered because there had been poured into his ear - l'oneille as it is called in Jarry - this delicate sap, hebenon, it seems that he should not have been aware of this, because there is nothing to tell us that he woke up and recognised the damage, that the scabs which covered his body were ever seen except by those who discovered his corpse. And therefore this supposes that in the domain of the beyond one has very precise information about the way in which one got there, which can in effect be a hypothesis in principle, which is not something either which we should right away hold to be certain.

All of this to underline the arbitrariness of the initial revelation, the one from which there begins the whole great movement of Hamlet; the revelation by the father of the truth about his death distinguishes essentially a coordinate of the (10) myth from what happens in the Oedipus myth.

Something is lifted, a veil, the one which weighs precisely on the articulation of the unconscious line; this veil which we ourselves are trying to lift, but not without as you know a certain amount of difficulty. Because it is clear that it must indeed have an essential function. I mean for the security of the subject in so far as he speaks, so that our interventions to reestablish the coherence of the signifying chain at the level of the unconscious present all these difficulties, receive on the part of the subject all this opposition, these refusals, this is something which we call resistance and which is the pivot of the whole history of analysis.

Here the question is solved. The father knew, and from the fact that he knew, Hamlet also knows. Namely that he has the answer. He has the answer, and there can only be one response. It is not necessarily sayable in psychological terms; I mean that it is not necessarily a comprehensible response, and still less one that gets you in the gut; but it is none the less a response of a quite fatal type. We are trying to see what this response is. This response is in short the message at the point that it is constituted on the upper line, on the line of the unconscious; this response which I already symbolised for you in advance, and not of course without being forced because of this to ask you to trust me. But it is easier, more honest to ask someone to trust (11) you on some point which at first makes no sense. This does not commit you to anything, except perhaps to look for it, which all the same allows you the freedom to create it by yourselves; this response I began to articulate in the following form: signifier $S($)$; what distinguishes the response at the level of the upper line, from that at the level of the lower line. At the level of the lower line the response is always the signified of the other, $s(0)$, it is always with respect to this word which unfolds at the level of the Other and which shapes the meaning of what we have wanted to say. But who would have wanted to say that at the level of the Other?

This signified at the level of the simple discourse, but at the level of the beyond of this discourse, at the level of the question the subject poses to himself which means in the final analysis: "What have I become in all of this?". The response as I told you, is the signifier of the Other with the bar, $S($)$.

There are a thousand fashions to begin developing for you what is included in this symbol. But today we choose, because we are in Hamlet the clear, obvious, pathetic, dramatic path. And this is the value of Hamlet that it allows us to gain access to the meaning of $S(0)$.

The meaning of what Hamlet learns from his father, is here before us very clearly, it is the irredeemable, absolute, unplumbable betrayal of love. Of the purest love, the love of this king who perhaps of course, like any man, may have been a great rogue but (12) who with this being who was his wife would go so far as to keep the wind away from her face. At least according to what Hamlet tells us (cf I ii 141)..

It is the absolute falseness compared to what appeared to Hamlet as the very witness of beauty, of truth, of the essential.

Here there is the response. The truth of Hamlet is a hopeless truth. There is not a trace in the whole of Hamlet of a raising up towards something which could be described as the beyond, atonement, redemption.

We are already told that the first meeting came from below. This oral, infernal relationship to the Acheron which Freud had chosen to move since he was not able to bend the higher powers, is here what situates Hamlet in the clearest fashion. But this of course is only a quite simple, quite obvious remark which it is rather curious to see that the authors, by some modesty or other - sensitive souls must not be disturbed - scarcely highlight in connection with Hamlet. I put it to you after all only as a step in the order of the pathetic, in the order of the tangible, however painful it may be. There must be something in which there can be formulated more radically the reason, the motive of this whole choice, because after all, every conclusion, every verdict, however radical it may be, by taking on a more accentuated form in the order of what is called pessimism, is still something which is made to veil from us what is in question.

S($) does not mean everything that is happening at the level of 0 is worthless; namely that every truth is fallacious. This is something which may make you laugh in the periods of amusement (13) which follow the post-war, in which for example people produce a philosophy of the absurd which is of use particularly in cellars.

Let us try to articulate something more serious, and lighter. So then what does S($) with the bar, what does this mean essentially? I think that this is the time to say it, even though of course this is going to appear from a very particular angle; but I do not believe that it is contingent.

S($) means the following: it is that if 0, the big Other is not a being but the locus of the word, S(6) means that in the locus of the word, in which there reposes in a developed form, or in a form the totality of the system of signifiers, namely of a tongue, something is missing. Something which can be only a signifier is lacking to it.

The signifier which is lacking at the level of the Other, and which gives its most radical value to this S(0), is the following which is as I might say the great secret of psychoanalysis, that through which psychoanalysis contributes something, through which the subject who speaks, in so far as the experience of analysis reveals him to us as necessarily structured in a certain fashion is distinguished from the usual subject, from the subject to which a philosophical evolution which after all may well appear to us in a certain point of view of fruitful delusion, but of delusion in retrospect.

This is the great secret: there is no Other of the Other. In other words for the subject of traditional philosophy, this (14) subject subjectivises himself indefinitely. If I am in everything I think, I am in so far as I think that I am, and so on, this has no reason to stop. The truth is that analysis teaches us something quite different. The fact is that it has already been glimpsed that it is not so sure that I am in so far as I think, and that one can only be sure of one thing, which is that I am in so far as I think that I am. Certainly that. Only what analysis teaches us is that I am not the one who precisely is in the process of thinking that I am, for the simple reason that because of the fact that I think that I am, I think in the locus of the Other; I am different to the one who thinks that I am.

But the question is that I have no guarantee of any kind that this Other, through what there is in his system, can give me if I may express myself in this way, what I gave him: his being and his essence as truth. There is no, I have told you. Other of the Other. There is not in the Other, any signifier which is able on this occasion to answer for what I am. And to say things in a transformed way, this hopeless truth that I spoke to you about a while ago, this truth which is the one that we encounter at the level of the unconscious, is a faceless truth, is a closed truth, is a truth which can be bent in every direction. We only know it too well. It is a truthless truth.

And this indeed is what creates the greatest obstacle for those who approach our work from outside, and who before our (15) interpretations, because they are not on the path with us where they are meant to have their effect which is only conceivable in a metaphorical fashion, and in so far as they play and reverberate always between these two lines, cannot understand what is in question in analytic interpretation.

If we talk about this signifier, that the Other does not have at its disposition, it is all the same because it is - of course - somewhere.

I set up this little gramme for you so that you would not lose your bearings. I made it as carefully as I could, but certainly not to increase your confusion. You can recognise, everywhere the bar is, the hidden signifier, the one that the Other does not have at its disposition, and which is precisely the one which concerns you; it is the same one which makes you enter the game in so far as you, poor simpletons, since you were born, were caught up in this sacred logos business. Namely the part of you which in this is sacrificed, and sacrificed not purely and simply, physically as they say, really, but symbolically. And this is not nothing, this part of you which took on a signifying function. And this is why there is only one; and there are not ninety nine of them. It is very exactly this enigmatic function that we call the phallus which is here, this something of the organism of life, of this sprouting, or vital surge which you know I do not think should be used on all sorts of occasions, but which once it is well circumscribed, symbolised, put where it is, and especially where it is of use, there where effectively it is (16) caught up in the unconscious, takes on its meaning. The phallus, the vital tumescence, this enigmatic, universal something more male than female and nevertheless of which the female herself may become the symbol, this is what is in question, and that which, because it is not at the disposition of the Other, that which, even though it is this very life which the subject makes signifying, nowhere comes in to guarantee the signification of the discourse of the Other.

In other words, though it may be sacrificed, this life is not given back to him by the Other.

It is because Hamlet starts from there, namely from the response of the given, that the whole path can be cleared, that this radical revelation is going to lead him to the final rendezvous. To reach it we are now going to take up what happens in the play Hamlet

The play Hamlet is as you know the work of Shakespeare, and we should therefore pay attention to what he added to it. It was already a long time on the road, but it must have offered - and it was enough for it to be offered for it to be taken - a long enough path still to be travelled to show us what can be called the genuine article, for Shakespeare to have travelled it.

I pointed out to you the last time the questions that are posed by the play scene, the players' scene. I will return to it. I would like today to introduce an essential element; essential because it concerns what we are getting close to after having established the function of the two lines, namely what lies in the interval, that which, as I might say, constructs for the (17) subject the distance that he can maintain between the two lines in order to be able to breathe there while he is still alive; and this is what we call desire.

I told you what pressure, what abolition, what destruction this desire undergoes in so far as what is encountered with this something of the real Other, of the mother in so far as she is a mother like so many others, namely something structured by this something which is less desire than gluttony, even engulfment, this something which obviously, we do not know why, but after all it does not matter, at this level of Shakespeare's life had been a revelation for him.

The problem of the woman, undoubtedly, had never not been present in the whole of Shakespeare's work, and there were fine strapping women before Hamlet, and such abysmal, ferocious and sad ones only appear after Hamlet. Troilus and Cressida which is a pure marvel, and certainly one that has not been highlighted enough, allows us perhaps to go further into what Hamlet thought at that time. The creation of Troilus and Cressida is I think one of the most sublime that one can meet with in dramatic work. At the level of Hamlet and at the level of the dialogue which one could call the paroxysm of the play between Hamlet and his mother, I told you the last time the meaning of this movement of adjuration vis-a-vis the mother, which is more or less: do not destroy the beauty, the order of the world, do not confuse Hyperion himself - it is his father whom he designates thus - with this most abject of beings; and the collapse of the adjuration before what he knows to be the fatal necessity of this (18) sort of desire which sustains nothing, which retains nothing.

The quotations that I could give you here of what Shakespeare's thought is in this regard are very numerous. I will only give you the following one which I picked up during the holidays in a quite different context. It is a question of someone who is rather in love, but also it must be said rather bizarre; who is moreover a decent man; it is in Twelfth Night. The hero, in a dialogue with the girl who to win him, and again with nothing in the hero, the Duke as he is called, putting in doubt that his leanings are towards women - because it is his passion that is in question - approaches him disguised as a boy, and which all the same is a peculiar way to promote oneself as a girl because she loves him. It is not for nothing that I am giving you these details, it is because it is a contribution to something which I am going to introduce now namely the creation of Ophelia. This woman Viola, is precisely before Ophelia. Twelfth Night is about two years before the production of Hamlet, and here we see exactly the example of the transformation of what is happening in Shakespeare on the level of his feminine creations, which as you know are among the most fascinating, the most attracting, the most captivating, the most disturbing also, which create the really immortally poetic character of a whole aspect of his (19) genius.

This girl-boy or boy-girl, here is the very type of creation in which there flowers, in which there is revealed something which is going to introduce us to what is now going to be our topic, our next step, namely the role of the object in desire.

After having taken this occasion to show you the perspective in which there is inscribed our question about Ophelia, here is what the Duke, without knowing that the person in front of him is a girl, and a girl who loves him, responds to the specious questions of the girl who, while he despairs of himself, says to him: How can you complain. If there was someone near you who was sighing after your love, and whom you had no desire to love - which is the case, this is what he is suffering from - how could you welcome her. You must not therefore blame others for what you would undoubtedly do yourself.

He is like a blind man, and greatly puzzled, tells her at that moment something about the great difference between feminine desire and masculine desire.

"There is no woman's side
Can bide the beating of so strong a passion
As love doth give my heart: no woman's heart
So big to hold so much; they lack retention.... (II iv)

And his whole development is in effect about something which makes of desire essentially this distance that there is, this particular relationship to the object sustained as such, which is something precisely, which is what is expressed in the symbol (20) which I put for you on this return line of the x of the will. Namely the relationship $ $ o, to the object in so far as it is as one might say the cursor, the level at which there is situated, there is placed that which in the subject is properly speaking desire.

I would like to introduce the character of Ophelia by profiting from what the philological and textual criticism has brought us about as I might say her predecessors. I saw on a page by some cretin or other a lively movement of good humour which came to him one day not especially suddenly because he must have known it for some time, when he noticed that in Belleforest there is something which corresponds to the role of Ophelia.

In Belleforest one is all the same embarrassed by everything that happens to Hamlet, namely that he really does seem to be mad; but all the same people are not all that more reassured by that, because it is clear that this madman knows well enough what he wants; and what he wants is what is not known, it is a lot of things; and what he wants is the question for all the others. They send him a prostitute who is meant, by drawing him off into a corner of the forest, to capture his confidences while someone who is listening may come to know something more. The stratagem fails, of course, thanks I think to the girl's love. What is certain, is that the critic in question was quite content to find this sort of proto-Ophelia in order to uncover there the reason for the ambiguities in Ophelia's character.

(21) Naturally I am not going to reread Ophelia's role; but this character who is so eminently pathetic, overwhelming, of whom one could say that she is one of the great figures of humanity, presents herself as you know with extremely ambiguous traits so that no one has ever yet been able to declare if she is innocence itself, who speaks about or who alludes to her most carnal movements with the simplicity of a purity which does not know modesty, or if on the contrary she is a shameless hussy who is ready for anything.

The texts about it are a real mish-mash. You can find everything in them. And in truth you find particularly in them a great charm, in which the mad scene is not the least important moment. Things are quite clear in effect. If on the one hand Hamlet behaves towards her with a quite exceptional cruelty, which is embarrassing, which people describe as painful, and which makes a victim of her, on the other hand one senses that she is not at all, and far from being, the disincarnated or uncarnal creature that the Pre-Raphaelite paintings which I have evoked have made of her. She is something quite different.

In truth it is surprising that prejudices about the type, the nature, the signification, the morals to speak plainly of women are still so strongly anchored that one can ask such a question about Ophelia. It seems that Ophelia is quite simply what every girl is whether or not she has broken through, after all we do not know anything about it, the taboo step of the breaching of her virginity. The question does not seem to be posed in any way about Ophelia. On this occasion it is a question of knowing why Shakespeare brought forward this character who seems to (22) represent a kind of extreme point on the curve which goes from his first heroines, the boy-girls, to something which is going to be formulated subsequently, but transformed into a different nature.

Ophelia, who seems to be the summit of his creation of the type of the woman, at the exact point at which she is herself a bud which is ready to blossom, and which is menaced by the insect gnawing at the heart of this bud. This vision of life ready to blossom, and of life which carries all lives, it is thus moreover that Hamlet qualifies it, situates it, in order to reject it: you will be the mother of sinners, this image precisely of vital fecundity, this image to speak plainly, illustrates for us more I think than any other creation the equation I noted in my lectures, the equation Girl = Phallus. There is obviously here something which we can very easily recognise.

I will not take into account things which in fact appear to me to be simply a curious encounter. I had the curiosity to look up the derivation of "Ophelia", and in an article by Boissade in the Dictionnaire étymologique grec, I found a Greek reference. Shakespeare did not have at his disposition the dictionaries that we use, but one finds in the authors of that epoch things so stupefying alongside extraordinary ignorance, such penetrating things, which resemble the constructions of the most modern criticism, that I can on this occasion tell you the following - which is in the notes which I have forgotten.

I believe that it is in Homer, if I remember rightly there is Ophelio, in the sense of to make pregnant, to impregnate; that Ophelio is used for this moulting, vital fermentation, which is (23) described more or less as allowing something to change, or to thicken. Funnier yet, one cannot take it into account, is that in the same article Boissade who is an author who sifts rather severely the organisation of his signifying chains, thinks it necessary to make express reference in this connection to the verbal form of Ophallos. To the phallus.

The confusion between Ophelia and Phallos does not require similarities in order to be obvious to us. It appears to us in the structure. And what it is now a question of introducing, is not the way in which Ophelia can be the phallus, but if she is as we say truly the phallus how Shakespeare made her fulfil this function.

Now this is the important thing. Shakespeare carries onto a new plane what is given in the legend of Belieforest, namely that in the legend as Belieforest reports it, the prostitute is the bait destined to tear his secret from him. Well, transposing that to a higher level which is the one at which the real question is sustained, I will show you the next time that Ophelia is there to question the secret, not in the sense of sinister plans which it is a question of making Hamlet avow to those who surround him and who do not know very well what he is capable of, but the secret of desire.

In the relations with the object Ophelia, in so far as they are punctuated throughout the play by a series of moments on which we will dwell, something is articulated which allows us to grasp, in (20) a particularly lively way, the relations of the subject in so far as he speaks, namely of the subject in so far as he is submitted to the rendezvous with his destiny, with something which must take on in analysis, and through analysis, a different meaning. This meaning around which analysis turns, and regarding which it is not for nothing that it is the turning point which it is approaching in connection with this term of object which is so predominant, and certainly much more insistent and present than it ever was in Freud, and to the point that some people have said that analysis has changed meaning in so far as libido the pleasure-seeker, has become object-seeking.

I have told you, analysis has engaged itself along a false path in so far as it articulates this object and defines it in a fashion which misses its goal, which does not sustain what is really involved in the relationship which is inscribed in the formula $ O o, S castrated, S subjected to something which I will describe for you the next time, and which I will teach you to decipher under the name of the fading of the subject, which is opposed to the notion of the splitting of the object, of this relationship of the subject to the object as such. What is the object of desire? One day which was I think the second session of this year, I gave you a quotation by someone whom I hope someone has identified since, who said that what the miser regrets in the loss of his moneybox would teach us a good deal, if we knew it, about human desire. It is Simone Weil who said that.

It is this that we are going to try to circumscribe in terms of this thread which runs right through the tragedy between Ophelia and Hamlet.

Seminar 17: Wednesday 15 April 1959

I announced as a kind of lure that today I would in fact speak about the kind of lure Ophelia is. And I think that I will keep my word.

This object, this theme, this character, comes in here as an element in our exposition, the one that we have already been presenting for four of our meetings, whose purpose is to show in Hamlet the tragedy of desire. To show that if it can properly speaking be thus qualified, it is in the whole measure that desire as such, or human desire, the desire that we have to deal with in analysis, the desire which we are in a position, according to the style of our outlook with respect to it, to weaken, even to confuse with other terms, this desire can only be conceived of, can only be situated with respect to fixed coordinates in subjectivity which Freud demonstrated to be of such a nature that they fix at a certain distance from one another the subject and the signifier, which places the subject in a certain dependence on the signifier as such.

This means that we cannot account for analytic experience by starting from the idea that the signifier is for example a pure and simple reflection, a pure and simple product of what are called on occasion interhuman relationships. And it is not only an instrument, it is one of the initial, essential components of a topology without which one sees the totality of phenomena being reduced, being leveled down in a way which does not allow us, us analysts, to account for what one can call the presuppositions of our experience.

I started on this path, taking Hamlet as an example of something (2) which betrays to us a very lively dramatic sense of the coordinates of this topology, and which means that it is to this that we attribute the exceptional power of captivation that Hamlet has, which makes us say that if the tragedy of Hamlet has this predominant role, in the preferences of the critical public, that if it is always so seductive for those who approach it, this is because of something which shows that the poet has put into it from some angle some glimpses of his own experience. And this is indicated by the sort of turning point that Hamlet represents in Shakespeare's work. Also indeed that his experience as a poet, in the technical sense of the term, had little by little shown him the way to it.

It is because of certain detours that we think we can interpret here in function of certain of our reference points, of those which are articulated on our gramme, that we can grasp the import of this study which is certainly very essential. A sudden change in fortune is noted in a way which distinguishes Shakespeare's play from preceding plays or from the narratives of Saxo Grammaticus, of Belieforest, as plays that we only have fragmentary glimpses of. This detour is that of the character of Ophelia who is certainly present in the story from the beginning - Ophelia as I told you, is the trap -; from the beginning of the legend of Hamlet it is the trap into which Hamlet does not fall, first of all because he has been warned, then because the lure itself, namely the Ophelia of Saxo Grammaticus, does not lend herself to it, since she has been in love for a long time, Belieforest's text tells us, with Prince Hamlet.

Out of this Ophelia, Shakespeare constructed something completely different; in the plot perhaps he has only deepened this (3) function, this role that Ophelia has in the legend, destined as she is to take hold of, to captivate, to surprise Hamlet's secret. She is perhaps something which becomes one of the most intimate elements of the drama of the Hamlet that Shakespeare constructs for us, of the Hamlet who has lost the way, the path to his desire. She is an essential articulating element in this journey which makes Hamlet go to what I called the last time the moment of his fatal rendezvous, of the accomplishment of an act which he accomplishes in a way in spite of himself.

We will see even more today the degree to which Hamlet is indeed the image of this level of the subject at which one can say that it is in terms of pure signifier that destiny is articulated, and that the subject is in a way nothing but the reverse side of a message which is not even his own.

The first step then that we took along this path, was to articulate the degree to which the play, which is the drama of desire in relation to the desire of the other, the degree to which it is dominated by this Other who is here desire in the least ambiguous fashion, the mother, namely the primordial subject of demand. The subject whom I showed you to be the true omnipotent subject that we are always talking about in analysis. This is not the for the woman which has in itself this dimension which is the omnipotence called omnipotence of thought. It is the omnipotence of the subject as subject of the first demand that is in question, and it is to her that this omnipotence should always be referred, I told you this when we were taking our first steps.

It is a question of something, at the level of the desire of the other which is presented to Prince Hamlet, namely to the (4) principle subject of the play, as such a tragedy, the drama of a subjectivity. Hamlet is always there, and one could say much more than in any other drama.

The drama always presents itself in a twofold fashion, its elements being at once inter-subjective and intra-subjective. Therefore in the very perspective of the subject, of Prince Hamlet, this desire of the other, this desire of the mother presents itself, essentially as a desire which between an eminent object, between this idealised, exalted object who is his father, and this disparaged, contemptible object who is Claudius, the criminal and adulterous brother, does not choose.

She does not choose because something of the order of instinctual voracity is present which means that in her case this sacrosanct genital object of our recent terminology presents itself as nothing other than the object of a jouissance which is really the direct satisfaction of a need.

This dimension is essential; it is the one which forms one of the poles between which Hamlet's adjuration of his mother vacillates. I showed it to you in the scene where confronted with her, he launches this call for abstinence to her at the moment when in terms, which are moreover of the crudest, the cruelest sort, he transmits the essential message which the ghost, his father, charged him to transmit. Suddenly this appeal fails and turns back on itself; he sends her off to the bed of Claudius, to the caresses of the man who will not fail to make her yield yet again.

(5) In this sort of collapse, of abandonment at the end of Hamlet's adjuration, we find the very term, the model which allows us to conceive of the way in which his desire, his natural movement towards an action which he burns to accomplish, so that the whole world becomes for him a living reproach for never being equal to his own will, this action collapses in the same way as the adjuration that he addresses to his mother. It is essentially in this dependence of the desire of the subject with respect to the other subject that there is presented the major approach, the very accent of the drama of Hamlet, what one can call its permanent dimension.

It is a question of seeing how, in a more articulated fashion, by entering into a psychological detail which would remain I must say fundamentally enigmatic if it were not, this detail, submitted to this total vision which gives the meaning of the tragedy of Hamlet, the way this reverberates at the very core of Hamlet's willing, into this something which in my graph is the hook, the question mark of the Che vuoi? of the subjectivity constituted in the Other, and articulating itself in the Other.

This is the meaning of what I have to say today. What one can call the imaginary regulation of what constitutes the support of desire, of that which face to face with an undetermined point, a variable point here at the origin of the curve, and which represents this assumption by the subject of his own essential willing, which is regulated on something which is somewhere opposite, and in a way one can say, immediately at the level of the conscious subject, the culmination, the abutment, the term of what constitutes the question of the subject, is something that we symbolise by this f in the presence of o, and which we call the phantasy, which in the psychic economy represents something (6) that you know. This something ambiguous in so far as it is effectively in consciousness, when we approach it in a certain phase, a final term, this term which makes of all human passion in so far as it is marked by one of those traits which we call traits of perversion.

The mystery of phantasy, in so far as it is in a way the final term of a desire, and always more or less presents itself in a fairly paradoxical form because it properly speaking motivated the ancient rejection of its dimension as belonging to the order of the absurd, and this essential step which was taken in the modern epoch of psychoanalysis constitutes the first turning point which tends to interpret, to conceive of this phantasy qua perverse - and that it could not be conceived of except in so far as it was organised with respect to an unconscious economy; and if it appears to be the abutment in its final term, in its enigma, if it can be understood in function of an unconscious circuit, or which articulates it through another signifying chain profoundly different to the chain that the subject commands in so far as it is this one, the one which is below the first one, and at the level firstly of demand. And this phantasy intervenes, and it also does not intervene.

It is in the measure that something which normally does not get there by that path, does not return to the level of the message, of the signified of the Other, which is the module, the sum of all the significations such as they are required by the subject in the interhuman exchange and complete discourse. It is in so far as this phantasy gets through or does not get through in order to arrive at the message, that we find ourselves in a normal situation or in an atypical situation.

It is normal that it should not get through this path, that it remain unconscious, that it be separated. It is also essential that at certain phases, and phases which are inscribed more or (7) less in the pathological order, that it should also get through. We will give their name to these moments of breakthrough, these moments of communication which can only happen, as the schema indicates to you, in one direction. I am indicating this essential articulation because it is in order to advance in short in the handling of this apparatus that we call here the gramme, that we are here.

We are going to see simply for the moment what is meant by, and how there functions in Shakespearean tragedy, what I called the moment of craziness of Hamlet's desire, in so far as it is to this imaginary regulation that it should be referred.

Ophelia, in this mapping out, is situated at the level of the letter o; the letter o in so far as it is inscribed in this symbolisation of a phantasy. The phantasy being the support, the imaginary substratum of something which is called properly speaking desire, in so far as it is distinguished from demand, as it is distinguished also from need. This o corresponds to something towards which the whole modern articulation of analysis is directed when it tries to articulate the object and object-relations .

There is something correct in this research, in this sense that the role of this object is no doubt decisive as it articulates it. I mean the common notion in object-relations as it articulates it when it articulates it as that which fundamentally structures the mode of apprehension of the world. Simply in object-relations as it is most usually explained to us today in (8) most of the treatises which give a greater or lesser place to it, whether it is a volume which appeared fairly close to us to which I allude as the most caricatural example, or others more elaborated like those of Federn [Fairbairn?] or one of the others, the error and the confusion consists in this theorisation of the object qua object, which itself is called the pregenital object.

A genital object is also specifically within diverse forms of the pregenital object, and the diverse forms of the anal object, etc. It is precisely what is materialised for you on this schema in the fact that this is to take the dialectic of the object for the dialectic of the demand. And this confusion is explicable because in both cases the subject finds himself at a moment, in a position with regard to the signifier, which is the same. The subject is in an eclipsed position. In so far as in these two points of our gramme, whether it is a question of the code at the level of the unconscious, namely of the series of relationships that he has with a certain apparatus of demand, or whether it is a question of the imaginary relationship which constitutes him in a privileged fashion in a certain position also defined by his relationship to the signifier before an object o, in these two cases the subject is in an eclipsed position.

He is in this position which I began to articulate the last time by using the term fading. I chose this term for all sorts of philological reasons etc., and also because it has become quite familiar in connection with the utilisation of the communication machines which we have. Fading is exactly what happens in a machine for communicating, for reproducing the voice, when the voice disappears, subsides, vanishes, in order to reappear at the (9) whim of some variation in the support itself of the transmission.

It is in so far therefore as the subject is at a like moment of oscillation which is the one which characterises - we will naturally come to give its support and its coordinates to what is only a metaphor -before the demand and in the object that the confusion can be produced, and that in fact what is called a relation to the object is always a reference to the subject in this privileged moment which is called the fading of the subject from - not objects as is said - signifiers of demand.

And in so far as the demand remains fixed, it is by the mode, by the signifying apparatus which corresponds to the different types, oral, anal and others, that one can articulate something which in effect has a sort of clinical correspondence. But there is a great drawback in confusing what is a relationship to the signifier with what is a relationship to the object, because this object is different, because this object, qua object of desire has a different meaning, because all sorts of things make it necessary that we should not overlook that we should even give all their primitive determining value, as we are doing, to the signifiers of demand in so far as they are oral, anal, signifiers - with all the subdivisions, all the differences of orientation and of polarisation that this object as such can take on with relation to the subject - (which object-relations as they are currently articulated overlook), precisely this correlation to the subject which is expressed in this way in so far as the subject is marked by the bar.

This is what brings it about that the subject, even when we consider him at the most primitive stages of the oral period, as it has been articulated for example in an extremely tight, extremely rigorous, exact fashion by Melanie Klein - we find (10) ourselves, you should notice in the very text of Melanie Klein, in the presence of certain paradoxes, and these paradoxes are not inscribed in the pure and simple articulation that one can construct of the subject as being put face to face with the object corresponding to a need, specifically the nipple, the breast on this occasion.

Because the paradox appears in the fact that from the beginning another enigmatic signifier presents itself at the horizon of this relationship. This is perfectly demonstrated by Melanie Klein, who has only one merit on this occasion which is to have no hesitation in plunging ahead, namely to ratify what she has found in clinical experience and for want of an explanation to content herself with very poor explanations. But undoubtedly she testifies that the phallus is already there as such, and as properly speaking destructive with respect to the subject.

She makes of it from the beginning this primordial object which is at once the best and the worst, that around which there are going to revolve all the phenomena of the paranoid period and the depressive period.

All I am doing here of course is indicating, recalling.

What I can articulate further in connection with this and in so far as it interests us not in so far as it is confronted with, related to the demand, but with this element which we are going to try this year to more closely circumscribe, which is represented by the o; the o, an essential object, the object around which revolves as such the dialectic of desire, the object around which the subject experiences himself in an imaginary otherness, before an element which is otherness at the imaginary level as we have already articulated and defined it on several occasions. It is image, and it is pathos.

And it is through this other which is the object of desire that there is fulfilled a function which defines desire in this double (11) coordinate which means that he does not understand, not at all an object which is as such the satisfaction of a need, but an object in so far as it is itself relativised, I mean placed in a relationship with the subject - the subject who is present in the phantasy.

This is something obvious phenomenologically, and I will return to it later.

The subject is present in the phantasy. And the function of the object, which is the object of desire only in the fact that it is a term of the phantasy the object takes the place, I would say of that of which the subject is symbolically deprived.

This may appear a little abstract to you. I mean, for those who have not gone through all the earlier stages of this path with us. Let us say for them that it is in so far as in the articulation of the phantasy the object takes the place of that of which the subject is deprived. Which is what? It is from the phallus that the object takes on this function that it has in the phantasy, and that desire, with the phantasy as a support constitutes itself.

I think that it is difficult to go further to the extremes of what I mean concerning what we must call properly speaking desire and its relationship with the phantasy. It is in this sense, and in so far as this formula that the object of phantasy is this otherness image and pathos through which an other takes the place of what the subject is symbolically deprived, you see clearly that it is in this direction that this imaginary object finds itself in a way in a position of being able to condense in itself what can be called the virtues or the dimension of being, that it can become this veritable lure of being, which the object of (12) human desire is; this something before which Simone Weil stops when she points out the most dense, the most opaque relationship which can be presented to us of man with the object of his desire, the relationship of the Miser with his moneybox in which there seems to culminate for us in the most obvious fashion this character of fetish which is that of the object of human desire, and which is also the character or one of the aspects of all his objects.

It is rather comical to see, as recently happened to me, a gentleman who came to explain to us the relationship between the theory of signification and Marxism, say that one cannot approach the theory of signification without taking interhuman relations as a starting point. This went rather far. Within three minutes we were learning that the signifier was the instrument thanks to which man transmitted to his neighbour his private thoughts - we were told this textually by someone whose authority was Marx. By not referring things to this foundation of interhuman relations we would fall it appears into the danger of fetishising what was in question in the domain of language.

Undoubtedly I am prepared to admit that in effect we must encounter something that is very like a fetish. But I ask myself whether this something which is called a fetish, is not precisely one of the very dimensions of the human world, and precisely the one that must be taken into account. If we see the whole thing being rooted in interhuman relations we end up with only one thing, which is to refer the fact of the fetishisation of human objects to some interhuman (13) misunderstanding, which itself therefore supposes a reference back to significations. Just as the private thoughts that are in question - I think in a genetic way of thinking - are enough to make us smile, because if the private thoughts are there, what is the use of looking any further.

In brief it is rather surprising that this reference, not to human praxis, but to a human subjectivity given as essentially primitive, should be sustained in a doctrine which qualifies itself as Marxist, because it seems to me that it is enough to open the first volume of Kapital to see that the first step in Marx's analysis is very properly speaking, in connection with the fetish character of merchandise, to tackle the problem very exactly at the proper level and as such, even though the term as such is not mentioned, at the level of the signifier.

The signifying relationships, the relationships of value are given first, and all subjectivity, even that of fetishisation, come to be inscribed within this signifying dialectic. There is no shadow of doubt about this.

This is not a simple parenthesis, a reflection that I pour into your ears about my occasional indignations, and the annoyance I feel at having wasted my time.

Now let us try to make use of this relationship of $ in the presence of o which for us is the phantastical support of desire. We must articulate it clearly, because this o this imaginary other, what does that mean?

That means something fuller than what a person may include in it, a whole chain, a whole scenario. I do not need to return on this occasion to what last year I put forward here in connection (14) with the analysis of Jean Genet's Le Balcon. It is enough to give a meaning to what I mean on this occasion to refer to what we can call the diffused bordel in so far as it becomes the cause of what we call the sacrosanct genital

What is important in this properly structural element of the imaginary phantasy in so far as it is situated at the level of o, is in part this opaque character, the one which specifies it in its most accentuated form as the pole of perverse desire, in other words what makes of it the structural element of perversions, and shows us then that perversion is characterised by the fact that the whole accent of the phantasy is put on the aspect of the properly imaginary correlative of the other, o, or of the parenthesis in which something which is o plus p plus q etc. - it is the whole combination of; the most elaborated find themselves reunited here according to the adventure; the sequelae, the residues in which there has come to be crystallised the function of a phantasy in a perverse desire.

Nevertheless what is essential, and is this element of phenomenology to which I alluded above, is that you should recall that no matter how strange, how bizarre the phantasy of perverse desire may be in appearance, desire is always in some fashion involved in it. Involved in a relationship which is always linked to the pathetic, to the pain of existing as such, of purely existing, or of existing as a sexual term. It is obviously in the measure that the one who suffers injury in the sadistic phantasy is something which involves the subject in so far as he himself can be open to this injury that the sadistic phantasy subsists. And one can only say one thing about this (15) dimension, which is that one cannot but be surprised that it has been thought possible to elude it for a single instant by making of the sadistic tendency something which in any way could be referred to a pure and simple primitive aggression.

I am dwelling a good deal on this subject. If I do so, it is only to properly accentuate something which is that towards which we must now articulate the veritable opposition between perversion and neurosis.

If perversion is then something well and truly articulated, and exactly at the same level, as you are going to see, as neurosis, something interpretable, analysable, in so far as in the imaginary elements something is discovered of an essential relationship of the subject to his being, in an essentially localised, fixed form as has always been said - neurosis is situated by putting an accent on the other term of the phantasy, namely at the level of the $.

I told you that this phantasy as such is situated at the extreme, at the tip, at the level of the abutment of the reflection of subjective interrogation in so far as the subject attempts to grasp himself there in this beyond of the demand, in the very dimension of the discourse of the Other in which he has to rediscover what was lost by this entry into the discourse of the Other. I told you that in the final analysis it is not the level of truth, but the moment of truth that is in question.

This in effect essentially is what shows us, what allows us to designate what most profoundly distinguishes the phantasy of neurosis from the phantasy of perversion. The phantasy of perversion I told you, can be named, it is in space, it suspends some essential relationship or other. It is not properly (16) speaking atemporal, it is outside time. The relationship of the subject to time in neurosis, is precisely something of which little is said, and which is nevertheless the very basis of the relations of the subject to his object at the level of phantasy.

In neurosis the object is charged with this signification which is sought for in what I call the moment of truth. The object here is always at the moment before, or at the moment after. If hysteria is characterised by the foundation of a desire qua unsatisfied, the obsessional is characterised by the function of an impossible desire. But what is beyond these two terms is something which is a double and inverse relationship in one case and the other with this phenomenon which blossoms, which emerges, which manifests itself in a permanent fashion in this procrastination of the obsessional for example, founded on the fact moreover that he always anticipates too late. Just as for the hysteric there is the fact that he always repeats what there was initially in his traumas, namely a certain too soon, a fundamental immaturity.

It is here because of this fact that the foundation of a neurotic behaviour, in its most general form, is that the subject always tries to read his moment in his object, and even as one might say that he learns to tell the time, it is at this point that we rediscover our Hamlet. You will see why Hamlet can be gratified, that he can take on at the whim of each all the forms of neurotic behaviour however far you push it, namely even (17) character neurosis. But also, just as legitimately - for this there is a reason which runs right through the whole plot, and which constitutes really one of the common factors of the structure of Hamlet - just as the first term, the first factor was dependence with respect to desire of the other, to the desire of the mother, here is the second common character which I would now ask you to rediscover by reading or by re-reading Hamlet.

Hamlet is always suspended on the other's time, and this up to the end.

Do you remember one of the first turning points that I stopped you at in the beginning in order to decipher the text of Hamlet, the one after the play scene, the scene of the players, in which the king was disturbed, visibly denounced himself in everybody's eyes in connection with what was produced on the stage, his own crime, because he could not tolerate the spectacle. Hamlet triumphs, exults, jeers at the one who has thus denounced himself; and on the way leading to the rendezvous already made, before the play scene, with his mother, and which everyone is encouraging his mother to have as quickly as possible; on the way to this meeting in which there is going to take place the major scene which I already accentuated so often, he encounters his step-father, Claudius, at prayer, Claudius shaken to his foundations by what has touched him by showing him the very face, the scenario of his action. Hamlet is there before his uncle who everything in the scene seems to indicate is even not only little disposed to defend himself, but does not even see the threat which hangs over his head, and he stops because it is not the time.

(18) It is not the other's time. It is not the time that the other should have to give an account of himself before the eternal. It would be too good a thing on the one hand, or too bad on the other; this would not be enough to avenge his father, because perhaps in this gesture of repentance, of prayer, there would be opened up to him the way to salvation. In any case there is one thing certain: it is that Hamlet who has just made this capture of the king's conscience - "Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king" - that he proposed for himself, stops short. He does not think for a single instant that his time is now. Whatever may happen afterwards, it is not the other's time and he suspends his gesture. In the same way it will always and ever be, everything that Hamlet does, he will only do it in the other's time.

He accepts everything. Let us not forget all the same at the beginning, and in the disgust that he felt even before the encounter with the ghost, and the unveiling of the background to the crime, simply because of his mother's remarriage, he only thought of one thing, leaving for Wittenberg. This is what someone illustrated recently in order to comment on a certain practical style which tends to be establishing itself in contemporary mores. He pointed out that Hamlet was the finest example of the fact that one avoids a lot of trouble by providing passports in good time. If he had been given his passport for Wittenberg this drama would never have occurred.

It is in his parents' good time that he remains there. It is on the time of other people that he suspends his crime; it is in his step-father's time that he embarks for England; it is in (19) Rosencrantz and Guildenstern's time that he is led, evidently with an ease which astonished Freud, to send them to their death thanks to a piece of trickery which is carried out very cleverly. And it is all the same in Ophelia's time also, at the time of her suicide, that this tragedy is going to come to a close at a moment when Hamlet, who has just discovered it seems that it is not difficult to kill someone, the time to say one... He will not have the time to say ouch! And still there has just been announced to him something which does not seem to be at all an opportunity for killing Claudius. There has just been proposed to him a very fine tournament, all the details of which have been minutely minuted, prepared, and whose stakes are constituted by what we will call in the collector's sense of the term, a series of objects which all have the character of precious objects, of collector's items. You should take up the text, there are even refinements in it, we are entering into the domain of collectors; it is a matter of swords, of carriages, of things which only have value as de luxe objects. And this is going to be the stake for a sort of joust in which Hamlet in fact provoked on the theme of a certain inferiority an advantage for which is accorded to him in the challenge. It is a complicated ceremony, a tournament which of course for us is the trap into which he must fall, which had been engineered by his step father and by his friend Laertes, but which for him, let us not forget is nothing other than once more accepting to play truant. Namely he is going to have a lot of fun.

Nevertheless he experiences in his heart a little warning. There is something in this which moves him. The dialectic of the (20) presentiment of the hero's moment comes here for an instant to give its accent to the drama. But all the same, essentially, it is still at the moment of the other, and in a yet more striking fashion, to support the wager of the other - because it is not his goods that are engaged; it is for his step-father's benefit, and himself as representative of his step-father, that he will find himself getting into this courtly battle in principle with someone who is presumed to be a better fencer than he, and as such is going to give rise in him to sentiments of rivalry and honour thanks to which it has been calculated he is surely going to be caught.

He plunges therefore into the trap. I would say that what is new at that moment, is only the energy, the heart with which he plunges into it. Up to the final term, up to the last moment, up to the moment which is so determining that it is going to be his own moment, namely that he is going to be mortally wounded before he is able to kill his enemy, it is at the other's time that the chain of the tragedy always continues and is accomplished. This is, in order to conceive of what is in question, an absolutely essential framework.

It is in this that the resonance of the character and the drama of Hamlet, is the very metaphysical resonance of the question of the modern hero, in so far as in effect something has changed for him in his relationship to his destiny.

As I told you, what distinguishes Hamlet from Oedipus, is that Hamlet knows. And this moreover more than anything else explains, when we have taken it to this central point, what we have designated as being surface traits. For example Hamlet's madness. There are tragic heroes, in ancient tragedy who are (21) mad, but as far as I know there are none - I mean in tragedy I am not talking about legendary texts - who act mad as such.

Could it not be said that everything in Hamlet's madness is resumed in acting mad? This is the question that we are now going to pose ourselves. But he acts mad because he knows he is the weaker one. And it is interesting to point this out - you see that however superficial it may be I now point it out - not because it takes us any further along our path, but only because it is secondary.

It is not however secondary in the following: we have to reflect on this; if we want to understand what Shakespeare wanted in Hamlet, the fact is that this is the essential trait of the original legend, which is in Saxo Grammaticus, and in Belieforest.

Shakespeare chose the subject of a hero who is constrained in order to follow the paths which will lead him to make his gesture to act mad. It is a properly modern dimension. The one who knows is in such a dangerous position as such, so marked out for failure and sacrifice, that he has to take the path as Pascal says somewhere, of being mad along with the others.

This fashion of acting mad is one of the teachings, one of the dimensions of what I could call the politics of the modern hero. It is something which deserves not be neglected if we think that it is what Shakespeare is gripped by at the moment that he wants to write the tragedy of Hamlet. What the authors offer him, is essentially that. And this is all that is in question, namely what has this madman got in the back of his head. That (22) Shakespeare should have chosen his subject from within this is an absolutely essential point.

We have now arrived at the point at which Ophelia has to fulfil her role. If the play contains everything that I have already developed for you in its structure, what after all is the good of this character Ophelia.

I recall that some people have reproached me for having advanced only with a certain timidity. I do not think I have demonstrated an exceptional timidity. I would not like to encourage you towards these foolish utterances which literally swarm in psychoanalytic texts. I am only astonished that it has not been written that Ophelia is ho phallos, because we find things which are just as gross and just as striking, by people who do not have bats in the belfry, simply by opening the unfinished paper on Hamlet which Ella Sharpe has perhaps regrettably left unfinished before her death, and which perhaps it was a mistake to publish.

But Ophelia is obviously essential. She corresponds to that, and is linked throughout the centuries to the figure of Hamlet.

I would simply like, because it is rather late for me to finish with Ophelia today, to punctuate for you what happens throughout the play. We hear Ophelia first spoken of as the cause of Hamlet's unhappy state. This is the psychoanalytic wisdom of Polonius. If he is sad, it is because he is not happy; if he is not happy, it is because of my daughter. You do not know her; she is the peak of perfection, and of course, I her father would
 (23) not tolerate that.

We see her appearing in connection with something which already makes of her a very remarkable person, namely in connection with a clinical observation, and she was the one who had the good fortune to be the first person that Hamlet met after the encounter with the ghost. Namely that scarcely had he emerged from this encounter in which all the same some rather upsetting things had occurred, when he met Ophelia. And the way in which he behaved with Ophelia is something which I believe is worth reporting.

"My lord, as I was sewing in my closet.
 Lord Hamlet, with his doublet all unbraced.
 No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
 Ungartered and down-gyved to his ankle.
 Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other.
 And with a look so piteous in purport
 As if he had been loosed out of Hell
 To speak of horrors he comes before me.....

He took me by the wrist and held me hard.
 Then goes he to the length of all his arm.
 And with his other hand thus o'er his brow
 He falls to such perusal of my face

As he would draw it. Long stayed he so.
 At last, a little shaking of mine arm.
 And thrice his head thus waving up and down.
 He raised a sigh so piteous and profound
 As it did seem to shatter all his bulk
 And end his being. That done, he lets me go.
 And with his head over his shoulder turned,
 (24) He seemed to find his way without his eyes;
 For out o' doors he went without their helps.
 And to the last bended their light on me." (II i 75)

So Polonius immediately cries: "It's love!"

This observation, and I think this interrogation, this distance taken from the object as if to carry out some sort of identification which is now difficult, this vacillation in the presence of what up to now had been the very object of exaltation, is something which gives us the first phase, estrangement as one might call it.

We cannot say any more about it. Nevertheless I believe that up to a certain point we are not forcing things in designating what is happening at that moment as properly pathological, testifying as it does to a great disorder of Hamlet in his dress, and making it similar to one of these periods of eruption, of subjective disorganisation of one kind or another. It happens in so far as something vacillates in the phantasy, allows its components to appear, allows them to appear and be received as something which manifests itself in the symptoms as what is called an experience of depersonalisation, and which is that by which the imaginary limits between the subject and the object find there to be changed, in the proper sense of the term the order of what is called the phantastical.

It is properly when something in the imaginary structure of the phantasy manages to join up, to communicate with that which arrives much more easily at the level of the message, namely that which comes from below, at this point here which is the image of the other in so far as this image of the other is my ego. This is the way in which authors like Federn [Fairbairn?] mark with a great deal of finesse the necessary correlation between the sentiment of one's own body and the strangeness of what happens in a certain crisis, in a certain rupture, in a certain attack on (25) the object as such and at a specific level which we find here.

Perhaps I was forcing things a little in order to interest you, in order to show you the way these things link up with elective experiences of our clinical work. We will no doubt come back to it. You can however be sure that it is impossible in any case, without this reference to this pathological schema, to this drama, to properly situate what was put forward for the first time by Freud at the analytic level under the name of It is not linked, as some have thought, to all sorts of eruptions from the unconscious. It is linked to this sort of disequilibrium which is produced in the phantasy, and in so far as the phantasy, breaking through the limits which are first of all assigned to it, is decomposed and comes to rediscover that by which it rejoins the image of the other. In fact this is only a hint.

In the case of Hamlet we find afterwards something in which Ophelia is completely dissolved qua love-object. "I did love you once", says Hamlet (III i 116). And things happen in his relations with Ophelia in this style of cruel aggression, of sarcasm pushed to such an extreme which makes of it one of the not least strange scenes in the whole of classical literature.

Because if this note has been struck in really extreme plays, in something which is situated with this really central aspect in the middle of the tragic scene of the Hamlet play, a scene like that which takes place between Hamlet and Ophelia is not a banal scene.

(26) That is what characterises this attitude in which we find the trace of what I was indicating above as the disequilibrium of the phantastical relations in so far as it tilts towards the perverse aspect of the object. It is one of the traits of this relationship. Another of the traits, is that the object in question, is no longer treated as she should be, as a woman. She becomes for him the bearer of children and of every sin, the one who is designated to engender sinners, and the one who is designated afterwards as having to succumb to all sorts of calumnies. She becomes the pure and simple support of a life which in its essence becomes condemned for Hamlet. In short, what is produced at that moment, is this destruction or loss of the object which is reintegrated into its narcissistic framework. For the subject it appears as I might say outside; what it is equivalent to according to the formula that I used above, what it takes the place of, and what cannot be given to the subject except at the moment when literally he sacrifices himself when he is no longer it himself, when he rejects it with all his being, is indeed and uniquely the phallus.

If Ophelia is at that moment the phallus, it is because of this, and in so far as here the subject exteriorizes the phallus qua signifying symbol of life and as such rejects it. This is the second phase of the relation to the object.

Since time is passing I feel a bit scrupulous about giving you all the coordinates, and I will come back to it.

That it is indeed this that is in question, namely a transformation of the formula $S \ 0 \ \leq p$ ($\leq p$ the phallus) and in the form of rejection, this is demonstrated once you have glimpsed by means of something that is quite different to the etymology of (27) Ophelia. First of all because it is not only that that is in question, namely fecundity. Conception is a blessing says Hamlet to Polonius but look to your daughter (II ii 185). And the whole dialogue with Ophelia is indeed about woman conceived here uniquely as the bearer of this vital tumescence which it is a question of cursing and putting an end to. A nunnery could just as well at the time designate a brothel. Semantic usage shows it.

On the other hand the attitude of Hamlet to Ophelia in the play scene is also something in which there is designated this relation between the phallus and the object. Here because he is in front of his mother, and expressly in so far as he is in front of his mother, telling her that here there is a metal which attracts me more than you, he is going to place his head between Ophelia's legs: "Lady shall I lie in your lap?" expressly asking it of her (III ii 117,119).

The phallic relationship of the object of desire is also clearly indicated at that level, and I do not think either that it is superfluous to point out, because iconography has made so much of it, that among the flowers with which Ophelia is going to drown, there is expressly mentioned that the "dead-men's-fingers" that are in question are designated in a more or less vulgar fashion by the common people (IV vii 172). The plant in question is the orchie mascula. It is a question of something which has some relationship with the mandrake which means that this has some relationship with the phallic element. I looked for this in the New English Dictionary but I was very disappointed because even though it is quoted in the references to the term finger, there is no allusion to what Shakespeare alludes to by this appellation.

(28) The third phase is the one to which I have led you on several occasions and on which I am going once more to leave you, the phase of the graveyard scene. Namely the link in operation between something which is posed as a reintegration of o and the final possibility for Hamlet of looping the loop, namely of finally precipitating himself towards his destiny.

This third phase, in so far as it is entirely gratuitous, absolutely capital because this whole graveyard scene is composed in order that this something should happen which Shakespeare found nowhere else, this sort of furious fight at the bottom of a grave upon which I insisted; this designation as it were of a point of the function of the object as being here reconquered only at the price of mourning and of death, it is on this that I think finally I will be able to finish the next time.

Seminar 18: Wednesday 22 April 1959

Hamlet, as we have said, cannot endure rendezvous. The rendezvous is always too soon for him, and he postpones it. This element of procrastination cannot, in any way - even though certain authors in a literature which I have explored more and more, in the course of this study - be set aside. Procrastination remains one of the essential dimensions of the tragedy of Hamlet.

When, on the other hand, he acts, it is always precipitously. He acts when all of a sudden it seems that an occasion presents itself, when some call or other of the event beyond himself, of his resolution, of his decision, seems to present to him some ambiguous opening or other which is properly for us analysts what has introduced into the dimension of performance this perspective which we call flight (la fuite).

Nothing is clearer than the moment when he precipitates himself on something which moves behind the arras, when he kills Polonius. And other moments also, the quasi-mysterious fashion, I would say almost in a dissociated state, when he wakes up at night on this boat in a storm, and checks out the messages, breaks the seal of the message that Guildenstern and Rosencrantz are the bearers of, and also the quasi-automatic fashion in which he substitutes one message for another, restores the royal seal with his ring, and is going also to meet this extraordinary chance of being taken by pirates and parting company with his guards who no doubt will go to their own execution.

(2) We have here something of a real phenomenology, because we must call things by their name, whose easily recognisable accent we all know, since it is almost familiar in our experience, as well as in our conceptions, in relation to the life of the neurotic.

This is what I tried to get you to see the last time beyond these very tangible characteristics, in this structural reference which runs right through the play: Hamlet always keeps to the time of the Other. Of course this is only a mirage, because the time of the Other - this too is what I explained to you when I described the final response in this signifier of the Other as barred; there is I told you no Other of the Other. There is in the signifier itself no guarantee of the truth dimension established by the signifier. It has only its own time. And there is also then only one time, it is the time of his destruction. And the whole tragedy of Hamlet is to show us the implacable journeying of Hamlet toward this time.

What specifies his destiny, what gives it its highly problematical value, is what then? Because this rendezvous with the moment of his destruction is not just the common lot which is significant for every human destiny. The fatality of Hamlet has a particular sign because otherwise it would not have for us this eminent value. Here then is where we are. This is where we had got to at the end of our discourse the last time.

What does Hamlet lack? And up to what point does the plan of the tragedy of Hamlet as Shakespeare composed it allow an articulation, a mapping-out of this lack which will go beyond the approximations that we are always satisfied with, and which also, because we content ourselves with their approximate character, (3) also give the vagueness, not only of our language, of our behaviour, of our suggestions - it has to be said - when we are dealing with patients.

Let us begin all the same with this approximation that is in question. It can be said, that what is lacking at every moment, in the case of Hamlet, is what we could call in a communicable language, in everyday language, this sort of fixation on a goal, of an object in his action, which always involves some degree of what is called arbitrariness.

Hamlet, as we have seen, we have even begun to explore why, is someone who, as women say, does not know what he wants. And in a way this sort of first dimension is presented by him, in the discourse that Shakespeare makes him hold. It is presentified at a certain turning point which is moreover very significant. It is the turning point of his eclipse in his tragedy. I mean for the short while that he is not there, when he is going to take this sea voyage from which he comes back extremely quickly, after scarcely having left port, when he, always obedient, is going to make this journey towards England on the orders of the king. He meets the troops of Fortinbras who is evoked from the beginning in the background of the tragedy, and who at the end comes to clean things up on the stage, collect the dead, put the damage in order. And here is how our Hamlet speaks about Fortinbras. He is struck by the sight of these valiant troops who are going to conquer a few acres of Poland in the name of some more or less stupid warlike pretext which gives him an opportunity to reflect on himself.

- (4) "How all occasions do inform against me
 And spur my dull revenge 1 What is a man
 If his chief good and market of his time
 Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more.
 Sure, He that made us with such large discourse.
 Looking before and after, gave us not
 That capability and godlike reason
 To fust in us unused." (IV iv 32)

What the translator transcribes as la raison, is the great discourse, the fundamental discourse, what I would call here concrete discourse. "Looking before and after, gave us not that capability and god-like reason...."

Here the word raison is in its rightful place. God has surely not given us this divine gift for it to rust in us for lack of use. "Now", says our Hamlet "whether it be bestial oblivion". Bestial oblivion is one of the key words of the dimension of his being in the tragedy -

".... or some craven scruple
Of thinking too precisely on the event -
A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
And ever three parts coward - I do not know
Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"
Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
To do 't. Examples gross as earth exhort me.
Witness this army, of such mass and charge.
Led by a delicate and tender prince
Whose spirit with divine ambition puffed
Makes mouths at the invisible event.
Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare.
Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
(5) Is not to stir without great argument.
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
And honour's at the stake. How stand I then.
That have a father killed, a mother stained.
Excitements of my reason and my blood.
And let all sleep while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men
That for a fantasy and trick of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause.
Which is not tomb enough and continent
To hide the slain? Oh, from this time forth.
My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth!" (IV iv 30)

Such is Hamlet's meditation on what I would call the object of human action. This object which here leaves the door open to what I would call all the particularities on which we dwell. We shall call this oblativity: spilling one's blood for a noble cause, honour. Honour is also mentioned: to be committed by one's word. We shall call this the gift. Qua analysts effectively we cannot fail to encounter this concrete determination, not be gripped by their weight, whether it is of flesh or of commitment.

What I am trying to show you here is something which is not simply a common form, the lowest common denominator, of all that.
(6) It is not just a question of a position, of an articulation which could be characterised as a formalism. When I write the formula $ 0 o put at the end of this question that the subject poses in the Other, which being addressed to him is called the "What do you want?", this question which is the in which the subject is looking for his final word, and which has no chance, outside the exploration of the unconscious chain in so far as it travels around the circuit of the upper signifying chain, but which is not, outside the special conditions that we call analytical, something which can effectively be opened up to investigation without this help of the unconscious chain in so far as it has been uncovered by the analyst, by the Freudian experience.

What we are dealing with, is this something to which there can accord, in an imaginary short circuit, in the relationship half-way between this circuit of desire and what is opposite it, namely the phantasy and the structure of the phantasy, its general structure is what I express, namely a certain relationship of the subject to the signifier, this is what is expressed by the $$ O o$ it is the subject in so far as he is irreducibly affected by the signifier, with all the consequences that this involves, in a certain specific relationship with a certain circumstance which is imaginary in its essence, o , not the object of desire, but the object in desire.

It is this function of the object in desire that we must now (7) approach, since it is because the tragedy of Hamlet allows us to articulate it in an exemplary fashion that we devote this insistent interest to the structure of Shakespeare's work.

Let us get closer. $$ O o$ as such signifies the following: it is in so far as the subject is deprived of something of himself which took on the value of signifier by its very alienation. This something is the phallus. It is therefore in so far as the subject is deprived of something which belongs to his very life, because this took on the value of what attaches him to the signifier; it is in so far as it is in this position that a particular object becomes object of desire.

To be an object of desire is something essentially different from being an object of any need. It is this subsistence of the object as such, of the object in desire, in time, that it has taken the place of what to the subject remains masked by its very nature. This sacrifice of himself, this pound of flesh engaged in its relationship to the signifier, it is because something comes to take the place of that, that this something becomes object in desire.

And this is so profoundly enigmatic because it is fundamentally a relationship to the hidden, to the occulted, it is because it is thus, it is because - if you will allow me a formula which is one of the ones I have written in my notes, and which comes back to me here but do not make of it a doctrinal formula, take it at most as an image - it is in so far as human life might be defined as a calculation whose zero is irrational. This formula is only a mathematical metaphor, and you have to give here to the (8) irrational its mathematical meaning. I am not alluding here to some unplumbable affective state or other, but to something which manifests itself at the very interior of mathematics in a form equivalent to what is called an imaginary number which is the square root of minus one. Because there is something which does not correspond to anything that can be intuited, and whose full function must nevertheless be maintained. It is this relationship I say of the object to this hidden element of the living support, of the subject in so far as in taking on the function of the signifier he cannot be subjectivated as such.

It is because this is the way things are that this structure, in the same way, in the same relationship that we are with the root of minus one which is something that in itself does not correspond to anything real also in the mathematical sense of the term It is precisely also because of this that we can grasp the veritable function of the object only by going around a series of its possible relationships with jfc, namely with the S which, at the precise point where the o takes on the maximum of value, cannot but be occulted.

And it is precisely this tour of the functions of the object - it would be a lot to say, that the tragedy of Hamlet takes us completely around it; but undoubtedly in any case it allows us to go much further than has ever been gone along any other path.

Let us begin from the end, from the point of encounter, the time of the rendezvous, from this act where, when all is said and done - you should take carefully into account that the terminal act, the one in which he finally throws, as a price for his completed action, the whole weight of his life, this act deserves to be called an act that he activates and that he undergoes. There is indeed about this act an aspect of being in at the (9) death. At the moment that his gesture is performed he is also the hart of Diana at bay. He is the one around whom there tightens the conspiracy that has been hatched, I do not know if you are aware of it, with an incredible cynicism and wickedness, between Claudius and Laertes, whatever may be the reasons each one of them has, there being also implicated in it probably this sort of tarantula, this ridiculous courtier who comes to propose to him the tournament in which the conspiracy is concealed.

This is the structure. It is extremely clear. The tournament which is proposed to him puts him in the position of being another's champion. I already insisted on that. He is the representative of the bet, of the wager, of his uncle and step-father Claudius. There happens something which I insisted on already the last time. Namely as regards the stakes, the objects, o, which are characterised there with all their eclat, namely that like any object and any stake they are essentially at first in the world of human desire characterised by what the religious tradition, in exemplary representations, teaches us to name as a vanitas, a sort of finely worked tapestry. It is the accumulation of all these precious objects which are there and placed in the balance over against death.

He has wagered six Barbary horses with Laertes against which this other has put in the balance six French rapiers and poniards; namely all the trappings of a dueller, with everything that is related to it, with what is used to wear them, their scabbards I think. And in particular there are three which have what the (10) text calls carriages. This word carriage is a particularly precious way of expressing a sort of buckle on which the sword is supposed to hang. It is a collector's word, which causes an ambiguity with the gun carriage, so that there takes place a whole dialogue between Hamlet and the person who comes to bring him the conditions of the tournament. Throughout a fairly long dialogue everything is done to display before your eyes the quality, the number, the panoply of the objects, giving all its accent to this sort of test whose paradoxical, even absurd character I pointed out to you, this tournament which has been proposed to Hamlet.

And nevertheless Hamlet seems once more to stick his neck out as if nothing in him can oppose in short a sort of fundamental availability. His response is quite significant. "Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please His Majesty, it is the breathing-time of day with me. Let the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the King hold his purpose, I will win for him an I can. If not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits" (V ii 179).

Here therefore is something which in the final act, shows us the very structure of the phantasy. At the moment that he is at the point of his resolution, indeed as always just on the eve of his resolution, here he is hiring himself literally to another and again for nothing, again in the most gratuitous fashion, this other being precisely his enemy, and the one whom he should kill. And this he puts in the balance against these worldly things, first of all which scarcely interest him, namely at that moment (11) it is not all these collector's items which are his major worry, but that he is going to try to win for another.

No doubt at the stage below there is something with which the others think they are going to captivate him, and to which of course he is not completely indifferent, not as the others think, but all the same on the same plane as the others are situated, namely that he is interested in honour, namely at a level of what Hegel calls the struggle for pure prestige, interested from the point of view of honour in something which is going to oppose him to a rival whom on the other hand he admires.

And we cannot fail to dwell for a moment on the sureness of the connection which is put here, put forward by Shakespeare. You will recognise in it something which is already long-standing in our discourse, in our dialogue, namely the mirror stage. That Laertes at this level is his counterpart, is something which is expressly articulated in the text. It is articulated in an indirect fashion, I mean within a parody. It is when he replies to this very stupid courtier called Osric, who has come to propose the duel to him, by beginning to display before his eyes the eminent quality of the one to whom he will have to show his merit. He cuts him short by doing still better than him. "Sir, his definement suffers no perdition in you, though I know to divide him inventorially would dizzy the arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw neither, in respect of his quick sail." It is an (12) extremely precious, very finely spun discourse that he pursues, which parodies in a way the style of his interlocutor, and which he concludes by saying: "I take him to be a soul of great article, and his infusion of such dearth and rareness as, to make true diction of him, his semblable is his mirror, and who else would trace him, his umbrage - nothing more" (V ii 117).

In brief, the reference to the image of the other, as being that which cannot but completely absorb the one who contemplates it, is here, in connection with the merits of Laertes, certainly presented inflated in a very over elaborate, conceited way, is something which has all its value at that moment. All the more since, as you are going to see, it is with this attitude that Hamlet is going to approach Laertes before the duel. It is on this footing that he approaches him and it only becomes more significant that it is at this paroxysm of imaginary absorption formally articulated as a specular relationship, a mirror reaction, that it is here there is also situated by the playwright the manifest point of aggressivity.

The person you most admire is the one that you fight. The one who is the ego-ideal, is also, according to the Hegelian formula of the impossibility of co-existences, the one you must kill.

This Hamlet only does on a level that we must describe as disinterested, the level of the tournament. He commits himself to it, in a fashion which we can qualify as formal, even as fictitious. It is without his knowledge that he enters in reality all the same into the most serious game.

(13) What does that mean? That means that he has not entered into it, let us say with his phallus. That means that what presents itself for him in this aggressive relationship, is a lure, is a mirage, that it is despite himself that he is going to lose his life in it, that it is without knowing it that he is going precisely at that moment, at once to encounter the accomplishment of his act and of his own death which is going to coincide with it to the nearest instant.

He has not entered into it with his phallus, is a way of expressing what we are trying to seek, namely where the lack is, where the particularity of this position of the subject Hamlet is in the drama.

He has all the same entered into it, because if the foils have their tips covered, that is only part of the lure. In reality there is at least one which is not covered, which at the moment of the distribution of foils is already in advance carefully marked in order to be given to Laertes. This one has a real point, and what is more it is a poisoned point.

What is striking, is that here the lack of constraint of this screen writer rejoins what can be called the formidable intuition of the dramatist. I mean that he does not trouble himself too much to explain to us that this poisoned weapon is going to pass in the fight, God knows how, - this must be one of the difficulties of production - from the hand of one of the adversaries into the hand of the other. You know that it is in the sort of hand-to-hand in which they grapple after Laertes had delivered the blow from which Hamlet cannot recover, and from which he must perish. In a few moments it happens that this same point is in the hands of Hamlet. Nobody has gone to any trouble to explain such an astonishing incident during the session. Nobody in fact has to worry himself in the slightest. Because what is in question is precisely this and it is to show that here the instrument of death, on this occasion the most veiled instrument of the drama, the one that Hamlet can only receive from the other, the instrument which causes death, is something which is elsewhere than what is here immaterially representable.

Here one cannot fail to be struck by something which is literally in the text. It is clear that what I am in the process of telling you, is that beyond this parade of the tournament of the rivalry with the one who is his most beautiful counterpart, the myself that he can love, beyond this there is played out the drama of the accomplishment of Hamlet's desire, beyond this there is the phallus.

And when all is said and done, it is in this encounter with the other that Hamlet is going to identify himself with the fatal signifier. Well then, it is a very curious thing, it is in the text. There is talk of foils at the moment of distributing them: "Give them the foils young Osric. Cousin Hamlet, you know the wager?" And earlier Hamlet says "Give us the foils". Between these two terms where there is question of foils, Hamlet makes a play on words: "I'll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance your skill shall, like a star in the darkest night, stick firey off indeed" (V ii 266). Foil means fleuret in the context. Here foil cannot have this meaning, and it has a (15) meaning that is perfectly locatable, it is a meaning that is well attested at the epoch, even rather frequently used. It is the sense in which foil, which is the same word as the French word feuille in old French, is used in a precious form to designate the leaf in which something precious is carried, namely a jewel case. Here it is used to say: Here I am only going to be something to highlight your starlike brilliance in the blackness of the sky by fighting with you.

Moreover these are the very conditions in which the duel is engaged; namely that Hamlet has no chance of winning, that he will have done well enough if the other takes only three points in twelve against him. The wager is engaged at nine against twelve, namely that Hamlet is given a handicap.

I would say that in this play on the word foil we legitimately find something which is included in the underpinnings of the pun... I mean that it is one of Hamlet's functions to be all the time playing on words, punning, making double entendre's, playing on the equivocal. This play on words is not there by chance. When he tells him, I will be your ecrin [jewel-case], he is using the same word, he makes a play on words with what is at stake at that moment, namely the distribution of foils. And very precisely in Hamlet's pun there is when all is said and done this identification of the subject to the fatal phallus in so far as it is present here.

He says to him, I will be your ecrin so that your merits may shine, but what is going to come, in a moment, is well and truly (16) Laertes rapier, in so far as this rapier is the one which has wounded Hamlet to death, but is also the same one that he will himself find in his hand in order to finish his journey and to kill at the same time, both his adversary, and the one who is the final object of his mission, namely the king whom he must destroy immediately afterwards.

This verbal reference, this play on the signifier is certainly not there by chance. It is legitimate to bring it into play. It is not in effect an accident in the text. One of the dimensions in which Hamlet is presented, and its texture, is in effect this one throughout the text:

Shakespeare, - and this just by itself would deserve a development You see playing an essential role in it these different characters who are called clowns, whether they are called the court fools, who are those who, having a right to speak frankly, can allow themselves to unveil the most secret motives, the character traits of people which politeness does not allow to be approached directly. It is something which is not simply cynicism, and a more or less insulting style of discourse; it is essentially by way of equivocation, by metaphor, by playing on words, by a certain usage of concelli, of a precious style of speaking, of these substitutions of signifiers whose essential function I insisted on here. They give to the whole of Shakespeare's theatre a style, a colour, which is absolutely characteristic of his style, and which essentially creates its psychological dimension.

(17) The fact that Hamlet is a character who is more agonising than any other one should not dissimulate from us that the tragedy of Hamlet is the tragedy which from a certain point of view, literally, brings this fool, this clown, this player on words down to zero. If for some reason one had to remove this dimension of Hamlet from Shakespeare's play, more than four fifths of the play would disappear as someone has remarked.

One of the dimensions in which the tension of Hamlet is accomplished, is this perpetual equivocation, the one which is in a way dissimulated from us, by what I could call the mask or the appearance of the affair. I mean, that which is played out between Claudius, the tyrant, the usurper, and the murderer, Hamlet. That is to say the unmasking of Hamlet's tensions, namely why he acts mad. But what must not be forgotten, is the way in which he acts mad; this style which gives to his discourse this quasi-maniacal aspect; this style of catching ideas on the wing, the opportunities for equivocation, the opportunities to make shine for a moment before his adversaries this sort of flash of meaning.

In this regard there are in the play, texts in which they themselves begin to construct, even to plot. This strikes them not as something discordant, but as something strange which they see as being especially pertinent. It is in this game, which is not just a game of dissimulation, but a jeu d'esprit, a game which is established at the level of signifiers, in the dimension of meaning, that there belongs what can be called the very spirit of the play.

It is within this ambiguous disposition which makes of all Hamlet's remarks, and at the same time of the reaction of those around him, a problem in which the spectator himself, the listener, is lost and continually questions himself, it is there that the base must be situated, the plane on which the play (18) Hamlet takes on its import.

I am recalling it here only to indicate to you that there is nothing either arbitrary or excessive in giving all its weight to this little play on the word foil.

Here then is what is characteristic of the constellation in which the final act is established: the duel between Hamlet and the one who here is a sort of counterpart or double more beautiful than himself. We have insisted on this element, i(o), which is in a way at the lower level of our schema, which is found by Hamlet to be remodelled for an instant that he for whom no man or woman is anything more than an inconsistent and putrid shadow finds here a rival who is in his own class. Let us say it, this remodelled counterpart, the one who is going to allow him at least for a moment to sustain in his presence the human wager of being himself also a man, this remodelling is only a consequence, it is not a starting point. I mean that it is the consequence of that which is manifest in the situation, namely the position of the subject in the presence of the other as object of desire, the immanent presence of the phallus which can only appear here in its formal function with the subject's own disappearance. What makes possible the fact that the subject himself succumbs before even taking it in hand in order to become himself the murderer?

We return once more to our crossroads. This very singular crossroads of which I have spoken, whose essential character in Hamlet I have marked: namely what happens in the graveyard; namely something which ought to greatly interest one of our colleagues who in his work happens to have treated eminently well both jealousy and mourning. This something which is one of the (19) most striking points of this tragedy: the jealousy of mourning.

Because I would ask you to refer to this act with which the graveyard scene ends. The one to which I led you three times in the course of my exposition. Namely the following which is absolutely characteristic: it is that Hamlet cannot tolerate parade or ostentation, and he articulates as such what is intolerable in the attitude of Laertes at the moment of his sister's burial. This ostentatious mourning in his partner, this is the very thing by which he finds himself torn away from himself, upset, shaken to his foundations to the point of not being able to tolerate it as such.

And the first rivalry, this one much more authentic - because if it is with all the apparatus of courtliness and with a covered foil that Hamlet approaches the duel, it is at Laertes' throat that he leaps in the hole into which the body of Ophelia has just been lowered, to tell him:

"'Swounds, show me what thou'lt do.
 Woo't weep? Woo't fight? Woo't fast? Woo't tear thyself?
 Woo't drink up eisel? Eat a crocodile?
 I'll do't. Dost thou come here to whine?
 To outface me with leaping in her grave?
 Be buried quick with her, and so will I.
 And if thou prate of mountains, let them throw
 Millions of acres on us, till our ground,
 Singeing his pate against the burning zone,
 Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou'lt mouth
 I'll rant as well as thou." (V i 297).

And everybody is scandalised by this, and hurries to separate these enemy brothers who are trying to strangle one another. And Hamlet again makes one of these remarks speaking to his partner: "What is the reason that you use me thus? I loved you ever. But it is no matter, let Hercules himself do what he may, (20) the cat will mew and the dog will have his day" (V i 313). Which is moreover a proverbial element which here seems to me to take on all its value from certain rapprochments that some of you may be making. But I cannot delay on this.

The essential thing is that when he is talking to Horatio he explains to him: "... the bravery of his grief did put me into a towering passion" (V ii 78). Here we are brought to the heart of something which is going to open up a whole problematic for us.

What relationship is there between what we have brought forward in the form of p O o, concerning the constitution of the object in desire, and mourning? Let us observe the following: let us approach by its most manifest characteristics which may also appear the furthest from the centre of what we are here searching for, what is presented to us.

Hamlet has behaved towards Ophelia in the most contemptible and cruel fashion. I insisted on the character of devaluating aggression, of humiliation ceaselessly imposed on this person who has suddenly become the very symbol of the rejection as such of his desire. We cannot fail to be struck by something which for us completes once more, in another form, in another trait, the structure for Hamlet. It is that suddenly this object is going to take on again for him its presence, its value. He declares: "I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers could not, with all their quantity of love, make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her?" (V i 292) .

It is in these terms that there begins the challenge addressed to Laertes. It is in a way in the measure that the object of his (21) desire has become an impossible object that it becomes for him once again the object of his desire. Once again we believe that we have found here a familiar detour, namely one of the characteristics of the desire of the obsessional. Let us not stop too quickly at these over-obvious appearances. For the obsessional, it is not so much the fact that the object of his desire is impossible which characterises him, even though by the very structure of the foundations of desire there is always this note of impossibility in the object of desire. What characterises it, is not then that the object of his desire is impossible, because it would then only be, and through this trait in this case only one of the especially manifest forms of an aspect of human desire, it is that the obsessional puts the accent on the encounter with this impossibility.

In other words, he arranges things so that this object of his desire takes on the essential value of a signifier of this impossibility. This is one of the notes through which we can already approach this form. But there is something more profound which solicits us.

Mourning is something that our theory, that our tradition, that the Freudian formulae have already taught us to formulate in terms of object-relation. Can we fail from a certain point of view to be struck by the fact that from the time psychologists began to think, it was Freud who highlighted the object of mourning for the first time.

The object of mourning is in a certain relationship of identification, which he tried to define more closely, by calling it a relationship of incorporation with the subject, that it takes on its import, that there are grouped together, that there are organised, the manifestations of mourning. So, are we not able to try, to re-articulate more closely, in the vocabulary which we have learned to handle here, what this identification of mourning may be? What is the function of mourning?

(22) If we advance along this path we are going to see, and uniquely in function of the symbolic apparatuses that we employ in this exploration, appearing from the function of mourning consequences which I think are new, and eminently suggestive for you. I mean destined to open up to you glimpses which are efficacious and fruitful to which you cannot gain access by another path.

The question of what identification is should be clarified from the categories which I have been putting forward here before you for years; namely those of the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

What is this incorporation of the lost object? In what does the work of mourning consist? We remain in a state of vagueness, which explains the blockage of any speculation around this path which nevertheless was opened up by Freud about mourning and melancholia, because of the fact that the question is not appropriately articulated. Let us stick with the first, most obvious aspect of the experience of mourning. The subject is plunged into the vertigo of suffering, and finds himself in a certain relationship, here in some way illustrated in the most manifest fashion by what we see happening in the graveyard scene, Laertes leaps into the grave, and the fact that he embraces, beside himself, the object whose disappearance is the cause of this suffering, which makes of it in time, at the point of this branching off, in the most obvious fashion, a sort of existence which is all the more absolute in that it no longer corresponds to anything at all.

In other words, the hole in the real provoked by a loss, a real loss, this sort of unbearable loss for the human being, which (23) provokes mourning in him, is found in the real, is found by that very function in this relationship which is the inverse of the one that I put forward before you under the name of Verwerfung.

Just as what is rejected in the symbolic reappears in the real, that these formulae should be taken in the literal sense, likewise the Verwerfung, the hole of the loss in the real of something which is properly speaking the intolerable dimension presented to human experience which is, not the experience of one's own death, which nobody has, but that of the death of someone else, who is for us an essential being.

This is a hole in the real, it is found in the real, and because of this fact is found, and because of the same correspondence which in the one that I articulated in the Verwerfung, to offer the place where there is projected precisely this missing signifier, this essential signifier, o, as such, in the structure of the Other, this signifier whose accent makes the Other powerless to give you your response. This signifier which you cannot pay for except with your flesh and your blood, this signifier which is essentially the phallus under the veil.

It is because this signifier finds its place there, and at the same time cannot find it, because this signifier cannot be articulated at the level of the Other, that there come, as in psychosis - and this is the way in which mourning is like psychosis - to proliferate instead of it all the images that the phenomena of mourning give rise to, the phenomena in the foreground being those through which there is manifested not one or other particular madness, but one of the most essential (24) collective madnesses of the human community as such, namely that which is put here in the forefront, given pride of place in the tragedy of Hamlet, namely the ghost, the fantome, this image which can surprise the soul of each and every one of us.

If with respect to the dead person, the one who had just died, something has not been performed which are called rites: rites destined when all is said and done for what? What are funeral rites? The rites through which we satisfy what is called the memory of the dead person, what are they if not the total.

massive intervention from earth to heaven of the whole symbolic operation. I would like to have the time to do some seminars with you on this subject of funeral rites by way of ethnological investigation. I remember, it is many years ago, spending some time on a book which is a really admirable illustration of this, and which takes on all its exemplary value for us, because it comes from a civilisation distant enough from our own for the features of this function to appear really in a striking way.

It is the Li Ki, one of the sacred Chinese books. The macrocosmic character of funeral rites, namely the fact that in effect there is nothing which can fill with signifier this hole in the real, except the totality of the signifier, the work accomplished at a level of the logos - I say this in order not to say at the level of the group or of the community (naturally it is the group and the community qua culturally signified that are its supports) - the work of mourning presents itself in the first place as a satisfaction made to what is produced in terms of disorder because of the insufficiency of all the signifying elements to face up to the hole created in existence by the total bringing into play of the whole signifying system for the least (25) bereavement (deuil).

And this is what explains to us that all the beliefs of folklore essentially set up the closest relationship between the fact that something was lacking, elided, or refused in terms of this satisfaction to the dead person, and the fact that there are produced these phenomena which correspond to the ascendancy, to the coming into play, to the putting into operation of ghosts and of the spirits of the dead at the place left free by the signifying rite.

And here there appears to us a new dimension of the tragedy of Hamlet. I told you at the beginning, it is a tragedy of the subterranean world. The ghost rises up because of an unexpiatable offence. Ophelia appears in this perspective, neutral, nothing other than a victim offered up for this primordial offence. The murder of Polonius and the ridiculous dragging of his corpse by the feet, by Hamlet who becomes suddenly literally wild, and amuses himself by flouting everyone who asks him where the corpse is, and who amuses himself by proposing a whole series of enigmas in very bad taste the high point of which culminates in the formula "Hide fox, and all after", (IV ii 33), which is obviously a reference to a kind of game of hide-and-seek. Which means, the fox is hidden, let us run after him; the murder of Polonius and and this extraordinary scene of the corpse hidden in defiance of the sensitivities, and the worries of the whole entourage is again only a mockery of what is in question, namely an unsatisfied mourning (deuil).

(26) We have here, in something the last word on which as you see I was not able to give you today, this perspective, this relationship between the formula $ o o, the phantasy, and something which appears paradoxically distant from it, namely the relation to the object in so far as mourning allows us to clarify it.

Next day we are going to continue in detail, by showing, by taking up the detours of the play Hamlet in so far as it allows us to satisfy the economy which is closely linked here of the real, the imaginary and the symbolic.

Perhaps in the course of this many of your preconceived ideas will break down, will even I hope be shattered, but I think you will be well enough prepared for this by the fact that because we are commenting on a tragedy in which there is no shortage of corpses, this sort of purely ideational damage will appear to you, when compared to the damage left behind him by Hamlet, as not amounting to much, and that to speak plainly you will console yourselves about the difficult path that I make you follow with this Hamlet-like formula, on ne fait pas d'hamlet sens casser des oeufs.

Seminar 19: Wednesday 29 April 1959

If the tragedy of Hamlet is the tragedy of desire, it is time to notice - this is where I had led you to at the end of my last lecture - as we come to the end of our course what is always noticed at the end, namely what is most obvious - I do not know in effect whether any author has dwelt simply on this remark which is all the same difficult to overlook once it has been formulated - that from the beginning to the end of Hamlet there is talk of nothing but mourning (deuil).

Hamlet's first remark concerns this scandal, his mother's precipitous marriage. This marriage which the mother herself in her anxiety, her anxiety to know what is troubling her beloved son, herself calls "our o'erhasty marriage": "I doubt it is no other but the main, his father's death and our o'erhasty marriage" (II ii 56). No need to remind you of those words of Hamlet about the left-overs of the funeral meal which are used for the wedding breakfast: "Thrift, thrift, Horatio I" (Economie, economie), indicating with this term something which reminds us that in our exploration of the world of the object, in this articulation which is that of modern society between what we call use-value and exchange-value with all the notions that are engendered around it, there is something perhaps that the analysis overlooks - I mean the Marxist, economic analysis, in so far as it dominates the thinking of our epoch - and whose power and breadth we meet at every moment, which are ritual-values.

Again because we pick them up unceasingly in our experience, it would perhaps be useful to separate them out, to articulate them as essential. I already alluded the time before last, to this function of ritual in mourning. It is by means of this (2) mediation which ritual introduces to what bereavement (deuil) opens up in terms of a gap somewhere; more exactly in the way in which it comes to coincide, to put at the centre of an essential gap, the major symbolic gap, the symbolic lack, the point x in short about which one can say that when Freud alludes somewhere to the navel of the dream perhaps he is evoking precisely the psychological correspondent of this.

So that on the question of mourning we cannot but be struck that in all these major bereavements, which are put in question in Hamlet, this always returns: that the rites were abbreviated, clandestine.

and articulate this principle in a fashion which throughout analysis is never presented as complete, concluded, accomplished, satisfying. This perpetual movement, dialectical slipping, which is the movement and the life of analytic research, is something which bears witness to the specificity of the problem that this research is grappling with.

In the presence of this, everything that our research involves in terms of mistakes, of confusion, of uncertainty even in its principles, everything that this brings into its practice in terms of ambiguity - I mean of always finding not only before oneself, but in one's very practice what is precisely its principle, what one wanted to avoid, namely suggestion, persuasion, construction, even mystagogy - all these contradictions in the analytic movement only serve to accentuate further the specificity of the Freudian thing.

(3) This thing we envisage this year by hypothesis, sustained by the whole concentric progress of our previous research, in the following form, namely that this thing is desire. And at the same time, at the moment that we articulate this formula, we notice a kind of contradiction coming from the fact that our whole effort seems to be working in the direction of making this desire lose its value, its original accent, without however our being able to put our finger on, indeed ensure that experience shows us, that it is indeed with its original accent that we have to deal with it.

Desire is not something that we can consider as reduced, normalised, functioning through the exigencies of a sort of organic preformation which would lead us in advance onto the traced-out path and way on which we would have to make it enter, bring it back to. Desire, from the origin of the analytic articulation by Freud, is presented with this characteristic that lust in English means convoitise as well as luxure, the same word which is in Lustprinzip. And you know that in German it conserves all the ambiguity of pleasure and of desire.

This something which presents itself at first in experience as disturbance, as something which disturbs the perception of the object, a something also which the maledictions of poets and of moralists show us also degrades this object, disorganises it, debases it, in any case shakes it, sometimes goes so far as to dissolve the very person who perceives it, namely the subject.

(4) This accent is certainly articulated as a principle of the Freudian position in the measure that the placing of Lust in the foreground as it is articulated in Freud is presented to us in a radically different fashion from anything that was previously articulated concerning the principle of desire. And it is presented to us in Freud as being opposed in its origin and its source to the reality principle. The accent of the original experience of desire is preserved in Freud as being opposed, contrary to the construction of reality. Desire is specified as being marked, accentuated by the blind character of its search;

as something which is presented as being the torment of man, and which effectively includes a contradiction in the search for what up to then, for all of those who had tried to articulate the meaning of the ways of man in his searchings, of everything that up to then had always been articulated in principle as being man's search for his good.

The pleasure principle, throughout all philosophical and moralistic thinking, throughout the centuries, in every original definition by which every moral theory of man is proposed, was always affirmed - whatever it was - as hedonistic. Namely that man fundamentally sought his good, whether he knew it or whether he did not know it, and at the same time that it was only through a sort of accident that there emerged the experience of this error of his desire, of its aberrations.

It is in principle, and as fundamentally contradictory that for the first time in a theory of man pleasure finds itself (5) articulated with a different accent. And in the measure that the term pleasure in its very signifier in Freud, is contaminated by the special accent with which there is presented Lust, lust, convoitise, desire.

Desire therefore is not organised, is not put together in a sort of preformed harmony with the map of the world, as after all a harmonic, optimistic idea of human development might suppose. Analytic experience teaches us that things go in a different direction. As you know, as we have stated here, it shows us something which is precisely the thing which is going to engage us in a way of experience which is also by its very development something in which we are going to lose the accent, the affirmation of this primordial agency (instant).

Namely that the history of desire is organised in a discourse which develops in senselessness - this is what the unconscious is - in a discourse whose displacements, whose condensations are without any doubt the displacements and condensations to be recognised in discourse, namely metonymies and metaphors. But metaphors which as opposed to metaphor do not engender any meaning. Displacements which do not carry any being, and in which the subject does not recognise something which is being displaced. It is around the exploration of this discourse of the unconscious that the experience of analysis has developed.

It is therefore around something whose radical dimension we can call the diachrony of discourse. What constitutes the essence (6) of our research, the place where there is situated what we are trying to grasp again in terms of what this desire is, is our effort to situate it in synchrony. We are introduced to this by something which makes itself heard every time we approach our experience. We cannot help seeing, help grasping - whether we read the account, the textbook of the most original experience of analysis, namely Freud's Interpretation of dreams, or whether we refer to any session whatsoever, to a succession of interpretations - the character of indefinite deferment (renvoi) that there is in every exercise of an interpretation which never presents desire to us except in an articulated form, but which supposes in principle something which requires this mechanism of deferment from wish to wish in which the movement of the subject is inscribed, and also the distance that he finds himself from his own wishes.

This is why it seems to me that we can legitimately formulate the hope that the reference to structure, a linguistic reference as such, in so far as it reminds us that there cannot be a symbolic formation if alongside, and fundamentally, primordially in every exercise of the word which is called discourse there is not necessarily a synchrony, a structure of language as a synchronic system. This is where we are trying to detect what the function of desire is.

Where is desire situated in this relationship which ensures that this x thing which in future we call man in the measure that he is the subject of the logos, that he is constituted in the signifier as subject ... Where in this relationship as synchronic is desire situated? What I think will make you sense the primordial necessity of this renewal, is something (7) we see analytic research becoming engaged in, in so far as it overlooks this structural organisation.

In effect at the very moment I articulated earlier the contrary function established fundamentally at the origin by the Freudian experience between the pleasure principle and the reality principle, could you not at the same time perceive that we are precisely at the point at which the theory tries to articulate precisely in the very terms in which I said that we could say desire is not composed. It is nevertheless composed in the appetite that the authors have to think and feel about it, in a certain fashion in a certain harmony with the song of the world.

Everything is done to try to deduce from a convergence of experience with a maturation what is at least to be wished for as a completed development. And at the same time it is quite clear that all of this means that the authors themselves have abandoned any contact with their experience if they can effectively articulate analytic theory in these terms, namely find anything at all that is satisfying, classical, in the ontological adaptation of the subject to his experience.

The paradox is the following: it is that the further one goes in the direction of this exigency towards which one goes by all sorts of errors - revelatory errors it must be said; revealing precisely that it is necessary to try to articulate things differently - the more one goes along the direction of this experience, the more one arrives at paradoxes like the following. I take an example, and I take it from one of the best authors, from one of those most concerned precisely with a correct articulation not only of our experience, but also of the totality of its data, in an effort also to make an inventory of our terms, (8) the notions that we make use of, our concepts, I am talking about Edward Glover whose work is undoubtedly one of the most useful for anyone who wishes to try - first of all in analysis this is absolutely indispensable, more than elsewhere - to know what he is doing, and also the mass of whose experiences has been included in his writings I take an example from one of the numerous articles which you should read, the one which appeared in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis, of October 1933 (the fourth volume of that year): "The relation of perversion-formation to the development of reality-sense".

There are many things in this article which are important to discuss, even the starting terms that he gives us with the intention of correctly handling what he wants to show us, in particular the definition of reality-sense as being that faculty whose existence we infer by examining the process of reality-testing. It is very important that from time to time things should be formulated.

The second thing is what he calls efficient reality-testing, which for any subject who has passed the age of puberty, is the capacity to retain psychic contact with the objects that promote gratification of instinct, including here both modified and residual infantile impulses.

Thirdly, objectivity is the capacity to assess correctly the relation of instinctual impulse to instinctual object, whether or not the aims of the impulse are, can be or will be gratified.

These are fundamental data which are extremely important, (9) and which undoubtedly cannot fail to strike you as giving to the term objectivity in any case a character which is no longer the one which is habitually assigned to it.

This characteristic is going to give us the idea that in effect something is not lost to the original dimension of Freudian research, because something can be overturned in what precisely up to then appeared to us to be the categories and the orders required by our view of the world. One cannot but be all the more struck by what our involves with such a starting point. It involves in this case a research into what the perverse relationship signifies; this being understood in the widest sense, with reference to reality-sense. I tell you, the spirit of the article implies that perversion-formation is conceived by the author as being when all is said and done a means for the subject of warding off the rents, the flaws, the things which say nothing to him in terms of a coherent reality.

Perversion is very precisely articulated by the author as being the way to salvation for the subject to assure a continuity to this reality. Undoubtedly we have here again an original way of looking at things. I pass over the following: the fact is that there results from this form of articulation a sort of omnipresence of the perverse function. Because also, taking on the task of retracing as one might say the chronological insertions, I mean for example where it would be appropriate to place it in a system of before and after in which we would see set out in steps psychotic problems as being more primitive than neurotic problems and in between the role that drug addiction plays in Glover's system in so far as he makes of it something that corresponds to an transitional stage, chronologically (10) speaking, between the points of attachment, the historically fruitful points, the points in development that the origin of these different afflictions go back to.

We cannot here get into detailed critique of this point of view which is certainly open to criticism as always happens when one tries a pure and simple genetic mapping out of analysable afflictions.

But from all of this I want to pick out a paragraph to show you to what degree of paradox one is led by any attempt which in a way starts out from a principle of reducing the function that we are dealing with at the level of desire, at the level of the principle of desire, to something like a preliminary stage, something preparatory, not yet informed by adaptation to reality, to a first form of relation with reality as such. Because it is by starting out from this principle of classifying perverse-formation with respect to reality-sense that Glover here as elsewhere develops his thought.

I will indicate to you what this involves simply by something which you will recognise moreover in a thousand other writings, which here takes its interest by being presented in a form which is picturesque, literary, paradoxical and really expressive. You will recognise in it something which is nothing other than really what one can call the Kleinian period of Glover's thought. So that this period is not so much a phase of the battle that he thought he had to wage against Melanie Klein on the theoretical plane. On several points one could say that this thinking has many points in common with the Kleinian system. It is a question of the period which, he says, appears at the (11) moment when the so-called paranoid phase of the subject is found to end up with this system of reality which he calls oral, anal, and which is supposed to be the one that the child finds himself living out at this epoch. He characterises it as an external world which represents " a combination of a butcher's shop, a public lavatory," in other words a urinal or even something more elaborated, " under shell-fire, and a post-mortem room," a morgue.

He explains that the particular outcome which results from what is the pivot and the central point of his intention at this moment transforms this world which is as you see in effect rather disturbed, catastrophic, "into a more reassuring and fascinating chemist's shop, in which, however," there is this reservation, "the poison cupboard is left unlocked."

This very nice and very picturesque view is of a nature to suggest that there is all the same some difficulty in conceiving that effectively the approach to reality is something which we should see in a living experience as profound, as immersed, as implicit, as we suppose it to be for the small child, as being that of a butcher's shop, a public convenience under bombardment, and a cold storage room.

There is here undoubtedly something which we should not reject in principle just because it is presented to us in a way that is shocking at first sight, but which can at the same time make us legitimately express some doubt as to the exactitude of this formulation, which in a certain, manifest fashion, cannot cover in a regular fashion the development of the small child, to the degree that one should consider it as characteristic of the modes (12) of adaptation of the subject to reality.

Such a formulation necessarily contains at least the articulation of a twofold reality, one in which the behaviourist experience could be inscribed and another one. The in which we will be obliged, reduced to observe the eruptions in the behaviour of the subject, namely effectively to reinstate from the beginning something which implies the autonomy, the originality of another dimension which is not primitive reality, but which is from the beginning a beyond of the living experience of the subject.

I am going perhaps to have to excuse myself for having laid stress for so long a time on a contradiction which after all, once it is articulated, becomes so obvious, but neither can we fail to perceive what is involved in the fact that it is masked in certain formulations. In effect, we end up with something which involves a serious ambiguity about the term reality.

If reality is considered as having for us anything at all which permits it to be harmonised with a development parallel to that of instincts - and this is the most commonly accepted truth - we end up with strange paradoxes which do not fail to have repercussions in practice.

If desire is there, it is necessary precisely to speak about its original form, and not its masked form, namely the instinct of what is involved in the evolution of what we have to deal with in our analytic experience. If this desire is inscribed in a homogeneous order, in so far as it can be entirely articulated and assured in terms of reality, if it is of the same order of reality, then in effect one understands this paradox implied (13) in formulations which are derived from the most day-to-day analytic experience. The fact is that desire situated in this way involves that it is its maturation which allows the world to be completed in its objectivity. This constitutes more or less a part of the credo of a certain type of analysis.

I want simply here to pose the question of what this means concretely. What is a world for us living beings? What is reality in the sense in which for example Adlerian psychoanalysis, the one which gives the whole share that they deserve to the structuring elements which are involved in the organisation of the ego, in so far as the ego is adapted to make its way in an efficient fashion in established reality, in a world which is more or less identical for the moment to at least an important field of our universe. This means that the most typical, the most complete, form of this world - I too would like to allow myself to give images which will make you sense what we are talking about - adult reality, we shall identify, to fix our ideas, to a world of American lawyers.

The world of American lawyers seems to me to be today the most elaborated, the most developed that one can define concerning the relationship with what in a certain sense we agree to call reality: namely that nothing is lacking in it from a range which begins from a certain fundamental relationship of essential violence, marked, always present in order that reality should be here something which we can say is nowhere elided, and extends to these refinements of procedure which allows there to be inserted in this world all sorts of paradoxes, of novelties which are essentially defined in relationship to the law, the relationship to the law being essentially constituted by the detours necessary (14) to obtain its most perfect violation.

Here is the world of reality. What relationship is there between this world and what one can call a mature desire; what is a mature desire in the sense that we understand it, namely genital maturation? The question undoubtedly can be settled in several fashions of which one, which is the way of experience, namely the sexual behaviour of the American lawyer.

Nothing seems, up to now, to confirm that there is a relationship, an exact correlation between the perfect achievement of a world so well kept in hand in the ordering of all its activities, and a perfect harmony in relationships with one's counterpart, in so far as this involves success on the plane of what one calls loving harmony. Nothing proves it, and there is scarcely a person who would dream of sustaining it - so that this is after all only a global, illustrative fashion of showing where the question is posed.

The question is posed in the following, that a confusion is maintained at this level in connection with the term object between reality, in the sense that we have just articulated it, where it is supposed to be situated, and the relationship of the subject to the object in so far as it implies knowledge, in a latent fashion, in the idea that the maturation of desire is something which involves at the same time a maturation of the object, it is a question of a quite different object to the one that we can effectively situate here. An objective mapping out permits us to characterise the relationships to reality.

This object that is in question is one we have known for a long (15) time. Even though it is completely masked, veiled here, it is this object which is called the object of knowledge, the object which is the goal, the aim, the term of a long research throughout the ages, of what is there behind the fruits it has obtained at the end of what we call science, but which for a long time had to traverse the ways of a non-refinement, of a certain relationship of the subject to the word. Refinement, I mean on the philosophical plane of something which we cannot deny as being that on whose terrain science was able at a particular moment begin from originally. And it is precisely that which.

now, distinguishes it like a child who takes on his independence, but which for a long time was nourished by it, by this relationship to meditation, traces of which remain to us under the name of theory of knowledge, and which in this order approached this term as far as can be, this thinking of a relationship of the object to the subject by means of which knowing involves a profound identification, the relationship to a connaturality through which any grasp on the object manifests something of a fundamental harmony.

But this, let us not forget, is only the result of a specialised experience, historically definable in several branches. But we will content ourselves with referring to the spirit, by articulating it, on this branch which is our own, which is that of Greek philosophy. This effort of asserting, of circumscribing this something which is called an object, involves a fundamental attitude which one would be completely wrong to consider that we can now, once the results have been obtained, elide, as if its position as a principle was without importance on its effect.

Undoubtedly we analysts are capable of introducing the question (16) of what was implied about a position of desire in this effort of knowledge. We will, here as elsewhere, only rediscover something which did not go unnoticed by religious experience which, in so far as it can indicate for itself other ends, individualised this desire as the desire to know, cupido sciendi. That we should find a more radical basis for it in the form of some ambivalent drive of the scopophilic type, indeed even oral incorporation, is a question to which we will only add our little touch, but there is one thing certain, which is that in any case this whole development of knowledge, with what it involves in terms of carrying these implicit notions of the function of the object, is the result of a choice.

Every establishment, every introduction to the philosophical position has never failed throughout the ages to propose itself as being a position of sacrificing something. It is in so far as the subject enters into the order of what is called disinterested research - after all its fruit, objectivity, is never defined except as reaching a certain reality in a disinterested perspective - in the exclusion at least in principle of a certain form of desire, it is in this perspective that there is constituted the notion of object which we are reintroducing because we do not know what we are doing, because it is implicit in what we are doing when we reintroduce it, when we suppose that in all our investigation of desire we can, as virtual, as latent, as having to be rediscovered, as having to be obtained, establish a correspondence of the object as object naturally of what we have explored in the perspective of desire.

(17) It is by means of a confusion therefore between the notion of object, such as it has been the fruit of the elaboration of centuries in philosophical research, the object satisfying the desire for knowledge, and what we can expect of the object of any desire, that we find ourselves led to pose so easily the correspondence of a certain constitution of the object with a certain maturation of the drive.

It is in opposition to this that I try to articulate things differently for you, and in a fashion that I claim is more in conformity with our experience, namely to allow you to grasp at every instant what is the true articulation between desire and what one calls on this occasion its object. This is what I call the synchronic articulation, which I am trying to introduce you to, of the relationship of desire to its object. It is the true form of so-called object relations as they have been articulated for you up to now.

This symbolic formula $\hat{a} O o$, in so far as it allows you to give a form to what I call phantasy - I call it fundamental here but that means nothing other except that it is in the synchronic perspective which assures the minimal structure to what must be the support of desire. In this minimal structure, two terms whose relationship to one another constitute the phantasy, which is itself complex in so far as it is in a third relationship with this phantasy that the subject constitutes himself as desire.

We are taking today the third perspective of this phantasy in making the assumption of the subject pass through o . Which is just as legitimate as making it pass through \hat{a} it being given that it is in the relationship of confrontation to $$ O o$ that desire is maintained.

(18) You have already heard things being articulated far enough not to be, I think, in any way astonished, upset, or surprised, if I put forward that the object o is first of all defined as the support which the subject gives himself in so far as he is failing (défaillir).

Let us stop here for a moment. Let us begin by saying something approximate so that this speaks to you in the sense, as I might say, that he fails in his certitude as a subject. And then I will come back to say it in another term which appeals too little to intuition so that I did not fear to bring it forward to you at first, which is nevertheless the exact term: in so far as he fails in his designation as subject.

Because what is in question rests entirely on what happens in so far, as I have told you, as the subject has as such this desire in the other. It is in so far as in the other, in this discourse of the other which is the unconscious, something is lacking to the subject - we will come back to it later, we will come back to it as often as necessary, we will come back to it up to the end - it is in so far as something, because of the very structure that establishes the relationship of the subject to the other qua locus of the word, something is lacking at the level of the other which permits the subject to identify himself there as precisely the subject of this discourse that he is holding, this something which ensures that the subject disappears in it as such in so far as this discourse is the discourse of the unconscious, that the subject employs for this designation something which is precisely taken at his cost - at his cost not as subject constituted in the word, but as real subject, well and truly living, namely as something which all by itself is not at all a subject - that the subject paying the necessary price for this mapping of himself qua failing is introduced to this dimension (19) always present every time desire is in question, namely of having to pay castration.

Namely that something real, on which he has a hold in an imaginary relationship, is raised to the pure and simple function of signifier. It is the final meaning, it is the most profound meaning of castration as such. The fact that castration is involved as soon as desire as such clearly manifests itself, is the essential discovery of Freudianism, it is the thing which up to then was overlooked, it is the thing which has permitted us to give all sorts of historical views and insights to which diverse mythical expressions had been given, expressions which themselves people subsequently tried to reduce in developmental terms.

The fecundity of this dimension was not in doubt. It should not dispense us from searching in a different dimension than this diachronic one, namely in the synchronic dimension. What is here the essential relationship which is involved?

The relationship which is involved is the following: namely that the paying subject - I am trying here to be as picturesque as possible, I am not always putting forward the most rigorous terms - paying with his person must supply for this relationship which is the relationship of the subject to the signifier where he cannot designate himself, where he cannot name himself as subject. He intervenes with something whose analogue we can find in the function of certain symbols of language, in so far as the linguists distinguish them under the term of shifter symbols, in particular, I have alluded to it, to the personal pronoun, in so far as the symbolic notion, in the lexical system ensures that it is something that designates the one who speaks when it is the I.

(20) In the same way on the plane of the unconscious, which it is not a symbol, which is a real element of the subject, o, is what intervenes to support this moment, in the synchronic sense, when the subject fails to designate himself at the level of an agency which precisely is that of desire.

I know how tiring the mental gymnastics of an articulation raised to this level must be for you. So in order to give you some respite I will only illustrate some terms which are part of our concrete experience.

I said that the o was the effect of castration. I did not say that it was the object of castration. We call this object of castration the phallus. What is the phallus? It must be recognised that in our experience, when we see it appearing in what I called the last time the artificial phallophanes of the analysis - it is here also that analysis proves itself to have been an absolutely unique, original experience; we have not seen it appearing in any kind of alchemy, therapeutic or not, in the past. In Hieronymus Bosch we see a whole lot of things, all sorts of dislocated members, we see the flatus in which Mr. Jones later thought he had rediscovered its prototype. And you know that it is nothing other than a smelly flatus. We find all of that spread over the images in the most obvious way. You cannot help noticing that one does not often see the phallus.

But we see it. We see it and we also perceive that it is not very easy either to designate it as being here or there. I only want to give one reference to this, that for example of our experience of (21) homosexuality.

Our experience of homosexuality was defined from the time that homosexuals began to be analysed. At the beginning they were not analysed. Professor Freud tell us, in the Three essays on sexuality, that masculine homosexuality - he cannot go any further at that time - is manifested by this narcissistic exigency that the object cannot be deprived of this attribute which is considered by the subject as being essential.

We begin to analyse homosexuals. I would ask you to refer at that moment to the work of Boehm as it began to organise itself between the years from 1929 to 1933 and beyond. He was one of the first. I am indicating this because it is quite exemplary. Moreover, I indicated the bibliography of homosexuality when I spoke to you of the importance of articles. The development of analysis shows us that homosexuality is far from being a primordial instinctual exigency. I mean, identifiable with a pure and simple fixation or deviation of the instinct.

We are going to find in a second stage that the phallus, whatever the fashion it intervenes in the mechanism of homosexuality is far from being that of object. That the phallus in question is a phallus that one identifies perhaps hastily with the paternal phallus in so far as this phallus is found in the woman's vagina. And because it is there it is, there it is dreaded, that the subject finds himself carried to extremes and to homosexuality.

Here therefore is a phallus with a quite different import, with a quite different function, and on a quite different plane to the (22) one we first saw.

That is not all. After rejoicing, as I might say, at having caught this hare by the ears, on we go with the analysis of homosexuals, and we perceive that in fact - this is where I refer very specially to the works of Boehm which are particularly clear and confirmed by a vast experience - the image that we will encounter at a later date, in the analytic structurings of homosexuality, is an image which although it presents itself as an appendix - we attribute it in a first sketch to the woman, in so far as she is not yet supposed to be castrated - shows itself when it is circumscribed in a more detailed way as being something which is what one can call evagination, the extra-position from the interior of this organ.

That this phantasy, which precisely we have encountered in the dream, and which I analysed at such length for you, whose analysis I took up at such length with you, this dream of the inverted hood, of an appendix made up of something which is in a way the exteriorisation of the interior, this is something which in a certain investigative perspective proves to be the final imaginary term with which the homosexual of whom there is now question - and there are several analysed by Boehme - finds himself confronted when it is a question of showing him the day-to-day dialectic of his desire.

What does this mean if not that here the phallus presents itself indeed in a radical form in which it is something, in so far as this something is to show in the exterior what is in the imaginary interior of the subject, and that in the last analysis one should almost not be surprised that a certain convergence is established between the imaginary function of what is here in the imaginary in a posture of extraposition, of extirpation, almost (23) detached, but still not detached from the interior of the body, and which most naturally finds itself being able to be raised to the function of symbol, without nevertheless being detached from its radical insertion, from what makes it be felt as a menace to the integrity of the self-image.....

Having given this glimpse, I do not want to leave you there, because this is not what is going to give you the sense and the function of o qua object in all its generality. I have told you; the object in the phantasy, namely in its most completed form, in so far as the subject is desire, as the subject is therefore on the brink of this castrating relationship, the object is what gives its support to this position. Here I would like to show you the synchrony in which this can be articulated. I underline synchrony, because the requirements of discourse will also necessarily give you a formula which is a little diachronic. Namely that you are going to be able to confuse what I am going to give you here with a genesis. It nevertheless has nothing to do with that.

What I want to indicate to you by the relationships of the letters which I am now going to write on the board is something that permits us to situate this acquisition in its place, and this object in its relationship to the subject who is in the presence of imminent castration in a relationship that I will provisionally call the relationship of ransom to that position, because I must also accentuate what I mean by talking about a relationship of support.

How is this synchronic support engendered? It is done in the following way. If we begin from the most original subjective position, that of demand as we find it at the level which is illustrated as illustration, the example which is manifested in (24) the behaviour which allows us to grasp in its essence how the subject is constituted in so far as he enters into the signifier, the relationship is the following: it is going to be established in the very simple algorithms which is that of division. It is essentially constituted by this vertical bar.

$\begin{array}{c c} 0 & D \\ \hline S' & D \\ \emptyset' & S \\ 0 & S \\ 0'' & \\ 0''' & \end{array}$	The horizontal bar being joined to it on this occasion, but not being essential because one can repeat it at every level. Let us say that it is in the measure that there is introduced by the most primordial relationship of the subject, the relationship to the Other qua locus of the word, to the demand, that there is established the dialectic whose residue is going to bring us the position of o, the object.
---	--

As I told you, by the very fact that it is in terms of signifying alternation that there is articulated primordially, at the start of the process, which is the one which interests us here, that there is primordially articulated the need of the subject, that there is established everything which is going subsequently to structure this relationship of the subject to himself which is called desire.

The Other, in so far as she is here someone real, but who is evoked in the demand, finds herself in the position of raising this demand, whatever it may be, to another value which is that of the demand for love as such, in so far as it refers purely and simply to the presence-absence alternative.

I could not help being surprised, touched, even moved, to rediscover in Shakespeare's Sonnets, literally, this term of presence and absence, with a hyphen, when there is question for him of expressing the love-relationship.

Here then the subject constituted qua Other is a real person, as being the one through whom the signification of the demand itself is changed. The one through whom the demand of the subject (25) becomes something different from what it demands, in particular the satisfaction of a need. There is no subject except for a subject - this is a principle which we always have to maintain as a principle. It is in so far as the Other has been primordially posed as the one who in the presence of the demand is able or is not able to play a certain part, it is already in terms of a tragedy that the other is established as subject. From then on, it is from that moment that the introduction of the subject, of the individual, into the signifier takes on the function of subjectivating him.

It is in so far as the other is a subject as such, that the subject at that moment establishes himself, and can set himself up as subject, that there is established at this moment this new relationship to the other by which he has, in this other, to make himself recognised as subject. No longer as demand, no longer as love, as subject.

You must not think that I am in the process of attributing here to some larva or other all the dimensions of philosophical meditation. This is not what is in question. But neither is it a question of this as hidden. It is a question of this in a concrete and quite real form, namely this something by means of which every kind of function and of functioning of the other in the real, as responding to his demand, that in which this has to find its guarantee, the truth of this behaviour whatever it may be, namely precisely this something which is concretely at the base of truth as intersubjectivity, namely that which gives its full sense to the term truth in English, which is employed not simply to express the truth with a capital T but also what we call in a decomposition of language which is found to be the (26) result of a language system, faith or the word. In other words, what makes it possible to count on the other.

That is what is in question. When I tell you that there is no Other of the other, what does that mean if it is not precisely that no signifier exists which might guarantee the concrete consequence of any manifestation of the signifier. This is where there is introduced this term which is manifested in the fact that at the level of the other something is manifested as a guarantee before the pressure of the demand of the subject before which this something is realised from the beginning and primordially in terms of the lack with respect to which the subject is going to have to locate himself. You should note that this lack, is produced at the level of the Other qua locus of the word, not at the level of the other qua real. But nothing real on the side of the other can supply for it except by a series of additions which will never be exhausted, but which I put in the margin namely the o or the c qua other, in so far as he will manifest himself to the subject throughout his existence by his gifts and by his refusals, but which he will never situate except on the margin of this fundamental lack which is found as such at the level of the signifier.

The subject will be involved historically through all these experiences with others; the maternal other on this occasion. But none of this will be able to exhaust the lack which exists at the level of the signifier as such, at the level where it is at this level that the subject has to locate himself to constitute himself as subject, at the level of the other.

It is here in so far as he himself finds himself marked by this (27) failure, by this non-guarantee, at the level of the truth of the other that he will have to establish this something which we already tried to approach above in the form of its genesis, this something which is o; this something which finds itself submitted to this condition of expressing his final tension, which is the remainder, which is the residue, that which is in the margin of all these demands, and which none of these demands can exhaust; this something which is destined as such to represent a lack and to represent it with a real tension of the subject.

This is as I might say the core of the function of the object in desire. This is what comes as a ransom for the fact that the subject cannot situate himself in desire without castrating himself, in other words without losing what is most essential in his life. And indeed it is also that around which is situated this form, which is one of the most exemplary of desire, that which already the remarks of Simone Weil presented to us as follows: if one knew what the miser locks up in his money box one would know, she says, a lot about desire.

Of course, it is precisely to protect his life that the miser - and this you should note is an essential dimension - locks up in something, in an enclosure, o, the object of his desire; and regarding this you are going to see that because of this very fact this object is found to be a mortified object. It is in so far as what is in the money box is outside the circuit of life, is withdrawn from it and preserved as being the shadow of nothing that it is the miser's object. And as well that there is sanctioned here the formula that whoever saves his life will lose it. But this is not to say too quickly that the one who consents to lose it will find it just like that, directly.

(28) What we try to see subsequently is where he will find it. Undoubtedly it is not one of the least valuable aspects of the path that we have taken today to make us see that the path that he takes to rediscover it is going to present him in any case with what he consents to lose, namely the phallus. If there is a moment when he has mourned it, we have indicated this as being an essential step, he can only perceive it, envisage it as a hidden object.

That the term o, qua opaque term, qua obscure term, qua term participating in a nothing to which he is reduced, it is beyond this nothing that he is going to seek the shadow of his life lost at the beginning, this highlighting of the functioning of desire which shows us that it is not only the primitive object of the primordial impression in a genetic perspective which is the lost object to be rediscovered, that it is of the very nature of desire to constitute the object in this dialectic is what we are going to take up the next time.

Seminar 20: Wednesday 13 May 1959

We are talking about desire. During this fortnight's interruption, I tried myself to recentre this path which we are taking this year, and which forces us, like every path, sometimes to make long detours.

In my effort to grasp again the origin, as well as the aim of what we are about, I believe I have also tried to bring about for you again this refocusing which is only one more way to concentrate oneself as our attention progresses.

In short it is a question, at the point that we have got to, of trying to articulate where our rendezvous is. It is not simply the rendezvous of this seminar, nor indeed the rendezvous of our daily work as analysts, it is moreover the rendezvous of our function as analyst and the meaning of analysis.

One cannot but be surprised at the persistence of a movement like analysis, if it were only, among others which have appeared in history, a therapeutic enterprise that is more or less grounded, more or less successful. There is no example of any theorisation, of any psychical orthopaedics whatsoever which has had a career lasting longer than half a century. And undoubtedly one cannot help feeling that what is responsible for the duration of analysis, what ensures its place beyond its medical use and function - which no one when all is said and done dreams of contesting - is that there is in analysis something that concerns man in a completely new, serious, authentic fashion. New in what it contributes, serious in its import, authenticated by what: surely by something other than results (2) which are often debatable, sometimes precarious.

I think that what is most characteristic in the phenomenon, is the feeling that one has about this thing which I once called "The Freudian thing", that it is something that is being spoken 4 about for the first time. I would go further and even say that what constitutes the proof and the most certain manifestation of the authenticity that this thing has, the proof of it is shown every day by the extraordinary amount of verbiage there is about it.

If you take the mass of analytic productions, what strikes you, is this effort of the authors who when all is said and done are always slipping away from grasping the principle of its activity.

and articulate this principle in a fashion which throughout analysis is never presented as complete, concluded, accomplished, satisfying. This perpetual movement, dialectical slipping, which is the movement and the life of analytic research, is something which bears witness to the specificity of the problem that this research is grappling with.

In the presence of this, everything that our research involves in terms of mistakes, of confusion, of uncertainty even in its principles, everything that this brings into its practice in terms of ambiguity - I mean of always finding not only before oneself, but in one's very practice what is precisely its principle, what one wanted to avoid, namely suggestion, persuasion, construction, even mystagogy - all these contradictions in the analytic movement only serve to accentuate further the specificity of the Freudian thing.

(3) This thing we envisage this year by hypothesis, sustained by the whole concentric progress of our previous research, in the following form, namely that this thing is desire. And at the same time, at the moment that we articulate this formula, we notice a kind of contradiction coming from the fact that our whole effort seems to be working in the direction of making this desire lose its value, its original accent, without however our being able to put our finger on, indeed ensure that experience shows us, that it is indeed with its original accent that we have to deal with it.

Desire is not something that we can consider as reduced, normalised, functioning through the exigencies of a sort of organic preformation which would lead us in advance onto the traced-out path and way on which we would have to make it enter, bring it back to. Desire, from the origin of the analytic articulation by Freud, is presented with this characteristic that lust in English means convoitise as well as luxure, the same word which is in Lustprinzip. And you know that in German it conserves all the ambiguity of pleasure and of desire.

This something which presents itself at first in experience as disturbance, as something which disturbs the perception of the object, a something also which the maledictions of poets and of moralists show us also degrades this object, disorganises it, debases it, in any case shakes it, sometimes goes so far as to dissolve the very person who perceives it, namely the subject.

(4) This accent is certainly articulated as a principle of the Freudian position in the measure that the placing of Lust in the foreground as it is articulated in Freud is presented to us in a radically different fashion from anything that was previously articulated concerning the principle of desire. And it is presented to us in Freud as being opposed in its origin and its source to the reality principle. The accent of the original experience of desire is preserved in Freud as being opposed, contrary to the construction of reality. Desire is specified as being marked, accentuated by the blind character of its search;

as something which is presented as being the torment of man, and which effectively includes a contradiction in the search for what up to then, for all of those who had tried to articulate the meaning of the ways of man in his searchings, of everything that up to then had always been articulated in principle as being man's search for his good.

The pleasure principle, throughout all philosophical and moralistic thinking, throughout the centuries, in every original definition by which every moral theory of man is proposed, was always affirmed - whatever it was - as hedonistic. Namely that man fundamentally sought his good, whether he knew it or whether he did not know it, and at the same time that it was only through a sort of accident that there emerged the experience of this error of his desire, of its aberrations.

It is in principle, and as fundamentally contradictory that for the first time in a theory of man pleasure finds itself (5) articulated with a different accent. And in the measure that the term pleasure in its very signifier in Freud, is contaminated by the special accent with which there is presented Lust, lust, convoitise, desire.

Desire therefore is not organised, is not put together in a sort of preformed harmony with the map of the world, as after all a harmonic, optimistic idea of human development might suppose. Analytic experience teaches us that things go in a different direction. As you know, as we have stated here, it shows us something which is precisely the thing which is going to engage us in a way of experience which is also by its very development something in which we are going to lose the accent, the affirmation of this primordial agency (instant).

Namely that the history of desire is organised in a discourse which develops in senselessness - this is what the unconscious is - in a discourse whose displacements, whose condensations are without any doubt the displacements and condensations to be recognised in discourse, namely metonymies and metaphors. But metaphors which as opposed to metaphor do not engender any meaning. Displacements which do not carry any being, and in which the subject does not recognise something which is being displaced. It is around the exploration of this discourse of the unconscious that the experience of analysis has developed.

It is therefore around something whose radical dimension we can call the diachrony of discourse. What constitutes the essence (6) of our research, the place where there is situated what we are trying to grasp again in terms of what this desire is, is our effort to situate it in synchrony. We are introduced to this by something which makes itself heard every time we approach our experience. We cannot help seeing, help grasping - whether we read the account, the textbook of the most original experience of analysis, namely Freud's Interpretation of dreams, or whether we refer to any session whatsoever, to a succession of interpretations - the character of indefinite deferment (renvoi) that there is in every exercise of an interpretation which never presents desire to us except in an articulated form, but which supposes in principle something which requires this mechanism of deferment from wish to wish in which the movement of the subject is inscribed, and also the distance that he finds himself from his own wishes.

This is why it seems to me that we can legitimately formulate the hope that the reference to structure, a linguistic reference as such, in so far as it reminds us that there cannot be a symbolic formation if alongside, and fundamentally, primordially in every exercise of the word which is called discourse there is not necessarily a synchrony, a structure of language as a synchronic system. This is where we are trying to detect what the function of desire is.

Where is desire situated in this relationship which ensures that this x thing which in future we call man in the measure that he is the subject of the logos, that he is constituted in the signifier as subject ... Where in this relationship as synchronic is desire situated? What I think will make you sense the primordial necessity of this renewal, is something (7) we see analytic research becoming engaged in, in so far as it overlooks this structural organisation.

In effect at the very moment I articulated earlier the contrary function established fundamentally at the origin by the Freudian experience between the pleasure principle and the reality principle, could you not at the same time perceive that we are precisely at the point at which the theory tries to articulate precisely in the very terms in which I said that we could say desire is not composed. It is nevertheless composed in the appetite that the authors have to think and feel about it, in a certain fashion in a certain harmony with the song of the world.

Everything is done to try to deduce from a convergence of experience with a maturation what is at least to be wished for as a completed development. And at the same time it is quite clear that all of this means that the authors themselves have abandoned any contact with their experience if they can effectively articulate analytic theory in these terms, namely find anything at all that is satisfying, classical, in the ontological adaptation of the subject to his experience.

The paradox is the following: it is that the further one goes in the direction of this exigency towards which one goes by all sorts of errors - revelatory errors it must be said; revealing precisely that it is necessary to try to articulate things differently - the more one goes along the direction of this experience, the more one arrives at paradoxes like the following. I take an example, and I take it from one of the best authors, from one of those most concerned precisely with a correct articulation not only of our experience, but also of the totality of its data, in an effort also to make an inventory of our terms, (8) the notions that we make use of, our concepts, I am talking about Edward Glover whose work is undoubtedly one of the most useful for anyone who wishes to try - first of all in analysis this is absolutely indispensable, more than elsewhere - to know what he is doing, and also the mass of whose experiences has been included in his writings I take an example from one of the numerous articles which you should read, the one which appeared in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis, of October 1933 (the fourth volume of that year): "The relation of perversion-formation to the development of reality-sense".

There are many things in this article which are important to discuss, even the starting terms that he gives us with the intention of correctly handling what he wants to show us, in particular the definition of reality-sense as being that faculty whose existence we infer by examining the process of reality-testing. It is very important that from time to time things should be formulated.

The second thing is what he calls efficient reality-testing, which for any subject who has passed the age of puberty, is the capacity to retain psychic contact with the objects that promote gratification of instinct, including here both modified and residual infantile impulses.

Thirdly, objectivity is the capacity to assess correctly the relation of instinctual impulse to instinctual object, whether or not the aims of the impulse are, can be or will be gratified.

These are fundamental data which are extremely important, (9) and which undoubtedly cannot fail to strike you as giving to the term objectivity in any case a character which is no longer the one which is habitually assigned to it.

This characteristic is going to give us the idea that in effect something is not lost to the original dimension of Freudian research, because something can be overturned in what precisely up to then appeared to us to be the categories and the orders required by our view of the world. One cannot but be all the more struck by what our involves with such a starting point. It involves in this case a research into what the perverse relationship signifies; this being understood in the widest sense, with reference to reality-sense. I tell you, the spirit of the article implies that perversion-format ion is conceived by the author as being when all is said and done a means for the subject of warding off the rents, the flaws, the things which say nothing to him in terms of a coherent reality.

Perversion is very precisely articulated by the author as being the way to salvation for the subject to assure a continuity to this reality. Undoubtedly we have here again an original way of looking at things. I pass over the following: the fact is that there results from this form of articulation a sort of omnipresence of the perverse function. Because also, taking on the task of retracing as one might say the chronological insertions, I mean for example where it would be appropriate to place it in a system of before and after in which we would see set out in steps psychotic problems as being more primitive than neurotic problems and in between the role that drug addiction plays in Glover's system in so far as he makes of it something that corresponds to an transitional stage, chronologically (10) speaking, between the points of attachment, the historically fruitful points, the points in development that the origin of these different afflictions go back to.

We cannot here get into detailed critique of this point of view which is certainly open to criticism as always happens when one tries a pure and simple genetic mapping out of analysable afflictions.

But from all of this I want to pick out a paragraph to show you to what degree of paradox one is led by any attempt which in a way starts out from a principle of reducing the function that we are dealing with at the level of desire, at the level of the principle of desire, to something like a preliminary stage, something preparatory, not yet informed by adaptation to reality, to a first form of relation with reality as such. Because it is by starting out from this principle of classifying perverse-formation with respect to reality-sense that Glover here as elsewhere develops his thought.

I will indicate to you what this involves simply by something which you will recognise moreover in a thousand other writings, which here takes its interest by being presented in a form which is picturesque, literary, paradoxical and really expressive. You will recognise in it something which is nothing other than really what one can call the Kleinian period of Glover's thought. So that this period is not so much a phase of the battle that he thought he had to wage against Melanie Klein on the theoretical plane. On several points one could say that this thinking has many points in common with the Kleinian system. It is a question of the period which, he says, appears at the (11) moment when the so-called paranoid phase of the subject is found to end up with this system of reality which he calls oral, anal, and which is supposed to be the one that the child finds himself living out at this epoch. He characterises it as an external world which represents "a combination of a butcher's shop, a public lavatory," in other words a urinal or even something more elaborated, "under shell-fire, and a post-mortem room," a morgue.

He explains that the particular outcome which results from what is the pivot and the central point of his intention at this moment transforms this world which is as you see in effect rather disturbed, catastrophic, "into a more reassuring and fascinating chemist's shop, in which, however," there is this reservation, "the poison cupboard is left unlocked."

This very nice and very picturesque view is of a nature to suggest that there is all the same some difficulty in conceiving that effectively the approach to reality is something which we should see in a living experience as profound, as immersed, as implicit, as we suppose it to be for the small child, as being that of a butcher's shop, a public convenience under bombardment, and a cold storage room.

There is here undoubtedly something which we should not reject in principle just because it is presented to us in a way that is shocking at first sight, but which can at the same time make us legitimately express some doubt as to the exactitude of this formulation, which in a certain, manifest fashion, cannot cover in a regular fashion the development of the small child, to the degree that one should consider it as characteristic of the modes (12) of adaptation of the subject to reality.

Such a formulation necessarily contains at least the articulation of a twofold reality, one in which the behaviourist experience could be inscribed and another one. The in which we will be obliged, reduced to observe the eruptions in the behaviour of the subject, namely effectively to reinstate from the beginning something which implies the autonomy, the originality of another dimension which is not primitive reality, but which is from the beginning a beyond of the living experience of the subject.

I am going perhaps to have to excuse myself for having laid stress for so long a time on a contradiction which after all, once it is articulated, becomes so obvious, but neither can we fail to perceive what is involved in the fact that it is masked in certain formulations. In effect, we end up with something which involves a serious ambiguity about the term reality.

If reality is considered as having for us anything at all which permits it to be harmonised with a development parallel to that of instincts - and this is the most commonly accepted truth - we end up with strange paradoxes which do not fail to have repercussions in practice.

If desire is there, it is necessary precisely to speak about its original form, and not its masked form, namely the instinct of what is involved in the evolution of what we have to deal with in our analytic experience. If this desire is inscribed in a homogeneous order, in so far as it can be entirely articulated and assured in terms of reality, if it is of the same order of reality, then in effect one understands this paradox implied (13) in formulations which are derived from the most day-to-day analytic experience. The fact is that desire situated in this way involves that it is its maturation which allows the world to be completed in its objectivity. This constitutes more or less a part of the credo of a certain type of analysis.

I want simply here to pose the question of what this means concretely. What is a world for us living beings? What is reality in the sense in which for example Adlerian psychoanalysis, the one which gives the whole share that they deserve to the structuring elements which are involved in the organisation of the ego, in so far as the ego is adapted to make its way in an efficient fashion in established reality, in a world which is more or less identical for the moment to at least an important field of our universe. This means that the most typical, the most complete, form of this world - I too would like to allow myself to give images which will make you sense what we are talking about - adult reality, we shall identify, to fix our ideas, to a world of American lawyers.

The world of American lawyers seems to me to be today the most elaborated, the most developed that one can define concerning the relationship with what in a certain sense we agree to call reality: namely that nothing is lacking in it from a range which begins from a certain fundamental relationship of essential violence, marked, always present in order that reality should be here something which we can say is nowhere elided, and extends to these refinements of procedure which allows there to be inserted in this world all sorts of paradoxes, of novelties which are essentially defined in relationship to the law, the relationship to the law being essentially constituted by the detours necessary (14) to obtain its most perfect violation.

Here is the world of reality. What relationship is there between this world and what one can call a mature desire; what is a mature desire in the sense that we understand it, namely genital maturation? The question undoubtedly can be settled in several fashions of which one, which is the way of experience, namely the sexual behaviour of the American lawyer.

Nothing seems, up to now, to confirm that there is a relationship, an exact correlation between the perfect achievement of a world so well kept in hand in the ordering of all its activities, and a perfect harmony in relationships with one's counterpart, in so far as this involves success on the plane of what one calls loving harmony. Nothing proves it, and there is scarcely a person who would dream of sustaining it - so that this is after all only a global, illustrative fashion of showing where the question is posed.

The question is posed in the following, that a confusion is maintained at this level in connection with the term object between reality, in the sense that we have just articulated it, where it is supposed to be situated, and the relationship of the subject to the object in so far as it implies knowledge, in a latent fashion, in the idea that the maturation of desire is something which involves at the same time a maturation of the object, it is a question of a quite different object to the one that we can effectively situate here. An objective mapping out permits us to characterise the relationships to reality.

This object that is in question is one we have known for a long (15) time. Even though it is completely masked, veiled here, it is this object which is called the object of knowledge, the object which is the goal, the aim, the term of a long research throughout the ages, of what is there behind the fruits it has obtained at the end of what we call science, but which for a long time had to traverse the ways of a non-refinement, of a certain relationship of the subject to the word. Refinement, I mean on the philosophical plane of something which we cannot deny as being that on whose terrain science was able at a particular moment begin from originally. And it is precisely that which.

now, distinguishes it like a child who takes on his independence, but which for a long time was nourished by it, by this relationship to meditation, traces of which remain to us under the name of theory of knowledge, and which in this order approached this term as far as can be, this thinking of a relationship of the object to the subject by means of which knowing involves a profound identification, the relationship to a connaturality through which any grasp on the object manifests something of a fundamental harmony.

But this, let us not forget, is only the result of a specialised experience, historically definable in several branches. But we will content ourselves with referring to the spirit, by articulating it, on this branch which is our own, which is that of Greek philosophy. This effort of asserting, of circumscribing this something which is called an object, involves a fundamental attitude which one would be completely wrong to consider that we can now, once the results have been obtained, elide, as if its position as a principle was without importance on its effect.

Undoubtedly we analysts are capable of introducing the question (16) of what was implied about a position of desire in this effort of knowledge. We will, here as elsewhere, only rediscover something which did not go unnoticed by religious experience which, in so far as it can indicate for itself other ends, individualised this desire as the desire to know, cupido sciendi. That we should find a more radical basis for it in the form of some ambivalent drive of the scopophilic type, indeed even oral incorporation, is a question to which we will only add our little touch, but there is one thing certain, which is that in any case this whole development of knowledge, with what it involves in terms of carrying these implicit notions of the function of the object, is the result of a choice.

Every establishment, every introduction to the philosophical position has never failed throughout the ages to propose itself as being a position of sacrificing something. It is in so far as the subject enters into the order of what is called disinterested research - after all its fruit, objectivity, is never defined except as reaching a certain reality in a disinterested perspective - in the exclusion at least in principle of a certain form of desire, it is in this perspective that there is constituted the notion of object which we are reintroducing because we do not know what we are doing, because it is implicit in what we are doing when we reintroduce it, when we suppose that in all our investigation of desire we can, as virtual, as latent, as having to be rediscovered, as having to be obtained, establish a correspondence of the object as object naturally of what we have explored in the perspective of desire.

(17) It is by means of a confusion therefore between the notion of object, such as it has been the fruit of the elaboration of centuries in philosophical research, the object satisfying the desire for knowledge, and what we can expect of the object of any desire, that we find ourselves led to pose so easily the

correspondence of a certain constitution of the object with a certain maturation of the drive.

It is in opposition to this that I try to articulate things differently for you, and in a fashion that I claim is more in conformity with our experience, namely to allow you to grasp at every instant what is the true articulation between desire and what one calls on this occasion its object. This is what I call the synchronic articulation, which I am trying to introduce you to, of the relationship of desire to its object. It is the true form of so-called object relations as they have been articulated for you up to now.

This symbolic formula $\dot{a} O o$, in so far as it allows you to give a form to what I call phantasy - I call it fundamental here but that means nothing other except that it is in the synchronic perspective which assures the minimal structure to what must be the support of desire. In this minimal structure, two terms whose relationship to one another constitute the phantasy, which is itself complex in so far as it is in a third relationship with this phantasy that the subject constitutes himself as desire.

We are taking today the third perspective of this phantasy in making the assumption of the subject pass through o . Which is just as legitimate as making it pass through \dot{a} it being given that it is in the relationship of confrontation to $$ o o$ that desire is maintained.

(18) You have already heard things being articulated far enough not to be, I think, in any way astonished, upset, or surprised, if I put forward that the object o is first of all defined as the support which the subject gives himself in so far as he is failing (défaille).

Let us stop here for a moment. Let us begin by saying something approximate so that this speaks to you in the sense, as I might say, that he fails in his certitude as a subject. And then I will come back to say it in another term which appeals too little to intuition so that I did not fear to bring it forward to you at first, which is nevertheless the exact term: in so far as he fails in his designation as subject.

Because what is in question rests entirely on what happens in so far, as I have told you, as the subject has as such this desire in the other. It is in so far as in the other, in this discourse of the other which is the unconscious, something is lacking to the subject - we will come back to it later, we will come back to it as often as necessary, we will come back to it up to the end - it is in so far as something, because of the very structure that establishes the relationship of the subject to the other qua locus of the word, something is lacking at the level of the other which permits the subject to identify himself there as precisely the subject of this discourse that he is holding, this something which ensures that the subject disappears in it as such in so far as this discourse is the discourse of the unconscious, that the subject employs for this designation something which is precisely taken at his cost - at his cost not as subject constituted in the word, but as real subject, well and truly living, namely as something which all by itself is not at all a subject - that the subject paying the necessary price for this mapping of himself qua failing is introduced to this dimension (19) always present every time desire is in question, namely of having to pay castration.

Namely that something real, on which he has a hold in an imaginary relationship, is raised to the pure and simple function of signifier. It is the final meaning, it is the most profound meaning of castration as such. The fact that castration is involved as soon as desire as such clearly manifests itself, is the essential discovery of Freudianism, it is the thing which up to then was overlooked, it is the thing which has permitted us to give all sorts of historical views and insights to which diverse mythical expressions had been given, expressions which themselves people subsequently tried to reduce in developmental terms.

The fecundity of this dimension was not in doubt. It should not dispense us from searching in a different dimension than this diachronic one, namely in the synchronic dimension. What is here the essential relationship which is involved?

The relationship which is involved is the following: namely that the paying subject - I am trying here to be as picturesque as possible, I am not always putting forward the most rigorous terms - paying with his person must supply for this relationship which is the relationship of the subject to the signifier where he cannot designate himself, where he cannot name himself as subject. He intervenes with something whose analogue we can find in the function of certain symbols of language, in so far as the linguists distinguish them under the term of shifter symbols, in particular, I have alluded to it, to the personal pronoun, in so far as the symbolic notion, in the lexical system ensures that it is something that designates the one who speaks when it is the I.

(20) In the same way on the plane of the unconscious, which it is not a symbol, which is a real element of the subject, o, is what intervenes to support this moment, in the synchronic sense, when the subject fails to designate himself at the level of an agency which precisely is that of desire.

I know how tiring the mental gymnastics of an articulation raised to this level must be for you. So in order to give you some respite I will only illustrate some terms which are part of our concrete experience.

I said that the o was the effect of castration. I did not say that it was the object of castration. We call this object of castration the phallus. What is the phallus? It must be recognised that in our experience, when we see it appearing in what I called the last time the artificial phallophanes of the analysis - it is here also that analysis proves itself to have been an absolutely unique, original experience; we have not seen it appearing in any kind of alchemy, therapeutic or not, in the past. In Hieronymus Bosch we see a whole lot of things, all sorts of dislocated members, we see the flatus in which Mr. Jones later thought he had rediscovered its prototype. And you know that it is nothing other than a smelly flatus. We find all of that spread over the images in the most obvious way. You cannot help noticing that one does not often see the phallus.

But we see it. We see it and we also perceive that it is not very easy either to designate it as being here or there. I only want to give one reference to this, that for example of our experience of (21) homosexuality.

Our experience of homosexuality was defined from the time that homosexuals began to be analysed. At the beginning they were not analysed. Professor Freud tell us, in the Three essays on sexuality, that masculine homosexuality - he cannot go any further at that time - is manifested by this narcissistic exigency that the object cannot be deprived of this attribute which is considered by the subject as being essential.

We begin to analyse homosexuals. I would ask you to refer at that moment to the work of Boehm as it began to organise itself between the years from 1929 to 1933 and beyond. He was one of the first. I am indicating this because it is quite exemplary. Moreover, I indicated the bibliography of homosexuality when I spoke to you of the importance of articles. The development of analysis shows us that homosexuality is far from being a primordial instinctual exigency. I mean, identifiable with a pure and simple fixation or deviation of the instinct.

We are going to find in a second stage that the phallus, whatever the fashion it intervenes in the mechanism of homosexuality is far from being that of object. That the phallus in question is a phallus that one identifies perhaps hastily with the paternal phallus in so far as this phallus is found in the woman's vagina. And because it is there it is, there it is dreaded, that the subject finds himself carried to extremes and to homosexuality.

Here therefore is a phallus with a quite different import, with a quite different function, and on a quite different plane to the (22) one we first saw.

That is not all. After rejoicing, as I might say, at having caught this hare by the ears, on we go with the analysis of homosexuals, and we perceive that in fact - this is where I refer very specially to the works of Boehm which are particularly clear and confirmed by a vast experience - the image that we will encounter at a later date, in the analytic structurings of homosexuality, is an image which although it presents itself as an appendix - we attribute it in a first sketch to the woman, in so far as she is not yet supposed to be castrated - shows itself when it is circumscribed in a more detailed way as being something which is what one can call evagination, the extra-position from the interior of this organ.

That this phantasy, which precisely we have encountered in the dream, and which I analysed at such length for you, whose analysis I took up at such length with you, this dream of the inverted hood, of an appendix made up of something which is in a way the exteriorisation of the interior, this is something which in a certain investigative perspective proves to be the final imaginary term with which the homosexual of whom there is now question - and there are several analysed by Boehme - finds himself confronted when it is a question of showing him the day-to-day dialectic of his desire.

What does this mean if not that here the phallus presents itself indeed in a radical form in which it is something, in so far as this something is to show in the exterior what is in the imaginary interior of the subject, and that in the last analysis one should almost not be surprised that a certain convergence is established between the imaginary function of what is here in the imaginary in a posture of extrapolation, of extirpation, almost (23) detached, but still not detached from the interior of the body, and which most naturally finds itself being able to be raised to the function of symbol, without nevertheless being detached from its radical insertion, from what makes it be felt as a menace to the integrity of the self-image

Having given this glimpse, I do not want to leave you there, because this is not what is going to give you the sense and the function of o qua object in all its generality. I have told you; the object in the phantasy, namely in its most completed form, in so far as the subject is desire, as the subject is therefore on the brink of this castrating relationship, the object is what gives its support to this position. Here I would like to show you the synchrony in which this can be articulated. I underline synchrony, because the requirements of discourse will also necessarily give you a formula which is a little diachronic. Namely that you are going to be able to confuse what I am going to give you here with a genesis. It nevertheless has nothing to do with that.

What I want to indicate to you by the relationships of the letters which I am now going to write on the board is something that permits us to situate this acquisition in its place, and this object in its relationship to the subject who is in the presence of imminent castration in a relationship that I will provisionally call the relationship of ransom to that position, because I must also accentuate what I mean by talking about a relationship of support.

How is this synchronic support engendered? It is done in the following way. If we begin from the most original subjective position, that of demand as we find it at the level which is illustrated as illustration, the example which is manifested in (24) the behaviour which allows us to grasp in its essence how the subject is constituted in so far as he enters into the signifier, the relationship is the following: it is going to be established in the very simple algorithms which is that of division. It is essentially constituted by this vertical bar.

$\begin{array}{c c} 0 & D \\ \hline S' & D \\ \emptyset' & S \\ 0 & S \\ 0'' & \\ 0''' & \end{array}$	The horizontal bar being joined to it on this occasion, but not being essential because one can repeat it at every level. Let us say that it is in the measure that there is introduced by the most primordial relationship of the subject, the relationship to the Other qua locus of the word, to the demand, that there is established the dialectic whose residue is going to bring us the position of o, the object.
---	--

As I told you, by the very fact that it is in terms of signifying alternation that there is articulated primordially, at the start of the process, which is the one which interests us here, that there is primordially articulated the need of the subject, that there is established everything which is going subsequently to structure this relationship of the subject to himself which is called desire.

The Other, in so far as she is here someone real, but who is evoked in the demand, finds herself in the position of raising this demand, whatever it may be, to another value which is that of the demand for love as such, in so far as it refers purely and simply to the presence-absence alternative.

I could not help being surprised, touched, even moved, to rediscover in Shakespeare's Sonnets, literally, this term of presence and absence, with a hyphen, when there is question for him of expressing the love-relationship.

Here then the subject constituted qua Other is a real person, as being the one through whom the signification of the demand itself is changed. The one through whom the demand of the subject (25) becomes something different from what it demands, in particular the satisfaction of a need. There is no subject except for a subject - this is a principle which we always have to maintain as a principle. It is in so far as the Other has been primordially posed as the one who in the presence of the demand is able or is not able to play a certain part, it is already in terms of a tragedy that the other is established as subject. From then on, it is from that moment that the introduction of the subject, of the individual, into the signifier takes on the function of subjectivating him.

It is in so far as the other is a subject as such, that the subject at that moment establishes himself, and can set himself up as subject, that there is established at this moment this new relationship to the other by which he has, in this other, to make himself recognised as subject. No longer as demand, no longer as love, as subject.

You must not think that I am in the process of attributing here to some larva or other all the dimensions of philosophical meditation. This is not what is in question. But neither is it a question of this as hidden. It is a question of this in a concrete and quite real form, namely this something by means of which every kind of function and of functioning of the other in the real, as responding to his demand, that in which this has to find its guarantee, the truth of this behaviour whatever it may be, namely precisely this something which is concretely at the base of truth as intersubjectivity, namely that which gives its full sense to the term truth in English, which is employed not simply to express the truth with a capital T but also what we call in a decomposition of language which is found to be the (26) result of a language system, faith or the word. In other words, what makes it possible to count on the other.

That is what is in question. When I tell you that there is no Other of the other, what does that mean if it is not precisely that no signifier exists which might guarantee the concrete consequence of any manifestation of the signifier. This is where there is introduced this term which is manifested in the fact that at the level of the other something is manifested as a guarantee before the pressure of the demand of the subject before which this something is realised from the beginning and primordially in terms of the lack with respect to which the subject is going to have to locate himself. You should note that this lack, is produced at the level of the Other qua locus of the word, not at the level of the other qua real. But nothing real on the side of the other can supply for it except by a series of additions which will never be exhausted, but which I put in the margin namely the o or the c qua other, in so far as he will manifest himself to the subject throughout his existence by his gifts and by his refusals, but which he will never situate except on the margin of this fundamental lack which is found as such at the level of the signifier.

The subject will be involved historically through all these experiences with others; the maternal other on this occasion. But none of this will be able to exhaust the lack which exists at the level of the signifier as such, at the level where it is at this level that the subject has to locate himself to constitute himself as subject, at the level of the other.

It is here in so far as he himself finds himself marked by this (27) failure, by this non-guarantee, at the level of the truth of the other that he will have to establish this something which we already tried to approach above in the form of its genesis, this something which is o; this something which finds itself submitted to this condition of expressing his final tension, which is the remainder, which is the residue, that which is in the margin of all these demands, and which none of these demands can exhaust; this something which is destined as such to represent a lack and to represent it with a real tension of the subject.

This is as I might say the core of the function of the object in desire. This is what comes as a ransom for the fact that the subject cannot situate himself in desire without castrating himself, in other words without losing what is most essential in his life. And indeed it is also that around which is situated this form, which is one of the most exemplary of desire, that which already the remarks of Simone Weil presented to us as follows: if one knew what the miser locks up in his money box one would know, she says, a lot about desire.

Of course, it is precisely to protect his life that the miser - and this you should note is an essential dimension - locks up in something, in an enclosure, o, the object of his desire; and regarding this you are going to see that because of this very fact this object is found to be a mortified object. It is in so far as what is in the money box is outside the circuit of life, is withdrawn from it and preserved as being the shadow of nothing that it is the miser's object. And as well that there is sanctioned here the formula that whoever saves his life will lose it. But this is not to say too quickly that the one who consents to lose it will find it just like that, directly.

(28) What we try to see subsequently is where he will find it. Undoubtedly it is not one of the least valuable aspects of the path that we have taken today to make us see that the path that he takes to rediscover it is going to present him in any case with what he consents to lose, namely the phallus. If there is a moment when he has mourned it, we have indicated this as being an essential step, he can only perceive it, envisage it as a hidden object.

That the term o, qua opaque term, qua obscure term, qua term participating in a nothing to which he is reduced, it is beyond this nothing that he is going to seek the shadow of his life lost at the beginning, this highlighting of the functioning of desire which shows us that it is not only the primitive object of the primordial impression in a genetic perspective which is the lost object to be rediscovered, that it is of the very nature of desire to constitute the object in this dialectic is what we are going to take up the next time.

Seminar 21; Wednesday 20 May 1959

Today we are going to take up our account at the point at which we left it the last time, namely at the point where what is in question is a sort of operation which I formalised for you in terms of a subjective division in demand.

We are going to take this up again in so far as it leads us to an examination of the formula of the phantasy in so far as it is the support of an essential relationship, of a pivotal relationship, the one which I am trying to promote for you this year in the functioning of analysis.

If you remember, the last time I wrote down the following letters for you: imposition, proposition of the demand at the locus of the other as being the ideal primary stage. It is of course a reconstruction, and nevertheless nothing is more concrete, nothing is more real, because it is in the measure that the demand of the child begins to be articulated that the process is engendered, or that we claim at least to show that the process is engendered, from which there is going to be formed this Spaltung of the discourse which is expressed in the facts of the unconscious.

If you remember the last time we alluded, following on this first position of the subject in the act of the first articulation of the demand, to what can be separated out from it as nevertheless necessary concerning the position of the real other as the one who is omnipotent in order to respond to this demand. As I told you, it is a stage that we have evoked, which is essential for the comprehension of the foundation of the first relationship to the other, to the mother, as giving in the other the first form of omnipotence.

(2) But as I told you, it is in..... what happens at the level of the demand that we are going to continue the process of the logical generation which is produced starting from this demand. So that what I expressed the other day in the form that made the other intervene as real subject - I do not remember if it was in this form or in another form that I wrote on the blackboard the fact that the demand here takes on a different import, that it becomes a demand for love, that in so far as it is a demand for the satisfaction for a need it is invested at this level with a sign, with a bar which essentially changes its import.

It does not matter whether I used these letters or not - these are in fact the ones I used - because this is very precisely what can engender a whole kind of which is that of the real experiences of the subject, in so far as they are going to be inscribed in a certain number of responses which are gratifying or frustrating, and which are obviously very essential so that there can be inscribed there a certain modulation of his history.

But this is not what is pursued in the synchronic analysis, the formal analysis which is the one that we are pursuing now. It is in the measure that, at a stage subsequent to the one of the position of the other as real other who responds to the demand, the subject questions her as subject, namely where he himself appears to himself as subject in so far as he is subject for another, it is in this relationship of the first stage in which the subject constitutes himself in relationship to the subject who speaks, locates himself in a fundamental strategy which is established once the dimension of language appears, and which only begins with the dimension of language, it is in the measure that the other being structured in language, by this fact becomes (3) the possible subject of a tragedy with respect to which the subject himself can constitute himself as subject recognised in the other, as a subject for a subject. - There can be no other subject than a subject for a subject, and on the other hand the first subject can only establish himself as such as a subject who speaks, as subject of the word;- it is therefore in so far as the other herself is marked by the necessities of language, that the other establishes herself not as a real other, but as other, as locus of the articulation of a word, that there is brought about the first possible position of a subject as such, of a subject who can grasp himself as subject, who grasps himself as subject in the other, in so far as the other thinks of him as subject.

You see, as I pointed out to you the last time, nothing more concrete than that. It is not at all a stage of philosophical meditation, it is this something primitive which is established in a relationship of trust. In what measure, and up to what point can I count on the other? What is viable in the behaviour of the other? What results can I expect from what she has already promised, this indeed is something on which the most primitive conflicts, the most primitive no doubt from the point of view that interests us, of the relationship of the child to the other, is something around which we see turning, the very establishment and basis of the principles of his history, and also that this is repeated at the most profound level of his destiny, of what commands the unconscious modulation of his behaviour. It is elsewhere than in a pure and simple frustration of gratification.

(4) It is in the measure that something can be based on the other, that, as you know, there is established what we find in analysis, indeed in the most day-to-day experience of analysis, the most radical thing that we find in the unconscious modulation of the patient, neurotic or not.

It is therefore in the measure that before the other as subject of the word, in so far as it is primordially articulated, it is with respect to this other that the subject himself is constituted as subject who speaks. Not at all as primitive subject of knowledge, not at all the subject of philosophers, but the subject in so far as he poses himself as regarded by the other, as being able to respond to him in the name of a common tragedy, as a subject who can interpret everything that the other articulates, designates, about her most profound intention, her good or bad faith.

Essentially at this level, if you will allow me a play on words, the S is really posed not alone as the S which is inscribed as a letter, but also at this level as the Es of the topographical formula that Freud gives of the subject, ca. C a in an interrogative form, in the form also that if you put here a question mark the S is articulated. S, this is all that at this level the subject still formulates of himself. He is at the state of being born in the presence of the articulation of the other in so far as it responds to him, but as it responds to him beyond what he formulated in his demand.

S, it is at this level that the subject is suspended, and that at the following stage, namely in so far as he is going to take this step in which he wants to grasp himself in the beyond of the word, and himself as marked by something which primordially divides him from himself qua subject of the word; it is at this level qua barred subject that he can, that he must, that he (5) intends to find the response, that that also he does not find it in so far as he encounters in the other at this level this hollow, this emptiness which I articulated for you by saying that there is no other of the other, that no possible signifier guarantees the authenticity of the sequence of signifiers, that he depends essentially for that on the good will of the other, that there is nothing at the level of the signifier which guarantees, authenticates in any way the signifying chain and word.

And it is here that there is produced on the part of the subject this something which he draws from elsewhere, that he brings from elsewhere, that he brings in from the imaginary register, that he brings in from a part of himself in so far as he is engaged in the imaginary relationship to the other. And this ... which comes here, which emerges at the place at which there is brought to bear, in which there is posed the interrogation of the ... about what he really is, about what he really wants. It is there that there is produced the emergence of this something which we call o, o in so far as it is the object, the object no doubt of desire, and not in so far as this object of desire might be directly coadapted with respect to desire, but in so far as this object comes into play in a complex which we call the phantasy; the phantasy as such; namely in so far as this object is the support around which, at the moment when the subject faints before the lack of the signifier which corresponds to his place at the level of the other, finds his support in this object.

Namely that at this level the operation is division. The subject tries to reconstitute himself, to authenticate himself, to rejoin himself in the demand directed towards the other. The operation stops. It is in so far that here the quotient (conscient) that the subject tries to attain, in so far as he has to grasp himself, reconstitute and authenticate himself as (6) subject of the word, remains here suspended in the presence, at the level of the other, of the appearance of this remainder through which he himself, the subject, supplies, pays the ransom, manages to replace the lack at the level of the other, of the signifier which corresponds to him.

It is in so far as this quotient (conscient), and this remainder, remain here in the presence of one another, and as one might say are sustained one by the other, that the phantasy is nothing other than the perpetual affronting of this S; of this S in so far as it marks this moment of fatigue of the subject in which the subject finds nothing in the other which guarantees him in a fashion that is sure and certain, which authenticates him, which allows him to situate himself and to name himself at the level of the discourse of the other, namely qua subject of the unconscious. It is responding to this moment that there emerges, as supplying for the signifier which is lacking, this imaginary element which we call in the most general form, as a correlative term of the structure of the phantasy, of support for S as such at the moment that he tries to indicate himself as subject of the unconscious discourse.

It seems to me that here I have no more to say about this; that I am nevertheless going to say more about it to remind you what this means in the Freudian discourse; for example the "Wo Es war soil Ich werden". "I must come to be where it was". It is very precise, it is this Ich which is not das Ich which is not the ego, which is an Ich, the Ich used as subject of the sentence. Where it has been, the place where it speaks. Where it speaks, namely where a moment before there was something which is unconscious desire, I must designate myself there, there I must be this I which is the goal, the end, the term of analysis (7) before it is named, before it is formed, before it is articulated, if indeed it ever is, because as well in the Freudian formula this soil Ich werden, this "it must be, this I must become", is the subject of a becoming, of a duty which is proposed to you.

We must reconquer the lost field of the being of the subject as Freud says in the same sentence in a nice comparison, like the reconquest by Holland from the Zuider Zee of lands which could be peacefully conquered. This field of the unconscious which we must win in the great analytic work, is indeed what is in question. But before this is done there where it has been, what designates for us the place of this I which must come to birth? What designates it for us, is the index of what? Very exactly of what is in question, of desire. Of desire in so far as it is the function and the term of what is in question in the unconscious.

And desire is here sustained by the opposition, the coexistence of two terms which are here the i, the subject in so far as precisely at this limit he loses himself, as there that the unconscious begins - which means that there is not purely and simply the privation of something which might be called consciousness. The fact is that another dimension begins in which it is no longer possible for him to know, where he is no longer consciousness (consciencia).

Here every possibility of naming oneself comes to a stop. But this stopping point is also the index, the index which is put forward, which is the major function whatever may be the appearances of what at that moment is sustained before him as the object which fascinates him, but which is also what keeps him from being purely and simply cancelled out, losing consciousness (8) of his existence. And this is what constitutes the structure of what we call the phantasy.

This is what we are going to dwell on today. We are going to see what this formula of the phantasy involves in its general application. So we are going to take it, because we said the last time that it was in its synchronic function, namely because of the place it occupies in this reference of the subject to himself, of the subject to what he is at the level of the unconscious when - I will not say he questions himself about what he is - when he is in short carried by the question about what he is. Which is the definition of neurosis.

Let us pause first of all at the formal properties, as analytic experience allows us to recognise them, of this object o in so far as it intervenes in the structure of the phantasy.

The subject, we say, is on the brink of this failing nomination which is the structural role of what is aimed at at the moment of desire. And he is at the point where he undergoes, as I might say, to the maximum, to the highest point, what can be called the virulence of the logos in so far as he encounters himself at the high point of the alienating effect of his implication in the logos.

This grip on man within the fundamental combinatory, which gives its essential characteristic to the logos is a question which people other than myself have to resolve in terms of what it means. I mean, what does it mean that man is necessary for (9) this action of the logos in the world. But here what we have to see, is what the result is for man, and how man faces up to it, how he sustains it.

The first formula which may come to us, is that he must sustain it really, that he must sustain it in his reality, of himself as real; namely indeed with what always remains most mysterious in him.

A detour would not be out of place here. It is for us to try to apprehend - it is moreover what some of you have been asking yourselves for a long time - what in the last analysis the meaning of this use that we make here of the term real may be, in so far as we oppose it to the symbolic and the imaginary.

It must be said that if psychoanalysis, if the Freudian experience comes at the right time in our epoch, it is certainly not indifferent to state that it is in so far as there has arisen for us with the greatest insistence what I can describe as a crisis of the theory of knowledge, or of knowledge itself. Indeed this point to which the last time I already tried to draw your attention, namely what the adventure of science signifies, how it was created, grafted onto, linked into this long culture which was a rather biased or what we could call an incomplete standpoint, which was this withdrawal of man to certain positions of being present to the world which were first of all contemplative positions, those which implied not the position of (10) desire - I pointed it out to you no doubt - but the choice, the election of a certain form of this desire; a desire, I said, for knowledge, a desire to know. Undoubtedly we can specify it as a discipline, an acesis, a choice, and we know what has emerged from it, namely science, or modern science, or science in so far as one can say that it is distinguished for us by this exceptional hold on the world which in a certain way reassures us when we are speaking about reality.

We know that we have some hold on the real, but what is it in fact? Is it a hold derived from knowledge - and here I can only indicate the questions for you - does it not seem at the first approach, at the first apprehension that we have of what results from this process, is that undoubtedly at the point that we have got to, at the point especially of the elaboration of the physical sciences, which is the form where the greatest success has been achieved of the hold of our symbolic chains on something which we call the experiment, the constructed experiment, does it not seem that we have less than ever the feeling of attaining this something which in the ideals of early philosophy, of philosophy at its beginnings, was preposed as the end, the recompense of the effort of the philosopher, of the wise man, namely this participation, this knowledge, this identification to being which was aimed at, and which was represented in the Greek perspective, in the Aristotelean perspective as being what was the end of knowledge, namely the identification by thought of the (11) subject, who was not at that time called the subject, of the one who thought, of the one who pursued knowledge, to the object of his contemplation?

At the end of modern science what do we identify ourselves to? I do not even think that there is a single branch of science, whether it is the one where we have arrived at the most perfect results, the most advanced results, or whether it is those where science is trying to make a beginning, to take the first steps, as in the terms of a psychology which is called behaviourist so that we are sure to be disappointed at the final term as regards what there is to be known, that even when we find ourselves in one of the forms of this science which is still at the stammering stage, which claims to imitate, like the little character in Durer's Melancholia, the little angel which alongside the great Melancholia begins to describe his first circles, when we begin a psychology which claims to be scientific, we pose at the beginning that we are going to do simple behaviourism, namely that we are going to be content to look, especially that we are going to refuse at the very beginning any aim which involves this assumption, this identification to what is there in front of us beyond the method, this is going to consist at first in refusing to believe that we can, at the end, arrive at what is in the ancient ideal of knowledge.

There is no doubt here something which is really exemplary, and which is of a nature to make us meditate on what happens when on (12) the other hand a psychology which it, of course if we do not pose it and do not articulate it as a science, is all the same something which poses itself as paradoxical compared to the method defined up to now as being a scientific contribution, Freudian psychology, it tells us that the real of the subject is not to be conceived of as correlative to a knowledge.

The first step where there is situated the real as real, as term of something in which the subject is involved, is not situated with respect to the subject of knowledge because something in the subject is articulated which is beyond his possible knowledge, and which nevertheless is already the subject, and what is more the subject who recognises himself in the fact that he is subject of an articulated chain. That something which is of the order of a discourse from the beginning, which sustains therefore some support, some support which it is not excessive to qualify with the term being, if after all we give to this term being its minimal definition which, if the term being means something, is the real in so far as it is inscribed in the symbolic, the real involved in this chain which Freud tells us is coherent and determines, beyond all the motivations that are accessible to the operation of knowledge, the behaviour of the subject ... It indeed is something which in the complete sense deserves to be named as belonging to the order of being, because it is already something which is posed as a real articulated in the symbolic, as a real which has taken its place in the symbolic, and which has taken this place beyond the subject of knowledge.

It is at the moment I would say, and this is where the parenthesis that I opened above comes to an end, it is at the (13) moment that in our experience of knowledge something is concealed from us in what has developed on the tree of knowledge, that something in this branch which is called science proves itself, manifests itself to us as being something which has disappointed the hopes of knowledge - even though on the other hand one could say that this has gone much further perhaps than any kind of effect that was expected from knowledge - it is at the same time, and at this moment that in the experience of subjectivity, in the one that is established in analytic confidences, in the confidence of analysis, that Freud designates for us this chain where things are articulated in a way which is structured in a fashion that is homogeneous with every other symbolic chain, with what we know as discourse which nevertheless is not accessible to contemplation, is not accessible to the subject, in so far as he might repose himself there as the object in which he recognises himself.

Quite the contrary, he fundamentally does not know himself. And in the whole measure that he tries in this chain to approach, that he tries there to name himself, to locate himself, it is precisely there that he does not find himself. He is only there, in a way which in the intervals, in the cuts (coupures), ... every time he wants to grasp himself he is always only in an interval.

And this indeed is why the imaginary object of the phantasy on which he is going to seek to support himself, is structured as it is. This is what I want to show you now. There are many other things to be demonstrated in this formalisation of 4 O o, but I want to show you how o is made.

I told you, it is as cut, and as interval, that the subject encounters himself at the end point of his questioning. It is as well essentially as a form of cut that the o, in all its (14) generality, shows us its form.

Here I am going simply to regroup a certain number of common traits that you know already, concerning the different forms of this object. For the people here who are analysts I can go quickly. Afterwards I will go into greater detail, and comment on it again.

If what is in question is that the object in the phantasy is something which has the form of a cut, how are we going to recognise it. Frankly I would say that at the level of the result I think that you are already ahead of me. At least I hope so.

In the relationship which brings it about that the S, at the point where he questions himself as S, can only manage to support himself in a series of terms which are those which we here call o, qua object in the phantasy, we can in a first approximation give three examples of it. This does not imply that it is completely exhaustive. It almost is. I say that it is not completely in so far as to take things at the level of what I would call the result, namely of the constituted o, is not a really legitimate step. I mean that to begin there is simply to start you from a terrain which is already known in which you will be able to find your bearings to make your path easier. It is not the most rigorous path, as you will see when we have to rejoin this term by the more rigorous pathway of structure. Namely the path that begins from the subject in so far as he is barred, in so far as it is he who brings up, who gives rise to the term of object. But it is from the object that we will start because it (15) is there that you will be able to find your bearings.

There are three kinds of references to it in analytic experience, well and truly identified up to now as such.

The first kind is the one which we habitually call, rightly or wrongly, the pregenital object. The second kind is this sort of object which is involved in what is called the castration complex. And you know that in its most general form it is the phallus. The third kind, is perhaps the only term which will surprise you as being a novelty, but in truth I think that those of you who have been able to study carefully enough what I wrote about psychoses will not find themselves all the same essentially upset by it, since the third kind of object fulfils exactly the same function with respect to the subject at his point of failing, of fatigue, is nothing other, and neither more nor less, than what is commonly called a delusion, and is very precisely the reason why Freud, from almost the beginning of his first apprehensions, was able to write: "These people love their delusion as they love themselves" (Sie lieben also den Wahn wie sich selbst) rDraft H 24.1.1895].

We are going to take up these three forms of the object in so far as they allow us to grasp something in their form which allows them to fulfil this function, to become the signifiers which the subject draws from his own substance to sustain before himself precisely this hole, this absence of the signifier at the level of the unconscious chain.

(16) Qua pregenital object what does the o mean?

In animal experience, in so far as it is structured in images should we not here evoke the very term in which more than one materialist reflection comes to resume what after all the functioning of an organism is, however human it may be, at the level of material exchanges. Precisely namely - I am not the one who invented the formula - this animal, however human he may be, is after all only a tube with two orifices, one through which things enter, and the other through which things leave.

And also indeed, this is how the so-called pregenital object is constituted, in so far as it manages to fulfil its signifying function in the phantasy. It is in the measure that that from which the subject nourishes himself cuts itself off from him at a certain moment, indeed that on occasion, it is the reverse of this position, the oral-sadistic stage, he himself cuts it off, or at least makes an effort to cut it off, and bites. It is therefore the object qua object of weaning. Which means properly speaking the object of a cut on the one hand, and on the other hand, at the other extremity of the tube, in so far as what he rejects is cut off from him, and also indeed the whole apprenticeship he must undergo of the rites and the forms of cleanliness, so that he may learn that what he rejects is something he cuts off from himself?

It is essentially in so far as that which in ordinary analytic experience we see as the fundamental form of the so-called oral and anal phases, namely the nipple, this part of the breast that the subject can hold in his oral orifice, is also what he is separated from - it is also indeed this excrement which also becomes for the subject at a different moment the most significant form of his relationship to objects ... are taken, (17) chosen very precisely in so far as they are particularly exemplary, showing in their form the structure of the cut, that they are involved in playing this role of support at the level at which the subject himself finds himself situated as such in the signifier in so far as it is structured by the cut. He is himself, on this occasion, the cut.

And it is this that explains to us why these objects, among others and in preference to others, should be chosen. Because it could not be overlooked that if it were a question of the subject eroticising one or other of his functions, simply as vital functions, why should there not be also a more primitive phase than the others, and what looks like a more fundamental one, which is that it would be attached to a function just as vital from the point of view of nutrition as the one which passes through the mouth and ends up by being excreted through the intestinal orifice, this is respiration.

Yes, but there is in respiration no part of this element of cutting. Respiration is not cut off, or if it is cut off it is in a fashion which does not fail to generate some drama. There is no element of cutting inscribed in respiration except only in an exceptional fashion. Respiration is rhythmical, respiration is pulsation, respiration is vital alternation, it is not something which allows there to be symbolised on the imaginary place precisely what is in question, namely the interval, the cut.

(18) This is not to say however that there is nothing which passes through the respiratory orifice which cannot, as such, be punctuated, because precisely it is by this same orifice that there is produced the emission of the voice, and that the emission of the voice is something which is cut, which is punctuated. And this indeed is also why we will rediscover it later on, and precisely at the level of this third type of o, which we have called the delusions of the subject.

In so far as this emission precisely is not punctuated, in so far as it is simply pneuma, flatus, it is obviously very remarkable - and here I would ask you to refer to Jones' studies - to see that from the point of view of the unconscious it is not individualised at the most radical point as being something which belongs to the order of respiration, but precisely just because of this imposition of the form of cutting referred to the most profound level of experience that we have of it in the unconscious - and it is the merit of Jones to have seen it - to the anal flatus which is found paradoxically, and through this sort of unpleasant surprise that the analytic discoveries have brought us, is found symbolised in the depths of what is in question each time that at the level of the unconscious the phallus is found to symbolise the subject.

At the second level, and this of course is only a teaching artifice, because there is no first, nor second level, at the point that we are dealing with here all the o's have the same function.

(19) They have the same function: it is a question of knowing why. They take on one or other form, but in the form that we describe in synchrony, what we are trying to separate out are common traits and characteristics.

Here, at the level of the castration complex, we find a different form for it which is that of mutilation. In effect if it is a question of cutting it is necessary and sufficient that the subject should separate himself from some part of himself, that he should be capable of mutilating himself. And after all the thing, as the analytic authors have perceived, does not even imply a modality that is all that new at first sight, because they recalled in connection with mutilation, in so far as it plays such an important role in all the forms, in all the manifestations of the access of man to his own reality, in the consecration of his fullness as man - we know by history, we know by ethnography, we know by the accounts of all sorts of initiatory procedures through which man searches in a certain number of forms of stigmatisation, to define his access to a higher level of realisation of himself, we know this function of mutilation as such. And this is not the place that I am going to remind you of this whole range and catalogue.

It is simply necessary, and it is sufficient, for me to remind you here simply in order to allow you, on this occasion, put your finger on the fact, that in a different form it is again here a question of something which we can call cutting, and well and truly, in so far as it establishes the passage to a signifying function, because what remains from this mutilation, is a mark. (20) This is what ensures that the subject who has undergone mutilation as a particular individual in the flock from now on carries on him the mark of a signifier which withdraws him from a first state in order to raise him up, to identify him to the power of being different, superior. This is the meaning of every kind of experience of initiatory transition in so far as we rediscover its signification at the level of the castration complex as such.

But also this does not, I point it out to you in passing, exhaust the question. Because since the time I have been trying with you to approach what is in question at the level of the castration complex, you must have perceived the ambiguities which reign around the function of the phallus. In other words, that if it is simply the result of seeing that from some angle it is what is marked, it is what is raised to the function of signifier, it remains that nevertheless the form of castration is not entirely implied in what we can have externally in the results of ceremonies which culminate in one or other deformation, circumcision.

The mark which is made on the phallus is not some kind of extirpation, of a particular function of negating brought to the phallus in the castration complex. We cannot grasp this at this level of exposition. We will come back to it I think the next time, when we will have to explain that which, I am simply indicating it to you today, is the problem which is posed now that we are tackling things again, that we are again making an inventory. It is the question of how, and why Freud could from the start do this extraordinary thing which is to link the castration complex to this something to which an attentive examination shows that it is not all that solidary, namely to the dominating, cruel, tyrannical function of a sort of absolute (21) father.

Undoubtedly this is a myth. And like all Freud's contributions, it is a really miraculous fact, it is myth which holds up, and we are trying to explain why.

It nevertheless remains that in their fundamental function the initiatory rites, which are marked, which are inscribed in a certain number of forms of stigmatisation, of mutilation, at the point here where we are approaching them today, namely in so far as they play the role of o, in so far as they are seen by the subjects themselves who experience them, as being destined to bring about a change in nature in what in the subject up to then, in the freedom of the pre-initiatory stages which characterise primitive societies, had been left to a sort of indifferent operation of natural desires.

The initiatory rites take the form of changing the meaning of these desires, of giving them, precisely from then on, a function in which there is identified, in which there is designated as such the being of the subject, in which it becomes as one might say a man, but also a woman, in the full exercise of their powers, in which mutilation serves here to orientate desire, to make it take on precisely this function of index, of something which is realised and can only be articulated, be expressed in a symbolic beyond, and a beyond which is the one that we call today being, a realisation of being in the subject.

One could on this occasion make some lateral remarks, and perceive that if something is offered up to the effect, to the signifying mark of the initiatory rite, it is not of course by chance that it should be everything which here may offer itself as appendage.

(22) You know as well that the phallic appendage is not the only one which on occasion is employed, that without any doubt also the relationship that the subject may establish in any reference to himself, and which is the one in which we can conceive that the experiential apprehension may be most remarkable, namely the relationship of tumescence, designates of course in the first place the phallus as something which offers itself in a privileged fashion, to this function of being able to be exposed to cutting, and as well in a fashion which will undoubtedly be more than in any other object dreaded, and at risk.

It is here that in so far as the function of narcissism is the imaginary relationship of the subject to himself, it should be taken as the supporting point in which there is inscribed at the centre this formation of the signifying object. And here also we can perhaps perceive how what is here important in the experience that we have of everything that happens at the level of the mirror stage, namely the inscription, the situation in which the subject can place his own tension, his own erection with respect to the image beyond himself which is in the other, allows us to perceive how legitimate were certain approaches that the tradition of philosophical psychologists had already made in this apprehension of the function of the ego.

I am alluding here to Maine de Biran's contribution in his very subtle analysis of the role of the feeling of effort. The feeling of effort, in so far as it is thrust forward, being grasped by the subject from two sides at once in so far as he is (23) the author of the thrusting, but as he is also the author of what contains it, nevertheless in the fact that he embraces this thrusting of his as being as such within himself, here is something which when linked to this experience of tumescence makes us perceive the way there can be situated there, and be brought into play at this same level of experience as something through which the subject experiences himself, without nevertheless ever being able to grasp himself, because here also there is properly speaking no mark possible, no cut possible, something whose link I think should here be located in so far as it takes on here a symbolic, symptomatic value at the same level of experience which is the one that we are trying to analyse here, which is the very paradoxical experience of fatigue.

If effort cannot be in any way of use to the subject, for the reason that nothing allows it to be imprinted with a signifying cut, inversely, it seems that this something whose mirage-like character, whose unobjectifiable character at the level of erotic experience, which is called the fatigue of the neurotic, this paradoxical fatigue which has nothing to do with any of the muscular fatigues that we can record on the level of facts - this fatigue, in so far as it corresponds, is in a certain way the inverse, the sequel, the trace of an effort which I would call signifyingness (signifiantite).

It is here that we can find - and I think that it is important to note it in passing - this something which in its most general form is that which at the level of tumescence, of the thrusting as such of the subject, gives us the limits in which the possible consecration in the signifying mark has vanished.

(24) We come to the third form of this little o, in so far as it can here serve as an object. Here I would not like to be misunderstood, and undoubtedly I do not have enough time in front of me to be able to accentuate what I am going to try to isolate here in all its details. What I think is the most propitious way of showing you what is in question, and how I understand it outside an attentive reading that I would ask you to undertake of what I have written on the subject of "On a question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis", namely what I articulated regarding what Schreber's delusion allows us to articulate in such an advanced, such elaborated fashion, is what is going to allow us to grasp the function of the voice in the delusion as such.

I think that it is in so far as we should try to see the way in which the voice, corresponds very particularly in delusion to the formal exigencies of this o, in so far as it can be raised to the signifying function of the cut, of the interval as such, that we will understand the phenomonological characteristics of this voice.

The subject produces the voice. And I would further say we will have to make this function of the voice intervene in so far as we bring into play the weight of the subject, the real weight of the subject in the discourse. In the formation of the agency of the super ego, the big voice is to be brought into play as something which represents the agency of another manifesting himself as real.

Is it the same voice that is in question in the voice of the deluding person? Is the voice of the deluding person this something whose dramatic function Cocteau tried to isolate under the title La voix humaine? It is enough to refer ourselves to this experience that we can have of it in effect in an isolated (25) form, in the place where Cocteau, with a lot of relevance and flair himself showed us its pure incidence, namely on the telephone. What does the voice tell us as such, beyond the discourse that it holds on the telephone? There is undoubtedly no need here for you to vary, and to make a little kaleidoscope of the experiences that one can have of it. It should be enough for you to evoke that in trying to demand a service in any commercial or other type of enterprise, you find at the end of the line one of these voices which teach you enough about the character of indifference, of bad will, of a will set up to evade whatever may be personal or present in your demand, and which is very essentially this type of voice which already lets you know that you can expect nothing from the one you are appealing to; one of these voices that we will call the voice of an overseer (contremaître). This term so magnificently constructed by the genius of the tongue. Not that he is against the master (contre le maître) but that he is the opposite (le contraire) of the true master.

This voice, this sort of embodiment of vanity, of inexistence, of bureaucratic emptiness that certain voices can sometimes give you, is this what we designate when we speak about the voice in the function that we make it intervene at the level of o? No, absolutely not. If here the voice presents itself well and truly, and as such, as pure articulation - and this indeed is what constitutes the paradox of what the deluding person communicates to us when we question him, and that something that he has to communicate about the nature of these voices always seems to conceal itself in a very particular way - there is nothing more firm for him than the consistency and the existence of the voice as such. And of course it is precisely because it (26) is reduced in its most trenchant form to the pure point at which the subject cannot take it except as imposing itself on him.

And so I also put the accent, when we were analysing President Schreber's delusion, on this character of cutting which is highlighted to such an extent that the voices heard by Schreber are exactly the beginning of sentences : Sie sollen werden etc., and precisely the words the signifying words, which are interrupted, which are pushed forward, allowing the appeal to signification to arise after they have been cut off.

The subject is involved here in effect, but properly speaking in so far as he himself disappears, succumbs, is entirely swallowed up in this signification which is only aimed at him in a global fashion. And indeed it is in this word: it involves him (il l'interesse) that I would resume today, as I am about to leave you, this something which I tried to apprehend and to grasp for you today.

I agree that this session has been perhaps one of the most difficult of all of those that I have addressed to you. I hope you will be rewarded for it the next time. We will be able to proceed along less arid paths. But I asked you today to sustain yourselves around this notion of interesse. The subject is as being in the interval, as being what is in the interval of the unconscious discourse, as being properly speaking the metonymy of this being which is expressed in the unconscious chain.

If the subject feels himself highly interested by these voices, by these sentences without head or tail of the delusion, it is for the same reason as in all the other forms of this object that (27) I enumerated for you today it is at the level of the cut, it is at the level of the interval that he is fascinated, and that he fixes himself to sustain himself in this instant at which properly speaking he envisages himself and he questions himself as being. As a being of his unconscious.

It is around this indeed that we pose the question here. And all the same I do not want to finish, at least for those who come here for the first time, without making them sense what the import is of such an analysis, of this little link which my discourse today is, with respect to those which have succeeded one another for days. The fact is that what is in question here also is to see what we should do with respect to this phantasy. Because I showed you here the most radical, the most simple forms of this phantasy, those in which we know it constitutes the privileged objects of the unconscious desire of the subject. But this phantasy is mobile; if one teases it out one must not think that it can, like that, drop one of its members. There is no example where a phantasy which has been properly attacked does not react by reiterating its form as phantasy.

So that we know what complicated forms this phantasy can reach in so far precisely as in what is called its perverse form it insists, it maintains, it complicates its structure, it tries harder and harder to fulfil its function. Does interpreting this phantasy, as it is said, to be purely and simply leading the subject back to a present of which we are the measure, the (28) present of a reality that we can define as men of science, or as men who imagine that after all everything is reducible to terms of knowledge?

It seems indeed that this is something towards which a whole direction of analytic technique is tending to reduce the subject to the functions of reality, this reality which I reminded you the last day, this reality which for certain analysts does not seem to be able to be articulated otherwise than as being that of what I called a world of American lawyers. Is it not no doubt the case that the enterprise is outside the range of the means of a certain persuasion? Does not the place occupied by the phantasy require of us to see that there is another dimension where we have to take into account what one can call the true exigencies of the subject? Precisely this dimension not at all of a reality brought about by a reduction to the common world, but of a dimension of being, of a dimension where the subject carries in himself something, by God, which is perhaps just as uncomfortable to carry as Hamlet's message, but which also indeed even though perhaps it promises him a fatal destiny is not something either which we analysts, if it is the case that we analysts find in the experience of desire something more than a simple accident, than something which after all is really inconvenient, and regarding which there is nothing to do but wait until it passes and old age comes so that the subject can rediscover quite naturally the paths of peace and of wisdom ... This desire designates for us analysts something other. Regarding this other thing that it designates for us, how can we operate with it, what is our mission, what is when all is said and done our duty? This is the question that I pose in speaking about the interpretation of desire.

Seminar 22; Wednesday 27 May 1959

Today we are going to continue the study of the place of the function of phantasy as it is symbolised in the relationships of the subject, provided, from the subject, qua marked by the effect of the word with respect to an object o which we tried, the last time, to define as such. This function of the phantasy, as you know is situated somewhere at that level. This relationship which we have tried to inscribe on what we call the graph is something very simple in fact because the terms are resumed at the four points, as I might say, situated at the intersection of two signifying chains by a loop which represents the subjective intention, this intersection, therefore, determining these four points which we have called code points, which are those on the right, here, and two other message points, this in function of the retroactive character of the effect of the signifying chain with respect to signification.

Here therefore are the four points which we have learned to furnish with the following significations, they are the loci where there comes to be situated the encounter of the intention of the subject with the concrete fact, the fact that there is language here.

(2) The two other signs that we will have to come to today are S in the presence of D, and S signifier of O. The two signifying chains, as you know, this has been elucidated for a long time, represent respectively the lower chain, that of the concrete discourse of the subject, in so far as it is, as such, let us say, accessible to consciousness. What analysis teaches us, is that in so far that it is accessible to consciousness, it is perhaps, it is surely because it begins from illusions which we affirm to be entirely transparent to consciousness. And if, for several years, I insisted before you from every angle from which it could be suggested on the illusory aspects of this effect of transparency, if I tried to show by every sort of fable, which perhaps you still remember, how, at the limit we were able to try, in the form of an image in a mirror which became efficacious, beyond any subsistence of the subject, by what persistent mechanism, in the subjective nothingness realised by the destruction of all life, if I try to give you, there, the image of a possibility of subsistence of something absolutely specular independently of any subjective support, it is not for the simple pleasure of such a game, but this rests on the fact that a structured montage, like that of a signifying chain, can be supposed to last beyond any subjectivity of supports.

(.3) Consciousness, in so far as it gives us this feeling of being me (moi) in the discourse, is something which, in the analytic perspective, the one which makes us put our finger constantly on the systematic méconnaissance of the subject, is something which precisely our experience teaches us to refer to a relationship, showing us that this consciousness in so far as it is first of all experienced, as it is first of all felt in an image which is an image of one's counterpart, is something which, rather, covers over with an appearance of consciousness what is included there in the relationships of the subject to the primary, naive signifying chain, to the innocent demand, to the concrete discourse, in so far as it is perpetuated from mouth to mouth, organises what discourse there is in history itself, what rebounds from articulation to articulation in what effectively happens at a more or less greater distance from this concrete, common, universal discourse, which englobes every real, social activity of the human group.

The other signifying chain is the one which is positively given to us in analytic experience as inaccessible to consciousness. You can indeed sense all the same that if already, for us, this reference to the consciousness of the first chain is suspect, a fortiori this single characteristic of the inaccessibility to consciousness is something which, for us, poses questions about what the meaning of this inaccessibility is.

So that we should consider - and I will come back to this -

(4) we should carefully specify what we mean by that. Should we consider that this chain, inaccessible to consciousness as such, is made up as a signifying chain? But this is what I will come back to later. Let us pose it, for the moment, in the way it presents itself to us. Here, the dotted line on which it is presented signifies that the subject does not articulate it qua discourse, what he actually articulates is something else, what he articulates at the level of the signifying chain is situated at the level of the intentional loop. It is in so far as the subject locates himself as acting in the alienation of significance with the operation of the word that the subject articulates himself as what? As enigma, as question, very exactly what is given to us in experience from what is tangible in the evolution of the human subject, in a moment of childish articulation, namely that beyond the first demand with all the consequences that it involves, there is a moment at which he is going to try to sanction what he has before him, to sanction things in the order inaugurated by significance. As such, he is going to say what and he is going to say why. It is within this that there is the express reference to discourse, this is what presents itself as continuing the first intention of the demand, carrying it to the second intention of discourse as discourse, of the discourse which questions itself, which questions things with (5) respect to itself, with respect to their situation in the discourse which is no longer exclamation, interpolation, the cry of need, but already nomination. This is what represents the second intention of the subject and if I make this second intention begin from the locus 0 it is in so far as if the subject is entirely in the alienation of significance, in the alienation of the spoken articulation as such and that it is there and at that level that there is posed the question which I called, the last time, subject as such of S with a question mark. So that, it is not that I enjoy the operations of ambiguity but it is also quite coherent with the level at which we are proceeding, at the point that we are articulating. It is within this questioning, of this internal questioning, to the established locus of the word, to discourse, it is within this that the subject must try to situate himself as subject of the word, again demanding there: is it, what, why, who is speaking, where is it speaking. It is precisely in the fact that that which, at the level of the signifying chain, is articulated, is not articulatable at the level of this S, of this question, which constitutes the subject once he is established in the word, it is in this that there consists the fact of the unconscious (la conscience).

Here, I would simply like to recall for the benefit of those who may here be disturbed as if it were an arbitrary construction, by this identification of the unconscious chain which I present (6) here, with respect to the questioning of the subject being in the same relationships as those of the first discourse, of the demand to the intention which arises from need. I would like to remind you of this: the fact is that if the signifier, if the unconscious (la conscience) has a meaning, this meaning has all the characteristics of the function of the signifying chain as such, and here I know that in giving this brief reminder I should, for the majority of my listeners, make an allusion to what I know they have already heard from me when I already spoke about this signifying chain in so far as it is illustrated in the story that I published elsewhere, the fable about the white discs and the black discs, in so far as it illustrates something structural in the relationships of subject to subject in so far as one finds three terms there. In this story a distinctive sign permits there to be identified, to be discriminated, with respect to a black or white couple, the relationship with the other subjects; for those who do not remember it, I will limit myself to telling them to refer to what I wrote on this subject, with reference to this succession of oscillations through which the subject locates himself with respect to what? With respect to the research of the other which is carried out in function of what the others see of himself and of what determines them in a conclusive fashion namely what I will call here the , that by which the subject decides that he is effectively white or black, proves that he is ready to declare that for which the fable is constructed.

(7) Do you not find here very exactly that which we are accustomed to use in the structure of the unconscious (l'incursion) namely this fact of relative identification, this possibility of denegation, of refusal of articulation, of defence, which are as coherent to the impulse as the back and front of the same thing, and which conclude with something which becomes for the subject the mark, the choice in such conditions, in such situations, what he always chooses first, this power of repetition, which is always the same, which we try to call, according to the subjects, a masochistic tendency, a penchant for failure, the return of the repressed, the fundamental evocation of the primal scene. All of this is one and the same thing, the repetition in the subject of a type of sanction whose forms go way beyond the characteristics of the content. Essentially, unconsciousness always presents itself for us as an indefinitely repeated articulation and this is why it is legitimate for us to situate, it in this schema in the form of this dotted line. Why do we make it dotted here? As we said, in so far as the subject does not gain access to it and we say, more precisely, in so far as the fashion in which the subject can name himself there, can situate himself in so far as he is the support of this sanction, in so far as he can designate himself there, in so far as he is the one who will after all carry the mark, the stigmata of what remains for him not only ambiguous, but properly speaking inaccessible up to a certain end point which is the one, (8) precisely, that analytic experience gives. No operation of his can be articulated at this level, but the experience presents itself as if it comes from outside and that it is already a lot that it comes, he can read it, as a ca parole. There is here a distance of which it is not even said, even though Freud's commandment allows us to envisage it, that the subject can reach its goal in any way whatsoever.

The import, therefore, at this level, of what is called the code point, in so far as we symbolise it here by the confrontation of | with the demand, signifies what? Very precisely the following: it is that this and nothing other than this point that we call the code point and which is only carried away in so far as analysis begins to decipher the coherence of the upper chain, it is in so far as the subject S qua subject of the unconscious, namely qua the subject who is constituted in the beyond of the concrete discourse, qua subject sees, reads, hears, I say retroactively, we can suppose him here as the support for the articulation of the unconscious (la conscience), encounters what? Encounters that which in this chain of the word of the subject in so far as he asks questions about himself encounters the demand.

What role does the demand play at this level? At this level, and this is what the sign between d and D means, at this level demand is affected with its properly symbolic form, demand is (9) utilised in so far as beyond what it requires in terms of the satisfaction of need, it poses itself as this demand for love or this demand for presence, through which we have said demand establishes the other to whom it is addressed as the one who can be present or absent. It is in so far as demand plays this metaphorical function, qua demand, whether it is oral or anal, becomes the symbol of the relationship to the other, that it plays here the function of code, that it allows there to be constituted the subject as being situated at what we call, in our language the oral or anal phase for example.

But this can also be called the correspondence of the message, namely because of the fact that with this code the subject can respond to or receive as message what the question is which, in the beyond, gives the first grasp on the signifying chain. It is presented here also in dots and as coming from the other, the question of Che vuoi?, what do you want? This is what the subject, beyond the other, poses for himself under the form of S? The response is the one here symbolised on the schema by the significance of the other qua s. We have given this significance of the other qua at this level, a meaning which is the most general meaning, this meaning in which there is going to run the adventure of the concrete subject, his subjective history. The most general form is the following: it is that there is nothing in the other, there is nothing in significance which can suffice at this level of signifying articulation.

(10) There is nothing in significance which is the guarantee of truth. There is no other guarantee of the truth than the goodwill of the other, namely something which is always posed for the subject in a problematic form.

Does that means that the subject remains stuck with his question, of this entire regarding what for him gives rise to the kingdom of the word? It is precisely here that we arrive at our phantasy. Already the last time, I showed you that the phantasy in so far as it is the concrete abutment by which we tackle at the limits of consciousness, how this phantasy plays, for the subject, this role of imaginary support, precisely of this point at which the subject finds nothing which is able to articulate him qua subject of his unconscious discourse.

It is to this then that we must return today, to question more closely what this phenomenon is about. I remind you of what I said the last time about the object, as if the object played here the same role of mirage as at the lower stage the image of the specular other plays with respect to the ego. Therefore then, over against the point where the subject is going to situate himself to accede to the level of the unconscious chain here there is proposed the phantasy as such. This relationship to the object as it is in the phantasy leads us to what, to a phenomenology of the cutting from the object in so far as it can support, on the imaginary plane, this relationship of cutting which is the one at which at this level the subject has to support himself.

(11) We have seen this object qua imaginary support of this relationship of cutting at the three levels of pregenital object, of castrating mutilation and also of the hallucinatory voice as such, that is to say less in so far as it is an embodied voice than discourse qua interrupted, qua cut off from the interior monologue, qua cut off in the text of the interior monologue.

Let us see today whether a whole lot more does not remain to be said if we come back to the meaning of what is expressed there, because also what is in question, with respect to something which I already introduced the last time, namely from the point of view of the real, from the point of view of knowledge. At what level are we here since we are introduced to the level of an esse? Is this esse something other than an ambiguity, which is open to being filled up with any meaning whatsoever. Where are we going to stop, in its verbal belonging by conjugation, to the verb to be. Something was already contributed to this the last time. It is a question in effect of knowing at what level we are here as regards the subject in so far as the subject does not locate himself simply in terms of discourse, but also indeed in terms of some realities.

I am saying the following: if something is presented, is articulated which we might, in a coherent fashion, entitle reality, I mean the reality that we take into account in our analytic discourse, I would situate its field on this schema (12) here in the field which is beneath the concrete discourse, in so far as this discourse englobes it and encloses it, is a reserve of a knowledge, of a knowledge which we can extend as far as everything that can speak for man. I mean that he is not for all that obliged, at every instant, to recognise what he has already included of his reality, of his history in his discourse, that everything that is presented, for example, in the Marxist dialectic, as alienation can here be grasped and articulated in a coherent fashion.

I would go further. The cut, let us not forget - and this is already indicated to us in the type of the first object of the phantasy, the pregenital object. What am I alluding to as objects which can here support phantasies, if not to real objects in a close relationship with the vital drive of the subject, in so far as they are separated from him. It is only too obvious that the real is not an opaque continuum, that the real is of course made up of cuts, just as much and well beyond the cuts of language and it is not today or yesterday that the philosopher Aristotle spoke to us about the "good philosopher", which means, as I understand it, just as much someone who knows in all its generality, who can be compared to the good cook, he is the one who knows how to insert the knife in the right place, cutting at the articulations, knowing how to penetrate without injuring them.

The relationship of the cutting of the real to the cutting of language is something therefore which, up to a certain point, (13) appears to satisfy the thing in which the philosophical tradition has always been installed, namely that it is only a question of the overlapping of a system of cutting by another system of cutting. The reason I say that the Freudian question comes at the right time, is in so far as the journey which has now been accomplished by science allows us to formulate that there is in the adventure of science something which goes well beyond this identification, this overlapping of natural cuts by the cuts of some discourse or other, something which by an effort which has essentially consisted in voiding every scientific articulation of its mythological implantations and we will see, later, something which from there has led us to the point that we are now at and which seems to me to be sufficiently characterised without being any more dramatic about it by the term of the disintegration of matter. This indeed is something which might suggest that we should see in this adventure only pure and simple pieces of knowledge. This, the fact is that by placing ourselves on the plane of the real, or, if you wish, provisionally, of something which I will call, on this occasion with all the necessary accent of irony, because it is certainly not my inclination to call it this, the great whole. From this point of view science and its adventure present themselves as the real, referring its own cuts to itself, but as elements creating something new and which take the path of proliferating in a fashion which here, undoubtedly, we cannot deny to ourselves, as (14) men, that our mediating function, our function as agents does not allow us to pose the question of whether the consequences of what manifests itself do not go a little bit beyond us.

Man in fact, enters perhaps into this game at his own expense. There is no need here, for us, to go any further. Because this discourse which I am deliberately making sober and restrained, but I suppose whose dramatic and contemporary accent does not escape you, what I want to say here, is that this question about the adventure of science is different to anything that has been articulated, with even these extreme consequences of science, with all the consequences of the human drama, qua inscribed in the whole of history. Here, in this case the particular subject is in relationship with this sort of cut that is constituted by the fact that with respect to a certain conscious discourse he is not, that he does not know what he is. This is what is in question, it is a question of the relationship of the real of the subject as entering into the cut and this coming of the subject to the level of the cut has something which must be called real, but which is symbolised by nothing. It may seem perhaps excessive to you to see delineated at the level of what we have called above a pure manifestation of this being, the elective point of the relationship of the subject to what we can here call his pure being as subject, that by means of which, from then on, the phantasy of desire takes on its function of designating this point.

(15) This is why, at another moment, I was able to define this function that is fulfilled by the phantasy as a metonymy of being and identify as such, at this level, desire. Let us be quite clear that at this level the question remains entirely open as to whether we can call the one who indicates himself in this fashion, man. For, what can we call man if not the one who is already symbolised as such and who as well, every time he is spoken about, finds himself therefore charged with all the recognitions that we can call historical. The word humanism usually designates nothing at this level. But there is of course in him something real, something real which is necessary and sufficient to assure in experience itself this dimension which we call, I believe, rather inappropriately usually, depth, let us say a beyond, which means that a being is never identifiable to any of the roles, to employ the term that is currently used, that he assumes.

Here therefore, the dignity, as I might say, of this being is defined in a relationship which is neither, in anything, that is is cut, if I may express myself thus, with all the backgrounds, especially the castrating references, if you are able along with other experiences to include in it not someone who is guilty (coupable) if I may make a play on words, but the cut (coupure) as such, namely when all is said and done what presents itself to us as being the last structural characteristic of the symbolic as such; regarding which, I only want simply to indicate in passing (16) that what we find there, is the direction in which I already taught you to look for what Freud called the death instinct, the way in which this death instinct may find itself converging with being.

At this point, there may be some difficulties, I would like to try to fill things out.

In the last number of the Psychoanalytic Quarterly, there is a very interesting, and temperate article, by Mr. Kurt Eissler called "The function of detail in the interpretation of works of art". It is to a work of art, and to the work of art in general, in effect, that I am going to try to refer to illustrate what is in question here. Kurt Eissler begins his discourse, and finishes it moreover, with a remark which I would say can be differently described according to whether one considers it as confused or as simply undeveloped. Here, in effect, is more of less what he articulates. The term detail seems to him to be particularly significant in connection with the work of an author who is moreover completely unknown outside the Austrian circle. He is an author-actor, and if I refer to this, it is because I am going to come back, later, to Hamlet. The actor-author in question is a little unknown Shakespeare.

Dealing with this Shakespeare who lived at the beginning of the last century in Vienna, Eissler has composed one of these very pretty little stories, which are quite typical of what is called (17) applied psychoanalysis, namely that once again, he has found, throughout the life of this person, a certain number of indicative, paradoxical elements, which allow questions to be introduced which will always remain unresolved, namely whether had been quite specially affected, five years before he wrote one of his major works, by the death of someone who was for him a sort of model, but a model he had assumed to such a degree that all sorts of questions arise in connection with paternal, maternal, sexual identification, everything that you can imagine. The question, in itself, leaves me fairly cold, it is an example of one of these gratuitous works which, in this style, are constantly renewed with a value of repetition which keeps also its value of conviction, but this is not what is in question.

What is in question is the following. It is the kind of distinction that Eissler wants to establish between the function of what he calls in English more or less the relevant details, let us call it the detail which does not fit in, and the pertinent detail. In effect, it is in connection with something in a rather well-written play called , it is in connection with something which is completely out of place there, which is absolutely not implied by anything, that Kurt Eissler pricks up his ears, and step by step, he manages to rediscover a certain number of biographical facts whose interest is absolutely obvious. Therefore, what is in question is the value of the irrelevant detail as a guide. And here Eissler draws up a sort (18) of opposition between what happens clinically and what happens in the so-called applied analyses which are usually made in the analysis of a work of art. He repeats twice something - if I had the time I should read out the text for you to give you a sense of its rather opaque character - he says in short, that it is more or less the same role that is played by the symptom and this inappropriate detail, except that in analysis, we begin with the symptom which is given as an element that is essentially irrelevant for the subject. It is in its interpretation that we progress to its solution. In the other case, it is the detail which introduced us to the problem, namely that in the measure that in a text - he does not even go to the stage of formulating this notion of text - in a text we grasp something which not being particularly implicated in it, being discordant, we are introduced to something which can lead us to the personality of the author.

There is here something which, if one looks at it more closely, will not stand up as a relationship of contrast. It seems that it should be enough for you to reflect on it in order to see it. If there is a contrast, there is also of course a parallel, that on the whole, the thing towards which it seems this remark should lead him, is undoubtedly that the discordance in the symbolic, in the symbolic as such in a written work, and here in any case, (19) plays a functional role, completely identifiable to a real symptom, in any case from the point of view of the progress, if this progress can be considered as a progress, in knowledge concerning the subject. From this point of view, in any case, the comparison has a real interest. Simply the question is then posed for us of knowing if in the work of art, I would say it is only the typing error that is going to be significant. And after all why? Because if it is here that in the work of art, what one can call the typing error, you understand of course that I mean something which is presented to us as a discontinuity, can lead us to some knowledge that is useful for us, serve as an indication in which we find in their major illuminations, in their unconscious impact, one or other incident in the past life of the author - this is what happens effectively in this article - is it not a fact that in any case the thing introduces us to the following, that the dimension of the work of art should be illuminated for us. In effect, from then on, and starting from this single fact - we will see it well beyond this fact - we can posit that the work of art, henceforward, can no longer be for us in any way affirmed as representing this transposition, this sublimation, call it what you will, of reality. It is not a question of something which operates as largely as possible by imitation, it is a question of something which operates just as largely as possible in the order of (20) This can therefore be applied just as well to the following which is moreover the general case namely that the work of art always undergoes a profound reworking, this does not put in question, even the fact which I think we have already gone beyond, but this is not the point that I intend to draw your attention to. The fact is that the work of art is limited for us to a type of work of art. For the moment, I will limit myself to the written work of art. The work of art, far from being something which transfigures, in any way whatsoever, however broadly you may understand it, reality, introduces in its very structure this fact of the advent of the cut in so far as there is manifested in it the real of the subject qua beyond what he says. He is the unconscious subject because if this relationship of the subject to the advent of the cut is prohibited to him in so far as this precisely is where his unconscious is, it is not prohibited to him qua subject to the experience of the phantasy, namely that he is animated by what is called this relationship of desire and that by the simple reference to this experience and in so far as it is intimately woven into the work, something becomes possible through which the work is going to express this dimension, this real of the subject in so far as we have called it above the advent of being beyond any possible subjective realisation and that it is towards the virtue and the form of the work of art, the one which succeeds and also the one which fails, that it involves this very dimension, this dimension as I might say, if I may use the (21) topology of my schema to give you a sense of it, this transversal dimension which is not parallel to the field created in the real by human symbolisation which is called reality, but which for its part is transversal in so far as the most intimate relationship of man to the cut in so far as he goes beyond all the natural cuts, that there is this essential cut of his existence, namely that he is there and he must situate himself in this very fact of the advent of the cut, that this is what is in question in the work of art and especially in the one that we have tackled most recently because it is in this respect the most problematic work, namely Hamlet.

There are also all sorts of irrelevant things in Hamlet. I would even say that this is the way that we progressed but in a completely enigmatic fashion. We could not help, at every moment, questioning ourselves about the following: what does this irrelevance mean. Because there is one thing that is clear, which is that it cannot be excluded that Shakespeare intended it. If rightly or wrongly, it does not matter, Kurt Eisler, in the work of , can find it odd that there should be brought in, at a particular moment, a period of five years that nobody had previously spoken about - it is the irrelevant detail which is going to put him on the path of a certain research - it is clear that we have not proceeded in at all the same fashion about what happens in Hamlet, because, in any case, we are sure that this tissue of irrelevancies cannot, in any case, be purely (22) and simply resolved by us by the fact that Shakespeare here let himself be led by his genius. We have the sense that he had some part in it, and after all if for no other reason than as regards the most profound manifestation of his unconscious, in any case here it is the architecture of these irrelevancies which shows us what he arrives at, it is essentially to deploy himself in the major affirmation which we distinguished above, namely in this type of relationship of the subject, to his most profound level, as speaking subject, namely in so far as he brings to birth his relationship to the cut as such.

This indeed is what the architecture of Hamlet shows us in so far as we see what in Hamlet fundamentally depends on a relationship which is that of the subject to the truth. Which is different to the dream of the dead father, which we started from this year, in our exploration, the dream of the dead father who appeared before the son transfixed with sorrow. Here the father knows that he is dead and lets his son know it and what distinguishes the scenario, the articulation of Shakespeare's Hamlet from the story of Hamlet as it appeared in the story of , is precisely, that they are the only two to know. In the story the murder has taken place publicly and Hamlet acts like a mad-man to dissimulate his intentions. Everyone knows that there has been a crime.

(23) Here, it is only the two of them that know, and one of them is a ghost. Now what is a ghost if not the representation of this paradox as a work of art alone can produce it and it is here that Shakespeare is going to render it entirely credible for us. Other people besides myself have shown the function that is fulfilled by this arrival of the ghost in the foreground. The function of the ghost is necessary from the beginning of Hamlet. And what does this ghost say? He says very strange things and I am astonished that no one has even approached, I will not say the psychoanalysis of the ghost, but has not by some questioning put the accent on what the ghost says. There is no doubt in any case about what he says: he says "The betrayal is absolute, there was nothing greater, more perfect, than my faithful relationship to this woman. There is nothing more total than the betrayal of which I was the object". Everything that is posed, everything that is affirmed in terms of goodwill, fidelity and vow, is therefore posed for Hamlet. Not simply as revocable but as having been literally revoked. The absolute cancelling out of this unfolds at the level of the signifying chain and is something quite different from this lack of something which might act as guarantee. The term which is guaranteed is the non-truth, this sort of revelation, as one might say of the lie. This is something which would deserve to be followed up, represents the spirit of Hamlet, this sort of stupor that he enters into after the paternal revelations. It is something which in Shakespeare's text is expressed in a quite remarkable way, namely that when he is asked what he has learned, he does (24) not want to say, and with good reason, but he expresses it in a quite particular fashion: "There's ne'er a villain dwelling in all Denmark but he's an arrant knave" (I v 123), namely that he expresses himself on the level of tautology.

But let us leave this to one side. These are only details and anecdotes. The question is elsewhere. The question is the following: where are we deceived. It is generally accepted that a dead person cannot lie. And why? For the same reason, perhaps, that the whole of our science still preserves the postulate that Einstein has explicitly underlined. He said, from time to time, things which were not all that superficial, as philosophical statements. He said: God is subtle certainly, but he is honest. And can we say as much about a father who tells us in a categorical fashion that he is suffering all the torments of the flames of hell, and this for absolutely infamous crimes. There is here, all the same, something which cannot fail to alert us, there is some discordance and if we follow the effects in Hamlet of what is presented as the eternal damnation of the truth always condemned to be concealed from him, if we conceive that Hamlet remains then locked into this affirmation of the father, cannot we ourselves, up to a certain point, question ourselves about what is signified, at least functionally, by this (25) word, with respect to the genesis and the unfolding of the whole drama? Many things could be said, including the following: that Hamlet's father says the following:

" But virtue, as it never will be moved
 Though lewdness court it in a shape of Heaven,
 So lust, though to a radiant angel linked
 Will sate itself in a celestial bed
 And prey on garbage." (I v 53ff))

It is moreover a bad French translation because one should say:
"Ainsi le vice quoique lie a un ange radieux."

What radiant angel are we talking about? If it is a radiant angel who introduces vice, in this relationship of broken love in which the whole blame is visited on the other, could it be here more than anywhere else that the person who always comes to bear testimony to the insult that has been undergone does not have some part in it? This, of course, is the key which can never be turned, the secret that can never be revealed?

But is there not something here that emerges to put us on the track of the word in which we should understand something. Well indeed, it is here, as elsewhere, the phantasy. Because the eternally unsolved enigma, however primitive we may suppose to be, and with good reason, the brains of Shakespeare's contemporaries, all the same what a curious choice is this vial of poison poured into the ear of the ghost who is the father, who is Hamlet the father, do not forget it, because they are both called Hamlet.

(26) The analysts have not really gone into this area. There have been a good number who have indicated that, perhaps, some symbolic element should be recognised in it. But it is something which, in any case, can be situated, according to our method; in the form of the block that it forms, of the whole that it forms, of the impenetrable enigma that it constitutes. There is no need to underline, I have done so already, the paradox of this revelation, and also its consequences.

The important thing is the following: we have here a structure which is not only phantastical, which fits in so well with what is happening, namely that in any case there is someone who is poisoned through the ear, it is Hamlet, and here what functions as a poison, is the word of his father. From then on, Shakespeare's intention becomes a little clearer, namely that what he has shown us from the beginning is the relationship of desire to this revelation. For two months, Hamlet remains under the influence of this revelation and how is he going to reconquer little by little the use of his limbs? Well, precisely by a work of art. The actors come to him at the right time for him to make of them the testing ground for the conscience of the king, the text tells us. What is certain, is that it is by way of this text that he is going to be able to enter into action, into an action which is going to unfold necessarily from the first consequences, namely, first of all that this person who, since the paternal revelation has only wished for his own (27) dissolution:

"Oh, that this too too solid flesh would melt.
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!" (I ii 129ff).

At the end of the play, we see him seized by a drunkenness which has a quite precise name, it is that of the pyrotechnist, he is wild with joy at having succeeded in doing his worst, he can no longer be contained and Horatio has to hold on to his coat-tails to limit this excessive exuberance. When he says to him: "Would not this get me a fellowship in a cry of players...?" Horatio replies: "Half a share" (III ii 288ff). He knows the limits that should be observed. In effect everything is far from being reconquered with this affair. It is not because he is a pyrotechnist that he has once again found his role. But it is enough that one should know that he is a pyrotechnist to understand that he will take on the first role that he finds. He will carry out what he is, when all is said and done, commanded to do.

I will read for you another time the text of this passage. "A poison ingested by a rat" - and you know that the rat is never very far away, especially in Hamlet - "gives him this thirst which is the very thirst he will die of, because it will dissolve completely in him, this mortal poison as Hamlet was first inspired by it"

Something is added to what I have just told you which allows its (28) whole accent to be given to it. An author named was astonished by a fact which the audience should have perceived long since,, which is that Claudius shows himself so insensitive to what precedes the play scene, the one in which Hamlet presents before Claudius the very scene of his crime. There is a sort of prologue which consists in a pantomime in which one sees, before this whole long scene of the protestations of fidelity and love by the queen in the play to the king in the play, beforehand, the gesture of pouring the poison into the ear in the very context of the orchard, of the garden, is made practically in front of Claudius who literally does not give a peep.

Whole lives have been spent on this point. Mr said something like the fact that the ghost tempted, something which, with God's help, I will not talk about. And Mr has written big books to explain how it could happen that Claudius who is so obviously guilty might not have recognised himself in the scene that was put on. And he has constructed all sorts of minute and logical things to show that if he did not recognise himself, it was because he was looking somewhere else. It is not indicated in the stage directions and, perhaps, after all, it is not worth spending one's whole life working on it. Can we not suggest that Claudius has undoubtedly some part to play in it, he admits it himself, he shouts it to the heavens in a sombre (29) story in which there is upset not only the conjugal equilibrium of Hamlet the father, but something more again, even his very life, and that it is quite true that his crime gives off a bad odour to the point of stinking to high heaven. Everything indicates that at a particular moment he feels himself really cut to the quick, in the depths of himself, he reacts at the moment that Hamlet says what to him? He says to him: The one who coming onto the stage is Lucianus, he is going to poison the king, he is his nephew. One begins to understand that Claudius who, for some time, senses that there is something, the smell of sulphur in the air, he has moreover asked: is there anything offensive in it? Not the least offence Hamlet had replied. Claudius, at that moment, senses that things have gone a bit too far.

In fact, we are left in a completely ambiguous situation, namely that if everyone is scandalised, if the whole Court, from that moment on considers that Hamlet is particularly impossible, because everyone is on the king's side, it is undoubtedly for the Court because they have recognised there Claudius' crime, because no one knows anything and no one knew anything up to the end, outside Hamlet and his confidant, about the way that Claudius had exterminated Hamlet the father. The function of the phantasy seems therefore to be indeed something different from that of the methods as they say in detective stories and this something becomes much clearer if we think, as I believe I am showing you, (30) that Shakespeare has gone further than anybody, to the point that his work is the work itself and is the one where we can see described a sort of cartography of all possible human relationships, with this stigma which is called desire as touchstone, that which irreducibly designates his being, that by which, miraculously, we can find this sort of correspondence.

Does it not seem absolutely wonderful to you that someone whose work crosschecked throughout presents this unity of correspondence, that someone who has certainly been one of the people who have gone furthest in this direction of the oscillations should have himself, no doubt, lived an adventure, the one which is described in the Sonnets which allow us to crosscheck exactly the fundamental positions of desire. I will come back to it later. This surprising man traversed the life of Elizabethan England undoubtedly, he could hardly fail to be noticed with his forty plays and with something of which we have all the same some traces, I mean some evidence. But read a very well-written work which summarises at the present time almost everything that has been done in terms of research on Shakespeare. There is something absolutely surprising: it is that apart from the fact that he certainly existed, we are able to say nothing about him, about his attachments, about everything that surrounded him, about his love affairs, about his friendships. Everything has passed away, everything has (31) disappeared without a trace. Our author presents himself to us analysts as the most radically vanished, dissolved, lost enigma that we can find in our history.

Seminar 23: Wednesday 3 June 1959

I am continuing my attempt to articulate for you what should regulate our action in analysis in so far as we are dealing, in the subject, with the unconscious. I know that this is not an easy thing, and also I am not taking too many liberties in the sort of formulation that I would like to lead you to. It sometimes happens that my detours are linked to the feelings that I have of having to make you aware of the steps that must be taken. For all that I do not necessarily always succeed in helping you not to lose your sense of the road we are taking.

Nevertheless I am asking you to follow me, to trust me. And to begin again from the point that we were at the last time I articulate more simply - obviously not without precautions, not without trying to avoid ambiguities - what I formulated in putting the term of being in the foreground.

And to hammer it out, I ask myself, however hazardous such a formula may seem to you, the reinstatement, the reintegration into our daily concepts of terms which are so massive that for centuries nobody dares to touch them any more except with a sort of tremor of respect - I want to speak about being and about the one - let us say - naturally it is only their use which will demonstrate their coherence - that what I call being, and what up to a certain point I even went so far as to qualify the last time as pure being, at a certain level of its emergence, is something which corresponds to the terms according to which we take our bearings, specifically to the real and the symbolic. And that here being is quite simply the fact that we are not idealists, (2) that for us, as they say in philosophy books, we are among those who think that being comes before thought, but in order to take our bearings we need nothing less than this here in our work as analysts.

I regret having to stir up for you here the heavens of philosophy, but I must say that I only do it with a sense of constraint and obligation, and after all because I find nothing better in order to operate.

Being, we will say then that it is properly the real in so far as it manifests itself at the symbolic level. But let us be quite clear that it is at the level of the symbolic - for us in any case we do not have to consider elsewhere this thing which appears quite simple - from the fact that there is something added on once we say it is that, and that this aims at the real, and in so far as the real is affirmed or rejected or denied in the symbolic.

This being is nowhere else - let this be well understood - except in the intervals, in the cuts, and there where properly speaking it is the least signifying of signifiers, namely the cut. That it is the same thing as the cut presentifies it in the symbolic. And we are speaking about pure being. I am going to say it more crudely because the last time it seems - and I willingly admit this to you - that certain formulae which I put forward appeared circumlocutious, or even confused to some of you. The pure being that is in question, is this same being of which I have just given the general definition, and this in so far as under the name of unconsciousness the symbolic, a signifying chain subsists according to a formula which you will allow me to put forward, every subject is one (tout sujet est un).

(3) And here I must ask your indulgence, namely to follow me. Which simply means that you should not imagine that what I am putting forward here is something that I am putting forward with fewer precautions than when I put forward being. I would ask you to give me the credit that before speaking to you I have already noticed that what I am now going to put forward, namely the one, is not a univocal notion, and that the dictionaries of philosophy will tell you that there is more than one use for this term, namely that the one, which is the whole, is not the same in all its uses, in the way it is employed, as the one in numbers, namely the one which supposes the sequence and the order of numbers and which is separated out from it as such. Because it indeed seems in effect, to all appearances, that this one is secondary to the institution of numbers as such, and to make a correct deduction - empirical approaches in any case leave this in no doubt (English psychology tries to establish the empirical entry of number into our experience; and it is not for nothing that I refer here to the most down-to-earth attempt at an argumentation). I already pointed out to you that it is impossible to structure human experience, I mean this most common affective experience, without starting from the fact that the human being counts, and that he counts himself.

I would say in an abbreviated fashion - because it is necessary, to go further, for me to suppose as having been acquired through a certain time of reflection what I have already said - that desire is closely linked to what is happening in so far as the (4) human being has to articulate himself in the signifier, and that qua being it is in the intervals that he appears at a level that we will try, perhaps, a little further on, to articulate in a fashion which there I will deliberately make more ambiguous than that of the one which I have just introduced, because I do not think that an attempt has yet been made to articulate it properly as such in its very ambiguity. It is the notion of pas un.

It is in so far as this S appears here as this pas un, that we are going to take it up again and look at it again, it is what we are going to have to deal with today.

But let us take things up at the level of experience. I mean here at the level of desire. If desire plays this role of serving as an index to the subject to the point at which he can designate himself without vanishing, we will say that at the level of desire the subject counts himself (se compte). He values himself (se compte), to play on the ambiguities, in the tongue, it is to this first of all that I want to draw your attention: I mean to the tendency that we always have to forget what we are dealing with in experience, the experience of our patients, of those whom we have the cheek to take responsibility for; and this is why I refer you to yourselves. In desire, we value ourselves in cash (nous nous comptons comptant).

Here is where the subject appears in full truth not in the calculation, but where it is said he has to face up to what in the last analysis constitutes him as himself.

It is time all the same to remind analysts that there is nothing (5) which more constitutes the final term of the presence of the subject, in so far as this is what we are dealing with, than desire.

That starting from there the handling of the cash (comptant) begins to be subject to all sorts of transactions which dissolve it into different fiduciary equivalents, is obviously quite a problem, but there is all the same a moment when one must pay cash. If people come to see us, it is in general for this reason, it is that something is not working at the moment when they have to pay up what is in question, namely sexual desire, which is action in its fullest and in its simplest sense.

It is here that the question of the object is posed. It is clear that if the object were simple, not only would it not be difficult for the subject to face up to the price of his feelings, but if you will allow me this play on words he would more often be content (content) with the object instead of having to put up with it (s'en contenter), which is quite different.

This is obviously linked to the fact which is also worth recalling because it is the principle of our experience, that at this level of desire, the object, to satisfy it, is not, to say the least, of easy access, and that we would even say that it is not easy to encounter it, for structural reasons which are precisely the ones that we will now try to go into more fully.

(6) We do not appear to be going quickly, but it is because it is hard, even though I repeat it is our daily experience.

If the object of the most mature, the most adult desire, as we express ourselves from time to time, in this sort of drivelling intoxication which is called the exaltation of genital desire ... we would not have to constantly point out the division which is introduced into it regularly, and that we are indeed forced to articulate at the very moment that we speak to this very conciliatory, more or less problematic subject, between the two planes which constitute this object as object of love, or as it is said, of tenderness, or of the other to whom we present the gift of our oneness, and the same other considered as the instrument of desire.

It is quite clear that it is the love of the other which resolves everything. But by this single remark one sees clearly that here perhaps we are going outside precisely the limits of our blue-print, because after all it is not to our dispositions, but to the tenderness of the other that there is reserved the fact that at the cost no doubt of a certain decentring of himself he could satisfy in the most exact possible way what on the plane of desire is proposed for us as object.

Finally it seems indeed that, in a more or less disguised way we quite simply the old distinctions of religious experience being introduced. Namely the distinction between the loving tendency, in the concrete or what is called the passionate, carnal sense of the term, and the love of charity. If this is really the case why not send our patients to the (7) pastors who would preach to them much better than ourselves.

Moreover we have had some warnings of the fact that this language would not be tolerated very well, and that from time to time there are no better people than our patients to anticipate the slidings of our language in this direction, and to tell us that after all if it is fine moral principles that we have to preach to them, they could go and look for them elsewhere, but that curiously it has already happened that this gets on their nerves to such an extent that they do not want to be listening to it again.

It is very easy to be ironical about this. But it is not pure and simple irony. I would go further. I would say that when all is said and done that there is no outline of a theory of desire - I mean of a theory of desire in which we could recognise ourselves If I dot the i's, the very figures through which I now intend to articulate it for you, except religious dogmas; and that it is not by chance that in the religious articulation of desire - this no doubt in hidden corners, access to which is of course reserved, is not wide open to common mortals, or the common faithful; but in these corners which are called mysticism, there is well inscribed as such the satisfaction of desire - is linked to a whole divine organisation which is the one which in common parlance is presented in the form of mysteries - probably also for the others (I do not need to name them). And you have to see what is represented for the believer in the tangible ladder of sufficiently vibrant terms like that of incarnation, or redemption.

(8) But I would go further: I would say that we would be greatly mistaken to think that the most profound of all, which is called the Trinity, is not something which at least is not without some relationship with the number three with which we always have to deal since we perceive that there is no proper access, or equilibrium that can possibly be acquired for what we will call a normal desire, without an experience which brings into play a certain subjective triad.

Why not say these things because they are there in an extremely simple form. And for me I am not reluctant to do it, what is more I am just as well satisfied with such references as with those referring to more or less confused apprehensions of primitive ceremonies, whether they are totemic or otherwise, among which the best we find are not very different to these elements of structure.

Naturally, it is precisely in the measure that we try to tackle in a fashion which though it is not exhaustive is not taken from the angle of mystery, that I think that it is interesting for us to engage ourselves along this path. But then I repeat that certain questions which I would describe as coming from the moral, or even the social horizon, are not superfluous to recall on this occasion: namely to articulate the fact which appears quite clearly in contemporary experience, that there can be no satisfaction of each without the satisfaction of all, and that this is at the principle of a movement which, even if I have not become as powerfully involved in it as others, pressures us from every side, and no doubt sufficiently to be almost on the point of upsetting a lot of our comforts.

Again it is a question of recalling that the satisfaction in question deserves perhaps to be questioned. Because is it (9) purely and simply satisfaction of needs? The very people that I am speaking about - let us put them here under the rubric of the movement which is inscribed in the Marxist perspective, and which has nothing other as its principle than what I have just expressed: there is no satisfaction for each except in the satisfaction of all - would not dare to claim that, because precisely that which is the goal of this movement and of the revolutions that it involves, is in the last analysis to allow this all to accede to a liberty which is no doubt in the distance, and posed as having to be post-revolutionary.

But this liberty then, what other content can we give it than that of being precisely the free disposition for each of his desire. It remains nevertheless that the satisfaction of desire, in this perspective, is a post-revolutionary question. And we perceive this every day. This does not settle anything. We cannot defer the desire that we are dealing with to a post-revolutionary stage, and everyone knows moreover that I am not in the process here of criticising one or other mode of life, whether it is on this side of or beyond a certain limit.

The question of desire remains in the very foreground of the preoccupations of the powers that be. I mean that there must be some social, collective manner of dealing with it. This is no easier of this side of a certain curtain than on the other. It is always a question of tempering a certain discontent, the discontents in culture as Freud called them. There are no other discontents in culture than the discontents of desire.

To hammer a final nail into what I mean, I would pose to you the (10) question of whether each of you, not qua analysts who are too given - less here than elsewhere - to believe yourself destined to lord it over the desires of others ... to ask yourselves about what the term means for each one of you at the heart of your existence: what does realising one's desire mean?

That exists all the same. There are all the same things which are achieved. They have gone a bit to the right, or a bit to the left, they are twisted, messed up, and more or less unsatisfactory, but they are all the same things which at a certain moment we can pull together in this bundle at one or other moment - this went in the direction of the satisfaction of my desire.

But if I ask you to articulate what it means to realise one's desire, I am willing to bet that you will not articulate it very easily. That nevertheless if I may be permitted - I would cross this with the religious reference which I advanced today - to refer to this extraordinary creation of black humour which the religion to which I referred above, the one which is quite alive here. Christian religion, put forward under the name of the last judgement, I ask you the question simply whether this is not one of the questions which we should project as it were into its most appropriate locus - the locus of the last judgement; the question as to whether on this day of the last judgement what we can say on this subject, what in our unique existence we will have done in this sense of realising our desire, will not weigh as heavily as the one which does not refute it in any degree, which does not counterbalance it in any way, namely whether we will have or not have done what are called good works (le bien).

(11) But let us come back to our formula, our structure of desire, to see what makes of it no longer just the function of the object, as I tried to articulate it two years ago, nor yet that of the subject in so far as I tried to show it to you which is distinguished in this keypoint of desire by this fainting of the subject in so far as he has to name himself as such, but in the correlation which links the one to the other, which means that the object has this function precisely of signifying this point at which the subject cannot name himself, where modesty I would say is the royal form of what is translated in the symptoms as shame and disgust.

And I would ask you again for some time before entering into this articulation, to point out to you this something which I am forced to leave here as a mark, namely as a point which I was not able to develop as I would have wished at the time, because of the programme we were following, which is that of comedy.

Comedy, contrary to what empty minded people may think, is what is most profound in this access to the mechanisms of the stage in so far as it allows to the human being the spectral decomposition of what his situation in the world is. Comedy is beyond this modesty. Tragedy ends with the name of the hero, and with the total identification of the hero. Hamlet is Hamlet, he is such and such a name. It is even because his father was already Hamlet that when all is said and done everything is resolved here, namely that Hamlet is definitively abolished in his desire. I think I have said enough now about Hamlet.

But comedy is a very curious trap for desire, and that is why every time a snare for desire functions we are in comedy. It is desire in so far as it appears where it is not expected. The (12) ridiculous father, the hypocritical bigot, the virtuous man in the throes of an adulterous enterprise, these are the people with whom one makes comedy. But there must be of course this element which ensures that desire does not avow itself. It is masked and unmasked. It is jeered at, it is punished on occasion, but it is for appearances sake, because in real comedies, the punishment does not even touch the wing of the crow of desire, which escapes absolutely intact.

Tartuffe is exactly the same after the policeman has put his hand on his shoulder. Arnolfe, goes 'phew', namely that he is still Arnolfe, and that there is no reason why he should not begin again with a new Agnes. And Harpagon is not cured by the more or less artificial conclusion of Moliere's comedy. Desire, in comedy, is unmasked, but not refuted.

I am only giving you an indication here. Now I would like to introduce you to something which will serve to situate our behaviour with regard to desire in so far as experience has taught us, in analysis, to see it, as one of our great poets said, even though he is a still greater painter, here we can catch this desire by the tail; namely in the phantasy.

The subject therefore, in so far as he desires, does not know where he is with respect to the unconscious articulation, namely to this sign, to this scansion that he repeats in so far as it is unconscious.

Where is this subject as such? Is he at the point where he desires? This is the point of my articulation today. He is not (13) at the point where he desires, he is somewhere in the phantasy. And this is what I want to articulate today, because it is on this that there depends all our behaviour in interpretation.

I once gave an account here of an observation which appeared in a sort of little bulletin in Belgium, concerning the appearance of a transitory perversion at a moment in the treatment of something which was inappropriately labelled as a sort of phobia, even though it was very clearly a question and as the author herself was aware in her questionings - I must say that this text is precious, it is very conscientious and of great use because of the questionings that the author herself highlights, namely the woman who carried out this treatment, and who no doubt if she had been better directed herself had all the qualities necessary to see things much more clearly and go much further. It is clear that this observation, in which one can say that in the name of certain principles, "reality" principles on this occasion the analyst allow herself to play with the desire of the subject as if it were a question here of the point which should be put in place for him.

The subject, not without reason no doubt, starts phantasising that his cure will coincide with the fact of being able to sleep with the analyst. No doubt it is not by chance that something so clear, so crude, comes to the forefront in an analytic experience; it is a result of the general orientation given to (14) the treatment, and of something which is clearly well perceived by the author herself as having been the crucial point, namely the moment where there was question of interpreting a phantasy, and of identifying or not an element of this phantasy, which happily is very magnificently, and at this moment, I will not say a man in armour, but a suit of armour which advances behind the subject. A suit of armour armed with something which is fairly easily recognisable because it is a can of Flytox, namely the thing which can be produced as the most comic and also the most characteristic representation of the phallic apparatus as destructive.

And this to the greatest retrospective embarrassment of the author. It is indeed on this that a lot of things depended, and she senses that it was on this that there subsequently hung the whole unleashing of the artificial perversion. Everything depends on the fact that this was interpreted in terms of reality, of an undoubtedly real experience of the phallic mother. And not in the case of the subject of the fact, which emerges quite clearly from a certain point of the view of the observation once one is willing to take it, that the subject makes emerge here the necessary and lacking image of the father as such in so far as he is required for the stabilisation of his desire. And nothing all the same could give us greater pleasure than the fact that this missing person appears then in the form of a montage, as something which gives the living image of the subject in so far as he is reconstituted with the help of a certain number of cuts, of articulations of the suit of armour, in so far as they are joints, and pure joints as such.

(15) It is in this sense, and in a quite concrete fashion that one could reconstruct the type of intervention which would have been necessary; that perhaps what is called on this occasions a cure could have been reached with less trouble than by this detour of a transitory perversion played out no doubt in the real, and which undoubtedly allows us to put our finger in a certain practice on the way in which the reference to reality represents a regression in the treatment.

I will now clearly specify what I am trying to get you to sense about the relationships of $ and o. I will first of all give you a model which is only a model, the Fort 1 Dat, namely something which I need make no further commentary on, namely this moment which we can consider as being theoretically the first in the introduction of the subject into the symbolic in so far as it is in the alternation of a signifying couple that there resides this introduction in relation to a little object whatever it may be, let us say a ball, or just as easily a little piece of cord, something frayed at the end of the bed, provided it holds up, and that it can be rejected and brought back. Here therefore is the element in question, and in which that which is expressed is something which is just before the appearance of S, namely the moment at which the S questions himself with respect to the other qua present or absent.

It is therefore the locus through which the subject enters at this level into the symbolic, and makes emerge at the beginning this something for which Mr. Winnicott, because of the requirements of a thought completely oriented towards primary experiences of frustration, introduced the term which is (16) necessary for him in the possible genesis of any human development as such, the transitional object. The transitional object is the little ball of the Fort I Da!.

From when can we consider that this game is promoted to its function in desire? From the moment that it becomes a phantasy, namely when the subject no longer comes into play, but anticipates himself in this game (je), where he short-circuits this game (je), where he is completely included in the phantasy. I mean, where he grasps himself in his disappearance.

He will never of course grasp himself without difficulty, but what is required for what I am calling phantasy, qua support of desire, is that the subject should be represented in the phantasy in this moment of disappearance. And I would like to point out to you that I am not saying anything extraordinary here. Simply I am articulating this angle, this flash, this moment that Mr. Jones dwelt on when he tried to give its concrete meaning to the term castration complex, and from which for reasons required by his personal understanding he does not depart, because this is the way that for him things are phenomenologically tangible.

People are brought to a halt all the same by the limits of understanding when they try to understand at all costs; this is what I am trying to get you to go beyond a little by telling you that one can go a little further by stopping oneself trying to understand. And it is for this reason that I am not a phenomenologist.

(17) And Jones identifies the castration complex with the fear of the disappearance of desire. It is exactly what I am in the process of telling you in a different form. Because the subject fears that his desire will disappear, this must indeed signify something, which is that somewhere he desires himself desiring. This, pay careful attention, is what constitutes the structure of the neurotic's desire.

This is why I will not go directly to the neurotic, because this may appear to you too easily as a simple reduplication: I desire myself desiring, and desire myself desiring as desired etc. This is not at all what is in question, and this is why it is useful to spell out again the perverse phantasy. And if today I can not go any further I will try to do so by taking one of the most accessible phantasies, and one which is moreover closely related to what I alluded to above in the observation that I evoked, namely the phantasy of the exhibitionist; of the voyeur also, because you are going perhaps to see that it would be well not to be satisfied with the fashion in which the structure in question is usually reported.

We are usually told, it is very simple, this perverse phantasy is very nice, the impulse. Of course one likes to look, or one likes to be looked at, these charming vital drives as Paul Eluard said somewhere. In short there is something there, the drive, which takes pleasure in what Eluard's poem expresses very prettily in the formula Donner a voir, a manifestation of the form offering itself spontaneously to the other.

(18) And in sum, I would point out to you, that it is not nothing to say this. This no longer seems so simple to us. It implies, because this is the level that we were at last evening, namely the implicit subjectivity there can be in an animal life, it implies all the same a certain subjectivity. It is scarcely possible even to conceive of this giving a look at (donner a voir), without giving to the word "to give" the fullness of the virtues of the gift, all the same a reference, an innocent, unawakened one no doubt, of this form to its own richness.

And we also have quite concrete indications of it in the ostentation demonstrated by these animals in the manifestations of the captivating parade, principally of sexual parade. I am not going to start wriggling the stickleback in front of you again, I think that I have spoken to you about it at enough length to give a meaning to what I am in the process of telling you. It is simply to say that in the sweep of a certain behaviour, however instinctual we may suppose it to be, something may be implied which is this little movement of return, and at the same time of anticipation which is there in the sweep of the word. I mean a temporal projection of this something which is in the exuberance of the drive to show oneself, as we can rediscover it at the natural level.

Here I can only incidentally, and for those who were at the scientific session last night, urge the person who intervened on this subject to see that it would be appropriate precisely in this temporal anticipation to modulate what is perhaps

(19) expectation no doubt in the case of the animal in certain circumstances, with this something which allows us to articulate the disappointment of this expectation as a deception. And the medium I would say, at least until I am convinced of the contrary, seems to me to be constituted by a promise.

Whether the animal promises himself the success of one or other of his behaviours, this is the whole question for us to be able to speak about deception instead of a disappointment of expectation.

Let us come back now to our exhibitionist. Is he inscribed in any way in this dialectic of what is shown, even in so far as this shown is linked to the pathways of the other? I can here simply point out to you all the same that in the exhibitionistic relationship to the other - I am going to employ rough and ready terms to make myself understood; they are certainly not the best, the most literary ones - that the other must be struck at the level of his complicitous desire - and God knows the other is so at times - by what is happening here, and by what is happening as what: as a breach (rupture).

Notice that this breach is not an indifferent one. It is essential that this breach should thus be the trap for desire. It is that it is a breach which passes unnoticed for what we can call on this occasion the most part. And it is perceived by the one that it is addressed to qua unnoticed elsewhere. So that everyone knows that there is no real exhibitionism, except of course for some supplementary refinement, in privacy. In order precisely that it should be, that there should be pleasure in it, it must happen in a public place.

(20) And then we come to this structure in our big boots and we say to him: my friend if you show yourself at such a distance it is because you are afraid to approach your object: come closer, come closer. I ask you what sort of a joke is this. Do you think that exhibitionists do not copulate? Clinical experience is completely against this. They are sometimes very good husbands to their wives except that the desire which is in question is elsewhere. They require of course other conditions; these are conditions which it would be well to dwell on here.

One can clearly see that this manifestation, this elective communication which is produced here with the other, satisfies a certain desire only in so far as there are put into a certain relationship a certain manifestation of being and of the real in so far as it involves a symbolic framework as such. This moreover is what makes a public place necessary: one has to be quite sure that one is in a symbolic framework. Namely: I point this out for the people who reproach me with not daring to approach the object, of giving way to some fear or other - that I put as a condition for the satisfaction of their desire precisely the maximum of danger. Here again people will go in the opposite direction, without worrying about the contradiction, and they will say that it is danger that they are looking for. It is not impossible.

Before going that far let us try all the same to notice a structure: the fact is that on the side of what here plays the part of object, namely those who are involved, one or several little girls for whom we should in passing shed a tear to show (21) our good intentions, it can happen that the little girls, especially if there are several of them, enjoy themselves a lot while this is going on. This even forms part of the pleasure of the exhibitionist; it is a variant.

The desire of the other is there then as an essential element in so far as it is surprised, as it is involved beyond modesty, that on occasion it is compileitous. The variations are possible.

On the other hand what do we have here? We have here something whose structure I have already pointed out to you sufficiently just now. There is no doubt what he shows, you will tell me. But for my part I would say to you that what he shows on this occasion is rather variable; what he shows is more or less magnificent; but what he shows is something redundant which hides rather than unveils what is in question. One must not be deceived by believing that what he shows testifies only to the erection of his desire, the difference there is between that and the apparatus of his desire. The apparatus is essentially constituted by what I underlined as what is glimpsed in the unnoticed, which I called quite crudely a trousers which is opened and closed, and to speak plainly is constituted by what we can call the split (fente) in the desire.

This is what is essential. And there is no erection however successful one may suppose it to be, which supplies here for what is the essential element in the structure of the situation, namely this split as such. It is here also that the subject as such designates himself. This is what you must hold onto to see (22) what is in question. And very probably what it is a question of making good. We will come back to it later because I want to check this against the correlative phenomenology of the voyeur.

I can, I think, go more quickly now. And nevertheless to go too quickly is as always to allow ourselves to dodge what is in question. This is why I approach here with the same circumspection, because what is essential, and what is omitted in the scopophilic drive, is to begin also with the split. Because for the voyeur this split is found to be an absolutely indispensable element of the structure. And even though the relationship between the seen and the unseen is divided here differently it is nonetheless distinct.

What is more I want to go into detail. Namely because it is a question of the support that is taken from the object, namely from the other in the specifically voyeuristic satisfaction in this case, the important thing is that what is seen is involved in the affair. This forms parts of the phantasy. Because without any doubt what is seen can very often be seen without knowing it. What we call the feminine object, because it seems that it is not for nothing that it is in this direction that this research is carried out, the feminine object does not know of course that she is being seen, but in the satisfaction of the voyeur, I mean in what supports his desire, there is the fact that it is in lending oneself as one might say innocently - something in the object lends itself to this function of spectacle - that it is open, that she participates in potency in this dimension of indiscretion; and that it is in the measure that something in her gestures may allow it to be suspected that (23) from some angle she is capable of lending herself to it that the jouissance of the voyeur attains its true and proper level.

The creature who is surprised will be all the more erotic I would say, because something in her gestures may reveal her to us as offering herself to what I would call the invisible hosts of the air. It is not for nothing that I evoke them here. They are what are called the angels of Christianity which M. Anatole France had the gall to involve in this affair. Read La Revolte des Anges. You will see in it at least the very precise link which unites the dialectic of desire with this sort of virtuality of an eye which is ungraspable but always imaginable. And the references made to the book of the comte de Cabanis concerning the mystical marriages of men with the sylphs and the water sprites were not put there for nothing in a text whose intentions are very well centred as is the case with one or other of Anatole France's books.

Therefore it is in this activity in which the creature appears in this secret relationship with herself, in these gestures in which there is betrayed the permanence of the witness before whom one does not avow oneself, that the pleasure of the voyeur reaches its peak.

Do you not see that here, in the two cases, that the subject reduces himself to the artifice of the split as such. This artifice takes his place and shows him effectively reduced to the miserable function which is his; but he indeed is the one in question, in so far as in the phantasy he is the split.

The question of the relationship of this split to what is (24) symbolically the most intolerable thing in our experience, namely the form which responds to it in the place of the feminine sexual organs, is another question which we will leave open here for the future. But now let us take up the whole thing and let us begin from the poetic metaphor of the celebrated "I saw myself seeing me" of the Jeune Pargue.

It is quite clear that this dream with its perfect closure of completed sufficiency, is realised in no desire, if not the superhuman desire of the poetic virgin. It is in so far as he puts himself at the place of "I saw myself", that the voyeur and the exhibitionist are introduced into the situation which is what? Precisely the situation in which the other does not see the "I saw myself" a situation of unconscious jouissance of the other. The other, in a way, has his third part decapitated here, he does not know that he can potentially be seen, he does not know what is represented by the fact that he may be shaken by what he sees, namely by the unusual object which the exhibitionist represents to him, and which has its effect on this other only in so far as it is effectively the object of his desire but does not recognise it at that moment.

He establishes therefore the sharing out of a double ignorance, because if the other does not realise at this level, what is supposed to be realised in the mind of the one who exhibits himself, or of the one who sees himself as a possible manifestation of desire, inversely in his desire the one who exhibits himself or who sees himself does not realise the function of the cut which abolishes him in a clandestine automation, which crushes him in a moment whose spontaneity he (25) absolutely fails to recognise in so far as it designates what is said there as such, and which is there at its height again known as present but suspended.

He himself is only aware of this shameful animal manoeuvre, this oblique manoeuvre, this manoeuvre which exposes him to being beaten. Nevertheless this split, in whatever form it is presented, a shade, or a telescope, or some screen or other, this split is here what makes him enter into the desire of the other; this split is the symbolic split of a more profound mystery which is the one which has to be elucidated, namely its place at a certain level of the unconscious, which allows us to situate the pervert, at this level, as being in a certain relationship with

This indeed is the structure of desire as such, because it is the desire of the other as such reproducing the structure of his own that he is aiming at.

The perverse solution to this problem of the situation of the subject in the phantasy is precisely the following: it is to aim at the desire of the other and to believe that one sees in it an object.

It is late so I will stop here. This is also a cut. Its only drawback is that it is arbitrary. I mean it does not allow me to show you the originality of this solution compared to the neurotic solution. You should simply know that it is this which makes it interesting to compare them, and starting from this fundamental phantasy of the pervert to help you to see the function which the neurotic subject plays in his own phantasy. Luckily I already indicated it to you above. As I told you he desires himself desiring. And why then because he cannot desire, is it so necessary that he should desire? Everyone knows there is something involved in this which is properly speaking the phallus. Because after all up to the present (26) you have been able to see that I have allowed to be reserved in this economy the intervention of the phallus, this good old phallus of long ago.

On two occasions in taking up the Oedipus complex last year, and in my article on the psychoses I showed it to you as being bound to the paternal metaphor, namely as coming to give to the subject a signified. But it was impossible to reintroduce it into the dialectic in question if I had not posited for you first of all this structural element through which the phantasy is constituted in something whose symbolism I am going to ask you to make a last effort to accept in future as we part today.

I mean that in future the $ in the phantasy qua confronted and opposed to this o which you have well understood that I showed it to you today as being much more complicated than the three forms that I gave you at first as an approach, because here the o is the desire of the other in the case that I am presenting.

You see therefore that all the forms of the cut, including precisely the ones which reflect the cutting of the subject, are indicated. I am asking you to accept the following notation. I would even allow myself to be so ridiculous as to refer to a notation of concerning the imaginaries. I left you on the brink of this pas un in this fainting of the subject. It is at this pas un, and even at this as pas un, in so far as it is what gives us our opening onto the oneness of the subject that I will take things up the next time. But if I ask you to take it down in this way it is precisely so that you will not see in it the most general form, and at the same time the most confused (27) form of negation. If it is so difficult to speak about negation, it is because no one knows what it is. Already I nevertheless indicated at the beginning of this year an opening in the difference there is between foreclosure and discordance. For the moment I am indicating to you in an closed, shut off, symbolic, but precisely because of this decisive form, another form of this negation. It is something which situates the subject in another order of magnitude.

Seminar 24: Wednesday 10 June 1959

In our last conversation I developed the structure of the phantasy in so far as it is in the subject what we call the support of his desire. The phantasy, there where we can grasp it in a structure sufficiently complete to serve subsequently in a way as a sort of turning plate for that whose different structures we are going to be lead to refer to it, namely for the relationship of the desire of the subject to what for a long time I have designated for you as being its reference, its essence in the analytic perspective, namely the desire of the other.

Today, as I announced, I am going to try to situate for you the position of desire in what we can call the different nosological structures, those drawn from experience, at the first level of neurotic structure.

The perverse phantasy, because it was the one that I chose the last time to allow you to pick out in it what corresponds to the function of the subject and to that of the object in the phantasy in so far as it is the support, the index of a certain position of the subject, just as it is the image of the other which is the starting point and the support - at least at this point where the subject qualifies himself as desire there is this more complex structure which is called the phantasy and into which paradoxically I was led the last time, by taking up a particular, especially exemplary form, not without having a profound motive that of the exhibitionist and of the voyeur, to show you that contrary to what is too often said, these are not two positions which are reciprocal in some way, as a sort of hasty thinking (2) leads it to be formulated, the one who shows, and the one who sees complementing one another.

As I told you, these two positions are on the contrary strictly parallel, and that in the two cases, the subject, in the phantasy, finds himself indicated by something which we have called the split, the gap, something which is in the real both a hole and a flash in so far as the voyeur spies behind his shutter, that the exhibitionist half opens his screen, that he is indicated there in his proper place in the act which is nothing other than this flash of the object of which one speaks. And experienced, perceived by the subject through the opening of this gap, through this something which it situates him as open. Open to what? To a desire other than his own. His own which is profoundly affected, shaken, struck by what is glimpsed in this flash.

It is the emotion of the other beyond her modesty (pudeur); it is the openness of the other, the virtual expectation in so far as she does not sense herself as being seen, and that nevertheless she is perceived as offering herself to view; it is this that characterises in the two cases this position of the object which is so fundamental in this structure because when all is said and done analytic experience locates it at the starting point of what it found at first along the path of the causes and the generating stigmata of the neurotic position, specifically the scene that is glimpsed, what is called the primitive scene.

It participates in this structure, namely by a reversal no doubt of this structure which means that the subject sees something (3) opening which is this gap suddenly glimpsed, something which quite obviously in its traumatic value has a relationship to the desire of the other glimpsed, perceived as such, which remains there as an enigmatic kernel until subsequently, in a deferred way, he will be able to reintegrate this moment that is experienced into a chain which will not necessarily be a correct chain, which will in any case be the chain which generates a whole unconscious modulation, a core generator in the case of neurosis.

I would ask you to dwell on this structure of the phantasy. It is understood that it is a suspended moment, as I underlined, which gives it its value. This is what gives it its value, it is a pause. A pause which has this value of an index corresponds to a moment of action in which the subject cannot establish himself in a certain fashion x which is precisely what we designate as desire here, what we are trying to isolate in its function as desire, properly speaking on condition, that this subject loses the meaning of this position.

Because the fact is that the phantasy is opaque to him. We, for our part, are able to designate his place in the phantasy. Perhaps he himself is able to glimpse it, but the meaning of the position namely the reason why what comes to birth of his being is there, this the subject cannot say. This is the essential point: aphanisis. No doubt the term is a happy one and is useful to us, but unlike the function that Jones gives it in the interpretation of the castration complex, its form is enigmatic.

(4) We see in the phantasy that aphanisis, at least there where the word disappearance, fading as I also said, is useful to us, it is not qua the aphanisis of desire, it is in so far as at the point of desire there is aphanisis of the subject. The subject, in so far as he is supposed to situate himself at this place, supposed to articulate himself as I where it speaks in the unconscious chain, in so far as he cannot indicate himself there except qua disappearing from his position as subject.

From this we can see what is going to be in question. In so far as we have defined this extreme point, this imaginary point in which the being of the subject resides with its maximal density - these are only images so that your minds can hold on to a metaphor - from the moment that we see, or that we define this imaginary point in which the being of the subject in so far as he is the one who is to be articulated, to be named in the unconscious, cannot in any case, in the last analysis, be named, but simply indicated by something which reveals him to himself as a cutting, as a split, as a structure of cutting in the phantasy, it is around this imaginary point - and this is i legitimate in every domain if we can articulate its structure by what starts from it - that we are going to try to situate what effectively happens in the different forms of the subject which are not at all necessarily homogenous forms, forms which are comprehensible from one side by the one who is on the other side.

(5) We know only too well in this respect what can deceive us in the understanding of a psychosis. For example we should be careful not to understand even though we try to reconstruct, to articulate its structure. And this in fact is what we are trying to do here. Thus starting from there, from this structure in which the subject, in his moment of disappearance - and I repeat that this is a notion whose trace we can find when Freud speaks about the navel of the dream, the point at which all the associations converge in order to disappear, in order to be no longer linked to anything except to what he calls the Nabel; this is what is in question. In this regard, the subject sees opening out before him what? Nothing other than a gap which, at the limit, would engender a reference to the infinity of desire, towards an other desire.

As we see in the phantasy of the voyeur and the exhibitionist, it is on the desire of the other that he finds himself dependent. He finds himself offered up to the mercy of the desire of the other. This is concrete. We find it in experience. It is not because we do not articulate it that we do not commonly that it is not very easy to grasp.

When I spoke to you at length, two years ago about little Hans' neurosis, it was nothing other than this that was in question. It is in so far as at a moment of his evolution little Hans finds himself confronted with something which goes much further than the undoubtedly critical moment of a rivalry with the new arrival, with his little sister, with something much more serious than this novelty which is for him the outline of sexual

(6) maturation which makes him capable of having erections, even indeed, for specialists the question is still open, of having orgasms. It is neither at the interpsychological level, properly speaking, nor at the level of the integration of a new tendency that the crisis opens up. I well underlined and articulated and even laboured it at that time.

It is in so far as by a closing at that moment of the situation he finds himself effectively and especially confronted as such with the desire of his mother, and that he finds himself in the presence of this desire without any recourse. The Hilflosigkeit, that Freud, in his article on the unconscious, the article of 1917 It is this most primitive of all positions of being without recourse, and with respect to which anxiety is already the beginnings of an organisation in so far as it is already an expectation. If one does not know of what, if in any case one does not articulate it right away, in any case it is before everything (Urbartut?) Freud tells us. But first there is the following: Hilflosigkeit, having no recourse.

Having no recourse before what? That which cannot be defined, centred in any other fashion than before the desire of the other.

It is this relationship of the desire of the subject, in so far as it has to situate itself before the desire of the other which nevertheless literally sucks him in, and leaves him without recourse, it is in this drama of the relationship of the desire of the subject to the desire of the other that there is constituted an essential structure, not only of neurosis, but of every other structure defined analytically.

We will begin with the neurosis; we have gone far enough from (7) perversion for you to be able to glimpse that perversion is linked to it also. Nevertheless let us underline it. We have brought in this perversion only in this instantaneous moment of the phantasy, due to the phantasy, in so far as the passage a l'acte in perversion, and in perversion alone, reveals it.

In neurosis, in which we are trying to circumscribe more closely for the moment that which is related to this structure which I am articulating before you, it is this fruitful moment of the neurosis that I am aiming at in the case of little Hans, because it is a question there of a phobia, namely the simplest form of neurosis, the one in which we can put our finger on the character of the solution, the one which I already articulated for you at length in connection with little Hans by showing you the coming into play of this object, the phobic object, in so far as it is an all purpose signifier.

It is there to occupy at this place, between the desire of the subject and the desire of the other, a certain function which is a function of protection or of defence. On this there is no ambiguity about the Freudian formulation. The fear of the phobic object is intended to protect the subject from what? (It is in Freud) from the approach of his desire. And it is by looking more closely at things that we see what is in question: from his desire in so far as it is weaponless with respect to what in the other, the mother on this occasion, opens up for Hans as the sign of his absolute dependency.

She will lead him to the ends of the earth, she will lead him still further; she will lead him as far and as often as she herself disappears, is eclipsed. That she is the person who at (8) that moment can appear to him not only as the one who could respond to all his demands. She appears to him with this supplementary mystery of being herself opened to a lack whose meaning appears at that moment to Hans to be in a certain relationship to the phallus, which phallus nevertheless he does not have.

It is at the level of the want-to-be of the mother that there opens out for Hans the drama that he can only resolve by giving rise to this signifier of the phobia whose plurivalent function I showed you to be a sort of universal key, and all-purpose key which serves him at that moment in protecting himself against that which in a univocal fashion every experienced analyst has perceived, against the arousal of an anxiety more terrifying again than the fear linked to, than the fear fixed to the phobia. This moment, in so far as it is relationship to desire, that it is something which is going in the structure of the phantasy, in the opposition $$$ to o , to give to this $$$ something which will alleviate the part of it which sustains the presence of the object, which is something which the subject can hold onto, this point where in fact the symptom is going to be produced.

The symptom at the deepest level in the neurosis, namely in so far as it involves in the most general fashion the position of the subject. This is what deserves to be articulated here.

If you do not mind we will proceed in this order: to be articulated first of all, then to ask ourselves if this structure of the phantasy is so fatal, how something which is on the brink of this point of being lost, of this point of disappearance indicated in the structure of the phantasy, as this something which is on the brink, which is sustained at the entrance to the (9) vortex of the phantasy, how this something is possible. Because it is quite clear that it is possible.

The neurotic has access to the phantasy. He has access to it in certain privileged moments of the satisfaction of his desire. But we all know that this is only a functional utilisation of the phantasy that its relationship on the contrary to his whole world, and especially his relationship to others, to the real others - this is where we are getting to now - is profoundly marked by what? It has always been said, by a repressed drive.

This repressed drive, it is its relationship that we are trying to articulate a little better, in a more rigorous fashion, in a fashion also that is clinically more evident. We are simply going to see how this is possible.

We are going all the same to indicate how this presents itself. Let us take the obsessional, if you wish, and the hysteric. Let us take them together since in a certain number of features we are going to see one being illuminated by the other.

The object of the phantasy, in so far as it ends up at this desire of the other, it is a question of not approaching it, and for that obviously there are several solutions. We have seen the one which is linked to the promotion of the phobic object, to the object of prohibition. Prohibition of what? When all is said and done of a jouissance because it opens up before the subject the abyss of desire as such.

There are other solutions. I already indicated them to you in (10) these two schematic forms in the Royaumont report. The desire of the subject can be sustained by the subject before the desire of the other. He sustains it in two ways, as unsatisfied desire, this is the case of hysterics. I remind you of the example of the butcher's beautiful wife where this structure appears in such a clear fashion, this dream in whose associations there appears as it were the avowed form of the operation of the hysteric.

The butcher's beautiful wife desires to eat caviare, but she does not want her husband to buy it for her, because it is necessary that this desire should remain unsatisfied. This structure which is pictured there in a little manoeuvre which forms moreover the warp and woof of the daily life of these subjects, goes much further in fact. This story gives the meaning of the whole function that the hysteric gives herself. It is she who is the obstacle. It is she who does not want. Namely that in this relationship of the subject to the object in the phantasy she comes to occupy this same third position which above was devolved on to the phobic signifier, but in another fashion.

It is she who is the obstacle, it is she who is at stake in reality. And here jouissance is precisely to prevent desire in situations that she herself constructs. This is one of the fundamental functions of the hysterical subject; in the situations that she constructs her function is to prevent desire coming to term in order that she herself will remain what is at stake.

She takes the place of what we could call using an English term a , namely something like a manikin. has a broader, more general sense. It is a false likeness. The (11) hysteric, in so far as in a situation so frequently observed that it is really clearly recognisable in the observations - it is enough to have the key which is that of her position between a shadow which is her double, a woman who is in this hidden fashion this point precisely where there is situated or inserted her desire in so far as she must not see it - the hysteric establishes, presents herself in this case, as the mainspring of the machine, the one who suspends and situates them with respect to one another like kinds of puppets for she has to sustain herself in this sort of reduplicated relationship which is that of $ O o.

The hysteric is nevertheless in the game herself in the form of the one who when all is said and done is the stake.

The obsessional has a different position. The difference between the obsessional and the hysteric is that he remains outside the game. His true desire you will observe - place your trust in these formulae when you have to deal with the subject who can be clinically described in this way - the obsessional is someone who is never really at the place where something is at stake which could be qualified as his desire. The place where apparently he is risking something is not where he is. It is of this very disappearance of the subject, the at the point of approach of desire, that he makes as you might say his weapon and his hiding place. He has learned to make use of this in order to be elsewhere.

And observe it carefully. This of course he can only do, because there is no other place than the one which was reserved up to now for the instantaneous, relational structure of the hysteric, he can only do it by deploying in time, by (12) temporalising this relationship, by always putting off to tomorrow his engagement in this real relationship of desire. It is always for tomorrow that the obsessional reserves engaging with his true desire.

This is not to say that while waiting for this term he does not get engaged in anything; far from it, he proves himself. What is more he can go so far as to consider these proofs, what he does, as a means of acquiring merit. Merit for what: for the reverence of the other with respect to his desires. You will find these things being well and truly acknowledged throughout the whole field, even if the obsessional does not recognise the mechanism as such. But it is important that you should be capable of recognising it, in order to designate it.

Because after all it is an important thing here, I am saying, to smash this mechanism in the form of what it drags along in its wake, namely all these intersubjective relationships which can only be conceived of as ordered with respect to this relationship or to these fundamental relationships as I am trying here to articulate them here for you.

When all is said and done what does this mean? I mean, even before asking yourselves how this is possible, what do we see emerging in this neurotic position? It is clear that what we see emerging is at least the following: the cry for help of the subject in order to sustain his desire, but to sustain it in the presence and in the face of the desire of the other, in order to constitute himself as desiring. This is what I indicated to you the last time, the fact is that the only thing that he does not (13) know, is that in constituting himself as desiring his steps are profoundly marked by something which is there behind, namely the danger which is constituted by this slope of desire. So that in constituting himself as desiring he does not perceive that in the constitution of his desire he is protecting himself against something, that his very desire is a defence, and cannot be anything else.

Again in order that this may be sustained it is clear that in every case he summons as a help something which presents itself in a third position with respect to this desire of the other, something where he can place himself so that the sucking in, disappearing relationship of the $ before the o is tenable. It is in the relationship to the other, to the real other, that we see there being sufficiently indicated the role of what permits the subject to symbolise. Because it is a question of nothing else than of symbolising his situation, namely of maintaining in act something in which he can recognise himself as subject.

satisfy himself as subject, astonished though he may finally be to see that this subject which is sustained, finds itself the prey of all sorts of contorted, and paradoxical attitudes which designate him to himself once he is able to have the slightest look at his own situation, as a neurotic who is a prey to his symptoms.

Here there intervenes this element which analytical experience has taught us to put at a key point in signifying functions, and which is called the phallus. If the phallus has the key position which I am now designating, it is very evidently qua signifier, qua signifier linked to something which has a name in Freud, and whose place in the unconscious economy itself was (14) absolutely not dissimulated by Freud, namely the law.

In this regard, every kind of attempt to reduce the phallus to something which can be balanced against, which is related to some other functional correspondent in the other sex is something which of course from the point of view of the interrelationships of the subject, has what one might call its genetic value, but which can only be exercised, be carried out on the condition of overlooking what is quite essential in the valorisation of the phallus as such.

It is not purely and simply an organ. Where it is an organ it is the instrument of a jouissance. It is not at this level integrated into the mechanism of desire, because the mechanism of desire is something which is situated at another level, that to understand what is the mechanism of desire it is necessary to define it as seen from the other side, namely once cultural relationships have been established, and from the myth of the primordial murder or not.

Desire is distinguished from all demands in the fact that it is a demand submitted to the law. This almost looks like breaking through an open door, but this is all the same what is in question when Freud makes the distinction for us between demands which correspond to what are called preservation needs in the species or in the individual, and those which are on another plane. This is why to tell us that those which are on this other plane are distinguished from the first in the sense that they can be postponed ..., but after all if sexual desire can be postponed in its effects, in its passage to action in man, it is undoubtedly in an ambiguous fashion.

(15) It can be postponed? How can it be more so in man than in animals where after all it does not suffer postponements all that much? It is because no doubt of a genetic flexibility; it is also and essentially - because nothing is articulated in analysis if one does not articulate it at this level - in so far as on this sexual desire itself there is constructed the primordial order of exchanges which found the law through which there enters in a living form number as such into human interpsychology. What is called the law of alliance and of kinship through which we see the following appearing: it is that the phallus fundamentally is the subject qua object of this desire; this object being submitted to what we will call the law of fecundity.

And also this is the way that there is brought into play in a more or less unveiled, a more or less initiatory fashion the phallus, that it is unveiled to those who participate in this initiation. If the function of the father for the subject, qua source of his life as it is said, is only the signifier of what I call here the law of fecundity, in so far as it regulates, as it ties desire to a law, effectively this fundamental signification of the phallus is that which, by all the dialectic of desire, in the measure that desire in so far as there is expressed in it the being of the subject at the point that he is lost interposes itself on the trajectory of this functionalisation of the subject qua phallus, of this thing through which the subject presents himself in the law of exchange defined by the fundamental relationships regulating the prohibitions of desire in culture, it is in the measure that the subject is, in so far as from a certain moment he no longer is, he wants-to-be, he can no longer (16) grasp himself.

It is from the encounter of this with his phallic function, with his phallic function in the real links of relationships with the real others of the real generation of the line of descendents, it is here that there is produced the point of equilibrium which is the one that we dwelt on at the end of the dream of Ella Sharpe's patient.

If I connected up the whole big digression about Hamlet at this level, it is in the measure that this subject presented to us in his dream, in the purest form, this alternation of to be or not to be, which I made so much of. Namely this subject who qualified himself as no one. This subject at the moment that he approaches his desire, when he is just about to put his finger on it, when he has to choose to be no one, or to be caught, entirely absorbed in the devouring desire of the woman, that immediately afterwards he is summoned "to be or not to be", to bring to birth the "to be" of the second part which has not the same meaning as in the first, the "not to be" of the primordial structure of desire, is seen to have an alternative. To be, that is to be the phallus, he must be the phallus for the other, the marked phallus; to be what he can be as subject he is exposed to the menace of not having it.

If you will allow me to use here what is called a logical sign which is the v , which is used to designate the either-or of the distinction, the subject sees opening out before him the not to be - not to be the phallus - or if he is it, not to have it, namely to be the phallus for the other, the phallus in the intersubjective dialectic. This is what is in question. And (17) it is in this game that the neurotic experiences the approach, the integration of his desire as a threat of loss.

The pas un by which the $$$ designates himself in the fundamental structure of desire, is transformed into a one too many (un en trop), either something extra or something missing, in the threat of castration for the man or in the phallus experienced as absence for the woman. That is why one can say that at the outcome of the analytic démystification of the position of the neurotic, something seems to remain in the structure, at least what Freud testifies to us in his own experience which presents itself as a remainder, as something which for the subject causes him to remain in any case in an inadequate position, that of the phallus in peril, for the man, that of the absence of the phallus for the woman.

But also it is perhaps in so far as in the angle adopted first of all for the solution of the neurotic problem, the transversal dimension, the way in which the subject in his desire is dealing with the manifestation to him of his being as such, as possible author of the cut, this dimension is neglected; that in other words the aim of the analyst is directed towards the reduction of the neurotic position of desire, and not towards the disengagement from the position of desire as such beyond the entanglement of this particular dialectic which is that of the neurotic.

How can I come back again on these points to make you sense their articulation still better? Undoubtedly I have introduced it here along its purest cutting edge. It is quite certain that this draws along with it not only all the anecdotes of the (18) history of the subject, but also other structural elements in this past. I mean what we have manifested, highlighted at the proper moment, which is everything that refers as such to the drama of narcissism, to the relationship of the subject to his own image.

Of course when all is said and done it is here that there is inserted for the subject - Freud underlined it several times when it was appropriate and in specific terms - the fear of the loss of the phallus, the feeling also of the lack of the phallus. The ego, in other words, is involved, but let us notice then at this level that if it intervenes, if it can intervene at this place at which the subject may have to sustain himself in this complex dialectic in which he is afraid that he will lose his privilege in his relationship to the other, and indeed this is certainly not if the narcissistic relationship to the image of the other intervenes by reason of something which we could call the weakness of the ego, because after all in all the cases where we note such a weakness, what we are assisting at, is on the contrary a dispersal of the situation, even indeed a blocking of the situation.

After all I have only to make an illusion here to something which is familiar to all of you, which has been I think been translated in the Revue, to Melanie Klein's famous case, namely of this child who was well and truly introduced as such to this relationship of desire to the signifier, but who found himself with respect to the other, to the possible relationship on the imaginary plane, on the living plane of gesture and communication with the other, completely suspended, as Melanie Klein describes it to us.

We do not know everything about this case, and after all we (19) cannot say that Melanie Klein has done anything other than present us here with a remarkable case. And what this case demonstrates, is that undoubtedly this child who did not speak is already so open and so sensitive to the spoken interventions of Melanie Klein that for us, in our register, in the one that we are trying to develop here, his behaviour is really remarkable.

The only structures of the world which are accessible, tangible, manifest, manifestable for him from the first moments with Melanie Klein, are structures which carry in themselves all the characteristics of the relationship to the signifying chain. Melanie Klein designates them for us. There is the little chain of the train, namely of something which is made up of a certain number of elements hooked on to one another. There is a door which opens and closes. One might as well say, that which, when I was trying to show you in the possible uses of one or other cybernetic schema for our handling of the symbol, that which is the most simple form of the yes or no alternation which conditions the signifier as such. A door must be opened or closed.

The whole behaviour of the child is limited to this. The fact is nevertheless by simply touching on this in words which are all the same sentences and something essentially verbal, that from the first moments what does the child obtain from the intervention of Melanie Klein? His first reaction is in my opinion almost amazing for its exemplary character: it is to go and put himself - and it is in the text - between two doors. (20) Between the inner and outer door of the room, in a dark space regarding which it is surprising that Melanie Klein, who in some way saw so well the structural elements, like those of introjection and of expulsion, namely this limit between the exterior world and what one can call the interior darkness with respect to a subject, did not grasp the import of this intermediate zone which is nothing other than the one that we are distinguishing here: the one where desire is situated, namely this zone which is neither the exterior, nor the interior, articulated and constructed, so reduced in this subject, but that which one can call, because in certain structures of the primitive village we find the sort of cleared zones between the two, the zone of "no man's land", between the village and virgin nature, which is indeed the place where the desire of the little subject has broken down.

It is here that we possibly see the ego intervening, and of course it is in the whole measure that this ego is not weak, but strong, that there will come to be organised, as I have repeated already a hundred times, the resistances of the subject. The resistances of the subject in so far as they are the forms of the very coherence of the neurotic construction, namely of that in which he organises himself in order to subsist as desire, not to be the place of this desire, to be sheltered from the desire of the other as such, to see being interposed between its most profound manifestation as desire, and the desire of the other, this distance, this alibi which is the one in which he constitutes himself respectively as phobic, hysterical, obsessional.

(21) I will come back, it is necessary, to a developed example of a phantasy that Freud gives. It is by no means futile to come back to it after having taken this detour. It is the phantasy, a child is being beaten. Here one can grasp the moments which allow us to rediscover the structural relationship that we are trying to articulate today.

What do we have: the phantasy of obsessionals; girls and boys use this phantasy to arrive at what: at masturbatory jouissance. The relationship to desire is clear; what is the function of this jouissance? Its function here is that of any satisfaction of need in a relationship with the beyond that the articulation of a language determines for man. That is to say that the masturbatory jouissance is here not the solution to desire, it crushes it; exactly the way the child at the breast in the satisfaction of nursing crushes the demand for love with respect to the mother.

And as well this is almost marked by historical testimony. I mean, because we have made allusions from time to time to the hedonistic perspective, to its inadequacy for qualifying human desire as such - let us not forget after all the exemplary character of one of these points which are paradoxical as such, obviously left in the shadows of the opinion of those who have presented themselves in history as wise men, and wise men of a discipline whose end, qualified as philosophical, was precisely, for reasons which are after all valid because they are methodical, the choice, the determination of a posture with respect to desire, a posture which consists also from the beginning in excluding it, in making it And any perspective which is properly hedonistic participates in this (22) position of exclusion as is demonstrated by the paradoxical example which I will remind you of here, namely the position of the Cynics for whom in a quite categorical way - the tradition, from the mouth of Chrysippus if I remember rightly, testifies to it - namely that Diogenes the Cynic openly claimed, to the point of doing it in public as a demonstratory act, and not as an exhibitionistic one, the solution to the problem of sexual desire was, as I might say, within hand's reach for everybody, and he demonstrated it brilliantly by masturbating.

The phantasy of the obsessional is therefore something which of course has a relationship to jouissance, of which it is even remarkable that it can become one of its conditions, but whose structure Freud demonstrated for us has a value of what I designate as being its value as an index, because what this phantasy points to is nothing other than a feature of the subject's history, something which is inscribed in his diachrony. Namely that the subject in a past which is consequently forgotten, has seen, Freud's text tell us, a rival - whether he is of one sex or the other does not matter - being punished by the beloved being, on this occasion the father, and has found in this original situation her happiness.

How does the phantastical agency (instant) perpetuate as one might say this privileged instant of happiness? It is here that the intermediate phase that is designated for us by Freud takes on its demonstrative value. It is to the extent that at a time Freud tell us which can only be reconstructed - this is indicated (23) by the fact that in Freud we only find the testimony of certain unconscious moments which are properly speaking inaccessible as such. Whether he is right or wrong in the precise, particular case is not in question for the moment. As a matter of fact he is not wrong, but the important thing is that he designates this intermediate stage as something which can only be reconstructed.

And this intermediate stage between the historical memory in so far as it designates the subject in one of his moments of triumph, a historical memory which at the worst is only repressed, and which can be brought to light, which is why the phantastical agency (instant) plays there the role of index, eternalises this moment as one might say by making of it a point of attachment to something quite different, namely the desire of the subject; and this indeed only happens in relation to an intermediate moment which I would call here, even though it may be a point at which it can only be reconstructed, properly speaking metaphorical.

Because what is in question in this intermediate moment? This second phase which Freud tells us is essential for the understanding of the functioning of this phantasy? It is the following: it is that for the other, the rival brother who is the object of the anger and the punishment inflicted by the beloved object, the subject substitutes herself. Namely that in this second moment she is the one who is chastised.

We find ourselves here before the naked enigma of what this metaphor, this transference involves. What is the subject looking for here? What a strange path to subsequently give to her triumph is this fashion of herself passing in her turn (24) through the Caudine forks of what had been inflicted on the other. Do we not find ourselves here before the final enigma - and Freud also does not hide it - of what comes to be inscribed in the analytic dialectic as masochism, and whose predicament one sees after all presented here in a pure form. Namely that something in the subject perpetuates the happiness of the initial situation in a hidden, latent, unconscious situation of unhappiness.

What is involved in the second hypothetical moment is in sum an oscillation, an ambivalence, more precisely an ambiguity of what the act of the authoritarian person, on this occasion the father, involves by way of recognition. The jouissance taken here by the subject is that towards which she slides from an accident of her history to a structure in which she is going to appear as being, as such. The fact is that it is in the fact of being alienated, namely of substituting oneself here for the other as victim, that there consists the decisive step in her jouissance in so far as it culminates in the phantastical agency (instant) at which she is no longer herself only one. In part instrument of alienation in so far as it is dévalorisation.

It is "is beaten", on the one hand, and that is why up to a certain point I was able to tell you that it becomes purely and simply the phallic instrument in so far as it is here the instrument of her cancellation. Confronted with what? With "a child is being beaten", a faceless child, a child who is no longer anything but the original child, and not either the child that she herself was at the second moment, whose sex is not determined in any even special way. The examination of the (25) sequence of successive phantasies Freud speaks to us about shows this. He is confronted with what one can call a sort of extract of the object.

It is nevertheless in this relationship of the phantasy that we see emerging at this moment that which constitutes for the subject the privileged instant of his jouissance. We will say that the neurotic - and we will see the next time how we can oppose to it something very particular, not perversion in general, because here perversion plays a pivotal role in what we are exploring as structure, but where we can oppose to it something very special, and whose common factor does not seem to have been found up to now, namely homosexuality.

But to keep today to the neurotic, his most common, fundamental structure resides when all is said and done in the fact that if he is this desire desiring what?, something which when all is said and done is simply what permits him to sustain in its precariousness, his desire as such, without knowing that the whole phantasmagoria is constructed for that, namely that it is his very symptoms which are the locus in which he his jouissance. These symptoms which are nevertheless so little satisfying in themselves.

The subject therefore presents himself here as I would not say at all a pure being (un être pur), that which I began from to indicate what was meant by the relationship of this particular manifestation of the subject to the real, but a being for (un être pour). The ambiguity of the position of the neurotic is entirely here, in this metonymy which ensures that it is in this being for that there resides all his fear of being (son peur être).

Seminar 25t Wednesday 17 June 1959

There is something instructive, I would not go so far as to say in the errors, but even, especially, in the errors - or in the meanderings, if you wish ... You see being fairly constantly used the very hesitations, even the impasses, which manifest themselves in analytic theory, as being by themselves revelatory of a structure of the reality with which we have to deal.

In this respect, it is clear that there is something interesting, remarkable, significant for us in works which are not all that old because the one, for example, to which I will refer is from 1956 (the July - October number of the International journal of psychoanalysis, Vol. 37).

It is an article, I believe, by some of our Parisian colleagues; I will not designate them by name, because it is not their position as personal that I am aiming at in this way. It is an effort to clarify the meaning of perversion. And it is clear that in this article, extremely curiously reserved in its (2) conclusions, and from which there really only emerges this formally articulated conclusion, that there is not, consequently, any specific unconscious content in sexual perversions, because the same ... discoveries can be recognised in the case of neuroses and psychoses.

There is here something rather striking, which the whole article illustrates, and one cannot say in a fashion which is absolutely convincing, because, without even needing to stand back very far, it can be perceived that the whole article begins from a confusion - really constantly maintained - between perverse phantasy and perversion.

From the fact that there are conscious and unconscious phantasies which overlap, that phantasies manifest themselves, with the appearances of overlapping, in neuroses and in perversions, the conclusion is drawn - with an astonishing ease - that there is no fundamental difference, from the point of view of the unconscious, between neurosis and perversion.

We have here one of these very astonishing things, where certain reflections which, themselves, are presented without guarantees, rather free from the analytic tradition and are presented as a sort of revision of values and principles.

The only conclusion, indeed, that is finally come to, is that it (3) is an abnormal relationship that is eroticised in perversion.

It is therefore not at all a question of a relationship with an object, but rather a valorisation of a relationship for relationships as such erotism - which, all the same, after any sort of serious examination, after rereading it, can appear as nothing other than something which is a cause of normative virtue. This corresponds to the object. That it is eroticised, is not in doubt!

In fact, it is indeed with this question of the relationship of phantasy and perversion that we ourselves are led to work on today, after what we approached the last time, namely: we began to indicate the most general terms of the relationship of phantasy to neurosis.

A little word on history: what has happened in analysis - and it is important to recall it here - and I would say, in the light of our progress, perhaps to circumscribe it in a more rigorous fashion - is essentially the following: it is that in short, a very short time after having articulated the functions of the unconscious, this quite particularly in connection with hysteria, neuroses and the dream, Freud was led to pose the presence in the unconscious of what he called polymorphously perverse tendencies (in German: Polymorph-perverse Neigungen).

It comes from there, and it is there, for a certain time - long (4) superseded, of course! - that people remained. And what it seems failed to be articulated, is that what is in question, this notion of polymorphously perverse tendency, is nothing other than the following: it is the fact that he had discovered the structure of unconscious phantasies.

The structure of unconscious phantasies resembled the relational mode which opened out, which spread itself out in clear view, which shows itself in the perversions; and, thus, the notion of the consciousness of the polymorphously perverse tendency was posed at first.

When all is said and done - this could be said - this came from the fact that the form of these unconscious phantasies covered what? Something which is a part of perversion, which presents itself to us in perversion, under the following appearance, which we can try to articulate, namely: something which occupies the imaginative field, the desire, the one which constitutes the desire of the pervert; and this something which, in short, the pervert plays out, this something which means that this is presented in its obvious aspect, in clinical practice, is something which for us, with what we know, with the relationship that we have drawn between these phantasies and the history of the subject, where we succeed in attaching him, if you wish, to this history, is, in sum, that the phantasy of the pervert presents itself as something which one could call a sequence, I mean, as one could call it using an empty word in cinema films, I mean: a sequence cut off from the development of the drama like something that one sees appearing under the name - I am not sure of the term - of a "rush" this piece which in trailers appears to us on the screen as a few illuminating images which are designed to whet our appetite to come back next week to see the film, which precisely is announced in this way.

What is seductive in these images, really depends, in effect, on this aspect of their not being inserted into the chain, of having been broken off from the theme, and it is indeed something of this order that is in question in the phantasy of the pervert.

This we know, in so far as what analysis has taught us to see in it, is, in effect, something which, up to a certain degree, replaced in its context, in its dramatic sequence, that of the subject's past, can in different degrees, indeed at the cost of some modifications, retouching, reverse transformations, take up again its place and its meaning.

So that, this relationship that the phantasy of the pervert has to his desire, it is not for nothing - I mean that it really is in the highlighting of what we already, in our formulation, have already situated in terms of the value, of the position of desire (6) with respect to the subject, I mean this beyond of the nameable, this beyond of the subject in which is situated this desire, here are - I say it retrospectively and in passing - these few things which explain to us the particular quality the phantasy is invested with when it is avowed, whether it is that of a pervert or not, namely: this sort of embarrassment which must be specifically named, one which effectively holds back for a long time, often, the subjects who have been delivered from it, namely: this ridiculous aspect, which can only be explained, can only be understood if already we have been able to perceive the relationships that we have drawn between desire in its proper position and the field, the domain of comedy. This is only a reminder.

And having recalled this position, this function of the phantasy especially in connection with the pervert, and the problems that they have therefore posed immediately as regards what their real nature was, whether it was a sort of radical, natural nature, whether this nature of the perverse phantasy was a final term, or whether one should not see in it other things just as complex, just as elaborated, in fact just as significant as the neurotic symptom.

This indeed is why a whole elaboration which was carried out, was integrated into the problem of perversity, and which took on an essential part in the elaboration of what is called "object (7) relations" or of the relationship to the object, as having to be defined in an evolutionary fashion, in a genetic fashion, as regulating the stages, the phases of the development of the subject, not just simply in function of the "momentariness" of man, therefore sensual "phase-erogenic" of the subject, but between the mode of a relationship and the mode which each one of these phases defines.

It is from this that there were constructed - as much by Abraham as by Ferenczi and others - I do not need to remind you here of the people who began this - that there were constructed these tables of so-called empty correlative phases, on the one side, of reservoirs of dependency, libidinal forms of the ego, on the other hand. In this form of the libido, this structure of the ego seemed to correspond to and to specify a type of special relationship to reality.

You know what on the one hand, this sort of elaboration contributed by way of clarification, indeed enrichment, and what on the other hand it posed by way of problems. It is enough to refer to the least of the works, to the least of the concrete works, which try effectively to articulate in connection with a precise case, a precise form, to rediscover the correspondence, always established in a slightly theoretical way, to perceive that the problem is sometimes of itself, in its development (8) suggestive of something, of an estimation which it lacks.

I remind you therefore that it is to this, to this theme: "research into the totality of object relations", this is what we say, this is what I am designating (desire) when it is a question, for example, of an opposition like that between partial object and total object which appears in an elaborated form, which in our opinion is inappropriate; in the most recent elaborations, for example that of the famous notion of the "distance from the object", so dominant in the works, in the technical rules, to which I often alluded here, this notion of distance from the object, is one that a certain French author in particular wants to make decisive in the relationships of obsessional neurosis; as if it were not evident, and much more evident still that, for example, this notion of distance plays a decisive role, when one is simply trying to articulate, to articulate certain perverse positions, those of fetishism for example, in which the distance from an object is much more obviously manifested by the very phenomenology of fetishism. Many other forms can obviously be articulated in this sense.

And the first of the truths that we would have to contribute to this is that undoubtedly this notion of distance is even so (9) essential that after all, it may indeed perhaps be impossible to eliminate it as such from desire itself - I mean necessary for the maintenance, for the support, for the very safeguarding of the dimension of desire.

It is enough, in effect, to consider that if something is indeed able to correspond to the myth of relationship without distance to the object, it is in effect hard to see how what is properly speaking desire could be sustained. There is here something which, as I say, has a properly mythological form, that of a sort of accord. I would say that there are two aspects, two mirages, two appearances. - Of what I would call animal accord on the one hand; one could also say, moreover on the other hand, of what we must call mystical accord - is it not so? - with the object, which indeed is a residue within analytic elaboration of something which in no way coincides with the data of experience.

Also, moreover, what is indicated in analytic technique as what ought to correct, to rectify this so called bad distance maintained from the object by the obsessional. Everyone knows in the clearest fashion that this is indicated as something which should be overcome..... in the analytic relationship, and this by an ideal, indeed an idealising identification with the analyst, himself considered, on this occasion, as not the object, (10) but the prototype of a satisfying relationship to the object. We will have reason to come back to what such an ideal may correspond to exactly, in so far as it is realised in analysis. I already approached it, but we will have reason perhaps to situate it, to articulate it differently a little later.

In effect these problems were approached in a much more rigorous and much more serious fashion, still along the same path, in other contexts, in different groups, and I would put - as I already indicated to you here - in the first rank the articulations of Glover. I remind you of the place of the article - which I already quoted - in Vol. 14 of the International journal of psychoanalysis October 1933 on "The relation of perversion-formation to the development of reality-sense".

This is the preoccupation which is, for him, pursued in the sense of a genetic elaboration of the relationships of the subject to this world, the reality which surrounds him, and of an evolution which must be more closely circumscribed as much by reconstruction, by the analyses of adults, as by the direct apprehension of the behaviour of the child, carried out as rigorously as possible in a perspective that is renewed by analysis, that Glover tries to situate these perversions somewhere with respect to a chain.

He had already established a chain involving the dates, as one might say, of insertion of different psychic anomalies with which (11) analysis has to deal, and which led him to construct a series, the order of which lends itself, as is usually the case, to criticism, but which, without insisting any more, is constituted by the primitive, primordial character of psychotic disturbances, paranoid disturbances to be specific, after which there follow different forms of neurosis, which are articulated, are situated in a progressive order - I mean from before to after, from the origins towards what comes later - beginning with the obsessional neurosis which is found then exactly at the limit of paranoiac forms.

It is in so far as he placed there, somewhere, in the interval, in a previous article - the one from Vol. 13, namely of July 1932, part three of Vol. 13 of the International journal - "On the etiology of drug-addiction", in other words what we call les toxicomanies, that he thought he could situate with sufficient precision the relationships between paranoiacs and neurotics.

that he tries to situate there what the function of perversions could be, at what stage, at what date, with what mode of relationship of the subject to the real; in so far as the paranoiac form is linked to quite primitive mechanisms of projection and interjection, he is at that time, let us state it clearly, working altogether on the same plane, and expressly in (12) accord, moreover, with a fashion formulated with

You know that he became a spectacular opponent - it is on this plane that he adheres to the Kleinian elaboration and it is in so far as a mode of relationship to the object, very specific to this paranoid-type stage, considered as primitive, exists, that he situates, that he elaborates, articulates, understands the function of drug-addiction.

It is to this that there must be referred the passage which I read for you a few sessions ago, namely: the passage in which, in a very brilliant metaphorical fashion, where in a very instructive way, he does not hesitate to compare the primitive world of the child to something which resembles a butcher's shop, a public lavatory under shell-fire and a post-mortem room combined, to which undoubtedly a more benign organisation is brought by the transformation of this initial, inaugural spectacle of life, by the progress to the stage of a chemist's shop with its reserves of objects, some beneficent, the others maleficent.

This is therefore articulated in the clearest fashion, and is instructive, in so far as it signifies for us the direction in which research about the function of phantasy is carried on. In the direction of its functioning, as structural, as organiser of the discovery, of the construction of reality by the subject. (13) In this, there is no difference, in effect, between Glover and Mrs. Melanie Klein. And Mrs. Melanie Klein specifically articulates it for us as follows: the fact is that in short objects are successively conquered by the child, in so far - this is articulated in the article on "Symbol formation in the development of the ego" - in so far as, in the measure that objects less close to the needs of the child are apprehended, are charged with the anxiety linked to their use in the fundamentally aggressive, sadistic, relationships, which are, at the beginning, those of the child to his entourage, as a consequence of any frustration.

It is in so far as the subject displaces his interest onto more benign objects - which, in their turn, will be charged with the same anxiety - that the extension of the world of the child is conceived of as such.

Notice what this represents: this represents the notion that we should search for in a mechanism, in short, that we could call contraphobic, namely: that it is in so far as objects have first of all and primitively a phobic-object function, and the phobic object - as one might say - is looked for elsewhere, it is by a progressive extension of the world of objects in a contraphobic dialectic, this is the very mechanism of the conquest of reality.

Whether or not this corresponds to clinical experience, is really (14) not a question that is directly here within the field that we are dealing with. I think that directly, and in clinical experience, that there are many things which go against it, that there is a unilateral, a partial view of a mechanism which undoubtedly does come into the conquest of reality, but which does not constitute it properly speaking.

But it is not our goal here to criticise the 's theory, because it is compared to 's; every other point of view, we will take into account, we will bring into play; it is with respect to something, and the function which is desire.

Now this is something which immediately shows its consequences. The fact is that Glover ends up with a paradox which undoubtedly seems more instructive for him that for us, because it is not really something which should astonish us. He ends up with the following: he tries concretely to situate the different perversions with respect to his dialectic, to this mechanism as he tries to elaborate it, to reconstitute it, to reintegrate it into the notion of a regular development of the ego, in so far as it is supposed to be parallel to the modifications of the libido; in so far as one can inscribe, in fact, the destiny, the structuring of the subject, in terms of a pure individual experience of the conquest of reality. Everything is there, in (15) effect.

The difference between the theory that I give you of phobias for example, and the one that you will see in certain recent French authors, in so far as they try to indicate the genesis of phobia in structural forms of infantile experience, for example of the way in which the child has to arrange his relationships with those who surround him, of the passage from clarity to obscurity, it is a question of a purely experimental genesis, of an experience of fear, from which there is engendered and deduced the possibility of the phobia - the difference between this position and the one which I teach you is typically the following: it is to say that there is no kind of direct deduction of the phobia, if one does not admit the function, the exigency as such of a function of the signifier, which supposes its own proper dimension which is not that of the relationship of the subject to his entourage, which is not that of the relationship to any reality, except to the reality and the dimension of language, as such, from the fact that he has to situate himself as subject in the discourse, to manifest himself there as being, which is different.

There is something quite striking, about the appraisal of these phobias, even in the case of someone as perspicacious as Glover. He tries to explain the genesis, the stabilisation of a phobia, when he declares that it is undoubtedly more advantageous to (16) suffer from a tiger-phobia, when one is a child living in the streets of London, than to find the same phobia if one were living in the middle of the Indian jungle.

One may ask oneself if one could not retort that, effectively, it is not on this register that the problem is posed; that is to say: that after all one could even reverse the proposition, and say that a tiger-phobia in the Indian jungle is, on the contrary, it seems, more advantageous to adapt the child to a real adaptation, and that, on the contrary, it is very burdensome to suffer from a tiger-phobia, in so far as we know what is correlative to it, namely: that the behaviour of the child, indeed of the subject who is as advanced as possible in his development, at the moment that he is the prey of a phobia, is undoubtedly more encumbered, and is indeed without any relationship with the real.

In fact, something presents itself, which poses for Glover his problem in these terms: it is that he sees that the greatest possible diversity of reality-distortions is produced in perversions, and to be able to say that he cannot situate perversion in a genetic perspective except by fragmenting it, interpolating it at all the supposed or presupposed stages of development, namely: to admit just as much the existence of very archaic perversions, more or less contemporaneous with the (17) paranoid epoch, even theepoch, as other perversions which must be situated at very advanced stages, even indeed ones that are just phallic, but properly speaking at the phallic or indeed genital stages of development.

This does not seem to him to be an objection for the following reason: the fact is that he ends up giving to perversion the following definition: it is that in short perversion is one of the forms, for him - he cannot end up at anything else given the perspective that he has begun from - is one of the forms of reality testing.

It is to the extent - according to Glover - that, somewhere, something in the testing of reality does not come to fruition, fails, that perversion helps to patch over this flaw, this hole - is that not it - by a particular mode of the apprehension of the real as such, of the real whose occasion is a psychic real, a real projected, and on the other hand, introjected, that it is therefore properly speaking as a function of maintaining, of preserving a reality which is supposed to be threatened in its totality, it is in so far as perversion serves, if you wish, one might say, both as a patching, in the sense of a cloth, in the sense that one says that a cloth is patched, or again the keystone of a vault, which is something of a substitute one, somewhat shakey, somewhat (18) threatening, compromising the equilibrium of the whole of reality for the subject; in brief, it is only in a non-ambiguous fashion, as a form of salvation with respect to a supposed menace of psychosis, that perversion is conceived by Edward Glover.

This is a point of view. Perhaps certain observations can effectively show us something which appears to illustrate it, but there are many elements which demand that we should distance ourselves from it; besides the fact, that it seems quite paradoxical to make of perversion something which has this economic role, this economic role which many elements contradict.

were it only something which indicates to us that it is certain that the precariousness of the pervert's edifice, is not something, either clinically or in analytic experience, which strikes us, at least at first sight.

To indicate something here, I will not abandon this Kleinian dialectic without pointing out how it rejoins and initiates the problem that we are posing.

In effect, if we seek what is in question in the Kleinian dialectic, namely: the two stages that she distinguishes between the paranoid phase, then afterwards, the depressive phase, which is characterised, as you know, with respect to the first, by the relationship of the subject to his major predominant object: the mother, as a whole.

Previously, it is with these disjointed elements that he has to deal (19) between good and bad objects, with everything that this is going to establish in him which is that of projection and of introjection. This is how the paranoid barrier is characterised.

Now, what can we say in our perspective? I mean: let us try to understand, by means of the perspective that we ourselves articulate what is in question in this process.

This altogether inaugural process, placed at the beginning of the life of the subject, is that in short the reality of the first apprehensions of the object, as Mrs. Klein shows it, arises from the following: the fact is in short that the object - and, first of all, beyond the fact that it may be good or bad, profitable or frustrating - the fact is that it is significant.

Because the notion, the distinction which, if the opposition, as such, is strict - and I would say without nuance, without transition, without perceiving in any fashion that it is the same object which can be good or bad, at different times, namely: the mother - that there is here not the experience of the young subject, nor everything that it can involve in terms of transitional attitudes, but that there is clear opposition, a passage of the object, as such, to a function of signifying opposition which is at the basis of the whole Kleinian dialectic, and regarding which it is too little perceived - it seems to me - (20) that however well founded it may be, it is completely opposite, on the opposite side, on the opposite pole, that it is the contrary of this other element highlighted by our experience, namely: the importance of living communication, just as essential at the beginning for development, which is expressed, is manifested in the dimension of maternal care.

There is here something from another register which is contemporaneous, but which cannot be confused, and what Melanie Klein brings us, is a sort of primitive algebra, which one can say completely rejoins, in effect, what we are trying here to highlight under the name of the function of the signifier.

They are the primary, primitive forms of this function of the signifier, as such, which are rightly or wrongly, whether it is effectively present at that date or simply a Ruckphantasie, a phantasy, but a retrospective one; this is - we only have to record it - what Melanie Klein describes for us.

From then on, what value is going to be taken on by this limiting phase between the paranoid period with its organisation of good objects, which are as such interiorised, "internalised" - she says - by the subject, which are rejected

What is happening? How can we describe what is happening, from the moment that there intervenes the notion of the subject as a (21) whole, which is essential in order that the subject himself should consider himself as having an inside and an outside. Because when all is said and done, it is only from then on that it is conceivable that there should be manifested, be defined the processes of internalisation and externalisation, of introjection and of projection, which are going to be - for Melanie Klein - decisive for this structuration of the primitive animal.

With our points of reference, we see that what is in question is something which resituates this relationship, this primitive esquisse - as she herself has put it - of objects into good and bad with respect to this other register of the inside and the outside of the subject.

This something, which I think that we can without being too attracted to the Kleinian perspectives, which we can refer to what we call the mirror stage, it is in so far as the image of the other gives to the subject this form of the unity of the other, as such, that there can be established somewhere this division of inside and outside, with reference to which the good and the bad objects are going to be reclassified - the good in so far as they ought to come inside, the bad in so far as they should remain outside.

Well! What comes to be defined here in the clearest fashion - because it is imposed by experience - is the same thing as we can (22) say in our own discourse; namely it is: that the discourse which really organises the world of objects - I would say according to the being of the subject, at the beginning - extends beyond the one in which the subject himself recognises himself in narcissistic testing, the testing belonging to what is called "stage number one", namely: in which he recognises himself as mastery and as unique ego, in which he recognises himself therefore in a "narcissist" or narcissistic relation of identification of one image to another, in which he recognises himself as mastery of an ego.

It is in so far as something defines him in a first identification, in the one which is expressed here (explanations on the blackboard) at the level of the first identification, to the mother, as object of the first identification to the insignia of the other, it is in so far as this preserves for the subject an assimilating value which extends beyond what he is going to be able to put within himself in so far as this within is defined by his first experiences of mastery, of prestige, in so far as he is $i(o)$ of the other $i(o)$, typically and ideally, of this young counterpart, with whom we see him in the clearest possible fashion carrying out his experiences of mastery, it is in so far as what is referred , it is in so far as the two (23) experiences do not overlap, that - I do not say, me: the whole experience of development is organised - that necessarily we must admit this to understand what it is in question in what Melanie Klein describes for us.

In effect what defines this difference, this field X or I which is here, (explanations on the blackboard) which is at once part of the subject and, at the same time, not part of this subject, is what? It is this object whose paradoxical nature seems to surprise no one, beginning with the first fruits, or the premises that Melanie Klein poses; it is what she calls the "bad" internal object. The "bad" internal object presents itself for us right away in the Kleinian dialectic, in the most manifest fashion, as the problematic object, in the sense that, seen - as one might say - from outside where the subject is not subject, but where we should take it as a real being, we can ask ourselves: this bad object, to which the subject supposedly identifies itself, when all is said and done, is the subject it, or is he not it?

Inversely, seen from within, seen from the point of view of the subject, of the mastery of the first exercises of the subject to maintain himself, to affirm himself as subject, to contain himself, we should ask ourselves whether he has or he does not have this bad object, whose absolutely decisive role we know (24) from then on. The question which poses itself, is: does he have it or does he not have it?'

Because if we have defined "good" and "bad" objects as determinant of the process of the structuring by which the subject interiorises the good objects, and primitively makes them a part of himself, and rejects the bad as being what is not him, all the others, the paradox of the interiorised bad object comes to the forefront. What is meant by this sum (or this zone) of the first object in so far as the subject internalises it, as he both makes it his own, and in a way denies it as virtually bad?

It is clear that here the subsequent function of prohibition is precisely that which has the value of denying, thanks to which the bad object ceases to propose itself as a kind of permanent enigma, an anxiogenic enigma with respect to the being of the subject. Prohibition is precisely what introduces within this problematic function of the bad object this essential denying - this is what constitutes its prohibitory function - the fact is that if he is this bad object, he does not have it; in so far as he is it, is identified with it, it is forbidden for him to have it - the euphony in French between the subjunctive of the verb to have (il l'ait) and the indicative of the verb to be (il est) (25) should be used: in other words: "in so far as he is it, he does not have it; in so far as he has it, he is not it" (en tant qu'il l'est, il ne l'a pas; en tant qu'il l'a, il ne l'est pas).

In other words, the fact is that at the level of the bad object the subject experiments. It is - if I may express myself in this way - the servitude of his mastery. It is that the true master - everyone knows that he is beyond any face that he is somewhere in language, even though he cannot even be nowhere in it - the true master is the one who delegates the limited usage of the bad object as such, namely: of an object which is not situated with respect to the demand for an object which one cannot demand.

Because it is from there, in effect that the whole import of our data begins.

Beforehand, may I indicate to you that what can be read in a gripping fashion in the precise cases that are presented to us by Melanie Klein, is that in so far as he is manifestly in this impasse, in this field of the "nondemandable" as such, that we find this particularly inhibited child with whom she is dealing, and whom she presents to us in the article on "Symbol formation in the development of the ego".

Is it not clear that what she obtains, once she begins to speak to this child, is something which immediately crystallizes in a demand, a panic-stricken demand "Is the nurse going to come?" (26) and that, immediately afterwards, in the measure that the child is going to allow himself to get into contact again with his objects, which he appears from the beginning, in the experiment, to be singularly prepared for, there is something which she signals to us as a very astonishing, very decisive fact....because, as you remember, it is in the exercise of a sort of little cutting, of scratching with the help of the scissors by the child, who is far from being awkward, because he makes use of all sorts of elements, such as the door handles.... He had never been able to hold scissors. Here, he holds them, and in order to try to detach - and he manages it I - a little piece of coal from something which is not without signification either, because it is an element of the chain of the train, with which she has succeeded in getting him to play, namely a tender - without even wanting to go into here curious games and terms which could be constructed around this tender - which is also tender in English.... it is not the weather map... but la carte du tendre which here is offered to us - and it is in this little piece that the child, in truth, isolates, defines, situates himself in this something that he can detach from the signifying chain; it is in this remainder, in this tiny little pile, in this outline of an object, which only appears here under the form of little pieces, of a little piece, the very one which will provoke (27) all of a sudden his panicky sympathy, when he sees it in the form of pencil shavings on Melanie Klein's lap and, for the first time, will be moved in the presence of this other crying out: "poor Mrs. Klein".

Therefore desire is not there

It is from this first intuition that we start: which brings us back to the original conditions in which a subject comes to see us: desire is not demand. When the subject says "why is this happening?", what is he demanding? In principle, satisfaction and happiness. Except for the fact that every satisfaction does not involve happiness for him, far from it.

... to organise the history of the subject, as the history of analysis, as the history of technique, in the sense of something which ought to respond to this demand for satisfaction. In what way? By a way which is the following, namely: in trying to respond to the demand for satisfaction of the subject by a reduction of his desires to his needs.

Now, is there not here a paradox, since, on the other hand, all our experience - one could say - is sustained in this dimension, as obvious moreover for the subject as for us - for us, because everything that we have articulated is going to be resumed in (28) what I am going to say; and, for the subject, because, when all is said and done, the subject knows it very well when he comes to see us - I am told that someone is in the process of writing a very important thesis on "the social signification of analysis" and I am led to understand that in it there will be elements extremely rich from the point of view of experience and extremely well developed; I really hope so, because I think effectively that the social representation of analysis is much less distorted in the community as a whole than one imagines, that what will emerge from it in the clearest fashion is this thing which is frankly at the basis, at the very principle of what a subject implies in front of us by his very presence is what; it is that in the data of his demand there is the following: "that he does not trust his desire".

The common factor with which subjects approach us is the following: it is that "his desire, he does not trust it".

Though he may, as a result of these new contrivances, follow on after us in his reference, if needs be to desire, indeed even to its sublimation along the elevated pathways of love, it remains, at the beginning, that what characterises desire, is that there is something which, as such, cannot be demanded, and in connection with which the question is posed, and that that is (29) what is, properly speaking, the field and the dimension of desire.

You know that to introduce this division, this dialectic of desire - which is something I did at a very precise date, namely: two and a half years ago now - I started from what? - from what Freud said about the Oedipus complex in women.

Is not this, is not what I have just articulated legible in the fact that, at the level of analytic experience, at the level of unconscious experience, there is a place for separating out the following, what the woman demands at the beginning, that through which - Freud tells us - she enters into the Oedipus complex?

It is not to have a satisfaction, it is to have what she does not have, as such.

It is a question, as you know, of the phallus.

It is nothing other than the source which gives rise to all the problems which will arise to try to reduce the dialectic of the maturation of desire in women to something natural; the fact is that, whether we arrive or not at this reduction, what we have to overcome is a fact of experience; a fact of experience which is the following, that the little girl, at a moment of her development - after all, it does not matter to us whether it is a primary or a secondary process; it is a striking and irreducible process - what she demands to have is namely; the phallus, it is (30) to have it at this critical moment of development that Freud highlights, it is to have it at the place where she should have it if she were a man. This indeed is what is in question; there is no ambiguity about it; and the whole discussion about what happens implies that in fact, even when she manages to get it - because the woman is in a very privileged position compared to the man - this phallus, which is a signifier, I really mean: a signifier she can really have. This is even what constitutes her advantage and the relative simplicity of her affective problems, compared to those of men.

But we must not allow this relative simplicity to blind us, because it nevertheless remains, because of the starting point, that this real phallus that she can have, namely: that it is introduced into her dialectic, into her evolution, as a signifier, she will always have it at least at one level of her experience. (I am always reserving the limiting possibility of the perfect union with a being, namely: of something which completely blends, in an embrace, the beloved being with his organ.) But what constitutes the test of our experience and the very difficulties that we have to deal with in the sexual order, is situated precisely by this: it is that this ideal, poetic, indeed apocalyptic moment of the perfect sexual union, is only situated at the limit, and that with which, in fact, in the ordinary (31) testing of experience, the woman has to deal, even when she has arrived at the realisation of her femininity, is the phallic object, always qua separated. It is even because she is operating, as such, and in this register, that her action, her incidence may be perceived by the man as castrating.

Moreover, this, of course, remains for her, until analysis, unconscious, just as there remains unconscious the following: the fact that this phallus which she does not have, symbolically she is it, in so far as she is the object of desire of the other. But she does not know the first of these things any more than the second.

This specific position of the woman is valid in so far as it is unconscious to her, which means in so far as it is only valid for the other, for the partner; she (il?) remains nevertheless from the formula, the very particular formula in which her relationship is resumed, his phallus; the fact is that paradoxically in the unconscious she both is it and has it.

We have here one of the most singular effects of the relationship to discourse; the fact is that it is at this position that at the ideal end point, the ideal relationship of the woman, in her phantastical world, in the unconscious, in the best of cases she is it and she has it - except for the fact that she does not know it, except by her desire.

(32) And through her desire of this there results - you will see it in the continuation of what I am developing - that there is a singular similarity between her formula, if one can express oneself in this way, between her transsubjective formula, her unconscious formula, and that of the pervert.

If everything that we have discovered about the unconscious economy of the woman consists in the symbolic equivalences between the phallus and all the objects that can be separated from her, including in the first place the most natural object to be separated from her, namely: her infant, - if it is here that she finds herself having to situate herself, in a series of phallic equivalents by which I am only reproducing here the test of analytic doctrine, we are going to find ourselves in the presence of the following: that for her, in the most natural way in the world, natural objects end up by realising this function of object of desire, in so far as they are objects from which one is separated.

And it is this which explains, I think, the lesser frequency of perversion in the woman. It is that inscribed in the cultural context - there is no question of it being elsewhere - her natural satisfactions naturally find - if I may express myself in this way - a way to situate themselves in the dialectic of separation, as such.

In the dialectic of the object signifier of desire, and this is what the analytic authors - there is more than one of them - (33) have expressed very clearly, and in a fashion which will appear no doubt much more concrete than what I have just said, by saying that if there is less perversion in women than in men, it is because in general they satisfy their perverse affects (?) in their relationships with their children. (Smiles) This is why not that your daughter is mute, but why there are some children that we - as analysts - have to deal with.

We come back, as you see, to first truths, but it is not a bad thing to come back to them by a path which is clear and correct. I will take the opportunity also to indicate something to you: to indicate something to you destined, at least for the masculine part of my audience, to temper the astonishment, even the impatience they may feel before one of the singular properties of their relationships with their partners of the other sex. I would like to talk about what is usually called jealousy.

As usual, the analyst, who has brought so much clarity, has also of course brought just as much obscurity. "No progress", said Nestroy, who was so appreciated by Freud "is half as great as one imagines it to be".

The problem of jealousy, and especially of feminine jealousy (34) has been submerged in analysis in the quite different form of masculine jealousy.

Feminine jealousy which in clear-cut dimensions, dimensions as distinct as the style of love in the two different sexes, is really something which, I believe, can really not be situated except at the most radical point.

And if you remember my little drawing of the demand for a relationship to the other, of the subject who questions this relationship and who, as I might say, strikes the other in it with a signifying collapse so that he appears himself as collapsed in the presence of something which is the remainder of this division, this something irreducible, undemandable, which is precisely the object of desire, it is in so far as for the subject, who in so far as she makes herself an object of love, the woman, on this occasion, sees clearly in this remainder this something which is the most essential in her, that she accords so much importance to the manifestation of desire.

Because, indeed, it is quite clear that, in experience, love and desire are two different things, and that one must all the same speak clearly and say that one can love one being very much and desire another.

It is precisely in the measure that the woman occupies this position, and that she knows very well the value of desire, (35) namely: that beyond all the sublimations of love, desire has a relationship to being even in its most limited, its most shortsighted, its most fetishistic and let us say the word, its most stupid form.

Even in the extreme form, in which in the phantasy the subject is presented and in which the subject is literally no longer anything but a support and a sign, the sign of this signifying remainder of relationships with the other, it is nevertheless to this that when all is said and done the woman will attach the value of final proof that it is indeed to her that one is addressing oneself.

The beloved, with all the tenderness and devotion one can imagine... it nevertheless remains that if a man desires another woman, she knows that even if what the man loves is only her slipper, or the hem of her dress, or the paint that she has on her face, it is nevertheless here that the homage to being is produced.

It is necessary from time to time to recall the first truths, and it is for this reason that I think you will excuse me the perhaps exaggerated tone which I gave given to this digression.

And, now, let us see where things go, namely with respect to this zone of the object in which there is established this ambiguity, and what is the function as such of the phallus?

Already it cannot but appear to you but as particularly outlined (36) in what I have just said concerning the bad internal object.

That if it can be said that if the paternal metaphor - as I called it - establishes there, in the form of the phallus, a dissociation which is exactly that which overlaps the general form, as might be expected, which I gave to you as being that of prohibition, namely that: either the subject is not it, or the subject does not have it.

This means that if the subject is it, the phallus - and this is illustrated immediately in this form, namely: as object of the mother's desire - then he does not have it, namely he does not have the right to make use of it, and this is the fundamental value of the law which is called the prohibition of incest, - and that, on the other hand/ if he has it - namely if he has realised the paternal identification - then there is one thing certain, it is that he is not this phallus.

This is what is signified, at, what I would call the most radical symbolic level, by the introduction of the dimension of the Oedipus complex. And everything that will be elaborated around this subject will come back always to this: "either.... or...." which introduces an order at the level of the object that one cannot demand.

How is the neurotic to be characterised? - Well! The neurotic, of course, uses this alternation: it is in so far as he situates (37) himself fully at the level of the Oedipus complex, at the level of the signifying structuring of the Oedipus complex, as such, that he makes use of it, and in a fashion that I would call metonymical, and which I would even call, in so far as here he is not it, presents itself as primary, with respect to "she does not have it", which I would call a regressive metonymy. I mean that the neurotic is the one who uses the alternative; in this metonymical form, in the fact, that, for him, "not to have it" is the form in which he affirms himself: and in a masked fashion: "to be it" - I mean the phallus.

He does not have the phallus, in order to be it, in a hidden, unconscious fashion. And in order not to have it, in order to be it - it is the rather enigmatic "being for" (pour être) around which I organised, I think, our last conversation - it is "another who has it", while he "is it" in an unconscious way.

Pay careful attention to this: the fact is that the basis of neurosis is constituted by this: it is that in his function as desirer, the subject takes on a substitute.

Take the obsessional, and look effectively at what happens at the the end of his complicated procedures; he is not the one who enjoys (jouit). In the same way for the hysteric, she is not the one who enjoys. The imaginary substitution that is in question, and, precisely, the substitution for the subject, at the level that I teach you here to situate him, namely....., it is (38) the substitution of his ego, as such, for this subject concerning the desire that is in question.

It is in so far as he substitutes his ego for the subject that he introduces demand into the question of desire. It is because someone - who is not him, but his image - is substituted for him in the dialectic of desire that when all is said and done he can demand - as experience allows us constantly to put our finger on - only substitutes.

What is characteristic in the experience of the neurotic, and what is on the same level as his own feeling, is that everything that he demands, he demands for something else.

And the result of this scene, through which the imaginary, in short, as you see, comes here to play this role in what I called the regressive metonymy of the neurotic, has another consequence, because in this domain it cannot be stopped: the subject is substituted for himself, at the level of his desire; he can only demand substitutes, while believing that he is demanding what he desires.

And, further on again, we know from experience that because of the very form that is in question, namely of the ego in so far as it is the reflection of a reflection, and the form of the other, he substitutes himself also for the one from whom he demands.

Because it is quite clear that, nowhere more than in the neurotic, does this separated ego as easily come to take the (39) place of this separated object which I designated for you as being the original form of the object of desire.

The altruism of the neurotic, contrary to what one says, is permanent. And there is no more common path to the satisfactions he is seeking than what one can describe as "devoting oneself then to satisfying, as far as one can for the other, all the demands, which he well knows, however, constitute in his case a perpetual failure of desire" or, in other words: "to blind oneself in one's devotion to the other to one's own dissatisfaction".

These are not, I think, things which are comprehensible, outside the perspective that I am trying to articulate for you here, namely when all is said and done, that the formula $S(0)$ is transformed into something, if you wish, with reservations and summarily, of the identification of his unconscious being; and this is why we will give to it the same sign as to S barred (S), namely the phallus barred; namely: that in the presence of an object it is the most general form of an object of desire, which is that other in so far as he is situated there, and rediscovers himself there.

We must now pass on to perversion.

But I it is late. I will put off therefore till the next time the rest of this discourse. If I cannot make it advance more (40) quickly, you should not see in this any more than the effect of the difficulties in which we have to make our way.

(Prolonged applause).

Seminar 26: 24 June 1959

The difficulty that we are dealing with does not date from today or yesterday. It is one of those after all about which the whole moralistic tradition has speculated, namely those of fallen desire (desir dechu). I do not need to evoke for you from the distant past the bitterness of wise men or of pseudo-wise men about the disappointing character of human desire.

The question takes on an explicit form in analysis in so far first of all as the first analytic experience shows us the in their partial nature, the relationship to the object supposing a complexity, a complication in the incredible risk there is in the fitting together of these partial drives, and making the contingency of the object depend on this fitting together; the combination of partial drives really shows us the fundamentally problematic character of any access to the object which to spell it out shows us a theory, only at the cost of showing it to be completely contrary to what we might think in a first approach to the notion of instinct which in any case, even if we keep its finalistic hypothesis extremely flexible, remains nevertheless - every theory of instinct whatever it may be is a theory as one might say of the centring of the object. Namely that the processes in the living organism ensure that an object is progressively fixed in a certain field, and is captured there by a certain behaviour, a process which of itself is presented under the form of the progressive concentration of the field.

The process, the dialectic which analysis shows us is completely different: that one progresses on the contrary by the addition, by the combination of these partial drives, and which comes to (2) conceive of the advent of a satisfying object, the one which corresponds to the two poles of masculinity and of femininity at the cost of the synthesis of all sorts of interchangeable, variable drives, and of combinations that are necessary to arrive at very diverse types of success.

This is why in a certain fashion you may think that in defining by the $ of o, placed here in the schema or the graph which we make use of to explain, to expose the position of desire in a speaking subject, that what is there is nothing other than a simple notation. In desire what is required is the relationship of the subject to the object; that o is the object.

The capital S is the subject, and nothing more. There is nothing more original in this notation than this little bar which recalls that the subject, at this high point which is represented by the presentation of desire, is himself marked by the word. And after all it is nothing other than this something which recalls that the drives are fragmented.

It should be carefully noted that the import of this notation is not limited to that. This notation does not designate a relationship of the subject to the object, but the phantasy, a phantasy which sustains this subject as desiring, namely at this point beyond his discourse where it is a question of This notation signifies that in the phantasy the subject is present as subject of the unconscious discourse. The subject is here present in so far as he is represented in the phantasy by (3) the function of cutting which is essentially his own, of cutting in a discourse, and which is not just any discourse, which is a discourse which escapes him: this discourse of the unconscious.

This is essential, and if you follow the thread you cannot fail to be struck by the extent to which it highlights a dimension always omitted when we are dealing with perverse phantasies.

I already indicated to you the other day the prudence with which what we call the perverse phantasy should be approached. The perverse phantasy is not perversion. The biggest mistake is to imagine that we all understand perversion in so far as we are, namely in so far as we are more or less neurotic in some way, in so far as we have access to these perverse phantasies. But the comprehensive access that we have to perverse phantasy does not for all that give the structure of perversion, even though in a way it calls for its reconstruction.

If you will allow me to take a few liberties in my discourse today, namely to take a little gambol outside it, I would evoke for you this book marked by this stamp of our contemporary epoch which is called Lolita. I am not requiring you to read this book any more than a series of others which seem to indicate a certain constellation of interest precisely around this mainspring of desire. There are better things written than (4) Lolita on what one could call the theoretical plane. But Lolita is all the same an exemplary enough production.

For those of you who open it there will be nothing obscure as regards the function devolved onto a And obviously in a way that is all the more unambiguous since one can say that curiously the author positions himself in a quite articulate opposition to what he calls Freudian charlatanism, and nevertheless on several occasion, in a fashion which he really does not perceive, gives the clearest witness to this symbolic function of the image of the Including the dream which he has a little while before approaching it in a decisive fashion and which makes it appear to him in the form of a hairy hermaphrodite monster.

But this is not what is important. The important thing in the structure of this work which has all the characteristics of the relationship of the subject to desire, to what is properly speaking a neurotic phantasy, for the simple reason which explodes in the contrast between the first and the second volume, between the sparkling character of desire while it is being meditated on while it occupies some thirty years of the life of the subject, and its prodigious collapse bogged down in a reality, with no means of even reaching the partner, which constitutes the second volume, and the miserable journey of this couple across America the beautiful.

What is important, and in some way exemplary, is that simply in virtue of a constructive coherence, the pervert properly speaking shows himself, appears in an other, an other who is no longer the double of the subject, who is something quite different, who appears there literally as his persecutor, who appears in the (5) margin of the adventure as if - and in effect this is what is most openly admitted in the book - the desire that is in question in the subject can only live in an other, and where it is literally impenetrable and completely unknown.

The character who is substituted for the hero at a given moment of the plot, the character who is properly speaking the pervert the one who really has access to the object, is a character the key to whom is given in the last groans that he gives when he collapses from the shots of the hero's revolver. This sort of negative of the principal character who is the person in whom there effectively reposes the relationship to the object has here something quite exemplary which may serve us as a schema to understand that it is only at the cost of an extrapolation that we can produce the perverse structure.

The structure of desire in neurosis is something of a quite different nature to the structure of desire in perversion, and all the same these two structures oppose one another. In fact the most radical of these perverse positions of desire, the one that is put by the analytic theory at the most original point, at the basis of development, and also at the terminal point of the most extreme regressions, namely masochism, this can we not recall here, allows us to put our finger, in a proof obtained through the phantasy, on the degree to which the levels are ignored in the fashion in which we precipitate ourselves in analysis to formulate in these telescoped formulae the nature of what we are in the presence of.

(6) I take masochism here because it will serve us as a pole for this approach to perversion. And everyone knows that the attempt is being made to reduce masochism in its diverse forms to a relationship which, in the final term, would present itself as a quite radical relationship, of the subject in his relationship to his own life; to integrate it, in virtue of valid and precious indications that Freud gave on this subject, with a death instinct through which it is supposed to make itself felt in an immediate fashion and at the very level of the drive of the vital force considered as organic, something which is contrary to the organisation of the instincts.

No doubt there is here something which, at the limit, presents an a way of aiming, a perspective on which no doubt it is not at all indifferent to fix oneself in order to pose certain questions.

In short do we not now see, by posing as it is situated here by the letters which indicate its relationship on the schema, the essential position of desire in a division of the relationship of the subject to discourse, something that appears in a glaring way, and which it is wrong to neglect within the phantastical aspect of what is called masochism. Of this masochism about which, while making of it something that emerges from the most radical of instincts, the analysts are without any doubt in agreement in perceiving that the essential of masochistic jouissance cannot go beyond a certain limit of maltreatment. Some features or other, because they are highlighted are destined to bring us some illumination I think at least on a medium, on something which allows us to realise there the relationship of the subject, and this is essential, to something which is properly speaking the discourse of the other.

(7) Is it necessary to have heard the confidences of a masochist, is it necessary to have read the least of the numerous writings which are consecrated to it, some more or less good examples of which have come out recently, in order to recognise an essential dimension of masochistic jouissance linked to this sort of particular passivity that the subject experiences and enjoys, in representing his fate as being played out above his head between a certain number of people who are there around him, and literally without taking his presence into account, everything that is being prepared about his fate being discussed before him without him being in the least taken into account.

Is this not one of the features, one of the most obviously striking, perceptible dimensions on which moreover the subject insists as being one of the constituents of the masochistic relationship.

Here therefore in short is the thing in which there is grasped, in which there appears something one can put one's finger on, that it is in the constitution of the subject qua subject, and in so far as this constitution is inherent to the discourse, and in so far as the possibility is pushed to the extreme, that this discourse as such here develops in the phantasy, takes the subject as nothing, that we find one of the first steps. This indeed is a rather important step because it is on this, from this, that a certain number of symptomatic manifestations will develop. A step which will allow us to see at the horizon the relationship that there can be between the death instinct considered as one of the most radical agencies, and this something in the discourse which gives this support without which (8) we would in no way have access to it, this support of this non-being which is one of the original, constitutive, implicit dimensions at the very roots of all symbolisation.

Because we have already for a whole year, the year that we consecrated to Beyond the pleasure principle, articulated this function proper to the symbolisation which is essentially in the foundation of this cut, therefore that by which the current of the original tension, whatever it may be, is caught up in a series of alternatives which introduce what one can call the fundamental machine which is properly what we rediscover as detached, as disengaged at the source of the subject's schizophrenia, in which the subject identifies himself to the discordance of this machine compared to the vital current, to this discordance as such.

In this sense, I point out to you in passing, you put your finger here, in an exemplary fashion, which is at once radical and quite accessible, on one of the most prominent forms of the function of the Verwerfung. It is in so far as the cut is both constitutive and at the same time irredeemably external to the discourse in so far as it constitutes him, that one can say that the subject, in so far as he identifies himself with the cut, is Verworfen. This is how he apprehends himself, and perceives "himself as real.

All I am doing here is to indicate to you in a different form, not I believe a fundamentally distinct one, but undoubtedly articulated and deepened differently, of the "I think therefore I am". I mean that it is in so far as the subject participates in this discourse - and the only thing that is added to the Cartesian dimension, is that this discourse is a discourse which escapes him, and which helps him without knowing it - it is in so far as he is in the cut of this discourse that he is to the supreme degree an "I am" which has this singular property in this reality which is really the last one in which the subject grasps himself, namely the possibility of cutting the discourse somewhere, of punctuating it. This property where his essential being lies, his being in which he perceives himself in so far as the only real intrusion that he brings radically into the world as subject, does not exclude however from all other living relationships, to the point that all the detours that we analysts know about are required, for "I" to be reintegrated into it.

We spoke briefly the last time about the way things happen for neurotics. As we said, for the neurotic the problem passes by way of the paternal metaphor, by way of the fiction, real or not, of the one who peacefully enjoys the object, at the price of what? Of something perverse. Because as we have said, this metaphor is the mask for a metonymy. Behind this metaphor of the father, as subject of the law, as peaceful possessor of jouissance, is hidden the metonymy of castration. And if you look at it carefully, you will see that the castration of the son is here only the continuation and the equivalence of the father's castration.

Like all the myths behind the primitive Freudian myth of the father - and the primitive myth of the father indicates it well enough: Chronos castrates Jupiter, Jupiter castrates Chronos before coming into his heavenly kingship.

The metonymy in question depends in the final analysis on the following: the fact is that there is only ever one phallus in the game; and this is precisely what in the neurotic structure (10) must be prevented from being seen. The neurotic cannot be the phallus except in the name of the other. There is therefore someone who has it, who is the one on whom his being depends. He does not have what everyone knows is called the castration complex. But if nobody has it he naturally has it still less.

The desire of the neurotic, if you will allow me this formula which is a little summary for something that I would like to give you a sense of here, it is in so far as it is entirely dependent, as the whole development of Freud's work indicates to us, on this mythical guarantee of the good faith of the signifier to which the subject must attach himself in order to be able to live other than in a state of vertigo. This allows us to arrive at the formula that the desire of the neurotic - and everyone knows that there is a close, historical relationship between the anatomy that Freudianism gives to this desire, and something that is characteristic of a certain epoch that we are living, and regarding which we cannot know under what human form, vaguely vaticinated by prophets of different dimensions, it will culminate, or collapse.... but what is certain, is that something is tangible for us in our experience, provided we are not afraid to articulate it: it is that the desire of the neurotic, I would say in a condensed fashion is what arises where there is no god.

You must not think that I am saying what I have not said, namely that the situation is simpler when there is one. The question is the following: that it is at the level of the suspension of (11) this supreme guarantee which is what the neurotic hides within himself, that there is situated and comes to a halt, and is suspended this desire of the neurotic. This desire of the neurotic is something which is only a desire at the horizon of all his behaviour.

Because - and you will allow me to communicate to you one of these formulae which will allow you to recognise the style of a behaviour, we will say that with respect to this desire in which he situates himself, the neurotic is always at his own horizon, that he prepares its advent. The neurotic, if you will allow me an expression which I believe faithfully represents all sorts of things that we see in daily experience, is always preoccupied with packing his bags, or examining his conscience - it is the same thing - or with organising his labyrinth - it is the same thing. He gets his bags together, he forgets them or he puts them in the left luggage, but it is always a question of bags for a journey that he never takes.

This is absolutely essential to consider if we wish to perceive clearly that there is a total contrast, whatever may be said about it by a lazy form of thinking which drags itself like a snail along the phenomenon, without having the will to gather together in it at any moment a perspective, some perspective or other. It is question of opposing to this the structure of perverse desire.

In the case of the pervert of course it is also a question of a gap. There cannot also but be a question, because this is the fundamental relationship, of the subject suppressing his being in the cut. It is a question of knowing how in the case of the pervert this cut is experienced, is supported.

(12) Well here undoubtedly the work, throughout the years, of analysts, in so far as their experiences with perverse patients have allowed them to articulate theories which are sometimes in contradiction, out of tune with one another, but suggestive of the order of difficulty that they have to deal with, is something that we can in a way take into account. I mean that we can speak about as a material which itself betrays certain structural necessities which are those properly speaking which we are trying to formulate here.

I would say therefore that in this attempt that we making here to establish the real function of desire, we can include even this discrete delusion, even this well organised delusion to which those who have approached this subject have been lead way of these , I mean, psychoanalysts. I am going to take an example of this.

I believe that at the present time taking every thing into account no one has better spoken I believe about perversion than a very discreet man and one who is personally full of humour, I mean Mr. Gillespie. I recommend to those who read English, they will get a lot out of it, the first study by Gillespie who approached this subject in connection with fetishism in the form of an article called "A contribution to the study of fetishism" (I.J.P. October 1940), then the notes that he devoted to the "Analysis of sexual perversions", in No. 23 (1952) Part 4, and finally the last one he wrote in the issue of July-October 1956 (No. 37, Part 4 and Part 5): "The general theory of perversions".

(13) Something will stand out from this for you: it is that someone who in short is so free, and judges rather well the different avenues along which attempts have been made to approach the question, which is clearly much more complex naturally than can be imagined in a summary perspective, the one which would see perversion as being purely and simply the drive showing itself itself openly. This is not to say either, as has been said, that perversion can be resumed in a sort of approach which tends in short to make it homogeneous with neurosis. I will go straight to what it is a question of expressing, to what will serve us in future as a reference point for questioning perversion in different ways. The notion of splitting is essential to it, already showing something which we can congratulate ourselves on - and do not think that I am going to rush into it right away as something which overlaps in a way the function, the identification of the subject to the split or the cut of discourse, which is the one where I teach you to identify the subjective component of the phantasy. This is only precisely the kind of haste that is implied in this recognition, which has already been put forward, and which has already provided on occasion a sort of glimpse which is a little shameful of himself in the case of one of the writers who have busied themselves with perversion.

In order to testify to this I need only refer to the third case to which Mr. Gillespie refers in the second of the articles. It is the case of a fetishist. I will sketch this case out for you briefly. It is the case of a 30 year old fetishist whose phantasy expressly proves itself after analysis to be that of (14) being split in two by the mother's split whose penetrating prow as I might say is represented here by his bitten breasts, as well as by the split that he has just penetrated and which suddenly changes into a In short a whole return to a decomposition, a recomposition by what Mr. Gillespie calls castration anxiety, is referred to a series of unfoldings where there also intervenes the primitive exigency for the mother or the primitive regret for the mother, and on the other hand a conception, not demonstrated I must say, but supposed when all is said and done at the end of the analysis by the analyst, a kistanist (?) conception with identification to the split.

We can say that at the end of the article Mr. Gillispie writes with this type of glimpse or half-assumed, interrogative, questioning intuition, but which is really in my opinion quite indicative of the extreme point to which is lead someone who follows attentively, I mean after this development over time, after this explanation which analysis alone gives us of what is found at the depths of the perverse structure: "The configuration of the material at this point led me to a speculation about the phantasy associated with the split ego..." The split ego (L'ego refendu), if we accept this term of refendu which is used freely enough to speak about this splitting upon which Freud in a way ended his work. Because you know I think, the unfinished article of Freud on the splitting of the ego, the pen fell from his hand as one might say and he left unfinished this article (14) which was found after his death.

This splitting of the ego "led me to a speculation about the phantasy associated with the split ego and the split object". It is the same word that we can use if we use this term. It is the split ego and the split object.

"Is not the female genital" - it is Gillespie who asks the question - "the split object par excellence, and cannot the phantasy of a split ego arise from an identification with this split genital? I am aware", he says, "that when we speak of the splitting of the ego and of the object we are referring to mental mechanisms which we assume to underlie the phenomena... ", I mean by that that we are doing science, that we are dealing with scientific concepts, "... and that phantasies pertain to a different level of discourse."

The order of interrogation that Mr. Gillespie poses here is interesting.

"... nevertheless, phantasies, our own no less than our patients' must always play a part in the way that we conceptualise these underlying processes. It seems to me, therefore, that the phantasy of being oneself split in pieces just as the vulva is split may well be very relevant to the mental mechanism of splitting of the object and introjection of the split object, leading to splitting of the ego."

"It is implicit, of course, in such a phantasy of the vulva as a split object that it was once intact, and that the splitting is the result of a sadistic attack, whether by the father or by oneself."

(16) It is quite clear that we find ourselves here before something which, for a mind as prudent and measured as that of Mr. Gillespie, can scarcely fail to strike us as something where he himself is playing at and going to the extremes of a line of thought by reducing in a way to a sort of completely primordial identificatory schema what can then serve us as an explanation for something which is on this occasion nothing less than the very structure of the personality of the subject, because what is in question throughout this whole article - there is not only this case to be quoted - is this something so tangible and which decomposes itself in the transference in the case of perverts, namely splittings which are what one could call on this occasion veritable divisions of the personality. To trace in a way the division of the personality of the pervert upon the two valves of the original organ of phantasy, is something which is sure on this occasion to make us smile, or even to baffle us.

But in fact what we find in effect, and here this should be grasped at every level and in extremely different forms of the formation of the personality of the pervert, is something that I have already indicated for example in one of my articles, the one that I wrote in connection with the case of Andre Gide which has been studied in such a remarkable way by Professor Delay. It is something also which is presented as an opposition between two identificatory aspects. The one more especially linked to the narcissistic image of oneself i(o), on the one hand, which is what regulates in the case of this illustrious patient whose confidences we have in a thousand forms in a work - and of course we should take into account the dimensions of this work, because (17) it adds something to the equilibrium of the subject, and I do not want to develop fully in this connection what I am indicating to you here, because after all our time is almost up this year, I have to give, to throw out a few indications about what will come later what our point of view allows us to approach: it is the relationship that there is in the title which I gave it, which in the first place is particularly striking here, between precisely what this schema articulates, namely desire and the letter.

What does this mean, if not that it is in this direction that there should be sought properly speaking in the reconversion of desire to this production which is expressed in the symbol, which is not the super-reality that it is believed to be, but on the contrary is essentially due to its breaking up, to its partly signifying decomposition; I am saying that it is in the reconversion of the impasse of desire into this signifying material that we should situate, and we should do this if we wish to give an appropriate meaning to the term, the process of sublimation as such.

Our Andre Gide, undoubtedly, deserves to be situated in the category that is posed for us by the problem of homosexuality. And what do we see: we see this double relationship to a divided object in so far as it is the reflection of this graceless, even disgraced, boy as one writer has put it, that the little Andre Gide was at the beginning; and that in this furtive relationship to a narcissistic object the presence of the phallic attribute is essential. Gide is homosexual. But it is impossible, it is the merit of this work to have shown it, it is completely impossible to (page 18 missing in Master Copy)

(19) that our friend Gribouille has become.

"An absurd fact", the writer cried to his interlocutor. "But this is just the reason why I am recounting it. It is the truth. And no doubt the grandmother scarcely thought that she was writing here something disgusting. But I bear witness to the fact that no page of Aphrodite could have disturbed any schoolboy as much as this metamorphosis of Gribouille into a vegetable disturbed the little ignorant boy that I was."

I will add in order to come back to it later, because its dimension should not be overlooked, the other example that he gives us of this phantasy which provoked this primitive jouissance.

"There was also in a stupid little piece by Mme. de Segur: Les diners de Mile Justine, a passage in which the domestics took advantage of the absence of their masters to have a good blow out. They go through all the cupboards, and they guzzle away while Justine quietly bends and lifts a pile of plates from the cupboard. The coachman catches her around the waist. Justine who is ticklesome drops the pile, and the plates are broken. The damage made me swoon."

If you need more to grasp the relationship, the phantasy of the second with this quite primordial thing that it is a question of articulating in the relationship of the subject to the cut, I would cite for you the following which is something quite common in the case of such subjects, that one of the fundamental phantasies in masturbatory initiation was also for example the phantasy of a verbal revelation concerning more precisely something which is the thing imagined in the phantasy, namely for example a sexual initiation taken as theme of the phantasy in so (20) far as it exists.

The relationship uncovered in the first of these phantasies of the subject to something which is detached and which progressively blossoms is remarkable in so far as it presentifies for us something which is demonstrated in a hundred analytic observations, namely the theme which is now admitted and seen as habitual, the order of identification of the subject to the phallus in so far as it arises from phantasying an object inside the mother. This structure is commonly met and nowadays there is no difficulty in it being accepted and recognised as such by any analyst.

The important thing is that here, we see it, manifested as such in the phantasy, taken up in the phantasy as a support for something which represents for the subject one of the experiences of his early erotic life as a , and that what is important for us, is to know more precisely what sort of identification we are dealing with.

We have said that the metonymy of the neurotic is essentially constituted by the following: it is that he is it only at the limit, namely at a point that he will attain from the fleeting point of view of symptoms in so far as he does not have it, the phallus. And this is what must not be revealed. That is to say that we encounter in him, the further the analysis progresses, a growing castration anxiety.

There is in perversion something that we can call a reversal of the processes of proof. What has to be proved by the neurotic, namely the subsistence of his desire, becomes here in perversion.

the basis of proof. You can see here something like this sort (21) of return in a position of honour of what in analysis we call reasoning per absurdum.

For the pervert the circumstance, this fact which unites into one term by introducing this slight opening which permits a quite special identification to the other, which unites in one term the "he is" and "he has". For that it is enough that this "he has" should be on occasion "she has". Namely the object of primitive identification.

He will have the phallus, the object of primitive identification, whether it is this object which is transformed into a fetish in one case, or into an idol in the other. We have the whole span between the fetishistic form of his loves, the homosexual, and the idolatrous form illustrated by Gide. The link is established, as one might say, in the natural support.

We will say that perversion presents itself as a sort of natural simulation of the cut. It is in this that Gillespie's intuition serves as an index. What the subject does not have, he has in the object. What the subject is not, his ideal object is. In short a certain natural relationship is taken as material for this subjective split which is what it is a question of symbolising in perversion as in neurosis. He is the phallus, qua object within the mother, and he has it in his object of desire.

This is more or less what we see in the male homosexual. In the female homosexual, remember the case articulated by Freud, and which we have analysed here by comparing it with the case of Dora. What is happening at the turning point at which Freud's young patient is precipitated into homosexual idealisation? She (22) is certainly the phallus, but how? Also qua object within the mother. And this is seen in a very clear fashion when at the height of the crisis, she throws herself over the railway bridge, Freud recognises that in this Niederkommen there is something which is the identification to this maternal attribute. She makes herself be in this supreme effort of a giving to her idol which is what her suicide is. Why does she fall like an object? In order to give her the object of love, to give her what she does not have, to bring about the maximum of idealisation, to give her this phallus which is the object of her adoration to which the homosexual love for the singular person who is the object of her loves is identified.

If we try to introduce this in connection with each case, if we make an effort to question ourselves in each case, we will find here what I claim to be putting forward as a structure. You can always rediscover, not just in perversion but especially in this form to which it is objected, with a good degree of pertinence, that it is extremely polymorphous, namely homosexuality, especially with the use that we make of the term homosexuality, how many different forms of experience in fact does it not present us with... But then again would it not also be of interest to us after all to be able to situate at the level of perversion something which could constitute a centre as such of something which while admitting all sorts of peripheral intermediate forms between perversion and for example let us say psychosis, drug addiction, or one or other form in our nosographical field, homosexuality compared to what the last time for example we were trying to formulate as being the point on (23) which the desire of desire which is the neurotic is based, namely this relationship to the image of the other thanks to which there can be established this whole interplay of substitution in which the neurotic has never to prove that what is in question, namely that he is the phallus, is well and truly

We would say that we have here something which is a certain relationship of primitive identification I with the narcissistic, specular identification, which is $i(o)$.

It is in so far as something already exists, that a schism is already delineated between the accession of the identificatory symbolic subject, primordial relationship to the mother, and the first Verwerfung; it is in so far as this is articulated with the second imaginary identification of the subject to his specular form, namely $i(o)$, this is what is used by the subject to symbolise that which with Gillespie we will call the split. Namely, the thing in which the subject intervenes in his phantastical relationship.

And here the phallus is the essential signifying element in so far as it is what arises from the mother as symbol of her desire, this desire of the other which terrifies the neurotic, this desire in which he senses that he is running all sorts of risks. It is this which constitutes the centre around which there is going to be organised the whole construction of the pervert.

And nevertheless the desire of the other is also what experience shows us in the form that is furthest back, and most difficult to reach. It is precisely this which constitutes the depth and the difficulty of these analyses which we have been able to undertake thanks to the access that has been given to us through our experience with children of the constructions and speculations that are particularly linked to primitive objectal identifications.

(24) Obviously even if Gide had presented himself at his own risk to make this sort of effort there is nothing to prove that the enterprise would have gone far enough. Gide did not present himself for analytic exploration. Nevertheless, however superficial when all is said and done may have been an analysis which only developed in the so-called sublimated dimension, we have some strange indications on this point. I believe that nobody to my knowledge has given its importance to this little trait which appears as a sort of singularity in behaviour which almost signs with its symptomatic accent what is in question, namely the beyond of the maternal personage, or more exactly her interior, her very heart. Because this core of primitive identification is rediscovered at the basis of the structure of the perverse subject himself.

If in the neurotic desire is at the horizon of all the demands which have been deployed for so long and are literally interminable, one can say that the desire of the pervert is at the heart of all his demands. And if we say that its unfolding is undeniably woven around aesthetic requirements, nevertheless nothing is more striking than what I would call the modulation of themes around which it is pursued.

And you will see that what appears from the first lines, is the relationships of the subject to a fragmented vision, a kaleidoscope which occupies the six or seven first pages of the volume. How can you not sense that you are being carried to the furthest experience of fragmentation.

But there is more, the notion, the perception that he grasps at a particular moment, and which himself articulates in the fact that there are no doubt, he says, reality and dreams, but that there (25) is also a second reality. And further on again - this is what I want to get to - it is the tiniest of indications, but everyone knows that for us these are the most important ones, he tells us the story known as the knot in the wood of a door. In the wood of this door, somewhere in Uzes, there is a hole because a knot has been removed. And what is at the bottom of it he is told is a little marble that your father put there when he was your age. And he recounts, to the wonder of students of character, that from his holidays on he spent a year letting the nail of his little finger grow in order to have it long enough at the next meeting to go and remove this little marble in the hole of the wood.

And in effect he manages to get it, only to discover that what he has is a greyish object that he would be ashamed to show to anyone,, so that - I think this is what he says - he returns it to its place, cuts his nail of his little finger, and tells nobody about it, except us, the posterity who are going to immortalise this story.

I think that it is difficult to find a better introduction to the notion rejected in a magnificent everything shows the perseverance of something which presents to us the figure of the form in which there is presented the relationship of the perverse subject to the internal object. An object which is at the heart of something. The relationship to this object as such, in so far as it is the imaginary dimension of desire, on this occasion of the primordial desire of the mother, which comes to play the decisive role, the symbolising, central role which allows us to consider that here at the level of desire the pervert is identified to the imaginary form of the phallus. It is to this that next time we will devote our final class on desire, this year.

Seminar 27: Wednesday 1 July 1959

We come to the end of this year which I have devoted, with all its risks and perils for me as well as for you, to this question of desire and its interpretation.

You have been able to see in effect that it is on the question of the place of desire in the economy of the analytic experience that I have remained without budging because I think it is from there that there should begin every particular interpretation of any desire whatsoever.

It has not been easy to circumscribe this place. That is why today I would like simply, by way of conclusion, to point out the major terms, the cardinal points with respect to which there is situated something whose importance I have managed, I hope, to make you sense this year: the specificity to be given to this function of desire as such.

As you know, the slightest experience that you may have of modern analytic work, and especially of what is constituted for example by an analytic observation, will show you a constant feature - I am talking about any observation that people care to communicate - in the period of analysis that we are living through and which began already about twenty years ago - these are cases which are called in contrast to the typical neuroses of the old literature, neurotic characters, cases which are borderline as regards neurosis. What is it that we encounter in this way of approaching the subject?

I read a certain number of them recently, in order to get a clear idea about where analytic thinking is as regards what constitutes the essential of the progress applied from experience. Well in general one can say that with surprising constancy the present state of things - namely at the period of analysis that we are (2) at - is dominated from whatever angle it takes its guidelines, by object-relations. It converges towards object-relations .

What is attached under this rubric to the Kleinian experience appears after all more like a symptom than as a centre of diffusion. I mean a zone in which everything that relates to it has been particularly investigated. But fundamentally any one of the other centres of organisation of analytic thought which structures research is not all that far from it fundamentally. Because object-relations have come to dominate the whole conception that we have of progress in analysis.

This is not the least striking of the observations that present themselves to us on this occasion. Nevertheless in the concrete case of an observation reported with the aim of illustrating some structure or other in which the field of our nosological object is situated, analysis appears to be pursued for some time now along the lines of what one could call moralising normativation.

I am not saying that it is in this sense that the intervention of the analyst directly takes place. It depends on the case. But it is in this perspective that the analyst himself chooses his reference points. The very fashion in which he articulates the particularities of the subject with respect to his surroundings, to this object, will always be in terms of an appreciation of the apprehension of the object by the subject that he has in analysis. And the deficiencies of this apprehension of the object as measured by a supposedly normal approach to the other as such, where in short we will be shown that the mind of the analyst is essentially dwelling on the degradations of this (3) dimension of the other who in short is seen as being always overlooked, forgotten, fallen in the subject from its proper condition as an independent autonomous subject of the pure other, of the absolute other. That is all.

This is a mapping out which is worth as much as any other; for what is taken as essential, what is granted its full value in terms of this appreciation of the other in his autonomy, his profile.

What is striking is not so much this despite all the cultural presuppositions that it implies. It is an implicit rallying to what one can call a system of values which even though it is implicit is no less present in it. What is striking is what one might call the precipitation of a certain turning point which is that after having elaborated at length with the subject the insufficiencies of his affective apprehension as regards the other, we see in general, either that this expresses directly some turning point or other in the concrete analysis, or simply that it may be by a sort of haste to resume in what appears to the analyst to be the final terms of experience, we see a whole essentially moralising articulation of the observation falling in a way brusquely to a lower stage, and finding this final term of reference in a series of extremely primitive identifications, those which whatever way they are named always approximate more or less to this notion of good and bad objects, internal, introjected, internalised, or external, externalised, projected.

(4) There are always some Kleinian leanings in this reference to the experiences of primordial identification. And the fact that it is masked on other occasions by the highlighting of final principles to which fixations are attributed, whether they are described on this occasion in older terms, in instinctual terms of reference, by referring for example to oral sadism as having profoundly deviated the oedipal relationship, and with the subject motivating in the last resort this accident of the oedipal drama, the oedipal identification, it is always to something of the same order that it is a question of referring oneself in the last analysis. Namely final identifications to which we refer in short the whole development of the subjective drama, whether it is in neurosis, or even in perversion; namely these identifications which leave the very notion of subjectivity profoundly ambiguous.

The subject appears here essentially as identification to what he can consider as coming from himself, more or less, and the therapy is presented as a rearranging of these identifications in the course of a experience which takes its principles in a reference to reality, in what the subject has in short to accept or to refuse of himself, in something which from then on takes on an aspect which may seem to be extremely hazardous because when all is said and done this reference to reality is nothing other than one reality. And the reality (5) supposed by the analyst, when all is said and done, which returns in an even more implicit form this time, still more masked this time, may be quite risky, especially by implying an ideal normativity which is properly speaking that of the ideals of the analyst as being the final measure to which the conclusion of the subject is urged to rally and this is an identificatory conclusion.

I am when all is said and done what I recognise as being the good (le bon et le bien) in me, I aspire to conform myself to an ideal normativity which however hidden, however implicit it may be is nevertheless the one which after so many detours I recognise as being designed for me.

By means of a subtle, more subtle than most, but when all is said and done a no different suggestive action is found to be here in this relationship the action, the analyzed interaction.

What I am trying to indicate here in this discourse which I have pursued before you this year, is the way in which this experience, because of having organised itself through a sort of progressive slippage away from the primordial Freudian indications, is an experience which conceals in itself in a fashion that is more and more masked the question which I believe is the essential question without which there is no proper appreciation of our analytic action, and which is that of the place of desire.

Desire as we articulate it has the effect of bringing back to the forefront of our interest, in a way which is unambiguous, but really crucial, the notion of what we are dealing with, which is a subjectivity. Is desire subjectivity or is it not?

(6) This question did not have to wait for analysis to be posed. It has always been there, since the origin of what one can call moral experience. Desire is at once subjectivity, it is what is at the very heart of our subjectivity, what is the most essentially subject, it is at the same time something which is its direct contrary which is opposed to it as a resistance, as a paradox, as a rejected core, as a core that is refutable. It is starting from that - I have insisted on it several times - that the whole ethical experience developed in a perspective at the end of which we have the enigmatic formula of Spinoza that desire - cupiditas - is the very essence of man.

Enigmatic in so far as his formula allows what follows to remain open: if what he defines is indeed what we desire, or what is desirable, he leaves open the question of knowing whether or not this is the same thing. Even in analysis the distance between what is desired and what is desirable is wide open. It is starting from there that analytic experience is established, and is articulated. Desire is not simply exiled, rejected to the level of the action and principle of our servitude; which it is up to now? It is interrogated as being the very key, or the mainspring in us of a whole series of actions and behaviors which are understood as representing the deepest part of our truth. And this is the high point, the summit from which at every moment experience tends to redescend.

(7) Does that mean, as one might have thought for a long time, that this desire we are dealing with is a pure and simple recourse to a vital gushing forth? It is quite clear that it is nothing of the kind because from the first spelling out of our experience, what we see is that in the very measure that we go deeper into this desire we ^see it confusing itself less and less with this pure and simple elan. It is decomposed, it is disarticulated into something which presents itself as always more distant from a harmonic relationship. No desire presents itself to us in the regressive tracing-back which constitutes analytic experience; it presents itself to us more as a problematic, dispersed, polymorphous, contradictory element, and to tell the truth, far from any oriented co-adaptation.

It is therefore to this experience of desire that it is a question of referring as something which we cannot leave without deepening it, to the point that we will be able to offer something which fixes its meaning for us, which will prevent us from turning away from what is absolutely original, absolutely irreducible in it. Everything, of course, in the fashion that I said analytic experience is articulated, is designed to hide from us this meaning of desire.

This separating out of the paths towards the object in the experience of transference only shows us in a way the negative of what is in question, the experience of transference, if we define it as an experience of repetition obtained through a regression itself dependent on a frustration, leaves to one side the (8) fundamental relationship of this frustration to demand. There is however no other in analysis. And only this way of articulating the terms will allow us to see that the demand regresses because the elaborated demand, as it presents itself in analysis, remains without response.

But already an analysis, taking an inappropriate path, involves itself in giving the response in order to guide the analysand towards the object from which he is coming. With all sorts of unbelievable ideas one of the examples of which I frequently had to criticise is constituted by this regulation of the distance that I spoke about because perhaps it plays a greater role here in the French context, this regulation of the distance from the object, which if I may say so, sufficiently shows by itself in what sort of contradictory impasse one becomes involved, along a certain path, that of analysis when it is narrowly centred on object-relations, in so far as undoubtedly any relationship whatsoever, however we are meant to conceive of the normal one, seems indeed to presuppose the maintenance, whatever people say, of a certain distance, and to tell the truth we can recognise here a kind of short application, and in fact a misinterpretation of some considerations about the relationship to the mirror stage, to the narcissistic relationship as such, which have constituted in the case of the authors who have put in the foreground the reference to analytic action, which served as a theoretical baggage at a time when he was not able to situate its place in a larger system of references... In fact every kind of reference to analytic experience contains something which, in the (9) final analysis is supposed to be based on the so-called reality of the analytic experience taken as a measure, as a standard of what it is a question of reducing in the transferential relationship; everything which would also put in the place complementary to this action of analytic reduction a more or less advanced, a more or less analysed, more or less criticised distortion of the ego with the notion of this

With reference to this distortion of the ego, with reference to what exists in the ego as a possible alibi for the reduction of analysis to a reality, everything that is organised in these terms only reestablishes this separation of the doctor from the patient on which there is founded a whole classical nosography, which in itself is not an objection, but also the inoperancy of a subjective therapy which is that of pre-analytic psychotherapy surrendering as one might say to the omnipotent norm of the judgement of the doctor what is in question in the experience of the patient, making of the relationship of the doctor to the patient the following: namely submitting it to a subjective structuring which is no doubt that of a counterpart, but of a counterpart who is on the wrong path, with all that this involves precisely in terms of distance, and of oversights that are impossible to reduce.

What analysis establishes is an intersubjective structuring which is strictly distinguished from the preceding one in that however far the subject, the patient, may be from our norms - and this up to the limit of psychosis, of madness, we do not presuppose that he is this counterpart to whom we are linked by links of charity, of respect for our image.

(10) No doubt there is here a relationship which has its foundation with regard to this something which constitutes an advance, which undoubtedly constituted an advance, and an historical advance in the fashion of behaving vis-a-vis the mentally ill patient. But the step forward established by analysis which emerges as decisive, is that we consider it essentially in its nature, in its relationship with him as a speaking subject, namely as such caught just like ourselves whatever his position may be in the consequences and risks of a relationship to the

This is enough to completely change our relationships to this subject, who is passive in analysis. Because if we start from here desire is situated beyond the feeling of a pressure which is obscure and radical as such, because if we consider this pressure, the drive, the cry, this pressure is only valid, only exists, is only defined, is only articulated by Freud as caught up in a temporal sequence of a special nature, this sequence which we call the signifying chain, and whose properties whose incidences upon everything that we have to deal with as a pressure, as a drive, is that it essentially disconnects this pressure from everything which defines it, and situates it as vital; it renders it essentially separable from everything which establishes it in its living consistency.

It makes possible, as the Freudian theory articulates from the beginning, that the pressure should be separated from its very source, from its object, from its tendency as one might say. It itself is separated from itself because it is essentially recognisable in this very tendency, that it is in an inverse form.

(11) It is primitively, primordially, decomposable, decomposed to tell the truth in a signifying decomposition.

Desire is not the sequence, it is a mapping out of the subject with respect to this sequence in which it is reflected in the dimension of the desire of the other. Let us take an example. Let us take in the most primitive form of what is presented to us by analytic experience, the relationship of the subject to the newcomer into the familial constellation; what we call aggression in this instance is not aggression, it is a death wish, namely however unconscious we may suppose it to be, it is something which is articulated: "May he die".

And it is something which can only be conceived in the register of articulation, namely where signifiers exist. It is in so far as it is in signifying terms, however primitive we may suppose them to be, of aggression vis-a-vis the rival counterpart that the aggression towards the rival counterpart is articulated. The little counterpart practices aggression, and pretends to bite, pushes them even shoves them away from the place where they can get their food.

The passage of primitive rivalry into the unconscious is linked to the fact that something however rudimentary we may suppose it to be is articulated which is not essentially different in this nature from spoken articulation: "May he die". And that is the reason why this "May he die" wants to remain beneath the "Isn't he lovely", or the "I love him" which is the other discourse which is superimposed on the preceding one.

(12) It is in the interval between these two discourses that there is situated what we have to deal with as desire, it is in the interval that there is constituted, if you wish, what the Kleinian dialectic has articulated as being the bad object, and we can see how there can come to converge the rejected drive on the one hand, from the introjected object in a similar ambiguity.

Nevertheless it is about the fashion in which there is structured in the interval this relationship, this imaginary function in so far as it is suspended from, as it depends on both chains of the discourse, the repressed chain and the patent, manifest chain, it is here that we are summoned essentially to specify what must be saved in the articulation in order to know at what level desire is situated.

You may have on one or other occasion thought, suggested, that I am giving here a phallogocentric conception of desire. Of course it is quite evident that the phallus plays an absolutely essential role in it, but how can we really understand this function of the phallus if not within the ontological reference points which are the ones that we are trying to introduce here.

How can we conceive of the usage that Melanie Klein makes of the phallus. I mean at the most primary, the most archaic level of the experience of the child. Namely when the child is caught up in one or other of the difficulties of development which can on occasion be severe. First of all Mrs. Melanie Klein will interpret for him this little toy that he is manipulating and (13) with which he is going to touch some other element that is part of the game which is used to set up the experiment by saying to him "this is Daddy's penis".

It is a fact that no one, at least if he comes from outside into such an experiment, can avoid being disconcerted by the perfectly brutal daring of the intervention, but still more disconcerted by the fact that when all is said and done it works. I mean that the subject who in certain cases can certainly resist, but if he resists it is undoubtedly as Melanie Klein herself has no doubt because something is operating here about whose future comprehension we have no reason to despair - and God knows she allows herself on occasion (I have been given reports of experiments all seen from the outside, but reported in a very faithful way) to be insistent. It is clear that the phallic symbol comes into the game at this ultra-precocious period as if the subject was expecting nothing else.

That Mrs. Melanie Klein sometimes justified this phallus as being the model of a simple which is more manageable and more convenient, is something that we can see here as a singular begging of the question.

That which in our register, in our vocabulary remains, and justifies such an intervention, can only be expressed in these terms: it is that the subject accepts, it is clear in any case, this object of which in most cases he has only the most indirect experience, only as a signifier; and that it is as a signifier that the incidence of this phallus is justified in the clearest fashion. Whether the subject takes it in as such at the age (14) that he is at is perhaps an unanswerable question. But undoubtedly if Melanie Klein takes this object, whether she knows it or not, it is because she cannot find a better one as a signifier of desire in so far as it is desire of the desire of the other.

If there is something that the phallus signifies - I mean itself in the position of signifier - it is precisely this: it is the desire of the desire of the other. And it is for this reason that it will take up its privileged place at the level of the object.

But I think that far from maintaining ourselves in this phallogocentric position, as is expressed by those who remain at the appearance of what I am in the process of articulating, this allows us to see where the veritable problem is. The veritable problem is the following: it is that the object with which we have to deal from the beginning, concerning desire, far from being in any way this preformed object, this object of instinctual satisfaction, this object which is destined to satisfy according to some vital preformation the subject as his instinctual complement, the object of desire is absolutely not distinct from the following which is: it is the signifier of the desire of desire.

The object as such, the object o, if you wish, of the graph, is as such the desire of the other in so far as I would say as it comes - if the word has a meaning - to the knowledge of an unconscious subject. It is namely, of course, with respect to this subject, in the contradictory position: the knowledge of an unconscious subject. Which is not at all unthinkable. But it is something open.

(15) This means that if it comes to something of the unconscious subject, it comes to it in so far as it is a wish to recognise it, that it is signifier of its recognition. And this is what that means. It is that desire has no other object than the signifier of its recognition. The character of the object in so far as it is the object of desire, should then be sought by us where human experience designates it for us, indicates it for us in its most paradoxical form, I am referring to what we usually call the fetish, this something which is always more or less implicit in everything which usually constitutes the objects of interhuman exchange, but is there no doubt masked by the regular, or regularised character of these exchanges.

People have spoken about the fetishistic aspect of merchandise, and after all this is not something which is simply caused by homophony, I mean of homophony. There is indeed a shared meaning in the use of the word fetish, but for us what should put in the foreground the accent which we must maintain about the object of desire, is this something which defines it first and foremost as being borrowed from signifying material.

"I saw the devil the other night", Paul Jean Poulet says somewhere, "and under his hide there peeped out his two ..."

This ends: the fruits of science do not fall all at once. And even though they do not all fall for us on this occasion, and that we perceive that what is important is not so much the hidden fruits as the mirage that is present to desire, that precisely the hide, the fetish is characterised by the fact that it is the hide, the hem, the fringe, the bauble, the thing which hides, the (16) thing which depends precisely on the fact that nothing is better suited for the function of signifier of what is in question, namely of desire of the desire of the other. Namely what the child primitively has to deal with in his relationship to the subject of the demand, is that he cannot decipher what this desire of the mother as such is outside demand, except in the most virtual fashion by means of this signifier which we analysts, whatever we may say in our discourse, refer to this common measure, to this central point of the signifying homeland which is on this occasion the phallus because it is nothing other than this signifier of the desire of desire.

Desire has no other object than the signifier of its recognition. And it is in this sense that it allows us to conceive what is happening, what we ourselves are the dupes of when we perceive that in this subject-object relationship, at the level of desire, the subject has passed to the other side. He has passed to the level of o in so far as precisely as at this final term he himself is nothing more than the signifier of this recognition, he is nothing more than the signifier of the desire of desire.

But precisely what is important to maintain is the opposition starting from which this exchange operates, namely the grouping of $ in front of o of a subject who is no doubt imaginary, but in the most radical sense, in the sense that he is the pure subject of the disconnection, of the spoken cut in so far as the cut is the essential scansion in which the word is built up. The grouping I say of this subject with a signifier which is what? Which is nothing other than the signifier of the being with which the subject is signified in so far as this being is itself marked (17) by the signifier.

That is to say that the o, the object of desire, in its nature is a residue, is a remainder. It is the residue which the being with which the speaking subject is confronted as such leaves to any possible demand. And this is the way that the object rejoins the real. This is how it participates in it. I am saying the real, and not reality because reality is constituted by all the halts that human symbolism, in a more or less perspicacious fashion, passes through the of the real in so far as it makes of them the objects of its experience.

Let us remark, the specific property of objects of experience is precisely to leave in some way, as Monsieur de La Palisse would say, everything that escapes from it in the object. This is the reason why contrary to what is believed, experience - so-called experience, is double edged. That is to say that when you attach yourself to experience to resolve an historical situation for example, you have just as good a chance of erring or of making a serious mistake as the opposite, for the very simple reason that by definition if you tie yourself to experience it is precisely in this way that you overlook the new element that there is in the situation.

The object in question, in so far as it rejoins the real, participates in it because the real presents itself precisely as what resists the demand, what I would call the inexorable.

The object of desire is inexorable as such, and if it rejoins the real, this real to which I alluded when we were doing our analysis of Schreber, it is in this form of the real that this inexorable is best incarnated, this form of the real which presents itself in the fact that it always comes back to the same (18) place. And this is why it is in the stars that curiously we have seen the prototype.

How can one explain otherwise the presence at the origin of cultural experience of this interest for the object which is really the least interesting which exists for anything vital, that is to say the stars. The culture and the position of the subject as such in the domain of desire, in so far as this desire is established, is set up fundamentally in the symbolic structure as such. This is explained by the fact that of all reality, it is the most purely real that there is starting on one condition, it is that the shepherd in his solitude, the one who first began to observe something which has no other interest except that as having been detected as returning always to the same place, he locates it with respect to that with which he sets himself up radically as object, with respect to a form however primitive you may suppose it to be of slit which allows it to be seen when it returns to this same place.

Here then is what we arrive at: it is to pose that the object of desire is to be defined fundamentally as signifier. As signifier of a relationship which itself is a relationship which reverberates indefinitely in some way. Desire, if it is the desire of the desire of the other, opens out on to the enigma of what is the desire of the other as such. The desire of the other as such is articulated and structured fundamentally in the relationship of the subject to the word, namely in the disconnection of everything that is vitally rooted in the subject.

(19) This desire is the central point, the pivotal point of the whole economy with which we have to deal in analysis. By not showing its function we are necessarily led to discover as a reference point only what is effectively symbolised by the term reality. The existing reality of the social context. And it then seems that we overlook another dimension in so far however as it is introduced into our experience, as it is reintegrated into human experience, and especially by Freudianism as something absolutely essential.

It is here that we can see the value of the facts on which I have often based myself of what the result is in analysis of any intervention which tends to the transferential experience with respect to what is called this so simple reality, this present reality, of the analytic session, as if this reality was not a complete contrivance, namely the condition in which normally, and with good reason, because this is what we expect of it, there must be produced on the part of the subject all these things that we have no doubt to respond to, but certainly not by reducing them to any reality that is supposed to be immediate. And this is why I have often insisted in different forms on the common character of what is produced every time the interventions of the analyst, in a too insistent, even brutal fashion, claim to prove in this reactualisation of an objectal relationship considered as typical in the reality of the analysis, what is produced with a regularity which I must say is proved by several observations, has not it seems to me always been identified by the analysts.

(20) In any case, to remain with something which we have criticised here, the famous observation in the Bulletin of the Belgian analysts to which I referred once, I am referring to it again in so far as I find in it a remarkable overlap precisely in one of Glover's articles the one in which he himself tries already to pose the function of perversion in relation to the reality-system of the subject.

One cannot help being struck by this: if it is in the measure that the woman analyst, I mentioned the first observation because she is the author, in connection with the phantasies of the subject. Namely phantasies which the subject develops of sleeping with her. She literally responds to him as follows: you are frightening yourself about something that you know is not going to happen. This is the way in which the analytic intervention is presented marking on this occasion something that we do not need to specify concerning the personal motivations of the analyst in question.

No doubt they were justified for her by something, for the analyst. And the analyst was an analyst who was being supervised by someone who is precisely someone to whom I already alluded in my discourse today, specifically concerning the theme of distance.

It is clear that whatever such an intervention represents in terms of panic with respect to the analyst, one could attempt to justify it by a proper apprehension of , namely the relationships of the objects which are present. It is certain (21) that the relationship is decisive and that it is immediately after this style of intervention that there occurs what forms the object of the communication, namely this rejection, this kind of brutal overcast in the subject - a subject who perhaps is not very well specified from the diagnostic point of view, who seemed to me to be undoubtedly closer to the beginnings of a kind of paranoid illusion than really the one that is given, namely of a phobia. This subject arrives in effect absolutely haunted by the shame of being too tall, and there are here a whole series of themes close to depersonalisation whose importance cannot be exaggerated.

What is certain is that it is a neo-formation. This moreover is the object of the observation, I am not the one who says this, to see this subject involving himself in what is called a transitory perversion, namely rushing towards the geographical point where he had found circumstances that were particularly favourable for observing through a slit people, especially females, in a cinema, while they are in the process of satisfying their urinary needs.

This element, which up to then had had no place in the symptomatology, is of interest to us only because on page 494 of the International Journal, Vol. 14, Oct. 1933, article 4, on "The relation of perversion-formation to the development of reality-sense", namely Glover's article on the functions of perversion, in the presence of a subject very close to the preceding one in this sense that he. Glover, goes for a paranoid (22) diagnosis, while I inversely would rather attach it to a phobia. Glover, because of interventions which are no doubt analogous, realises, produces a scenario analogous to a transitory and occasional perverse explosion. (Glover 223-225)

There is no essential difference between these two cases and the thing for example that I stressed in the discourse on the function of the word and the field of language, namely the intervention of Ernest Kris, who, in dealing with the phobic fear of plagiarism, explains that he is not a plagiarist at all, as a result of which the other rushes outside and asks for a plate of fresh brains to the great happiness of the analyst who sees in this a really significant reaction to his intervention, but of which we can say that in an attenuated form this represents as one might say, the reaction, the reforming of the proper dimension of the subject every time the intervention tries to reduce it, to telescope it, to compress it in a pure and simple reduction to data which are called objective, that is to say to data coherent with the prejudices of the analyst.

If you will allow me to end on something which introduces the place in which we analysts, in this relationship to desire, should situate ourselves, this is undoubtedly something which is not going to work out, if we do not construct for ourselves a certain coherent conception of what precisely our function is in relation to social norms - these social norms, if there is an experience which should teach us the degree to which they are (23) problematic, the degree to which they ought to be questioned, the degree to which their determination is situated somewhere other than in their function of adaptation, it appears to be that of the analyst.

If in this experience of ours of the logical subject we discover this dimension which is always latent, but also always present, which is sustained beneath every intersubjective relationship, and which is found therefore in the relationship of interaction, of exchange with everything which because of that is crystallized in the social structure, we must arrive more or less at the following conception.

It is that we will call something culture - I do not like that word, in fact I do not like it at all; what I mean by it are certain stories of the subject in his relationship to the logos whose agency no doubt was able to remain masked for a long time in the course of history, and it is difficult not to see in our own day - this is why Freudianism exists in it - the gap, the distance it represents compared to a certain social inertia.

The relationship of what happens between culture and society we can provisionally define as something which would be well enough expressed in a relationship of entropy. In so far as something of what is happening in culture is produced in society which always includes some function of disaggregation, which is presented in society as culture, in other words in so far as it has entered under different headings into a certain number of stable conditions, themselves also latent, which are what one can (24) call conditions of exchange within the flock - and something which sets up a movement, a dialectic, leaving open the same gap within which we try to situate the function of desire; it is in this sense that we can qualify what is produced as perversion as being the reflection, the protest at the level of the logical subject of what the subject undergoes at the level of identification, in so far as identification is the relationship which organises, which establishes the norms of the social stabilisation of different functions.

In this sense we cannot fail to make the rapprochement that exists between every structure similar to that of perversion and that which Freud somewhere, specifically in the article "Neurosis and Psychosis", articulates in the following fashion "it will be possible for the ego to avoid a rupture in any direction by deforming itself, by submitting to encroachments on its own unity and even perhaps by affecting a cleavage or division of itself. "In this way," says Freud, in one of these glimpses by which his texts are always illuminated, compared to the texts that we usually have to deal with in the literature of analysis, "in this way the inconsistencies, eccentricities and follies of men would appear in a similar light to their sexual perversions, through the acceptance of which they spare themselves repressions." (SE 1f 152-3) - "Damit rückten die Inkonssequenzen Verschrobenheiten und Narrheiten der Menschen in ein ähnliches Licht wie ihre sexuellen Perversionen, durch deren Annahme sie sich ja Verdrängungen ersparen" (GW 13, 391)

He pinpoints in the clearest fashion, precisely, everything which in the social context presents itself as paradox, (25) inconsistencies, confusional forms, and the form of madness - the Nar is the madman - in what constitutes the most ordinary and the most common text of social life. So that we could say something like a turning circuit is established between what we can call conformity, or a socially conforming form, so-called cultural activity - here the expression becomes an excellent one to define everything which from culture is exchanged and alienated in society -

Here, at the level of the logical subject of perversion, in so far as it represents by a series of degradations everything which in conformity presents itself as a protest properly speaking in the dimension of desire in so far as it is the relationship of the subject to his being - it is this famous sublimation which we will begin perhaps to speak about next year, because here in fact we have indeed the most extreme notion, and the one which most justifies everything that I am trying to advance before you, and which is the one that Freud contributed, namely this sublimation.

What is it in effect? What could this sublimation be? What must it be if we are to be able with Freud to define it as a sexual activity in so far as it is desexualised? How can we even conceive of it - because here it is no longer a question either of the source, nor of the direction of the tendency, nor of the object, it is a question of the very nature of what is called on this occasion the energy that is involved. It will be enough I think for you to read the article by Glover in the International Journal of Psychoanalysis in which he tries to approach with the critical preoccupations that he has, the notion of sublimation.

(26) What is this notion if we cannot define it as the very form into which desire flows, because what is pointed out to you is precisely that it can empty itself of the sexual drive as such, or more exactly that the very notion of drive far from confusing itself with the substance of the sexual relationship, is this form itself, that it is the interplay of the signifier, that normally it cannot be reduced to this pure interplay of the signifier. And it is also indeed as such that we can define sublimation. It is something through which, as I wrote somewhere, desire and the letter can become equivalent; if all the same here we can see in a point as paradoxical as perversion, namely in its most general form that which in the human being resists every normalisation, there being produced this discourse, this apparently empty elaboration which we call sublimation, which is something which of its nature, in its productions, is distinct from the social valorisation which is subsequently given to it - the difficulties that there are in attaching the notion of social value to the term sublimation are particularly well highlighted in this article by Glover that I am talking to you about.

Sublimation as such, namely at the level of the logical subject, is where there is unfolded, established, instituted all this work which is properly speaking creative work in the order of the logos. And it is here that there comes more or less to be inserted, more or less to find its place at the social level, what is called cultural activity, and all the incidence and the risks that it involves, up to and including the remodelling, (27) even the explosion of previously established conformisms.

And it is in the closed circuit which these four terms constitute that we can at least provisionally indicate something which should for us leave on its proper plane, on its animating plane what is involved concerning desire. Here we come to the problem which is the same, on which I left you last year in connection with the congress at Royaumont.

This desire of the subject, qua desire of desire, opens onto the cut, onto pure being, here manifested in the form of lack. This desire of the desire of the other, is when all is said and done what desire is he going to confront in analysis, if not the desire of the analyst? It is precisely the reason why it is so necessary for us to maintain ourselves in front of this dimension on the function of desire. Analysis is not a simple reconstitution of the past, nor is analysis a reduction to preformed norms, analysis is not an epos, analysis is not an ethos, if I were to compare it to something, it is a narrative which would be such that the narrative itself is the locus of the encounter that is in question in the narrative.

The problem of analysis is precisely this that the desire which the subject has to encounter, which is this desire of the other, our desire, this desire which is only all too present in what the subject supposes we are demanding of him, this desire finds itself in this paradoxical situation that we must guide this desire of the other which for us is the desire of the subject not towards our desire, but towards an other. We mature the desire (28) of the subject for someone other than ourselves, we find ourselves in this paradoxical situation of being procurers, midwives, those who preside at the advent of desire.

How can this position be held? It can undoubtedly only be held by maintaining an artifice which is that of the whole analytic rule. But the final mainspring of this artifice, does it not contain something which allows us to grasp where there can take place in the analysis this openness onto the cut which is the one without which we cannot conceive of the situation of desire? As always it is undoubtedly both the most trivial and the most hidden truth. The essential thing in the analysis of this situation in which we find ourselves, of being the one who offers himself as a support for every demand, and who responds to none of them; is it only in this non-responding which is far from being an absolute non-responding that there is found the principle of our presence? Should we not give some essential share to what happens at the end of each session, but which is imminent in the whole situation itself in so far as our desire should limit itself to this aim, to this place that we leave to desire in order that it may situate itself there, to the cut? To the cut which is no doubt the most efficacious mode of analytic intervention and interpretation.

And that is why it is one of the things on which we should most insist, this cut which we turn into something mechanical, which we understand as limited by a prefabricated time. It is quite elsewhere not alone that we effectively put it. It is one of the (29) most efficacious methods by which we can intervene; it is also one of those to which we should most apply ourselves. But in this cut there is something, this same thing that we have learned to recognise in the form of this phallic object latent to every relationship of demand as signifier of desire.

I would like to end my lesson for this year, and to recall in some way or other what will inaugurate my lessons next year in the form of a praelectio, conclude with a sentence that I will offer to you as an enigma, and from which it will be seen whether you are any better at deciphering spoonerisms than I have found to be the case in the course of experiments carried out with some people who visited me. A poet Desire Viardot in a Brussel's review, in '51 or '52, proposed under the title of Pantomas this little inscrutable enigma - we will see if a shout from the audience is going to give us the key to it right away -: the woman has in her skin a grain of phantasy, this grain of phantasy which is undoubtedly what is in question when all is said and done in what modulates and models, the relationships of the subject to the one from whom she demands - whoever she may be, and no doubt it is not nothing that at the horizon we have found the subject who contains everything, the universal mother, and that we can on occasion make a mistake about this relationship of the subject to the tower which is supposed to be what you are given by analytic archetypes.

But it is indeed something different that is in question. It is the opening, it is the gap onto this radically new thing that every cut of the word introduces. Here it is not only from the woman that we have to wish this grain of phantasy or this grain of poetry, but from analysis itself.

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

BOOK VIII

Transference

1960 - 1961

Translated by Cormac Gallagher from unedited French typescripts

FOR PRIVATE USE ONLY

Seminar 1: Wednesday 16 November 1960

I announced for this coming year that I would deal with transference, with its subjective oddity (sa disparate subjective). It is not a term that was easily chosen. It underlines essentially something which goes further than the simple notion of asymmetry between subjects. It poses in the very title... it rebels, as I might say from the beginning, against the idea that intersubjectivity can by itself alone provide the framework in which the phenomenon is inscribed. There are words which are more or less appropriate in different tongues. I am looking for some equivalent for the word impair, for the subjective oddity of transference, for the oddity that it contains essentially. There is no term, except the very term imparite which is not used in French, to designate it. "In its supposed situation" (dans sa pretendue situation) my title also says, indicating by that some reference to this effort over the last years in analysis to organise, around the notion of situation, what happens in analytic treatment. The very word supposed is there again to say that I dispute the validity of, or at least that I take up a corrective position with respect to this effort. I do not believe that one can say purely and simply about psychoanalysis that what we have here is a situation. If it is one, it is one of which one could also say: it is not a situation or again, that it is a false situation.

Everything that presents itself as technique must be inscribed as referring to these principles, to this search for principles which is already evoked by pointing out these differences, and in a word in a correct topology, in a rectification of what is in question, of what is commonly implied in the use that we make every day theoretically of the notion of transference, namely as something which when all is said and done it is question of referring to an experience, which it, we nevertheless know very well, at least to the extent that in some way or other we have some practical experience of analysis. I would like to point (2) out that I took a long time to reach what is this heart of our experience. Depending on how you date this seminar in which I have been guiding a certain number of you for several years, depending on the date that you consider it to have begun, it is in the eighth or tenth year that I am tackling transference. I think that you will see that there are reasons for this long delay.

Let us begin then... at the beginning, everyone charges me with having referred myself to some paraphrase of the formula: "In the beginning was the Word", somebody else said "In Anfang war die Tat", and for a third, at first (namely at the beginning of the human world), at first there was praxis. Here are three enunciations which appear to be incompatible.

In fact, what is important from the position we are in to settle the matter, namely from analytic experience, what is important is not their value as enunciations, but as I might say their value as enunciatings, or again as annunciations, I mean the way in which they bring to light the ex nihilo proper to all creation and show its intimate liaison with the evocation of the word. At this level, all manifest obviously that they fall within the first enunciation: "In the beginning was the Word". If I evoke this, it is to differentiate it from what I am talking about, this point from which I am going to begin to affront this most opaque term, this kernel of our experience which is transference.

I intend to begin, I want to begin, I am going to try, by beginning with all the necessary awkwardness, to begin today around this, that the term "In the beginning" certainly has another meaning. At the beginning of analytic experience - let us remember - was love. This beginning is something different to this self-transparency of the enunciating which gave their meaning to the above mentioned formulae. Here it is a dense, confused beginning. It is a beginning not of creation but of formation - and I will come back to this later - at the historical point at which there is born what is already psychoanalysis and what Anna O. herself baptised, in the initial observation of Studien über Hysterie, with the term of talking cure or again of chimney sweeping.

But before getting to this I want to recall for a moment, for those who were not here last year, some of the terms around which there turned our exploration of what I called The ethics of psychoanalysis. What I wanted to explain before you last year is - as one might say - to refer to the term of creation which I mentioned above, the creationist structure of the human ethos as (3) such, the ex nihilo which subsists at its heart which constitutes to use a term of Freud's, the kernel of our being, Kern unseres Wesen. I wanted to show that this ethos is enveloped around this ex nihilo as subsisting in an impenetrable vacuum. In order to approach it, to designate this impenetrable character, I began - as you remember - by a critique whose end consisted in rejecting expressly what you will allow me to call (at least those who heard me will let it pass), Plato's Schwärmerei. Schwärmerei in German, for those who do not know it, designates reverie, phantasy directed towards some enthusiasm and more especially towards something which is situated or which is directed towards superstition, fanaticism, in brief the critical connotation in the order of religious orientation which is added by history. In the texts of Kant the term Schwärmerei clearly has this inflection. What I call Plato's Schwärmerei, is to have projected onto what I call the impenetrable vacuum, the idea of the sovereign good. Let us say that this is simply to indicate the path taken, that with more or less success of course I tried to pursue with a formal intention; what results from the rejection of the Platonic notion of the sovereign good occupying the centre of our being.

No doubt to rejoin our experience, but from a critical point of view, I proceeded in part from what one can call the Aristotelian conversion with respect to Plato who without any doubt has been superseded for us on the ethical plane; but at the point that we are at of having to show the historical fate of ethical notions beginning with Plato (undoubtedly the Aristotelian reference), the Nicomachean Ethics is essential. I showed that it is difficult to follow what it contains as a decisive step in the construction of an ethical reflection, not to see that although it maintains this notion of sovereign good, it profoundly changes its meaning. It makes it consist by an inverse movement of reflection in the contemplation of the stars, this most exterior sphere of the existing world which is absolute, uncreated, incorruptible. It is precisely because for us it is decisively volatilised into the dust of the galaxies which is the final term of our cosmological investigation, that one can take the Aristotelian reference as a critical point of what in the traditions of antiquity, at the point that we have got to in them, the notion of sovereign good is.

With this step we came up against a wall, the wall which is always the same ever since ethical reflection has tried to develop itself; it is that we must assume or not what ethical reflection, ethical thinking has never been able to free itself from, namely that there is no good (bon. gut), no pleasure, unless one begins from there. We are still looking for the principle of the Wohltat. the principle of good action. What it infers allows us to say that it is not perhaps simply a question of the good deed, even if it were raised to the Kantian power of the universal maxim. If we have to take seriously the Freudian denunciation of the fallacy of these so called moral satisfactions, in so far as an aggressivity is concealed within them which succeeds in stealing his nouissance from the person (4) who practices it, while at the same time making its ill effects reverberate endlessly on his social partners (what these long circumstantial conditionals indicate is exactly the equivalent of Civilisation and its discontents in Freud's work), so that one ought to ask oneself how one can operate honestly with desire; namely how to preserve desire with this act in which it ordinarily collapses rather than realising itself and which at best only presents to it (to desire) its exploit, its heroic gesture; how to preserve desire, preserve what one can call a simple or salubrious relationship of desire to this act.

Let us not mince words about what salubrious means in terms of the Freudian experience: it means to be rid of, to be as rid as possible of this infection which to our eyes, but not only to our eyes, to eyes ever since they were opened to ethical reflection... this infection which is the teeming foundation of every social establishment as such. This of course presupposes that psychoanalysis, in its very manual of instructions, does not respect what I would call this opaque spot, this newly invented cataract, this moral wound, this form of blindness which constitutes a certain practice from what is called the sociological point of view. I am not going to expand on this. And even, to recall what a recent encounter which presentified to my eyes the useless and scandalous conclusions come to by this sort of research which pretends to reduce an experience like that of the unconscious to the reference of two, three, even four so-called sociological models, the great irritation I felt has since calmed down, but I will leave the authors of such exercises at the pons asinorum which is only too willing to receive them. It is quite clear also that in speaking in these terms about sociology I am not referring to this sort of meditation where the reflection of Lévi-Strauss is situated in so far - consult his inaugural lecture at the Collège de France - as it expressly refers, in dealing with societies, to an ethical meditation about social practices.

The double reference to a cultural norm situated more or less mythically in neolithic times, and on the other hand to the political meditation of Rousseau, is sufficiently indicative of this.

But let us leave it, this is of no concern to us. I will only recall that it was along the path of the properly ethical reference which is constituted by the wild reflections of Sade, and that it is along the offensive paths of Sadian iouissance that I showed you one of the possible access points to this properly tragic frontier where the Freudian Oberland is situated, and that it is at the heart of what some of you have baptised the between-two-deaths (a very exact term to designate the field in which there is expressly articulated as such everything that happens in the proper universe delineated by Sophocles and not only in the adventure of King Oedipus), that there is situated this phenomenon regarding which I think I can say that we have introduced a reference point in the ethical tradition, in the reflection on the motives and the motivations of the good.

This reference point, in so far as I properly designated it as being that of beauty in so far as it ornaments, has the function of constituting the last barrier before this (5) access to the last thing, to the mortal thing, to this point at which Freud's meditation came to make its final avowal under the term of death instinct.

I ask your pardon for having thought it necessary to delineate, even though in an abbreviated fashion but constituting a long detour, this brief summary of what we said last year. This detour was necessary to recall, at the origin of what we are going to have to say, that the term on which we dwelt concerning the function of beauty (because I do not need I think, for most of you, to evoke what is constituted by this term of the beautiful and of beauty at this point of the inflection of what I called the platonic Schwärmerei) that provisionally I ask you, as a hypothesis, to see as leading to the level of an adventure which is if not psychological at least individual, to see it as the effect of mourning which one can really see is immortal, because it is at the very source of everything which has since been articulated in our tradition about the idea of mortality, of the immortal mourning of the one who incarnated this wager of sustaining his question which is none other than the question of everyone who speaks, at the point where he, this person, received it from his own demon (according to our formula in an inverted form), I am talking about Socrates.

Socrates thus put at the origin, let us say right away, of the longest transference (something which would give to this formula all its weight) that the history of thought has known. Because I am saying it to you right away, I am trying to get you to sense it, the secret of Socrates will be behind everything that we will say this year about transference.

Socrates admitted this secret. But it is not just because one has admitted it that a secret ceases to be a secret.

Socrates claims to know nothing, except to be able to recognise what love is and, he tells us (I come to a testimony of Plato, specifically in the Lysis) namely to recognise infallibly, wherever he encounters them, where the lover is and where the beloved.

I think that it is in paragraph 2 04c. There are multiple references to this reference of Socrates to love.

And now we have been brought back to our starting point in so far as I want to accentuate it today. However chaste or however indecent may be the veil which is kept half open on this inaugural accident which turned the eminent Breuer aside from giving to this first really extraordinary experience of the talking cure the development it deserved, it remains quite obvious that this accident was a love story, that this love story did not exist only on the side of the patient is absolutely also not in doubt.

It is not enough to say, in the form of these exquisitely correct terms which we use (as Mr. Jones does on one or other page of his first volume of Freud's biography) that undoubtedly Breuer must have been the victim of what we call, says Jones, a rather marked counter-transference. It is quite clear that Breuer loved his (6) patient. We only see as its most obvious proof what in such a case is the properly bourgeois result: the return to a conjugal fervour which had been reanimated in this connection, the sudden trip to Venice with even as a result something that Jones tells us about, namely the fruit of a new little girl being added to the family, whose end many years afterwards Jones rather sadly tells us in this connection is mixed up with the catastrophic invasion of the Nazis into Vienna. There is no need to ironise about these sorts of accidents, except of course in so far as they present us with something typical with respect to a certain so-called particularly bourgeois style relating to love, with this need, this necessity of an awakening in place of this heartlessness which harmonises so well with the type of abnegation within which bourgeois need is inscribed.

This is not what is important. But it does not matter whether he resisted or not. What we should rather bless in that moment is the divorce already inscribed more than ten years ahead of time (because this happens in 1882, and it is only ten years later, then fifteen years, that will be required, for Freud's experience to culminate in the work of Studien über Hysterie written with Breuer) bless the divorce between Breuer and Freud. Because everything is there: the little eros whose malice first struck the first, Breuer, with the suddenness of his surprise, forced him to flee, the little eros finds his master in the second, Freud. And why? I might say - allow me to amuse myself for a moment - that it was because for Freud his retreat was cut off: an element from the same context where he was the votary of intransigent loves (as we know since we have his correspondence with his fiancée). Freud encounters ideal women who respond to him in the physical mode of the hedgehog. Sie streben dagegen (as Freud wrote in Irma's dream, in which the allusions to his own wife are not evident or avowed) they are always being rubbed up the wrong way. There appears in any case an element of the permanent outline that Freud gives us of his thirst, the Frau Professor herself, an object on occasion of Jones' wonder, who nevertheless, if I may believe my sources, knew how to keep her head down. It might be a curious common dominator with Socrates, who as you know also had to deal at home with a shrew who was not at all easy to handle. Even though the difference between the two is obvious, it would be one between the ceremonial otter whose profile Aristophanes shows us, a profile of a Lysistratian weasel whose powerful bite we can appreciate in the replies of Aristophanes. A simple difference (7) of odour. That is enough about this subject. And all the same I would say that I think that there is here only a particular reference and that, in a word, this datum, as regards your conjugal existence is not at all indispensable - everybody can relax - for your good behaviour.

We must search further on the mystery that is in question. Over against Breuer, for whatever reason, Freud took the step that made of him the master of the redoubtable little god. He chooses like Socrates to serve him in order to make use of him. Here indeed is the point where problems are going to begin for all of us. Again is it indeed a question of underlining this "making use of eros". And to make use of it for what purpose? Here indeed is why it was necessary for me to recall to you the reference points of our articulation from last year: to make use of it for good. We know that the domain of eros goes infinitely further than any field that this good may cover, at least we can take this as understood. You see that the problems that transference poses for us are only beginning here. And it is moreover something perpetually presented to your spirit (it is the current language, the common discourse about analysis, about transference): you should indeed not have in any preconceived or permanent way, as a first term of the end of your action the supposed good or not of your patient, but precisely his eros.

I do not think I should fail to recall once more here that which joins in the most risky way the Socratic initiative and the Freudian initiative, by bringing together their outcome in the reduplication of these terms in which there is going to be expressed in a condensed fashion more or less the following: Socrates chose to serve eros in order to make use of it or by making use of it. This led him very far - you should note this - to a very far which people try to camouflage by making a pure and simple accident of what I called above the teeming foundation of social infection. But is this not to do him an injustice, not to give him credit for believing it, for believing that he did not know perfectly well that he was going against the current of this whole social order in the midst of which he inscribed his daily practice, this really senseless, scandalous behaviour with whatever merit the devotion of his disciples afterwards tried to invest it, by highlighting the heroic aspects of Socrates' behaviour. It is clear that they could not but record what is the major characteristic which Plato himself qualified by a word which has remained celebrated among those who have approached the problem of Socrates, it is his atopia (in the order of the city there are no healthy beliefs if they are not verified). In everything which assures the equilibrium of the city, not only does Socrates not have a place, but he is nowhere.

And how can one be surprised if an action so vigorous in its unclassifiable character, so vigorous that it still vibrates down to our own time, took its place. How can one be surprised at the fact that it culminated in this death sentence, namely in real death in the clearest fashion, qua inflicted at a moment chosen in advance with the consent of all and for the good of all, and after all without the centuries having been ever able to decide since whether the sanction was just or unjust. From here where goes the destiny, a destiny which it seems to me it is not excessive to consider as necessary and not extraordinary, of Socrates?

(8) Freud on the other hand, is it not in following the rigour of his path that he discovered the death instinct, namely something also very scandalous, less costly no doubt for the individual? Is there a real difference here? Socrates as formal logic has repeated for centuries, and there must be a reason for its insistence, Socrates is mortal, therefore he had to die one day. It is not the fact that Freud died quietly in bed that is important for us here. I tried to show you the convergence between what is delineated here and the Sadian aspiration. There is here distinguished this idea of eternal death, of death in so far as it makes of the being itself its detour without our being able to know if we have here sense or nonsense and also indeed the other, that of the body. The second is that of those who uncompromisingly follow eros, eros by means of which bodies are joined, with Plato into one soul, with Freud without any soul at all, but in any case in a single eros in so far - as it unifies unitively. Naturally you could interrupt me here. Where am I leading you? This eros of course - you will grant me this - is indeed the same in the two cases, even if it intolerable to us. But these two deaths, why do you have to bring those back to us, this boat from last year? Are you still thinking about it, to make us pass over what? The river which separates them? Are we talking about the death instinct or about dialectic? My answer to you is yes! Yes, if both one and the other gives rise to astonishment in us. Because of course I am quite willing to grant that I am straying, that it is not my job after all to carry you to the final impasses, that I will make you be astonished, if you are not so already, if not about Socrates, at least about Freud at the starting point. Because people will prove to you that these very impasses are simple to resolve if precisely you are willing to be astonished by nothing. It is enough for you to take as a starting point, something as simple as "Good day", as clear as spring water, intersubjectivity for example. I intersubjectivate you, you intersubjectivate me I swear that the first one who laughs will get a smack, and one that is well deserved!

Because as people say, who does not see that Freud overlooked that there is nothing other in sadomasochistic constancy? Narcissism explains everything. And people address themselves to me saying: "Were you not almost saying that?" It must be said that at that time I was already rather reticent about the function of the narcissistic wound but it does not matter! And I would also be told that my inconvenient Socrates should also have come back in his turn to this intersubjectivity. Because Socrates in fact made only one mistake, it was to violate the procedure according to which we should always regulate ourselves, not to return to the law of the masses, who everyone knows will take a long while to lift a little finger on the terrain of justice, because the masses will always necessarily arrive the day after. This is how astonishment is regulated, made into a fault; errors will never be anything but judicial errors, this without prejudice to personal motivations.

What there may be in me in terms of this need I have always to add to things, and which, of course, is to be looked for in my taste for making things beautiful - we have found our feet again - is my perverse leaning, therefore my sophistry may be (9) superfluous. Therefore we are going to restart by proceeding from 0 and I will take up again in coming down to earth, the force of the litotes in order to aim without your being slightly astonished. Is it intersubjectivity, namely what is most foreign to the analytic encounter, which for its part stresses that we should flee from it, in the certainty that it must be avoided? The Freudian experience becomes rigid once it appears, it only flourishes in its absence. The doctor and the patient - as we are told - this famous relationship which gets people so excited, are they going to become intersubjective and who is going to do it best? Perhaps, but one can say that in this sense both one and the other take precautions; "He is telling me this for his own comfort or to please me?" thinks the one; "Is he trying to trick me?", thinks the other. Even the shepherd-shepherdess relationship, if it engages in this way, is badly engaged. It is condemned, if it remains there, to end up with nothing. This is precisely why these two relationships, doctor-patient, shepherd-shepherdess, must at all costs be different to diplomatic negotiation and the ambush.

What is called poker, -this theoretical poker, with all due respects to Mr. Henri Lefebvre, is not to be looked for in the work of Mr. von Neumann even though he recently affirmed it, which means that given my benevolence I can only deduce one thing: that all he knows about von Neumann's theory is the title in Hermann's catalogue. It is true that at the same time Henri Lefebvre places on the same register of poker the very philosophical discussion we were dealing with. Obviously if after all it is not his right I can only leave him to reap the rewards that he merits.

To come back to thinking about our intersubjective couple, my first concern as an analyst will be not to be put myself in the position that my patient has even to share such reflections with me and the simplest way to spare him this is precisely to avoid any attitude which lends to an imputation of comforting, and a fortiori of seduction. I will even absolutely avoid, if it happens to escape from me as such, and if I see it happening, in any case I can only intervene to the degree that I underline that I suppose that he is doing this without realising it. Again, it is necessary for me to take precautions to avoid any misunderstanding, namely of appearing to be charging him with a piece of trickery however uncalculated it may be. Therefore this does not even mean that intersubjectivity is to be taken up in analysis only in the movement which would carry it to a second degree, as if the analyst were waiting for the analysand to transfix himself on it in order that he, the analyst, could turn the sword.

(10) This intersubjectivity is properly set aside, or better again put off sine die, in order to allow there to appear a different hold whose characteristic is precisely to be essentially transference. The patient himself knows it, he calls for it. Moreover he wants to be surprised. You may say that it is another aspect of intersubjectivity, even, a curious thing, in the fact that it is I myself who am supposed to have opened up the path here. But wherever one places this initiative, it is a misinterpretation to attribute it to me.

And in fact, if I had not formalised in the position of bridge players the subjective othernesses which are involved in the analytic position, you would never have been able to pretend that you saw me taking a step that converged with the mistakenly daring schema that someone like Rickman thought up one day under the name of two-body psychology. Such theories always have a certain success given the state of amphibious respiration with which analytic thought sustains itself. For them to succeed, two conditions are enough. First of all, that they are supposed to come from honourable areas of scientific activity from which there may return in the present, from something moreover which may be shop-soiled psychoanalysis, a cheap gloss. This was the case here.

Rickman was a man who had, shortly after the war, this sort of benevolent aura of having been involved in the Russian revolution, thought of putting it at the heart of interpsychological experience.

The second reason for this success was that it did not disturb in any way the routine of psychoanalysis. And also of course a track is remade for the mental switching points which bring us back to the garage. But at least the name of two-body psychology might all the same have had some sense: to wake us up. This precisely is what is completely elided - you should notice - in the way its formula is used. It should evoke the role played by the attraction of bodies in the supposed analytic situation. It is curious that we would have to pass by way of the Socratic reference to grasp its import. In Socrates, I mean when words are lent to him, this reference to the beauty of bodies is permanent. It is as one might say the animator of this movement of interrogation into which - you should notice - we have not even entered into yet, in which we do not even yet know how the function of the lover and the beloved are divided up (although there, all the same, things are called by their name and in terms of these we are able to make some useful remarks).

If effectively something, in the passionate, dialectical interrogation which animates this starting point is related to the body it must be said that, in analysis, this is underlined by features whose accentuated value takes its weight from its particularly negative incidence. That analysts themselves - I hope that nobody here will think that he is being got at - do not recommend themselves by their corporeal charm is something to which Socratic ugliness gives its most noble ancestry, at the same time moreover as it recalls to us that it is not at all an obstacle to love. But we must all the same underline something, which is that the physical ideal of the psychoanalyst, at least as it is modelled according to the imagination of the masses, involves adding on an obtuse density and a narrow minded (11) boorishness which really brings with it the whole question of prestige.

The cinema screen - as I might say - offers the most sensitive revelation of this. If we simply make use of Hitchcock's last film, you can see the form in which the one who solves the riddle is presented, the one who is presented here to finally settle matters when all the other recourses have been exhausted. Frankly he carries all the marks of what we will call an element of the untouchable! So that here moreover we put our finger on an essential element of the convention because we are dealing with the analytic situation. And in order for it to be violated, let us take again the same term of reference, the cinema, in a way that is not revolting, it is necessary that the one who plays the role of the analyst..... let us take Suddenly Last Summer, we see here the personage of a therapist who pushes charity to the point of nobly returning the kiss that an unfortunate woman places on his lips, he is a handsome man, here it is absolutely necessary that he should be. It is true that he is also a neurosurgeon, and that he is promptly sent back to his trepanning. It is not a situation which could last. In short analysis is the only praxis in which charm is a disadvantage. It would break the spell. Who has ever heard tell of a charming analyst?

These are not remarks which are altogether useless. They may seem to be things which might only amuse us. It is important that they should be evoked at the level they are at. In any case it is just as important to note that in the management of the patient this very access to the body, which a medical examination would seem to require, is usually sacrificed according to the rule. And it is worthwhile noting this. It is not enough to say: "It is to avoid the excessive effects of transference". And why should the effects be more excessive at that level? Of course it cannot be accounted for either by a kind of anachronistic prudishness the traces of which one sees subsisting in rural areas, in Islamic gynaeceums, and in that incredible Portugal where the doctor can only auscultate through the clothes of the beautiful stranger. We go even further than this, and however necessary an auscultation may appear at the beginning of a treatment (or in the course of one) it is a way of breaking the rule. Let us look at things from another angle. There is nothing less erotic than that reading - as one might call it - of the instantaneous states of the body that certain psychoanalysts excel at. Because all the characters of this reading is in terms of signifiers - one could say that these states of the body are translated. The distant focus which this reading adapts itself to demands on the part of the analyst just as much interest, let us not settle too quickly the meaning of all of this. One could say that this neutralisation of the body (which seems after all the primary end of civilisation) has to deal here with a greater urgency and so many precautions suppose the possibility of abandoning it. I am not so sure. Only I introduce here the question of what the body is. Let us remain for a moment at that remark. In any case it would be a bad (12) appreciation of things not to recognise at the beginning that psychoanalysis demands from the first a high degree of libidinal sublimation at the level of collective relationships. The extreme decorum that one can say is maintained in the most ordinary fashion in the analytic relationship leads one to think that if the regular confinement of the two people involved in the analytic treatment in a room where they are protected from any indiscretion only rarely culminates at a lack of bodily constraint of one on the other, it is because the temptation which this confining would involve in any other occupation is less here than elsewhere. Let us remain at this point for the moment.

The analytic cell, even if it is a comfortable one, let it be whatever you wish, is all but (n'est rien de moins que) a bed of love and this I think comes from the fact that, despite all the efforts that one makes to reduce it to the common denominator of a situation, with all the resonances that we can give to this familiar term, it is not a situation to come to it - as I said above - it is the falsest situation imaginable. This allows us to understand, it is precisely the reference that we will try to take up the next time to what is in the social context the situation of love itself. It is in the measure that we can circumscribe more closely, dwell on what Freud touched on more than once, what the position of love is in society, a precarious position, a threatened position let us say right away, a clandestine position, it is in this very measure that we can appreciate why and how, in this most protected of all positions, that of the analytic office this position of love becomes here even more paradoxical.

Here I arbitrarily suspend this process. Let it suffice for you to see in what sense I intend that we should take up the question. Breaking with the tradition which consists in abstracting, in neutralising, in emptying of all its meaning whatever is involved at the basis of the analytic relationship, I intend to begin from the extremes of what I am supposing: to isolate oneself with another to teach him what? What he is lacking!

A still more formidable situation, if we think precisely that by the very nature of transference "what he is lacking" is going to be learned by him as a lover. If I am here for his good, it is not in the completely restful sense in which the Thomist tradition articulates it (Amare est velle bonum alicui) because this good is already a term which is more than problematic - if you were following me last year - superseded, I am not there when all is said and done for his good, but in order that he should love. Does that mean that I must teach him how to love? Undoubtedly, it seems difficult to elide from it the necessity that as regards loving and what love is it must be said that the two things must not be confused. As regards loving and knowing what it is to love, I must all the same, like Socrates, be able to testify on my own behalf that I know something about it.

(13) Now it is precisely, if we enter into analytic literature, that about which least is said. It seems that love in its primordial ambivalent coupling with hate, is a term which is self-evident. You should see nothing other, in my humorous remarks of today, than something destined to tickle your ears.

There is nevertheless a long tradition which speaks to us about love. The final term at which it has culminated is this enormously laborious work by Anders Nygren, which radically splits it into these two terms unbelievably opposed in his discourse of eros and agape.

But behind that, for centuries people spent their time discussing and debating about love. Is this again not another subject for astonishment that we analysts who make use of it, who have this word continually on our lips, that we could say that with respect to a certain tradition we present ourselves really as impoverished, having made no attempt - even a partial one - I will not say to revise, to add to what has been pursued throughout the centuries about this term, but even of something which simply is not unworthy of this tradition. Is there not something surprising here?

In order to show it to you, to make you sense it, I took as the object of my next seminar the recalling of what is really a monumental, original term of interest with respect to this whole tradition of ours on the subject of the structure of love which is the Symposium. If anyone who felt himself sufficiently interested or wanted to have a dialogue with me about the Symposium. I think there would be a lot of advantages in it. Undoubtedly a rereading of this monumental text which is so full of enigmas where everything tends to show us at once how much - as one might say - the very mass of religious lucubration which penetrates all our fibres, which is present in all our experience, owes to this sort of extraordinary testament, the Schwarmerei of Plato, what we can find in it, deduce from it in terms of essential references and - I will show you - up to the history of this debate, of what happened in the first analytic transference. That we can find in it every possible key, is something that I think, when we have put it to the test, you will not doubt. Undoubtedly these are not terms which I would easily allow to be so conspicuous in some published account. Nor are they formulae whose echoes I would like to see going to nourish elsewhere the usual buffooneries. I would intend that, this year, we should know who we are working with and who we are.

Seminar 2; Wednesday 23 November 1960

It is a question today of entering into an examination of the Symposium. This at least is what I promised you the last time.

What I told you the last time seemed to have had different destinies among you. The tasters are tasting. They are asking themselves: will it be a good year? Only I would like you not to dwell too much on what may appear as approximate in some of the touches with which I tried to light up our path. I tried the last time to show you the supports of the stage on which there is going to take place what we have to say about transference. It is quite certain that the reference to the body, and specifically to what can affect it in the order of beauty, was not simply an opportunity to make jokes about the transferential reference. Occasionally there is the objection that it sometimes happens in the cinema that the psychoanalyst is a handsome man and not alone in the exceptional case that I remarked on. It should be noted that it is precisely at the moment when in the cinema analysis is taken as a pretext for comedy. In short, you are going to see that the principal references to which I referred the last time find their justification in the path that we are going to have to take today.

It is not easy to give an account of what the Symposium is all about, given the style and the limits which are imposed on us by our place, our particular object which - let us not forget it - is particularly that of analytic experience. To set about giving a proper commentary on this extraordinary text is, perhaps, to force ourselves to make a long detour which would not then leave us enough time for the other parts of the field, given that we choose the Symposium in the measure that there seemed to us to be in it a particularly illuminating introduction to our study.

Therefore we are going to have to proceed using a form which is obviously not the one that would be used in what could be called a university style commentary of the Symposium. On the other hand, of course, I must necessarily suppose that at least some of you have not really been initiated into Plato's thought. I am not telling you that I consider myself to be fully armed from this point of view. Nevertheless I have all the same enough experience of it, a good enough idea of it to believe that I can allow myself to isolate, to concentrate these spotlights on the Symposium while respecting a whole background. I would moreover (2) ask those who are in a position to do so to supervise me from time to time, to let me know what may be not so much arbitrary - this illumination is necessarily arbitrary - but that which in its arbitrariness may appear to be forced or biased.

On the other hand I do not object to, and I even believe that one must highlight a certain rawness, newness, in approaching a text like that of the Symposium. That is why I hope you will excuse me for presenting it to you at first in a rather paradoxical form or one that may appear to you to be such. It seems to me that someone who reads the Symposium for the first time, if he is not absolutely dulled by the fact that it is a text belonging to a respectable tradition, can hardly fail to experience a feeling which can be described more or less as being stunned. I would say more: if he has a little historical imagination it seems to me that he must ask himself how such a thing could have been preserved for us throughout what I would be happy to call the generations of scribblers, of monks, of people who do not seem to have been destined to transmit something to us; ... which it seems to me that it can hardly fail to strike us, at least in one of its parts (by its end) as belonging rather - why not say it - to what is called in our own days a special type of literature, a literature which can be the object.... which can become subject to enquiries by the police.

To tell the truth if you simply know how to read - it seems to me you can speak all the more freely in so far as, I believe that one swallow does not make a summer, many of you, following my announcement the last time have acquired this work and therefore have been able to dip into it - you can hardly fail to be struck by what happens in the second part at least of this discourse between Alcibiades and Socrates outside the limits of the banquet itself. In so far as we will see later that it is a ceremony which has its rules, a sort of ritual, of an intimate competition between members of the elite, a society game... this society game this Symposium we see is not a pretext for Plato's dialogue, it refers to customs, to habits that are differently regulated according to the locality in Greece, the level of culture we would say, and the rule that is imposed there is not something exceptional: that everyone should bring his share in the form of a little contribution of a discourse determined by a subject (194d). Nevertheless there is something which was not foreseen, there is what one might call a disturbance. The rules were even given at the beginning of the Symposium that there should not be too much drinking; no doubt the pretext is that most of the people there already have a hangover because they had drunk too (3) much the night before. One also notices the importance of the serious character of this elite group that is made up that evening by fellow drinkers.

This does not prevent that at a moment, which is a moment at which not everything is finished, far from it, one of the guests, Aristophanes, has something to say in the order of a rectification of the agenda, or a demand for explanation. At that very moment there enter a group of people, who are completely drunk, namely Alcibiades and his companions. And Alcibiades, who is pretty high, takes over the chair and begins to make statements which are exactly the ones whose scandalous character I intend to highlight for you.

Obviously this presupposes that we have some idea of what Alcibiades is, of what Socrates is and this takes us very far. All the same I would like you to take into account what Alcibiades is. In any case, for the usual version, you should read in the Nine Greek Lives what Plutarch wrote about him, this to help you to take into account the stature of the personage.

I know well that this again is going to demand an effort from you. This life is described for us by Plutarch in what I would call the Alexandrian atmosphere, namely at a funny moment in history, in which all the personages seem to pass to the state of a sort of shadow. I am speaking about the moral accent of what comes to us from this epoch which involves a sort of emergence of shadows, a sort of nekuia as it is called in the Odyssey.

Plutarch's construction, with what they contain moreover as a model, as a paradigm, for a whole moralistic tradition which followed, have this something or other which makes us think of the being of zombies: it is difficult to see blood flowing through their veins. But try to imagine from this singular career that Plutarch outlines for us, what this man must have been; this man coming here before Socrates, Socrates who elsewhere declares that he was protos erastes, the first to have loved him, Alcibiades, this Alcibiades who on the other hand is a sort of pre-Alexander, a personage no doubt whose political adventures are all marked with the sign of defiance, of extraordinary exploits, of an incapacity to situate himself or to come to a halt anywhere, and wherever he passes upsetting the situation and making victory pass from one camp to the other wherever he goes, everywhere hunted, exiled and, it must be said, because of his misdeeds.

It seems that if Athens lost the Peloponnesian War, it is in so far as it felt the need to recall Alcibiades right in the middle of hostilities to make him account for an obscure story, the one described as the mutilation of Hermes, which appears to us to be (4) as inexplicable as it is ridiculous as we look back on it, but which surely involved fundamentally a character of profanation, of properly speaking insulting the gods.

Nor are we at all able to consider the memory of Alcibiades and his companions as settled. I mean that it is surely not without reason that the people of Athens brought him to book for it. In this sort of practice which evokes, by analogy, some sort of black Mass or other, we cannot fail to see against what kind of background of insurrection, of subversion with respect to the laws of the city, that there emerges a personage like Alcibiades. A background of rupture, of contempt for forms and for traditions, for laws, no doubt for religion itself... This is the disturbing thing that this personage carries with him. But he carries with him just as much a very singular seduction wherever he goes. And after this suit by the people of Athens, he does neither more nor less than pass over to the enemy, to Sparta, to this Sparta moreover that he Alcibiades has some responsibility in making the enemy of Athens, because, previously, he did all in his power in short, to make the peace negotiations fail.

So he goes over to Sparta and he immediately finds nothing better, nor more worthy of his memory, than to make the queen pregnant, something which everybody saw and knew about. It happens to be very well known that the king Agis has not slept with his wife for ten "months for reasons which I will pass over. She has a child, and right away Alcibiades will say: in any case, it was not for the pleasure of it that I did this, it is because it seemed appropriate to my dignity to ensure that my descendants would have a throne, and in that way to honour the throne of Sparta with one of my own race. This sort of thing, as you can well imagine, may be captivating for a certain time, but it is not forgiven. And naturally as you know Alcibiades, having contributed this present and some ingenious ideas about the manner of conducting hostilities, is going to change quarters again. He can hardly fail to go to the third camp, to the Persian camp, to the one represented by the power of the king of Persia in Asia Minor, namely Tissaphernes who, Plutarch tells us, was a bitter enemy of Greece. To be frank he hates them, but he is seduced by Alcibiades.

It is from there that Alcibiades is going to set about reestablishing the fortunes of Athens. He does it in conditions whose story of course is also extremely surprising because it seems that it is really in the midst of a sort of network of double agents, of permanent betrayal, all the warnings he gives to the Athenians are immediately reported through a circuit to Sparta and to the Persians themselves who make it known to the specific person of the Athenian fleet who passed on the information; so that at the same time he in his turn comes to know, to be informed, that it is perfectly well known in the highest places that he is a traitor.

Each of these personages sorts himself out as best he can. It is certain that in the midst of all this Alcibiades redresses the fortunes of Athens. After all that, without our being able to be absolutely sure of the details, in the way that the ancient (5) historians reported them, we must not be astonished if Alcibiades comes back to Athens with what we could call a really outstanding triumph which, despite the joy of the Athenian people, is going to be the beginning of a change of opinion.

We find ourselves in the presence of someone who cannot fail at every instant to provoke what can be called public opinion. His death is also quite a strange business. There are many obscurities about who is responsible for it; what is certain, is that it seems, that after a succession of reversals of fortune.

of reversions each more astonishing than the other, (but it seems that in any case, whatever difficulties he find himself in, he is never disheartened), a sort of enormous confluence of hatreds is going to culminate in the destruction of Alcibiades by means of procedures which are those, which legend, myth say must be used against the scorpion: he is surrounded by a circle of fire from which he escapes and it is from a distance with javelins and arrows that he must be brought down.

Such is the singular career of Alcibiades. If I have shown you the level of a power, of a penetration of a very active, exceptional mind, I would say that the most outstanding trait is still the reflection which is added to it by what is described not alone as the precocious beauty of Alcibiades as a child (which we know is closely linked to the story of the type of love then reigning in Greece namely, the love of children) but this beauty preserved for a long time which meant that at a rather advanced age it makes of him someone who seduces as much by his form as by his exceptional intelligence.

Such is the personage. And we see him in a gathering which reunites in short learned, serious men (although, in this context of Greek love on which we are going to put the accent later on which already contributes a background of permanent erotism from which these discourses on love are going to emerge) we see him therefore coming to recount to everybody something which we can summarise more or less in the following terms: namely the vain efforts that he made when he was a young man, at the time Socrates loved him, to get Socrates to have sex with him.

This is developed at length with details, and in short with a considerable crudity of language. There is no doubt that he made Socrates lose control, show how disturbed he was, yield to these direct corporal invitations, to a physical approach. And this which is publicly [reported] by a drunken man no doubt, but by a drunken man the whole extent of whose remarks Plato thinks it worthwhile reporting to us - I do not know if I am making myself fully understood.

Imagine a book which might appear, I am not saying in our day, because this appears about fifty years after the scene which is (6) reported, Plato produces it at that distance, suppose that after a certain time, to soften things a little, a personage like for example Mr. Kennedy, in a book composed for the elite, a Kennedy who would have been at the same time James Dean, comes to tell how he did his best while he was at the university to be made love to by (let us say some kind of professor), you can choose the personage yourself. It is not absolutely necessary that he should belong to the teaching profession, because Socrates was not quite a professor. But he was all the same a rather special one. Imagine that it is somebody like Mr. Massignon and who at the same time is Henry Miller. That would produce a certain effect. It would lead to some difficulties for Jean-Jacques Pauvert who would have published this work. Let us recall this at the moment when it is a question of noting that this astonishing work has been transmitted to us throughout the centuries by the hands of what we should call in different ways different kinds of benighted friars, which means that we have without any doubt the complete text.

Well! That is what I thought, not without a certain admiration, in leafing through this admirable edition which Henri Estienne gave us of it in a Latin translation. And this edition is definitive enough for there still to be now, in all the different learned, critical editions, it is already, this edition, the perfect critical one whose pagination is given to us. Those who are coming to this for the first time, should know that the little 272a or others, by which you see noted the pages to which you should refer, is only the pagination of Henri Estienne (1578). Henri Estienne was certainly not benighted, but one finds it difficult to believe that someone who was capable (this was not all he did) of devoting himself to producing such monumental editions [had an] openness to life such that he could fully appreciate the contents of what there is in this text, I mean in so far as it is above all a text about love.

At the same epoch - that of Henri Estienne - other people were interested in love and I can tell you quite frankly: when I spoke to you last year at length about the sublimation of the love of women, the hand which I was holding invisibly was not that of Plato nor of some erudite person, but that of Marguerite of Navarre. I alluded to it without insisting. You should know, for this sort of banquet, of sumposion also which her Heptameron is, she carefully excluded these sort of people with dirty nails who were emerging at the time and renewing the content of the libraries. She only wants knights, lords, personages who, in speaking about love speak about something that they had time to live. And also in all the commentaries which have been given about the Symposium it is indeed this dimension which often seems to be lacking that we thirst after. It does not matter.

(7) Among those people who never doubt that their understanding - as Jaspers says - attains the limits of the concrete-tangible-comprehensible, the story of Alcibiades and Socrates has always been difficult to swallow. As testimony I will only take the following: that Louis le Roy, Ludovicus rejus, who is the first translator into French of these texts which were just emerging from the orient for western culture, quite simply stopped there, at the entry of Alcibiades. He translated nothing after that. It seemed to him that enough beautiful discourses had been made before Alcibiades entered. Which indeed is in fact the case moreover. Alcibiades appeared to him as something added on, apocryphal, and he is not the only one to have behaved in this way. I will spare you the details. But Racine received one day from a lady who had been working on a translation of the Symposium a manuscript to look over. Racine who was a sensitive man had considered that as untranslatable and not alone the story of Alcibiades but all the Symposium. We have his notes which prove that he had looked very closely at the manuscript which had been sent to him; but as regards redoing it, because it was a question of nothing less than redoing it (it needed somebody like Racine to translate the Greek), he refused. A small thing for him. Third reference. I have the good luck to have found a long time ago, in a corner, handwritten notes from the course given by Brochard on Plato. It is very remarkable, these notes are very well taken, the writing is exquisite. In connection with the theory of love, Brochard of course refers to all the appropriate things: the Lysis, the Phaedrus, the Symposium. Above all the Symposium. There is a very well done operation of substitution when one arrives at the Alcibiades affair. He links up, he switches things onto the Phaedrus which, at that moment takes up the baton. He does not take responsibility for the story of Alcibiades.

This reserve after all deserves rather our respect. I mean that it is all the same the feeling that there is here something which poses questions. And I prefer that than to see it resolved by the singular hypotheses which frequently appear. The prettiest of them - this is one among thousands - Mr. Leon Robin sides with it (and this is astonishing) is that Plato here wanted to justify his master. The scholars have discovered that someone called Polycrates brought out [a pamphlet] some years after the death of Socrates. You know that he was brought down under different accusations which were made by three personages one of whom was called Anytus a certain Polycrates is supposed to have effectively put that in the mouth of Anytus, an indictment the principal body of which was constituted by the fact that Socrates is supposed to have been responsible precisely for what I spoke to you about above, namely for what one can call the scandal, the sowing of corruption; he is supposed to have dragged Alcibiades after him throughout his life, with all the procession of problems indeed of catastrophes which he brought with him.

(8) It must be admitted that the idea that Plato justified the morals if not the influence of Socrates by confronting us with the scene of public confession by this character, is really a backhanded way of doing things. One must really ask what the people who produce such hypotheses are thinking about. That Socrates should have resisted Alcibiades' attempts, that this by itself can justify this piece of the Symposium as something destined to elevate the sense of his mission in public opinion, is something which, as far as I am concerned, leaves me flabbergasted.

It is all the same necessary that either we are confronted with the consequence of reasons that Plato does not tell us about or that this piece has in effect a function, I mean that this irruption of this personage who has all the same the closest relationship with what is in question: the question of love.

To see then what is involved, and it is precisely because, what is involved is precisely the point around which there turns everything that is in question in the Symposium, the point around which there is going to be clarified at the deepest level not so much the question of the nature of love as the question which interests us here, namely, of its relationship with transference. It is because of this that I am going to focus the question on this articulation between the text which is reported to us of the discourses pronounced in the sumposion, (416BC) and the irruption of Alcibiades.

At this point I must outline for you at first something about the meaning of these discourses, first of all the text of them that is transmitted to us, the narrative. What in fact is this text? What does Plato tell us?

First of all one can ask oneself that question. Is it a fiction, a fabrication, as many of his dialogues manifestly are which are compositions which obey certain laws (and God know that on this point there would be much to say)? Why this genre? Why this law of dialogue? We are going to have to leave these things to one side; I am only indicating to you that there is on this point a whole range of things to be known. But this has all the same a different character, a character moreover which is not altogether foreign to the mode in which we are shown certain of these dialogues.

To make myself understood, I would say the following: if we can take the Symposium as we are going to take it, let us say as a sort of account of psychoanalytic sessions (because effectively it is something like this that is in question) because in the measure that there progress, that there succeed one another these contributions of the different participants in this sumposion something happens which is the successive clarification of each one of these flashes by the one which follows, then at the end something which is really reported to us as the sort of raw even inconvenient happening, the irruption of life into it, the presence of (9) Alcibiades. And it is for us to understand the meaning precisely of this discourse of Alcibiades.

So then, if this is what is in question, we would have according to Plato a sort of recording of it. Since there was no tape recorder, we will say that it is a brain recording. Brain recording is an extremely old practice, which sustained - I would even say - the way of listening for long centuries of people who participated in serious matters, as long as writing had not taken on this function of a dominant factor in the culture which is the one it has in our day. Since things can be written down, the things that must be remembered are for us in what I have called kilograms of language namely, piles of books and heaps of papers. But when paper was rarer, and books much more difficult to fabricate and to diffuse, it was an extremely important thing to have a good memory, and - as I might say - to experience everything that had been heard in the register of the memory which conserves it. And it is not only at the beginning of the Symposium but in all the traditions that we know that we can see the testimony that the oral transmission of science and of wisdom is absolutely essential there. It is because of this moreover that we still know something about it, it is in the measure that writing does not exist that oral tradition functions as a support. And it is indeed to this that Plato referred in the mode in which he presents to us.... in which the text of the Symposium comes to us. He has it recounted by someone who is called Apollodorus. We are aware of the existence of this personage. He exists historically and this Apollodorus who is made to speak by Plato (because Apollodorus speaks) is supposed to come at a time dated at about a little more than thirty years before the appearance of the Symposium if one takes the date of about 370 for the publication of the Symposium. It is before the death of Socrates that there is placed what Plato tells us is said at that moment that there is to be transmitted by Apollodorus this account about what happened, again fifteen years earlier than the moment when he is supposed to have received it because we have reasons for thinking that it was in 416 that there took place this so called sumposion at which he assisted.

It is therefore sixteen years after that a personage extracts from his memory the literal text of what is supposed to have been said. Therefore, the least that can be said, is that Plato takes all the measures necessary to make us believe at least in what was commonly practised and which is still practised in these phases of culture, namely what I called brain recording. He underlines that this same personage, Aristodemus ... that some of (10) the tape had been damaged, that there may be gaps at certain points. All of this obviously does not at all settle the question of historical veracity but has nonetheless a great verisimilitude. If it is a lie, it is a beautiful lie. Since on the other hand it is obviously the work of love, and that, perhaps we will come to see there being highlighted for us the notion that after all only liars can appropriately reply to love, even in this case the Symposium would respond certainly to something which is like (this on the contrary is bequeathed to us without ambiguity) the elective reference of the action of Socrates to love.

This indeed is why the Symposium is such an important testimony. We know that Socrates himself testifies, affirms that he really does not know anything (no doubt the Theages in which he says it is not one of Plato's dialogues but it is all the same a dialogue of someone who wrote about what was known about Socrates and what remained of Socrates) and Socrates in the Theages is attested to have expressly said that he knew nothing in short except "this little bit of science, smikrou tinos mathematos" which is that of "ton erotikon, the things of love". He repeats it in these very terms, in terms which are exactly the same at a point in the Symposium.

The subject then of the Symposium is this... the subject had been proposed, put forward by a personage called neither more nor less Phaidros. Phaidros will also be the one who has given his name to another dialogue, the one to which I referred last year in connection with the beautiful and in which there is also question of love (the two are linked in Platonic thought). Phaidros is said to be pater tou logou, "the father of the subject" (177d), in connection with what is going to be dealt with in the Symposium, the subject is the following: in short what use is it to know about love? And we know that Socrates claims to know nothing about anything else. It is all the more striking to make this remark which you will be able to appreciate with its proper value when you refer to the text: you will see that Socrates says almost nothing in his own name. This "almost nothing" I will tell you if we have time today, it is important. [Line missing in Master Copy] to tell you, almost without nothing, is no doubt the essential. And it is around this "almost nothing" that the stage really turns, namely that people begin to really speak about the subject in a way that one would have expected.

Let us say right away that when all is said and done, in the type of adjustment, of arranging the level at which things are to be taken, you will see that when all is said and done Socrates does not set it particularly high with respect to what the others say: (11) it consists rather in centring things, in adjusting the lights so that one can properly see what is the average height. If Socrates tells us something it is, undoubtedly, that love is not something divine. He does not rate it very highly, but that is what he loves, he only loves that. That having been said, the moment at which he begins to speak is also worthwhile underlining, it is just after Agathon. I am obliged to bring them in one after another, in accordance with the rhythm of my discourse, instead of bringing them all in from the beginning namely Phaidros, Pausanias, Aristodemos who had come there I should say as a toothpick, namely that he met Agathon, Socrates, and Socrates brought him; there is also Eryximachos who is a colleague of most of you, who is a doctor; there is Agathon who is the host, Socrates (who brought Aristodemos) who arrives very late because on the way he had what we could call an attack. The attacks of Socrates consist in coming to a sudden halt, and standing on one leg in a corner. He stops in the house next door where he has no business. He is planted in the hallway between the umbrella stand and the coatstand and there is no way of waking him up. You have to give a little bit of atmosphere to these things. They are not as you will see the boring stories that you thought they were at secondary school.

I would like one day to give a discourse in which I would take my examples precisely in the Phaidros, or again in a certain play of Aristophanes, on something absolutely essential without which there is all the same no way of understanding how there is situated, what I would call in everything that is proposed to us by antiquity, the enlightened circle of Greece.

We ourselves live all the time in the midst of light. The night is in short carried on a stream of neon. But imagine all the same that up to an epoch which there is no need to refer to the time of Plato, a relatively recent epoch, night was night. When someone comes to knock, at the beginning of the Phaidros, to wake up Socrates, because he has to get up a little bit before daybreak (I hope that it is in the Phaidros but it does not matter, it is at the start of one of Plato's dialogues) it is quite a business. He gets up, and he is really in the dark, namely that he knocks things over if he tries to take a step. At the beginning of a play by Aristophanes to which I also alluded, when one is in the dark one is really in the dark, it is here that one does not recognise the person who touches your hand.

To take up what was still happening at the time of Marguerite de Navarre, the stories of the Heptameron are full of stories of this sort. Their possibility rests on the fact that at that time, that when one slipped into a woman's bed at night, it is considered to be one of the things that is most possible, provided you keep your mouth shut, to have oneself taken for her (12) husband or for her lover. And this it appears was frequently practised. This completely changes the dimension of relationships between human beings. And obviously what I would call in a quite different sense the diffusion of lights changes many things because of the fact that night is no longer for us a consistent reality, the fact that you can no longer pour it from a ladle, make of blackness something dense, removes certain things, many things from us.

All of this to come back to our subject which is the one that we must come back to, namely what is signified by this illuminated circle in which we are, and what is in question as regards love when one speaks about it in Greece. When one speaks about it, well... as M. de la Palisse would say, we are dealing with Greek love.

Greek love, you have to get used to this idea, is the love of beautiful boys. And then, hyphen, nothing else. It is quite clear that when one speaks about love one is not speaking about something else. All the efforts that we make to put this in its place are destined to fail in advance. I mean that in order to see exactly what it is we are obliged to move the furniture around in a certain way, to reestablish certain perspectives, to put ourselves in a certain more or less oblique position, to say that this was not necessarily all there was... obviously... of course...

It nevertheless remains that on the plane of love there was nothing but that. But then on the other hand, if one says that, you are going to tell me that love for boys is something which was universally accepted. Well no! Even when one says that it nevertheless remains that in a whole part of Greece a very poor view was taken of it, that in a whole other part of Greece - Pausanias underlines it for us in the Symposium - it was very well regarded, and since it was the totalitarian part of Greece, the Boeotians, the Spartans who belonged to the totalitarians (everything that is not forbidden is obligatory) not alone was it very well regarded, it was what was commanded. One could not stand apart from it. And Pausanias says: there are people who are much better. Among us, Athenians, it is well regarded but it is prohibited all the same, and naturally that reinforces the value of the thing. This is more or less what Pausanias tells us.

All of this, of course, fundamentally, does not teach us very much, except that it was more credible on a single condition, that we should understand more or less what it corresponds to. To have an idea of it, you must refer to what I said last year about courtly love. It is not of course the same thing, but it occupies an analogous function. I mean that it is quite obviously of the order and of the function of sublimation, in the sense that I tried last year to contribute to this subject a slight rectification in your minds about what is really involved in the function of sublimation.

(13) Let us say that there is nothing involved here which we [cannot] put under the register of a kind of regression on a collective scale. I mean that this something which analytic doctrine indicates to us as being the support of the social bond as such, of fraternity among men, homosexuality, attaches it to the neutralisation of the bond. . It is not a question of dissolving this social bond, of returning to the innate form, it is quite obviously something else. It is a cultural happening and it is also clear that it is in the milieu of the masters of Greece, amongst people of a certain class, at the level at which there reigns and at which there is elaborated culture, that this love is put into practice. It is obviously the major centre for the elaboration of interhuman relationships.

I recall in a different form, the thing that I already indicated at the end of the last seminar, the schema of the relationship of perversion with culture in so far as it is distinguished from society. If society brings with it by its censoring effect a form of disintegration which is called neurosis, it is in a contrary sense of development, of construction, of sublimation - let us say the word - that perversion can be conceived when it is produced by culture. And if you wish, the circle closes in on itself: perversion contributing elements which torment society, neurosis favouring the creation of new elements of culture. However much a sublimation it may be, this does not prevent Greek love from being a perversion. No culturalist point of view should predominate here. We cannot tell ourselves on the pretext that it was an accepted, approved, even celebrated perversion... homosexuality remains nevertheless what it was: a perversion. That to want to tell us in order to arrange things that if, we, for our part, treat homosexuality, it is because in our day homosexuality is something quite different, it is no longer the fashion, and that in the time of the Greeks on the contrary it played its cultural function and as such is worthy of all our respect, this really is to evade what is properly speaking the problem. The only thing which differentiates the contemporary homosexuality with which we have to deal and the Greek perversion, God knows, I believe that one can scarcely find it elsewhere than in the quality of objects. Here, schoolboys are acned and cretinised by the education they receive and these conditions are not really favourable for them to become the object of our homage; it seems that one has to go searching for objects in out of the way places, the gutter, that is the whole difference. But there is no difference in the structure itself.

(14) Naturally this causes scandal, given the outstanding dignity with which we have invested the Greek message. And then there are the fine sentiments with which one surrounds oneself for this purpose, namely that we are told: all the same you must not believe that for all that women did not receive appropriate homage. Thus Socrates, do not forget, precisely in the Symposium, where, as I told you, he says very little in his own name - but what he speaks is extraordinary - only he makes a woman speak in his place: Diotima. Do you not see that the testimony, that the supreme homage comes back, even in the mouth of Socrates, to the woman? Here at any rate is what right thinking people never fail at this point to highlight for us; and in addition, you know that from time to time he would go to visit Lais, Aspasia - historians collect all sorts of gossip - Theodota who was Alcibiades' mistress. And as regards the famous Xanthippes, about whom I spoke to you the other day, she was there the day he died as you know, and she even gave out the most deafening cries. There is only one problem... this is attested for us in the Phaedo, in any case, Socrates suggests that she should be put to bed immediately, that she should be got out as quickly as possible so that they can talk calmly, there are only a few hours left.

Except for this, the function of the dignity of women will be preserved. I have no doubt in fact about the importance of women in antique Greek society, I would say even more, it is something very serious whose import you will subsequently see. It is that they had what I would call their true place. Not alone did they have their true place, but this means that they had a quite outstanding weight in love relationships and we have all sorts of testimonies of this. It appears in fact, provided always that one knows how to read - one must not read the antique authors with wire netting on one's glasses - that they had this role which is veiled for us but nevertheless is very outstandingly their own in love: simply the active role, namely that the differences between the antique woman and the modern woman is that she demanded her due, that she attacked the man. This is something that you can, I believe, put your finger on in many cases. In any case when you have woken up to this point of view on the question you will notice many things which otherwise, in ancient history, seem strange. In any case Aristophanes who was a very good music-hall producer, did not dissimulate from us how the women of his time behaved. There has never been anything more characteristic and more crude concerning the enterprises - as I might say - of women. And it is precisely for that reason that learned love - as I might call it - took refuge elsewhere.

We have here in any case one of the keys for the question which should not astonish psychoanalysts too much.

(15) This may appear perhaps quite a long detour to excuse the fact that in our enterprise (which is to analyse a text whose object is to know what it means to know about love) we take something obviously, we take what we know, that it refers to the time of Greek love, this love as I might say of the school, I mean of schoolboys. Well, it is for technical reasons of simplification, of example, of a model which allows to be seen an articulation that otherwise is always elided in what is too complicated in love with women, it is because of this that this love of the school can be of use to us, can legitimately be of use to all (for our object) as a school for love.

This of course does not mean, that this is something to be relaunched. I would like to avoid any misunderstanding, because soon people will be saying that I am setting myself up here as a proponent of Platonic love. There are many reasons why this can no longer serve as a school for love. If I were to tell you about them, this would again be a question of giving great sword thrusts through curtains when one does not know what there is behind - believe me - in general I avoid it. There is one reason why there is no reason to begin again, because of which it is even impossible to begin again, and one of the reasons which will astonish you perhaps if I put it forward before you is that, for us, at the point that we are at, even if you have not realised it yet you will realise it if you reflect a little bit, love and its phenomenon and its culture and its dimension has for some time become disengaged from beauty. That may astonish you, but that is the way it is.

You can verify that from both sides. From the side of beautiful works of art on the one hand, from the side of love also, and you will see that it is true. It is in any case a condition which renders difficult... and it is precisely for this reason that I make this whole detour to accustom you to what is in question... we return to the function of beauty, to the tragic function of beauty because this is what I put forward last year - the dimension - and this is what gives its veritable meaning to what Plato is going to tell us about love.

On the other hand, it is quite clear that at the present time it is not at all at the level of tragedy, nor at another level of which I will speak in a moment that love is bestowed, it is at the level of what in the Symposium is called, in Agathon's discourse, the level of Polymnie. It is at the level of lyricism, and in the order of artistic creations, at the level of what presents itself indeed as the most vivid materialisation of fiction as essential, namely what we call the cinema. Plato would have been delighted by this invention. There is no better illustration for the arts of what Plato put at the origin of his vision of the world, than this "something" which is expressed in the myth of the cave that we see illustrated every day by those (16) dancing rays which are able to manifest on the screen all our feelings in a shadowy way.

It is indeed to this dimension that there belongs most outstandingly in the art of our day the defence and the illustration of love. This indeed is the reason that one of the things that I told you - which will nevertheless be the one around which we are going to centre our progress - one of the things I told you and which does not fail to arouse a certain reticence, because I said it quite incidentally: love is a comic sentiment. All the same, an effort is required for us to come back to the proper point of adaptation which gives it its import.

There are two things which I noted in my former discourse about love and I recall them. The first is that love is a comic sentiment, and you will see what will illustrate it in our investigation. We will complete in this connection the loop which will allow us to bring forward what is essential: the true nature of comedy. And it is so essential and indispensable that it is for this reason that there is in the Symposium, something which since that time the commentators have never been able to explain, namely, the presence of Aristophanes. He was, historically speaking the sworn enemy of Socrates; nevertheless he is there.

The second thing that I wanted to say - as you will see - that we rediscover at every moment, which will serve us as a guide, is that love is to give what one does not have. This you will also see arriving at one of the essential hinges of what we will have to encounter in our commentary.

In any case, to enter into this subject, into this dismantling through which this discourse of Socrates about Greek love will be something illuminating for us, let us say that Greek love allows us to separate out in the love relationship the two partners in a neutral way (I mean at this something pure which is actually expressed in the masculine gender), it is to allow there to be articulated at first what happens at the level of this couple who are respectively the lover and the beloved, erastes and eromenos.

What I will tell you the next time consists in showing you how, around these two functions of lover and beloved, the process of what unfolds in the Symposium is such that we are going to be able to attribute respectively, with all the rigour that analytic experience is capable of, what is in question..... in other words we will see there articulated clearly, at a time when analytic experience as such was lacking, when the unconscious in its proper function with respect to the subject is undoubtedly a dimension which is not even suspected, and therefore with the limitation that this involves, you will see articulated in the (17) clearest fashion this something which comes to meet the summit of our experience; that which I tried throughout all these years to unfold before you under the double rubric, the first year of Object Relations, the year which followed, of Desire and its interpretation you will see clearly appearing and in formulae which are probably those to which we have come: the lover as subject of desire (and taking into account all the weight that we give to the word desire) the eromenos, the beloved, as being the one who in this couple is the only one to have something.

The question of knowing whether "what he has" (because it is the beloved who has it) has a relationship I would say even any relationship whatsoever with that which the other, the subject of the desire lacks. I would say the following, the question of the relationships between desire and the one before whom desire is fixed - as you know - has already led us around the notion of desire qua desire for something else. We arrived at it by means of an analysis of the effects of language on the subject. It is strange that a dialectic of love, that of Socrates, which is precisely made up entirely by means of dialectic, by a testing of the imperative effects of questioning as such, does not lead us to the same crossroads. You will see that indeed far from leading us to the same crossroads it will allow us to go beyond, namely, to grasp the moment of tipping over, the moment of reversal where from the conjunction of desire with its object qua inadequate, there must emerge the signification which is called love.

It is impossible, without having grasped this articulation, the conditions it involves in the symbolic, the imaginary and the real... not to grasp what is in question, namely in this effect so strange in its automatism which is called transference, to measure, to compare what is the part, the proportion between this transference and love, what there must be attributed to each one of them and reciprocally, in terms of illusion or of truth. In this the path and the investigation that I introduced to you today is going to prove to be of inaugural importance for us.

Seminar 3; Wednesday 30 November 1960

We stopped the last day at the position of the erastes and the eromenos, of the lover and the beloved, as the dialectic of the Symposium will allow us to introduce it as what I have called the basis, the turning point, the essential articulation of the problem of love. The problem of love interests us in so far as it is going to allow us to understand what happens in transference, and I would say up to a certain point, because of transference.

To justify such a long detour as this one which may appear to those of you who are newly come this year to this seminar and which may after all appear to you as a superfluous detour, I will try to give you the grounds, to presentify to you the meaning, which you should immediately apprehend, of what our research involves.

It seems to me that at whatever level of his formation he may be, something should be present to the psychoanalyst as such, which may strike him, catch him by the coat-tails at many a turning point (and is not the most simple the one which it seems to me is difficult to avoid after a certain age and which for you it seems must already involve in a very live way just by itself what the problem of love is). Have you never been struck at this turning point by the fact that, in what you have given - I mean to those who are closest to you - there was something missing, and which not only was missing, but which has left those mentioned, those closest to you irremediably lost to you? And what is it? it is that precisely those closest to you (with them) one does nothing but turn around the phantasy whose satisfaction you have more or less sought for (in them), which (for them) has more or less substituted its images or its colours. This being of which you may suddenly be reminded by some accident whose resonance can be best understood by death, this veritable being, which is what I am evoking for you, already distances itself and is already eternally lost. Now this being is all the same the very one that you are trying to rejoin along the paths of your desire. Only that being is yours, and as analysts you know well that it is, in some way or other, because of not wanting it, that you have also more or less missed it.

But at least here at the level of your sin and your failure you are exactly the measure.

(2) And those others whom you have cared for so badly, is it because you have made of them as people say simply your objects? Would to God that if you had treated them as objects whose weight, whose taste, whose substance is appreciated, you would today be less disturbed by their memory, you would have done them justice, rendered them homage and love, you would at least have loved them like yourself, except for the fact that you love badly (but it is not even the fate of the unloved that we have had our share of) you would have made of them no doubt as they say, subjects as if this was the end of the respect that they merited, the respect as it is said of their dignity, the respect owed to our fellows (nos semblables). I am afraid that this neutralised use of the term our fellows, is indeed something different to what we are dealing with in the question of love and, as regards these fellows that the respect that you give them may go too rapidly towards respect for the similar, leaving them to their quirks of resistance, to their stubborn ideas, to their congenital stupidity, indeed to their own concerns... let them sort it out for themselves! This is, I believe, the foundation of this coming to a halt before their liberty which often directs your behaviour, the liberty of indifference it is said, but not so much of theirs as of yours.

And it is indeed here that the question is posed for an analyst, namely what is our relation to this being of our patient? Nevertheless we know well all the same that this is what is in question in analysis. Is our access to this being one of love or not? Has our access some relation with what we know about the point we place ourselves at as regards the nature of love? This as you will see will lead us rather far, precisely to know that which - if I may express myself in this way by using a metaphor - is in the Symposium when Alcibiades compares Socrates to some of these tiny objects which it seems really existed at the time, to little Russian dolls for example, these things which fitted into one another; it appears that there were images whose outside represented a satyr or a Silenus, and, within we do not really know what but undoubtedly some precious things.

What there should be, what there may be, what there is supposed to be, of this something, in the analyst, is indeed what our question will tend towards, but right at the end.

In approaching this problem of this relationship which is that of the analysand to the analyst, which manifests itself by this very curious phenomenon of transference which I am trying to approach in a fashion which circumscribes it more closely, which evades as little as possible its forms (at once known to all, and which people try more or less to make into abstractions, to avoid their proper weight), I believe that we cannot do better than begin (3) from a questioning of what this phenomenon is supposed to imitate to the highest degree, or even to become confused with.

There is as you know a text of Freud, celebrated in this sense.

which is found in what are usually called The papers on technique, with that to which it is closely linked, namely let us say that something has ever since always remained suspended to something in the problem of love - an internal discord, some duplicity or other which is precisely what we should circumscribe more closely namely perhaps clarify by this ambiguity of this other thing, this substitution en route which after some time of the seminar here you should know to be all the same what happens in analytic action, and which I can summarise in this way.

The person who comes to see us in principle with this supposition that he does not know what is wrong with him (there is already there a whole implication of the unconscious, of the fundamental "he does not know" and it is through this that there is established the bridge which can link our new science to the whole tradition of "know thyself"; of course there is a fundamental difference, the accent of this "he does not know" is completely displaced) - and I think that I have already said enough about this to you for me not to have to do any more than indicate the difference in passing..... but what is it? What he truly has in himself, what he is demanding to be, not only formed, educated, released, cultivated according to the method of all the traditional pedagogies, (he puts himself under the mantle of the fundamentally revelatory power of some dialectics which are the offspring, the offshoots of the inaugural step taken by Socrates in so far as it is a philosophical one) is it towards this that we are going, in analysis, to lead whoever comes to see us as an analyst?

Simply as readers of Freud, you should all the same already know something of that which in its first appearance at least may present itself as the paradox of what presents itself to us as end, telos, as the completion, the termination of analysis. What does Freud tell us if not when all is said and done that what the one who follows this path will find at the end is nothing other essentially than a lack? Whether you call this lack castration or whether you call it Penisneid this is the sign, the metaphor. But if this is really what analysis comes up against, is there not there already some?

In short by recalling this ambiguity to you, this sort of double register between what in principle is the beginning and the starting point and this end (at first sight it may appear so (4) necessarily disappointing) a whole development is inscribed, this development, is properly speaking this revelation of something entire in its text which is called the unconscious Other.

Of course all of this, for someone who hears it spoken about for the first time - I do not believe that this is the case for anybody here - cannot be understood except as an enigma. This is not at all the way in which I am presenting it to you, but as the collecting together of terms in which our action as such is inscribed. It is also to illuminate right away what I could call, if you wish, the general plan according to which our journey is going to unfold, when it is a question after all of nothing other than immediately apprehending, of seeing there in fact the analogy there is between this development and these terms and the fundamental starting point of love. [This situation] even though it is after all evident, has never been, as far as I know, also, situated in any terms, placed at the starting point in these terms that I am proposing to you to articulate immediately, these two terms from which we are beginning: erastes, the lover, or again eromenos, the loving one and eromenos, the one who is loved.

Is everything not already better situated at the start (there is no need to play hide-and-seek). Can we not see immediately in such a gathering what characterises the erastes, the lover, for all those who have questioned him, who approach him, is it not essentially what he is lacking? And we for our part can immediately add, that he does not know what he is lacking, with this particular accent of unknowing which is that of the unconscious. And on the other hand the eromenos, the beloved object, is he not always situated as the one who does not know what he has, the hidden thing he has, what gives him his attraction? Because is not this "what he has" that which in the love relation is called on not only to reveal itself, [but] to become, to be, to presentify, that which up to then is only possible?

In short with the analytic accent, or without this accent, he also does not know. And it is something else that is in question. He does not know what he has.

Between these two terms which constitute, as I might say, in their essence, the lover and the beloved, you should notice that there is no coinciding. What is lacking to the one is not this "what he has", hidden in the other. And this is the whole problem of love. Whether one knows this or not is of no (5) importance. One encounters at every step in the phenomenon, its splitting apart, its discordance and a person has no need for all that to dialogue, to engage in dialectics, dialektikeuesthai about love, it is enough for him to be involved, to love, in order to be caught up in this gap, in this discord.

Is that all there is to say? Is it sufficient? I cannot do any more here. I am doing a lot in doing what I am doing, I am exposing myself to the risk of a certain immediate incomprehension, but I assure you, I have no intention here of leading you on, I am putting my cards on the table immediately. Things go further than that. We can propose, in the terms that we use, that which the analysis of the creation of meaning in the signifier-signified relationship already indicated (we will see, provided we see how it is to be handled, the truth in what follows) already indicated about the question, namely that precisely love as signification, (because for us it is one and it is only that), is a metaphor, in the measure that we have learned to articulate metaphor as substitution, and this is where we enter into obscurity and that I would ask you for the moment simply to admit, and to keep what I am here putting forward as what it is in your hands: an algebraic formula.

It is in so far as the function where it occurs of the erastes, of the loving one, who is the subject of lack, takes the place of, substitutes itself for the function of the eromenos who is the object, the beloved object, that there is produced the signification of love. We will spend a certain time perhaps in clarifying this formula. We have the time to do it in the year before us. At least I will not have failed to give you from the beginning this reference point which may serve, not as a riddle, at least as a point of reference to avoid certain ambiguities (when I will have developed it).

And now let us enter into this Symposium of which in a way the last time I gave you the setting, presented the personages, the personages who have nothing primitive about them as regards the simplification of the problem that they present to us. We must really admit that they are extremely sophisticated personages! And here, to retrace one of the aspects of what I spent my time telling you the last time, I will resume it in a few words, because I think it important that its provocative character should be expressed, articulated.

There is all the same something rather humorous [after] twenty-four centuries of religious meditation (because there is not a single reflection on love throughout these twenty-four centuries, either among free-thinkers or among priests, there is not a (6) single meditation on love which has not referred to this inaugural text) [this text] after all (taken in its external aspect) for someone who enters into it without being warned, represents all the same a sort of tonic, as they say, between people who we must all the same remind ourselves (for the peasant who emerges there from his little garden around Athens) are a collection of old queens. Socrates is fifty-three, Alcibiades still handsome it appears, is thirty-six and Agathon himself in whose house they are gathered, is thirty. He had just won the prize of the competition for tragedies; this is what allows us to date the Symposium exactly. Obviously one must not stop at these appearances. It is always in salons, namely in a place where people have nothing particularly attractive in their appearance, it is in the houses of duchesses that the most subtle things are said. There are lost forever of course but not for everyone, not for those who say them in any case. Here we are lucky enough to know what all these personages, in turn, exchanged that evening.

Much has been said about this Symposium, and there is no need to tell you that those whose job it is to be philosophers, philologists, Hellenists have examined it microscopically, and that I have not exhausted everything that they have said. But it is not inexhaustible either, because it always turns around one point. However little inexhaustible it may be, there is all the same no way in which I could put before you the totality of these tiny debates which are carried on about one or other line; first of all it cannot be assumed that it is the way not to allow something important to escape. It is not very comfortable for me who am neither a philosopher, nor a philologist, nor a Hellenist, to put myself in this role, to put myself in this position and give you a lecture on the Symposium.

What I can simply hope, is to give you first of all a first grasp of this something which I would ask you to believe does not just like that depend on a first reading. Trust me, and credit me in your thinking that it is not the first time and simply for this seminar that I have gone into this text. And do me the credit also of believing that I have taken some trouble to refresh the memories I had about the works that are consecrated to it, indeed to inform myself about the ones that I may have neglected up to now.

This in order to excuse myself for having (and all the same because I believe it is the best way) tackled things from the end; namely that which, simply because of the method that I teach you, should be the object for you of a sort of reserve, namely what I understand of it. It is precisely here that I am running the greatest risks; you should be thankful to me that I am running them in your place. Let this serve you simply as an introduction to the criticisms which are not so much to be aimed (7) at what I am going to tell you that I understood here, as at what there is in the text, namely that which in any case is subsequently going to appear to you as being that which my understanding latched onto. I mean that which explains, makes necessary, this true or false understanding, and as a text then, as an impossible signifier, even for you, even if you understand it differently, impossible to distort.

I will pass over then the first pages, which are these pages which always exist in Plato's dialogues. And this is not a dialogue like the others, but nevertheless this kind of situation constructed to create what I have called the illusion of authenticity, these withdrawals, these indications of the transmission of the one who repeated what the other had told him. It is always the way in which Plato intends, at the beginning, to create a certain depth, which no doubt is of use to him to give a wide-spread repercussion to what he is going to say.

I will pass over also the regulations to which I alluded the last time, the laws of the Symposium. I pointed out to you that these laws were not simply local, improvised, that they referred to a prototype. The sumposion was something which had its laws. No doubt not quite the same ones in different places; they were not quite the same in Athens or in Crete. I will pass over all these references.

We will come then to the carrying out of the ceremony which will involve something which in short should be called by a name, and a name which lends itself - I point it out to you in passing - to discussion: the praise of love. Is it encomion, is it epainesis? I will pass over all of this which has its interest, but which is secondary. And I would like simply today to situate what I would like to call the progress of what is going to unfold around this sequence of discourses which are first of all that of Phaidros, that of Pausanias.... Phaidros is another quite curious personage, you would have to trace out his character. It is not very important. For today you should simply know that it is curious that it is he who should have given the subject, that he is the pater tou logou, the father of the subject (177d). It is curious because we know him a little bit from elsewhere through the beginning of Phaedros, he is a curious hypochondriac. I am telling you this right away, it will perhaps be of use to you subsequently.

While I think of it I must also right away apologise to you. I do not know why I spoke to you about the night the last time. Of (8) course I remembered that it is not in Phaedrus that things begin at night, but in Protagoras. Having corrected this let us continue.

Phaidros, Pausanias, Eryximachos and before Eryximachos, it should have been Aristophanes, but he has a hiccup, he lets the other go before him and he speaks afterwards. It is the eternal problem in this whole story to know how Aristophanes, the comic poet, found himself there with Socrates, whom as everyone knows he did more than criticise, whom he ridiculed, defamed in his comedies and who, generally speaking, historians hold in part responsible for the tragic end of Socrates, namely his condemnation. I told you that this implies no doubt a profound reason, whose final solution I am not giving you any more than anybody else but perhaps we will try first of all to start throwing a little light on things.

Then comes Agathon and, after Agathon, Socrates. This constituting what is properly speaking the Symposium, namely everything that happens up to this crucial point which, the last time, I pointed out to you should be considered as essential, namely the entry of Alcibiades, to which corresponds the subversion of all the rules of the Symposium, if only because of the following: he comes in drunk, and he puts himself forward as being essentially drunk and speaks as such in drunkenness.

Let us suppose that you were to say to yourselves that the interest of this dialogue, of this Symposium, is to manifest something which is properly speaking the difficulty of saying something about love which hangs together. If it were only a question of this we would be purely and simply in a cacophony but what Plato - at least this is what I claim, it is not particularly daring to claim it - what Plato shows us in a fashion which will never be unveiled, which will never be revealed, is that the contour that this difficulty outlines is something which indicates to us the point at which there is the fundamental topology which prevents there being said about love something which hangs together.

What I am telling you there is not very new. Nobody dreams of contesting it. I mean that all of those who have busied themselves with this "dialogue" - in quotes - because it is scarcely something which deserves this title, because it is a succession of praises, a sequence in short of comic songs, of drinking songs in honour of love, which take on all their importance because these people are a little bit smarter than the others (and moreover we are told that It is a subject which is not often chosen, which at first sight may astonish us).

We are told then that each one expresses the affair with his own tone, at his own pitch. We do not really know moreover why for example Phaidros is going to be charged to introduce it (we are told) from the angle of religion, of myth or even of ethnography. (9) And in effect there is some truth in all of this. I mean that Phaidros introduces love to us by telling us that he is a megas theos, he is a great god (178a). That is not all he says, but in fact he refers to two theologians, Hesiod and Parmenides, who from different aspects spoke about the genealogy of the gods, which is all the same something important. We are not going to feel ourselves obliged to refer to the Theogony of Hesiod and to the Poem of Parmenides on the pretext that a verse of them is quoted in the discourse of Phaidros.

I would say all the same that two or three years ago, four maybe, something very important was published on this point by a contemporary, Jean Beaufret, on the Poem of Parmenides. It is very interesting to read it. Having said that, let us leave it to one side and let us try to take account of what there is in this discourse of Phaidros.

There is then the reference to the gods. Why to the gods in the plural? I would like simply all the same to indicate something. I do not know what meaning "the gods" have for you, especially the antique gods. But after all there is enough said about them in this dialogue for it to be all the same useful, even necessary that I should respond to this question as if it were posed by you to me. What after all do you think about gods? Where are they situated with respect to the symbolic, to the imaginary and to the real? It is not at all an empty question. Up to the end the question that is going to be dealt with, is whether or not love is a god, and one would at least have made the progress, at the end, of knowing with certitude that it is not one.

Obviously I am not going to give you a lecture on the sacred in this connection. Quite simply, like that, let us pin down some formulae on the subject. The gods, in so far as they exist for us in our register, in the one which we use to advance in our experience, in so far as these three categories are of some use to us, the gods it is quite certain belong obviously to the real. The gods are a mode of revelation of the real. It is for this reason that all philosophical progress tends in some way, by its own necessity, to eliminate them. It is for this reason that Christian revelation finds itself, as Hegel very well remarked, on the way to eliminating them, namely that in this register, Christian revelation finds itself a little bit further on, a little bit more profoundly on this path which goes from polytheism to atheism.....that with respect to a certain notion of the divinity of the god as the high point of revelation, of lumen, as radiation, aspiration, (it is a fundamental, real thing) Christianity incontestably finds itself on the path which goes towards reducing, which goes in the final analysis towards abolishing the god of this very revelation in so far as it tends to displace him, as dogma, towards the word, towards the logos as such, in other words finds itself on a path parallel to that which philosophy follows, in so far as I told you above its destiny is to deny the gods.

(10) These same revelations then which are met with up to then by man in the real, (in the real in which that which is revealed is moreover real)... but this same revelation, it is not the real which displaces it (this revelation) he is going to seek in the logos. He is going to seek it at the level of a signifying articulation.

Every interrogation which tends to articulate itself as science at the beginning of Plato's philosophical progress, teaches us rightly or wrongly, I mean truly or untruly, that this was what Socrates was doing. Socrates required that this thing with which we have this innocent relationship which is called doxa (and which of course is sometimes true) should not satisfy us, but that we should ask why, that we should only be satisfied with this certain truth which he calls episteme, science, namely which gives an account of its reasons. This Plato tells us was the business of Socrates' philosophiein.

I spoke to you about what I called Plato's Schwärmerei. We have to believe that something in this enterprise finally fails in order that [despite] the rigour, the talent deployed in the demonstration of such a method (so many things in Plato which afterwards all the mystagogies profited from - I am speaking above all about Gnosticism, and let us say that in which Christianity itself has still remained gnostic), it nevertheless remains that what is clear is that what pleases him is science. How could we blame him for having taken this path from the first step to the end?

In any case then, the discourse of Phaidros refers, to introduce the problem of love, to this notion that he is a great god, almost the oldest god, born immediately after Chaos says Hesiod. The first one of whom the mysterious Goddess, the primordial Goddess of Parmenides discourse, thought.

It is not possible here for us not to evoke at this level (in Plato's time) for us not to attempt (this enterprise may moreover be impossible to carry out) to determine all that these terms could have meant in Plato's time, because after all try to start from the idea that the first time that these things were said (and this was in Plato's time) it is completely impossible that all of this should have had an air of pastoral stupidity (that this has for example in the seventeenth century in which when people speak about Eros they are play-acting, all of this is inscribed in a completely different context, in a context of (11) courtly culture, echoing L'Astree, and everything that follows it namely words that carry no weight) here the words have their full importance, the discussion is really theological. And it is also to make you understand this importance that I found no better way than to tell you in order to really grasp it, to get hold of the second of Plotinus' Enneads, and see how he speaks about something which is placed more or less at the same level. It is also a level of eros, and it is only about that. You could not, provided you have read a little a theological text on the Trinity, have failed to glimpse that this discourse of Plotinus (by simply... I think there would have to be three words changed) is a discourse (we are at the end of the third century) on the Trinity.

I mean that this Zeus, this Aphrodite, and this Eros, are the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. This simply to allow you to imagine what is in question when Phaidros speaks in these terms about Eros. To speak about love, in short, for Phaidros is to speak about theology. And after all it is very important to see that this discourse begins with such an introduction, because for a lot of people still, and precisely in the Christian tradition for example, to speak about love is to speak about theology. It is all the more interesting to see that this discourse is not limited to that, but goes on to an illustration of its subject. And the mode of illustration that is in question is also very interesting, because we are going to hear about this divine love, we are going to hear about its effects.

These effects, I underline, are outstanding at their level through the dignity that they reveal with the theme which has become a little bit worn out since in the developments of rhetoric, namely the fact that love is a bond against which every human effort will come to grief. An army made up of lovers and beloveds (and here the underlying classical illustration by the famous Theban legion) would be an invincible army and the beloved for the lover, just as the lover for the beloved would be eminently suitable to represent the highest moral authority, one that one does not yield on, one that one cannot dishonour.

This culminates in the extreme case, namely at love as principle of the final sacrifice. And it is not without interest to see emerging here the image of Alcestis, namely in a reference to Euripides, which illustrates once more what I put forward to you last year as delimiting the zone of tragedy, namely properly speaking this zone of between-two-deaths. Alcestis, the only one among the whole family of the king Admetus, a man who is happy but whom death all of a sudden warns, Alcestis the incarnation of love, is the only one (and not his old parents as Admetus says who have such a short time to live in all (12) probability and not the friends and not the children, nobody), Alcestis is the only one who substitutes herself for him to satisfy the demands of death. In a discourse which deals essentially with masculine love, this is something which may appear remarkable to us, and which is worth our while retaining. Alcestis therefore is proposed to us here as an example. Saying this has the interest of giving its import to what is going to follow. Namely that two examples succeed that of Alcestis, two which according to the orator also advanced into this field of the between-two-deaths.

Orpheus, who succeeded in going down to Hell in order to seek out his wife Eurydice, and who as you know came back empty-handed because of a sin which he had committed, that of turning back before the permitted moment, a mythical theme reproduced in many legends of civilisations other than the Greek. There is a celebrated Japanese legend. What interests us here is the commentary that Phaidros has given it.

And the third example is that of Achilles. I can hardly push things further today than to show you what emerges from the bringing together of these three heroes, which already puts you on the path of something which is already a first step along the path of the problem.

The remarks first of all which he makes about Orpheus, what interests us is what Phaidros says (it is not whether he gets to the bottom of things or whether it is justified we cannot go that far) what matters to us is what he says, it is precisely the strangeness of what Phaidros says which ought to retain us. First of all he says about Orpheus, Oïagros' son, that the gods did not at all like what he had done (179d). And the reason that he gives for it is in a way given in the interpretation that he gives of what the gods did for him.

We are told that the gods (for someone like Orpheus who was not in short someone all that good, but a weakling - we do not know why Phaidros blames him, nor why Plato does so) did not show him a real woman, which I think sufficiently echoes that through which I introduced above my discourse about the relationship to the other, and the difference there is between the object of our love in so far as it overlaps our phantasies, and that which love questions in order to know whether it can reach this being of the other.

In this way it seems according to what Phaidros says, we see here that Alcestis really substituted herself for him in death.... you will find in the text this term which cannot be said to have been put there by me huper... apothanein (179b) here the substitution-metaphor of which I spoke to you above is realised in the literal (13) sense, that it is in place of Admetus that Alcestis authentically places herself. This hyperapothanein, I think that M. Ricoeur who has the text before his eyes can find it. It is exactly at 180a, where this hyperapothanein is enunciated to mark the difference there is, Orpheus then being in a way eliminated from this race of merit in love, between Alcestis and Achilles.

Achilles, is something else. He is epapothanein, the one who shall follow me. He follows Patroclos in death. You should understand what this interpretation of what one could call Achilles' gesture means for a man of antiquity, it is also something which would deserve much commentary, because all the same it is less clear than for Alcestis. We are forced to have recourse to Homeric texts from which it results that in short Achilles is supposed to have had the choice. His mother Thetis told him: if you do not kill Hector (it was a question of killing Hector uniquely to avenge the death of Patroclos) you will return home in all tranquility, and you will have a happy and quiet old age, but if you kill Hector your fate is sealed, death is what awaits you. And Achilles was so sure about this that we have another passage in which he makes this reflection to himself in an aside: I could go back peaceably. And then this is all the same unthinkable, and he says for one or other reason. This choice is by itself considered as being just as decisive as the sacrifice of Alcestis; the choice of moira the choice of destiny has the same value as this substitution of being for being. There is really no need to add to that (as M. Mario Meunier does for some reason or other in a note - but after all he was very erudite - to the page that we are speaking about) that afterwards apparently Achilles killed himself on the grave of Patroclos.

I have given a good deal of attention these days to the death of Achilles because it was worrying me. I cannot find anywhere a reference in the legend of Achilles which would permit there to be articulated something like that. I saw many modes of death attributed to Achilles, which, from the point of view of Greek patriotism attribute curious activities to him, because he is supposed to have betrayed the Greek cause for love of Polyxenes who is a Trojan woman, which would take something from the importance of Phaidros' discourse. But to remain at, to stay with Phaidros discourse, the important thing is the following: Phaidros devotes himself to a lengthily developed consideration concerning the reciprocal function of Patroclos and Achilles in their erotic bond.

(14) He undeceives us at a point which is the following: you must not at all imagine that Patroclos, as was generally thought, was the beloved. It emerges from an attentive examination of the characteristics of the personages Phaidros tells us in these terms, that the beloved could only have been Achilles who was much younger and beardless. I am noting this because this business is always coming up, of knowing at what moment one should love them, whether it is before the beard or after the beard. People talk about nothing else. One meets this business about the beard everywhere. One can thank the Romans for having rid us of this business. There must be a reason for it. So that Achilles had no beard. Therefore, in any case, he is the beloved.

But Patroclos, it appears, was about ten years older. From an examination of the texts he is the lover. What interests us is not that. It is simply a first indication, this first mode in which there appears something which has a relationship with what I gave you as being the point to be aimed at towards which we are going to advance, which is that whatever the case may be, what the gods find so sublime, more marvellous than anything else, is when the beloved behaves in short as one would have expected the lover to have behaved. And he opposes strictly on this point the example of Alcestis to the example of Achilles.

What does that mean? Because it is the text, one cannot really see why he should go through all this business which takes two pages if it were not important. You think that I am exploring the map of tenderness (la carte du Tendre), but it is not I, it is Plato and it is very well articulated. It is necessary also to deduce from it what imposes itself, namely then, because he expressly opposes him to Alcestis, and because he makes the balance of the prize to be given to love by the gods tip in the direction of Achilles, which is what that means. That means therefore that Alcestis was, for her part, in the position of the erastes. Alcestis, the woman, was in the position of the erastes, namely of the lover, and it is to the extent that Achilles was in the position of the beloved that his sacrifice (this is expressly said) is much more admirable.

In other words this whole theological discourse of the hypochondriacal Phaidros ends up by showing us, by indicating that it is at this there ends up what I called above the signification of love, the fact is that the apparition of it which is most sensational, most remarkable, sanctioned, crowned by the gods, gives a very special place in the Islands of the Blest to Achilles (and everyone knows it is an island which still exists at the mouth of the Danube, where they have now stuck an asylum or something for delinquents). This reward goes to Achilles, and very precisely because of the fact that a beloved behaves like a lover.

(15) I am not going to take my discourse any further today. I am going to end on something suggestive, which is going perhaps all the same to allow us to introduce here a practical question. It is the following: it is that in short it is from the side of the lover, in the erotic couple, that there is found, as one might say, in the natural position, the activity. And this will be full of consequences for us if, by considering the couple Alcestis-Admetus, you are willing to glimpse the following which is particularly within your reach by what we discover from analysis about what the woman can as such, experience about her own lack; we do not at all see why at a certain stage we do not conceive that in the couple, the heterosexual one in this instance, it is at once on the side of the woman that we say the lack exists, no doubt, but also at the same time the activity.

In any case, Phaidros, for his part, does not doubt it. And that on the other hand it is from the side of the beloved, of the eromenos, or, put it in the neuter, of the eromenon because in so far as one eromene's, what one ere's, what one loves in this whole business of the Symposium is what? It is something which is always said and very frequently in the neuter form, it is ta paidika. It is called in the neutral form the object. This is indeed what it designates as such, wherever we see associated with this function of the eromenos or of the eromenon, of that which is loved, of the beloved object, a neutral function: it is that it is on its side that the strong term is. You will see this subsequently when we will have to articulate what ensures, as one might say, that the problem is at a superior more complex stage when it is a question of heterosexual love, this thing which is seen so clearly at that level, this dissociation of the active and of the strong will be of use to us. It was in any case important to point out at the moment at which this is found so manifestly illustrated by the example precisely of Achilles and of Patroclos. It is the mirage that the strong is supposed to be confused with the active. Achilles because he is obviously stronger than Patroclos is not supposed to be the beloved. This indeed is what is denounced here, in this corner of the text, the teaching that we have to retain here in passing. Having got to this point of his discourse Phaidros hands over to Pausanias.

As you will see - I will recall it to you - Pausanias was taken throughout the centuries as expressing Plato's opinion about the love of boys. I have reserved some very particular care for Pausanias; I will show you that Pausanias who is a very curious personage, who is far from meriting this esteem of being on this occasion... (and why would he have put him there in the second place, immediately) from meriting the imprimatur. He is I believe quite an episodical personage. He is all the same important from a certain point of view, in so far as the best thing, as you will see, to put as a commentary in the margin of the discourse of Pausanias, is precisely this truth of the gospel that the kingdom of heaven is prohibited to the rich. I hope to show you the next time why.

[A desire redoubled is love.
 But redoubled love becomes delusion]

I am going to try today to advance in the analysis of the Symposium which is the path that I have chosen to introduce you this year to the problem of transference. Remember where we had got to the last time at the end of the first discourse, Phaidros' discourse. I would not like each one of these discourses, as they succeed one another: that of Pausanias, that of Eryximachos, that of Aristophanes, that of Agathon who is the host of this Banquet which was witnessed by Aristodemos, and which Apollodoros tells us about by reporting what he got from Aristodemos. Therefore from beginning to end it is Apollodoros who is speaking, repeating what Aristodemos said. After Agathon comes Socrates, and you will see the singular path he takes to express what he, for his part, knows love to be. You also know that the final episode is the entry of Alcibiades, a sort of public confession which is astonishing and almost indecent which is the one presented to us at the end of this dialogue and which has remained an enigma for all the commentators. There is also something afterwards, which we will come to. I would like to avoid your having to take this whole journey step by step, or your finally going astray or becoming wearied and forgetting the goal we are aiming at, the meaning of this point that we are heading for.

And this is why the last time I introduced my discourse by those words about the object, about this being of the object which we can always say (always more or less correctly but always correctly in some sense) we have missed, I mean we have missed out on. This reaching towards which it was appropriate for us to seek while there was time, this being of the other, I will come back to it by specifying what is in question as compared with the two terms of reference of what are called on this occasion intersubjectivity, I mean the accent put on the fact that we should recognise in this other a subject like ourselves and that it would be in this "I", in this direction that there lies the essential of this getting to the being of the other. In another direction also, namely what I mean when I try to articulate the role, the function of desire in this apprehension of the other, as it emerges in the erastes-eromenos couple, the (2) one which has organised all the meditation on love from Plato up to the Christian meditation. This being of the other in desire, I think I have pointed it out enough already, is not at all a subject. The eromenos is, I would say eromenon for that matter ta paidika in the neuter plural: things connected with the beloved child, it could be translated. The other properly, in so far as he is aimed at in desire, is aimed at I have said, as beloved object. What does that mean? It is that we can say that what we missed in the one who is already too distant for us to recover from our failure, is indeed his quality as object, I mean that essentially what initiates this movement (which is what is in question in the access that love gives us to the other) is this desire for the beloved object which is something that, if I wanted to image it, I would compare to the hand that is put out to grasp the fruit when it is ripe, to draw towards us the rose which has opened, to poke the log which suddenly catches fire.

Listen carefully to the rest of what I am going to say. [What] I am doing, in this image which will stop there: I am outlining before you what is called a myth, and you are going to see the miraculous character of what follows the image. When I told you the last time that the gods from which one begins (megas theos Love is a great god, Phaidros says at the beginning) the gods, are a manifestation of the real every passage from this manifestation to a symbolic order distances us from this revelation of the real. Phaidros tells us that Love, who is the first god conceived by the Goddess of Parmenides (on whom I cannot dwell here) and who Jean Beaufret in his book on Parmenides identifies, I believe, more correctly than to any other function, to truth, truth in its radical structure - and on this consult the way I spoke in "The Freudian Thing": the first conception, invention of truth, is love - and moreover it is presented to us here as being without father or mother. "Parents Love has none" (178b). Nevertheless the reference is already made in the most mythical forms to Hesiod. In the presentation of the gods something is organised which is a genealogy, a kinship system, a theogony, a symbolism.

At this halfway point of which I spoke to you which goes from theogony to atheism, this halfway point which is the Christian god, you should notice from the point of view of his internal organisation, what this triune god, this "one and three" god is, the radical articulation of kinship as such in what is its most irreducible, mysteriously symbolic, most hidden relationship and, as Freud says, the least natural, the most purely symbolic, the relationship of Father to Son. And the third term remains present there under the name of love.

This is where we started from, from Love as god, namely as reality which reveals itself in the real, which manifests itself in the real and as such we can only speak about it in a myth. It is for this reason that I am also authorised to fix before you the goal, the orientation of what is in question when I try to direct you towards the metaphor-substitution formula of erastes for eromenos. It is this metaphor which engenders this signification of love.

I have the right in order to introduce it here, to materialise it before you, to complete its image, to really make a myth of it. And as regards this hand which stretches towards the fruit, towards the rose, towards the log which suddenly bursts into flame, first of all to tell you that its gesture of reaching, of (3) poking, is closely linked to the maturation of the fruit, to the beauty of the flower, to the flaming of the log, but that, when in this movement of reaching, of drawing, of poking, the hand has gone far enough towards the object, if from the fruit, from the flower, from the log, a hand emerges which stretches out to encounter your hand, and that at that moment it is your hand which is fixed in the closed fullness of the fruit, the open fullness of the flower, in the explosion of a hand which bursts into flame, what is produced at that point is love! Again it is important not to stop even there and to say that we are face to face with love, I mean that it is yours when it was you who were first of all the eromenos, the beloved object, and that suddenly you become the erastes, the one who desires. Look at what I am trying to accentuate by this myth: every myth refers to the inexplicable of the real, it is always inexplicable that anything should respond to desire. The structure in question, is not this symmetry and this return. So that this symmetry is not really one. In so far as the hand stretches out, it is towards an object. It is in the hand which appears from the other side that the miracle lies; but we are not there to organise miracles, quite the contrary, we are there to know. And what it is a question of accentuating, is not what passes from there to the beyond, it is what is happening there, namely this substitution of the erastes for the eromenos or for the eromenon. In other words I underline it, some people thought, I believe, that there was some uncertainty in what I articulated the last time on the one hand about the substitution of the erastes for the eromenos, a metaphorical substitution, and wanted in a way to see in this some contradiction in the supreme example to which the gods themselves give the accolade, before which the gods themselves are astonished agasthentes (179d), this is the term used, namely that Achilles, the beloved epapothanein: dies - we are going to see what that means - let us say to remain imprecise: dies for Patroclos. It is in this that he is superior to Alcestis when she alone was willing to die in place of her husband whom she loved: huper tou autos andros apothanein. The terms used in this connection by Phaidros, huperapothanein as opposed to epapothanein..... huper.... apothanien Phaidros says earlier in the text: she dies in place of her husband. Epapothanein, is something different. Patroclos is dead. Alcestis changes places with her husband whom death demands, she crosses over this space mentioned above, which is between the one who is there and the other. She already performs there something which undoubtedly is destined to extract from the gods this disarmed testimony before this extreme act which will make her, before all human beings, receive this singular prize of having come back from among the dead. But there is still better. This indeed is what Phaidros articulates. What is better is that Achilles should have accepted his tragic destiny, his fatal destiny: the certain death which is promised him instead of returning to his country with his father to his fields, if he pursues the vengeance of Patroclos. Now Patroclos was not his beloved. It is he who was the beloved. Rightly or wrongly it does not matter to us, Phaidros articulates that Achilles, in the couple, was the beloved, that he could only have had that position, and that it was because of that position that his act (which is in short to accept his destiny as it is written) if he does not remove something from it, if he puts himself, not in place of, but following after Patroclos, if he makes of the destiny of Patroclos the debt for which he himself has to answer, which he himself must face.... it is to this that to the eyes of the gods the most necessary, the greatest admiration is given, that the level reached in the order of the manifestation of love is, Phaidros tells us, more elevated, that as such Achilles is more honoured by the gods in so far as it is (4) they who have judged something to which their relationship, let us say in passing, is only a relationship of admiration, I mean of astonishment; I mean that they are overwhelmed by this spectacle of the value of what human beings bring them in terms of the manifestation of love. Up to a certain point the gods, impassible, immortal, are not meant to understand what happens at the level of mortals. They measure as if from the outside something which is like a distance, a miracle in what happens as a manifestation of love.

There is indeed therefore in what Phaidros* text means, in the epapothanein, an accent put on the fact that Achilles, an eromenos, transforms himself into an erastes. The text says it and affirms it: it is as as erastes that Alcestis sacrifices herself for her husband. This is less of a radical, total, spectacular manifestation of love than the change of role which is produced at the level of Achilles when, from being an eromenos he transforms himself into an erastes.

It is not a question therefore in this erastes over eromenon of something whose humorous image - as I might put it - would be given by the lover over the beloved, the father over the mother, as Jacques Prevert says somewhere. And this is no doubt what inspired this sort of bizarre error of Mario Meunier that I spoke to you about, which says that Achilles kills himself on the tomb of Patroclos. It is not that Achilles as eromenos manages in some way to substitute himself for Patroclos, it is not a question of that because Patroclos is already beyond anybody's reach, anybody's attacks, it is that Achilles who is himself the beloved transforms himself into a lover. It is this which is in itself the properly miraculous event. It is through this that there is introduced into the dialectic of the Symposium the phenomenon of love.

Immediately afterwards we enter into Pausanias' discourse. We should punctuate Pausanias' discourse. We cannot take it in all its detail, line by line, as I told you because of time. Pausanias' discourse - you have generally enough read the Symposium for me to say it to you - is something which is introduced by a distinction between two orders of love. Love, he says, is not one and, to know which we are to praise.... there is there a nuance between encomion and epainos (I do not know why the last time I made the word epainesis out of epainein). The meaning of epainos is the praise of love: the praise of Love should begin from the fact that Love is not one. He makes the distinction from its origin. Aphrodite he says is never without Love, but there are two Aphrodites. The essential distinction between the two Aphrodites is the following, that one has nothing to do with women, that she is motherless, that she is born from the spattering onto the earth of the rain engendered by the castration of Uranus. It is by this primordial castration of Uranus by Kronos, it is from this that there is born the Uranian Venus who owes nothing to the duplication of sexes. The other Aphrodite is born shortly after the union of Zeus and Dione who is a Titaness. The whole history of the advent of the one who governs the present world, of Zeus, is linked - for this I refer you to Hesiod - to his relationships with the Titans, the Titans who are themselves his enemies. Dione is a Titaness. I will not insist on it. This Aphrodite is born of man and woman (5) arrenos. This one is an Aphrodite who is not called Uranian but Pandemian. The depreciatory and contemptuous accent is expressly formulated in Pausanias' discourse. It is the Common Venus. She belongs entirely to the people. She belongs to those who confuse all loves, who seek them at levels which are inferior to them, who do not make of love a superior element of domination, which is what is contributed by the Uranian Venus, the Uranian Aphrodite.

It is around this theme that there is going to develop Pausanias¹ discourse which, contrary to the discourse of Phaidros (which is a discourse of a mythologist, which is a discourse about a myth), is a discourse - one could say that we are not forcing anything - of a sociologist.... this would be exaggerated.... of an observer of societies. Everything in appearance is going to be based on the diversity of positions in the Greek world with regard to this superior love, this love which takes place between those who are at once the strongest and who have most spirit, those who are also the most vigorous, those who are also agathoi, those who know how to think (181e) namely between people placed at the same level because of their capacities: men.

Custom, Pausanias tells us, varies greatly between what happens in Ionia or among the Persians, where this love (the testimony about this we have from him) is supposed to be disapproved of, and what happens elsewhere in Elis or among the Lacedaimonians where this love is highly approved of, where it seems to be very bad for the beloved to refuse his favours, charizesthai, to his lover (182b), and what happens among the Athenians which appears to him the superior mode of apprehension of the ritual, as one might say, of giving a social form to love relationships.

If we follow what Pausanias says about it, we see that if he approves the Athenians for imposing obstacles, forms, interdictions to it (as least it is in this way in a more or less idealised form that he presents it to us) it is with a certain goal, with a certain end, it is in order that this love should manifest itself, prove itself, establish itself over a certain duration, indeed more, over a duration formally expressed as being comparable to conjugal union. It is also in order that the choice which follows the competition of love (agonotheton he says somewhere speaking about this love) presides at the struggle, at the competition between the postulants of love by putting to the test those who present themselves in the position of lover (184a). Here the ambiguity is particularly well sustained for a whole page. Whence is there placed this quality, this function of the one who chooses? Because also the one who is loved (even though he would want him to be a little bit more than a child already capable of some discernment) is all the same the one of the two who knows least, who is least capable of judging the quality of what one could call the profitable relationship between the two (it is something which is left to a sort of ambiguous testing, a testing between the two of them). It is moreover in the lover namely in the mode in which his choice is directed according to what he seeks in the beloved, and what he is going to seek in the beloved, is something to give him. The conjunction of the two, their encounter on what he calls somewhere the point of encounter of the discourse, both are going to meet at this point at which there is going to be a meeting place (184e).

It is a question of what? It is a question of this exchange which will mean that the first (as Robin has translated it in the text which is in the Budé collection) being thus able to (6) contribute something for wisdom and virtue in general, the other desiring to get this for education and wisdom in general (184e), are here going to meet in order according to him to constitute the couple and from an association which - as you see - is in short at the highest level: kai ho men aúnamenos eis pronesin ten alien areten sumballesthai, ho de deomenos eis paidensin kai ten alien sophian ktasthai,... ..it is on the plane of ктаομαι, of an acquisition, of a profit, of an acquiring, of a possession of something, that there is going to be produced the meeting between the terms of the couple which is going forever to articulate this love which is called superior, this love which will remain, even when we will have changed its partners, which will be called for the centuries that follow "Platonic love".

But it seems that it is very difficult in reading this discourse, not to sense, not to see the register to which all this psychology belongs. The whole discourse - if you reread it - is elaborated in function of a quotation, of a search for values, I would say of quoted shares (valeurs cotees). It is well and truly a question of investing the psychic investment funds that one has. If Pausanias demands somewhere that rules, severe rules - let us go back a little in the discourse - should be imposed on this development of Love, in courting the beloved, these rules are justified by the fact that it is appropriate that polle spoude (181e), a great deal of earnestness (it is indeed a question of this investment that I spoke about above) might not have been spent, wasted on these little boys who are not worth the trouble. Moreover it is for this reason that we are asked to wait until they are better formed, so that we know what we are dealing with. Further on again he will say that is is savages, barbarians, who introduce into this order of seeking for merit, disorder, that in this respect access to the beloved should be preserved by the same sorts of interdictions, of laws, of reservations, thanks to which we try to prevent, he says, access to freeborn women in so far as they are the ones through whom there are united two families of masters, that they are in a way in themselves, representative of everything you want in terms of name, of a value, of a firm, of a dowry, as we say today. Under this title they are protected by this order. And it is a protection of this order which should prohibit to those who are not worthy of it access to desired objects.

The more you advance in this text, the more you see affirmed this something which I indicated to you in my discourse the last time in so far as it is properly speaking the psychology of the rich man. The rich man existed before the bourgeois. Even in a still more primitive agricultural economy, the rich man exists. The rich man exists and manifests himself from the beginning of time, even if it is only in the fact whose primordial character we have seen, by periodic manifestations in the matter of festivals, of ostentatious spending which is what constitutes the first duty of the rich man in primitive societies.

It is curious that in the measure that societies evolve this duty seems to pass to a lower plane, or at least a clandestine one. But the psychology of the rich man reposes entirely on the fact that what is in question for himself, in his relationship with the other, is worth (la valeur): it is about what can be evaluated in accordance with modes that are open to comparison, (7) on a scale, between what can be compared in an open competition which is properly speaking that of the possession of goods.

What is in question, is the possession of the beloved because he is a good security, the term is there: chrestos, and that a whole life would not be enough to make the most of this security (183e). So that Pausanias, some years after this Symposium (we know this through the comedies of Aristophanes) will go a little further precisely with Agathon, who is here as everyone knows his beloved, even though there is already a payment because he has what I called here a beard on his chin, a term which has here all its importance. Agathon here is thirty and has just taken the prize at the tragedy competition. Pausanias is going to disappear some years later into what Aristophanes calls the domain of the blessed. It is a remote place, not just out in the country but in a distant land. It is not Tahiti but it is in Macedonia. He will remain there as long as his security is assured.

The ideal of Pausanias in the matter of love is - I might say - the capital that is put to one side, the putting in a safe of what belongs to him by right as being that which he was able to discern of what he is capable of making the best use of.

I am not saying that there are no sequelae to this personage, as we glimpse him in the Platonic discourse, in this other type whom I will rapidly designate for you because he is in short at the end of this chain, who is someone that I have met, not in analysis - I would not tell you about it - but whom I met enough for him to open up to me what was in what served him for a heart. This personage was really well-known and known for having a lively sentiment of the limits that are imposed in love precisely by what constitutes the position of the rich man. He was an extremely rich man. He had if I can express myself in this way - it is not a metaphor - strong boxes full of diamonds (because one never knows what might happen... it was immediately after the war... the whole planet might have gone up in flames).

This is nothing. The fashion in which he conceived it... because he was a rich Calvinist - I apologise to those here who may belong to that religion - I do not think that it is the privilege of Calvinism to create rich people, but it is not unimportant to indicate it here, because in a word all the same it can be noted that Calvinist theology had the effect of making appear, as one of the elements of moral direction, that God fills with good things those he loves on this earth (elsewhere also perhaps, but starting from this earth), that the observation of laws and commandments has as fruit worldly success, which has not been without its fruitfulness moreover in all sorts of enterprises. In any case the Calvinist in question treated exactly the order of merits that he would acquire from this earth for the future world in the register of a page of accounts: on such a day this was bought. And there also all his actions were directed towards acquiring for the beyond a well-filled safe.

I do not wish in making this digression to seem to be recounting a too facile apologue, but nevertheless, it is impossible not to complete this picture by outlining what his matrimonial fate was. One day he knocked down somebody on the street with the bumper of his big car. Even though he always drove very carefully. The (8) person knocked down shook herself. She was very pretty, she was the daughter of a concierge, which is not at all impossible when one is pretty. She received his excuses coldly, and still more coldly his propositions for damages, still more coldly again his propositions that they should dine together. In short, in the measure that the difficulty became greater of gaining access to this miraculously encountered object, the notion grew in his mind. He told himself that there was here a real asset (valeur). And it was for this very reason that all of this led him into marriage.

What is in question is properly speaking the same theme which is proposed to us by the discourse of Pausanias. It is namely that to explain to us the degree to which love is a value - judge for yourselves - he tells us: "Love is forgiven everything. For if, wishing to get money from someone or to win public office or to get any other power, a man should behave as lovers do towards their beloved he would reap the greatest disgrace". He would be guilty of what is called low morals, aneleutheria, because that is what that means, flattery, kolakeia. He would flatter, "something which is not worthy of a master, to obtain what he desires" (183b). It is by measuring something as going beyond the danger level that we can judge what love is. This indeed is the same register of reference that is in question, the one which led my Calvinist accumulator of goods and of merits to have in effect for a certain time a lovable wife, to cover her of course with jewels which every evening were removed from her body to be put back in the safe, and arrive at this result that one day she went off with an engineer who was earning fifty thousand francs a month.

I would not like to appear to be overdoing things on this subject. And after all in introducing this discourse of Pausanias (which is particularly presented to us as the example of what there is supposed to be in antique love in terms of some kind of exalting of the moral quest) I do not need to have got to the end of this discourse to perceive that this shows the flaw that there is in any morality, which in any fashion attaches itself uniquely to what one can call the external signs of value. The fact is that he cannot end his discourse without saying that if everybody accepted the primary, prevalent character of these beautiful rules by which assets are only accorded to merit, what would happen? "In this case even to be deceived is not ugly. . . . for if one in pursuit of riches gratifies a lover supposed to be rich, and is deceived and gets no money because the lover turns out to be poor, it is no less ugly; for such a one is thought to show, as far as in him lay, that for money he would do anyone and everyone any and every service, and that is not beautiful. By the same argument observe that even if one gratifies another as being good, expecting to be better himself because of his affection for the lover, but since the other turns out to be bad (kakos) and not possessed of virtue, he is deceived, nevertheless the deceit is beautiful." (184e-185b)

One sees there generally something in which curiously people would like to find, to recognise the first manifestation in (9) history of what Kant called right intention. It seems to be that this is really to share in a singular error. The singular error is not to see rather the following: we know by experience that this whole ethic of educative love, of pedagogical love in the matter of homosexual love and even of the other, is something in itself which always shares - we see it from experience - in some lure which in the end cannot completely conceal itself. If it has happened to you, because we are on the plane of Greek love, to have some homosexual brought to you by his protector (it is always undoubtedly, on his part, with the best of intentions), I doubt that you have seen in this order some very manifest effect of this more or less warm protection with regard to the development of the one who is put before you as the object of this love which would like to present itself as a love for the good, for the acquisition of the greatest good. This is what allows me to say to you that it is far from being Plato's opinion. Because scarcely has the discourse of Pausanias - rather suddenly I must say - concluded on something which says more or less the following: "all the others were and those who were not should betake themselves to the Pandemian Venus, the goddess of easy virtue who is not one either, let them go and screw themselves if they want! It is on this, he says, that I would conclude my discourse on love. As for the plebs, in other words for popular love, we have nothing more to say about it.

But if Plato agreed, if this were really what was in question, do you believe that we would see what happens immediately afterwards? Immediately afterwards Apollodoros begins to speak again and says to us: Pausaniou... pausamenou, Pausanias paused upon this clause (185c), it is difficult to translate into French and there is a little note which says: "there is no corresponding French expression, because the numerical symmetry of the syllables is important, it is probably an allusion, see the note...."

I will pass over it. M. Leon Robin is not the first one to react to it. Already in the edition of Henri Estienne there is a marginal note. Everybody has reacted to this Pausaniou... pausamenou because people saw an intention there. I think that I am going to show you that they have not seen what it is, because in fact, immediately after this little bit of cleverness - it is well underlined for us that it is a bit of cleverness - because in parenthesis the text tells us: "that's how the stylists teach me to jingle!" Didaskousi gar me isa legein outosi oi sophoi "the masters have taught me to speak that way isologically", let us say.... a play on words, but isology is not a play on words, it is really a technique. I will pass over all the ingenious efforts that have been made to discover what master, is it Prodicus, is it not a Prodicus? Is it not rather Isocrates because also in Isocrates there is an iso and it would be particularly iso to isologize Isocrates. This leads to problems! You cannot imagine the amount of research that this has engendered! Were Isocrates and Plato pals....?

I have been reproached for not always quoting my sources, and starting from today I have decided to do it, here it is Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff. I am telling you this because he is a sensational character. If you can put your hands on them, if you can read German, get his books (there is book on Simonides that I would really like to have) he lived at the beginning of this century and he was an erudite gentleman of his time, a (10) considerable personage whose works on Plato are absolutely illuminating. He is not the one I am blaming in connection with Pausaniou... pausamenou, he did not waste his time on this sort of trivial gossip.

What I wanted to tell you is the following, it is that I do not believe on this occasion in a particularly distant reference to the way in which Isocrates handles isology when it is a question of demonstrating for example the merits of a political system. The whole development that you will find in the preface to this book of the Symposium as it has been translated and commented by Leon Robin appears to me to be something undoubtedly interesting but unrelated to this problem and here is why. My conviction was already formed no doubt concerning the import of the discourse of Pausanias, and I even gave it all to you the last time in saying that the discourse of Fausanias is truly the image of the Gospel's malediction: what is really worthwhile is forever refused to the rich. Nevertheless it happens that I think I found here a confirmation which I propose to your judgement. Last Sunday I was - I am continuing to quote my sources - with someone, and I would be angry with myself if I have not already told you how important he was in my own formation, namely Kojeye. I think that some of you all the same know that it is to Kojève that I owe my introduction to Hegel.

I was with Kojève with whom, of course, because I am always thinking of you, I spoke about Plato. I found in what was said to me by Kojève (who is doing something completely different to philosophy now because he is an eminent man who all the same writes from time to time two hundred pages on Plato, manuscripts that make their way into different places).... He shared with me a certain number of things about his very recent discoveries in Plato, but he was not able to say anything to me about the Symposium because he had not reread it. This did not form part of the economy of his recent discourse. It was a little bit then as if I had gone to some trouble for nothing, even though I was very encouraged by many of the things that he said to me about other points of the Platonic discourse, and particularly by the fact that it is quite certain (which is altogether obvious) that Plato essentially hides what he thinks from us just as much as he reveals it and that it is according to the measure of the capacity of each one (namely up to a certain limit very certainly not supersedable) that we can glimpse it. You must not blame me then if I do not give you the last word on Plato because Plato was quite determined not to tell us this last word.

It is very important, at the moment at which perhaps everything that I am telling you about Plato will make you open Phaedo for example, that you might have the idea that perhaps the object of Phaedo is not quite to demonstrate, despite appearances, the immortality of the soul. I would even say that its end is very obviously the contrary. But let us leave this to one side.

On leaving Kojève I said to him that we had not spoken very much after all about the Symposium, and since Kojève is a very superior sort of person, namely a snob, he answered me: "In any case you will never interpret the Symposium if you do not know why Aristophanes had a hiccup!"

I already told you that it was very important because it is obvious that it is very important. Why would he have had a hiccup if there were no reason for it? I had no idea why he had a hiccup, but all the same encouraged by this little push, I said to myself, moreover with a great weariness, that I expected nothing less annoying than to discover again speculations about (11) hiccuping, sneezing, the antique or even the psychosomatic value that this might have.... very distractedly I reopen my copy and I look at this text at the place Pausaniou... pausamenou because it is immediately afterwards that there is going to be a question of Aristophanes (he is the one who is supposed to speak) and I noticed the following which is that for sixteen lines all that is dealt with is stopping this hiccup (when will this hiccup stop - will it stop - will it not stop - if-it-will-not-stop-you-take-this-or-theJ -sort-of-thing-and-it-will-end-up-by-stopping) in such a way that the terms pausai, pausomai, pause, pausethai, pausetai, if we add Pausaniou...pausamenou give seven repetitions of paus, in these lines, or an average of two lines and a seventh interval between these eternally repeated paus ...; if you add here the fact that this will or will not achieve something and that when all is said and done I will do what you said I should do, namely that the term poieso is added to it, repeated with an almost equal insistence, which reduces to a line and a half the homophonies, indeed the isologies, that are in question, it is all the same extremely difficult not to see that if Aristophanes has a hiccup, it is because during the whole of the discourse of Pausanias he is convulsed with laughter - and so is Plato! In other words, that if Plato says something to us like Pausaniou...pausamenou: "The louse tried everything" (toto a tout tente) that he then repeats to us for these sixteen lines the word "tendant" (trying) and the word "tente (tried), should all the same make us prick up our ears, because there is no other example in any text of Plato of a passage which is so crudely like something out of l'almanach Vermot. Here too of course is one of the authors in whom I was formed in my youth. It was there even that the first time I read a Platonic dialogue which was called Theodore cherche des allumettes, by Courteline, which was really a prize morsel!

Therefore I think it is sufficiently affirmed that for Plato himself, in so far as it he is who speaks here under the name of Apollodoros, the discourse of Pausanias is indeed something derisory.

Well.... because we have got to a rather late hour, I will not analyse for you today the discourse of Eryximachos which follows. Eryximachos speaks instead of Aristophanes who should have spoken then. We will see the next time what the discourse of Eryximachos, the doctor, means as regards the nature of love. We will also see - because I think it is much more important - the role of Aristophanes and we will see in his discourse that Aristophanes will make us take a step, the first really illuminate --- one for us, if not for the ancients for whom the discourse of Aristophanes has always remained enigmatic like an enormous farce. It is a question of dioecism of this dioecism? Miemei. As it is put, of separation in two. It is a question - < of this Spaltung, of this splitting which, even though it is not identical to the one I am developing for you on the graph, has undoubtedly some relationship to it.

After the discourse of Aristophanes I will look at the discourse of Agathon. What I want starting from now so that you will know where you are going while you are waiting for the next time... if you look closely at this text (there is in any case one sure thing, and here I do not need a learned preparation to give it greater value), at whatever moment of analysis you tackle this text you will see that there is one thing and one thing only that Socrates articulates when he speaks in his own name, it is first of all that Agathon's discourse, the discourse of the tragic poet, is utterly worthless.

It is said: it is to spare Agathon's feelings that he is going to have himself replaced as I might say, by Diotima, that he is going to give his theory of love through the mouth of Diotima. I do not see at all how you can spare the feelings of someone who has been executed. This is what he does to Agathon. And starting from now - even if it is only to object to me if there is reason for it - I would ask you to highlight what is in question, which is that what Socrates is going to articulate after all the beautiful things that Agathon in his turn will have said about Love, which is not alone here all the goods of Love, all the profit that one can draw from Love but, let us say, all its virtues, all its beauties... there is nothing too beautiful to be accounted for by the effects of Love... Socrates in a single flash undermines all of this at the base by bringing things back to their root which is the following: Love, love of what?

From love we pass to desire and the characteristic of desire, if it is a fact that Eros, era, that Eros desire's is what is in question, namely what it is supposed to bring with it, the beautiful itself, is lacking to it endes, endeia, in these two terms it is lacking, it is identical of itself to the lack in these two terms. And the whole contribution of Socrates in his personal name in this discourse of the Symposium is that starting from there something is going to begin which is very far [from] reaching something that you can catch hold of, how is this conceivable. . . up to the end we plunge on the contrary progressively into a darkness and we will find here the antique night is always greater.. . And everything that there is to be said about the thought of love, in the Symposium begins here.

Seminar 5; Wednesday 14 December 1960

In order to see correctly the nature of the enterprise that I am involved in, in order that you may be able to tolerate the wearisome aspects of these detours - because after all you do not come here to hear a commentary on a Greek text, we are drawn into it, I do not claim to be exhaustive - I assure you that after all I have done the greater part of the work for you, I mean in your place, in your absence, and the best service that I can give you is in short to encourage you to refer to this text. Without any doubt, if you have referred to it as I suggested, it will happen perhaps that you will read it to some degree at least through my spectacles, this no doubt is better than not reading it at all. All the more so because the goal that I was seeking, what dominates the whole enterprise - and the way in which you can accompany it in a more or less commented fashion - is that it is highly appropriate not to lose sight of what we are destined to arrive at, I mean something which responds to the question from which we begin.

This question is simple, it is that of the transference, I mean that it is proposed [starting from] terms which are already elaborated. A man, the psychoanalyst, from whom one comes to seek the knowledge of what is most intimate to oneself (because this is the state of mind in which one approaches him usually) and therefore of what should be supposed from the beginning to be the thing most foreign to him and moreover that one supposes at the same time to be most foreign to him (we encounter this at the beginning of analysis) is nevertheless supposed to have this knowledge. Here is a situation which we are proposing here in subjective terms, I mean in the disposition of the one who comes forward as the demander. We do not have for the moment even to bring into it all that this situation involves, sustains objectively namely, what we should introduce into it about the specificity of what is proposed to this knowledge namely, the unconscious as such. The subject has not the slightest idea about this, whatever else he may have.

How can this situation, by simply being defined objectively in this way, engender something, which in a first approximation resembles love (because this is the way transference can be defined)? Let us put it better, let us say further, which puts love in question, puts it in question profoundly enough for us, for analytic reflection, because it has introduced into it as an essential dimension, what is called its ambivalence; let us say it, a new notion compared to a certain philosophical tradition which it is not vain for us to search for here right at the origin. This close coupling of love and of hate, is something that we do not see at the beginning of this tradition, because this beginning (because we must choose it somewhere) we choose as Socratic, even though... we are going to see it today, there is something earlier from which precisely it starts.

Naturally, we could not advance so daringly in posing this question if already in some way the tunnel had not already been opened up at the other end. We are setting out to meet something. We have already rather seriously circumscribed the (2) topology of what the subject, as we know, ought to find in analysis in place of what he seeks. Because as we know, if he sets out to seek what he has and does not know about, what he is going to find is what is lacking to him. It is indeed because we have articulated, posed this earlier in our journey that we can dare to pose the question that I formulated at first as being that in which there is articulated the possibility of the emergence of transference. We know well then that it is as what he lacks that there is articulated what he finds in analysis, namely his desire, and the desire not being therefore a good in any sense of the term, nor quite precisely in the sense of a ktesis, treasure, this something which under some title or other he might have. It is in this moment, in this birth of transference-love, this moment defined in the double chronological and topological sense that there should be read this inversion, as one might say, of the position which, out of the search for a good, produces properly speaking the realisation of desire.

You understand of course that this discourse supposes that the realisation of desire is specifically not the possession of an object, it is a matter of the emergence to reality of desire as such. It is indeed because it seemed to me, and not because of a chance encounter but in a way when I was seeking (in order to begin as it were from the heart of the field of my memories, guided by some compass which is created from an experience) where to find as it were the central point of the articulated things that I had been able to retain in what I had learnt.... it seemed to me that the Symposium was, however distant from us it was, the locus in which there was debated in the most vibrant fashion the meaning of this question. Properly speaking in this moment which concludes it when Alcibiades - one could say strangely, in every sense of the term - moreover which is the work at the level of the composition by Plato in which manifestly he broke off there on this supposed stage and the succession of organised, programmed discourses which is all of a sudden broken off by the irruption of the real feast, by the disturbance of the order of the feast.... And in its very text, this discourse of Alcibiades (because it is a matter of the avowal of his own disconcertment) everything that he says is really about his suffering, how disturbed he is by an attitude of Socrates which still leaves him, almost as much as at the time, wounded, eaten by some strange wound or other. And why this public confession? Why in this public confession this interpretation by Socrates which shows him that this confession has an altogether immediate goal: to separate him from Agathon, the occasion right away for a sort of return to order? All of those who have referred to this text, since I have been speaking to you about it, have not failed to be struck by how consonant this whole strange scene is with all sorts of situations, of instantaneous positions which are liable to happen in transference. Again of course, this is only an impression, there is question here of something which must be related to it. And of course it is in a tighter, more subtle analysis that we will see what is given to us by a situation which in any case is not obviously to be attributed to something which is supposed to be a sort (as Aragon says in Le Paysan de Paris) of foreshadowing of chicanalyse. No! But rather an (3) encounter: a sort of apparition of some features in it should be revelatory for us here.

I believe, and this is not simply because of a sort of stepping back before a leap (which ought to be like the one Freud attributes to the lion, namely unique) that I am delaying showing it to you, because to understand what this advent of the Alcibiades-Socrates scene fully means, we must thoroughly understand the general design of the work, namely of the Symposium.

And this is where we are advancing. It is indispensable to set out the terrain. If we do not know what Plato meant by bringing in the Alcibiades scene, it is impossible to situate exactly its import, and that is the reason why. Today we are at the beginning of the discourse of Eryximachos, of the doctor, let us hold our breath for a moment.

That it is a doctor should all the same interest us. Does that mean that the discourse of Eryximachos should lead us into a research about the history of medicine? It is quite clear that I cannot even outline it, for all sorts of reasons, first of all because it is not our business because this detour, itself, would all the same be rather excessive, and then because I do not really think it is possible. I do not believe that Eryximachos is really specified, that Plato is thinking of a particular doctor in bringing us this personage. All the same there are fundamental traits in the position that he brings forward (which are the ones which are to be distinguished, and which are not necessarily a historical feature, except in function of a very general dividing line), but which perhaps is going to make us reflect for a moment in passing about what medicine is.

It has already been remarked that there is in Socrates a frequent almost pervasive reference to medicine. Very frequently, Socrates, when he wants to bring his interlocutor onto the plane of dialogue where he wants to direct him towards the perception of a rigorous step, refers himself to some art of the technician.

I mean: "If you want to know the truth about such or such a subject, who would you address yourself to?" And among them the doctor is far from being excluded and he is even treated with a particular reverence, the level at which he is put is certainly not that of a lower order in Socrates' eyes. It is nevertheless clear that what regulates his progress is something which is far from being able to be reduced in any way to what one could call a mental hygiene.

The doctor in question speaks as a doctor, and immediately even promotes his medicine as being the greatest of all the arts: medicine is the great Art (186b).... Immediately after having begun his discourse, and here I will only briefly note the confirmation given to what I told you the last time about the discourse of Pausanias in the fact that, beginning his discourse Eryximachos expressly formulates the following: "Because Pausanias, hormesas, began well", it is not a good translation "but ended feebly" - not in an appropriate fashion. It is a litotes, it is clear that for everybody (and I even believe that the degree of it should be underlined here) there is implied as obvious this something - to which it must be said that our ear is not exactly attuned - we do not have the impression that this discourse of Pausanias ended all that badly, we are so used to hearing idiocies of this kind about love. It is very strange the degree to which, in his opinion, this feature in the discourse of Eryximachos really appeals to the consent of everybody, as if in short, the discourse of Pausanias had really revealed itself to everyone as feeble, as if it were obvious that all these rude jokes about the pausamenou, on which I insisted the last time, were obvious for the reader in antiquity.

(4) I believe it is rather essential for us to refer to what we can glimpse about this question of tone, to which after all the ear of the mind always latches on, even if it does not always openly make a criterion of it, and which is so frequently invoked in the Platonic texts as something to which Socrates refers at every instant. How often before beginning his discourse, or beginning a parenthesis in a discourse of another, does he not invoke the gods in a formal and express way in order that the tone may be sustained, may be maintained, may be harmonised. As you are going to see, this is very close to what concerns us today.

I would like, before entering into the discourse of Eryximachos, to make some remarks a distance from which, even if it leads us to altogether primary truths, is nonetheless something which is not all that easily given. Let us observe the following, in connection with the discourse of Eryximachos.... I will demonstrate to you in passing that medicine has always thought of itself as scientific. Eryximachos makes remarks which refer - because in short, it was instead of you, as I said above, that I had to spend these days trying to disentangle this little chapter in the history of medicine.... in order to do it I had to leave the Symposium and refer to different points of the Platonic text. There are a series of schools which you have heard about, however neglected this chapter of your formation in medicine may have been: the most celebrated, the one everybody knows about, the school of Cos. You know that there was a school, before the school of Cnidos, in Sicily, which is earlier again, whose great name is Alcmeon and the Alcmeonians, Croton is the centre of it. What must be realised, is that it is impossible to dissociate its speculations from those of a scientific school which flourished at the same time, at the same place, namely the Pythagorians. See where that leads us. We have to speculate on the role and the function of Pythagorism on this occasion, and moreover, as everyone knows, it is essential in order to understand Platonic thought. We see ourselves here engaged in a detour in which we would literally lose ourselves. So that I am going rather to try to separate out its themes, as they concern very strictly our concerns, namely that towards which we are advancing, the meaning of this episode of the Symposium, I mean of this discourse, the Symposium in so far as it is problematic.

Here we will retain only one thing, which is that medicine ...; whether it is that of Eryximachos (we do not, I believe, know very much about the personage of Eryximachos in himself) or that of the people who are supposed to have taught a certain number of other personages whom we know something about, personages who intervene in the discourses of Plato and who are directly attached to this medical school through the Alcmeonians, in so far as they were attached to the Pythagoreans: we know that Simmias and Cebes, the people who dialogue with Socrates in the Phaedo are disciples of Philolaus (who is one of the masters of the first Pythagorean school). If you refer to the Phaedo, you (5) will see what is contributed by Simmias and Cebes in response to the first propositions of Socrates, specifically about what should assure the soul about its immortality, that these responses refer to the same terms exactly as the ones which I am going to talk to you about here, namely those which are put in question in the discourse of Eryximachos, in the first rank of which there is the notion of harmonia, of harmony, of concord (187a).

Medicine therefore, as you can notice here, always believed itself to be scientific. It is moreover how it has always shown its weaknesses. Through a sort of necessity within its position, it has always referred to a science which was that of its time, whether it was good or bad (how can you know from the point of view of medicine whether it is good or bad?). As for us, we have the feeling that our science, our physics, is always thought to be a good science, and that, throughout the centuries, we had a very bad physics. This is indeed quite certain. What is not certain, is what medicine has to do with this science, namely how and through what opening and what end it is to deal with it, as long as something is not elucidated for medicine itself, and which is not as you are going to see, the least important thing, because what is in question is the idea of health.

Very exactly: what is health? You would be wrong to think that even for modern medicine which, with regard to all the others, believes itself to be scientific, the matter is altogether certain. From time to time the idea of the normal and of the pathological is proposed as a thesis-subject to some student; it is a subject which is in general proposed to them by people who have a philosophical formation, and on this we have an excellent work by M. Canguilhem. Obviously, it is a work whose influence is very limited in properly medical circles.

Now there is something in any case (without trying to speculate at a level of Socratic certitude about health in itself) which by itself shows us especially as psychiatrists and psychoanalysts, the degree to which the idea of health is problematical: it is the means themselves that we employ to get back to the state of health; these means show us, to put things in the most general terms that, whatever about nature, about the successful form which is supposed to be the form of health, at the heart of this successful form we are led to postulate paradoxical states - it is the least that one can say about them - the very ones whose manipulation in our therapeutics is responsible for the return to an equilibrium which remains on the whole, as such, rather uncriticised.

Here then is what we find at the level of postulates which are the least accessible to demonstration from the medical position as such. It is precisely the one which is here going to be promoted in the discourse of Eryximachos under the name of harmonia. We do not know the harmony that is in question, but the notion is very fundamental to every medical position as such, all that we should seek, is concord. If we have not advanced very much compared to the position in which someone like Eryximachos situates himself about what constitutes the essence, the substance of this idea of concord, namely something borrowed from an intuitive domain to the sources of which he is simply closer, it is historically more defined and tangible when here we expressly perceive that it is referred to the musical domain in so far as here the musical domain is the Pythagorean model and form. Moreover everything which in one way or another refers to (6) this according of tones, even of the most subtle kind, even if it is the tone of the discourse to which I alluded above, brings us back to this same appreciation - it is not for nothing that I spoke in passing about the ear - to this same appreciation of consonance which is essential for this notion of harmony. This is what introduces, as you will see provided you enter into the text of this discourse - which I will spare you the boredom of reading line by line, which is never very possible in the midst of such a large audience - you will see in it the essential character of this notion of concord in order to understand what is meant by, how there is introduced here this medical position, and you will see that everything that is articulated here has the function of a support which we can neither exhaust, nor in any way reconstruct, namely the thematic of discussions which in advance we can suppose here to be present in the minds of the listeners.

Let us not forget that we find ourselves here at the historic culminating point of a particularly active, creative epoch: these Vlth and Vth centuries of the great period of Hellenism abound in mental creativity. There are good works to which you can refer. For those who read English there is a big book of the kind that only English editors can give themselves the luxury of producing. It is part of a philosophical testament because it is Bertrand Russell in his old age who has written it. This would be a very good book for the New Year, because I assure you - you only have to read it - it is studded with wonderful drawings in colour in its large margins, drawings of extreme simplicity addressed to the imagination of a child, in which there is after all everything that should be known starting from this fruitful period to which I am referring today (which is the pre-Socratic epoch) up to our own day, to English positivism; and no one really important is left but. If you really want to be unbeatable when you dine out, when you have read this book you will know really everything, except of course the only things that are important, namely those that are not known. But I would all the same advise you to read it. It will fill in for you, for each and every one of you, a considerable number of the almost necessary lacunae in your information.

Let us therefore try to put a little order in what is delineated when we engage ourselves along the path of trying to understand what Eryximachos means. The people of his time found themselves always faced with the same problem as the one that we find ourselves faced with, except that, for want of having as great an abundance as we have of tiny facts with which to furnish their discourse (I am giving here moreover a hypothesis which arises from allurements and illusion) they go more directly to the essential antimony which is the same as the one that I began to put before you a while ago, which is the following: that we cannot in any case be content to take any concord at its face value. What experience teaches us, is that something is concealed at the heart of this concord, and that the whole question is to know what can be required from this underpinning of concord; I mean from a point of view which cannot be settled simply by experience, which always involves a certain mental a priori which cannot be posed outside a certain mental a priori.

At the heart of this concord must we require the similar or can we be content with the dissimilar? Does every concord suppose some principle of concord or can concord emerge from discordance, from conflict? You must not imagine that it was only with Freud (7) that such a question emerges for the first time. And the proof, is that it is the first thing that the discourse of Eryximachos brings before us. This notion of what is concordant or discordant - for us, let us say, of the function of anomaly compared to the normal - comes in the first place in his discourse (186b, around line 9). "In fact what is unlike desires and loves things unlike. Then," continues the text, "there is one love in the healthy, and another in the diseased. So you see just as, according to what Pausanias said just now, it is beautiful to gratify good men, and ugly to gratify the intemperate,"

We have been brought now to the question of physique of what this virtue and this disorder signify, and immediately we find a formula which I note, which I can only pin-point on the page. It is not that it gives us very much, but that it should all the same for us analysts be the object of a type of interest in passing, when there is some sort of surface noise that interests us. He tells us that "medicine is knowledge of the body's loves: episteme ton tou somatos erotikon" (186c). One could not give a better definition of psychoanalysis, it seems to me. And he adds "pros plesmonen kai kenosin, for filling and emptying" the text translates brutally. It is indeed a question of the evocation of two terms of the full and of the empty the role of which two terms we are going to see in the topology, in the mental position of what is in question at this meeting point of physics and the operation of medicine.

It is not the only text, I can tell you, where this full and this empty are evoked. I would say that the role of these terms is one of the fundamental intuitions that would have to be extracted, to be highlighted in the course of a study on the Socratic discourse. And anyone who engaged himself in this enterprise would not have to go very far to find a further reference. At the beginning of the Symposium, when Socrates, as I told you, who had delayed in the hallway of the house next door where we can suppose him to be in the position of a gymnosophist, standing on one foot like a stork and immobile until he had found the solution to some problem or other, he arrives at Agathon's after everybody has been waiting for him: "Well! you have found what you were looking for, come near me", Agathon says to him. At which Socrates gives a little speech to say: "What a blessing it would be, Agathon, if wisdom could run from the fuller among us to the emptier, while we touch one another, as when two cups are placed side by side a bit of wool conveys water from the fuller to the emptier!" (175d) We must suppose that this amusing physical operation was, for some reason or other, frequently practiced, because that probably served as an image for everybody. Effectively, this passage from within one vase to another, this transformation from the full into the empty, this communication of the content is one of the fundamental images of something which regulates what one could call the fundamental covetousness of every philosophical exchange, and it is to be retained to understand the meaning of the discourse that is proposed to us.

A little further on, this reference to music as being at the beginning of the concord which is the foundation of what is going to be proposed to us as being the essence of the function of love between beings, is going to lead us on the page that follows - namely in paragraph 187 - to encounter in a living way in the discourse of Eryximachos this choice which I told you above was primordial on the subject of what is conceivable as being at the beginning of concord, namely: the similar and the dissimilar, order and conflict. Because here in passing we see, when it is question of defining this harmony, Eryximachos noting that no (8) doubt we encounter from the pen of an author about a century earlier, Heraclitus of Ephesus, a paradox when it is to the opposition of contraries that Heraclitus refers expressly as being the principle of the composition of all unity. "The One," Eryximachos tells us, "at variance with itself is brought together again, like a harmony of bow and lyre." This hosper harmonian toxou te kai luras (187a) is extremely celebrated, if only because it was cited here in passing - and it is cited by many other authors. It has come to us in these few scattered fragments that the German scholars have collected for us about pre-Socratic thinking. This one, among those which remain to us from Heraclitus, remains really dominant. I mean that, in Bertrand Russell's book which I recommended you to read above, you will find there effectively represented the arc and its cord, and even the simultaneous drawing of a vibration from which the movement of the arrow begins.

What is striking is this bias, the reason for which we cannot see very clearly in passing, which Eryximachos demonstrates concerning the Heraclitean formulation: he finds fault with it. It seems to him that there are exigencies here whose source we cannot clearly fathom, because we find ourselves here at a confluence where we do not know what share to accord to prejudice, to a priori's, to choices made in function of a certain consistency of time in a whole theoretical ensemble, or to psychological aspects which really we are unable (especially when it is a matter of personages who are ghosts from the past) to give an origin to. We have to be satisfied with noting that effectively (something whose echo we find in many other places in the Platonic discourse) some aversion or other is shown at the idea of referring to any conjunction of the opposition of contraries (even if in some way it is situated in the real) the birth of something which does not appear to him to be in any way assimilable - namely the creation of the phenomenon of concord, something which is affirmed and is posed, is experienced, is assented to as such. It seems that even in its very principle the idea of proportion when it is a question of paying attention to that of harmony, to speak in medical terms of diet or of dosage, with everything that this involves in terms of measure, of proportion, must be maintained [but] that in no way can the Heraclitean vision of conflict as creator in itself, for some minds, for some schools - let us leave the matter in suspense - be sustained.

There is here a bias which for ourselves, to whom of course all sorts of models in physics have brought the idea of the fruitfulness of contraries, of contrasts, of oppositions and of the absolute non-contradiction of the phenomenon with its conflictual principle (in a word that the whole of physics tends much more towards the side of the image of the wave than - whatever modern psychology has made of it - to the side of the form, of the Gestalt, of the good form)... we cannot help being surprised, I was saying, as much in this passage as in many others of Plato, to even see sustained the idea of some impasse or other, of some aporia or other, of some choice or other to be made, of some preference or other to be given which would be on the side of the necessarily conjoined, fundamental character, of concord with concord, of harmony with harmony.

As I have told you, this is not the only passage and, if you refer to a dialogue which I must say is extremely important to read as an underpinning for our understanding of the Symposium, namely the Phaedo you will see that the whole discussion with Simmias and Cebes is based on that. That, as I was telling you the other day, the whole pleading of Socrates in defence of the (9) immortality of the soul is presented there in the most obvious fashion in the form of a sophism which is properly speaking the following (which is none other than the one around which I have been making my remarks about the discourse of Eryximachos revolve), namely that the very idea of the soul qua harmony does not suppose there to be excluded that there should enter into it the possibility of its rupture. Because when Simmias and Cebes object that this soul, whose nature is constant, whose nature is permanence and duration, might well vanish at the same time as its elements are dislocated, these elements which are corporeal elements, whose conjunction creates the harmony Socrates gives nothing else as an answer, except that the idea of harmony in which the soul participates is in itself impenetrable, that it would hide itself, that it would flee before the very approach of anything that would put its constancy in question. The idea of the participation of anything that exists in this sort of incorporeal essence which is the Platonic idea, openly demonstrates its fiction and its lure and to such a degree in this Phaedo that it is really impossible not to tell oneself that we have no reason to think that Plato did not see this lure any less than ourselves. This unimaginable, extraordinary pretension that we have of being more intelligent than the personage who has developed the Platonic oeuvre has something really bewildering about it!

This indeed is why when, after the discourse of Pausanias, we see developing that of Eryximachos (he gives out his patter, this does not immediately have obvious consequences), we are nevertheless entitled to ask ourselves by making succeed to one another in this order this series of tirades among which we have at least seen that that of Pausanias which immediately precedes is derisory. And if, after all, we hold onto the general characteristic, the overall tone which characterises the Symposium, we are legitimately entitled to ask ourselves if what is in question is not properly speaking something which is consonant with a comic work as such: in dealing with love, it is clear that Plato has taken the path of comedy. All that follows will confirm it - and I have my reasons for beginning to affirm it now - at the moment when there is going to come on the scene the great comic, the great comic Aristophanes about whom people have always been puzzled as to why Plato had him come to the Symposium. It is scandalous because, as you know, this great comic is one of those responsible for the death of Socrates. If Phaedo, namely the drama of the death of Socrates, is presented to us with this lofty character which gives it the tragic tone that you know (and besides it is not so simple, there too there are comical things, but it is quite clear that tragedy dominates and that it is represented before us), the Symposium already teaches us that there is not (and including the ever-so-brief discourse of Socrates in so far as he speaks in his own name) a single point of this discourse which is not put before us with this suspicion of the comic. And I would even say that this point, in order to leave nothing out and to respond specifically to one of my listeners whose presence does me the greatest honour, with whom I had on this subject a brief exchange.... I would say specifically that even the discourse of Phaidros at the beginning which not unreasonably, not without a motive, not incorrectly he thought he understood me to be taking at its face value as opposed to the discourse of Pausanias, I would say that this goes just as much in the direction of what I am here affirming precisely: the fact is that precisely this discourse of Phaidros by referring to the judgement of the gods on the subject of love, also has an ironic value. Because the gods are unable, precisely, to understand anything about love. The expression of a divine stupidity is something which to my way of thinking ought to be more widespread. It is often suggested by the behaviour of those people to whom we address ourselves precisely on the (10) terrain of love. To take the gods to testify at the bar about what is in question concerning love appears to me to be something which in any case is not heterogeneous for what follows in Plato's discourse.

We have now arrived at the brink of the discourse of Aristophanes. Nevertheless, we are not yet going to enter into it. I would simply like to ask you yourselves, using your own means, to complete what remains to be seen in the discourse of Eryximachos. For M. Lion Robin it is an enigma that Eryximachos takes up again the opposition between the theme of Uranian love and Pandemic love given precisely what he tells us about the physical medical handling of love. He does not see very clearly what justifies it. And in fact I believe that our astonishment is really the only attitude which is appropriate to respond to that of the author of this edition. Because the thing is clarified in the very discourse of Eryximachos confirming the whole perspective in which I tried to situate it for you.

If he refers, concerning the effects of love (par. 188a-b) to astronomy, it is indeed in so far as what is in question, this harmony, to which it is a question of bringing together, of according, concerning the good order of the health of mankind, is one and the same as that which reigns over the order of the seasons and that, when on the contrary, he says, violent love (hubris, something excessive), has more power on the seasons of the year, it is then that there begin disasters, and confusion, the prejudices (as he calls them), damage, among which of course there are pestilences, but at the same level are placed hoar frosts and hails and blights and a whole series of other things.

This to replace us in the context where I believe all the same that the notions that I am putting forward before you as the fundamental, radical categories to which we are forced to refer to pose a worthwhile discourse for analysis namely, the imaginary, the symbolic and the real, are utilisable here.

People talk about primitive thinking, and there is astonishment that a Bororo identifies himself with an ara. Does it not seem to you that it is not a question of primitive thinking, but of a primitive position of thinking concerning that with which for everyone, for you as for me, it has to deal? When we see that man interrogating himself not about his place, but about his identity, has to locate himself not at all within the limited enclosure which is supposed to be his body, but has to locate himself in the total and raw real with which he has to deal - and that we do not escape from this law from which it follows that it is at the precise point of this delineation of the real in which the progress of science consists that we will always have to situate ourselves. At the time of Eryximachos, it is completely outside the question, for want of any knowledge whatsoever about what a living tissue as such is, that the doctor could make, let us say of humours, something heterogeneous to humidity in which (11) in the world natural vegetations are able to proliferate; the same disorder which will provoke in man such and such an excess due to intemperance, to violence, is the one which will lead to the disorders in the seasons which are enumerated here.

Chinese tradition represents for us at the beginning of the year the emperor, the one who can with his hand accomplish the major rites on which depends the equilibrium of the whole Middle empire, tracing the first furrows whose direction and rectitude are destined precisely to ensure during the year the equilibrium of nature.

There is not, I dare say, in this position anything that is not natural. The one to which Eryximachos attaches himself here, which is to call it by its name, that to which is attached the notion of man as microcosm, is namely what? Not at all that man is in himself a resume, a reflection, an image of nature, but that they are one and the same thing, that one can only dream of constituting man from the order and the harmony of cosmic components. Here is a position with which simply I wished to leave you today with this question of whether it does not preserve, despite the limitation within which we believe we have reduced the meaning of biology, some traces in our mental pre-suppositions. . . . undoubtedly, detecting them is not so important as to perceive where we place ourselves, in what zone, more fundamental level we place ourselves, we analysts, when we bestir ourselves to understand for our part notions like the death instinct, which is properly speaking as Freud did not fail to recognise, an Empedoclean notion. Now it is to this that the discourse of Aristophanes is going to refer. What I will show you the next time, is that this gag which is manifestly presented as the entry of the clowns going head over heels in a scene from Athenian comedy, refers expressly as such - I will show you the proofs for this - to this cosmological conception of man. And starting from there I will show you the surprising opening of what results from it, the opening left gaping wide about the idea that Plato was able to construct of love, I am going that far - concerning the radical derision which the simple approach to the problems of love brought to this incorruptible, material, supra-essential, purely ideal order, participating in the eternal and the uncreated which is the one, ironically perhaps, that his whole work uncovers to us.

Seminar 6: Wednesday 21 December 1960

Our account, I hope, will today with the celestial conjunction pass through its winter solstice; I mean that drawn along by the orb that it involves, it may have seemed to you that we are getting further and further away from our subject of transference. Reassure yourselves then. We will reach today the lowest point of this ellipse and I believe that from the moment that we glimpsed - if this is to be proved valid - something to be learned from the Symposium, it was necessary to push forward to the point to which we are going to push it today the analysis of the important parts of the text which might seem not to have a direct relationship with what we have to say. In any case what does it matter! Here we are now engaged in the enterprise and, when one has begun on a certain path of discourse, it is precisely a sort of non-physical necessity which makes itself felt when we want to take it to its term.

Here we are following the guide of a discourse, the discourse of Plato in the Symposium, the discourse which has around it all the charge of significations (like a musical instrument or even a music box), all the significations that it made resonate throughout the centuries. A certain aspect of our effort is to return as closely as possible to the meaning of this discourse. I believe that to understand this text of Plato, to judge it, one cannot avoid evoking in what context of discourse it is, in the sense of the universal concrete discourse. And here again, let me make myself clearly understood! It is not a question properly speaking of resituating it in history. You know well that it is not at all our method of commentary and that it is always for what it makes us ourselves understand that a discourse (even when pronounced at a very distant epoch when the things that we have to understand were not at all to be seen) is questioned by us. But it is not possible, as regards the Symposium, to avoid referring to something which is the relationship of discourse and history namely, not how discourse is situated in history, but how history itself arises from a certain mode of entry of discourse into the real.

And so I must remind you here (at the time of the Symposium at which we are at, in the second century from the birth of concrete discourse about the universe)... I mean that we must not forget this philosophical efflorescence of the VIth century, which is so strange, so singular moreover because of the echoes or other modes of a sort of terrestrial choir which make themselves heard at the same epoch in other civilisations, without any apparent relationship.

But let us leave that to one side; it is not the history of the philosophers of the VIth century, from Thales to Pythagoras or to Heraclitus and so many others that I wish even to outline. What I want you to sense, is that it is the first time that in this occidental tradition (the one to which this book by Russell which I recommended you to read refers) this discourse is formed there as expressly aiming at the universe for the first time, as aiming at rendering the universe discursive. Namely that at the (2) beginning of the step of science as being wisdom, the universe appears as a universe of discourse. And, in a sense, there will never be anything but a universe of discourse. Everything that we find at that epoch including the definition of elements, whether there are four or more, has something which carries the brand, the mark, the stamp of this petition, of this postulate that the universe should surrender itself to the order of the signifier. Naturally, of course, it is not at all a question of finding in the universe elements of discourse but [elements] linking together like a discourse. And all the steps that are articulated at that epoch among the supporters, the inventors of this vast questioning movement, show clearly that if, one cannot discourse in a fashion coherent with the laws of discourse about one of these universes which is forged, there are radical objections. Remember the mode of operation of Zeno, the dialectician when, in order to defend his master Parmenides, he proposes sophistical arguments which are meant to throw his adversary into inextricable confusion.

Therefore in the background of this Symposium, of this discourse of Plato, and in the rest of his work, we have this grandiose attempt in its innocence, this hope which dwelt in the first philosophers who are called physicists of finding under the guarantee of discourse, which is in short the whole of their experimental instrumentation, the final grasp on the real.

I ask your pardon if I avoid it. This is not the place where I could maintain a discourse on Greek philosophy before you. I propose to you, to interpret a special text, the minimal thematic that it is necessary for you to have in mind in order to judge this text properly. And this is why I must remind you that this real, this grasp of the real was not conceived at that epoch as correlative to a subject, even a universal one, but as the term which I am going to borrow from Letter VII of Plato, where in a short digression there is said what is sought by the whole operation of the dialectic: it is quite simply the same thing that I had to take into account last year in our account of the Ethics and which I called "la Chose", here to pragma [which] you should understand precisely in the sense that it is not Sache, an affair (une affaire); understand it if you wish as the great affair, the final reality, that on which there depends the very thought which confronts it, which discusses it and which is only.

as I might say, one of the fashions of putting it into practice. It is the essential to pragma, the thing, the praxis. You can be certain that the theory, which term comes to birth at the same epoch (however contemplative it may affirm itself to be and it is not simply contemplative as the praxis from which it emerges, the Orphic practices, sufficiently demonstrate) is not, as our use of the word theory implies, the abstraction from this praxis, nor its general reference, nor the model, however one may imagine it of what is supposed to be its application, when it makes its appearance it is this praxis itself. The theoria is itself the exercise of the power of the to pragma, the great affair.

(3) One of the masters of this epoch who is the only one I have chosen to quote, Empedocles, because he is thanks to Freud one of the patrons of speculation, Empedocles, in his no doubt legendary guise (because also what is important is that it is this guise that has been bequeathed to us), Empedocles is someone all-powerful. He advances as master of the elements, capable of resurrecting the dead, a magician, lord of the royal secret on the same terrain where the charlatans, later, will present themselves with a similar style. Miracles are demanded of him and he produces them. Like Oedipus, he does not die, he re-enters the heart of the world in the fire of the volcano and the yawning chasm.

All of this, as you are going to see, remains very close to Plato, moreover it is not by chance that it is, taking it from him, at a much more rationalist epoch, that quite naturally we borrow the reference of the to pragma.

But Socrates? It would be quite singular that the whole historical tradition should have been mistaken in saying that over against this background he contributes something original, a rupture, an opposition. Socrates explains himself, in so far as we can trust Plato at the place where he presents him to us more manifestly in the context of a historical testimony concerning him. It is a movement of withdrawal, of lassitude, of disgust with respect to the contradictions manifested by these first attempts as I have just tried to characterise them for you. It is from Socrates that there proceeds this new essential idea: it is first necessary to guarantee knowledge and the path of showing them all that they know nothing, is in itself a revelatory path - revelatory of a virtue which, despite its privileged successes, does not always succeed. And that which Socrates himself calls episteme, science, what he discovers in short, what he separates out, what he detaches, is that discourse engenders the dimension of truth. The discourse which is assured of an inner certainty as regards its very action assures, where it can, the truth as such. It is nothing other than this practice of discourse.

When Socrates says that it is the truth, and not himself, that refutes his interlocutor, he shows something whose most solid aspect is its reference to a primitive combinatory which is always the same at the basis of our discourse. From which it results, for example, that the father is not the mother and that it is in the same respect, and in this respect alone, that one can declare that the mortal should be distinguished from the immortal. Socrates refers back in short to the domain of pure discourse the whole ambition of discourse. He is not, as is believed, as is said, very specially the one who leads man back to man, nor even all things to man (it is Protagoras who had given that slogan: man is the measure of all things), Socrates brings the truth back to discourse. He is in short, as one might say, the super-sophist, and it is in this that his mystery lies - because if he were only a super-sophist he should not have engendered anything more than the sophists, namely what remains of them, namely a doubtful reputation.

It is precisely something other than a temporal subject which inspired his action. And here we come to the atopia, to this unsituatable aspect of Socrates which is precisely the question which interests us since we sense in it something which may illuminate us about the atopia which is demanded of us. It is this atopia, from this nowhere of his being that he certainly provoked, because history attests it to us, this whole line of researches whose destiny is linked in a very ambiguous fashion to a whole history which can be fragmented, the history of (4) consciousness, as it is said in modern terms: the history of religion.... of morality, of politics certainly at the limit, and less of art. To designate this whole ambiguous, I am saying, diffuse and living line I would only have to point out to you (through the question most recently renewed by the most recent imbecile: Pourquoi des philosophes) whether we did not experience this line, as solidary with a flame transmitted in fact, which is foreign to everything that it illuminates, whether it be the good, the beautiful, the true, the same, which it takes pride in occupying itself with.

If one tries to read, through testimonies which are near at hand as well as through the distant effects - near, I mean in history - as through the effects which are still there of the Socratic posterity, there might come to us in effect the formula of a sort of perversion without object. And in truth, when one tries to accommodate, to approach, to imagine, to fix for oneself what effectively this personage might be, believe me, it is tiring and I believe that I could not better formulate the effect of this tiredness than in words which came to me one Sunday evening: this Socrates is killing me! It is a curious thing, I woke up the following morning feeling much livelier.

It seems all the same (in order to try to say things about this) impossible not to start by taking literally what is attested to us by the entourage of Socrates, and this even on the eve of his death, that he is the one who said that after all we have nothing to fear from a death of which we know nothing. And specifically we do not know, he adds, whether it might not be a good thing. Obviously, when one reads that.... one is so used to reading only fine words in classical texts that one does not pay attention to them any more. But it is striking when we make that resonate in the context of the last days of Socrates, surrounded by his last followers, he gave them this last look from under his brows which Plato photographs on the document (he was not there) and which he calls the look of a bull.... and his whole attitude at his trial. If The Apology of Socrates reproduces exactly for us what he said before his judges it is difficult to think, hearing his defence, that he did not expressly wish to die. In any case he repudiates expressly and as such the whole pathetic aspect of the situation, thus provoking his judges who are used to the ritual, classical, supplications of the accused.

Therefore what I am aiming at here as a first approach to the enigmatic nature of a desire for death which no doubt can be held to be ambiguous (he is a man who is supposed, after all, to have spent seventy years to obtain the satisfaction of this desire), it is quite sure that it cannot be taken in the sense of a tendency to suicide, nor to failure, nor to any sort of masochism, moral or otherwise; but it is difficult not to formulate this tragic minimum linked to the maintenance of a man in a zone of no man's land, of a sort of gratuitous entre-deux-morts.

You know that when Nietzsche discovered Socrates it went to his head. The birth of tragedy and all Nietzsches' subsequent work came from there. The tone in which I am speaking to you about it should mark clearly some personal impatience. One cannot all the same not see that undoubtedly (Nietzsche put his finger on it... it is enough to open at random a dialogue of Plato) the profound incompetence of Socrates every time he touches on this subject of tragedy is something quite tangible. Read Gorgias. (5) Tragedy is dealt with there is three lines among the arts of flattery, a rhetoric like another, with nothing more to be said about it (Gorgias 502 b d) .

No tragic, no tragic sentiment, as it is put in our days, sustains this atopia of Socrates. Only a demon, the daimon - do not forget it, because he speaks to us about it ceaselessly - which hallucinates him it seems in order to allow him to survive in this space; he avoids the holes into which he might fall: do not do that. And then, in addition, a message from a god whose function he himself testifies to us in what one can call a vocation, the god of Delphi, Apollo, that a disciple of his had the rather absurd idea of telling him to go and consult. And the god had replied: "There are some wise men, there is one who is not too bad, namely Euripides, but the wisest of all, the best of all, the sacred one, is Socrates." And from that day forward Socrates said: "I must realise the oracle of the god, because I did not know that I was the wisest, but because he said it, I must be." It is exactly in these terms that Socrates presents to us the sharp turn of what one could call his passage to public life. He is in short a madman who believes that he is at the service, at the command of a god, a messiah, and what is more in a society of chatterboxes. No other guarantee of the word of the Other (with the capital O) than this word itself, and there is no other source for the tragic than this destiny which may well appear to us from a certain aspect to be that of nothingness.

With all that, he is led to surrender the terrain about which I spoke to you the other day, the terrain of the reconquest of the real, of the philosophical, namely the scientific conquest, to surrender a good part of the terrain to the gods. It is not in order to make paradoxes as certain have confided in me: "You were very amused to have surprised us when you asked: what are the gods?" Well, as I told you, the gods belong to the real! - Everyone expected me to say: to the symbolic. Not at all! - "You were really joking, you said: they belong to the real." Well, not at all! Believe me, I am not the one who invented it. For Socrates, manifestly they belong only to the real. And this real has nothing to do with the principle of his own behaviour, Socrates himself aims only at the truth. He satisfies himself with obeying the gods on occasion, provided that he himself defines this obedience. Is this really to obey them or is it not rather acquitting oneself ironically vis-a-vis beings which have themselves their own necessity? And in fact we do not sense any necessity which does not recognise the supremacy of internal necessity in the deployment of the true, namely science.

We may be surprised at the seduction exercised by such a severe discourse. In any case this seduction is attested to us in the course of one or other of the dialogues. We know that the discourse of Socrates, even repeated by children, by women, exercises a charm which one could call bewildering. We could really say: thus spoke Socrates. A force is transmitted in it "which raises up those who approach it" the Platonic texts always say, in short, that the simple murmur of his word, some say "at its contact". Notice again, there are no disciples, but rather friends, the curious also, and then the bewitched (struck by some secret or other), as they are called in the stories of Provence and then, the disciples of others also come knocking at the door.

(6) Plato is none of these, he is a late-comer, much too young to have seen anything but the end of the phenomenon. He was not among those who were there at the end. And this indeed is the ultimate reason - it has to be said in passing very quickly - for this obsessional cascade of testimonies which he latches onto every time he wants to speak about his strange hero: "Such a person heard it from such a person who was there, from one or other visit when they carried on such and such a debate. I have what was recorded on their brains, here in a first, there in a second edition." Plato is a very particular kind of witness. One could say that he lies and on the other hand that he is truthful even when he lies because, in interrogating Socrates, it is his own question that, he, Plato explores. Plato is something completely different. He does not go around barefoot; he is not a wanderer; no god has either spoken to him nor called him and, in truth, I think that for him, the gods do not amount to much. Plato is a master, a true one; a master at the time when the city is breaking apart, swept away by the winds of democracy, prelude to the time of the great imperial unifications. He is a sort of Sade but funnier. One cannot even, naturally, like anybody else.... one cannot even imagine the nature of the powers that are reserved for the future. The great mountebanks of the world tribe: Alexander, Seleucides, Ptolemy, all of that is still properly speaking unthinkable. One cannot yet imagine mystical soldiers! What Plato sees at the horizon, is a communal city just as revolting to his eyes as to our own. A stud farm, this is what he promises us in a pamphlet which has always been a bad dream for all those who with their sentiment of the good cannot get over the ever-accentuated discord of the order of the city. In other words, this is called The Republic and everybody took it seriously. People believe that it is really what Plato wanted!

Let us pass over some other misunderstandings and some other mythical lucubrations. [If] I were to tell you that the myth of Atlantis seems to me to be rather the echo of the failure of Plato's political dreams (it is not unrelated to the adventure of the Academy) perhaps "you would find that my paradox would need to be better fleshed out, that is why I am passing over it.

What he himself wants in any case, is all the same the thing, to pragma. He is relaying with the magi of the previous century at a literary level. The Academy is a sort of reserved city, a refuge for the best people. And it is in the context of this enterprise, whose horizon certainly went very far.... what we know about what he dreamt of in his voyage to Sicily (curiously to the same places where his adventure is in a way a sort of echo of the dream of Alcibiades who, for his part, clearly dreamt about a Mediterranean empire with Sicily as its centre) bore a sign of the most lofty sublimation: it is like a sort of Utopia of which he thought he could be director. From the heights of Alcibiades, obviously all of this is reduced to a level that is certainly less elevated.

Perhaps it would go no further than a high point of masculine elegance. But it would all the same be to depreciate this metaphysical dandyism not to see the range of which it was in a way capable. I think that one is right to read the text of Plato from the angle of what I am calling dandyism: they are writings for the outside, I would even go so far as to say that he throws to the dogs that we are tiny scraps which may be good or bad, the debris of an often rather infernal humour. But it is a fact, that he has been understood differently. The fact is (7) that Christian desire, which has so little to do with all these adventures, this Christian desire whose core, whose essence is in the resurrection of bodies (you have to read St. Augustine to glimpse the place that that holds).... that this Christian desire recognised itself in Plato for whom the body must dissolve into a beauty that is super-terrestrial and reduced to an extraordinarily incorporeal form, of which we are going to speak in a little while, is the sign obviously that there is here a complete misunderstanding.

But it is precisely that which brings us back to the question of transference and to this delusional character of such a taking-up of the discourse into another context which is properly speaking contradictory to it. What is in it, if not that the Platonic phantasy, which we are going to approach as closely as possible - do not believe that these are only general considerations - is already affirmed as a transference phenomenon. How did the Christians for whom a God reduced to the symbol of the Son had given his life as a sign of love allow themselves to be fascinated by the speculative stupidity - I remind you of the term I used above - offered as intellectual food by the most disinterested of men: Socrates? Must we not recognise here the effect of the only tangible convergence between the two thematics which is the Word presented as object of adoration? This is why it is so important (over against the Christian mystique, in which one cannot deny that love produced rather extraordinary fruits, follies according to the Christian tradition itself) to delineate what the import of love is in the transference which is produced around this other, Socrates who, himself, is only a man who claims to know about love but who only leaves of it the most simply natural proof, namely that his disciples tease him for losing his head from time to time before a beautiful young man and, as Xenophon testifies to us, to have one day - this does not amount to much - touched with his shoulder the naked shoulder of the young Cristobulos; Xenophon himself tells us the result of it: it left him with neither more nor less than an ache - which is not nothing, for such an experienced cynic! Because already in Socrates there are all the figures of the cynic. This proves in any case a certain violence of desire, but it leaves, it must be said, love in a rather instantaneous position.

This explains to us, makes us understand, allows us to situate that in any case for Plato these love stories are simply farce, that the final mode of union with the to pragma, the thing, is certainly not be sought in the direction of the effusion of love in the Christian sense of the term. And there is no need to seek the reason for this elsewhere than in the Symposium, the only one who speaks appropriately about love, is a clown (un pitre) - you will see what I understand by this term.

Because Aristophanes for Plato is nothing else, a comic poet for him is a clown. And one sees very well how this gentleman who is very distant - believe me - from the crowd, this man, this obscene Aristophanes about whom I do not need to remind you of what you can find by opening the least of his comedies.... the least thing that you can see being produced on stage, for example the one in which the parent of Euripides is going to disguise himself as a woman in order to expose himself to the fate of Orpheus, namely to be cut to pieces by the gathering of women instead of Euripides in this disguise.... we are made to assist (8) on the stage at the burning of the hairs of his ass because women, as they still do today in the Orient, pluck their hair. And I will spare you all the other details. All that I can tell you is that all of this goes beyond anything that one can see today except on the stage of a London music hall, which is saying quite a lot! Simply the words are better, but they are not more distinguished for all that. The term of "gaping asshole" is one which is repeated in ten replies one after another to designate those among whom should be chosen those whom we would today call in our language candidates who are most apt for all the progressive roles, because these are the people that Aristophanes particularly hates.

So then, that it should be a personage of this type (and what is more - as I already said - who had the role you know about in the defamation of Socrates) that Plato chooses to make him say the best things about love should make us use our loaves a little!

To make clearly understood what I mean in saying that he gives him the best things to say about love, I am going to illustrate it for you immediately. Moreover someone as reflective, as measured in his judgements, as prudent, as the learned university man who produced the edition that I have before my eyes, M. Leon Robin, even he, cannot fail to be struck by it. It draws tears from his eyes.

He is the first one who speaks about love, God knows, as we speak about it, namely that" he says things which grab you by the throat and which are the following. First of all this rather subtle remark (one might say that this is not what is expected from a clown, but it is precisely for that reason that it is put into the mouth of a clown) he is the one who makes the remark: "No one," he says, "could suppose that it is he ton aphrodision sunousia", which is translated: "la communauté de la jouissance amoureuse" (192c), I must say that this translation appears detestable to me; I believe moreover that M. Leon Robin made another one for La Pléiade which is much better, because really this means: it is not for the "pleasure of being in bed together as if this could make anyone delight in another¹'s company so seriously as all that," in Greek outos epi megales spoudes it is the same spoude that you found last year in the Aristotlian definition of tragedy; of course, spoude means solicitude, care, readiness, it also means seriousness; because in fact, these people who love one another, have a strangely serious air.

And let us leave to one side this psychological note to show all the same, to designate where the mystery is. Here is what Aristophanes says: "Plainly the soul of each wants something else - what, it cannot say, but it divines and riddles what it wants. And as they lie together suppose Hephaistos" (namely Vulcan, the character with the hammer and the anvil) "were to stand beside (9) them with his tools, and ask: What do you want from each other, men?" (the object of your wishes) "Is it only that you desire to be together as close as possible, and not to be apart from each other night or day? For if that is what you desire, I am ready to melt you and weld you together, so that you two may be made one, and as one you may live together as long as you live, and when you die you may die still one instead of two, and be yonder in the house of Hades together. Think if this is your passion, and if it will satisfy you to get this. If that were offered, we know that not a single one would object, or be found to wish anything else, he would simply believe that he had heard that which he had so long desired, to be united and melted together with his beloved, and to become one from two!" (192c-192e).

This is what Plato has Aristophanes say. Aristophanes does not say only that. Aristophanes says things that raise a laugh, things moreover which he himself had announced as operating between the laughable and the ridiculous, in so far as there is divided between these two terms the fact that the laugh is directed at what the comic aims at, or at the comedian himself.

But what is Aristophanes making a laugh of? Because it is clear that he raises a laugh and that he gets past the barrier of the ridiculous. Is Plato going to make him make us laugh at love? It is quite evident that this already bears witness to the contrary. We would even say that, nowhere, at any moment of these discourses, is love taken so seriously, or so tragically. We are exactly at the level that we moderns impute to this love, after courtly sublimation and after what I could call the romantic misinterpretation of this sublimation, namely the narcissistic overvaluing of the subject, I mean of the subject supposed in the beloved object. Because this is the romantic misunderstanding compared to what I taught you last year about courtly sublimation. Thanks be to God, in Plato's time, we have not yet got to that point, except for this strange Aristophanes, but he is a clown.

Rather are we involved in a sort of zoological observation of imaginary beings, which takes its value from what they evoke from what can undoubtedly be taken in a derisory sense in real beings. Because this indeed is what is in question in these beings who are sliced in two like a hard-boiled egg, one of these bizarre beings like the ones we find on a sandy bottom, a flatfish, a sole, a plaice are evoked here (190e, 191d), which appear to have all that is necessary, two eyes, all these even organs, but which are flattened in a way that they seem to be half of a complete being. It is clear that in the first behaviour which follows the birth of these beings which are born from such a division in two, what Aristophanes shows us at first and what is the underpinning of what immediately comes here in a light which for us is so romantic, is this kind of panicky fatality which is going to make each one of these beings seek above all his half, and then, clinging to it with a tenacity, which one might say has no way out, effectively makes them perish side by side because of their incapacity to rejoin one another. Here is what he depicts for us in these long developments, which is given with all the details, which is extremely vivid, which naturally is projected onto the plane of myth, but which is the way in which, there is forged, by the sculptor who the poet is here, his image of the love relationship.

But is it in this that there lies what we must suppose, what we must put our finger on, that this is something laughable? Quite obviously not. This is inserted into something which (10) irresistibly evokes for us what we can still see in our day on the circus mat when the clowns enter, as is sometimes done, embracing or hooked on in some way or other two by two, coupled belly to belly with a great whirling of four arms, of four legs and of their two heads going head over heels for one or more circuits. In itself, it is something that we would see going very well with the style of fabrication of this type of choir which gave, in a different genre, The Wasps, The Birds, or again The Clouds, about which we will never know under what kind of screen these plays were produced on the stage in antiquity.

But here what kind of ridicule is in question? Is it simply the rather cheerful character of the image all by itself? It is here that I will begin a little development for which I ask your pardon since it may involve us in a rather long detour, because it is essential.

If you read this text, you will see the degree to which, to the degree that this also strikes M. Leon Robin - it is always the same thing, I am not the only one who knows how to read a text - in an extraordinary way, he insists on the spherical character of this personage. It is difficult not to see it, because this spherical, this circular, this sphaira is repeated with such insistence, we are told that the "shape of man was quite round, back and ribs, pleuras kuklo echon, passing about it in a circle" (189e) And we must see this, as I told you above, as the two wheels perched on one another and all the same flat, while here it is round. And this annoys M. Leon Robin who changes a comma that no one has ever changed saying: "I am doing that because I do not want too much stress on the sphere; the important thing is the slicing." And I am not the person to diminish the importance of this slicing, we are going to come back to it a little later. But it is difficult all the same not to see that we are before something very singular and whose term, whose final word I am going to give you immediately, it is that the derision that is in question, what is put under this ridiculous form, is precisely the sphere.

Naturally this does not make you laugh, because the sphere does not affect you in the least! Only be very sure of this, that for centuries it was not that way. You only know it under the form of this fact of psychological inertia which is called good form. A certain number of people, Mr. Ehrenfels and others perceived that there was a certain tendency in forms towards perfection, to rejoin in a doubtful state the sphere, that in short it was this that gave pleasure to the optic nerve. This of course, naturally is very interesting and only makes a start at the problem, because I would point out to you in passing that these Gestalt notions into which people venture so lightly only relaunch the problem of perception. Because if there are such (11) good forms, it is because perception must consist, as one might say, in rectifying them in the sense of the bad ones which are the true. But let us leave to one side the dialectic of the good form on this occasion.

This form has a quite different sense to this properly psychological objectification which has a limited interest. At the time and at the level of Plato, and not only at the level of Plato, but well before him, this form, Sphairos as Empedocles also says, whose verses time prevents me from reading to you, Sphairos in the masculine is a being who, "from every side is similar to itself, and without limit on any side. Sphairos kukloteres, Sphairos which has the form of a ball, this Sphairos reigns in its royal solitude filled by its own contentment", its own sufficiency. This Sphairos haunts the thinking of antiquity. It is the form that takes, at the centre of the world of Empedocles, the phase of gathering together what he himself calls, in his metaphysics Philie or Philotes, Love. This Philotes which he calls elsewhere "schedune Philotes, the Love which gathers together, which agglomerates, which assimilates, which agglutenates"; exactly agglutenated, it is the kresis, it belongs to the kresis of love.

It is very singular that we have seen re-emerge from Freud's pen this idea of love as the pure and simple power of unifying and, as one might say, of attraction without limits in order to oppose it to Thanatos; while we have correlatively and - as you can sense - in a discordant fashion, a very different and very much more fruitful notion in the love-hate ambivalence.
